When it comes to musical instruments, the Book of Mormon is sadly deficient. We searched for the words instrument and instruments and found 24 places in the Bible where they are used with regard to musical instruments. Although the Book of Mormon uses these words, we did not find a single case where they refer to a musical instrument. We searched for the names of specific musical instruments the Israelites used. In the first search we looked for the following instruments: organ, organs, psalteries, psaltery, sackbut, tabret, tabrets, timbrel, timbrels, trump, trumpet, trumpeters, trumpets, trumps and viol. While these words appeared 174 times in the Bible, they are used only seven times in the Book of Mormon. The word trump appears three times, but in every case it is referring to the trump of God. While the word trumpet is found twice, one of these examples (3 Nephi 13:2) has been plagiarized from Matthew 6:2. The only example of any of these musical instruments actually being used is when a Jaredite by the name of Comnor “did sound a trumpet unto the armies of Shiz to invite them forth to battle” (Ether 14:28). It is really surprising that the author of the Book of Mormon, who obviously had a real interest in warfare, never had the Nephites or the Lamanites sound a trumpet.

We also searched for the following musical instruments or words related to them: cornet, cornets, cymbal, cymbals, dulcimer, flute, harp, harped, harpers, harping, harps, pipe, piped, pipers and pipes. The result was that we found these words used 102 times in the Bible. Only two of these words were found in the Book of Mormon, harp and pipe. They both appear in one verse found in 2 Nephi 15:12. An examination of this verse, however, shows that it was plagiarized from Isaiah 5:12 in the Bible. It is obvious, therefore, that the author of the Book of Mormon mentioned none of these musical instruments in his own writing. The same applies to Joseph Smith’s revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants. The Pearl of Great Price does use the word harp in one place (Moses 5:45), but it is obvious that even this is taken from Genesis 4:21.

JEW OR PROTESTANT?

An extremely important question concerning the Book of Mormon is whether it was actually written by Jewish writers who understood the laws and customs of ancient Israel or by someone who was raised in the Christian faith as a Protestant during the early part of the 19th century. The authenticity of the Book of Mormon stands or falls on this question.

The Book of Mormon presents what most Christians feel is a very unusual picture of religious life between 600 B.C. and the coming of Christ. It claims that the ancient Nephites actually worshipped Jesus Christ and established Christian churches during this long period before Christ died and the New Testament was written. Bible scholars find it very hard to accept this claim, and they are even more puzzled when they learn that the Book of Mormon claims that the ancient Nephites also kept the law of Moses at the same time. Between “559 and 545 B.C.” Nephi was supposed to have written the following: “And, notwithstanding we believe in Christ, we keep the law of Moses, and look forward with steadfastness unto Christ, until the law shall be fulfilled. . . . the right way is to believe in Christ . . . And, inasmuch as it shall be expedient, ye must keep the performances and ordinances of God until the Law shall be fulfilled which was given to Moses” (2 Nephi 25:21, 29-30). In his Master’s thesis, Wesley P. Walters takes issue with this type of worship:

The transplantation of New Testament material into the Old disrupts the dispensations that God has established in the unfolding of redemption, and confuses the Old and New Covenants and their respective ordinances. The Book of Mormon is careful to point out that the American Hebrew colony “kept the law of Moses”. . . Yet Christian baptism was said to be taught among the Nephites five hundred years before Christ. . . Furthermore by 147 B.C. a Christian Church is depicted as flourishing, of which people become members through baptism. . . to introduce the New Testament practice of baptism in the name of Christ into the Old Testament period is to confuse the Old and New Covenants and the ordinances connected with each. The Book of Hebrews is very specific that while the Old Testament was in force, the New clearly was not. When the New Covenant had been established, the Old Covenant was abolished (Heb. 8:13, 10:1-9). To introduce the features of the New Covenant into the time period when the Old Covenant was in force is to confuse the two covenants to the extent of rendering them both meaningless. Yet Mormon teaching has followed this pattern first set out in the Book of Mormon. . . . Dr. James D. Bales has well expressed the Book of Mormon’s variance with the biblical teachings concerning the Old and New Covenants: “The two [covenants] could not exist together because he took away the first that he might establish the second. Furthermore, it is evident that the second could not be in force before the first had been taken away. This is evident because the purpose of the taking away of the first was to establish the second. It had to be taken away so the second could be established.” The Book of Mormon, by injecting the New Testament material into the Old Testament period, completely disrupts the biblical pattern so carefully set forth in the Old Testament itself and so faithfully guarded by the New. (“The Use of the Old Testament in the Book of Mormon,” pp. 15-17)

Joseph Smith’s idea of having the Nephites practicing Christianity yet living the law of Moses for hundreds of years seems to be equivalent to a man trying to ride two horses at the same time over rough terrain. Eventually the horses part and the man comes crashing to the ground.

The fact that full-blown Christianity appears far too early in the Book of Mormon and continues to dominate throughout the entire book leads to the conclusion that it was written by someone who at least professed to be a Christian. That person’s familiarity with the New Testament is evident from the 1st book of Nephi until the concluding book of Moroni.

While the Book of Mormon shows a fair knowledge of biblical Christianity and a real interest in the religious topics that were being debated during Joseph Smith’s lifetime, it seems to be almost totally deficient when it comes to the issues which were of great importance to the Jews prior to the time of Christ. The church’s own computer program has helped us to pinpoint some of the areas where the Book of Mormon is sadly lacking with regard to Jewish customs and religion.

NO PASSOVER?

It is a well-known fact that one of the most important items in Judaism is the festival of the passover. While the Jewish people were held in slavery in Egypt, Moses told the elders to “take you a lamb according to your families, and kill the passover. And ye shall take a bunch of hyssop, and dip it in the blood that is in the basin, strike the lintel and the two side posts with the blood that is in the basin . . . For the Lord will pass through to smite the Egyptians; and when he seeth the blood upon the lintel, and on the two side posts, the Lord will pass over the door, and will not suffer the destroyer to come in unto your houses to smite you” (Exodus 12:21 23). The Egyptians did not do this, and consequently lost all their “firstborn.” This judgment upon the Egyptians, of course, convinced Pharaoh that he should let God’s people leave the land. In Exodus 12:14, the Lord told the Jewish people that “this day shall be unto you for a memorial; and ye shall keep it a feast to the Lord throughout your generations; ye shall keep it a feast by an ordinance for ever.”

The importance of the passover to the Jewish people cannot be overstated. Since the Nephites were supposed to have been Israelites who possessed “the five books of Moses” (1 Nephi 5:11), they should have celebrated the passover about six hundred times after they came to America. We would expect, therefore, to find a significant number of references to that festival in the Book of Mormon. A computer search for the words passover and passovers revealed that these words were used 77 times in the Bible. In the Book of Mormon, however, these words are never used at all. It is absolutely astounding that a book purported to have been written by ancient Jewish people would never refer to the passover.

At the time of the passover, the Israelites were supposed to “observe the feast of unleavened bread” (Exodus 12:17). In verse 15, the Lord tells the people that “Seven days shall ye eat unleavened bread; even the first day ye shall put away leaven out of your houses: for Whosoever eateth leavened bread from the first day until the seventh day, that soul shall be cut off from Israel.” The Bible yielded 43 places where unleavened bread was mentioned, but the Book of Mormon was completely silent about the matter. We also searched for the following words: leaven, leavened, leaveneth and unleavened. While the Book of Mormon never used any of these words, the Bible had 100 places where these words appeared.
Besides the passover with the accompanying feast of unleavened bread, the Jewish men were required to attend two other feasts or festivals—i.e., the feast of weeks (also known as the feast of harvest) and the feast of tabernacles (or feast of ingathering). When we searched in the Bible for the two words feast of, we found 41 places where they refer to Jewish feasts. We found the feast of passover, the feast of unleavened bread, the feast of harvest, the feast of weeks, the feast of tabernacles, the feast of the ingathering, the feast of the seventh month, the feast of dedication, the feast of the Lord and the feast of the Jews. Some of these names, of course, are just different names for the same feasts. In the New Testament we find the word Pentecost used three times. This is the Old Testament feast of weeks. We have, therefore, 44 cases in which Jewish feasts or festivals are mentioned in the Bible, and we feel that a search for just the word feast would bring forth more examples. In the Book of Mormon, however, there is not even one case where a Jewish feast or festival was celebrated in the New World!

The Book of Mormon even seems to be deficient with regard to the “sabbath day.” A search for the words sabbath and sabbaths revealed that they were used 171 times in the Bible, but appeared just five times in the Book of Mormon. It is also interesting to note that three of the five cases (Mosiah 13:16, 18, 19) are derived directly from the Bible, Exodus 20:8, 10, 11. It seems almost incredible that the Book of Mormon, which was supposed to have been written by Jewish people, would almost completely disregard the day which was held so sacred by the ancient Israelites.

Even before the Israelites received the law of Moses, they were practicing circumcision. It was a very important part of the Jewish religion. Genesis 17:14 makes it clear that “the uncircumcised man child whose flesh of his foreskin is not circumcised, that soul shall be cut off from his people; he hath broken the covenant.” The Book of Mormon should have many references to this practice if it is really a history of Jewish people. We searched for the words circumcision, circumcised, circumcision, uncircumcised, uncircumcision, foreskin and foreskins and learned that the Bible uses these words 160 times. These same words only appeared five times in the Book of Mormon. Two of the places where they are found (2 Nephi 8:24 and 3 Nephi 20:36) are taken directly from the Bible, Isaiah 52:1. Two other references (2 Nephi 9:33 and Helaman 9:21) are only referring to the “uncircumcised of heart.” The only remaining reference (Moroni 8:8) is found in one of the very last chapters in the book. It says that after the coming of Christ, he told the Nephites that “the law of circumcision is done away in me.” This is a very strange statement because there seems to be no evidence in the Book of Mormon that it was ever practiced.

The Book of Mormon claims that “I, Nephi, did build a temple; and I did construct it after the manner of the temple of Solomon save it were not built of so many precious things . . .” (2 Nephi 5:16). After this verse, however, Nephi never mentions the temple again. His brother Jacob did use this temple to preach a sermon, but after that we find no mention of any temple for hundreds of years. Mormon scholar John L. Sorenson observed: “Perhaps during the centuries of warfare . . . the original temple fell into disuse . . At least we hear nothing about the temple between Jacob’s day and the time when the Zeniffites reoccupied the land, over 400 years later . . .” (An Ancient American Setting for the Book of Mormon, p. 145).

The ancient Israelites had two altars in their temple—the brazen altar for burnt offerings and the golden altar for burning incense. Altars played a very important role in the religious ceremonies of both the Jews and the people around them who worshipped other gods. Consequently, when we searched for the words altar and altars in the Bible, we found that they were mentioned 433 times. The Book of Mormon, however, only used these words four times. It is also interesting to note that two of these cases (Alma 15:17; 17:4) seem to have nothing to do with altars used in temples to offer sacrifices or burn incense. The word altar in these cases refers to the type of altar used in Christian churches where people pray and confess their sins. This is obvious from Alma 15:17: “. . . the people . . . began to assemble themselves together at their sanctuaries to worship God before the altar . . .” Of the two remaining verses which contain the word altar, one of them (2 Nephi 16:6) was obviously copied from the Bible, Isaiah 6:6. The last verse, 1 Nephi 2:7, does mention the fact that Lehi “built an altar of stones, and made an offering to the Lord . . .” This is the only verse where a Jewish type of altar is mentioned in the entire Book of Mormon. The reader will notice, however, that this altar was built when Lehi was traveling in the “wilderness in the borders which are nearer the Red Sea” (verse 5). It has nothing to do with any altar in the New World. Furthermore, it was only a temporary pile of stones, not an altar in a temple. It is plain, therefore, that the Book of Mormon never refers to either a brazen altar to offer sacrifices in the temple or a golden altar for burning incense.

The author of the Book of Mormon seems to have been almost completely in the dark with regard to the importance of sacrifices and offerings in the ancient Jewish religion. We used the computer to search for the following words sacrifice, sacrificed, sacrificest, sacrifices, sacrificeth, sacrificial and sacrificing. The result was that the Bible yielded 298 cases where these words were used, but the Book of Mormon produced only twenty. Of these twenty, however, nine referred to Christ sacrificing his life, three were related to human sacrifice, two were concerning men sacrificing their own lives, one was concerning the sacrifice of “a broken heart and a contrite spirit” and two were specific instructions by Christ to the Nephites to cease making “sacrifices and your burnt offerings” after the law was fulfilled. There were, therefore, only three references that could relate to someone actually making a sacrifice according to the Jewish law.

We searched for the words offering and offerings and discovered that while they were used 989 times in the Bible, they only appeared 13 times in the Book of Mormon. Of the 13, only four could be linked in any way to the type of sacrifices the Jewish priests offered in their temple, four were directly copied from the Bible, two came from Christ’s words to end sacrifices and burnt offerings. The last three were concerning the story of Isaac in the Bible, the offering of Christ and the teaching that people should offer their “whole souls” to God. A search for the words burnt offerings yields only five places in the Book of Mormon where these words appear together. All of these were previously found in our search for the words offering and offerings, and as we stated before, two of the five relate to burnt offerings being forbidden after the appearance of Christ to the Nephites. The Bible, on the other hand, has 86 places. The Book of Mormon never uses the words burnt offering (singular), but they do appear 184 times in the Bible.

The only verse in the Book of Mormon that relates to the inhabitants of the New World making burnt offerings is Mosiah 2:3: “And they also took of the firstlings of their flocks, that they might offer sacrifice and burnt offerings according to the law of Moses.” Instead of helping the case for the authenticity of the Book of Mormon, this verse actually shows that the author of the Book of Mormon really did not understand the law of Moses. M. T. Lamb points out:

According to the law of Moses the firstlings of their flocks were never offered as burnt offerings or sacrifices. All firstlings belonged to the Lord, de jure, and could not be counted as a man’s personal property—whereas, all burnt offerings, or sacrifices for sin of every kind, must be selected from the man’s own personal property, or be purchased with his own money for that purpose, while all firstlings of the flock, as the Lord’s property, came into the hands of the high priest, and by him could be offered up as a peace offering, not as a burnt offering or a sin offering, himself and family eating the flesh. (See Ex. 13:2, 12 and 22:29, 30; Numb. 3:13; 2d Sam. 24:24; Numb. 18:15-18 and other places.)

This one little blunder, then, proves beyond the chance of question that the Book of Mormon could not have been inspired by the Holy Spirit or by an angel of the Lord. This passage is precisely such a passage as Joseph Smith or any other ignorant man like him might have written; it could not have been found in the book if God, or any angel of the Lord, had had to do with its preparation. (The Golden Bible, pp. 109-110)

That the author of the Book of Mormon would make the serious mistake described above with regard to burnt offerings shows that he was unfamiliar with the biblical material on the subject. Moreover, it appears that he was not even aware of the other kinds of Jewish offerings commanded in the Bible. In the King James Version of the Old Testament we find the following: trespass offerings, meat offerings, drink offerings, wave offerings and peace offerings (see Exodus, chapter 29; Leviticus, chapters 2-5; Numbers, chapter 29; Chronicles, chapter 29). The computer showed that these offerings were mentioned 519 times in the Bible. The Book of Mormon, on the other hand, does not have a single place where any of these important offerings are mentioned!

The Book of Mormon not only fails the test with regard to Jewish sacrifices, but it is also deficient when it comes to the ancient laws concerning ceremonial uncleanness. Under the Mosaic law there were certain things people did that would make them unclean.” For instance, in Numbers 19:11-13, we read: “He that toucheth the dead body of any man shall be unclean seven days. He shall purify himself with it on the third day, and on the seventh day he shall be clean . . . Whosoever toucheth the dead body of any man that is dead, and purifieth not himself, defileth the tabernacle of the Lord; and that soul shall be cut off from Israel: because the water of separation was not sprinkled upon him . . .” That these laws concerning ceremonial uncleanness were still in effect when Jesus was born is clear from Luke 2:21-23: “And when eight days were accomplished for the circumcision of the child, his name was called JESUS . . . And when the days of her [Mary’s] purification according to the law of Moses were accomplished, they brought him to Jerusalem, to present him to the Lord . . . And to offer a sacrifice according to that which is said in the law of the Lord, A pair of turtledoves, or two young pigeons.”

The Old Testament also gave the Jewish people strict laws concerning which type of food was clean or unclean. These instructions are still carefully observed by Jewish people today who only eat “kosher” food—i. e., food that is permitted by their dietary laws.

The author of the Book of Mormon seems to have been oblivious to these laws. While the Bible uses the words clean and unclean 327 times, they only appear in the Book of Mormon 25 times. Eleven of these, however, seem to relate to whether a person is going to heaven or to hell. For instance, in 1 Nephi 15:34, we read that “there cannot any unclean thing enter into the kingdom of God . . . ” In six places the material has been taken directly from the Bible, three relate to unclean spirits and the last five are concerning other matters that have no relationship to the ceremonial laws concerning uncleanness in the Bible.

In our search to find if the Book of Mormon mentioned anything about these ancient laws, we searched for the following words: purification, purifications, purified, purifier, purifieth, purify and purifying. The Bible yielded 49 places where these words occurred. While the Book of Mormon had ten places, eight related to Christ’s purifying work in a person’s life and the other two were derived through plagiarism from the Bible.

Although the Book of Mormon has a great deal of material regarding Jesus Christ and Christianity, it has hardly anything that would relate to the early Jewish religion and customs. We have noted, for instance, that the Nephites never celebrated the passover or any of the other festivals or feasts that were so important to the ancient Israelites. Very little appears about the sabbath day and, as we show in our new book, nothing concerning sabbatical years or jubilee. There seems to be no evidence that circumcision was actually practiced. The Book of Mormon also seems to be sadly deficient with regard to material regarding both tithing and the temple. The author of the Book of Mormon seems to know nothing at all about the laws concerning unclean foods and practices, and sacrifices are almost completely absent. In fact, the only time that the author of the Book of Mormon speaks of burnt offerings he makes a serious mistake.

If Joseph Smith had said that the Nephites had totally changed their beliefs before they came to the New World, these matters would be easier to understand. Instead, however, the Book of Mormon itself boasts that “the people did observe to keep the commandments of the Lord; and they were strict in observing the ordinances of God, according to the law of Moses, for they were taught to keep the law of Moses until it should be fulfilled” (Alma 30: 3).

All of this evidence leads to the inescapable conclusion that the Book of Mormon was written by someone raised as a Protestant who had very scanty knowledge with regard to Jewish history, religion and customs.

THE PLAGIARISM QUESTION

In the July 1989 issue of the Messenger we noted that the evidence we now have against the authenticity of the Book of Mormon is at least a thousand times as strong as the textual evidence we had against the Hofmann documents. Much material relating to plagiarism in the Book of Mormon was obtained prior to the time that we began working with the Mormon Church’s computer program, but since that time new and important evidence has come to light.

The idea that the author of the Book of Mormon plagiarized from the New Testament is not new. In his book, Roughing It, page 110, Mark Twain made this observation concerning the Book of Mormon:

> The book seems to be merely a prosy detail of imaginary history, with the Old Testament for a model; followed by a tedious plagiarism of the New Testament. The author labored to give his words and phrases the quaint, old-fashioned sound and structure of our King James’s translation of the Scriptures; and the result is a mongrel—half modern gibleness, and half ancient simplicity and gravity.

It is very clear from the contents of the Book of Mormon that while the author was not a trained Bible scholar, he was rather familiar with the contents of the King James Version of the Bible. Although Mormon apologists are reluctant to face the facts, the evidence shows that Joseph Smith had the ability and the biblical knowledge required to write the Book of Mormon. According to Smith’s earliest account of his life, written in 1832, he claimed he began studying the Bible when he was only about 12 years old:

> At about the age of twelve years my mind become seriously imprest (page 1) with regard to the all important concerns for the welfare of my immortal Soul which led me to searching the scriptures ... from the age of twelve years to fifteen I pondered many things in my heart concerning the situation of the world of mankind ... My mind become exceedingly distressed for I become convicted of my sins and by searching the scriptures I found that ... /mankind/ did not come unto the Lord but that they had apostatised from the true and living faith. (An American Prophet’s Record: The Diaries and Journals of Joseph Smith, pp. 4-5)

Since this document was written in Joseph Smith’s own hand, it shows that he had all the skill necessary to write a book like the Book of Mormon and also that he had been studying the Bible since he was a child.

Joseph Smith’s mother later wrote that her son told her he could take his “Bible and go into the woods, and learn more in two hours, than you can learn at meeting in two years, if you should go all the time” (Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith the Prophet, p. 90). If Joseph Smith began studying the Bible when he was about 12 years old, as his own statement indicates, he would have had about 10 or 11 years experience with the Bible prior to writing the Book of Mormon.

In his Master’s thesis, Wesley P. Walters made these observations about the text of the Book of Mormon:

> When one begins to read the Book of Mormon, if he is well-acquainted with the Bible, he will at once be impressed with the large scale use of biblical materials in the book. Not only is there an unskilled mimicking of the style of the King James Version, but there is an artificial clarity added to that portion of the Book of Mormon that claims to date from the Old Testament period. This contrived clarity is the result of writing back into that Old Testament period New Testament words, phrases and quotations, as well as the introduction of New Testament concepts and teachings into that time-frame. ... The usual Mormon defense is that such knowledge was supernaturally made known to the people in America, just as God in a vision showed Ezekiel that Jerusalem was about to fall and the temple to be destroyed, or Peter given a vision of Cornelius before he met him in person. Such an explanation might be more readily accepted if the Book of Mormon had presented its material in the format of a vision. Instead it introduces its material in much the same way that a nineteenth century frontier preacher introduced biblical quotations into his sermons. The frequency with which the Book of Mormon introduces this chronologically misplaced material into its text would require that God supernaturally provided this American colony with virtually the entire New Testament text, as well as those portions of the Old Testament which postdated their departure for America. ... passages from the New Testament ... are sprinkled generously into the speeches and sermons of Book of Mormon characters in the same manner as one might find them in the sermons of a Methodist or Baptist preacher of Joseph Smith’s day. This type of usage implies an acquaintance with the New Testament books themselves. Only after knowing the entire work can one select from it appropriate words and phrases to employ in this sermonic manner. It is naive to suggest that in every one of those instances God made known each of those biblical phrases and quotations so that the Old Testament Book of Mormon speakers could work them into their message. It is far more reasonable to believe that the insertions of such phrases and quotes came from one who already had the New Testament in hand before him while composing the Book of Mormon. ... The Book of Mormon is intentionally written by Smith in the King James style, ostensibly so that it would sound like the Bible and be more readily accepted as a companion to it. Moreover, for Joseph to have thrown in numerous biblical phrases so generously while making his “translation”, one can only conclude that he must have been much more conversant with the Bible than Mormons are generally prepared to admit. If he knew the Bible well enough to scatter biblical phrases freely throughout the Book of Mormon, there is no reason why he could not have composed the book itself. In his revelations there also appears this same type of biblical quotation along with an employment of the King James style. The Book of Mormon’s biblical phraseology, therefore, must be credited to Joseph Smith, and evidences a surprisingly good working knowledge of the Bible. . . .

The really fatal blow to the proposal that the New Testament material in the Old Testament portion of the Book of Mormon is due to Joseph Smith’s employment of such phrases in the process of translating the book is that such material goes much deeper than the mere use of words and phrases. New Testament concepts, interpretations and theology are all worked into the text itself. (“The Use of the Old Testament in the Book of Mormon,” pp. 7, 10-13)

As Wesley Walters has pointed out, the problem with regard to the Book of Mormon is that it has the ancient Nephites making extensive quotations from works that were not even in existence at that time. In fact, in the 1st and 2nd books of Nephi, the writings of the New Testament are cited 600 years before they were written!

The following might help to illustrate the problem facing believers in the Book of Mormon: Suppose, for instance, someone were to come forth with a book which purported to be written by Moses entitled, The Only True Sayings of Moses, and in this book the following words were attributed to him: “Consider the lilies how they grow: they toil not, they spin not; and yet I say unto you, that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.” Two problems instantly come to mind: One, the quotation is identical to the words of Jesus in Luke 12:27. Two, Solomon was not born until Moses had been dead for hundreds of years. Defenders of The Only True Sayings of Moses might argue that Moses was the true author of this saying and that Jesus merely borrowed it for his own use. With regard to the problem of Solomon being mentioned, these apologists might use Joseph Smith’s defence that the author was really “speaking of things to come as though they had already come” (Mosiah 16:6). It is doubtful, however, that many people would be very impressed by either one of these arguments. As we see it, the case set forth by Mormon apologists in defence of the Book of Mormon seems to be just as unreasonable.

To those who really consider the matter, it should be obvious that the presence of many portions of the New Testament in the Book of Mormon is more out of place than to find the following words in a speech attributed to George Washington: “Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent, a new nation, conceived equal.” These words alone would be enough to prove the speech a forgery. While less than a century separated George Washington and Abraham Lincoln, in the Book of Mormon we have Lehi quoting from the New Testament book of Revelation almost seven centuries before it was written! (The first quotation appears on the second page of the Book of Mormon and is dated “About 600 B.C.” The book of Revelation is believed to have been written about 90 A.D.)

It is clear that the author of the Book of Mormon was holding a King James Version of the Bible in his hand when he produced it. He, therefore, could not have lived in 600 B.C. When all the evidence is examined, it is evident that he actually lived in 1830—some 2,430 years after Lehi was supposed to have fled from Jerusalem.

The 74 pages we devoted to the study of plagiarism in the Book of Mormon in our new book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, only deals with the small plates of Nephi from the book of 1st Nephi through Omni (the material used to replace the missing 116 pages). This material is dated between 600 B.C. and 130 B.C. All of it, therefore, was supposed to have been written before the time of Christ and also before the New Testament was produced. If we had made an extensive study of the entire Book of Mormon, it would have been at least twice as long.

The noted Mormon scholar Hugh Nibley has said that “a forgery is defined by specialists in ancient documents as ‘any document which was not produced in the time, place, and manner claimed by it or its publishers’” (Since Cumorah, p. 160). The material we have published in the first part of our book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, and the parallels to the Bible which appear in the second part of that book furnish irrefutable proof that the Book of Mormon is not the ancient text it claims to be. Regardless of Joseph Smith’s motives for producing the book, it cannot be accepted as a genuine document because it “was not produced in the time, place, and manner claimed by it or its publishers.”

A SELFAHOLIC

At a church service we attended a few weeks ago, a member of our congregation told of attending a meeting of a group of people who were struggling to overcome addiction to drugs and alcohol. He was very impressed by their willingness to admit that their dependence on these items was only a symptom of greater problems within. The man who attended this meeting then told us that even though he was not addicted to alcohol or drugs, he was a recovering “selfaholic.” He went on to explain that all of us are in reality selfaholics.

When we think about it, we realize that this is true and even those who are truly converted to Christ are still recovering selfaholics who are being transformed by God’s power. It is, in fact, the dominating love of self which leads us into sin. Although some people can hide it better than others, none of us can escape the fact that we are by nature very selfish creatures. In Romans 3:23 we read that “all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God” (The New King James Version).

Speaking of Jesus, J. B. Phillips wrote: “It was pride and self-righteousness and the exploitation of others which called forth His greatest anger. Self-love in fact He saw as the arch-enemy. It was this which must be recognized... and deliberately killed if a man were to follow His way of constructive love” (Your God Is Too Small, page 91). Jesus made it very clear that the worst thing that can happen to people is for them to end up imprisoned eternally to sin and selfishness: “For what is a man profited if he gains the whole world, and loses his own soul? Or what will a man give in exchange for his soul?” (Matthew 16:26). Again, in Matthew 10:28, Jesus made the gravity of the situation very clear: “And do not fear those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul. But rather fear Him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell.”

Thomas A. Kempis wrote: “Know that the love of yourself is more hurtful to you than anything else in the world” (Of the Imitation of Christ, p. 42). Because the love of self is more harmful to us than anything else, the Lord tells us to deny ourselves: “Then Jesus said to his disciples, ‘If anyone desires to come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. For whoever desires to save his life will lose it, and whoever loses his life for My sake will find it’” (Matthew 16:24-25). Speaking concerning the 25th verse, Raymond L. Cramer made this observation:

The phrase, “save his life,” refers to saving it for a selfish purpose, utilizing ability in terms of self-gratification—a self-possessed, self-centered life. Jesus was not talking here about some distant future, but physical, down-to-earth, everyday living. He claimed that anyone who used his life in this way would lose it. The word “lose” means to become empty, void, useless and destructive. That which is capable of being useful becomes a source of insecurity, greed, and a vehicle of hostility if it is used for selfish purposes. Fear and anxiety result when man tries to hang onto his life. He loses what he is trying to save—life itself. (The Psychology of Jesus and Mental Health, page 126)

Charles L. Allen commented:

The best summary of the Ten Commandments is the one Jesus gave: “Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind . . . Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself” (Matthew 22:37, 39). Put God and others first; get something into your mind greater than yourself. In so doing you lose yourself, selfishness is blotted out; instead of making ourselves miserable by what we do not have, we begin to gain the blessed thrill of giving what we can give. (God’s Psychiatry, page 80)

Many people feel that “sin” only occurs when we do wrong to others. The truth of the matter, however, is that our selfishness continually leads us into sins of omission. This is explained in James 4:17: “Therefore, to him who knows to do good and does not do it, to him it is sin.” In Matthew, chapter 25, Jesus declares that those who selfishly ignore the needs of others will be found on his “left hand” in the day of judgment (see verses 31-46). It is very easy for us to see the sins and selfishness of others and fail to comprehend our own wicked condition before God. Jesus expressed it in this way:

“And why do you look at the speck in your brother’s eye, but do not consider the plank in your own eye? Or how can you say to your brother, ‘Let me remove the speck out of your eye’; and look, a plank is in your own eye? Hypocrite! First remove the plank from your own eye, and then you will see clearly to remove the speck out of your brother’s eye.” (Matthew 7:3-5)

The Pharisees once asked why Jesus ate with “tax collectors and sinners.” Jesus responded as follows: “Those who are well have no need of a physician, but those who are sick. I did not come to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance” (Mark 2:17). Since Jesus made it clear in other verses that the Pharisees themselves were spiritually blind, it is obvious that he was trying to tell them that people must realize their own sinful condition, repent and be born again before they can enter into the kingdom of heaven. The Pharisees simply refused to face this fact. Since they did not believe they were spiritually sick, they had no need of the Great Physician.

In Luke 18:9-14 we read a parable Jesus related the following:

. . . to some who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others: “Two men went up to the temple to pray, one a Pharisee and the other a tax collector. The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself, ‘God, I thank You that I am not like other men—extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this tax collector. I fast twice a week; I give tithes of all that I possess.’ And the tax collector, standing afar off, would not so much as raise his eyes to heaven, but beat his breast, saying, ‘God be merciful to me a sinner!’ I tell you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other; for everyone who exalts himself will be abased, and he who humbles himself will be exalted.”

It is very easy to condemn the alcoholic, drug addict, adulterer, murderer or those who commit other flagrant sins and yet refuse to see our own sinful and selfish condition before a holy God. If, however, we confess to God that we are truly selfishaholics who are desperately in need of his mercy, we will be forgiven of all our sins. Those of us who have taken this step of faith must continue to remember that we are only recovering selfishaholics who need Gods power to overcome this addiction to having our own selfish way. Besides trusting in the Lord’s strength, we need to find a support group of other recovering selfishaholics who can encourage us to remain strong in times of temptations. This group is usually known as a “church.” If it is serving its true purpose, a church is actually like a hospital where the Great Physician is working through others to help treat our selfishaholic condition. We, in turn, can encourage others to resist the temptations which selfishaholics encounter.

Those of us who have come to God for healing must be careful that we do not think that we are better than other selfishaholics who have not yet come to accept the truth about their condition. Apostle Paul wrote: “For who makes you differ from another? And what do you have that you did not receive? Now if you did indeed receive it, why do you glory as if you had not received it?” (1 Corinthians 4:7). It is only “by grace you have been saved through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God, not of works, lest anyone should boast” (Ephesians 2:8-9).

According to the Bible, those who refuse to acknowledge they are selfishaholics and claim that they “have no need of a physician” will remain in that unhappy condition forever, whereas those who admit they have a problem and turn to God will receive His help in treating this condition and in the next life they will find total deliverance and eternal happiness.
IN THE MAIL

We receive a great deal of encouraging mail from our readers. The extracts from the letters which follow are just a brief sample.

We converted to Mormonism 16 years ago. . . . We subsequently married in the Temple in New Zealand . . . I became a Christian in October last year and my husband followed shortly after . . . two other families have left the Mormon Church which we attended after I witnessed to them that the truth can only be found through Jesus Christ and gave them literature to read. I believe another family who are also close friends of ours and who are currently reading your book “Mormonism—Shadow or Reality” will leave . . . We are so grateful to you and other Christians like you who have dedicated their lives to seeking the truth . . . We feel so full of the spirit of God and we love Jesus with all our hearts. (Letter from Australia)

My husband and I would like to thank both of you for your dedicated research and the enlightening facts regarding the Mormon Church. . . . It saved a marriage and . . . answered numerous questions. . . . we now have an inner peace which cannot be touched by those who would condemn and sadly shake their heads . . . (Letter from Nevada)

I was a very active LDS member for thirteen years; the Lord used your “Shadow or Reality” work to lead me to the point where I began challenging what I had been taught by the church. While I give the real glory and credit to Jesus & the Word of God, the Lord used your work to help in my personal discovery of Jesus and in my freedom from the error of Mormonism. (Letter from California)

Thanks for your help in leaving the Mormons and making the transition to Christianity. (Letter from Pennsylvania)

I was L.D.S. for 5 years . . . I had lots of serious questions that went unanswered until a friend loaned me your books. I am no longer L.D.S. and I am a lot happier . . . Your works are certainly a light shining in the dark . . . (Letter from Georgia)

Thank you so much for all the literature! . . . The information provided helped me to share the truth with a Mormon family I know. They have now begun the journey out of Mormonism—Praise the Lord!! (Letter from California)

IMPORTANT VIDEO

Personal Freedom Outreach has produced a video on Mormonism which we highly recommend. It is entitled, Mormonism: The Christian View. The narration is done by Wesley P. Walters. It deals with Mormon history, doctrines, the claim to authority, changes in doctrine, false prophecies, and witnessing suggestions. It is available from Utah Lighthouse Ministry for $24.00 (plus shipping)

MEETING THE NEEDS

Book sales only cover half of the expenses of Utah Lighthouse Ministry. Besides the expenses of the work on Mormonism, we also provide support for 100 children through World vision, those who are interested in helping our ministry can send their tax-deductible contributions to Utah Lighthouse Ministry, PO Box 1884. Indian Origins and the Book of Mormon, by Dan Vogel provides important evidence demonstrating that the Book of Mormon fits well into “the pre-1830 environment of Joseph Smith.” It shows that the idea that the Indians were descendants of the ancient Hebrews was discussed by many writers prior to the time Joseph Smith wrote the Book of Mormon in 1830.

THE SALAMANDER THAT REFUSED TO DIE

As most of our readers are aware, the Mormon murderer Mark Hofmann fooled his church’s prophets with a batch of forged documents which included a letter about a white salamander that revealed the Book of Mormon to Joseph Smith. Although Mr. Hofmann confessed to his crimes a few years ago, the church leaders cannot put the “salamander scandal” behind them. Since the Mormon leaders claim that they have prophetic powers, many members of the church cannot understand how they could have been fooled.

Hundreds of thousands of copies of books concerning the scandal have now been sold. The latest development is the publication of a paper-back edition of Salamander: The Story of the Mormon Forgery Murders, by Linda Sillitoe and Allen Roberts. This excellent study, which used to sell in hard-back binding for $17.95, is now available for $5.95. In addition, we have combined our books, Tracking the White Salamander and Confessions of a White Salamander into one volume and reduced the price to $6.95. While the Sillitoe-Roberts book gives an excellent account of the Hofmann story, our two books add details that are not found in any of the other books available. For instance, we have a great deal of testimony from Hofmann’s preliminary hearing in the first volume and the most important parts of his confession are cited in the second volume. When these three books were first published, it would have cost the reader $28.85 to obtain them. Because Salamander is now available in paper-back and our two books have been combined, we are offering all three for the following price if they are ordered before April 30, 1990:

In response to Fawn M. Brodie’s book, No Man Knows My History, the noted Mormon apologist Hugh Nibley declared:

Yet of all churches in the world only this one has not found it necessary to readjust any part of its doctrine in the last hundred years. . . . How does Brodie explain the fact that the doctrine which she claims was the haphazard outgrowth of complete opportunism remains the most stable on earth? (No Ma’am That’s Not History, 1946, pp. 46-47)

Although most Mormons have always placed a great deal of weight in Dr. Nibley’s arguments, recent developments within the church itself will undoubtedly cause many to wonder about his claims concerning doctrinal stability. The New York Times gave this startling report in an article which begins on the first page of the issue dated May 3, 1990:

The Mormon Church has changed some of its most sacred rituals, eliminating parts of the largely secret ceremonies that have been viewed as offensive to women and to members of some other faiths.

Last month the church . . . quietly dropped from its temple rituals a vow in which women pledged obedience to their husbands . . . and a portrayal of non-Mormon clergy as hirelings of Satan.

Church officials have confirmed that changes went into effect in mid-April, but the ceremonies are considered to be too sacred, they say, for them to comment further . . . More specific information on the changes has been provided to the news media by Mormons participating in the rituals at the church’s 43 temples around the world and by former Mormons who are critical of the rituals. A number of Mormons who would not discuss details of the rituals verified that these reports were “pretty factual” or “not inaccurate.” . . .

NEW BOOK ON TEMPLE

Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony, 1842-1990, by Jerald and Sandra Tanner. This book will contain reprints of early accounts of the temple endowment ceremony so that the reader can see how the ritual evolved over the years. It will also have testimony on the ritual which was given before a committee of the U.S. Senate and evidence showing that Joseph Smith borrowed from Masonry in creating his temple ceremony. Regular Price: $4.00

Pre-publication Special: $3.00
Must be ordered before August 15, 1990

“I’ve known an awful lot of people who went once and it was years before they’d go back, especially women,” he said.

Bruce L. Olsen, managing director of the church’s communications office in Salt Lake City, denied that the changes were made in response to criticism or social pressure. The Mormon Church believes “in continued and modern revelation,” Mr. Olsen said, so that practices might be changed when “the Lord clarified” church teaching.

But some Mormons see the church as responding, without admitting it, both to critics and to the church’s growth overseas.

Among the critics are many conservative Christians who complain that Mormonism features occult practices.

The Arizona Republic (April 28, 1990) referred to the modifications in the ceremony as “Revolutionary changes.” The same article went on to state:

The changes in the Temple Endowment Ceremony are seen as a move to bring the secret ceremony closer to mainstream Christianity. The changes are the most drastic revisions of the century.

Church officials in Salt Lake City refused to discuss the ceremony, which is shrouded in secrecy. In fact, the church has issued a directive to temple members telling them to refrain from talking about the changes in the ceremony.

Another prominent Mormon, who asked not to be identified, confirmed that portions of the ceremony have been removed.

“The temple ceremony has been significantly abridged,” he said.

Changes in the ceremony include:

A modified version of the woman’s vow of obedience to the husband.

“I think this is in response to the feminist movement in the Mormon Church,” said Sandra Tanner, a former Mormon who now heads Utah Lighthouse Ministries in Salt Lake City.

“Many of the women objected to the obedience.”

An article by Associated Press writer Vern Anderson also noted that the ceremony has “undergone what some view as their most significant changes this century.” He went on to say:

The revisions, effective April 10 in the faith’s 43 temples, are being greeted with enthusiasm by church members who are being read a statement from the governing First Presidency which says the revisions, following a long and prayerful review, were unanimously approved by that three-member body and the advisory Quorum of the Twelve Apostles. (Salt Lake Tribune, April 29, 1990)

On May 5, 1990, the Los Angeles Times printed an article by John Dart. In that article, Mr. Dart reported:

Most Mormon Church members quoted last month in news stories about revisions in the church’s confidential temple ceremony have been summoned for interviews by church officials. One man said he was reprimanded for talking to the press and another was asked to surrender his “temple recommend.” The public communications office of the Church issued a statement Thursday, defending the questioning of members and re-emphasizing the sacred confidentiality of the temples.

REVEALED BY GOD

Mormon leaders have always proclaimed that the temple ritual—often referred to as the “temple endowment” because the recipients are supposed to be “endowed with power from on high”—was given to Joseph Smith, the first Mormon prophet, by revelation. The ordinances in this ritual, which are performed for both the living and the dead (by proxy), are considered to be “most sacred.” A person has to go through these ceremonies before becoming a missionary and those who desire to be married in the temple for “time and eternity” must first have their “temple endowments.”

Mormon theology teaches that those who are married in the temple can eventually become Gods and rule over their own creations. Apostle Bruce R. McConkie affirmed that the righteous who are married in the temple “for time and eternity” have “gained eternal life (exaltation), the greatest of all the gifts of God . . . Those so inheriting are the sons and daughters of God . . . They are joint-heirs with Christ . . . becoming gods in their own right” (Mormon Doctrine, 1979, pp. 117-118). President Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth prophet of the church, made the matter very clear:

It fills my heart with sadness when I see in the paper the name of a daughter or a son of members of this Church, and discover that she or he is going to have a ceremony and be married outside of the temple of the Lord, because I realize what it means, that they are cutting themselves off from exaltation in the kingdom of God . . . These young people who seem to be so happy now, when they rise in the resurrection—and find themselves in the condition in which they will find themselves—then there will be weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth, and bitterness of soul . . .
Civil Marriage Makes Servants In Eternity. . . . Celestial Marriage Makes Gods In Eternity. . . . it is open to us; it is a free gift; it doesn’t cost us anything: only righteousness, faith, obedience; and surely we can pay that price. (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, pp. 60-63)

Mormons who go through the temple ceremony and are sealed in marriage for eternity believe that they will not only become Gods, but will also continue to have children throughout all eternity. They will people other worlds with their spiritual children and these children will worship and pray to the husband as God. Mormons feel that the God of the Bible was not always God and that he also had to pass through the same endowments to achieve deity. Wilford Woodruff, who became the fourth prophet of the Mormon Church, proclaimed that “the Lord had His endowments long ago; it is thousands and millions of years since He received His blessings . . . . He is far in advance of us” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, p. 192).

According to a revelation given by Joseph Smith, those who will not submit to Celestial Marriage are . . . . appointed angels in heaven, which angels are ministering servants, to minister for those who are worthy of a far more, and an exceeding, and an eternal weight of glory . . . . these angels . . . remain separately and singly, without exaltation, in their saved condition, to all eternity; and from henceforth are not Gods, but are angels of God forever and ever. (Doctrine and Covenants 132:16-17)

Although faithful Mormons have written many articles and books on temples, they have been very careful not to tell what actually goes on in the endowment ritual. One of the most revealing and concise statements, however, comes from comments President Brigham Young made in 1877. These comments were recorded in the diary of L. John Nuttall. The second prophet of the church remarked:

When we got our washings and anointings under the hands of the Prophet Joseph at Nauvoo, we had only one room to work in, with the exception of a little side room or office where we were washed and anointed, had our garment placed upon us and received our new name; and after he had performed these ceremonies, he gave the key-words, signs, tokens, and penalties. Then after, we went into the large room . . . . Joseph Smith divided up the room the best that he could, hung up the veil, marked it, gave us our instructions as we passed along from one department to another, giving us signs, tokens, penalties, with the key-words pertaining to those signs. (Statement of Brigham Young, recorded in the diary of L. John Nuttall, February 7, 1877, as cited in God, Man, And The Universe, by Hyrum L. Andrus, 1968, p. 334)

The reader will notice that President Young mentioned washings, anointings, garments, the new name, the key-words, signs, tokens and penalties. He also stated that there was a “veil” with certain marks on it. On another occasion, Brigham Young made it clear that the endowment contains secret information that the initiated need to get into heaven: “Your endowment is, to receive all those ordinances in the House of the Lord . . . . to enable you to walk back to the presence of the Father, passing the angels who stand as sentinels, being enabled to give them the key words, the signs and tokens, pertaining to the Holy Priesthood, and gain your eternal exaltation in spite of earth and hell” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 31). Those who have actually been through the ceremony affirm that secret grips, signs and key-words are learned during the ceremony which will be needed after death for a person to gain entrance into God’s presence. It is at the “veil” that the Lord himself questions the candidate who desires to enter into his presence.

The fact that the temple ritual was changed by the present leaders of the church will undoubtedly cause serious problems for many devout members of the church who feel that these ceremonies cannot be tampered with. They will probably have a difficult time understanding how the General Authorities can meddle with a sacred ceremony which was supposed to have been given by revelation to Joseph Smith.

The inspired nature of the ritual has been impressed on the minds of the Mormon people since the 1840’s. Even before the Nauvoo temple was built, Joseph Smith gave a revelation foretelling that God himself was about to restore the ancient mysteries that had been lost from the earth:

. . . . build a house to my name, for the Most High to dwell therein. For there is not a place found on earth that he may come to and restore again that which was lost unto you, or which he hath taken away, even the fulness of the priesthood. . . . And verily I say unto you, let this house be built unto my name, that I may reveal mine ordinances therein . . . . For I deign to reveal unto my church things which have been kept hid from before the foundation of the world, things that pertain to the dispensation of the fulness of times. And I will show unto my servant Joseph all things pertaining to this house, and the priesthood thereof, and the place whereon it shall be built. (Doctrine and Covenants 124:27-28, 40-42)

After Joseph Smith received the endowment ceremony, it was accepted as a divine revelation from God. Since that time church leaders have continued to stress that the endowment came from heaven. Apostle John A. Widtsoe, for instance, wrote the following: “Joseph Smith received the temple endowment and its ritual, as all else that he promulgated, by revelation from God” (Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, Prophet of God, 1951, p. 249). Apostle Bruce R. McConkie wrote the following under the title “Temple Ordinances”: “Certain gospel ordinances are of such a sacred and holy nature that the Lord authorizes their performance only in holy sanctuaries prepared and dedicated for that very purpose. . . . They were given in modern times to the Prophet Joseph Smith by revelation, many things connected with them being translated by the Prophet from the papyrus on which the Book of Abraham was recorded” (Mormon Doctrine, p. 779). The current prophet of the church, Ezra Taft Benson, does not hesitate to affirm that the endowment ritual came by revelation:

The endowment was revealed by revelation and can be understood only by revelation. . . . This temple . . . is a place of revelation. . . . The laws and ordinances which cause men and women to come out of the world and become sanctified are administered only in these holy places. They were given by revelation and are comprehended by revelation. (The Teachings of Ezra Taft Benson, 1988, pp. 250, 252)

In the past, Mormon leaders have not only taught that the endowment came by revelation, but also that it was not changed since the time of Joseph Smith. Just after the church passed into the 20th century, there was an attempt to remove Mormon Senator Reed Smoot from his seat. These lengthy hearings are usually referred to as the Reed Smoot Case. Although Senator Smoot retained his seat, the hearings proved to be very embarrassing for the church because of the testimony given concerning polygamy after the Manifesto and charges of Mormon Church interference in politics. In any case, when Senator Smoot, who was also an apostle in the church, was questioned about the endowment ceremony, he responded: “... the endowments have never changed; as I understand it; it has been so testified, and that Joseph Smith, jr., himself was the founder of the endowments” (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 3, p. 185).

On page 140 of the same volume, the following statements by President Joseph F. Smith, the sixth prophet of the church, were entered into the record:

It [the Nauvoo temple] was finished . . . and was dedicated unto the Lord. The ordinances of the house of God were administered therein as they had been taught to the leading authorities of the church by the Prophet Joseph Smith himself. The same gospel, the same ordinances, the same authority and blessings that were administered by the Prophet Joseph Smith, and taught by him to his associates, are now being enjoyed by and taught to the Latter-Day Saints in the four temples . . . When you hear anybody say we have changed the ordinances, that we have transgressed the laws, or broken the everlasting covenants which were entered into under the personal administration of the Prophet Joseph Smith, tell them for me . . . and for all those who are living to-day who received blessings and ordinances under the hands of the Prophet Joseph Smith, that they are in error. The same gospel prevails to-day, and the same ordinances are administered today, both for the living and for the dead, as were administered by the prophet himself and delivered by him to the church.

These statements by President Smith were originally printed in the church’s newspaper, Deseret Evening News, December 1, 1900. President Smith’s son, Joseph Fielding Smith, who served as the tenth prophet of the church in the early 1970’s, printed an affidavit by Bathsheba W. Smith which contained the following:

Near the close of the year 1843, or in the beginning of the year 1844, I received the ordinance of anointing . . . the same day . . . I received my endowment . . . The endowments were given under the direction of the Prophet Joseph Smith . . . there has been no change, to my certain knowledge, in these ceremonies, They are the same today as they were then. (Blood Atonement and the Origin of Plural Marriage, p. 87)

Mormon leaders have not only taught that their church has not changed its doctrines and ordinances, but they have pointed to changes by other churches as evidence of apostasy. In an editorial published in the Church Section of the Deseret News, June 5, 1965, we find the following:

... God is unchangeable, the same yesterday, today and forever. . . . The great mistake made down through the ages by teachers of Christianity, is that they have supposed they could place their own private interpretation upon scriptures, allow their own personal convenience to become a controlling factor, and change the basis of [C]hristian law and practice to suit themselves. This is apostasy.

The Gospel can not possibly be changed . . . the saving principles must ever be the same. They can never change . . . the Gospel must always be the same in all of its parts . . . no one can change the Gospel . . . if they attempt to do so, they only set up a man-made system which is not the Gospel, but is merely a reflection of their own views . . . if we substitute “any other Gospel,” there is no salvation in it . . . the Lord and His Gospel remain the same—always.

In 1982, W. Grant Bangerter, executive director of the Temple Department and a member of the First Quorum of Seventy, made it very clear that the temple ceremony could not be changed:

“As temple work progresses, some members wonder if the ordinances can be changed or adjusted. These ordinances have been provided by revelation, and are in the hands of the First Presidency. Thus, the temple is protected from tampering.” (Deseret News, Church Section, January 16, 1982)

It would appear that instead of protecting the ordinances, the current First Presidency and the Council of the Twelve Apostles have themselves been “tampering” with them. It is interesting to note that the first Mormon prophet, Joseph Smith, proclaimed that the ordinances could never be changed:

Now the purpose in Himself in the winding up scene of the last dispensation is that all things pertaining to that dispensation should be conducted precisely in accordance with the preceding dispensations. . . . He set the ordinances to be the same forever and ever, and set Adam to watch over them, to reveal them from heaven to man, or to send angels to reveal them. (History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 208)

The Book of Mormon itself accuses the Catholics of conspiring to alter the Bible. It bluntly states that “many plain and precious things” have been deliberately removed:

... thou seest the formation of that great and abominable church, which is most abominable above all other churches; for behold they have taken away from the gospel of the Lamb many parts which are plain and most precious; and also many covenants of the Lord have they taken away. . . . this they have done that they might pervert the right ways of the Lord, that they might blind the eyes and harden the hearts of the children of men. . . . thou seest that after the book hath gone forth through the hands of the great and abominable church, that there are many plain and precious things taken away from the book . . . because of the many plain and precious things which have been taken out of the book . . . an exceedingly great many do stumble, yea, insomuch that Satan hath great power over them. (Book of Mormon, I Nephi 13:26-30)

Joseph Fielding Smith, Jr., the son of the tenth prophet of the church, charged:

The Bible alone is an insufficient guide because the “plainness of the gospel” has been removed. . . . The early “apostate fathers” did not think it was wrong to tamper with inspired scripture. If any scripture seemed to endanger their viewpoint, it was altered, transplanted or completely removed from the biblical text. All this was done that they might keep their traditions. Such mutilation was considered justifiable to preserve the so-called “purity” of their doctrines. (Religious Truths Defined, 1959, pp. 175-176)

Mormon Apostle Mark E. Petersen bluntly stated: “Many insertions were made [in the Bible], some of them ‘slanted’ for selfish purposes, while at times deliberate falsifications and fabrications were perpetrated” (As Translated Correctly, 1966, p. 4).

The current prophet of the church, President Ezra Taft Benson, emphatically proclaimed: “The Book of Mormon is the keystone in our witness of Jesus Christ . . . Unlike the Bible, which passed through generations of copyists, translators and corrupt religionists who tampered with the text, the Book of Mormon came from writer to reader in just one inspired step of translation” (The Teachings of Ezra Taft Benson, 1988, page 53).

Since Mormon leaders and apologists have freely criticized other churches for making changes and have claimed that their doctrines are “the most stable on earth,” the General Authorities of the church must have approached the question of changing the temple ceremony with a great deal of caution. David John Buerger informs us that when some procedural changes were suggested in the temple ceremony some years ago, “initial opposition came from Elder Harold B. Lee due to what he perceived as ‘doctrinal tampering’ “ (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1987, p. 63). Harold B. Lee later became the 11th prophet of the church. While minor changes have been made in the ceremony during the last few decades, they appear insignificant when compared with those made on April 10, 1990.

We would suspect that the Mormon leaders must have decided to make the present changes many months ago. Since “motion pictures have replaced some of the live actors” in most of the temples, it follows that it would take time to make new films containing the changes. The Salt Lake Tribune, April 29, 1990, reported that the “new endowment film, the fifth since the 1950s, incorporates the most recent revisions” (The Story of the Latter-day Saints, 1976, p. 574). It should also be noted that it would take time to make new translations of the changes for the foreign temples. We may never know for certain whether George P. Lee, who was a member of the First Quorum of the Seventy, knew of the proposed changes in the temple ceremony before his excommunication was announced in the September 2, 1889, issue of the Salt Lake Tribune. It is interesting to note, however, that in a letter “To the First Presidency and the Twelve,” Lee did mention his concern that other church leaders felt they could change the gospel:

7. I have heard a few of you declare that you are greater than ancient apostles such as Moses, Abraham, Noah[,] Is[a]iah, Isaac, Jacob and etc. This reflects the attitude of all of you.
8. I have heard one of [or?] more of you declare that you can change anything Jesus had said or taught. This also reflects the attitude of all of you. (Letter by George P. Lee, photographically printed in Excommunication of a Mormon Church Leader, page 54)

Less than two weeks before the changes were made in the temple, President Gordon B. Hinckley, First Counselor in the First Presidency, expressed concern about members of the church talking about the temple ceremony: “I remind you of the absolute obligation to not discuss outside the temple that which occurs within the temple. Sacred matters deserve sacred consideration. We are under obligation, binding and serious, to not use temple language or speak of temple matters outside
. . . do not discuss outside of the temple that which occurs in the temple. . . . when you leave the doors of the House of the Lord, be true to a sacred trust to speak not of that which is holy and sanctified” (The Ensign, May 1990, p. 52). It seems obvious that President Hinckley gave this warning in an attempt to keep members from talking about the changes which were to be made in the ceremony ten days later. It is obvious, of course, that Hinckley’s admonition was not followed by many members of the church and therefore accounts of the changes in the ritual made their way to the news media. We had been told that changes would be made some time before they actually took place, and members of the church discussed them with us after they were made.

It is interesting to note that the changes in the temple ceremony were put into effect immediately after the church’s general conference had ended (the conference ended April 1st and the changes were made on April 10th). The temple presidents were apparently given instructions about the changes before they returned from conference to their work in the various temples throughout the world. The general membership of the church, however, left the conference completely in the dark with regard to what was about to happen to their sacred ritual.
Since it would be six months before another general conference would take place, any dissenting opinions or discussion of the changes would have to take place on a local level.

Church leader Joseph Fielding Smith declared that “One of the greatest blessings given to mankind is the gift of free agency” (Answers to Gospel Questions, vol. 3, p. 46). As far as we can determine, faithful Latter-day Saints were given no chance to exercise their free agency with regard to the changes made in the endowment ceremony. The method of handling this whole matter, however, was in accord with a statement which appeared in the official Mormon publication, Improvement Era, June 1945 (p. 354): “When our leaders speak, the thinking has done. When they propose a plan—it is God’s plan. When they point the way, there is no other which is safe. When they give direction, it should mark the end of controversy.”

Although it is often ignored, the church actually has a doctrine of “common consent” which should have applied to the alterations made in the temple ritual. In a revelation given by Joseph Smith in July 1830 we find the following: “And all things shall be done by common consent in the church, by much prayer and faith, for all things you shall receive by faith.
Amen” (Doctrine and Covenants 26:2). Section 28:13 reaffirms that “all things must be done in order, and by common consent in the church . . . .”

Joseph F. Smith, the sixth prophet of the church, testified as follows in the Reed Smoot investigation: “Mr. Smith.—I will say this, Mr. Chairman, that no revelation given through the head of the church ever becomes binding and authoritative upon the members of the church until it has been presented to the church and accepted by them” (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, p. 96).
Apostle John Henry Smith gave this testimony in vol. 2, p. 321:

Mr. Smith. Yes, sir; he [the prophet] receives revelations;
but the revelations must be accepted by his church by vote.
Mr. Tayler. So that what the Almighty orders depends on whether the people who are ordered want to do it or not?
Mr. Smith. Yes, sir; there is no force on the Mormon people.

Apostle James E. Talmage likewise testified: “If it is a revelation it is a revelation, and amounts to just so much; but as to being a binding law upon the church—a law of practice and action—it would have to be first adopted by the church to become such” (Ibid., vol. 3, p. 80).

From the testimony given by the Mormon leaders, a person would certainly be led to believe that a major revision of the temple ritual (a ceremony which was supposed to have been given by revelation) would have to be approved by church members before it would be binding on the Mormon people and used in the church’s 43 temples. For the General Authorities to drop out important portions of a ceremony they claim came from God himself, seems far worse than what they have charged the Catholics with doing. After all, the Book of Mormon’s accusation that the “great and abominable church” removed many plain and precious things” from the Bible (a charge which the Mormon leaders cannot prove) relates to portions that would have been available at one time to everyone that had access to the Biblical text. The items which were removed from the temple ceremony were supposed to have been so sacred that they were never revealed to the world. These secret ceremonies could only be found in the temples of the Lord. These rituals, in fact, purport to give the information on how men may become Gods!

Mormon leaders who have now passed away would have been shocked at what the present leaders altered or removed from the temple ceremony. Apostle James E. Talmage emphasized:

No jot, iota, or title of the temple rites is otherwise than uplifting and sanctifying. In every detail the endowment ceremony contributes to covenants of morality of life, consecration of person to high ideals, devotion to truth, patriotism to nation, and allegiance to God. (The House of the Lord, 1968, p. 84)

As the newspaper accounts have stated, the Mormon leaders have removed the “penalties” which were previously held to be extremely important and sacred. The reader will remember that we have quoted President Brigham Young as saying that Joseph Smith himself “gave the key-words, signs, tokens, and penalties.” Before the recent changes in the ceremony, it was stressed in the ceremony itself that the penalties were sacred:

We are required to give you the First Tokens of the Aaronic Priesthood. Before doing this, however, we desire to impress upon your minds the sacred character of the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign and penalty, together with that of all the other Tokens of the Holy Priesthood, with their accompanying names, signs and penalties, which you will receive in the temple this day. They are most sacred and are guarded by solemn covenants and obligations of secrecy to the effect that under no condition, even at the peril of your life, will you ever divulge them . . . The representation of the penalties indicates different ways in which life may be taken. (Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? p. 468)

From this it is very clear that the penalties, which have now been removed from the temple ritual, were previously considered to be “most sacred.”

Harold B. Lee, who later became the twelfth prophet of the church, compared the things found in the temple ritual to the “pearls” that Jesus mentioned in Matthew 7:6:

But we say the ordinances are sacred as contrasted with just being secret. . . . the Master said, “Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you.” . . . in temples like this, there could be revealed that which couldn’t be had otherwise. (Improvement Era, Feb. 1965, p. 123, as cited in Achieving a Celestial Marriage, p. 202)

Other Mormon leaders have also identified the elements of the temple ceremony with the pearls mentioned by Christ. If this were the case, it would appear that the Mormon leaders have now thrown away some of their “most sacred” pearls!

SECRETS LEAK OUT

Joseph Smith swore those who took part in the endowments to secrecy, but because of his practice of plural marriage and other doctrines he taught, many of his followers became alienated from the Mormon Church and some of them revealed the contents of the ritual. An account was published as early as April 15, 1846, in the Warsaw Signal. Increase McGee Van Dusen and his wife exposed the temple ceremony in 1847, and their account was reprinted several times. Many other exposures were printed in the 19th century. As we noted earlier, the Reed Smoot investigation took place just after the turn of the century. At that time many people who had been through the ritual were questioned regarding its contents. While a number refused to talk about it, others spoke concerning what went on in the temples. Their testimony was printed by the United States Government in four volumes.

In 1889 John Moore and W.J. Edgar were denied citizenship because it was believed that they had taken “an oath or obligation incompatible with the oath of citizenship . . .” As in the Reed Smoot investigation, Mormons or those who had formerly been Mormons were called upon to give testimony concerning the temple ceremony. In the “Temple Lot Case,” a dispute over the property on which a temple was to be built, additional testimony was given concerning the ritual. Much of this testimony appears in a large volume entitled, The Temple Lot Case.

On February 12, 1906, the Salt Lake Tribune printed the temple ritual, and in 1931, W. M. Paden published an account of the endowment ceremony in Temple Mormonism—Its Evolution, Ritual and Meaning. In 1964, William J. Whalen printed the ceremony (see Latter-Day Saints in the Modern Day World), and two years later John L. Smith, a Baptist minister, published the ritual in I Visited the Temple.

In 1964, we reprinted Paden’s 1931 publication concerning the temple ceremony. We suspected, however, that there had been some changes in the ceremony over the years. Since we wanted to publish the most accurate account possible, we had a couple who had been through the ritual about fifty times revise Paden’s work. Later, however, a man who had been through the temple approximately 120 times heard that we were preparing to publish the ritual and felt that it was important that the most accurate account possible should be given to the world. He, therefore, volunteered to bring the ceremony right up to date. We published this account in vol. 1 of The Mormon Kingdom in 1969, and later we incorporated this same account into our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? Tens of thousands of copies have been distributed throughout the world since that time. It was our feeling that Mormons should have the right to know what they were getting into before they were sworn to secrecy and had to take part in the demonstration of the penalties. Although we felt that we were performing an important service for the Mormon people, many people were horrified that we would dare to print the ritual. Nevertheless, a number of Mormon scholars verified that we had produced an extremely accurate account of the ceremony. Many Mormons had a difficult time believing that God would allow anyone to reproduce the ritual and found it hard to believe that a printed copy actually existed. Writing in the Los Angeles Times, May 5, 1990, John Dart commented: “Some candid Mormon officials have acknowledged in interviews that the whole secret ritual was published years ago by church critics Jerald and Sandra Tanner of Salt Lake City.”

The Salt Lake City Public Library obtained a number of copies of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? Unfortunately, however, there was a continual problem with people ripping or cutting out pages which related to the temple endowment. Some people wondered if the church would allow us to continue to publish the ritual. We shared the same concern, but, as it turned out, the Mormons allowed us to continue exercising our freedom of religion and of the press.

In any case, as far as the Mormon Church was concerned, the situation turned from bad to worse. About eleven years after our publication of the ceremony, Bob White and Gordon H. Fraser printed the ritual in a pamphlet entitled, What’s Going On In Here? Later, Chuck and Dolly Sackett published a pamphlet with a similar title, What’s Going On In There? The Sacketts’ pamphlet was unique in that on page 4 of the booklet they claimed that their printing “was transcribed from a tape recording made inside the temple during the actual Endowment ceremony.” While Mormons questioned the ethics of someone secretly recording the ceremony, no one seemed to doubt that the tape recording had actually been made. The Sacketts, who had previously been deeply involved in genealogy and temple work for the church, went a step further and began duplicating copies of the tape recording so that others could actually hear what went on inside the temple. These tapes were extensively circulated and even played on radio stations.

Another member of the Mormon Church secretly recorded the temple ritual in the Provo temple and a good number of copies of this tape have also been circulated. Many others have published material or made films concerning the endowment ritual. Still others have given lectures about it. The cumulative effect of all the audio and video tapes, lectures, radio programs, films and printed copies of the ceremony being available to the general public has placed the Mormon leaders in a very awkward predicament. They had previously maintained that the temple ritual was so holy that God kept the knowledge of it from the world. Apostle Bruce R. McConkie declared:

So sacred and holy are the administrations performed that in every age when they have been revealed, the Lord has withheld them from the knowledge of the world and disclosed them only to the faithful saints in houses and places dedicated and selected for that purpose. (Mormon Doctrine, p. 227)

To an outsider, it would almost appear that the Mormon leaders and the God they worship have lost all control over the dissemination of the ceremony. The contents of the ritual have been scattered to the ends of the world. Many non-Mormons now know far more about the endowments than the average Mormon. Only adults are permitted to go through the temple, and, according to the Church Section of the Mormon newspaper, Deseret News, January 16, 1982, “two-thirds of the adult members have yet to go through the temple for the first time, said Elder W. Grant Bangerter, executive director of the Temple Department . . .” The same issue of the church’s newspaper also noted that Bangerter said that “Through the history of the Church . . . only a fourth of the members have received endowments . . .”

It is certainly ironic that a person can now easily obtain a non-Mormon publication such as Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? or What’s Going On In There? and find out more about the temple ceremony in a few minutes than most of the Mormons learn in a lifetime! Furthermore, the material available to the public seems to be proliferating as the Mormon Church grows larger.

Mormon leaders are not only faced with trying to explain the availability of a ceremony which they previously asserted was “withheld” from the “knowledge of the world,” but they also will find it very difficult to explain why God did not protect his sacred temple from those who brought in tape recorders to expose the ceremony. It has been a common belief among the Mormons that God’s hand protects the temple and its rituals. Ezra Taft Benson, who is currently the prophet of the church, stated: “I think the temple is the most sacred spot on earth . . . Temples are places of personal revelation” (The Teachings of Ezra Taft Benson, pp. 250-251). One would think that if the spirit of the Lord flows freely in the temple, deceivers would be detected. In the Old Testament, II Chronicles 26:17-21, we read the story of a wicked king named Uzziah who “went into the temple of the Lord to burn incense upon the altar of incense.” He was warned that only the priests who were “consecrated to burn incense” were allowed to do so. When he persisted he was “smitten” by the Lord with “leprosy” and was “a leper unto the day of his death.”

Mormon Apostle Bruce R. McConkie maintained that “the discerning of spirits is poured out upon presiding officials in God’s kingdom; they have it given to them to discern all gifts and all spirits, lest any come among the saints and practice deception . . . . . There is no perfect operation of the power of discernment without revelation. Thereby even “the thoughts and intents of the heart’ are made known.” Apostle Mathias F. Cowley told how the gift of discernment protected the temple:

On one of the three days during which the Dedicator Services of the Logan Temple was held, President John Taylor . . . sighted a woman in the crowd whom he did not know but indicated her to President Card and said: “Don’t let that woman come into the assembly; she is not worthy.” . . . Brother Card said to President Taylor: “She couldn’t pass the door keeper without a recommend.” President Taylor replied, “That matters not; she is not worthy.” . . . Brother Card turned her back and later on he went to see her . . . she said there was a man in the ward who was not worthy of a recommend, but the Bishop gave him one . . . This woman happened to meet the man on the street and he asked her how she would like to go to the dedication . . . She said she would like to but could not get a recommend. He said: “I have a recommend and will give it to you for one dollar.” And so she got her recommend by paying this amount. (Temples of the Most High, p. 100)

One would think that if the temples were protected by God and the current Mormon officials were really led by revelation, those who used deception to obtain tape recordings to expose the endowment ceremony would have encountered judgment from God or at least been thwarted in their nefarious plans to discredit the church. The Sacketts, however, report the following:

The tape recording of the Mormon temple Endowment . . . was recorded in the Los Angeles Mormon Temple, and was made using a personal pocket-size tape recorder carried by one of the patrons . . . The patron . . . entered the temple using his own personal temple recommend . . . He was greeted by several temple worker acquaintances who obviously did not know of his excommunication from the Mormon Church, which had been at his own request several months earlier. One of the objectives of this foray was to test the well-known Mormon claim of divinely-assisted temple security. . . . Contrary to popular Mormon belief, not one person in the temple appeared the slightest bit spiritually or supernaturally alert to the presence among them of one whom they classify as an “apostate” and a “son of perdition.” As he departed, the patron was encouraged by a member of the temple Presidency to return again soon. (What’s Going On In There? p. 4)

When we think of this incident with the tape recorder, we cannot help but remember a picture of Mark Hofmann, the man who forged Mormon documents, standing in the presence of the twelfth prophet of the church, Spencer W. Kimball, and four of the apostles. In this photograph, which we have reproduced in our book, Tracking the White Salamander, page 73, the prophet and the apostles appear to be carefully examining what purports to be the prophet Joseph Smith’s copy of characters found on the gold plates of the Book of Mormon. This document, of course, was a forgery, but the Mormon leaders were completely oblivious to that fact. Mr. Hofmann continued meeting with church leaders for about four years for the express purpose of deceiving them so that they would give him large amounts of money in exchange for his fraudulent documents. Church leaders, however, could not discern the wicked plan that Hofmann had in his heart. While the Mormon leaders claim to have the same powers as the ancient apostles in the Bible, their performance with regard to Mark Hofmann certainly does not match up to that of the Apostle Peter when he caught Ananias and Sapphira red-handed in their attempt to deceive the church with regard to a financial transaction: “But Peter said, Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost, and to keep back part of the price of the land?” (Acts 5:3).

From the time the endowment ritual was first revealed in Nauvoo, Mormon leaders have feared that the contents of the ceremony would become known. It now seems that all of their efforts to stop the spread of knowledge concerning the endowment ceremony have been completely in vain.

NO MORE PENALTIES

We have already noted that the Mormon leaders have now removed the “most sacred” penalties which have been in the temple ceremony since the days of Joseph Smith. We feel that this is a real vindication of our work and of that of the many other ministries laboring with the Mormons. We have always felt that these penalties were not compatible with Christian teachings and have strongly opposed them in print for over twenty years. We have continually expressed our belief that Joseph Smith borrowed the penalties from Masonry after he joined that secret organization. Although Masonry had been very unpopular since the late 1820’s, Smith was not ashamed of his association with the lodge in 1842. The following appears in Joseph Smith’s History under the date of March 15, 1842: “In the evening I received the first degree in Free Masonry in the Nauvoo Lodge . . .” (History of the Church, vol 4, p. 551). The entry for the following day contains this statement: “Wednesday, March 16.—I was with the Masonic Lodge and rose to the sublime degree” (p. 552).

The Masons had some very bloody oaths in their ritual. Capt. William Morgan, who had been a Mason for thirty years, exposed these oaths in a book printed in 1827. After publishing his book, Freemasonry Exposed, Morgan disappeared and this set off the great controversy over Masonry which was still raging when Joseph Smith wrote the Book of Mormon. In any case, on pages 21-22 of his book, Morgan revealed the oath that Masons took in the “First Degree” of their ritual: “. . . I will . . . never reveal any part or parts, art or arts, point or points of the secret arts and mysteries of ancient Freemasonry . . . binding myself under no less penalty than to have my throat cut across, my tongue torn out by their roots . . .” On page 23, Morgan went on to show that the Masons who went through the first degree were also taught to draw “your right hand across your throat, the thumb next to your throat, your arm as high as the elbow in a horizontal position.”

In the past, Mormon leaders have argued against the charge by critics that changes have been made in the temple ceremony. Our examination of the evidence, however, reveals that their statements were not correct. Serious changes have been made in the ritual, and these changes have tended to obscure the fact that the penalties were derived from Masonry. For example, it is clear from many early sources that the promise given when the penalties were derived from Masonry after he joined that secret organization. Although Masonry had been very unpopular since the late 1820’s, Smith was not ashamed of his association with the lodge in 1842. The following appears in Joseph Smith’s History under the date of March 15, 1842: “In the evening I received the first degree in Free Masonry in the Nauvoo Lodge . . .” (History of the Church, vol 4, p. 551). In the past, Mormon leaders have argued against the charge by critics that changes have been made in the temple ceremony. Our examination of the evidence, however, reveals that their statements were not correct. Serious changes have been made in the ritual, and these changes have tended to obscure the fact that the penalties were derived from Masonry. For example, it is clear from many early sources that the promise given when

The bloody nature of this oath in the temple endowment was verified by an abundance of testimony given in the Reed Smoot Case. For example, in vol. 2, page 78, J. H. Wallis, Sr., testified: “. . . I agree that my throat be cut from ear to ear and my tongue torn out by its roots from my mouth.”

A very important letter has come to light which also confirms the gory wording of this oath in earlier times. It was written by the First Presidency of the Mormon Church (President Wilford Woodruff and his counselors George Q. Cannon and Joseph F. Smith) to Lorenzo Snow, President of the Salt Lake Temple. Some months prior to the time the letter was written, President Woodruff recorded in his journal that he had met with George Q. Cannon, Joseph F. Smith, Lorenzo Snow and other church officials—including representatives who presided over four temples—and “spent three hours in harmonizing the Different M[ode?]s of Ceremonies in giving Endowments” (Wilford Woodruff’s Journal, October 17, 1893, vol. 9, p. 267). The letter was written about ten months after the entry in Woodruff’s journal and contains this revealing information:

As a result of the conference of the brethren engaged as ordinance workers in the several Temples, held at Salt Lake Temple, some time ago, the following slight corrections have been adopted by us . . .

In the creation on the fifth day a grammatical error occurs. The word “their” is used instead of “its,” the word there, therefore, is changes [sic] to its . . .

The words “that my tongue be torn from its roots in my mouth,” were substituted for “from the roof of my mouth.”

(Letter from the First Presidency, August 31, 1894, LDS Historical Department, CR 100, 14, #2, Volume 8:16-17, typed copy)

Some time in the first half of the 20th century, a major change was made concerning the penalties in the endowment ceremony. The bloody wording of the oath mentioned above was entirely removed. Nevertheless, Mormons were still instructed to draw their thumbs across their throats to show the penalty. In the account of the ritual which we published in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 468, the reader can see how the wording was modified to remove the harsh language regarding the cutting of the throat and the tearing out of the tongue:

. . . we desire to impress upon your minds the sacred character of the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign and penalty, together with that of all the other Tokens of the Holy Priesthood, with their accompanying names, signs and penalties, . . . They are most sacred and are guarded by solemn covenants and obligations of secrecy to the effect that under no condition, even at the peril of your life, will you ever divulge them, except at a certain place that will be shown you hereafter. The representations of the penalties indicates different ways in which life may be taken . . .

Adam, we give unto you the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood . . .

The sign of the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood is made by bringing the right arm to the square the palm of the hand to the front, the fingers close together and the thumb extended. This is the sign. The execution of the penalty is represented by placing the thumb under the left ear, the palm of the hand down, and by drawing the thumb quickly across the throat, to the right ear, and dropping the hand to the side . . .

Now repeat in your minds after me the words of the covenant, at the same time representing the execution of the penalty.

I, _______ (think of the new name) do covenant and promise that I will never reveal the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, together with its accompanying name, sign and penalty. Rather than do so I would suffer my life to be taken.
The recent removal of the penalties from the endowment ceremony by the Mormon leaders has been hailed by liberal Mormons as a step in the right direction. In his article, published in the Salt Lake Tribune, April 29, 1990, Vern Anderson told of Ross Peterson’s response to the removal of the penalties:

In completely removing the penalties from the endowment ceremony, the Mormon leaders have taken out some important vestiges of Masonry which Joseph Smith had borrowed from the Masonic ritual.

The reader will remember that the article in the Los Angeles Times mentioned two other penalties that have been removed from the Mormon temple endowment. These were also derived from Masonry. In the “Second or Fellow Craft Degree,” Masons bound themselves:

... under no less penalty than to have my body severed in two in the midst, and divided to the north and south, my bowels burnt to ashes in the center... The Penal Sign is given by putting the right hand to the left side of the bowels, the hand open, with the thumb next to the belly, and drawing it across the belly, and letting it fall; this is done tolerably quick. This alludes to the penalty of the obligation: “Having my body severed in twain,” etc. (Freemasonry Exposed, pp. 75-77)

Joseph Smith included this Masonic oath in the “First Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood.” Mormons who went through the endowment were instructed to say that if they revealed “any of the secrets of this, the First Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood... we agree that our bodies be cut asunder in the midst and all our bowels gush out” (Temple Mormonism, p. 20). These offensive words were removed from the temple ceremony many years ago, but Mormons continued to execute the sign of the penalty until just recently:

Finally, in April 1990, this penalty was entirely removed from the temple ceremony.

As we have shown, Joseph Smith received the first three degrees of Masonry on March 15th and 16th of 1842. Less than two months later (May 4, 1842) he gave the endowment ceremonies (see History of the Church, vol. 5, pp. 1-2). The fact that the bloody oaths appeared in the temple ceremony in exactly the same order as in Masonry seems very suspicious. In both cases the first oath mentioned the slitting of the throat and tearing out of the tongue. The second spoke of the cutting open of the breast so that the heart and vitals could be removed, and the third mentioned disembowelment. Moreover, in all three cases the same penalties were demonstrated. This all appears to be too similar to be a coincidence.

Since many of those who took part in the endowment ceremonies were already Masons, Joseph Smith had some explaining to do. He, therefore, maintained that he was restoring the original temple rites which had been lost from the earth.

“We and each of us do covenant and promise that we will not reveal the secrets of this, the Second Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign, grip or penalty. Should we do so, we agree to have our breasts cut open and our hearts and vitals torn from our bodies and given to the birds of the air and the beasts of the field...”

The Sign is made by placing the left arm on the square, placing the right hand across the chest with the thumb extended and then drawing it rapidly from left to right and dropping it to the side.

As in the case of the “First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood,” the offensive wording was deleted from the Mormon ceremony a number of decades ago (see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? p. 470). The “execution of the penalty,” however, was still retained in the ritual until April, 1990.

In the “Third, or Master Mason’s Degree,” Masons bound themselves:

... under no less penalty than to have my body severed in two in the midst, and divided to the north and south, my bowels burnt to ashes in the center... The Penal Sign is given by putting the right hand to the left side of the bowels, the hand open, with the thumb next to the belly, and drawing it across the belly, and letting it fall; this is done tolerably quick. This alludes to the penalty of the obligation: “Having my body severed in twain,” etc. (Freemasonry Exposed, pp. 75-77)

Joseph Smith included this Masonic oath in the “First Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood.” Mormons who went through the endowment were instructed to say that if they revealed “any of the secrets of this, the First Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood... we agree that our bodies be cut asunder in the midst and all our bowels gush out” (Temple Mormonism, p. 20). These offensive words were removed from the temple ceremony many years ago, but Mormons continued to execute the sign of the penalty until just recently:

Finally, in April 1990, this penalty was entirely removed from the temple ceremony.

As we have shown, Joseph Smith received the first three degrees of Masonry on March 15th and 16th of 1842. Less than two months later (May 4, 1842) he gave the endowment ceremonies (see History of the Church, vol. 5, pp. 1-2). The fact that the bloody oaths appeared in the temple ceremony in exactly the same order as in Masonry seems very suspicious. In both cases the first oath mentioned the slitting of the throat and tearing out of the tongue. The second spoke of the cutting open of the breast so that the heart and vitals could be removed, and the third mentioned disembowelment. Moreover, in all three cases the same penalties were demonstrated. This all appears to be too similar to be a coincidence.

Since many of those who took part in the endowment ceremonies were already Masons, Joseph Smith had some explaining to do. He, therefore, maintained that he was restoring the original temple rites which had been lost from the earth.
Smith further explained that Masonry, which claimed to go back to King Solomon’s temple, originally had the same ritual but that it had become corrupted. Heber C. Kimball, who later became a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, could not help but see the resemblance between the two ceremonies. In the book, Heber C. Kimball, page 85, Stanley B. Kimball gives this valuable information:

Heber thought he saw similarities between Masonic and Mormon ritual. In a letter to Parley Pratt, June 17, 1842, Heber revealed: “We have received some precious things through the Prophet . . . there is a similarity of [preas]t[hood in Masony. Bro. Joseph Ses [says?] Masony was taken from preas[thood but has become degenerated. But menny things are perfect.” Later at a special conference . . . Heber explained further: “We have the true Masony. The Masony of today is received from the apostasy which took place in the days of Solomon and David. They have now and then a thing that is correct, but we have the real thing.”

Mormon apologist E. Cecil McGavin wrote:

If we manifested the belligerent spirit that many of the Masons display, we might say that Masonry is a spurious system descending from Solomon’s Temple. Numerous changes and corruptions have crept in, yet enough of the original remains to bear a few humble resemblances to the true endowment.

In the diary of Benjamin F. Johnson, an intimate friend and associate of Joseph Smith, it is recorded that “Joseph told me that Freemasonry was the apostate endowment, as sectarian religion was the apostate religion.” (Mormonism and Masonry, 1947, p. 199)

Dr. Reed C. Durham, a Mormon historian who has served as president of the Mormon History Association, was forced by the evidence to admit that Masonry had a powerful influence on Joseph Smith:

. . . . I am convinced that in the study of Masonry lies a pivotal key to further understanding Joseph Smith and the Church. . . . The many parallels found between early Mormonism and the Masonry of that day are substantial . . . . I believe that there are few significant developments in the Church, that occurred after March 15, 1842 [the day Smith became a Mason], which did not have some Masonic interdependence . . . . There is absolutely no question in my mind that the Mormon ceremony which came to be known as the Endowment, introduced by Joseph Smith to Mormon Masons, had an immediate inspiration from Masonry. This is not to suggest that no other source of inspiration could have been involved, but the similarities between the two ceremonies are so apparent and overwhelming that some dependent relationship cannot be denied. They are so similar, in fact, that one writer was led to refer to the Endowment as Celestial Masonry. (Mormon Miscellaneous, October 1975, pp. 13-14)

Some Mormon apologists who are aware of the devastating parallels between Masonry and the Mormon temple endowment believe that when Joseph Smith went through the Masonic ritual, God gave him the spirit of revelation so that he would discern which portions really went back to Solomon’s temple and which parts had been corrupted by later Masons. The prophet, therefore, only incorporated the genuine God-given elements into the Mormon “endowment ceremony.”

Now that the Mormon leaders have completely removed both the gruesome wording and the penalties from the temple ritual, it places these apologists on the horns of a dilemma. If God really instructed Joseph Smith to lift the bloody oaths and penalties from the Masonic ritual and insert them into the endowment ceremony, how can the present leaders of the church, who are supposed to be guided by revelation, tear them out of the temple ritual without offending God? It would appear that either the present leaders of the church feel that they know more than the God who was supposed to have spoken to Joseph Smith, or else they realize that Smith made a serious mistake when he borrowed this embarrassing material from the Masons.

The action of church authorities in dropping out some of the elements which were once believed to be “most sacred” will undoubtedly raise some serious questions in the minds of many faithful LDS people. If Joseph Smith was in error when he included these things, then it is obvious that we have no assurance that the other material he took from the Masons is really inspired. If a portion of the Masonic material he plagiarized is found to be defective, it throws suspicion on all the rest of the Masonic ritual which was incorporated into the endowment, and since there is so much Masonry in the ceremony, it would lead one to the suspicion that the entire ceremony is man-made. In Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?, pages 484-492, we presented devastating evidence linking the Mormon temple ceremony to Masonry. The parallels are too close to be swept aside. This same information will be included in our new book, Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony, 1842-1990.

Those who maintain that the recent changes were really made because of revelation given to church authorities, should consider another interesting aspect with regard to this question. On February 18, 1987, the church’s own newspaper, Deseret News, reported that British Freemasons removed the bloody oaths from their own ceremonies. “Behheading and ripping out the tongue have been abolished by the British Freemasons as penalties for violating the solemn code of the secret society, it was reported. Such punishments have been on the books of Freemasonry for centuries to enforce solemn obligations that inductees to Masonic lodges swear on the Bible to uphold. But, the Daily Telegraph said this week, it’s the sort of thing that scares people away from the secret society.”

Now, if British Freemasons realized that their gruesome oaths had a tendency to scare “people away from their secret society” and decided to make a change to accommodate themselves to current thinking, it seems very likely that the leaders of the Mormon Church could also see “the handwriting on the wall.” If this process is termed “revelation,” then it is obvious that the British Freemasons had the revelation first.

IMPORTANT OMISION

The Los Angeles Times, May 5, 1990, gave this information concerning the removal of the “Five Points of Fellowship” from the temple ceremony:

Also dropped is an “embrace” of a man representing God, who stands behind a ceiling-to-floor veil. Reaching through a slit in the veil, the church member puts his or her hand to the back of the deity and presses against him at the cheek, shoulders, knees and feet with the veil between them. The contact at “five points of fellowship,” including the hand to his back, has been omitted, although the member must still give a secret handshake and repeat a lengthy password.

There can be no question that the “five points of fellowship” were derived from Masonry. The reader can clearly see this from the comparison which follows:

MASONS: — He (the candidate) is raised on what is called the five points of fellowship . . . This is done by putting the inside of your right foot to the inside of the right foot of the person to whom you are going to give the word, the inside of your knee to his, laying your right breast against his, your left hands on the back of each other, and your mouths to each other’s right ear (in which position alone you are permitted to give the word), and whisper the word Mahah-bone. He is also told that Mahah-bone signifies marrow in the bone. (Freemasonry Exposed, pp. 84-85)

MORMONS:—The five points of fellowship are given by putting the inside of the right foot to the inside of the Lord’s, the inside of your knee to his, laying your breast close to his, your left hands on each other’s backs, and each one putting his mouth to the other’s ear, in which position the Lord whispers:

Lord—This is the sign of the token:

That the “five points of fellowship” were in the temple ceremony while the Mormons were still in Nauvoo, Illinois, is verified by a reference H. Michael Marquardt pointed out in Heber C. Kimball’s Journal, Nov. 21, 1845 to Jan. 7, 1846. Under the date of Dec. 11, 1845, a scribe wrote of the “second token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, the Patriarchal Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail. When the Lord asks the recipient to “give it [the name] to me?” the response is: “I cannot. I have not yet received it. For this purpose I have come to converse with the Lord through the veil.” The Lord then responds: “You shall receive it upon the five points of fellowship, through the veil.” The Lord gives the vital information and then asks for the name again: “Will you give it to me?” This time the recipient says, “I will, upon the five points of fellowship through the veil . . .” After the secret words are given, the Lord says “That is correct.” Shortly after this, the recipient is allowed to enter into the presence of the Lord in the “Celestial Room.”

In Duncan’s Masonic Ritual and Monitor, page 120, we read that in Masonry the candidate can only receive “the grand Masonic word on the five points of fellowship.” The reader will remember that Heber C. Kimball’s journal for 1845 made it clear that in the Mormon endowment this important key to the Celestial Kingdom was only given “on the five points of fellowship.” We have also shown that up until the revision of the ceremony in April 1990, the Lord would only give this important information “upon the five points of fellowship, through the veil.” Furthermore, the recipient had to give it back to the Lord “upon the five points of fellowship, through the veil.” For almost a century and a half, therefore, the Mormon leaders taught that these secret words could only be whispered in the ear while the Lord and the recipient were touching on all “five points of fellowship.” From what we can learn, those who participate in the ritual still put their “left hands on each other’s backs and whisper the words of the sign,” but they do not put their feet and knees together and all the wording concerning the “five points of fellowship” has been completely deleted. These words previously appeared in four different places—the “Lord” spoke of the “five points of fellowship” twice; “Peter” referred to the “five points of fellowship” once, and the recipient mentioned them once.

While it is good that the Mormon leaders removed this Masonic element from the endowment ceremony, some people who have been involved in temple work feel that the reason it was dropped was because some of the women felt the five points of contact (especially the placing of the “inside of your knee to his”) were too intimate. There were complaints that the men playing the role of the Lord sometimes took advantage of the situation. We were also told that even some of the men felt they had a problem with the “Lord” behind the veil. Since a large number of men have played the role of the Lord in the various temples throughout the world, it is certainly possible that complaints could have been made at various times. The performance of this type of ceremony in any group of people would probably result in some complaints. In any case, it is very possible that the “five points of fellowship” were removed because this part of the ritual seemed awkward or embarrassing to some members of the Mormon Church.

Regardless of the reason for the change, it raises serious questions concerning the inspiration of church officials. If a person was previously compelled to receive the secret information necessary to enter heaven on the five points of fellowship, how can the church leaders now by-pass God’s revealed way which was given by the prophet Joseph Smith. Kim Sue Lia Perkes revealed that:

. . . a former Mormon familiar with the changes said the ceremony’s climax has been eliminated. Removal of that part of the ritual, he said, is the equivalent of taking the Eucharist out of the Roman Catholic Mass.

Not all Mormons are happy with the ceremony changes.

“I certainly have Mormon friends who will see it as a step toward apostasy and an accommodation to the world,” said one practicing Mormon in Utah. (Arizona Republic, April 28, 1990)

DEVIL’S MINISTER GONE

When we first printed the temple ceremony in 1969, we commented on the fact that in the 1906 printing of the endowment, the Devil offered a preacher four thousand dollars a year to work for him. We said that in 1906 this was a great deal of money, but that the Mormons had neglected to give the preacher much of a raise. Therefore, when we printed the ceremony in 1969, and subsequently in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 468, the preacher was still only receiving five thousand dollars a year. In any case, this portion of the ceremony makes it perfectly clear that in the eyes of the Mormon leaders the orthodox Christian religion is the Devil’s religion:

LUCIFER:—Well, if you’ll preach your orthodox religion to this people and convert them, I’ll give you—let me see—five thousand a year.

In Mormonism, Magic and Masonry, page 66, we wrote:

. . . the temple ritual tries to link Christians and ministers of other churches to the Devil’s work. We feel that this is one of the most objectionable things about the ceremony, and we do not feel that a Christian would want to give any support to this type of thing.

Many other Christians protested against this part of the ceremony, and a great deal of pressure has been put on the Mormon leaders to change this part of the endowment. We understand, in fact, that a petition signed by thousands of people demanded that this portion of the endowment be changed.

After this portion of the ceremony was deleted, Vern Anderson wrote the following: “Among the changes . . . a portion of the ceremony with an actor portraying a non-Mormon ‘preacher’ paid by Satan to spread false doctrine has been eliminated. ‘The general consensus is that it’s a breath of fresh air,’ said Ross Peterson . . . ‘You don’t put down other churches, or imply that they are Satan’s children’” (Salt Lake Tribune, April 29, 1990). We have been told that all the material making fun of both Protestants and Catholics has now been eliminated. The ceremony as it was previously given, not only implied that Protestant ministers were working for the Devil, but also had Lucifer claiming he would buy up “Popes” to help him in his evil work.

Unfortunately, the removal of the portion of the temple ceremony which implies that Christian ministers are working for the Devil does not really solve the problem. The Mormon Church still retains Joseph Smith’s story of the First Vision in his sight in the Pearl of Great Price; Joseph Smith—History, verses 18-19. In this account, Joseph Smith asserted that Jesus himself told him that all other churches were wrong:

My object in going to inquire of the Lord was to know which of all the sects was right . . . I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt . . .

OTHER CHANGES

In the version of the temple ceremony which we published in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 467, the men “covenant and promise” that they will “obey the law of God.” The women, however, agree to obey the law of their husbands:

ELOHIM:—We will now put the sisters under covenant to obey the law of their husbands. Sisters, arise, raise your right hand to the square. Each of you do covenant and promise that you will obey the law of your husband and abide by his council in righteousness. Each of you bow your head and say yes.

SISTERS:—Yes.

We have already shown that since the church leaders revised the endowment ceremony on April 10, 1990, there has been some kind of a change in the covenant women are required to make. It has been stated that they “no longer must vow to obey their husbands” (Salt Lake Tribune, April 29, 1990). While we do not know the wording of the new version, it appears that some of the women are pleased with the changes in the ritual. In the Los Angeles Times, May 5, 1990, we find this:

Lavina Fielding Anderson . . . said she received the revisions “with joy.” “I anticipate further changes with hope and faith,” she said . . . “Some portions of the temple ceremony have been painful to some Mormon women and, in some respects, still are,” she added, without identifying what elements may still be objectionable. Women, for example, still cover their faces with veils at certain points in the ritual, sources said.

Another important change seems to have been made in the sign for the Second Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood. In the ceremony, as printed in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 471, we find this:

The sign is made by raising both hands high above the head and by lowering your hands to the side, saying:

Pay lay ale
Pay lay ale

As early as 1969 we pointed out a problem with this:

. . . there seems to have been a change made in this part of the ceremony, for the Salt Lake Tribune, February 12, 1906, gave the words as “Pale, Ale, Ale,” and Temple Mormonism used the words “Pale, Hale, Hale.” (The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1, p. 138)

However this may be, in another portion of the ceremony (Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? p. 468), it is explained that “Pay lay ale” means “O God, hear the words of my mouth!” In the early 1980’s some critics of the church began to proclaim that in Hebrew these words really mean, “Wonderful Lucifer.” If this were true, this would mean that the Mormons were praying to the Devil in this part of the ceremony. We took very strong exception to this claim and pointed out that there is no way that these words can be translated “Wonderful Lucifer.” We still stand by this research which we presented in detail in our book, The Lucifer-God Doctrine, pages 11-15, 85-86.

In any case, many Mormons must have been bothered when they had to raise and lower their hands repeating the strange words “Pay lay ale” three times during the ritual. According to what we can learn, the Mormon leaders have now replaced the mysterious words with the English words which were mentioned earlier in the ceremony: “O God, hear the words of my mouth!” The fact that four different versions of the sign of the Second Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood have been given over the years certainly raises a question concerning the claim that the endowment was revealed by revelation.

We have been informed by two different sources that the Lecture Before The Veil has been removed. This lecture was previously given to all those who were going through the ritual for the first time. It was not deemed necessary, however, for those who were going through the endowment ceremony for the dead. The words “penalty” or “penalties” were used six times in this lecture, and it referred to the “sectarian minister” who preached false doctrine (i.e., the minister who was employed by Lucifer).

There probably were many other changes made in the temple ceremony which have not been reported yet. There have been different reports regarding how much material was actually removed from the ceremony or changed in some way. The Salt Lake Tribune, April 29, 1990, referred to the rituals “current length of about 90 minutes.” One man noted that just after the changes were made, temple workers were having a very difficult time with the new wording and felt that when they become proficient in the use of the new script, the ceremony might be somewhat shorter than when he went through.

REVELATION OR ACCOMODATION?

Although the Mormon leaders have been extremely quiet about the changes in the temple ceremony, John Dart reported that the following appeared in a statement by church leaders:

“We are a church that believes in modern and continuous revelation, and the changes that were recently made in our temple ceremony are reflective of that process . . .” (Los Angeles Times, May 5, 1990)

An increasing number of Mormons are beginning to believe that what is called “revelation” by church leaders is not really revelation from God, but rather “accomodation” to the views of the world. A number of things which have happened since 1890 lead to that conclusion. The changes concerning polygamy, the blacks and the temple endowment all point in this direction. The process of “modern and continuous revelation” could probably be summed up in the following formula: Criticism of a specific doctrine or practice from without the church + acceptance of that criticism by Mormon scholars and prominent people = “Revelation.”

Take, for example, the practice of polygamy. Joseph Smith claimed to receive a revelation from God on July 12, 1843, stating that plural marriage was to be practiced by the Mormon Church. This revelation is still published in the church’s Doctrine and Covenants as Section 132. Interestingly, this system of marriage was an extremely important part of the sealing ceremonies which are still performed in the temple for “time and all eternity.” For many years the Mormon leaders taught that temple marriage and plural marriage stand or fall together. Apostle Orson Pratt, for instance, emphasized that:

... if plurality of marriage is not true, or in other words, if a man has no divine right to marry two wives or more in this world, then marriage for eternity is not true, and your faith is all vain, and all the sealing ordinance[s] and powers, pertaining to marriages for eternity are vain, worthless, good for nothing; for as sure as one is true the other also must be true. Amen. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 21, p. 296)

Non-Mormons, of course, vigorously opposed the practice of polygamy. In addition, the United States Government prosecuted Mormons who were engaged in the practice. On Jan. 16, 1886, Lorenzo Snow, who later became the fifth prophet of the Mormon Church, was sentenced to six months in prison. When the prosecuting attorney predicted that if Apostle Snow was convicted, “a new revelation would soon follow, changing the divine law of celestial marriage,” Lorenzo Snow emphatically replied: “The severest prosecutions have never been followed by revelations changing a divine law, obedience to which brought imprisonment or martyrdom. Though I go to prison, God will not change his law of celestial marriage” (Historical Record, 1887, vol. 6, p. 144).

Things went from bad to worse for the Mormon leaders. Pressure not only increased from the outside, but members of the church were swayed by the opposition. John Taylor, who was the third prophet of the church, strongly denounced those who would give up the practice:

God has given us a revelation in regard to celestial marriage. . . . they would like us to tone that principle down and change it and make it applicable to the views of the day. This we cannot do . . . I cannot do it, and will not do it. I find some men try to twist round the principle in any way and every way they can. They want to sneak out of it in some way. Now God don’t want any kind of sycophancy like that. . . . If God has introduced something for our glory and exaltation, we are not going to have that kicked over by any improper influence, either inside or outside of the Church of the living God. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 25, pp. 309-310)

Apostle Orson Pratt argued:

God has told us Latter-day Saints that we shall be condemned if we do not enter into that principle; and yet I have heard now and then . . . a brother or a sister say, “I am a Latter-day Saint, but I do not believe in polygamy.” Oh, what an absurd expression! . . . If the doctrine of polygamy, as revealed to the Latter-day Saints, is not true, I would not give a fig for all your other revelations that came through Joseph Smith the Prophet; I would renounce the whole of them. . . . The Lord has said, that those who reject this principle reject their salvation, they shall be damned, saith the Lord . . . I want to prophesy that all men and women who oppose the revelation which God has given in relation to polygamy will find themselves in darkness . . . they will finally go down to hell and be damned if they do not repent. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 17, pp. 224-225)

Notwithstanding all of the strong rhetoric used by Mormon leaders, in 1890, Wilford Woodruff, the fourth prophet of the church, suspended the practice of polygamy when he issued the Manifesto (see Doctrine and Covenants, Official Declaration 1). President Woodruff proclaimed that the Manifesto was given by revelation from God: . . . the Lord . . . is giving us revelation . . . The Lord showed me by vision and revelation exactly what would take place if we did not stop this practice. If we had not stopped it . . . all ordinances would be stopped . . . and many men would be made prisoners. . . . the God of Heaven commanded me to do what I did do . . . I went before the Lord, and I wrote what the Lord told me to write. . . . (Evidences and Reconciliations, 3 volumes in 1, pp. 105-106)

It is obvious from the evidence we present in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 231-234, that President Woodruff yielded to pressures from both non-Mormons and members of his own church and issued the Manifesto which eventually ended the practice of plural marriage within the church.

Prior to June 9, 1978, the Mormon Church had a doctrine which was referred to by outsiders as the “anti-black doctrine” because blacks were forbidden the priesthood. The basis for this doctrine was Joseph Smith’s Book of Abraham (published in the Pearl of Great Price, one of the four standard works of the church). Joseph Smith wrote that “from Ham, sprang that race which preserved the curse in the land.” Blacks were identified as descendants of Ham and were “cursed . . . as pertaining to the Priesthood” (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Abraham, 1:21-26). It was taught that even “one drop of Negro blood” would prevent a person from holding the priesthood, marrying for eternity in the temple, or even going through the endowment ceremony (see Race Problems—As They Affect the Church, by Mark E. Petersen, August 27, 1954). Bruce R. McConkie, who later became an apostle, bluntly stated:

Negroes in this life are denied the priesthood; under no circumstances can they hold this delegation of authority from the Almighty. The gospel message of salvation is not carried affirmatively to them . . . Negroes are not equal with other races where the receipt of certain spiritual blessings are concerned . . . (Mormon Doctrine, 1958, p. 477)

There was a great deal of discussion regarding civil rights in the 1950’s. In 1959 we printed our first criticism of the Mormon doctrine concerning blacks. As early as 1963, we believed that it was likely that the Mormon leaders would have a new “revelation” regarding blacks and printed a sheet entitled, “Will There Be a Revelation Regarding the Negro?” At the bottom of this sheet we predicted: “If the pressure continues to increase on the Negro question, the leaders of the Mormon Church will probably have another revelation which will allow the Negro to hold the priesthood.” Over the years we continued to print a great deal of material on the subject of blacks and the priesthood. Although there were some Mormons who had doubts about the anti-black doctrine, at that time very few were willing to publicly criticize the church. We were ridiculed for the stand which we took, but we persisted in challenging this doctrine and a number of Mormons began to take our work seriously.

Pressure for a change in the doctrine concerning blacks continued to mount both without and within the church. Finally, on June 9, 1978, the Mormon church’s Deseret News carried a startling announcement by the First Presidency which said that a new revelation had been given and that blacks would be allowed to hold the priesthood: “. . . we have pleaded long and earnestly . . . supplicating the Lord for divine guidance. He has heard our prayers, and by revelation has confirmed that the long-promised day has come . . . all worthy male members of the church may be ordained to the priesthood without regard for race or color.” Shortly after this revelation was received, it became clear that the church’s ban on marriage to blacks had been lifted. On June 24, 1978, the church’s newspaper announced that “the first black man to gain the priesthood” was allowed to go through the temple endowment and was sealed to his wife for time and eternity.
Like the polygamy revelation, the revelation by President Spencer W. Kimball granting blacks the priesthood was given only after tremendous pressure was exerted by non-Mormon critics and members of the church itself.

With regard to the recent revision of the temple ceremony, it is clear that the “revelation” came in the same way as the changes on polygamy and the black doctrine. In the Introduction to our 1964 reprint of Temple Mormonism, we pointed out that “there have been quite a number of changes made since the Temple ceremony was first introduced.” We went on to predict that there would “probably be other changes made in the Temple ceremony as time goes on.”

As we have already shown, after printing Temple Mormonism in 1964, we published an updated version of the endowment ceremony in 1969 in The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1. This same version was printed in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? in 1972 and is still found in that book. In addition, in our book, The Changing World of Mormonism, published by Moody Press in 1980, we included portions of the endowment ceremony. We have mentioned also that Chuck and Dolly Sackett published the ceremony in a pamphlet and distributed tapes of the actual ceremony. Others also disseminated the ceremony or portions of it in books, pamphlets, tracts, films and tapes.

Although the Mormon Church completely lost control of the situation and had no way to stop the tens of thousands of copies of the endowment which were being distributed throughout the world, most members of the church who felt there was something wrong with the ritual did not dare to openly protest. They feared that they would be strongly reprimanded or even excommunicated if they raised their voices on the issue. In 1987, however, a remarkably frank article by David John Buerger was printed in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, a liberal Mormon publication which is not controlled by the church. In this article, Buerger acknowledged that there were “strong indications that Joseph Smith drew on the Masonic rites in shaping the temple endowment, and specifically borrowed the tokens, signs, and penalties” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1987, p. 45).

Mr. Buerger went even further by suggesting that church leaders needed to seriously consider making changes in the ceremony to counter declining rates of attendance at endowment ceremonies:

The number of operating temples has increased dramatically . . . An analysis of ordinance data, however, suggests that rates of temple work have remained relatively constant over the last fifteen years. . . . Members of my own stake made 2,671 visits to the Oakland Temple in 1985, versus 3,340 visits in 1984—a 20 percent drop in activity. . . . Without comparing the policies of stakes in other temple districts, it is impossible to say how characteristic my stake might be.

These declining rates suggest that many Latter-day Saints apparently do not participate extensively in either vicarious or living endowments. The need for reevaluation can at least be discussed. As the history of the endowment shows, specific content and procedural alterations were made in 1845, 1877, 1883, 1893, 1919-27, the early 1960s, and 1968-72. . . .

The feelings contemporary Saints have for the temple certainly merit a careful quantitative analysis by professional social scientists. I have heard a number of themes from people who feel discomfort in one degree or another with elements of the temple ceremony. . . . Probably in no other settings except college organizations, with their attendant associations of youthfulness and possibly immaturity, do most Mormons encounter “secret” ceremonies with code handshakes, clothing that has particular significance, and, perhaps most disturbing to some, the implied violence of the penalties. Various individuals have commented on their difficulty in seeing these elements as “religious” or “inspirational,” originating in the desires of a loving Father for his children. . . . Some are also uncomfortable at the portrayal of a Christian minister as the hireling of Satan . . .

Sixth, the endowment ceremony still depicts women as subservient to men, not as equals in relating to God. For example, women covenant to obey their husbands in righteousness, while he is the one who acts as intermediary to God . . . Some find the temple irrelevant to the deeper currents of their Christian service and worship of God. Some admit to boredom. Others describe their motivations for continued and regular temple attendance as feelings of hope and patience—the faith that by continuing to participate they will develop more positive feelings . . . Often they feel unworthy or guilty because of these feelings since the temple is so unanimously presented as the pinnacle of spiritual experience for sincere Latter-day Saints. . . . The endowment has changed a great deal in response to community needs over time. Obviously it has the capability of changing still further if the need arises. . . . From a strictly functional perspective, the amount of time required to complete a vicarious endowment seems excessive. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1987, pp. 63, 66-69).

The reader will notice that David John Buerger felt there should be a “careful quantitative analysis by professional social scientists” to find out why attendance at temples has been declining. Although it could have been just a coincidence, it is interesting to note that within months of the publication of Buerger’s article, the Mormon Church made its own survey of the opinions of members concerning temple work. In the Instructions for the Survey of Adult Members in the United States and Canada, the following appears: “. . . we have developed this survey to help us understand your thoughts, feelings, and experiences relating to temple and genealogy activities, . . . along with you, approximately 3,400 other members in the United States and Canada are being asked to participate in this project. . . . We hope that you will feel you can be candid and open in your answers. . . . what you write will be anonymous. We will not be able to associate your name with the questionnaire you complete.” This survey was to be returned in the mail “by MARCH 30th,” 1988.

Although Question 28 asked the person who had been through the endowment ritual if he or she “felt spiritually uplifted by the experience,” it also probed to find out if the “experience was unpleasant” or if the person “was confused by what happened. Q. 29 is worded, “Briefly describe how you felt after receiving your own endowment.” On the photocopy we have in our possession, the respondent has written: “Wierd [sic].” Q. 37-k inquired as to whether the person found “it hard to go to the temple.” Q. 39-b asked if the individual fell “asleep during sessions.” Questions were also asked concerning whether the person really believed “The president of the LDS Church is a loving Father for his children. . . . some are also uncomfortable at the portrayal of a Christian minister as the hireling of Satan . . .”

Although our photocopy of the page containing the “Comments” is faded out and difficult to read, it appears that the woman who filled out the Survey admitted she had lost faith in the church. This is supported by her answers to Questions 77 and 78. The “main reason for not attending LDS church services” was listed as: “I have some doubts about specific LDS doctrines and teachings.” From all appearances it appears that the Mormon Church’s Survey was a feeler to find out what changes should be made in the ceremony and how they would be received by members of the church.

While many Mormons will undoubtedly stand firm in their faith that the decision to change the ceremonies came by direct revelation from God, the evidence seems to indicate that the publication of the temple ceremony and objections to it by non-Mormons combined with criticism from within the church (as evidenced by David John Buerger’s article in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought) forced the Mormon leaders to issue a survey to find out why temple attendance had fallen off and what members of the church actually felt about the endowment ceremony. The results of that survey must have indicated that a significant number of people were offended by parts of the ceremony. Consequently, a new “revelation” was given to make the ritual more appealing to the Mormon people. This tends to verify the formula that the criticism of a specific doctrine or practice from without the church + acceptance of that criticism by Mormon scholars and prominent people = “Revelation.”

In the early days of the Mormon Church, the word “revelation” had a very different meaning than it does today. Joseph Smith often used the word to refer to some new doctrine or teaching which he claimed God himself had revealed to him. Some of his “revelations” were extremely unpopular, but this usually did not bother him very much. Take, for instance, his “revelation” concerning polygamy. In spite of the fact that many members of the church were violently opposed to the doctrine, he continued to secretly advocate the practice and to take plural wives himself. Unlike the current leaders of the church, he did not feel that it was necessary to take a survey and modify the doctrine to fit the opinions of others. While we do not believe that the “revelation” on polygamy came from God and are very opposed to the practice, we must admit that Smith was not easily swayed by public opinion.

While Joseph Smith used the word “revelation” to refer to controversial new doctrines he brought forth to the church, later prophets have used the same word in an attempt to destroy the very teachings which Joseph Smith claimed were divinely inspired. When President Wilford Woodruff claimed he had a “revelation” to stop the practice of plural marriage in the church, he was not adding any new doctrine. Instead, he was throwing overboard a doctrine Smith taught was essential for salvation. If the information that polygamy should not be practiced was a “revelation,” then Christians actually received it first. Long before Mormonism began, they were condemning the practice.

Some people now point to the “revelation” which Spencer W. Kimball, the twelfth prophet of the church, gave concerning the blacks as evidence that the church is still led by revelation. Nothing could be further from the truth. President Kimball did not reveal any new truth to the world. Instead, he destroyed a doctrine that came from Joseph Smith’s own “Book of Abraham”—a doctrine which the prophets of the church had stubbornly clung to until pressure from within and without the church was so strong that he was forced to yield on the issue. Millions of Christians and even a large number of Mormons had received this “revelation” many years before President Kimball received his answer.

As far as we know, the recent “revelation” that the temple ceremony should be altered has not produced any new or important material. Instead, it is a mutilation of what was supposed to have been revealed by “revelation” to the prophet Joseph Smith. Things that were formerly considered to be “most sacred” were stripped from the ritual. For many years Christians have spoken against the very things which have now been removed. Why did it take so long for Mormon leaders to obtain their “revelation” on the subject? The liberal Mormon David John Buerger seems to have had the “revelation” some time before church leaders changed the ceremony.

It seems that it is very difficult for most faithful Mormons to grasp the significance of what is really going on within the church. The implications are just too devastating for them to face. The following hypothetical illustration may help the Mormon reader put the matter into perspective: If we were to say that God had given us a “revelation” that baptism should no longer be practiced, members of the church would protest that this could not be a true revelation. They would undoubtedly claim that we were merely feigning a “revelation” as a pretext to remove an important ordinance from the teachings of Christ and might even suggest that we were embarrassed about getting wet in front of a crowd.

To those who are paying close attention, it is obvious that the word “revelation” is really being used as a cover-up for what is going on. Church leaders are really destroying the original teachings of Joseph Smith in a very sneaky way. Each time they remove some part that Smith considered vital, they clothe the action by saying it is a new “revelation” from God. When will the people wake up and realize what is going on? We, of course, agree that Joseph Smith’s teachings are filled with errors. We feel, in fact, that sweeping changes need to be made, but we do not believe it is being honest to do it under the guise of “revelation.” Instead, the General Authorities of the church should openly admit that they feel Joseph Smith departed from Christian teachings and then propose a plan to effect the changes that need to be made. It seems obvious, however, that they will not do this because they know they will lose power with the people. It is much easier to say that the prophet has had a new “revelation” and that, of course, marks “the end of controversy.” O. Kendall White has pointed out that the Mormon leaders’ claim of “continuing revelation” is really a mechanism which they use to side-step acknowledging the “errors of the past.” This, of course, leads to the impression that “the church is never wrong.”

Although they would never admit it, it would appear from the changes they made in the temple endowment ritual that the current leaders of the church realize that portions of the ceremony were not from God—at least we assume that they never would have changed these parts if they truly believed they came from God. They must agree, therefore, that we were correct in our assertion that the penalties which they themselves removed from the ceremony were really derived from Masonry. It is certainly sad that with all the evidence they have in their possession that the endowment ritual is man-made, they still choose to remain silent.

A BAD EXPERIENCE?

Many people who have been through the Mormon temple endowment later admit that they were shocked by the ceremony because it was so different from anything they had previously encountered in Mormonism. A prominent Mormon educator who served at Brigham Young University told us that when his wife first went to the temple to receive her endowments, she became so upset with the ritual that she refused to go any further and the entire session was delayed while temple workers tried to convince her to go on. Over the years a surprising number of people have told us that they had a very bad experience when they went through the temple ritual. Many of them said that their first serious doubts concerning the authenticity of Mormonism arose when they went through the endowment ceremony. Couples have told us that they both had very negative feelings during the ceremony but at the time did not dare confide these doubts with each other. We recently received a letter in which the following appears:

We converted to Mormonism 16 years ago when two delightful young missionaries knocked on our door. . . I had been raised in a Christian household. . . We subsequently married in the Temple in New Zealand; an experience we found to be very confusing and frightening and we both wanted to leave, but did not mention this to each other. . . I became a Christian in October last year and my husband followed shortly after. . . We feel so full of the spirit of God and we love Jesus with all our hearts. (Letter from Australia, dated January 11, 1990)

Many people who enter the temple are puzzled as to why they should have to wear specially marked garments for the rest of their lives and learn secret passwords, signs and handshakes to enter into the presence of God. They feel that this is rather childish. As we have shown, David John Buerger has pointed out that these types of things are found in secret lodges and also in “college organizations, with their attendant associations of youthfulness and possibly immaturity.” The endowment ceremony actually gives the impression that God is like a youngster who only allows those who know the secret passwords and signs into his heavenly clubhouse. This is entirely different from anything we find in the New Testament. In John 10:14, 27-28, the following appears: “I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine. . . My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: And I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand.” Those who really know Christ do not have to worry about remembering any secret words or handshakes. As the Apostle Paul expresses it, those who are alive at his coming will be “caught up together with them [i.e., those who are raised from the dead] in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord” (1 Thessalonians 4:17). This hardly allows any time for questions and answers and a ceremony of passing through the veil. In 1 Corinthians 15:51-52, Paul wrote that “we shall all be changed, In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump . . .” Apostle John added this comforting thought: “. . . when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is” (1 John 3:2). While the temple ritual leads Mormons to believe that God is going to put them through the type of test a Mason has to go through to get into the lodge, Christians believe that at death the entire ceremony and the idea of men becoming Gods needs to be abandoned.

While we do not know what the future holds for Mormonism, we are very encouraged by recent developments. More and more Mormons are beginning to reject the concept that “when the leaders speak, the thinking has been done,” and many of them are turning to the Lord for help. We feel that the recent changes in the endowment ritual will serve as a catalyst in bringing LDS people to the truth. While the discussion of the temple ceremony used to be almost completely taboo, active Mormons are now coming into our bookstore and discussing the matter with us. A number of them, who have recently gone through the temple, have provided important details concerning the changes. We have also received word that they are discussing these matters among themselves. Those of us who have labored for years to bring the truth to the Mormons are excited about the future. We have been ridiculed in the past by those who did not believe our work could have any affect on the leadership of the church. It is our belief that a large number of Mormons are growing tired of blindly following their leaders and that we will see tens of thousands of them turning to the Lord.

For those who are interested in learning more about the endowment ceremony, we recommend our new book, Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony, 1842-1990. . .

WITCHCRAFT CONTROVERSY REKINDLED

In the Salt Lake City Messenger for September 1988, we noted that a statement by Walter Martin of Christian Research Institute had finally ended a controversy between our ministry and Ed Decker. At the heart of the disagreement was a question regarding the influence of witchcraft and Satanism on the Mormon temple ceremony. We felt that although there were occultic influences in the endowment ritual, Mr. Decker had made some very exaggerated claims in his newsletter. Furthermore, we maintained that a member of his staff, William Schnoebelen, also misrepresented the facts in a booklet he coauthored with James Spencer. This pamphlet is entitled, Mormonism's Temple of Doom. Ed Decker had called upon his very close personal friend, Walter Martin and CRI, the organization Martin had founded, to settle the dispute, and Decker and Schnoebelen agreed to submit “ourselves and this ministry to the matter. We agree to submit to their findings and take whatever action they deem necessary.” Walter Martin and his researchers looked into the matter and finally issued a statement which strongly supported our position. In this report, Walter Martin stated:

> Herein is our position pertaining to some of the views advanced in the booklet. . . . we agree . . . that there are similarities and parallels among Mormonism and some forms of modern Witchcraft and Satanism. However, as Utah LightHouse Ministry and others have correctly pointed out, what similarities there are stem from Mormonism borrowing directly from Witchcraft or Satanism, but the commonality that all three have in being heavily influenced by Free Masonry . . .

> We understand how and why Mr. Schnoebelen arrived at his conclusion . . . We however cannot endorse his premises, nor the overall conclusion as represented in Mormonism’s Temple of Doom. . . . overall we cannot approve the booklet and all of its conclusions.

We obtained this statement directly from the Christian Research Institute and will provide a free copy of the entire report to anyone who requests it.

In a letter to us dated September 18, 1988, Ed Decker promised that the booklet would be modified to conform to Walter Martin’s criticism:

> This letter is to acknowledge that Christian Research Institute (CRI) has completed its review . . . It is our understanding that they have forwarded a copy of their conclusions to you . . . Our commitment to Dr. Martin was that we would take whatever correction they gave in the matter. To that end, I have met with both Bill Schnoebelen and Jim Spencer with regard to Dr. Martin’s statements about the “Temple of Doom” book. They readily agreed to modify the next printing of the book, which is about due, to report Dr. Martin’s conclusions regarding the historical origins of the temple ritual. Dr. Martin also assured us that CRI would continue to carry the book as soon as that change has been made.

Since Walter Martin and his researchers bluntly stated that they “cannot endorse his [Schnoebelen’s] premises, nor the overall conclusion as represented in Mormonism’s Temple of Doom;” we presumed that the booklet would have to be carefully rewritten to pass muster. We accepted Ed Decker’s promise that they would “modify the next printing of the book.” To our surprise, however, when we obtained the new printing, we could not find any changes regarding the important matters which had been brought to their attention by CRI. It is true that a date has been changed from 1970 to 1971 on page 63, and the word “Roman” has been added before “Catholic” on the next line, but these changes are trivial and do not in any way correct the serious errors in the book. Moreover, there was no answer to the weighty charges we had published in the enlarged edition of The Lucifer God Doctrine. It would appear that the authors did not want to make any changes which would indicate that they were backing down from their extreme conclusions or that could be used by the Mormons to show dishonesty was used in the first edition.

Since Walter Martin has passed away, we will probably never know exactly what transpired between him and the three individuals with whom we disagreed—Decker, Schnoebelen and Spencer. We do know, however, that they completely ignored the criticism found in Martin’s official CRI statement and at least one of the items which Martin had specifically pointed out to them. In a letter dated February 2, 1989, William Schnoebelen acknowledged:

> . . . we submitted ourselves to Dr. Walter Martin and CRI . . . He disagrees with one statement in my book, on p. 14 which says that “Ample evidence exists to prove that Joseph Smith stole the temple endowment from Masonry or witchcraft.” He would prefer to say that “Mormonism, Freemasonry, and Witchcraft are streams of the same Satanic river.”

Since Mr. Schnoebelen admitted that Walter Martin was displeased with this statement, we would expect the booklet to have been altered to conform to Martin’s suggestion. Instead, however, the statement reads exactly the same as in the old edition: “Ample evidence exists to prove that Joseph Smith stole the temple endowment from Masonry or witchcraft . . .” (see p. 14)

While there was a great deal of talk about submitting to CRI, there seems to have been no action to fit the rhetoric. It would appear that these men originally went to Walter Martin because they felt he would come down heavily on their side of the issue and take us to task. When CRI’s final conclusions agreed with ours, they simply ignored the criticism and refused to submit as they had promised.

At any rate, although we have remained silent in our newsletter concerning this issue since November 1988, those who have opposed our attempt to stop the dissemination of inaccurate information on the Mormon temple ritual have become increasingly vocal. James Spencer, for example, wrote an article entitled, “THE VINDICATION OF TEMPLE OF DOOM” (see Through the Maze, Issue No. 23). On May 14, 1990, Ed Decker appeared on the radio program, The Bible Answer Man, and made these comments: “Well, we don’t agree on some particular items regarding the Mormon temple ritual . . . The Tanners, Jerald in particular, feels that I’m a little too harsh on that and that I’ve drawn conclusions that shouldn’t be drawn . . . I think that we’ve been vindicated.”

Those who are still supporting Mormonism’s Temple of Doom are circulating what William Schnoebelen claims is a copy of a “recent letter from Dr. Martin.” As strange as it may seem, this letter appears to give support to the very booklet Walter Martin had previously disapproved. While it is possible that Martin could have prepared such a statement, reason would tell us that the use of the endorsement would have to be contingent upon the authors modifying the booklet “to report Dr. Martin’s conclusions regarding the historical origins of the temple ritual” (Letter from Ed Decker, September 18, 1988). Since there was absolutely no attempt to correct the false information in the booklet, it is obvious that such an endorsement would be of no value. A member of the staff at CRI, in fact, told us that it was his understanding that Mormonism’s Temple of Doom would be revised and he was later shocked to learn that it was not corrected to conform with the truth. He felt that Walter Martin had put his full trust in these men and had no idea that they would not keep their word.

However this may be, a photocopy of the letter which Mr. Schnoebelen mailed on February 2, 1989, contained these words at the end of the letter: “(Signed) Dr. Walter Martin[,] Author, The Kingdom of the Cults,” That the word “Signed,” appeared in parentheses, clearly shows that it is not an actual photocopy of the original letter. The original letter, of course, should have Walter Martin’s handwritten signature on it. It is obvious, therefore, that what Schnoebelen sent was a copy of the letter which had been completely retyped. One would think that it would be simpler for Mr. Schnoebelen to make a photocopy of the original. In addition, it would appear more authoritative with Walter Martin’s own handwritten signature on it. Although there may be some other explanation, we suspect that there is some reason that the original letter has to be suppressed. It could be that the original contained additional information which might be embarrassing to the authors of the booklet. For example, Walter Martin could have detailed how the booklet would have to be revised before they could use the statement. Whatever the case may be, we would like to see the original letter in its entirety or at least a good photocopy of it. A retyped copy of this controversial document is certainly not sufficient.

One would think that after the devastating evidence we printed in The Lucifer-God Doctrine, Ed Decker would be more careful in his public statements concerning Mormonism. Instead, however, he seems to have thrown caution to the wind. On the radio program, The Bible Answer Man, May 15, 1990, Mr. Decker gave a revealing demonstration of his ability to fabricate evidence to support his own opinions. He spoke concerning the film, The God Makers, claiming that he was the moving force behind the production of that film. Mr. Decker apparently felt that he had to impress the listening audience with the effect the film had on slowing down the growth of the Mormon Church. He, therefore, made this fantastic statement regarding a speech given by Mormon Apostle M. Russell Ballard at Brigham Young University on November 14, 1989:

Well, Elder Ballard spoke at BYU . . . and he said that in evaluating the 1980s and the 1990s, he said that the church had planned and expected 10,000,000 people in the church at the end of the 1980s and I remember in the early 1980s that that was spoken of a lot more than it was in the end of the 1980s. . . . he said that the church had only 7,000,000 members and while that’s an outstanding number of people who are in the church today, he said that’s 3,000,000 short of the plan, and that instead of seeing 20,000,000 people—doubling again in the next decade—they could only see like about 14,000,000 people if the trend continued at the pace the church was going today. And he said the reason that the church had not grown[n] was primarily at the foot of the former Mormons and specifically the “God maker” film, and so I feel like that’s what we accomplished.

We were immediately suspicious of Mr. Decker’s statements concerning Apostle Ballard’s speech. The Mormon leaders are always very careful not to say anything that would give comfort to their critics. To make such an admission at a BYU Devotional would be like giving gun powder to the enemy. At any rate, H. Michael Marquardt has provided us with an audio tape of the speech and we checked it out carefully to see if it contained the comments Ed Decker attributed to Apostle Ballard. Unfortunately for Mr. Decker’s credibility, we were unable to find anything concerning The God Makers causing a loss of membership in Ballard’s speech or even anything concerning the church losing 3,000,000 prospective converts. Instead, Apostle Ballard boasted that: “Worldwide church membership has now increased to more than 7,000,000. . . . The day of 50 to 60 thousand full-time missionaries is not far off.” The speech does have one brief mention of The God Makers, but it is only a passing reference to the fact that the church has always had enemies. Mr. Marquardt has transcribed this part of the tape and we have verified its accuracy: “In recent years the church has been attacked openly by producers of the film The Godmakers. A concerted effort by a band of enemies of the church is underway at this very hour.” The speech gives no indication that either The God Makers or the work of any of the church’s critics has had any effect on the growth of the church. Moreover, Apostle Ballard never mentioned anything about the plan to have 10,000,000 members by 1990, nor did he refer to the church’s plan to have 20,000,000 members by the turn of the century.

It was pointed out to us that this erroneous information concerning Apostle Ballard’s speech was also printed in Ed Decker’s Saints Alive in Jesus Newsletter in January 1990. In this issue we find the following:

Elder M. Russell Ballard spoke at BYU according to The Provo Herald of 11/14/89. He announced that the Church had . . . “more than 7 million members . . .” Viewers of THE GOD MAKERS will recall an LDS graph in the early part of the film which predicted that the church would hit 10 million by 1990. Ballard lamented that the church did not meet that membership goal[.] He laid the blame for the failure at the feet of the opposition and specifically blamed the film, THE GOD MAKERS . . . In this decade, the church grew from 4.4 million to 7.0 million. However we praise God that those figures reflect a 3 million member shortfall. We have been led to believe that the spiritual offensive spearheaded by THE GOD MAKERS has cut their planned gains by more than 50%.

The reader will notice that Ed Decker attributed this information to the November 14, 1989, issue of The Provo Herald. This newspaper, like the tape of the address, has absolutely nothing in it that supports the claim that “Ballard lamented that the church did not meet that membership goal,” and raises still another problem. The reader is referred to “an LDS graph in the early part of the film [The God Makers] which predicted that the church would hit 10 million by 1990.” When we examined a video of The God Makers, we found a graph, but it did not have the projected church growth for 1990. It was pointed out to us, however, that it was possible that when the film was transferred to the video that the right side of this graph had been accidentally cut off. A check with a ministry that had a copy of the film revealed that this was the case. The graph did have a projected growth for 1990 as Ed Decker had claimed. This graph, however, did not support Mr. Decker’s conclusion. Instead of 10,000,000 members, the church’s graph predicted a growth of only 6,491,200 by 1990. Since the church’s magazine, The Ensign, listed 7,300,000 members for the last day of 1989, it would appear that church growth had actually exceeded the projection by 808,800. In addition, it is clear from the graph in The God Makers that the projection applies to the end of 1990 not to the end of 1989 as Mr. Decker had assumed. We must, therefore, take into consideration the increase which will take place during this year. In 1989, the church membership increased by 580,000. Since it will probably increase by at least that amount if not more in 1990, we have to add these members to the 808,800. This would give a total of 1,388,800 more members than had been projected for 1990. Since Mr. Decker had claimed that the church had fallen 3,000,000 short of the goal, this would mean that his figures were off by well over 4,000,000!

Now, while we do not doubt that The God Makers had some effect on the growth of the Mormon Church, the church stepped up its missionary program and actually gained more members than it had predicted. There is just no way that we can believe that Mr. Decker’s work, or that of all of the ministries to the Mormons combined, caused “a 3 million member shortfall” in the membership of the church. Ed Decker went even further in his interview on The Bible Answer Man program. As we have shown, he claimed that Apostle Ballard also lamented that because of the damage which had been done, the church would now only have 14,000,000 members by the turn of the century and thus there would be a shortfall of 6,000,000!
It seems only fair to expect any ministry that criticizes the misrepresentations in LDS history and doctrine to be equally concerned about accuracy in its own statements and literature. When we dealt with the changes in Joseph Smith’s story of the First Vision, we were forced to the conclusion that he either deliberately changed his story to fit his evolving theology or he was living in a fantasy world and could not separate the truth from fiction. What can we say with regard to Ed Decker’s report of Apostle Ballard’s speech? Using exactly the same standard as we have used in our study of Mormonism, we feel that the situation looks very grave. Although we do not know what was going on in Mr. Decker’s mind, it is obvious that the truth has been completely distorted. Moreover, some ministries have reprinted this false information and have compounded the problem. They, no doubt, did not have any intention of misleading anyone. Mr. Decker was taken at his word. After all, it is very hard for many people to believe that those engaged in ministries would attempt to pull the wool over the eyes of their readers in this manner. Nevertheless, we simply have to face the truth about the matter.

It would appear that what happened was that Ed Decker received a copy of The Provo Herald and saw that Apostle Ballard had mentioned The God Makers. This, of course, is some type of an achievement because the Mormon leaders hardly ever refer to the works of their adversaries. Mr. Decker must have been extremely impressed by this article and either deliberately set out to deceive or else allowed his imagination to run wild. In any case, he remembered seeing some sort of graph indicating that the church would grow to 10,000,000 members. He felt that it was the graph he used in The God Makers. As we have shown, however, this graph actually projected that by 1990 the church would have only 6,491,200 members. Although we do not know for certain, it may be that Mr. Decker was actually thinking of a graph he saw in the Salt Lake City Messenger or in our book, The Case Against Mormonism, vol. 3, page 164. In the book, two graphs which we prepared are shown. The graphs themselves could not have been the source, but just above the graphs we reported that the Mormons predicted “that if they continue to grow at the same rate they will have 10,000,000 members by 2000 A. D. (Deseret News, Church Section, October 21, 1967, page 1).” If this was the source, Mr. Decker’s memory failed him to some extent. Although the statement concerning “10,000,000 members” fits Decker’s comments, it really referred to the year 2000, not 1990.

With this incorrect information in his mind, Ed Decker reasoned that if the Mormons only had 7,000,000 members by 1990, this would be a “3 million member shortfall.” Since he was convinced that The God Makers had a very significant effect on the Mormon Church, he just knew that this “shortfall” must mainly stem from his work with regard to that film. The next step, of course, was to put all this information into the mouth of a Mormon leader—i.e., Apostle Ballard. This, of course, is the same type of thing that Mark Hofmann did when he forged documents. We are not saying that Ed Decker created any actual document other than his newsletter or even that he did this deliberately. Nevertheless, the facts speak for themselves; a fabricated story has been created by Mr. Decker and it has been widely circulated throughout the land.

Now that Ed Decker’s ability to make up stories has been clearly demonstrated, it raises serious questions concerning many of his sensational claims. On The Bible Answer Man program, May 15, 1990, Ed Decker was asked: “Have you experienced someone actually trying to kill you or is this just sensationalism?” In response to that question, Decker replied that it had nothing to do with sensationalism but, in fact, really occurred: “… it comes with the territory and not very often or highly successful, thank God . . . we just take it with a grain of salt . . . I was poisoned in Scotland . . . it comes with the territory and [is] something you have to learn to live with.” In the Saints Alive in Jesus Newsletter, September 1986, Mr. Decker wrote: “Pray for my health, which has deteriorated badly. The day after Capstone, I came down with Legionnaires’ Disease . . . my body still had not recovered from the Scotland poisoning and the flesh was (and is) weak.” Although Decker was supposed to have been given a dose of arsenic poison which was several times stronger than that required to kill a person, he claimed that God had healed him.

A man who was with Ed Decker at the time of the alleged poisoning has called us from Scotland and expressed his disbelief in Decker’s story. Another man has been seriously investigating this matter and claims to have evidence that the whole story was hatched up. The charge that Mr. Decker has been making up sensational stories to achieve both notoriety and contributions is very serious indeed. If the “Scotland poisoning” really did occur, there should be some witnesses available or evidence in hospital or police records which would verify the story. If Mr. Decker has any evidence to that effect, we would be willing to print it in our next newsletter. If, however, he was not actually tested for arsenic poisoning, then there is no reason to believe the story.

Ed Decker has created a great deal of fear in the hearts of many people with his stories. Many Christians are afraid to come to Utah for fear they might lose their lives. We recently received a very strange call from Mr. Decker in which he claimed he had received an anonymous call from a man who told him he was part of an assassination team that received directions from a member of the First Presidency in the Mormon Church. According to Decker, the man said that three people had been marked for death. One of the authors (Jerald Tanner) was among that number and was to be killed with a bomb. Ed Decker indicated that the individual involved in the conspiracy later felt very bad about the matter and had decided to expose the plot.

We felt that it was very strange that this man—if he really existed—would call Ed Decker because Decker’s name was not even on the hit list. It seemed far more reasonable that he would have contacted the individuals whose lives were in danger. Mr. Decker claimed that the informant told him that his name was not on the list because he had become such a well-known public figure that they did not dare assassinate him for fear of the bad publicity. In any case, we found it very interesting that the Mormon leader who was supposed to oversee the assassination team was the very same man Decker himself had been strongly attacking in his newsletter. Although we can not prove it, we strongly suspect that this entire story, like the story concerning Apostle Ballard, was a figment of Ed Decker’s fertile imagination.

In the book, The Lucifer-God Doctrine, we present a great deal of evidence to show the unreliability of the work on the Mormon temple ceremony which has been published by Ed Decker, William Schnoebelen and James Spencer. Until the objections we have raised in this book have been specifically answered, no one should be deceived into believing that their work has been vindicated. The Lucifer-God Doctrine is available from Utah Lighthouse Ministry.

NOTE: In order to receive this free book you must request it when you send your order!

Our good friend, LaMar Petersen, the author of Hearts Made Glad, has donated a large number of copies of his books to help our ministry. This book throws a great deal of light on Joseph Smith’s revelation known as the Word of Wisdom and Smith’s flippant attitude towards it. The Word of Wisdom forbids the use of alcoholic beverages, tobacco, tea and coffee. A Mormon who continues to break the Word of Wisdom is considered weak in the faith. Such disobedience to this revelation can bar a person from the temple. Incredible as it may seem, Mr. Petersen shows the if Joseph Smith the prophet were alive today, he would not be able to enter the temple because of his frequent use of alcoholic beverages—a practice which continued until the day of his death.

As we were working on our new book, Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony: 1842-1990, we had a very unexpected thing happen: we were offered a transcript and a tape of the new 1990 revision of the “endowment ceremony.” We, therefore, decided to publish it in our new book together with the 1984 version and show all the changes which had been made in the ritual. This delayed publication for some time, but those who had ordered it and were waiting for their copies were pleasantly surprised when they received the final product. One man, who had asked for a number of copies, made this comment in a letter:

Thank you very much for the copies of your latest book. As ever, your work is excellent! A day or two before the copies arrived I was browsing through 3,913 Changes in the Book of Mormon and had the thought that it would be nice to see the endowment changes shown in a like manner. Needless to say, I was pleasantly surprised to find that you did exactly that. Everyone with whom I have shared the book is favorably impressed. One Christian family I know is sharing it with another family who is being given the missionary discussions. I’m sure they’ll find it an eye opener. I recommended they share it with the missionaries. I ran into some missionaries myself and brought up that topic, and was surprised to find that one of the elders was new, and had only gone through the 1990 version. He thought I was lying about the old one, because not even his parents told him what had been changed. His companion confirmed what I said, and the new Elder was obviously distressed with the whole issue. One of the last things he said was something like “I believe the Church is true and that the G. A.’s [General Authorities—i.e., the highest leaders of the church] are prophets, but I can’t see God changing the temple ceremony that much, unless it was wrong to begin with.”

The changes which were made in the temple ceremony have stirred up a controversy within the Mormon Church. A number of Mormons who had talked to the news media concerning the changes were called in for questioning. A recent issue of the liberal Mormon magazine, Sunstone, reported the following:

Last spring at the April general priesthood meeting when President Gordon B. Hinckley counseled the men in the Church not to discuss the temple ordinances outside of the temple, few realized that his comments were a prelude to that soon-to-be-released new temple film which included changes in the ceremony and a streamlined narrative.

It soon became obvious that Church leaders did not welcome individual Saints commenting to the press about the changes were called in for questioning. A recent issue of the liberal Mormon magazine, Sunstone, reported the following:

Many were talked to by their bishops or stake presidents, some met with general authorities. With two exceptions, all reported that their meetings were pleasant and non-threatening . . .

As word of the questioning spread, some were disturbed at what appeared to be an inquisitional approach by Church leaders toward well-meaning members. Others expressed dismay that members would break their temple covenants by speaking to the press. . . . private conversations disputed just exactly what was covenanted in the temple: whether it was simply not to reveal specific covenants or not to talk about anything in the temple ceremony. . . .

One man’s experience was more than a “visit.” In a meeting with all three seventies in his area presidency, Ross Peterson [co-editor of Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought] was questioned at length about his comments and loyalty to the Church. The presidency referred to clippings from a thick Church file which had been gathered on him since his days in college. As a result of the questioning, Peterson’s temple recommend was taken and further action was intimated if he continued to speak or write on the temple. Later, after he wrote a protest and others petitioned Church leaders, his recommend was restored.

In a similar scene in Cleveland, Ohio, Keith Norman’s bishop reluctantly told him that he had been instructed to deny Norman a temple recommend for one year, after which he could have a recommend if he had repented. When Norman asked of what he needed to repent, his bishop replied, “I don’t know.”

In the end, many are troubled by the systematic censoring of believing members and undoubtedly this episode will be alluded to for years in discussions about the role and prerogatives of the Church and its members. (Sunstone, June 1990, pp. 59, 61)

SERIOUS CHANGES

Since the temple ceremony was supposed to have been given by revelation to the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith, some members of the church, like the young missionary quoted above, are very disturbed that the current church leaders would make changes in the sacred ritual. Although some Mormon apologists would have us believe that the changes were really very minor or were only made so the ceremony could be shortened, the evidence we present in Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony clearly demonstrates that many of the changes were major and affect very important Mormon teachings.

In our last newsletter we noted that in the 1990 version of the temple ceremony the Mormon leaders removed the “penalties” for revealing the secrets. These penalties had previously been considered “most sacred.” We have always felt that these penalties were not compatible with Christian teachings and have strongly opposed them in print for over twenty years.

The evidence shows that the wording with regard to the penalties was originally very strong, but has been altered over the years. In the book, Temple Mormonism, published in 1931, page 18, we find this information concerning the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood:

The left arm is here placed at the square, palm to the front, the right hand and arm raised to the neck, holding the palm downwards and thumb under the right ear.

Adam—“We, and each of us, covenant and promise that we will not reveal any of the secrets of this, the first token of the Aaronic priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign or penalty. Should we do so, we agree that our throats be cut from ear to ear and our tongues torn out by their roots.” . . .

Sign—In executing the sign of the penalty, the right hand palm down, is drawn sharply across the throat, then dropped from the square to the side.

The bloody nature of this and other oaths in the temple endowment has been verified by an abundance of testimony (see Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony, pp. 16-26). Some time in the first half of the 20th century, however, a major change was made concerning the penalties in the endowment ceremony. For example, those who received the “First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood” no longer agreed to have their throats “cut from ear to ear” and their “tongues torn out by their roots” if they revealed the First Token. Nevertheless, they were still instructed to draw their thumbs across their throats to show the penalty. In the 1984 account of the ritual, which we have published in our new book, pages 77-79, the reader can see how the wording was modified to remove the harsh language regarding the cutting of the throat and the tearing out of the tongue:

. . . we desire to impress upon your minds the sacred character of the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign and penalty, as well as that of all other tokens of the Holy Priesthood, with their names, signs and penalties . . . . They are most sacred and are guarded by solemn covenants and obligations of secrecy to the effect that under no condition, even at the peril of your life, will you ever divulge them, except at a certain place that will be shown you hereafter. The representation of the execution of the penalties indicates different ways in which life may be taken. . . . We give unto you the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood . . .

The sign is made by bringing the right arm to the square, the palm of the hand to the front, the fingers close together, and the thumb extended. . . . This is the sign. The Execution of the Penalty is represented by placing the thumb under the left ear, the palm of the hand down, and by drawing the thumb quickly across the throat, to the right ear, and dropping the hand to the side. . . .

Now, repeat in your mind after me the words of the covenant, at the same time representing the execution of the penalty.

I, ______, think of the New Name, covenant that I will never reveal the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign and penalty. Rather than do so, I would suffer my life to be taken.

In the new 1990 version of the temple ceremony all mention of penalties has been completely removed. There is nothing said about the thumb being drawn across the throat, and nothing is mentioned concerning “ways in which life may be taken”:

. . . we desire to impress upon your minds the sacred character of the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, with its accompanying name and sign, as well as that of all other tokens of theHoly Priesthood, with their names and signs . . . . They are most sacred, and are guarded by solemn covenants and obligations made in the presence of God, angels and these witnesses to hold them sacred and under no condition will you ever divulge them, except at a certain place in the temple that will be shown you. . . . we give unto you the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood. . . . The sign is made by bringing the right arm to the square, the palm of the hand to the front, the fingers close together, and the thumb extended. This is the sign. . . .
Now, repeat in your mind after me the words of the covenant.

I, ______, think of the New Name, covenant before God, angels, and these witnesses, that I will never reveal the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, with its accompanying name and sign. (1990 version of the temple ceremony, as published in Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony, p. 122)

There were two other portions of the temple ceremony which were altered to remove all references to the penalties which were obviously vestiges of the bloody oaths Joseph Smith borrowed from Freemasonry (see Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony, pages 86, 87 and 89).

In our last newsletter we reported the removal of the “Five Points of Fellowship” from the Mormon temple ceremony. Although we had strong evidence that this part of the ritual had been deleted, we did not know exactly what happened in its place. Now that we have the transcript of the 1990 ceremony, we can clearly understand the change that has taken place.

The Five Points of Fellowship was previously an extremely important part of the temple ceremony. It was only “upon the Five Points of Fellowship through the veil” that one could receive the name of the Second Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, The Patriarchal Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail. This is a highly secret “name”—actually a thirty-six word saying—which only the “Lord” who was behind the veil could give to those who were receiving their endowments. Mormons believe that after they die they will have to give this secret name back to the Lord before he will allow them to pass through the veil into his Presence.

In the book, Temple Mormonism, page 22, the Five Points of Fellowship were described as follows: “The five points of fellowship are given by putting the inside of the right foot to the inside of the Lord’s, the inside of your knee to his, laying your breast close to his, your left hands on each other’s backs, and each one putting his mouth to the other’s ear . . . .” Only when the Lord and the recipient were embracing in this position could the secret name be whispered.

Since the revision of the ceremony in 1990, those who participate in the ritual no longer embrace on the Five Points of Fellowship. They are, in fact, only required to place “left arms . . . upon right shoulders.” They do not put their feet and knees together and all the wording concerning the Five Points of Fellowship has been completely deleted. The words “Five Points of Fellowship” previously appeared in five different places in the ritual—the “Lord” spoke of the “Five Points of Fellowship” twice; “Peter” referred to the “Five Points of Fellowship” twice, and the recipient mentioned them once. Below is a comparison of a portion of the 1984 version with the new revised version:

Lord: You shall receive it upon the Five Points Of Fellowship through the Veil.
(The Officiator demonstrates the Five Points of Fellowship through the Veil with the temple worker who represents the Lord, as each point is mentioned.)

Peter: The Five Points of Fellowship are “inside of right foot by the side of right foot, knee to knee, breast to breast, hand to back, and mouth to ear.” The Lord then gives the name of this token, and asks:

Lord: What is that?
Peter: The Second Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, the Patriarchal Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail.

Lord: Has it a name?
Peter: It has.

Lord: Will you give it to me?
Peter: I will, upon the Five Points of Fellowship through the Veil. (Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony, pp. 96-97)

The reader will notice that in the 1990 revised version (shown below) all references to the Five Points of Fellowship have been deleted:

Lord: You shall receive it through the Veil.
Peter: It is received as left arms are placed upon right shoulders through the Veil.

Peter: The Lord then gives the name of this token, and asks:

Lord: What is that?
Peter: The Second Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, the Patriarchal Grip or Sure Sign of the Nail.

Lord: Has it a name?
Peter: It has.

Lord: Will you give it to me?
Peter: I will, through the Veil.

(Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony, p. 138)

The reader will notice that in the 1990 revised version all references to the Five Points of Fellowship have been deleted.

Regardless of the reason for the change, it raises serious questions concerning the inspiration of church officials. If a person was previously compelled to receive the secret information necessary to enter heaven on the Five Points of Fellowship, how can the church leaders now by-pass God’s revealed way which was supposed to have been given to the prophet Joseph Smith? Kim Sue Lia Perkes revealed that, “a former Mormon familiar with the changes said the ceremony’s climax has been eliminated. Removal of that part of the ritual, he said, is the equivalent of taking the Eucharist out of the Roman Catholic Mass.

Not all Mormons are happy with the ceremony changes. “I certainly have Mormon friends who will see it as a step toward apostasy and an accommodation to the world,” said one practicing Mormon in Utah. (Arizona Republic, April 28, 1990)

One very important change in the temple ceremony is the removal of a portion of the ceremony in which the Devil hired a Christian minister to preach the “orthodox religion” to the people. This portion of the ceremony made it clear that in the eyes of the Mormon leaders the orthodox Christian religion was the Devil’s religion. In the 1984 version of the temple ritual, the Devil tells the minister that if “you will preach your orthodox religion to these people, and convert them, I will pay you well.” This, of course, led the Mormon people to believe that Christian ministers were really working for the Devil. In Mormonism, Magic and Masonry, page 66, we wrote: “... the temple ritual tries to link Christians and ministers of other churches to the Devil’s work. We feel that this is one of the most objectionable things about the ceremony, and we do not feel that a Christian would want to give any support to this type of thing.” Many other Christians protested against this part of the ceremony, and a great deal of pressure has been put on the Mormon leaders to change it.

In the new version all of the material making fun of both Protestants and Catholics has been completely eliminated. In Appendix B of Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony, we demonstrated that over 700 words were deleted and other words changed to remove the attack on other churches!

Unfortunately, the removal of the portion of the temple ceremony which implies that Christian ministers are working for the Devil does not really solve the problem. The Mormon Church still retains Joseph Smith’s story of the First Vision in the Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History, verses 18-19. In this account, Joseph Smith asserted that Jesus himself told him that all other churches were wrong:

My object in going to inquire of the Lord was to know which of all the sects was right. . . . I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt . . .

OATH OF OBEDIENCE

The Mormon leaders teach that those who receive their endowments and are married in the temple can become Gods. In a speech published in The Ensign, Nov. 1975, page 80, Spencer W. Kimball, the twelfth prophet of the LDS Church, made some comments which were broadcast to those men serving in the priesthood of the church: “Brethren, 225,000 of you are here tonight. I suppose 225,000 of you may become gods.”

Because of their belief that God is only an exalted man, Mormon leaders teach that he had a mother as well as a wife. Although Mormons do not worship God’s wife, they teach that she is their “Eternal Mother.” Apostle Bruce R. McConkie explained the doctrine:

Implicit in the Christian verity that all men are the spirit children of an Eternal Father is the usually unspoken truth that they are also the offspring of an Eternal Mother. . . .

This doctrine that there is a mother in Heaven was affirmed in plainness by the First Presidency of the Church . . . they said that “man, as a spirit was begotten and born of heavenly parents, and reared to maturity in the eternal mansions of the Father . . . all men and women are in the similitude of the universal Father and Mother, and are literally the sons and daughters of Deity. (Mormon Doctrine, 1979, p. 516)

The Mormon doctrine of “pre-existence” is very important to those who are married in the temple for time and all eternity. Like the Gods who received their endowments eons ago, those who go through the temple today and are accounted worthy to become Gods and Goddesses will also give birth to spirit children throughout all eternity. These spirits will eventually take bodies on other worlds. In The Gospel Through the Ages, 1958, page 120, Milton R. Hunter, who was a member of the Mormon Church’s First Council of the Seventy, wrote:

. . . Joseph explained . . . that the Gods were to be parents of spirit children just as our Heavenly Father and Mother were the parents of the people of this earth.

Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt made it clear that every God would be the father of billions of children. He estimated that “seventy thousand million [i.e., 70 billion] sons and daughters were born in Heaven” to our Heavenly Father. He also stated:

Each God, through his wife or wives, raises up a numerous family of sons and daughters . . . each father and mother will be in a condition to multiply forever. As soon as each God has begotten many millions of male and female spirits . . . he, in connection with his sons, organizes a new world . . . where he sends both the male and female spirits to inhabit tabernacles of flesh and bones. . . . The inhabitants of each world are required to reverence, adore, and worship their own personal father who dwells in the Heaven which they formerly inhabited. (The Seer, March 1853, p. 37)

The description given by Mormon leaders of the function of a woman who advances to Godhood reminds us of the role played by a queen bee. The queen bee, of course, produces swarms of offspring—as many as 2,500 a day! Her main purpose appears to be to produce more bees. Apostle Bruce R. McConkie made it very plain that spirit children are literally born to the Eternal Father and Mother:

Our spirit bodies had their beginning in pre-existence when we were born as the spirit children of God our Father. Through that birth process spirit element was organized into intelligent entities. (Mormon Doctrine, p. 750)

Many Mormon women have serious reservations about the concept of having billions of spirit children every time their husbands decide to serve additional worlds. In any case, Mormon Church leaders proclaim that “Godhood is not for men only, it is for men and women together” (Mormon Doctrine, p. 844). While at first glance it appears that this would make men and women equal, a more careful examination of the doctrine reveals just the opposite. According to Mormon theology, church members follow the same plan of eternal progression as God the Father. Now, if the “Eternal Mother” had really gained equality with her husband, we would expect the Mormons to pray to her. Apostle Orson Pratt, however, made it plain that the Eternal Mother’s Godhood is rather insignificant when it is compared to her husband’s power. She, in fact, is to be in “the most perfect obedience” to her “great head”:

But if we have a heavenly Mother as well as a heavenly Father, is it not right that we should worship the Mother of our spirits as well as the Father? No; for the Father of our spirits is at the head of His household, and His wives and children are required to yield the most perfect obedience to their great Head. (The Seer, p. 159)

It would appear, then, that in Mormon theology the claim that a woman can obtain “Godhood” amounts to very little. Like the present “Heavenly Mother,” she will be required to “yield the most perfect obedience” to her “great Head”—i.e., her husband, while she continues to give birth to “many millions” of spirit children throughout all eternity. Mormon theology would seem to teach that women who enter into “Godhood” will find themselves serving their own husbands in eternity rather than the God of the Bible. The more one studies the church’s teaching concerning the Mother God, the more obvious it becomes that women are considered to be spiritually inferior in Mormon theology. Since the church changed the anti-black doctrine, many Mormon women have come to see that they are the ones who will be “second class” citizens in heaven. Mormon leaders used to explain that blacks could not hold the priesthood because they were not valiant in the pre-existence, but no reason has been given for the inferiority of women in Mormon theology.

President Brigham Young once stated: “The man is the head and God of the woman, but let him act like a God in virtuous principles . . .” (Sermon of Brigham Young, as quoted in Journals of John D. Lee, 1846-47 and 1859, edited by Charles Kelly, 1938, p. 81) The subservient role of women in the Mormon temple ceremony is evident when they come to the veil in the temple. A man representing Elohim (God the Father) brings the men through the veil into the Celestial Kingdom. The women, on the other hand, are brought through by their husbands. This part of the ceremony seems to be an attempt to demonstrate that “man is the head and God of the woman.” In the account of the temple ritual printed in Hand-Book on Mormonism, 1882, p. 30, we read that the official who performs the wedding ceremony “tells the man that he must look to God, but the woman must look to her husband as her God, for if he lives in his religion, the spirit of God will be in him, and she must therefore yield him unquestioning obedience, for he is as a God unto her . . .” On page 28 of the same book, we read of an “oath of obedience”:
“The women then took the oath of obedience to their husbands, having to look up to them as their gods. It is not possible for a woman to go to Christ, except through her husband.”

In his article published in 1987, David John Buerger noted that “the endowment ceremony still depicts women as subservient to men, not as equals in relating to God. . . . he is the one who acts as intermediary to God . . .” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1987, p. 68). In the 1984 version of the temple ceremony, which is published in Appendix A of Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony, pages 75-76, the men “covenant and promise” that they will “obey the law of God.” The women, however, agree to obey the law of their husbands:

Elohim: We will put the sisters under covenant to obey the law of their husbands. Sisters, arise.

(Female patrons stand as instructed.)

Elohim: Each of you bring your right arm to the square. You and each of you solemnly covenant and promise before God, angels and these witnesses at this altar that you will each observe and keep the law of your husband, and abide by his counsel in righteousness. Each of you bow your head and say yes.

Women: Yes.

Since the church leaders revised the endowment ceremony on April 10, 1990, women “no longer must vow to obey their husbands” (Salt Lake Tribune, April 29, 1990). The new ceremony reads as follows (see Appendix B of Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony, p. 120):

Elohim: We will put each sister under covenant to obey the Law of the Lord, and to hearken to the counsel of her husband, as her husband hearkens unto the counsel of the Father. Sisters, arise.

(Female patrons stand as instructed.)

Elohim: Each of you bring your right arm to the square. You and each of you solemnly covenant and promise before God, angels, and these witnesses at this altar that you will each observe and keep the Law of the Lord, and hearken to the counsel of your husband as he hearkens to the counsel of the Father. Each of you bow your head and say “yes.”

Women: Yes.

The reader will notice that the words “the Law of their husbands” was changed to “the Law of the Lord,” and the words “the law of your husbands” have been altered to read, “the Law of the Lord.” It is also interesting to note some changes a few paragraphs earlier in the ceremony. In one place in the 1984 version, Elohim tells Adam that Eve “will obey your law in the Lord . . .” These words have been modified to, “will obey the Law of the Lord . . .” In the 1984 version, the following paragraph reads: “Eve: Adam I now covenant to obey your law as you obey our Father.” In the 1990 revision this has been changed to read: “Eve: Adam, I now covenant to obey the Law of the Lord, and to hearken to your counsel as you hearken unto Father.”

Another very interesting change concerning women occurs just before the “Law of Obedience.” In the 1984 version we are told of the punishment which is to be inflicted upon both Adam and Eve because of their transgression:

Elohim: Eve, because thou hast hearkened to the voice of Satan and hast partaken of the forbidden fruit, and given unto Adam, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children. Nevertheless, thou mayest be preserved in child-bearing. Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee in righteousness.

Adam, because thou has hearkened unto the voice of thy wife and hast partaken of the forbidden fruit, the earth shall be cursed for thy sake. Instead of producing fruits and flowers spontaneously, it shall bring forth thorns, thistles, briars, and noxious weeds to afflict and torment man. And by the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread all the days of thy life, for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return.”

In the 1990 revision, Eve’s punishment is completely omitted. All of the words which we have emphasized above in bold type were completely deleted:

Elohim: Adam, because thou has partaken of the forbidden fruit, the earth shall be cursed for thy sake. Instead of producing fruits and flowers spontaneously, it shall bring forth thorns, thistles, briars, and noxious weeds to afflict and torment man. And by the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread all the days of thy life, for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return.

It is very interesting to note that although the Lord’s words to Eve have been entirely omitted (compare Genesis 3:16), Adam is still punished with the same curse found in Genesis 3:17-19. This revision of the temple ceremony cannot be supported from the revelations of Joseph Smith (see Smith’s Inspired Version of the Bible and the Pearl of Great Price, Moses 4:22). In the 1984 version of the endowment, Eve was often overlooked. In the new version her name has been added in twenty-two places.

OTHER RECENT CHANGES

Another important change has been made in the sign for the Second Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood. In the 1984 version of the endowment ceremony, as printed in Appendix A of Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony, page 94, we find this:

The sign is made by raising both hands high above the head (Officiator demonstrates.), and while lowering the hands repeating aloud the words:

Pay Lay Ale
Pay Lay Ale
Pay Lay Ale

As early as 1969 we pointed out a problem with this:

. . . there seems to have been a change made in this part of the ceremony, for the Salt Lake Tribune, February 12, 1906, gave the words as “Pale, Ale, Ale,” and Temple Mormonism used the words “Pale, Hale, Hale.” (The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1, p. 138)

However this may be, in another portion of the temple ceremony, it is explained that “Pay Lay Ale” means “Oh God, hear the words of my mouth!”

A number of years ago a Mormon intellectual informed us that it was his understanding that one of the top scholars in the church had pointed out to church authorities that the words pay lay ale or pe le el could be translated from the Hebrew language as “mouth to God.” This, of course, could be considered to be a condensed version of “Oh God, hear the words of my mouth!” That this translation is plausible can be confirmed by consulting Strong’s Exhaustive Concordance of the Bible, Hebrew and Chaldee Dictionary, word #6310—“peh . . . the mouth.” The Hebrew letter Lamed (transliterated in English as l) is often added on the front of words and means “to, at, for” (Hebrew Primer and Grammar, by C. P. Fagnani and A. B. Davidson, page 50). of Abraham, his son, Larry Ferguson, continues to maintain that he was a true believer.

After Thomas Stuart Ferguson passed away in 1983, Larry Ferguson decided that his father’s book, One Fold and One Shepherd, a work which was written before he lost his testimony, should be revised and republished to the world. He talked Dr. Bruce W. Warren, of Brigham Young University, into working on the revision, and in 1987 it was published under the title, The Messiah in Ancient America. In the Preface, page xiii, Dr. Warren wrote the following: “The Ferguson family wanted the new book to be a tribute to Thomas Stuart Ferguson and his abiding testimony of the Book of Mormon and the divinity of the Messiah, Jesus the Christ.” Warren also revealed that “the driving force behind the book was Larry Ferguson . . .”

Fortunately, Stan Larson, one of the top scholars in the Mormon Church, has made a serious study concerning Thomas Stuart Ferguson’s beliefs during the last years of his life and has reached the same conclusion that we came to—i.e., Ferguson was not a believer in the Book of Mormon nor in the divine authenticity of the Mormon Church. Larson has written a 38-page article concerning this matter entitled, “The Odyssey of Thomas Stuart Ferguson,” which is published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1990.

Stan Larson has gathered photocopies of many letters written by Thomas Stuart Ferguson which are now available to researchers at the University of Utah in the H. Michael Marquardt Collection, Special Collections, J. Willard Marriott Library. Although Larson could find a great deal of evidence in letters Ferguson wrote after 1970 that he had completely lost faith in Joseph Smith and the historicity of the Book of Mormon, he found no letters written during this period which supported the divine claims of Mormonism. He, in fact, noted:

When the Thomas Stuart Ferguson papers arrived at the Lee Library at Brigham Young University after his death, they contained absolutely no letters after 1967 that indicate his views on the Book of Mormon, the Book of Abraham, or Joseph Smith. . . . As far as the present collection at BYU is concerned, the fifteen-year period before his death is a blank. In contrast with his publication record in the 1940s, 1950s, and early 1960s, Ferguson published no new articles or books after 1967, nor did he reprint any of his previous work. If it were not for letters he wrote [i.e., the letters in the Marquardt Collection at the University of Utah], the last years of his life would remain unknown. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1990, pp. 71-72)

In addition to the letters which clearly show Ferguson’s unbelief, Larson has brought to light some extremely important extracts from the journal of Mormon scholar, Ronald Barney, which demonstrate conclusively that just before his death, Ferguson was working on research which he felt discredited Joseph Smith and the Book of Mormon. We will have more to say about this matter later in this article.

Thomas Stuart Ferguson, who was born in Pocatello, Idaho, on May 21, 1915, devoted a great deal of his life trying to prove the Book of Mormon by archaeology and was considered by the Mormon people as a great defender of the faith. He wrote at least three books on the subject. His book, One Fold and One Shepherd, was recommended to one of the editors of this newsletter as containing the ultimate case for the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. On the jacket of that book (1962 edition), we find this information about Ferguson:

Thomas Stuart Ferguson, 47, President of the New World Archaeological Foundation, is a distinguished student of the

Ferguson’s Rejection of the Book of Mormon Verified

In our book, Ferguson’s Manuscript Unveiled, we presented a great deal of evidence showing that the noted Mormon scholar, Thomas Stuart Ferguson, became a complete unbeliever in the Book of Mormon during the last 12 or 13 years of his life. Notwithstanding the fact that there is a collection of letters to a number of different people in which Ferguson declared his disbelief in Joseph Smith, the Book of Mormon and the Book
Joseph Smith announced, in print (History of the Church, Vol. II, page 236), that “one of the rolls contained the writings of Abraham, another the writings of Joseph of Egypt . . .”. Since 4 scholars, who have established that they can read Egyptian, say that the manuscripts deal with neither Abraham nor Joseph—and since the 4 reputable men tell us exactly what the manuscripts do say—I must conclude that Joseph Smith had not the remotest skill in things Egyptian-hieroglyphics. To my surprise, one of the highest officials in the Mormon Church agreed with that conclusion when I made that very statement to him on Dec. 4, 1970—privately in one-to-one conversation.

The attempts, including Nibley’s, to explain away and dodge the trap into which Joseph Smith fell when he had the audacity to translate the Chandler texts, and keep the original Egyptian texts around, are absurd, in my view. . . .

Of course the dodge as to the Book of Abraham must be:

“We DON’T HAVE THE ORIGINAL MANUSCRIPT FROM WHICH THE BOOK OF ABRAHAM WAS TRANSLATED. I conclude that we do have it and have translations of it.” (Letter by Thomas Stuart Ferguson, dated March 13, 1971)

The first indication we had that Mr. Ferguson was losing his faith in Mormonism was just after Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Papyri were rediscovered. In 1968 he wrote us a letter saying that we were “doing a great thing—getting out some truth on the Book of Abraham.” This was a significant statement since we were presenting evidence that the Book of Abraham was not a correct translation of the papyri. Later we heard a rumor that he had given up Joseph Smith’s Book of Abraham, but this hardly prepared us for his visit on December 2, 1970. At that time, Mr. Ferguson told us frankly that he had not only given up the Book of Abraham, but that he had come to the conclusion that Joseph Smith was not a prophet and that Mormonism was not true. Ferguson felt that our work was important and that it should be subsidized. He told us that he had spent twenty-five years trying to prove Mormonism, but had finally come to the conclusion that all his work in this regard had been in vain. He said that his training in law had taught him how to weigh evidence and that the case against Joseph Smith was absolutely devastating and could not be explained away.

He referred to Dr. Hugh Nibley’s defense of the Book of Abraham as “nonsense,” and told us that just before coming to visit us he had discussed the Book of Abraham with Hugh B. Brown (Brown served as a member of the First Presidency under President David O. McKay). According to Mr. Ferguson, Apostle Brown had also come to the conclusion that the Book of Abraham was false and was in favor of the church giving it up. A few years later Hugh B. Brown said he could “not recall” making the statements Thomas Stuart Ferguson attributed to him. Ferguson, however, was apparently referring to the same incident in the letter of March 13, 1971, when he stated: “I must conclude that Joseph Smith had not the remotest skill in things Egyptian-hieroglyphics. To my surprise one of the highest officials in the Mormon Church agreed with that conclusion . . . privately in one-to-one conversation.” When Ferguson visited with us he seemed to be absolutely convinced that Brown did not believe the Book of Abraham.

In any case, Ferguson found himself faced with a dilemma, for the Mormon Church had just given him a large grant ($100,000 or more) to carry on the research of the New World Archaeological Foundation. He felt, however, that this foundation was doing legitimate archaeological work, and therefore he intended to continue the research. He realized that the organization he had founded to establish the authenticity of earliest high civilizations of the New World. He, with Dr. A. V. Kidder, dean of Central American archaeologists, first planned the New World Archaeological Foundation in 1952 . . . He raised $225,000 for the field work, incorporated the Foundation (being an attorney), assisted in the initial explorations in Central America and Mexico and has actively directed the affairs of the Foundation since its inception.

The Mormon Church provided hundreds of thousands of dollars to Ferguson’s New World Archaeological Foundation in the hope that it would find evidence supporting the Book of Mormon. This organization was eventually “attached to and administered through BYU.”

From all that we can learn, Thomas Stuart Ferguson was a dedicated believer in the authenticity of the Book of Mormon at the time he founded the New World Archaeological Foundation. He really believed that archaeology would prove the Book of Mormon. For a number of years he was very excited about the progress of the work and seemed certain that the Book of Mormon would be vindicated soon. In his book, One Fold and One Shepherd, page 263, he stated: “The important thing now is to continue the digging at an accelerated pace in order to find more inscriptions dating to Book-of-Mormon times. Eventually we should find decipherable inscriptions . . . referring to some unique person, place or event in the Book of Mormon.” In 1962 Mr. Ferguson said that “Powerful evidences sustaining the book are accumulating.”

Although many important archaeological discoveries were made, the evidence he had desired to find to support the Book of Mormon did not turn up. At first it had all seemed so simple; since the Book of Mormon told when the Nephites were in Mesoamerica, all one had to do was find archaeological sites that dated to the period and the Book of Mormon would be established by the evidence. The fact that archaeological research failed to provide the confirmation which Mr. Ferguson expected to find must have weighed very heavily on his mind. The most serious blow to Ferguson’s faith, however, came just after Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Papyri were rediscovered in the Metropolitan Museum of Art. This collection, which had been lost for many years, contained the very papyrus from which Joseph Smith “translated” the Book of Abraham. The Book of Abraham is published in the Pearl of Great Price, one of the four standard works of the Mormon Church.

After Mr. Ferguson obtained photographs of the papyrus fragments, he consulted Professors Lutz and Lesko of the University of California. Both these Egyptologists agreed that the papyrus Joseph Smith claimed was the Book of Abraham was in reality the Book of Breathings, an Egyptian funerary text made for a man by the name of Hor (Horus). Ferguson learned that this papyrus had nothing at all to do with the patriarch Abraham or his religion. It was in its entirety a pagan text filled with the names of Egyptian gods and goddesses.

Thomas Stuart Ferguson was shaken to the core by this discovery. When the church’s noted apologist, Dr. Hugh Nibley, began defending the Book of Abraham, Mr. Ferguson wrote a letter to another member of the church in which he stated:

Nibley’s . . . articles on the Book of Abraham aren’t worth a tinker—first, because he is not impartial, being the commissioned and paid defender of the faith. Second, because he could not, he dared not, he did not, face the true issue: “Could Joseph Smith translate Egyptian?” . . . it is perfectly obvious that we now have the original [sic] manuscript material used by Jos. Smith in working up the Book of Abraham. . . .
the Book of Mormon was now actually disproving the Book of Mormon by its failure to turn up anything concerning a Christian culture existing in Mesoamerica prior to the time of Columbus.

A few months after Thomas Stuart Ferguson revealed to us that he had come to the conclusion that the Book of Mormon was a spurious production, he wrote us a letter in which he said:

“I will be in SLC in June—and if so, I’ll call on you again. I enjoyed my visit with you . . . I certainly admire you for the battle you are waging—virtually single handed” (Letter dated March 13, 1971). On a number of occasions when people wrote to him, Mr. Ferguson recommended that they read our publications on Mormonism.

Unfortunately, Thomas Stewart Ferguson seems to have had a very difficult time communicating his loss of faith to those he was close to. He told us, for instance, that he did not dare tell one of his sons the truth about the Book of Mormon because the shock would cause him too much emotional trauma. (Although we cannot prove it, we suspect that this may have been Larry Ferguson). Ferguson felt that he may have to put the matter off until the situation changed. While he no longer believed in the divinity authenticity of the Book of Mormon, he continued to attend the Mormon Church.

In a letter to James Still, dated December 3, 1979, Mr. Ferguson frankly stated: “I lost faith in Joseph Smith as one having a pipeline to deity—and have decided that there has never been a pipeline to deity—with any man.” Since he had many friends and members of his family in Mormonism and apparently felt comfortable there, he decided to remain in the church. In the same letter Ferguson stated that he still attended Mormon meetings, “sing in the choir and enjoy my friendships in the Church. In my opinion it is the best fraternity that has come to my attention . . . .” With regard to the origin of the Book of Mormon, Mr. Ferguson wrote: “I give Joseph Smith credit as an innovator and as a smart fellow. . . . I think that Joseph Smith may have had Ixtilxochitl and View of the Hebrews as an innovator and as a smart fellow. . . . I think that Joseph Smith may have had Ixtılxochitl and View of the Hebrews from which to work.”

In 1975 Thomas Stuart Ferguson finally mustered up his courage and prepared a 29-page paper in response to papers written by Mormon apologists John Sorenson and Garth Norman. It was entitled, Written Symposium on Book-of-Mormon Geography: Response of Thomas S. Ferguson to the Norman & Sorenson Papers. (We have published Ferguson’s paper in our book, Ferguson’s Manuscript Unveiled.) In this response, page 4, Mr. Ferguson wrote: “With all of these great efforts, it cannot be established factually that anyone, from Joseph Smith to the present day, has put his finger on a single point of terrain that was a Book-of-Mormon geographical place. And the hemisphere has been pretty well checked out by competent people. Thousands of sites have been excavated.” Ferguson pointed out in his paper that the text of the Book of Mormon makes it very clear that certain items should be found in archaeological excavations and that these items are not present in the sites proposed. On page 29 he concluded by saying: “I’m afraid that up to this point, I must agree with Dee Green, who has told us that to date there is no Book-of-Mormon geography. I, for one, would be happy if Dee were wrong.”

In a letter to Mr. & Mrs. H. W. Lawrence, dated February 20, 1976, Thomas Stuart Ferguson made very plain the reason why there is “no Book-of-Mormon geography”: “Herewith is a copy of my recent (1975) paper on Book of Mormon matters. . . . The real implication of the paper is that you can’t set Book of Mormon geography down anywhere—because it is fictional and will never meet the requirements of the dirt-archeology. I should say—what is in the ground will never conform to what is in the book.”

As we indicated earlier, Stan Larson, who studied the matter at great length, reached the same conclusion we did with regard to Thomas Stuart Ferguson’s loss of faith. He stated:

In the middle years of his career, he organized archaeological reconnaissance and fieldwork in the area of Mesoamerica. But in the last years of his career, he concluded that the archaeological evidence did not substantiate the Book of Mormon, and so he reduced (in his mind) the geography of the book to nothing at all in the real world. . . . He had lived his life as a Latter-day Saint expecting to be the instrument of verification, believing that he would find the physical proof that would not only justify his faith in the Book of Mormon but that would convince the world as well. . . . In the end, he was theologically shipwrecked less by his failure to find persuasive archaeological support for the Book of Mormon than by his encounter with the translations of the newly discovered Joseph Smith Egyptian papyri. But though his ship ran aground and floundered, it did not sink, and he managed to salvage what he felt were worthwhile essentials. . . .

Ferguson’s excitement about authenticating the Book of Abraham turned into a nightmare. His former belief system could not withstand the shock of this disillusionment. Not only did Ferguson’s views of the Book of Abraham radically change, but also, domino-like, his belief in the prophetic status of Joseph Smith and the historicity of the Book of Mormon.

Ferguson and his wife, June, had a daughter, Sandra, and a son, Larry, and they had a third child, Thomas, who was born in 1956. Ferguson’s excitement about authenticating the Book of Abraham turned into a nightmare. His former belief system could not withstand the shock of this disillusionment. Not only did Ferguson’s views of the Book of Abraham radically change, but also, domino-like, his belief in the prophetic status of Joseph Smith and the historicity of the Book of Mormon.

Early in December 1970 . . . Ferguson bared his soul to people at opposing ends of the theological spectrum—on the one hand, the liberal apostle, Hugh B. Brown, and on the other hand, the anti-Mormons, Jerald and Sandra Tanner.

Ferguson’s skepticism became public a year and eight months later when the Tanners published an account of his visit with them in the revised edition of Mormonism: Shadow or Reality.

Ferguson never issued any kind of retraction or revision to this account. He frankly discussed his new views in answer both to letters sent to him and to direct questions. . . . Tom Ferguson, in a sense, identified himself as a closet doubter—though one who was willing to write letters from his closet. . . . Ferguson was a man of contrasts. His early enthusiasm for the Book of Mormon . . . changed in the last decade and a half of his life into a skeptical view that placed the source of all Book of Mormon activities in the creative mind of Joseph Smith. After many years of archaeological investigations, Ferguson, disappointed by not finding the long-hoped-for confirmation of the Book of Mormon, concluded that the book was ‘fictional’ and that “what is in the ground will never conform to what is in the book” (Ferguson 1976b). (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1990, pp. 57, 71-73, 85-86)

As we indicated earlier, Stan Larson brought to light some extremely important material from the journal of Ronald O. Barney, Senior Archivist at the Mormon Church Historical Department. Barney had a very revealing interview with Thomas Stuart Ferguson about two and a half months before his death. Barney had his interview with Ferguson on January 4, 1983, and he recorded the matter in his journal on February 15, 1983. Ferguson died the following month (March 16, 1983). On April 19, 1984, Ronald Barney made a typed copy of the information he had recorded in his journal and added some additional recollections regarding the visit he had with Mr. Ferguson on January 4. According to Barney, Thomas Stuart Ferguson confided in him that he was working on a project which he felt would show that the Book of Mormon was in reality a 19th century production.
Stan Larson gives this information concerning the interview:

On 4 January 1983, a little more than two months before his death, Ferguson met Ronald Barney at the LDS Historical Department. Barney told Ferguson he knew of his various publications and asked if he knew how Jerald and Sandra were using his March 1971 letter to James Boyack. This letter contains Ferguson’s earliest known denial of the authenticity of the Book of Abraham. Barney recorded in his journal that Ferguson “began to shift in his chair, got pale and acted as if I was a General Authority that had caught him committing adultery. He apologized all over the place, said the Tanners were creeps, etc.” After Barney expressed his concern for open discussion, Ferguson disclosed his current beliefs: “After having once been once [sic] a defender of the faith he now totally rejects the divine intervention of God in the workings of the affairs of men” (Barney 1983).

A few days later on 10 January 1983, Ferguson wrote to Barney, providing the details of his historical investigations into possible connections between Oliver Cowdery and Ethan Smith, author of View of the Hebrews, a suggested possible source of influence on Joseph Smith . . . (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1990, p. 83)

Ronald Barney claimed that Ferguson was also trying to link Joseph Smith with Sidney Rigdon prior to the publication of the Book of Mormon. It is clear, then, that as Mr. Ferguson entered the last months of his life he was still engaged in a project which he felt would prove that the Book of Mormon was not an ancient document. As late as February 1, 1983, about six weeks before his death, Ferguson wrote Barney a letter in which he indicated that he was still pursuing his critical research into the true origin of the Mormon Church: “I am continuing my research. It is fun and stimulating. I will look forward to meeting with you on my next trip to Salt Lake City” (Ferguson 1983b) (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1990, p. 84).

It is also interesting to note that Mr. Ferguson told Ronald Barney the same story concerning Apostle Hugh B. Brown repudiating the Book of Abraham that he told us some twelve years earlier. In the typed material which Ronald Barney prepared on April 19, 1984, he wrote:

Beyond what is in my journal entry concerning my visit with him on January 4, 1983 I should include these things. Ferguson said that the thing that first led him to seriously question the church was the papyri [sic] purported to be the source of the Book of Abraham. . . . He took the evidence to Hugh B. Brown . . . he said that Brother Brown agreed with him that it was not scripture. . . . He did say that Hugh B. Brown did not believe the Book of Abraham was what the church said it was. I felt as Ferguson was telling me this that he was not making up the story. It appeared that he really believed what he was telling me. (Photocopy of statement by Ronald O. Barney, dated April 19, 1984)

Concerning the material Ronald Barney has brought to light, Stan Larson observed: “These final two letters, together with Barney’s journal and reminiscence, confirm Ferguson’s critical views just two months before his death. This crucial testimony functions like a kingpin to tie the last fifteen years together and is comparable to the Wesley P. Lloyd diary, which reports the non-historical view of the Book of Mormon held by B. H. Roberts just two months before he died (Roberts 1985, 22-24)” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1990, p. 84).

In spite of the strong evidence that Thomas Stuart Ferguson completely lost faith in Joseph Smith and the Book of Mormon, his son, Larry Ferguson, cannot allow himself to face the truth. He continues to promote the sale of The Messiah in Ancient America—a book which continues to proclaim Thomas Stuart Ferguson’s “abiding testimony of the Book of Mormon and the divinity of the Messiah, Jesus the Christ.”

In a letter published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Fall, 1990, page 9, Larry Ferguson made this claim: “A few years before my father passed away, he, my mother, and I met with a publisher about revising, updating, and publishing One Fold and One Shepherd. The year or so before his death, my father cut back on his law practice and began that revision.” One would think that in a “year or so” of working on the project, Thomas Stuart Ferguson could have completed a fairly good sized manuscript. Stan Larson became curious about this manuscript and asked for permission to examine it. To his surprise, he discovered there was no such manuscript:

At the time of his death Ferguson had not written a single word in a manuscript of revision. His only work on the contemplated revision was about twenty ideas for updating, jotted on small 3M “Post-it” notes. One of these notes suggested including the influence of Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews on the text of the Book of Mormon, but this controversial subject is never mentioned in Warren’s revision, The Messiah in Ancient America, even though Ferguson’s radical view on this point was independently supported by Ron Barney. So, while the new book contains thousands of Thomas Stuart Ferguson’s words, they represent his position when One Fold and One Shepherd was published in 1958 or 1962, not his ideas in 1983. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1990, p. 85, footnote 6)

In the same footnote (pages 84-85), Stan Larson makes it clear that The Messiah in Ancient America is a “gross misrepresentation” of Ferguson’s true feelings:

. . . since the title page presents Thomas Smart Ferguson as a coauthor with Bruce W. Warren one must examine this posthumous attribution of authorship . . . Since the clear evidence in his letters indicates that Ferguson denied the historicity of the Book of Mormon and the divinity of Jesus, it is deceptive for Warren to speak of his “abiding” testimony. . . . Warren’s total association with Ferguson during the last fifteen years of his life consisted of a five-minute conversation in 1979. . . . If the book were intended to be a tribute to Ferguson, it should have been dedicated to his memory, rather than have his name printed on the title page as a coauthor. Wishful thinking and fond memories do not change the way things had changed in Ferguson’s thinking. The Messiah in Ancient America attributes fresh authorship to Ferguson, and this kind of an attempted reinstatement of the pre-Book-of-Abraham-papyri Ferguson is a gross misrepresentation of his real views.

Those who are interested in obtaining Stan Larson’s definitive article, “The Odyssey of Thomas Stuart Ferguson,” which was published in the Spring 1990 issue of Dialogue, can write to: Dialogue Foundation, University Station—UMC 7805, Logan, Utah 84322.

In bringing out a book by his father which is favorable to the Book of Mormon, Larry Ferguson had to side-step a great deal of evidence which appeared in letters written by his father. In addition, there are a number of people who could testify concerning Thomas Stuart Ferguson’s complete rejection of the Book of Mormon. The journal of Ronald Barney is especially hard to disregard. The reader will remember that Barney is a Senior Archivist at the Mormon Church’s Historical Department. It seems highly unlikely that someone in his position would make up a false story concerning the last weeks of Ferguson’s life.
That Larry Ferguson was unable to produce an actual manuscript written by his father, Thomas Stuart Ferguson, certainly throws a great deal of doubt upon the claim that The Messiah in Ancient America represented his true feelings. Moreover, a manuscript which Thomas Stuart Ferguson wrote which demonstrated that “there is no Book-of-Mormon geography” and a “paucity of specific support” for the Book of Mormon in the findings of archaeologists in the New World has been deliberately ignored in The Messiah in Ancient America.

As we indicated earlier, we have photographically reproduced Thomas Stuart Ferguson’s manuscript criticizing the Book of Mormon in our book, Ferguson’s Manuscript Unveiled. Ferguson himself said that this manuscript was written to prove the Book of Mormon “fictional.”

WESLEY WALTERS’ HOPE

We had just completed printing Wesley P. Walters’ Master’s thesis and were preparing to go to press with this newsletter, when we received word that he had passed away. We had known for some time that Wesley had serious heart problems, but his death still came as a real blow. Nevertheless, we rejoice in the fact that our good friend and associate in the work has gone home to be with the Lord. While Walters was truly a great scholar, his most important concern was his relationship with his Lord Jesus Christ. Walters also pastored a church in Marissa, Illinois, for as long as we knew him (we first met him in 1961).

Wesley Walters’ contributions in the field of Mormon history were remarkable. He was, in fact, a great detective when it came to ferreting out early Mormon documents. It was Walters who discovered the original document which verified the claim that Joseph Smith was a “glass looker” and that he was arrested and brought before a Justice of the Peace for that practice (see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pp. 32-39). In addition, Walters discovered that Joseph Smith’s claim that he had his First Vision in 1820 at the time of a religious revival in Palmyra, New York could not be true. There was no revival in Palmyra that year; it actually occurred in 1824-25 (Palmyra, New York could not be true. There was no revival in Palmyra that year; it actually occurred in 1824-25 (Palmyra, New York could not be true. There was no revival in Palmyra that year; it actually occurred in 1824-25). Although Mormon scholar Richard L. Bushman tried to refute Walters’ arguments, he acknowledged that Walters had a very important effect on Mormon history:

The Reverend Mr. Walters’ article on the first vision raised quite a stir among Mormon scholars when an early version circulated about a year and a half ago . . . the style of his attack was both refreshing and disconcerting . . . it was free of the obvious rancor characteristic of anti-Mormon writers . . . They cannot resist twisting the knife. Mr. Walters, by contrast, sticks to his facts . . . He candidly presents his argument and bluntly tells Mormons to reevaluate the foundations of their church. That kind of frankness is far more disarming than the more pretentious variety . . . Our consternation was a genuine compliment to the quality of Mr. Walters’ work.

While Mr. Walters has put us on the spot for the moment, in the long run Mormon scholarship will benefit from his attack . . . Mormon historians asked themselves how many other questions about our early history remain unasked as well as unanswered. Not long after we saw his essay, a committee on “Mormon History in New York” sent a group of scholars east for special research . . . Without wholly intending it, Mr. Walters may have done much to advance the cause of Mormon history within the Church as anyone in recent years. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1969, pp. 82-83)

Wesley P. Walters had an extremely important effect upon our own work and that of the other ministries to Mormons. While we have researched many areas of Mormon history, when we talked to Wesley Walters we clearly recognized our own inadequacies. Walters was a real historian in every sense of the word, and for this reason we constantly sought his advice. He not only spent untold hours giving us guidance, but also provided an unending stream of photocopies, microfilms and information concerning Mormon history and documents. Our work would not be in the place it is today without his help. In fact, during some of our hardest years he sent us monthly support to keep the ministry going. Wesley Walters could have acquired a far greater name for himself, but he chose to spend a great deal of his time serving others. He was constantly helping those in other ministries prepare their manuscripts and spent a great deal of his time answering letters and sending photocopies to Mormons and others who had questions. The importance of his work cannot be overstated. While we will really miss him, we thank God that we had the privilege of knowing him and benefiting from his research and wisdom.

Wesley P. Walters received the Lord into his heart long before we met him. His hope for eternal life was firmly based in the atonement and resurrection of Jesus Christ. He recognized that he was a sinner and asked God to forgive him and come into his life. His desire to bring others to know the saviour who had changed his life led him into the ministry. While he was pastoring in New York—the birthplace of Mormonism—he encountered the teachings of the Joseph Smith. His examination of LDS teachings led him to the conclusion that Mormonism was another gospel which was not founded on the teachings of the Bible (see Galatians 1:8).

Pastor Walters’ fervent desire was to bring Mormons to the hope that he had in Jesus Christ. In a tract entitled, Enticing Words of Man’s Wisdom, Wesley P. Walters wrote:

The world does not need another man-made, feeling-centered religion by which men try to earn their way to glory through religious deeds and temple ceremonies. It needs to hear the refreshing real gospel, that while our sins have justly brought down upon us God’s great anger and condemnation, His love has brought us eternal salvation and glory by sending His Son to die for our personal sins and guilt. Those who place all their confidence in Him alone, He transforms into new creations and makes them citizens of His true Heavenly Kingdom.

As we indicated earlier, we have just finished printing Wesley Walters’ Master’s thesis, The Use of the Old Testament in the Book of Mormon. In this important thesis Walters demonstrated many errors Joseph Smith fell into when he wrote the Book of Mormon. His research makes it clear that in creating that book, Smith was plagiarizing the King James Version of the Bible rather than translating from ancient gold plates. We are selling this 235-page thesis for only $7.00.
When the Apostle Paul wrote to the churches of Galatia, he asked this question: “Am I therefore become your enemy, because I tell you the truth?” (Galatians 4:16) Paul was painfully aware of the fact that his stand for true Christianity was costing him a great deal. Many of those who are engaged in Christian work today are faced with this same problem. The truth does not always make everyone happy. In fact, it can make some people extremely angry. We found this out over thirty years ago when we left the Mormon Church and began publishing material questioning its authenticity. Because of our stand, many people began to proclaim that we were either possessed by the Devil or at least working through his power. We realize the position these people are coming from and continue to love and pray for them in spite of what they might say about us.

Recently, however, we have encountered the same type of charges from critics of the Mormon Church who feel that we are being too soft on the Mormons. Because we have taken a strong stand against sensationalism and inaccurate statements concerning Mormonism, we have found ourselves under attack. Like the Mormons, some of our critics have come to believe that we are demonized and are actually being used by the Mormon Church. In November 1988, we received a letter which contained the following: “I . . . am led to the conclusion that . . . You have never been ‘Set Free’ from the demonic spirit of Mormonism . . . You are, in fact, a plant of the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter-Day Saints.”

On August 6, 1990, Ed Decker published a paper in which he suggested that his letters wrote to “Saints Alive . . . Brigham City, Utah, 84[3]02, and ask . . . for a copy of a report . . . prepared for the Body of Christ in Utah regarding the Tanners. . . . I agree that Jerald and Sandra stepped over the line of error into sin . . . ” In the report recommended by Mr. Decker, we are charged with being in “demonic” bondage and with having “been used by the LDS Church”:

We accuse the Tanners of doing major damage to the outreach to the Mormon people for Jesus Christ . . . The Tanners are being used mightily of Satan in this attack to quench the Holy Spirit of God . . . We could not understand why Jerald would not accept Bill’s [Bill Schnoebelen’s] thorough answers—then we saw why. He raised up, his body shaking, and in a different sounding voice, and with his finger pointed at Bill, he shouted, “Take all that occult material and burn it!” . . . Jerald’s eyes were fixed and piercing. We looked at one another, recognizing what this was—a demonic manifestation. We offered ministry to the Tanners to break this spiritual bondage, but they refused . . .

In the past two years, we have heard comments and rumors from independent sources that the Tanners may have been used by the LDS church. We refused to believe such rumors at first . . . Then we read a thesis, in 1989, by Loftes Tryk . . . Mr. Tryk presented a very good case, and his conclusion on the Tanners was, “The Tanners were surely supplied with the selected documents by the church authorities themselves.” . . . the material the Tanners have written is critical and embarrassing, but not very damaging to the LDS church. The evidence is mounting, and it would seem that the Tanners have indeed been used by the LDS church to provide a controlled criticism of the church. (The Tanner Problem, pages 1-2)

We feel that these charges are as serious as any that have ever been leveled against us. At any rate, immediately after we received the document mentioned above, James Spencer, coauthor of Mormonism’s Temple of Doom, issued an attack on our work. In this response, he cited the following from a letter he had written: “The Tanners have been used by our Enemy to sow division. They are loose cannons, firing indiscriminately at their own army” (The Attack on Mormonism’s Temple of Doom, page 20). On pages 31-32 of the same booklet, James Spencer wrote: “Jerald, in resisting us, may well find himself fighting against God . . . What Jerald has done is not only ungodly, it is clearly libelous.” In a letter dated July 20, 1990, Ed Decker supported James Spencer’s accusations against us and suggested that his publisher had “every right to seek legal redress against the Tanners for trade libel.”

James Spencer seemed to be especially upset with us because of some questions we had raised in our last newsletter concerning a letter by the late Walter Martin (dated January 6, 1989) which gave some support to the booklet Mormonism’s Temple of Doom—a book which we had criticized. Mr. Spencer finally released a photocopy of the entire letter. An examination of the document reveals that our questions were justified. The first sentence of the letter, which we had not seen before, shows that the statement was originally authored by Spencer himself and sent to Walter Martin: “Dear Jim, After reading the statement you sent, I made some amendments to it.” While Walter Martin’s signature at the end of the letter does make him responsible for its contents, Mr. Spencer undoubtedly found it somewhat embarrassing that he had to compose the statement for Martin. It seems reasonable to believe that this is the reason that photocopies of the original letter were not circulated.

This previously undisclosed portion of the letter plus other evidence we now have suggests that James Spencer had been pressuring Martin and Christian Research Institute very hard for a statement supporting Mormonism’s Temple of Doom. Martin was very reluctant to contradict the official CRI statement which he himself had approved for distribution. The CRI statement, of course, strongly supported our position on the book. In a letter dated July 27, 1988, Spencer pleaded with Walter Martin to soften his stand. He even accused Martin of being cowardly in the face of spiritual warfare:

When I saw your letter . . . I was shocked, hurt and saddened. You, dear brother, after having convinced us to fly in the face of “nonrockaboatis” have chosen the easy path at our expense. . . . The resulting “chicken soup” is worse than no statement at all. . . . The old quote . . . applies: “If we don’t hang together, it is certain we shall all hang separately.” I call upon you to be courageous in the defense of the brethren in this matter. (Letter from James Spencer to Walter Martin, dated July 27, 1988)

Four months passed without any helpful response from Walter Martin. Finally on November 3, 1988, James Spencer prepared his own statement and sent it to Martin with a letter in which he stated: “My proposal is that you authorize me to insert the accompanying statement on the book. . . . I would ask that you sign one of the statements and return it to me immediately, please.”

Even after all this, Martin did not deal with the matter “immediately.” He, in fact, waited another two months (Jan. 6, 1989) before sending the statement back to Spencer! In any case, Martin’s statement does not replace the official CRI statement which is unfavorable to the book. This is very important because Ed Decker and William Schnoebelen had agreed to submit themselves to the decision of that organization. The official
At the time of its investigation, CRI appointed Craig Hawkins to research the charges regarding the book because he “was the expert in these matters.” Mr. Hawkins answered questions on the CRI radio program “The Bible Answer Man” both before and after Martin’s death. James Spencer, however, questions Mr. Hawkins’ ability in his response to us. We feel that his attack on Hawkins’ expertise is not based on facts. In the pamphlet recommended by Ed Decker, the attack against Craig Hawkins is carried much further. While the authors do not go so far as to say he is demonized, they claim that his opinion with regard to the origin of the temple ceremony “was apparently clouded by his own involvement in the occult.” Hawkins is also accused of working “behind Dr. Martin’s back” in preparing his report (The Tanner Problem, p. 3). Craig Hawkins, however, claims that he has evidence to prove that Walter Martin fully supported his findings concerning the book. With regard to Hawkins “involvement in the occult,” the charge stems from the fact that at one time he practiced martial arts. It appears that anyone who takes a strong stand against the unfounded claims of these people is liable to be accused of being influenced by the occult or of being in league with the Devil. In any case, Craig Hawkins is preparing a response to the charges made against him. He can be contacted at Apologetics Information Ministry, 3855 E. La Palma Ave, Anaheim, CA 92807.

In his critique of our July 1990 newsletter, James Spencer claims that “Walter Martin never told me ever to change one word in Mormonism’s Temple of Doom” (page 8). While Martin or CRI may not have prepared a specific list of changes to be made, common sense should have shown Spencer and Schnoebelen that major changes would have to be made in the booklet if they were to continue printing it.

On page 8 of his attack on us, James Spencer maintained that he “was of the mind that if anybody, at any time, found an important mistake of fact in Mormonism’s Temple of Doom, I would be glad to change it.” In the interview which we had with Spencer and Schnoebelen and in our publication, The Lucifer-God Doctrine, we pointed out major problems in the book. For example, in Mormonism’s Temple of Doom, pp. 12-13, Mr. Schnoebelen made a serious misrepresentation concerning his trip through Freemasonry. Both Spencer and Schnoebelen acknowledged in the tape-recorded interview that the facts were not correctly stated in the book and discussed how the wording would have to be changed to correct this very serious problem. In view of their own statements, which are preserved on tape, we expected that they would correct this misstatement of the facts which appeared in the first edition. To our surprise, however, when we obtained the new printing, we discovered that there was absolutely no attempt to correct the false claims!

Even more important than the flaw in the book which we mentioned above, James Spencer and William Schnoebelen have refused to alter the erroneous information given concerning the relationship between Mormonism and witchcraft (see The Lucifer-God Doctrine, pp. 41-55). How can we reconcile this with Spencer’s statement that he would be “glad to change” any serious error found in the book?

While we do not have room to discuss these matters at length in this newsletter, we are preparing a booklet dealing with them entitled, Serious Charges Against the Tanners. In order to have a good grasp on what is going on in this controversy a person also needs to read our booklet, The Lucifer-God Doctrine.

WAS ED DECKER POISONED?

In the July 1990 issue of our newsletter, we commented concerning a claim by Ed Decker that he was “poisoned in Scotland” in 1986. Although he was supposed to have been given a dose of arsenic poison which was seven times stronger than that required to kill a person, he claimed that God had healed him. We stated that a man who was with Mr. Decker at the time of the alleged poisoning had “called us from Scotland and expressed his disbelief in Decker’s story.” The man mentioned in the article was Sam Burton, an American pastor who is doing missionary work in Scotland. We noted that, “If the ‘Scotland poisoning’ really did occur, there should be some witnesses available or evidence in hospital or police records which would verify the story. If Mr. Decker has any evidence to that effect, we would be willing to print it in our next newsletter.” Ed Decker has faulted us for not asking him for the information we desired before going to press. He has apparently forgotten that the last time we asked for data, he would not send it and told us not to contact him any more: “Please don’t write us any more. If you have something to say, say it to Dr. Martin and CRI or just issue another special edition of the messenger.” Since we had no reason to feel that Mr. Decker had changed his mind about not providing information to us, we took his advice and published our doubts in the next “edition of the messenger.”

It is now clear that Mr. Decker was never hospitalized in Scotland, never contacted the police and did not even consult a doctor until his return from that country some “4 or 5 days” after the incident. Ed Decker has distributed copies of letters from two American pediatricians who give information concerning the purported arsenic poisoning incident. The most important letter comes from Dr. Keith A. Rodaway. He frankly stated his opinion that, “This was arsenic poisoning, which nearly claimed this man’s life.” While the major portion of the letter merely gives facts concerning the poisoning which Mr. Decker “related” to Dr. Rodaway after his return from Scotland, he does claim that he examined Decker and conducted tests: “I interviewed, examined and tested this man on his return to Seattle, from Scotland and Ireland, in March 1986. . . . Blood and urine test[s] were run demonstrating hematocrit of 32, Wbc. 3,700, urinalysis showed +3 blood, +4 protein. Toxic screen revealed arsenic of 27 µg/dl. (normal 0-20 µg/dl.) He developed pustular skin eruption and paresthesias. After appropriate treatment and many prayers Ed has made a full recovery” (Letter from Dr. Keith A. Rodaway, July 19, 1990).

This letter by Dr. Rodaway does indicate that Ed Decker had some kind of a physical problem when he came into his office and a somewhat elevated level of arsenic in his body. Mr. Decker, however, has completely misunderstood the information regarding the arsenic. He seems to feel that the reading of “27 µg/dl” is a fatal dose. In a letter to Jerald, dated August 31, 1990, he made it clear that a person who drank “27 units” would undoubtedly die or at best “become deathly ill like I did and still live.” A doctor in Salt Lake City who examined Dr. Rodaway’s letter, however, pointed out to us that that level of arsenic is not... sufficient to prove that Decker was poisoned. Two other doctors have also given that opinion.

It is clear from Mr. Decker’s letter that he does not realize that “27 µg/dl” is a relatively small amount of arsenic. The “µg” in Dr. Rodaway’s letter is not referring to a milligram (mg—i.e., one-thousandth of a gram) but rather to a microgram (a millionth part of a gram). It takes 1,000 µg (micrograms) to equal 1 mg (milligram). The lethal dose of arsenic trioxide, an extremely deadly poison, is given as “about 120 mg” in Handbook of Poisoning: Prevention, Diagnosis & Treatment, 1987, page 221. In Courtroom Toxicology, 1981, vol. 3, Arse-9, we read that the “acute ingestion of only 200mg of arsenic trioxide may be fatal to an adult…” When these figures are converted to micrograms by multiplying by 1,000, we have from 120,000 to 200,000 µg.

We have already cited Dr. Keith A. Rodaway’s statement that in Ed Decker’s case “Toxic screen revealed arsenic of 27 µg/dl. (normal 0-20 µg/dl) In Courtroom Toxicology, however, we read that, “Urine arsenic concentrations of unexposed persons may range from 0.01-0.30 mg/L…” (vol. 3, Arse-9) When the higher reading is converted to micrograms (0.30 x 1,000 = 300 µg) and adjusted to deciliters (300 µg ÷ 10 = 30 µg) we find that Mr. Decker’s reading fits within the range of “unexposed persons.” Therefore, according to Courtroom Toxicology, instead of being a fatal dose, 27 µg seems to be 3 µg under the 30 µg limit for “unexposed persons.”

We all have some arsenic in our bodies and the amount can be elevated in a number of ways. Wally Tope pointed out to us that in the book, Courtroom Toxicology, it was stated that just “a seafood meal” could greatly affect arsenic readings in urine samples. We suggested that this should be put to the test. Mr. Tope, therefore, ate a good deal of seafood and submitted to urinalyses. On October 19, 1990, the Nichols Institute Reference Laboratories reported that he had an arsenic concentration of “546” µg/L. When this is adjusted to the amount of arsenic in a deciliter (546 ÷ 10), we find that he had twice as much arsenic in his urine sample as Ed Decker—i.e., 54.6 µg! As we have already shown, Mr. Decker had only 27 µg! Wally Tope suffered no bad effects from what Ed Decker felt was well over the lethal dose.

However this may be, Ed Decker has actually claimed that he was “poisoned twice” in 1986. We have contacted Mr. Decker and asked him to provide documentation concerning this second attempt on his life, but he has refused to do so. The most information we have been able to find concerning this incident appears in a tape-recording of a speech he gave on June 29, 1987. On that occasion Mr. Decker revealed the following: “They can’t kill me… those of you who know me know I got poisoned twice last year—came close to dying both times—shouldn’t of lived.” This account of a second poisoning attempt raises a number of important questions. For example, if Mr. Decker came “close to dying,” why is so little information given concerning it? Where and when did it occur? Are there any witnesses to this poisoning? Was Mr. Decker hospitalized or treated by a physician? It would seem that if there was any evidence regarding this attempted murder, Mr. Decker would have used it in his response to us. It is also interesting to note that both of the doctors who prepared statements for Decker were completely silent about this matter. It seems very difficult to believe that Ed Decker was poisoned twice and “came close to dying” on both occasions, yet was apparently never admitted to a hospital where tests would have verified the poisonings.

Although the details are scanty, Ed Decker has given some information concerning his first poisoning in Scotland. In the Saints Alive In Jesus Newsletter, April-May, 1986, he revealed:

On March 24th, I was in Northern Scotland where I was to do two television specials on Mormonism and Masonry. The television crew was set up to videotape my meetings for rebroadcast. That day, during a luncheon, I was slipped a lethal dose of arsenic in a soft drink. I spent the next six hours in terrible convulsions, yet Jesus protected me from its killing power and gave me the strength and a special anointing to do the meetings.

One question immediately arises: if Ed Decker was “in terrible convulsions” for “six hours,” why was he not rushed to a hospital for treatment? In the book, Poisoning: Toxicology—Symptoms—Treatments, page 190, we find that in cases where a massive dose of arsenic is given, “Convulsions and coma are the terminal signs and death is from circulatory failure.” If Mr. Decker was in convulsions and at the point of death itself, one would think that someone would have had the presence of mind to seek medical help.

Since Ed Decker did not go to a hospital in Scotland to verify the first poisoning and since the urinalysis which was taken “4 or 5” days later does not reveal the large amount of arsenic we would expect for someone who had received a lethal dose, we have to rely on the testimony of witnesses who were in Scotland at the time the incident took place. A great deal hinges on whether he was actually in convulsions and as sick as he claims he was during the period following the poisoning. Fortunately, Wally Tope, of Frontline Ministries, has made a very thorough investigation of the matter and has shared his private notes with us. Mr. Tope had telephone interviews with all of the witnesses who were present at the luncheon with Mr. Decker as well as people he associated with during his trip. A number of these people, who lived in Scotland and Ireland, allowed Mr. Tope to tape-record their statements.

Wally Tope’s work concerning the Scotland poisoning seems to be a very significant contribution to our understanding of the incident. In two telephone conversations with us Pastor Sam Burton, who was present at the time of the purported poisoning, has confirmed the important details concerning his statements which appear in Mr. Tope’s notes (in the material which follows we will refer to these notes as TN).

To begin with, Mr. Tope has found some evidence to indicate that Ed Decker had some physical problem after attending a luncheon on the day he claimed he was poisoned. At that time Mr. Decker was staying with Mr. and Mrs. James Eglinton in Inverness, Scotland. According to Mr. Tope’s notes of a telephone conversation with Mrs. Eglinton (p. 59), she remembered that after Decker returned from the lunch he was sweating and seemed to be in pain. She thought that she remembered him saying that he had eaten a pizza pie which did not agree with him. Mr. Decker’s friend, Eric Clarke, who was present with him at the time, said that they “had lunch at a Pizza Parlour” and that as they were leaving it was clear that Mr. Decker “was in pain and very unwell. We took him back to the home where we were staying and immediately put him to bed” (Statement of Eric Clarke, dated July 20, 1990).

While the evidence shows that Ed Decker did become ill, a serious problem with his story began to surface when Tope tried to verify Decker’s claim that he “spent the next six hours in terrible convulsions.” Mrs. Eglinton could not remember anything about Mr. Decker having convulsions while he was at her house. (TN, p. 59) Like his wife, Mr. Eglinton had no recollection of convulsions. (Ibid., p. 57) The Eglintons seemed to remember that Mr. Decker was only in bed 3 or 4 hours, yet, according to Mr. Decker, the convulsions were supposed to have lasted “six hours.”

There is another element which makes the problem even more serious: Mr. Decker’s doctor, Keith A. Rodaway, mentioned that “Mr. Decker related the sudden onset of severe... vomiting and diarrhea following a meal . . . had severe abdominal cramps, heart burn and started recurrent [sic] vomiting. Soon watery diarrhea ensued” (Letter dated July 19, 1990). Now, it seems obvious that if Ed Decker did indeed have six hours of “convulsions” together with “severe vomiting and diarrhea,” the family with whom he stayed would have been aware of the problem. Mr. or Mrs. Eglinton, however, could recall neither the “terrible convulsions” nor the “severe vomiting and diarrhea” (TN, pp. 57-60).

In a statement Ed Decker published on August 6, 1990, he claimed that Eric Clarke was “the one man who was with me continually before, during and after my poisoning.” Although Eric Clarke is very supportive of Mr. Decker in a statement he prepared for him on July 20, 1990, the statement itself raises serious questions. In this document, Mr. Clarke said he “travelled to all the meetings with Mr. Decker and stayed in the same homes.” We would expect, therefore, that if the poisoning story were true, there would be some mention of the serious nature of Ed Decker’s illness. As we have already shown, Eric Clarke did mention that Decker was “in pain and very unwell.” Significantly, however, Mr. Clarke mentioned neither the “terrible convulsions” nor the “severe vomiting and diarrhea.” Since Clarke was staying at the same home as Decker, the absence of this important information is highly significant.

Moreover, Eric Clarke makes a very revealing observation which seems to indicate that at the time he was with Ed Decker in Scotland he did not believe that Decker was at the very point of death or even in very serious condition. He, in fact, says that it was only when Decker called him from America and informed him of the doctor’s diagnosis that he understood the gravity of the situation:

> Before we left the room I prayed for him to be well enough to take the meeting that had been arranged for that evening. . . . In the light of his doctor’s later diagnosis this may appear to have been a selfish attitude on my part, but we just didn’t realise how ill he might have been . . . I was shocked to learn of the Doctor’s diagnosis when Mr. Decker phoned me a few days after he had returned home.

Amazing as it may seem, immediately following the “convulsions,” Ed Decker arose from his bed and gave two speeches (one on Mormonism and the other on Masonry) which were preserved on video tapes. Fortunately, Wally Tope was able to obtain a video tape of the second message. Mr. Tope has provided us with an audio tape of the same sermon. When we listened to the tape-recording of Mr. Decker’s speech, we found absolutely no evidence to support the claim that he was having the problems which the doctors’ letters would lead us to believe. In fact, the tape revealed that Ed Decker’s voice was very strong and there was nothing to indicate that he was suffering pain or having any problem at all. It was actually a powerful sermon that he delivered the night of the “poisoning.”

Besides making the video tapes on the day he was poisoned, Mr. Decker spoke publicly on at least three more occasions on that trip. Eric Clarke related that there was another meeting in Scotland: “. . . we just didn’t realise how ill he might have been. He had one more meeting to take before I took him to the airport in Edinburgh” (Statement dated July 20, 1990). The plane Mr. Decker boarded in Edinburgh, however, was headed for Ireland, not America. He had two more speaking engagements there (TN, p. 36).

Dr. Charles Sweigard, who never actually treated Ed Decker, claimed in his letter that, “The Scottish brethren sent him to Ireland where a veterinarian friend said his symptoms resembled arsenic poisoning.” There is an element of truth in this story. Ed Decker did, in fact, visit a veterinarian in Ireland, and this man did give him some type of a remedy. In 1988, Wally Tope was able to track down this veterinarian and question him at great length about Decker’s claim regarding arsenic poisoning. The veterinarian was James McCormick. Mr. McCormick has since passed away, but before his death he allowed Wally Tope to tape-record their conversations. Mr. McCormick, who had picked up Mr. Decker at the airport, did not seem to know anything about him having recurrent vomiting and diarrhea. McCormick said that Decker did complain of being unwell in a general sort of way and noted that he was lethargic and was not eating well. He felt that Mr. Decker may have had some kind of a bug (TN, pp. 33, 34, 36). The statement that James McCormick claimed that Ed Decker’s “symptoms resembled arsenic poisoning” is not supported by the tape-recorded conversation Wally Tope had with him. On the contrary, James McCormick clearly stated that he was a veterinarian surgeon and was well acquainted with the effects of arsenic poisoning. He did not have any reason to believe that Mr. Decker had been poisoned and the treatment which he gave him had nothing to do with the effects of arsenic (TN, page 36). Wally Tope played part of this tape for us, and we can verify that James McCormick completely dismissed the idea of arsenic poisoning.

Pastor Sam Burton, who was present at the luncheon where Mr. Decker was supposed to have received the arsenic, emphatically denied that Decker was poisoned. He felt that the whole thing probably grew out of paranoia (TN, p. 85). Leslie Jappy, who was also at the luncheon, also asserted the story was false (TN, p. 93).

Some people who were close to Ed Decker at the time of the “poisoning” have suggested that it is possible that the symptoms he had were really the result of a bad reaction to a prescription drug he was taking known as Indocin. We will have more concerning this matter and also other important information on the poisoning story in the pamphlet we are working on entitled, Serious Charges Against the Tanners.

Wally Tope is preparing a report on the same subject which will contain photocopies of documents and give actual quotations from those who were with Mr. Decker in Scotland and Ireland and allowed him to tape-record their conversations. His paper on the subject will be published under the title, The Strange Case of Ed Decker’s “Arsenic Poisoning,” and will be available from Frontline Ministries, PO Box 1100, La Canada, CA 91012. The price will be $2.75 plus $1.00 for shipping.

Wally Tope has already brought other important information to light. For example, in our last newsletter we reported that Ed Decker claimed that Mormon Apostle M. Russell Ballard gave a speech in which he admitted that ex-Mormons and “specifically” the film, The God Makers, had caused the church to have “a 3 million member shortfall.” Although we were suspicious of this claim when we first heard it in May 1990, we found that Wally Tope had been working on this question since March when he began examining Mr. Decker’s January 1990 newsletter. Mr. Tope provided us with a photocopy of that issue. Tope, in fact, had already initiated research which led to the discovery that there was a tape available of Ballard’s speech. In addition, he had obtained a photocopy of the Nov. 14, 1989, issue of the Provo Herald which he sent to us. All of the evidence combined to disprove the Ballard story, and Ed Decker and William Schnoebel finally admitted it was erroneous (see Saints Alive In Jesus Newsletter July 1990)
“Our family greatly appreciates the work you are doing to lead people into the truth . . . a friend of ours . . . shared a copy of his Mormonism: Shadow or Reality? with us. It was a huge help in helping us make the decision to leave Mormonism for our return to true Christianity and a wonderful new church . . . Thank you very much! (Letter from North Carolina)

“I can’t tell you how much I am indebted to you both for showing me the error of my beliefs in Mormonism! I was a fully active member for 19 years, having served a proselyting mission in New Zealand, a Temple Marriage and until my leaving the church served in several leadership roles in both Ward and Stake. . . . I began to doubt the church’s authenticity when speaking to a fellow worker who was a strong Christian . . . I approached my sister who had left the church about 9-10 years earlier after having studied church history with her husband. They were a great help and provided me with a copy of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality to read. This book is dynamite! . . . My sister and her husband had been praying fervently for years for myself and my parents (who have served 2 temple missions) to see the light and finally we have . . . I can assure you that the work you are doing is well and truly worthwhile as myself and my parents are living proof.” (Letter from Australia)

“. . . I left the Mormon Church about a year ago (hence my decision to write a book) having been a convert for about three years. I am an Ambulance man now . . . and have faith in Jesus Christ . . . My ‘other half’. . . was a Mormon, in fact I helped her towards her conversion when I was actively involved in missionary work in my local ward, she too is no longer a member . . . I did not study to criticise or prove the church false but to learn of the ‘true church.’ . . . I soon learnt of the infamous Jerald and Sandra Tanner. . . . I . . . had made plans already to serve as a missionary. I decided to go . . . I returned seven months later, and soon afterwards left. On my mission . . . I had written to Utah Lighthouse Ministry and received information that confirmed my doubts . . . When I write about my so-called opposition, it was really from the day of my Endowment . . . In actual fact I was horrified by the temple, I have never felt so far away from God in all my life. I was in a daze for many days. I expressed my feelings with other members. Some were honest enough to admit they felt the same, others implied I must of been unworthy or I should go many times to appreciate it. This I did, twenty or so I believe and I still had the same feeling that it was not of God.” (Letter from England)

“We both wish to thank you for your research and excellent work in exposing the Mormon Church. There are alot of people in Australia (Ex Mormons) who are very grateful to you both for your tremendous research work in exposing the World of Mormonism. Since we have left the Mormon Church we have found out that 15 (Fifteen) people have left the church, and all have come from the same stake that we belonged to. From what we can establish, the information, in [sic] which prompted these people to leave the church, was from your books, Mormonism Shadow or Reality and the Changing World of Mormonism, both excellent books. We want to let you know that we are grateful to you both for bringing us the truth, it has made us free and alot happier.” (Letter from Australia)

“I really appreciate the work that you are doing. I am a former Mormon that your works helped bring out of the darkness and into the glorious light of the real gospel of Jesus.” (Letter from Ohio)

CHRISTIAN INSTITUTE FOR MORMON STUDIES

June 13–15, 1991 — Salt Lake City Hilton

This exciting three-day conference brings Christians together from all over the country who share a vision for more effectively sharing the Good News of Jesus Christ with Mormon people.

Major speakers include:

*Ruth Tucker, PhD (Trinity Evangelical Divinity School)
*Paul Carden (Christian Research Institute)
*Sandra Tanner (Utah Lighthouse Ministry)
*David Crump, PhD (Salt Lake Pastor)

Challenging seminars will sharpen your understanding of ministry to and among LDS people. Seminars are aimed at Christians who want to grow in their understanding of:

*Issues in research on Mormonism
*Evangelism to Mormon people
*How to effectively minister to Christians in a Mormon dominated area

This conference is sponsored by the Utah Institute for Biblical Studies.

For a free brochure and registration fee information, either write or call Utah Lighthouse Ministry (801-485-8894) or call the Utah Institute for Biblical Studies (801-581-1900).

About thirty years ago, while browsing through a collection of rare books, we encountered a dusty old book with this sensational title, Brigham's Destroying Angel: Being the Life, Confession, and Startling Disclosures of the Notorious Bill Hickman, The Danite Chief of Utah. In this book, Bill Hickman alleged that he had committed murders by the orders of Brigham Young, the 2nd prophet of the Mormon Church, and Apostle Orson Hyde. The appearance of the book was not impressive. It was a rather cheap looking paperback book which was edited by J. H. Beadle. Since we did not know whether we could trust either Hickman or Beadle, we dismissed the book as possibly a work of fiction and felt that it was not anything we could rely on.

We had, of course, heard of the Mormon doctrine of “blood atonement”—i.e., the teaching that certain sins can only be atoned for by the shedding of the sinner’s own blood. This doctrine was explained by Brigham Young in a discourse given September 21, 1856:

> There are sins that men commit for which they cannot receive forgiveness in this world, or in that which is to come, and if they had their eyes open to see their true condition, they would be perfectly willing to have their blood spilt upon the ground, that the smoke thereof might ascend to heaven as an offering for their sins; and the smoking incense would one day atone for their sins, whereas, if such is not the case, they will stick to them and remain upon them in the spirit world.

I know, when you hear my brethren telling about cutting people off from the earth, that you consider it is strong doctrine, but it is not to destroy them. . . . I know there are transgressors, who if they knew themselves, and the only condition upon which they can obtain forgiveness, would beg of their brethren to shed their blood, that the smoke thereof might ascend to God as an offering to appease the wrath that is kindled against them, and that the law might have its course. I will say further; I have had men come to me and offer their lives to atone for their sins.

It is true that the blood of the Son of God was shed for sins through the fall and those committed by men, yet men can commit sins which it can never remit. As it was in ancient days, so it is in our day. . . . There are sins that can be atoned for by an offering upon an altar, as in ancient days, and there are sins that the blood of a lamb, or a calf, or of turtle doves, cannot remit, but they must be atoned for by the blood of the man. That is the reason why men talk to you as they do from this stand; they understand the doctrine and throw out a few words about it. You have been taught that doctrine, but you do not understand it. (Sermon by Brigham Young, Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pp. 53-54; also published in the Mormon newspaper Deseret News, October 1, 1856, p. 235)
On another occasion President Brigham Young explained:

Now take a person in this congregation who has knowledge with regard to being saved . . . and suppose that he is overtaken in a gross fault, that he has committed a sin that he knows will deprive him of that exaltation which he desires, and that he cannot attain to it without the shedding of blood, and also knows that by having his blood shed he will atone for that sin, and be saved and exalted with the Gods, is there a man or woman in this house but what would say “shed my blood that I may be saved and exalted with the Gods?”

All mankind love themselves, and let these principles be known by an individual, and he would be glad to have his blood shed. That would be loving themselves, even unto an eternal exaltation. Will you love your brothers and sisters likewise, when they have committed a sin that cannot be atoned for without the shedding of their blood? Will you love that man or woman well enough to shed their blood? . . .

I could refer you to plenty of instances where men have been righteously slain, in order to atone for their sins. I have seen scores and hundreds of people for whom there would have been a chance (in the last resurrection there will be) if their lives had been taken and their blood spilled on the ground as a smoking incense to the Almighty, but who are now angels to the devil . . . I have known a great many men who left this Church for whom there is no chance whatever for exaltation, but if their blood had been spilled, it would have been better for them, the wickedness and ignorance of the nations forbids this principle’s being in full force, but the time will come when the law of God will be in full force.

This is loving our neighbor as ourselves; if he needs help, help him; and if he wants salvation and it is necessary to spill his blood on the earth in order that he may be saved, spill it. Any of you who understand the principles of eternity, if you have sinned a sin requiring the shedding of blood, except the sin unto death, would not be satisfied nor rest until your blood should be spilled, that you might gain that salvation you desire. That is the way to love mankind. (Deseret News, February 18, 1857; also reprinted in Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pp. 219-20)

At the time we first saw Hickman’s confessions we had also read some material concerning the “Danites”—a secret organization which existed during Joseph Smith’s lifetime which was committed to vengeance against the church’s enemies. This band not only targeted the gentiles, but even dealt with dissenters from the church. David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, revealed the following concerning the Danites:

In the spring of 1838, the heads of the church and many of the members had gone deep into error and blindness. . . . In June, 1838, at Far West, Mo., a secret organization was formed, Doctor Avard being put in as the leader of the band; a certain oath was to be administered to all the brethren to bind them to support the heads of the church in everything they should teach. All who refused to take this oath were considered dissenters from the church, and certain things were to be done concerning these dissenters, by Dr. Avards secret band . . . my persecutions, for trying to show them their errors, became of such a nature that I had to leave the Latter Day Saints; . . . (An Address To All Believers In Christ, by David Whitmer, Richmond, Mo., 1887, pp. 27-28)

Mormon apologists were somewhat divided concerning the Danite band. Some denied that it even existed. Others admitted the existence of the secret organization but denied that Joseph Smith was connected with it. Mormon writer William E. Berrett took this position. Although he wanted his readers to believe that Joseph Smith was in the dark concerning what was going on, Mr. Berrett freely admitted that “Such a band as the ‘Danites’ did exist, as historians affirm; . . . The organization had been for the purpose of plundering and murdering the enemies of the Saints” (The Restored Church, 1956, pp. 197-198).

Joseph Smith himself made some very contradictory statements about this organization. On one occasion he said that it existed but claimed that he did not have any knowledge of it at the time (see History of the Church, vol. 3, pp. 178-182). On another occasion, however, Joseph Smith passed the whole thing off by saying, “The Danite system alluded to by Norton never had any existence” (Ibid., vol. 6, p. 165). Fortunately for the cause of truth, some new and important evidence came to light when H. Michael Marquardt was working on a transcript of Joseph Smith’s early diaries—a work which we later published. In 1838, Joseph Smith had his scribe George W. Robinson keep a diary which was called “The Scriptory Book of Joseph Smith Jr President of The Church of Jesus Christ, of Latterday Saints in all the world.” This diary contains a very important entry under the date of July 27, 1838, which has been crossed out. Mr. Marquardt worked very carefully with this portion of the record and was finally able to decipher most of the words. He discovered that the entry related to the Danite band. It not only confirmed the existence of the band but said it was organized for the purpose of making things right and cleansing the Church.

The Mormon scholar Scott H. Faulring, who later transcribed Joseph Smith’s diaries, verified that the reference related to the Danites (see An American Prophet’s Record: The Diaries and Journals of Joseph Smith, p. 198). Unfortunately, neither Marquardt nor Faulring were allowed access to the original diaries and therefore had to depend on photocopies and microfilms. Recently, however, two prominent Mormon scholars, Dean C. Jesse and David J. Whittaker published a transcription of this highly significant entry. They also confirmed that the entry relates to the Danites. Moreover, since they had access to the original diary, they were able to decipher a number of words that neither Marquardt nor Faulring could make out. Their transcription of these words, in fact, seems to suggest that the Danites were going to use physical force to set things “right”:

. . . the brethren or Saints . . . have come up hither Thus far, according to the order <Rev?> of the Danites, we have a company of Danites in these times, to put right physically that which is not right, and to cleanse the Church of very great evils, which hath hitherto existed among us inasmuch as they cannot be put to right by teachings & persuasions. This company or a part of them exhibited on the fourth day of July [illegible word] They came up to consecrate by companies of tens, commanded by their captain over ten. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1988, page 14)

While Jesse and Whittaker do not seem to catch the serious implications of their transcription, they acknowledge that there was an attempt to suppress the material in this quotation: “Some of the material in this citation has been crossed out in pencil in the original by a latter hand” (Ibid., p. 37, n. 24).
Joseph Smith’s “Scriptory Book” agrees with other evidence about the Danites. For instance, Reed Peck records: “I heard Avard, on one occasion, say that the Danites were to consecrate their surplus property, and to come in by tens to do so . . .” Joseph Smith’s “Scriptory Book” confirms this when it says that the Danites “come up to consecrate, by companies of tens . . .” While it is extremely interesting that Joseph Smith’s own “Scriptory Book” would contain an entry concerning the Danites, the whole matter is made even more intriguing by the fact that there has been an attempt to obliterate the entry. Joseph Smith’s History of the Church relies on the “Scriptory Book” for the entries of July 26 and 28, but the entry for July 27—i.e., the portion concerning the Danites—has been omitted.

In the Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, pages 500-501, the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts commented about testimony given after the war in Missouri:

"It is in this testimony and principally in the statement of Dr. Avard, that the existence of the “Danites” in the “Mormon” Church is affirmed. Avard declared that about four months before the date of his testimony . . . “a band called the ‘Daughter of Zion’ (afterwards called the ‘Danite Band’) was formed of the members of the Mormon church, the original object of which was to drive from the county of Caldwell all those who dissented from the Mormon church; in which they succeeded admirably and to the satisfaction of all concerned.”"

We were not aware of the devastating evidence concerning the Danites found in Joseph Smith’s “Scriptory Book” at the time we first saw Bill Hickman’s confessions. While we were convinced that there was such a group and that “blood atonement” was actually practiced in early Utah, we were still reluctant to put a great deal of weight in Hickman’s tales. Mormon authors, of course, dismissed Brigham’s Destroying Angel as an example of the type of trash published by early anti-Mormons. Mormon apologist Hugh Nibley suggested that Hickman’s confessions really came from the fertile imagination of the editor, J. H. Beadle:

"Nobody had been able to pin anything on the Mormons until 14 years later, when Bill Hickman came to the rescue with his thrice-welcome “confessions”; . . . a long and lurid catalogue of blood in which every major crime committed in Utah is mechanically and unimaginatively pinned on Brigham Young . . . Hickman, as we shall see, never dreamed of such a thing until Beadle put him up to it . . . Beadle was a professional purveyor of scandal . . . we believe that those tales are Beadle’s invention . . . The patent absurdity of the “Confessions” becomes apparent on the most superficial investigation and grows with every monotonous episode . . . The Hickman stones were not true. (Sounding Brass, 1963, pp. 254, 256, 263-65)"

It was only after we had made a careful study of Mormon history that we became convinced that Hickman’s confessions could not be easily dismissed. We found, for instance, that John D. Lee, who had been a member of the church’s secret Council of Fifty, charged that the Mormon police committed murders for the church and that “Under Brigham Young, Hosea Stout was Chief of Police.” Hosea Stout was a member of the Danite Band and later served as a body guard for Joseph Smith. Besides serving as Chief of Police in Nauvoo, he was an officer in the Nauvoo legion. Fortunately, Hosea Stout’s diary has survived and proves to be one of the most revealing documents that we have had access to. The fact that it was written by a faithful Mormon makes it even more significant. In his diary, Stout frankly tells of some of the violent methods used by the Mormon leaders. For instance, under the date of April 3, 1845, Hosea Stout recorded the following in his diary:

"In the morning I went to the Temple and was roughly accosted by Brs Cahoon & Cutler about a circumstance which took place last night at the Temple. They said that the old Police had beat a man almost to death in the Temple. To which I replied I was glad of it and that I had given orders to that effect in case anyone should be found in the Temple after night and they had only done as they were told, or ordered . . . we concluded to lay the matter before President Brigham Young and get his advice . . . Brother Brigham came to us and we related the matter to him and he approved of the proceedings of the Police and said he wanted us to still guard the Temple to regulate the matters there which was done to our satisfaction and justification. (On The Mormon Frontier, The Dairy of Hosea Stout, vol. 1, p. 32)"

Under the date of January 9, 1846, Hosea Stout recorded: “When we came to the Temple some what a considerable number of the guard were assembled and among them was William Hibbard . . . He was evidently come as a spy. When I saw him I told Scott that we must “bounce a stone off of his head.” to which he agreed we prepared accordingly & I got an opportunity & hit him on the back of his head which came very near taking his life. But few knew anything about what was the matter he left the ground out of his senses when he came to himself he could not tell what had happened to him &c” (Ibid., vol. 1, p. 103). Other entries in Hosea Stout’s diary show that he was a very brutal man (see The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 2, p. 7).

President Brigham Young seemed to delight in the fact that he had some ruthless men who could help him out when violence seemed necessary. In fact, he once boasted: “And if the Gentiles wish to see a few tricks, we have ‘Mormons’ that can perform them. We have the meanest devils on the earth in our midst, and we intend to keep them, for we have use for them; and if the Devil does not look sharp, we will cheat him out of them at the last, for they will reform and go to heaven with us” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 176). Brigham Young was undoubtedly referring to men like Orrin Porter Rockwell and Bill Hickman when he made this statement.

As we have already stated, Hickman confessed that he had committed murders which had been ordered by President Brigham Young and Apostle Orson Hyde. In Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 444-447, we give evidence that Bill Hickman robbed and murdered the enemies of the church and that he had the approval and protection of Mormon leaders in carrying out his crimes. That the Mormon leaders approved of Hickman’s crimes is clear from the journal of John Bennion. In 1860 Bennion felt that William Hickman and his brother, George Hickman, should be punished for their evil deeds, but he soon learned that Bishop Gardiner “had been bound & could not act” and that Orson Hyde—President of the Twelve Apostles—taught that a man should not be punished for stealing from the “gentiles.” The following is taken from Bennion’s journal:

"Sat 13 went to the city met Bp Gardiner had a talk with him about W. A. Hickmans wicked course for some time past he said that up till now he had been bound & could not act I told him I was not bound neither was I afraid to expose the wickedness of any man that it was my duty to expose we got home about sun down in the evening I met with Bp & councilors & parties concerned [to] try George Hickman for stealing mules when about to commence trial Elder Hyde come in and by Bp Gardners solicitation he preached and the trial was postponed after meeting Bp council & Elder Hyde had a long talk in my house br Hyde said speaking of stealing that a man may steal & be influenced by the Spirit of the Lord to do it that Hickman had done it years past and that he never would institute a trial against a brother for stealing from the gentiles but stealing from his brethren he was down on it he laid down much teaching on the subject.

S 14th went to meeting at the mill to hear br Hyde . . . he give much good instruction spoke on last nights intention to try Hickman give it as the word of the Lord to set him free for the past, bid him go & sin no more. ("John Bennion Journal," October 13 and 14, 1860, original journal at Utah State Historical Society)

Since this evidence comes from John Bennion’s journal—not from an anti-Mormon or unfriendly source—it cannot be easily dismissed.

In his confessions, Bill Hickman tells that he received orders from Brigham Young through Apostle Hyde to eliminate Jesse Hartley, a man whom the church leaders did not trust:

...I set out with Judge Appleby and Rev. Orson Hyde ... When we had got ... into East Cañon, some three or four miles, one Mr. Hartley came to us from Provo City. This Hartley ... had married a Miss Bullock, of Provo ... at the April Conference, Brigham Young, before the congregation, gave him a tremendous blowing up, calling him all sorts of bad names, and saying he ought to have his throat cut ...

I saw [Apostle] Orson Hyde looking very sour at him, and after he had been in camp an hour or two, Hyde told me that he had orders from Brigham Young, if he came to Fort Supply to have him used up. “Now,” said he, “I want you and George Boyd to do it.” ... Boyd came to me and said: “It’s all right, Bill; I will help you to kill that fellow.” One of our teams was two or three miles behind, and Orson Hyde wished me to go back ... Hartley stepped up and said he would go ... Orson Hyde then whispered to me: “Now is your time; don’t let him come back.” We started, and about half a mile on had to cross the cañon stream ... While crossing, Hartley got a shot and fell dead in the creek. . . . I went on and met Hosea Stout ... I then told him all that had happened, and he said that was good. (Brigham’s Destroying Angel, 1904 reprint, pp. 96-98)

Hickman’s claim that Hosea Stout said “that was good” when he heard of the murder of Hartley reminds us of Stout’s own entry in his diary when he learned that the “police had beat a man almost to death in the Temple.” The reader will remember that Stout arrogantly recorded that he told those who had complained about the matter that he was “glad of it and that I had given orders to that effect . . . ”

In 1872, Bill Hickman made a confession of his crimes to R. N. Baskin. Mr. Baskin, who later served as mayor of Salt Lake City and became a member of the supreme court of the State of Utah, gave this report in his book, Reminiscences of Early Utah, page 150:

The Danites were an organization in the Mormon church. Its existence was stated by Bill Hickman in his confession made to me. He gave me the names of more than a score of its active members, among whom were a number of reputed notorious Danite assassins. He stated that the members were bound by their covenants to execute the orders of the priesthood, and that when a direct order or intimation was given to “use up” anyone, it was always executed by one or more of the members, according to the circumstances of the case. That such an organization existed is conclusively shown by the numerous mysterious murders which were never investigated by the executive officers of the Territory, or any attempt made to prosecute the guilty parties. The Mormon sermons, the confessions of Hickman and Lee, and numerous other circumstances made plain its existence. Hickman confessed to me that he personally knew of thirteen persons having been murdered, some of them by him, and others by various Danites; that at one time he murdered a man by the name of Buck at the personal request of Brigham Young.

In 1979, there was an attempt by former Church Historian Leonard J. Arrington and Hope A. Hilton, a great-granddaughter of Bill Hickman, to undermine Bill Hickman’s confession which was published in Brigham’s Destroying Angel. Their thesis concerning the book was similar to that set forth by Dr. Hugh Nibley. They felt that Hickman had written a manuscript, but that “a skilled anti-Mormon journalists,” J. H. Beadle, had altered it to link Brigham Young and the Mormon hierarchy to the crimes:

Unquestionably, Bill wrote an autobiography that served as the basis for the book. Although it is no longer extant, family members report having seen the manuscript, and Brigham’s Destroying Angel could not have been prepared without such a personal history. On the other hand, enough manuscript material in Bill’s handwriting survives for us to assert with confidence that the published draft of Brigham’s Destroying Angel was not written by Hickman. The style is different, and the editorializing and sensationalizing are alien to Bill’s spirit. . . . unquestionably the autobiography was subjected to tampering, if not ghost-writing, and was almost certainly given a market orientation by Beadle. We are confident that the editorializing and ‘setting the record straight,’ Task Papers in LDS History, No. 28, Historical Department of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 1979, Foreword, pp. i-ii)

On pages 33-34 of the same paper, we find the following:

Beadle, who was in the process of writing an anti-Mormon book . . . did edit the manuscript to make it count for the maximum in the anti-Mormon cause, and did introduce phrases that linked Brigham Young and the “Mormon Hierarchy” to criminal activities.

The claim by Arrington and Hilton that Bill Hickman denied the accuracy of the published book is based primarily on the statement of William H. Kimball. There are at least two reasons why this statement seems very questionable: First, it was not “relayed to Orson F. Whitney by Kimball on November 15, 1892): “My book is a lie from the beginning to the end—from the boar through. . . . I was bribed to write that book. I was told that I could make fifty thousand dollars out of it, and that is why I did it.” (Leonard J. Arrington and Hope A. Hilton, “William A. (‘Bill’) Hickman: Setting the Record Straight,” Task Papers in LDS History, No. 28, Historical Department of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 1979, Foreword, pp. i-ii)

On pages 33-34 of the same paper, we find the following:

Beadle, who was in the process of writing an anti-Mormon book . . . did edit the manuscript to make it count for the maximum in the anti-Mormon cause, and did introduce phrases that linked Brigham Young and the “Mormon Hierarchy” to criminal activities.
was certainly based only on wishful thinking. They did not produce any manuscript evidence to support such a conclusion. Moreover, their own paper contains information which makes their position untenable. On page 53 of their study, they cite the following from a letter written by Brigham Young on September 27, 1871: “They have, I am informed, brought before their exclusive, packed grand jury one Wm. Hickman . . . and, he evidently to save himself from justice, has laid at my door some or all of those crimes . . .”

Now, if Bill Hickman would testify before a grand jury that Brigham Young was guilty of the crimes—and it is very clear that he did give such testimony—why would he hesitate to put the same claim in his manuscript? The evidence clearly shows that Hickman planned to openly testify against the Mormon leaders when they were brought to trial. It also seems naive to assume that the anti-Mormons would be willing to give Hickman a bribe of $50,000 to link the Mormon leaders to his crimes, but accept a manuscript from him which, according to the Arrington-Hilton thesis, provided absolutely no evidence to that effect until it was altered by Beadle.

Fortunately, after writing the paper with Church Historian Leonard Arrington, Hope A. Hilton seems to have done further research on the matter and in a new book on Bill Hickman she has repudiated the idea that J. H. Beadle added the material linking Brigham Young to the crimes. Mrs. Hilton now states:

I do not question whether Hickman actually wrote Brigham’s Destroying Angel. It is too accurate in its details to have been written by anyone else . . .

I have relied on Hickman’s Brigham’s Destroying Angel: . . . for facts of Hickman’s life that can be corroborated from other sources. . . . Beadle did not have access to Brigham Young’s daily office journal or to other sources available today which confirm many of the book’s first-hand statements. . . . one of the most compelling questions about Hickman is why he implicated Brigham Young, Hosea Stout, William Kimball, and others both in his book and in court. (Wild Bill Hickman and the Mormon Frontier, 1988, Preface, pp. x-xi)

On page 127 of her book, Hope Hilton wrote: “To his daughter, Katharine Hickman Butcher, Hickman told the truth when he wrote on 7 January 1872 from the Fort Douglas prison: ‘I have written a rough book, but no more rough than true.’” In the preface to her book, p. xi, Mrs. Hilton stated: “. . . avowedly anti-Mormon editor, J. H. Beadle, wrote the preface to the autobiography and the first chapter. He also wrote the bitter diatribe against Young and the Mormons on pages 137-139, probably the first paragraph on page 192, and several other brief inserts, sometimes adding only a single word. Except for these additions, Hickman’s mind and hand are the book’s undisputed source.”

Although there is no reason to believe that Mrs. Hilton is trying to deceive her readers, those who do not have a copy of Brigham’s Destroying Angel to refer to may be inclined to believe that Beadle played a larger role in editing the text than he actually did. At the end of the preface the name “J. H. Beadle” appears. The first chapter, likewise, contains a statement that makes it clear that Beadle is the author: “CHAPTER 1. INTRODUCTORY HISTORY. BY THE EDITOR.” Pages 137-139 are also separated from Hickman’s writings with the words: “BY THE EDITOR.” It would appear, then, that Mrs. Hilton now believes that only “the first paragraph on page 192, and several other brief inserts,” were added to the text. It is also clear that she is not even certain that Beadle added the paragraph on page 192 because she begins her statement with the word “probably.” Furthermore, she says that “only a single word” is added in some of the “other” places.

It is interesting to note that J. H. Beadle made these comments concerning his role in editing the manuscript:

I then agreed to take charge of his [Hickman’s] manuscript, and, to use his own language, “Fix it up in shape, so people would understand it.” My first intention was to re-write it entirely, speaking of Hickman in the third person; but one perusal satisfied me that it would be far better as he had written it. I have thought it best, also, to preserve his own phraseology nearly exactly, only inserting a word occasionally where absolutely necessary to prevent mistake. . . . I think every critic must admit that our sentimental and religious murderer has a singularly pleasing style.

A perusal of some of the letters of Bill Hickman, which Hope Hilton has included in her book, shows that Hickman was qualified to write such a book.

HICKMAN’S WORK FOUND?

The significant change in Mrs. Hilton’s position concerning Beadle’s role in editing Hickman’s book and her comments concerning the matter raise some interesting questions: Why did she make such a major change in her thesis? Is it possible that she has located the original manuscript of Brigham’s Destroying Angel? (A Mormon researcher once told us that he was on the track of this manuscript and had traced it to a vault. He did not, however, reveal where this vault was located.) Mrs. Hilton’s statements concerning the matter are rather strange. She gives no reason as to why she has singled out the paragraph on page 192 as “probably” an interpolation by Beadle. (This paragraph seems to contain no significant information.) If she had compared the original manuscript, however, and noted that the paragraph did not appear there, she would be suspicious that it was added by Beadle. She, of course, would not know for certain that Beadle was the author. Anyone who had access to the manuscript could have added the words. Furthermore, those who prepare manuscripts for publication know that sometimes writers send additional material or corrections in letters to their publishers. This uncertainty might force a scholar like Hope Hilton to qualify her comment to say that the paragraph was “probably” added by Beadle.

While this is only a matter of speculation, there is a very strange reference to an important Hickman document in the earlier Arrington-Hilton paper, page 39: “As for manuscript materials, the LDS Church Archives in Salt Lake City has a short holograph autobiography, which we have used without attribution; . . .” While one would think that this would be an extremely significant document for a historian writing about Hickman, in her published book Mrs. Hilton never even refers to this document. It is obvious that something is wrong here. Why do Arrington and Hilton say they are using it “without attribution” in their original paper? Is this document something the church is trying to suppress?

Although Arrington and Hilton claimed that they used the handwritten Hickman autobiography “without attribution,” there is one actual quotation from it on the first page of their paper: “. . . his grandfather told Bill that he had twenty-one blood relations in the War of the Revolution—and not one Tory among them!” The footnote for this citation reads as follows: “From the William A. Hickman Autobiography, holograph manuscript, Hickman Collection, Church Archives, p. 1.” It is very interesting to note that the words cited are similar to the opening page of Hickman’s narrative published in Brigham’s Destroying Angel, page 25: “I had, according to my grandfather’s story, twenty-one blood relatives in the Revolutionary War, ‘and not a Tory among them . . .’”
We wonder if it is possible that Arrington and Hilton had access to just a portion of the original manuscript of Brigham’s Destroying Angel at the time they wrote their paper and did not recognize it as such. It could also be possible that someone later compared the original manuscript with the published book but was forbidden to release any information concerning the manuscript’s existence. Unless the church releases the handwritten “Hickman Autobiography” we may never know the truth about this matter.

In any case, in 1979, Arrington and Hilton felt they could “assert with confidence that the published draft of Brigham’s Destroying Angel was not written by Hickman.” Today, however, Hope Hilton feels that “Hickman’s mind and hand are the book’s undisputed source.” Although we would like to know just what evidence brought her to this conclusion, we are very happy that Mrs. Hilton has been honest enough to repudiate the old theory. We feel that her book is a valuable contribution to the study of Bill Hickman. It includes some very important material from the LDS Church Archives which we did not have access to before. Although the research we had done prior to the publication of Hope Hilton’s book had already led us to conclude that Bill Hickman was receiving his orders from Brigham Young and other Mormon leaders, “Wild Bill” Hickman and the Mormon Frontier furnishes a great deal of new information showing that Hickman was deeply involved with church leaders.

On pages 9, 10, 12 and 13 of her book, Mrs. Hilton revealed:

On 6 May [1839], Hickman met Joseph Smith, Jr., who ordered Bill ordained to the Council of Seventy the same day. . . . Hickman seemed a natural choice to be one of the bodyguards of the prophet Joseph. A similar call was extended to Hosea Stout, Orrin Porter Rockwell, and Lot Smith . . . . Dressed in white, surrounding their beloved prophet, these four men would have made an impressive sight. . . . [Brigham] Young assigned Hickman to oversee covert spying activities, to “subdue” the enemies of the church, and to serve as his chief bodyguard. Hickman and others in a tightly knit group served Smith in Nauvoo and Young in Winter Quarters . . . . From 1850 to 1853, they shared the duties of government with Young’s secret political organization, the Council of Fifty. . . . Hickman was not a Mormon during the Danite heyday in Missouri, and there is no reliable evidence that the Danites, as such, survived after 1838 as an organization. However, that some vigilante Mormons, notably Hickman, continued to espouse the Danite philosophy they had been taught by church leaders of “attacking the Gentiles to preserve the Saints” seems apparent.

Some Mormon apologists have tried to make an issue over the fact that Bill Hickman was called a “Danite” on the title page of Brigham’s Destroying Angel. Mrs. Hilton, however, put the matter in perspective when she said that he “continued to espouse the Danite philosophy.” While it is true that the original organization ceased to exist in the late 1830’s, it is also clear that the church had men in early Utah who performed exactly the same function. Mormon writer Klaus J. Hansen says that “several important Danites were among those initiated into the Council of Fifty in 1844” (Quest for Empire, p. 58). He also admits that the Council of Fifty may have been involved in the practice of “blood atonement”:

If, according to this doctrine, a member of the kingdom committed the crimes of murder and adultery, or if he betrayed one of his fellow Mormons to the enemies of the church, or revealed the secrets of the kingdom, he could save his soul only if he expiated for the crime by the shedding of his blood. Blood atonement was, of course, a form of capital punishment, yet because of its theological implications, and because the Council of Fifty was to administer it, the doctrine was surrounded with an aura of mystery, terror, and holy murder. The Council of Fifty heightened the atmosphere of fear and secrecy associated with this practice by conducting cases involving the possibility of blood atonement in utmost secrecy for fear of public repercussions. (Ibid., p. 69)

It seems rather ridiculous to quibble over the word “Danite” when the evidence shows that Bill Hickman functioned in the same way that the Danite band did in Missouri. As a matter of fact, on July 5, 1857, Brigham Young himself used the word “Danite” when referring to “the boys” who took care of unruly people who came to Utah: “If men come here and do not behave themselves, they will not only find the Danites, whom they talk so much about, biting the horses’s heels, but the scoundrels will find something biting their heels. In my plain remarks, I merely call things by their right names” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, p. 6). Because of the circumstances surrounding Hickman’s work for the Mormon leaders and in view of Brigham Young’s own statement, we see no reason why a person should be disturbed if he is called a “Danite.” Those who are concerned with this term, however, might refer to Hickman as a Mormon “spy” or one of the first members of “Church Security.”

In the Forward to the 1979 paper by Arrington and Hilton (p. iii), Leonard Arrington indicated that Philip Jordan had “apparently confused Hickman’s Church security assignments with the work of the earlier Danites. These two groups were as much unlike as the Mafia and the FBI . . . . the actions once attributed to the Danites were probably those of individuals or of Mormon security forces—deputy sheriffs, territorial militia, and/or minutemen.” This statement seems rather naive in light of the evidence which was available in 1979. In any case, on page 2 of the same manuscript, we read that Hickman “was chosen as one of a group of twelve men who served as bodyguards and ‘protectors’ of Joseph Smith. He was apparently a ‘regular’ with the Mormon security forces during the period (1843-1844) . . . .” Later in Utah, “Bill Hickman was assigned to lead one of the parties of scouts delegated to ‘spy’ on the [U.S.] Army . . . . Hickman’s intelligence reports to Governor Young show him to have been effective in the tasks assigned to him. Some of his spies disguised themselves as California emigrants and went in among the troops. . . . Bill’s personal assignment, under an official appointment from Brigham Young as Governor, was to ‘keep watch on the Army.’ And apparently Bill did this, and perhaps magnified his calling by keeping watch on its horses as well. At least later stories began to drift in of a group of men, allegedly connected with Hickman, who rustled some of the Army’s livestock” (Ibid., pp. 14, 17, 18).

On page 27 of the same manuscript, we learn that in 1863, Hickman “reported [Colonel Patrick] Connor’s movements and intentions to Brigham Young . . . once more carrying out an important intelligence assignment for the pioneer leader.”

In her published book, Hope Hilton says that “Hickman’s primary assignment was to spy on the church’s enemies in Nauvoo (such as Colonel Williams), although he was also occasionally given orders to execute punishments. Bill Hickman rarely shirked an assignment from Young . . . .” (“Wild Bill” Hickman and the Mormon Frontier, p. 15). On pages 43 and 45, Mrs. Hilton says that in Green River County, Utah, where Hickman served as “county assessor, tax collector, prosecuting attorney, and Utah territorial legislative representative” he “was also Brigham Young’s eyes and ears.” In his published confession, Bill Hickman tells of his meetings with Brigham Young. Mrs. Hilton confirms that Hickman had many contacts with Young, both by mail and in person. Concerning one meeting Bill Hickman had with Brigham Young, Hilton notes: “Young’s own journal recorded simply, ‘Friday, June 26th, 1857: Spent the forenoon with Brother Hickman who arrived yesterday from the States’” (Ibid., p. 65). On page 84, she gives this information:

During 1858-59, at least two local gangs of horse thieves were operating in Utah: Bill Hickman’s and that of Joachim “Cub” Johnson. . . .

During this time Hickman was serving Brigham Young as one of his spies. Young needed informers to watch the army and to contact prominent Gentiles about their views of the church and chose Hickman.

On page 85, Mrs. Hilton quotes the following from Brigham Young’s journal: “It is rumored that five marshals left Camp Floyd yesterday sworn to arrest or kill Bill Hickman on the spot. Bill was warned and left home in time.”

In the earlier paper, pages 43-44, Arrington and Hilton had questioned the authorship of a story in Brigham’s Destroying Angel concerning the murder of a “half-breed Indian.” They even suggested that “Beadle transposes the event to 1848 [instead of 1849] in order to involve Brigham Young.” In her new book, Mrs. Hilton no longer seems to question the date of the murder or the authorship of the statement:

Most surviving evidence reveals that Bill Hickman, Brigham Young, and Orson Hyde were close friends. Perhaps the events recounted in Hickman’s autobiography account for these bonds. According to his memoir, Hickman killed a half-breed Indian who had joined the Mormon church but subsequently threatened Young’s life. Later, he killed a notorious horse-thief who was seeking revenge against Hyde. Hickman admits to both killings and claims they were the first acts of violence performed at Young’s request. Young gratefully promised to make him “a great man in the Kingdom” sometime later. . . . Hyde would later go to great lengths to defend Hickman . . . In the spring of 1848, Brigham Young left Nebraska . . . he requested that Bill stay behind to protect Hyde . . . (pages 19-20)

After Brigham Young left, Bill Hickman murdered two more Indians. In their 1979 paper, page 43, Arrington and Hilton revealed that Joseph Young, Brigham Young’s brother, wrote him a letter on June 26, 1849, stating that “this bloody fray” reminded him of the tragic scene at Haun’s Mill—“an outrage on the principles of humanity.” The outrage was “unprovoked on the part of the Indians and without council or pretext for such cruelty.” William Hickman is a cold-blooded murderer, and as such he stands before every tribunal of justice in Heaven and on Earth and when the Judge of all the Earth makes inquisition for innocent blood it will be found dripping from the hands of William Hickman.” On June 1, 1849, Apostle Orson Hyde wrote a letter to Brigham Young in which he defended Bill Hickman:

“Brother Hickman has gone to the valley. You may hear some bad accounts of him, but don’t kill him till I come! It may be that my testimony may have a little bearing in his case! He is sometimes a little rash and may shoot an innocent Indian, mistaking him for an Omaha horse thief!” (“Wild Bill” Hickman and the Mormon Frontier, p. 24)

Notwithstanding the fact that Brigham Young was warned by his own brother that Bill Hickman was “a cold-blooded murderer,” he continued to use him in early Utah to rob and assassinate enemies of the church. Mrs. Hilton informs us on page 62 of her book, that in 1857, . . . hands were laid on Hickman’s head and he was given a blessing by church patriarch, John Young: “. . . You shall have power over all your enemies, even to set your feet upon their necks, and no weapon that is formed against you shall prosper . . . If you are faithful you shall assist in avenging the blood of the prophets of God, and assist in accomplishing the great work of the last days . . .”

On April 25, 1865, Bill Hickman wrote a letter to Brigham Young in which he confided:

If you want me to do anything, just let me know it . . . If you want this or that, or whatever you may think, I will try. Or if you want my life you can have it without a murmur or a groan, just let me know late or early. I will be there, and there will be no tale left behind . . . I am on hand. (Ibid., p. 113)

Bill Hickman was known to have killed many people in early Utah, yet he seemed to have been shielded from prosecution by the Mormon Church. Orrin Porter Rockwell was another murderer who received protection from the church. Rockwell was one of the first to become a member of the church and soon became one of Joseph Smith’s intimate friends. In Missouri, he joined the dreaded Danite band, served as a bodyguard for Joseph Smith, and was initiated into the secret Council of Fifty.

Both Hickman and Rockwell participated in the Aiken massacre. Although this slaughter did not involve as many people as the Mountain Meadows Massacre, it was certainly one of the cruelest deeds the early Mormons ever perpetrated. J. H. Beadle gave the following information concerning this cold-blooded transaction:

The party consisted of six men . . . on reaching Kaysville, twenty-five miles north of Salt Lake City, they were all arrested on the charge of being spies for the Government! . . . The Aikin party had stock, property, and money estimated at $25,000. Nothing being proved against them they were told they should be “sent out of the Territory by the Southern route.” Four of them started, leaving Buck and one of the unknown men in the city. The party had for an escort, O. P. Rockwell, John Lot, Miles, and one other. When they reached Nephi, one hundred miles south, Rockwell informed the Bishop, Bryant, that his orders were to “have the men used up there.” Bishop Bryant called a council at once, and the following men were selected to assist: J. Bigler (now a Bishop,) P. Pitchforth, his “first councilor,” John Kink, and Pickton. The selected murderers, at 11 p.m., started from the Tithing House and got ahead of the Aikins’, who did not start till daylight. The latter reached the Sevier River, when Rockwell informed them they could find no other camp that day; they halted, when the other party approached and asked to camp with them, for which permission was granted. The weary men removed their arms and heavy clothing, and were soon lost in sleep . . . the escort and the party from Nephi attacked the sleeping men with clubs and the kingbolts of the wagons. Two died without a struggle. But John Aiken bounded to his feet, but slightly wounded, and sprang into the brush. A shot from the pistol of John Kink laid him senseless. ‘Colonel’ also reached the brush, receiving a shot in the shoulder from Port Rockwell, and believing the whole party had been attacked by banditti, he made his way back to Nephi. With almost superhuman strength he held out during the twenty-five miles . . . ghastly pale and drenched with his own blood, staggering feebly along the streets of Nephi . . . his story elicited a well-feigned horror.

Meanwhile the murderers had gathered up the other three and thrown them into the river, supposing all to be dead. But John Aiken revived and crawled out on the same side, and hiding in the brush, heard these terrible words:

“Are the damned Gentiles all dead, Port?”
“All but one — the son of a b . . . ran.”

Supposing himself to be meant, Aiken lay still till the Danites left, then . . . set out for Neph . . . To return to Neph offered but slight hope, but it was his only hope . . . He sank helpless at the door of the first house he reached, but the words he heard infused new life into him. The woman, afterwards a witness, said to him, “Why, another of you ones got away from the robbers, and is at Brother Broo de’s.”

“Thank God, it is my brother,” he said, and started on. The citizens tell with wonder that he ran the whole distance, his hair clotted with blood, reeling like a drunken man all the way. It was not his brother, but “Colonel.”

Bishop Bryant came, extracted the balls, dressed the wounds, and advised the men to return, as soon as they were able, to Salt Lake City.

According to the main witness, a woman of Neph, all regarded them as doomed. They had got four miles on the road, when their driver, a Mormon named Wolf, stopped the wagon near an old cabin: informed them he must water the horses; unhitched them, and moved away. Two men then stepped from the cabin, and fired with double-barreled guns; Aikin and “Colonel” were both shot through the head, and fell dead from the wagon. Their bodies were then loaded with stone and put in one of those “bottomless springs”—so called—common in that part of Utah.

Meanwhile Rockwell and party had reached the city [Salt Lake City], taken Buck and the other man, and started southward, plying them with liquor . . . they reached the Point of the Mountain. There it was decided to “use them up,” and they were attacked with slung-shots and billies. The other man was instantly killed. Buck leaped from the wagon, outran his pursuers, their shots missing him, swam the Jordan, and came down it on the west side. He reached the city and related all that occurred, which created quite a stir. Hickman was then sent for to ‘finish the job,’ which he did as related in the text.

_Brigham’s Destroying Angel_, pp. 206-210)

Bill Hickman claimed that he was summoned to Brigham Young’s office. When he arrived, he asked President Young what he wanted. Young answered: “The boys have made a bad job of trying to put a man out of the way. They all got drunk, bruised up a fellow, and he got away from them at the Point of the Mountain, came back to this city, and is telling all that happened, which is making a big stink. He said I must get him out of the way and use him up” (Ibid., p. 128). Hickman goes on to say that the last surviving member of the Aiken party trusted a man by the name of George Dalton. Dalton was able to lure the man out to a secluded spot beyond “the Hot Springs three miles north of the city” where Hickman was waiting in ambush and shot him “through the head” (Ibid., p. 129). The next day Bill Hickman “went to Brigham Young’s, told him that Buck was taken care of, and there would be no more stink about his stories. He said he was glad of it. Buck was the last one of the Aiken’s party . . .” (Ibid., pp. 129-130).

There can be no doubt that the Mormons did take the Aiken party as prisoners and murdered them as related by J. H. Beadle and Bill Hickman. Under the date of November 3, 1857, Hosea Stout recorded the following in his diary: “Cal mail came and six cal prisoners taken at Box Elder supposed spies” (On_the_Mormon_Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 644). On November 9, 1857, Hosea Stout recorded that he himself was “guarding the prisoners from Cal.” Finally, on November 20, 1857, Stout made this very revealing entry in his diary:

O. P. Rockwell with 3 or 4 others started with 4 of the prisoners, which we had been guarding for some days, South to escort them through the settlements to Cal via South route The other two are going to be permitted to go at large and remain till spring and the guard dismissed. (Ibid., p. 645).

Mormon writer Harold Schindler has done an excellent job of compiling the evidence concerning the Aiken massacre. His research leads to the unmistakable conclusion that Rockwell was involved in the bloody deed (see _Orrin Porter Rockwell: Man of God, Son of Thunder_, 1966, pp. 268-279).

Less than two years after the Aiken massacre, U. S. Marshall P. K. Dotson held a warrant for Orrin Porter Rockwell’s arrest. Dotson found it impossible to make the arrest, and Rockwell retained his freedom for twenty years. He was in full fellowship with the Mormon Church during this period, and on June 1, 1873, he was called on a mission to Grass Valley (Ibid., p. 356). Finally, on September 29, 1877, Rockwell was arrested for his part in the Aiken massacre. He was 64 years old at the time. On June 9, 1878, Orrin Porter Rockwell died, and therefore he did not have to face a trial which could have been very embarrassing for the Mormon Church.

Mormon Apostle Orson Hyde, the man who ordered Bill Hickman to kill Hartley and protected him in his crimes, apparently felt that Hickman and Rockwell were like shepherd dogs who protected the Mormon Church. In an address delivered in the Tabernacle on April 9,1853, Apostle Hyde made these chilling hints concerning the matter:

_Suppose the shepherd should discover a wolf approaching the flock, what would he be likely to do? Why, we should suppose, if the wolf was within proper distance, that he would kill him at once . . . in short, that he would shoot him down, kill him on the spot. If the wolf was not within shot, we would naturally suppose he would set the dogs on him; and you are aware, I have no doubt, that these shepherd dogs have very pointed teeth . . .

Now don’t say that brother Hyde has taught strong things, for I have only told you what takes place between the shepherd and the flock, when the sheep have to be protected.

If you say that the Priesthood or authorities of the Church here are the shepherd, and the Church is the flock, you can make your own application of this figure. It is not at all necessary for me to do it.

It is all the same to me whether they want to destroy the flock, or destroy, steal, and carry off the property of the flock . . . the best way to sanctify ourselves, and please God our heavenly Father in these days, is to rid ourselves of every thief . . . It would have a tendency to place a terror on those who leave these parts, that may prove their salvation when they see the heads of thieves taken off, or shot down before the public. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, pp. 72-73)

As Bill Hickman became older, it became obvious that he was becoming increasingly difficult to control. His gun fights and public intoxication were becoming very embarrassing to the church. It was evident that he presented a danger to the flock itself. Richard S. Van Wagoner and Steven C. Walker give this interesting information in their book concerning an incident which occurred in 1860:

According to Brigham Young’s office journal, “Mayor Smoot had a conversation with the President about Wm. A. Hickman, observing people see him come in and out the office, and that leads them to suppose he is sanctioned in all he does by the President. He also observed that dogs were necessary to take care of the flock, but if the Shepherd’s dogs hurt the sheep it would be time to remove them.” (A_Book_of_Mormons_, p. 122) to work for General Patrick Connor in 1863. Hope Hilton says:

Brigham Young distrusted men who accepted government employment and advised Hickman twice during the summer of 1863 to leave Connor’s employ and, as Hickman puts it, to “kidnap Connor, the Irish Ditcher, and send him over into California.” Young, according to Hickman, offered $1,000, plus all expenses. “I stood up to Brigham for the first time ever, and said I would not do it,” Hickman wrote . . . (“Wild Bill” Hickman and the Mormon Frontier, p. 110)

Mrs. Hilton says that Young and Hickman eventually became “irreconcilably hardened towards each other” (Ibid., p. 120). On page 119 of the same book, Hilton stated that Hickman wrote a letter to Young in which “he must have threatened to ‘disclose all.’” Finally, “Without a bishop’s court, trial, or stated complaint, he was denied his church membership on 12 June 1868.”

In 1871, Bill Hickman met will U.S. Marshal H. Gilson and confessed he had committed murder for the church. He then appeared before a Grand Jury and “made a full statement of all the crimes committed in this Territory that I knew of . . .” (Brigham’s Destroying Angel, page 192).

BRIGHAM YOUNG INDICTED FOR MURDER

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts referred to the massacre of the Fancher train which Mormons and Indians committed at Mountain Meadows in 1857 as “the most lamentable episode in Utah history, and in the history of the church” (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 139). Although we do not have the room to discuss that massacre here, the reader will find a good account of it in our book, Major Problems of Mormonism, pages 193-202. We have already spoken of the massacre of the Aiken party and the slaying of Jesse Hartley for opposing the church. These were certainly not the only cases of blood atonement in early Utah. In Major Problems of Mormonism, page 181, we reported concerning the murders of Ramos Anderson and Dr. Vaun for adultery. John D. Lee tells of other people who were “blood atoned.” In addition, Hosea Stout related that on February 27, 1858, “several persons disguised as Indians entered Henry Jones’ house and dragged him out of bed with a whore and castrated him by a square & close amputation” (On The Mormon Frontier; The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 653). Two months later both Henry Jones and his mother were “blood atoned” in Payson—all allegedly for incest. James Monroe was murdered for adultery. Three “apostates named Potter, Wilson and Walker,” were arrested by the Mormons for stealing and were shot. Only Walker survived and later he seems to have disappeared. In Springville, Garder G. Potter, William R. Parrish and his son, William B. Parrish were assassinated for apostacy. All of these murders seem to have been committed by people who believed in the “doctrine” of blood atonement (see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pp. 545-559).

Due to the secrecy surrounding blood atonement, the reported cases may represent only a portion of those who were actually put to death. R. N. Baskin, who served as a Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Utah, was not sure how many people were blood atoned in early Utah, but he noted:

In the excavations made within the limits of Salt Lake City during the time I have resided there, many human skeletons have been exhumed in various parts of the city. The present City cemetery was established by the first settlers. I have never heard that it was ever the custom to bury the dead promiscuously throughout the city; and as no coffins were ever found in connection with any of these skeletons, it is evident that the death of the persons to whom they once belonged did not result from natural causes, but from the use of criminal means. . . . That the Danites were bound by their covenants to execute the criminal orders of the high priesthood against apostates and alleged enemies of the church is beyond question. . . . How many murders were secretly committed by that band of assassins will never be known, but an estimate may be made from the number mentioned in the confessions of Hickman and Lee, and the number of human skeletons which have been exhumed in Salt Lake City, the possessors of which were evidently murdered and buried without a knell, coffin, or Christian ceremony. (Reminiscences of Early Utah, pages 154-155)

However this may be, an historian who takes an honest look at conditions in early Utah is forced to the conclusion that there is no way all these murders could have been committed and the killers allowed to remain free unless the church itself was involved in a conspiracy. The following statements are taken from “the remarks of Judge Cradlebaugh upon the occasion of his releasing the Grand Jury” from further service in 1859:

This day makes two weeks from the time you were impanelled. . . . the court took the unusual course of calling your attention to particular crimes—the horrible massacre at the Mountain meadows. It told you of the murder of young Jones and his mother, and of pulling their house down over them and making that their tomb, it told you of the murder of the Parrishes and Potter, and Forbes, almost within sight of this court house. . . . The court has had occasion to issue bench warrants to arrest persons connected with the Parrish murder; had them brought before it and examined; the testimony presents an unparalleled condition of affairs. It seems that the whole community were engaged in committing that crime. There seems to be a combined effort on the part of the community to screen the murderers from the punishment due for the murder they have committed.

I might call your attention to the fact that when officers seek to arrest persons accused of crimes they are not able to do so; the parties are screened and secreted by the community. Scarcely had the officers arrived in sight of the town of Springville before a trumpet was sounded from the walls of the town. This, no doubt, was for the purpose of giving the alarm. The officers were there to make arrests. The officers leave the town, and in a short time a trumpet sounds again from the wall for the purpose of announcing that the danger was over. Witnesses are screened; others are intimidated by persons in that community. . . . Such acts and conduct go to show that the community there do not desire to have criminals punished, it shows that the Parishes and Potter were murdered by counsel, that it was done by authority. . . . (The Valley Tan, March 29, 1859, p. 3)

U. S. Marshal P. K. Dotson became very frustrated when he tried to serve warrants on about 40 men involved in the Mountain Meadows massacre, the Aiken massacre and other crimes. He wrote the following in a letter to Judge Cradlebaugh:

I have received from you certain warrants of arrest against many persons, in your Judicial district, charged with murder. . . . I regret to inform you that it is not in my power to execute any of these processes, I have made repeated efforts by the aid as well of the military, as of the civil posse, to execute the warrants last alluded to, but without success. So great is the number of persons engaged in the commission of these crimes, and such the feeling of the Mormon Church, and the community in their favor, that I cannot rely on a civil posse to aid me in arresting them. . . . (“Journal History,” June 3, 1859, as cited in Orrin Porter Rockwell; Man of God, Son of Thunder, pp. 292-293)

It was obvious to many people in early Utah that Brigham Young was responsible for the death of many people, but with the power he had it would be almost impossible to convict him. After Bill Hickman confessed to committing murders for the church, some felt that there might be a chance of successfully prosecuting President Young for ordering the murder of Richard Yates. Hickman gave this information about the death of Yates:

One Yates, a trader . . . came to Bridger twice, buying beef cattle for the Government. . . . We kept watch of the United States camps every day . . . One day they moved up the creek about four miles, and we saw a vacancy between them and their cattle. We made a rush and drove off seven hundred and fifty head . . .

About this time it was noised about that Yates had let the soldiers have his ammunition, and that he was acting the spy for them. . . . One of the Conover boys . . . saw a lone man traveling. . . . After learning his name, Yates, he marched him to Bridger, where he was placed in the big stone corral and a guard placed over him. . . .

I will here state that the office I held was that of independent captain, amenable to none but the head commanding general or governor, Brigham Young. . . . I was asked to take the prisoner, Yates, to the city with me. . . . He had a fine gold watch and nine hundred dollars in gold . . . we traveled about halfway down Echo Canon to where the general’s headquarters were located . . . I delivered General Wells [a member of the First Presidency under Brigham Young] some letters . . . and asked him what I should do with my prisoner. He said: “He ought to be killed; but take him on; you will probably get an order when you get to Col. Jones’ camp” . . . within three or four miles of the camp, we met Joseph S. Young, a son of Brigham’s . . . He hailed me (I being behind) and said his father wanted that man Yates killed, and that I would know all about it when I got to Jones’ camp.

We got there about sundown, and were met outside by Col. Jones . . . He took me aside and told me he had orders when Yates came along to have him used up . . . Supper was brought to us, and Yates soon went to sleep on his blankets. Flack and Meacham spread their blankets and soon went to sleep also. . . . No person was to be seen, when Col. Jones and two others, Hosea Stout and another man whose name I do not recollect, came to my camp-fire and asked if Yates was asleep. I told them he was, upon which his brains were knocked out with an ax. He was covered up with his blankets . . . and a grave dug some three feet deep near the camp by the fire-light, all hands assisting. Flack and Meacham were asleep when the man was killed, but woke up and saw the grave digging. The body was put in and the dirt well packed on it . . .

The next day I took the nine hundred dollars, and we all went to headquarters. . . . Flack and I went to Brigham’s office. . . . He asked what had become of Yates? I told him. He then asked if I had got word from him? I told him that I had got his instructions at Jones’ camp, and also of the word I had got from his son Jo [Joseph Young]. He said that was right, and a good thing. I then told him I had nine hundred dollars given me to bring in, that Yates had at the time he was captured. I told him of the expense I had been to during the war, and asked him if I might have part of the money? He gave me a reprimand for asking such a thing, and said it must go towards defraying the expenses of the war. I pulled out the sack containing the money, and he told me to give it to his clerk . . . The money was counted, and we left. (Brigham’s Destroying Angel, pp. 122-126)

Brigham Young’s son admitted meeting with Hickman about Yates but claimed it was to save him. Stanley P. Hirshon wrote:

In 1871, Joseph A. Young, the prophet’s son, described to the New York Tribune how he met Hickman at the outskirts of the city and urged him to bring Yates in alive. Hickman, however, told the New York World a different story. Joseph said Young wanted the prisoner “taken care of.” . . . Significantly, neither Joseph nor Hickman denied that Mormons had murdered Yates. (The Lion of the Lord, pages 176-177)

Joseph Young’s statement certainly raises some interesting questions: If an order had not been given that Yates was to die, why would he be urging Hickman to bring him in alive? Moreover, if Joseph Young was really concerned about Hickman bringing in Yates alive, why didn’t the Mormons punish Hickman when he came in without him? The fact that the Mormon leaders did not punish Hickman for this murder seems to show that they were responsible for the crime. That Hickman did not seem concerned about keeping Yates’ death a secret is made plain by a statement written by Dan Jones:

“This Yates was a personal friend of mine, a kind-hearted, liberal man . . . One very cold morning about sunrise, Hickman and two others came to my camp. . . . he took me outside and asked me if I knew Yates. I told him I did. ‘Well, we have just buried him,’ he said.” (Forty Years Among the Indians, as cited by Juanita Brooks in On The Mormon Frontier, vol. 2, p. 643, n. 13)

In the same footnote, Mrs. Brooks commented: “That some Mormons did confiscate Yates’ property is shown in the diary of Newton Tuttle . . . ‘Sat 24 . . . Lewis Robinson got back from Green river he took 48 Horse & colts 36 pair of blankets &c that belonged to Yates . . .’”

J. H. Beadle said that Yates’ “remains have been disinterred from the spot named by Hickman, and the chain of evidence is complete. Hosea Stout, a Mormon lawyer of considerable prominence, who was arrested for complicity in this murder, and on Hickman’s testimony, admits that Yates was killed as a spy; but insists that he was not present and had no knowledge of the transaction; that Yates was delivered to Hickman to be taken to the city, and neither he nor any other officer saw him again” (Brigham’s Destroying Angel, pp. 205-206). That Hosea Stout was on the scene at the time of the murder is verified by his own diary. “Sunday 18 Oct 1857. . . . Some 700 head of the captured cattle passed to day being driven by teamsters who left the enemy. At dark W. A. Hickman came in with Mr Yates a prisoner” (On The Mormon Frontier, The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, p. 643). There is little doubt that Stout would resort to violence against a man suspected of being a spy. We have previously quoted from Stout’s own diary for Jan. 9, 1846. In that entry Hosea Stout said that he thought “William Hibbard was ‘a spy’ and that ‘I told Scott that we must ‘bounce a stone off his head.’ . . . I got an opportunity & hit him on the back of his head which came very near taking his life” (Ibid., vol. 1, p. 103).

R. N. Baskin, who was responsible for the indictment of Brigham Young, gave this information:

I knew that the indictment of Brigham and others would cause great excitement, especially among the polygamic element of the Mormon church, and if a collision occurred it [sic] would be at the time Brigham was arrested on the charge of murder. To meet such a contingency the United States marshal had appointed about one hundred deputies. . . . I knew that the arrest of anyone except Brigham would not be resisted. I therefore had Hawkins arrested and tried before taking any steps in the other cases. During that trial the street in front of the courtroom was daily crowded by hundreds of men, many of whom were armed and whose demeanor was most threatening towards the court. . . . Brigham was then arrested on the charge of lewd and lascivious cohabitation, and brought into court. He gave bonds, just as the others were required to do. . . . a few days later I had a warrant issued for his arrest on the murder charge. . . . Evidently some of the marshal’s deputies betrayed him, as Brigham learned of his intended arrest. . . . Brigham finally decided that instead of resisting he would make a journey to “the south” for his health. . . . In the height of the excitement, and when the armed mob was menacing the court, a number of prominent Gentiles called upon me and stated that they had reliable information that, unless the prosecutions were stopped, the prominent Gentiles who had taken an active part in opposing the Mormon ’system’ would be assassinated; that they had been appointed a committee to advise me of the fact and request me to dismiss the cases. I told the spokesman he would make a splendid angel, and as I did not intend to grant the request, he had better prepare to go to Abraham’s bosom. He replied that the matter was “too serious to treat facetiously.” . . . This was not the only time I had been subjected to a fire from the rear by men who should have encouraged instead of opposed me. (Reminiscences of Early Utah, pages 54-56)

Under the date of December 13, 1871, Wilford Woodruff recorded the following in his journal:

. . . spent the Evening at the Presidets office with the Twelve . . . & many others & Expresed our views concerning Presid Brigham Young coming home to stand his trial . . . all thought it wisdom & good policy for him to Come to the City & stand his trial . . . Yet all agreed to leave it with him to decide as the spirit might dictate. (Wilford Woodruff’s Journal, vol. 7, page 45)

Brigham Young finally returned, and on January 2, 1872, Woodruff noted:

. . . the United States Marshall Came to Presidents Youngs office & Served an Inditement upon him for Murders. . . . McKean the Judge Refused Bail But put Presidt Young into the Hands of the Marshall to be Confined in one of Presidt Youngs own Homes. (Ibid., p. 52)

Unfortunately, the case against Brigham Young for murder never came to trial. Harold Schindler states:

. . . the United States Supreme Court handed down a decision in the Englebrecht case which set aside all legal proceedings in Utah during the previous eighteen months and declared null and void indictments found against nearly one hundred and forty persons. The landmark opinion resulted in all charges being dropped against Young, Wells, Stout, Kimball and ironically, Hickman himself. (Orrin Porter Rockwell: Man of God, Son of Thunder, p. 355)

Almost everyone agreed that Bill Hickman had committed many murders. After Hickman became disillusioned with Mormonism, even Apostle Woodruff spoke of his “damnable murders” (Wilford Woodruff’s Journal, vol. 7, p. 36). That Hickman could commit the atrocious crimes he did while the Mormons were in power without being punished seems to show that he was being protected by church leaders. These leaders did everything they could to make it difficult to enforce the law. By the time Hickman confessed to his crimes, the legal system in Utah was in such disarray that neither Young nor Hickman had to stand trial.

The federal decision in Clinton V. Englebrecht provided the legal basis for throwing out 130 indictments found by grand juries drawn in accordance with the practice in United States courts rather than the territorial statutes. This solved nothing, however, because the disputes over the appointment of the territorial marshall tied the hands of the court; the courts became little more than boards of arbitration, and by June, 1874, a backlog of ninety-five cases had built up in Third District Court.

McKean and other Gentiles believed that the Mormons were afraid to allow trials of their brethren accused of murder and other crimes before impartial juries. The judge wrote to U. S. Attorney General George H. Williams in the fall of 1873 complaining that he could neither convict the guilty nor protect the innocent and that Utah had become a “theocratic state, under the vice regency of Brigham Young.”

While all the evidence seems to show that everyone who opposed the Mormon Church in early Utah risked the possibility of losing their property or even their lives, things are different today. The police in Salt Lake City give full protection to both Mormons and Gentiles. Wallace Turner observed:

A modern apostasy can be understood through the story of the Tanner couple. The fact that today they can live comfortably in Salt Lake City, relatively unmolested by the LDS church (beyond a letter or so from anguished apostles) demonstrates as much as anything could the way the church has changed. In the old days, those who disagreed had better be able to defend themselves. (The Mormon Establishment, 1966, p. 163)

The reader will notice that the books Brigham’s Destroying Angel and “Wild Bill” Hickman and the Mormon Frontier make a devastating case against the claim by Mormon apologists that the church had no connection with William Hickman’s crimes. The evidence clearly shows that although President Brigham Young and Apostle Orson Hyde knew that Hickman was a thief and a cold-blooded murderer, he was used to further the interests of the church.

IN THE MAIL

“I read two books in the past year pertaining to Hoffman and his forgeries. . . . the tanner name kept appearing in Gathering of Saints & Mormon Murders—to the extent that I became interested in your writings. I am halfway through your Mormonism [—Shadow or Reality?] . . . and was released sunday as 2nd Coun[selor]— in the . . . ward bishopric . . . about 4 weeks ago I gave a note to the other counselor . . . that said—this will probably be my last Sacrament Service and promptly left the podium . . . I hav[e]n’t returned to church . . .

“As you can imagine—I am going through a difficult time. My wife is very upset . . .

“Thank you for your research—It has been overpowering to me—and answered many of my questions.” (Letter from Texas)

“I wish to thank you warmly for your faithful ministry and sending of printed material of foremost importance to us, keeping us abreast of so many events occurring within and without the Church . . . I have almost finished perusing your last book EVOLUTION ON TEMPLE CEREMONY; it is confirming what I have been feeling for years, so as to lead me to discontinue attending temple Sessions—the only strong link that keeps me still tied with Mormonism is the Book of M. . . .” (Letter from Switzerland)

“I count you as very special friends, although we’ve never met. Questions that were unresolved in me for years were clarified and openly discussed in your literature. My story, in brief, is that I rebelled against parental and church authority from age 12 to 17 when I was caught up and repented of smoking and drinking, returned to the fold, serve a mission, married in the temple, acquired a PhD . . . had five children . . . was Pres. in a Quorum of Seventy, read much church literature . . . was an officiator in the Oakland Temple, became inactive, rejected both God and Christ, drank again casually at age 36, discovered I was alcoholic at age 40, joined AA and found the spiritual basis for my life that had always eluded me as both child and man. I found God rather soon, but spent several years coming to Christ . . . In AA I discovered that I was bankrupt in all areas of my life: spiritual, mental, moral. When I abandoned myself to God, His Grace entered to expel my obsession and begin to restore me to health. I understood Paul for the first time. Service to others is the key to my life . . . For several years, theological correctness became secondary to recovery and service, but after my mother died . . . I put more time into the search, read much of your literature and on Oct. 31, 1989, I requested that my name be removed from LDS church rolls. This was quietly done soon thereafter. Life is now a coherent whole and my inner peace is great. . . . Thank you for your good work. I feel you have been used as an instrument that could reach me because you are committed to the truth and not merely to a ‘cause.’ The difference is important to me. I have had dear friends in the church advise me that I should suppress my doubts because of the good the church does and because of the good people in it. With far baser motives, some enemies of the church use untruths or distortions to attack it because of the good people in it. There are two basic elements in the Gospel view of sexuality as I interpret it from the scriptures. The first is that sex is good—sexuality, far from being the antithesis of spirituality, is actually an attribute of God . . . In the light of their understanding that God is a procreating personage of flesh and bone, latter-day prophets have made it clear that despite what it says in Matthew 1:20, the Holy Ghost was not the father of Jesus. . . . The Savior was fathered by a personage of flesh and bone, and was literally what Nephi said he was, “Son of the Eternal Father.” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn, 1967, pp. 100-101)

Brigham Young, the second prophet of the Mormon Church, boldly asserted: “Now, remember from this time forth and for ever, Jesus Christ was not begotten by the Holy Ghost” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 51). This statement, of course, is directly contradicted by the Bible, Matthew 1:18 and 20: “Now the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost . . . for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost.” It is interesting to note that even the Book of Mormon agrees with the Bible on this matter stating that Mary was to be “overshadowed and conceive by the power of the Holy Ghost . . .” (Alma 7-10)

In spite of these plain statements, Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth prophet of the church, declared: “They tell us the Book of Mormon and the Bible teach that Christ was begotten by the Holy Ghost. I challenge that statement. The Book of Mormon teaches no such thing! Neither does the Bible” (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 19).

In any case, since Christians believe that “God is a Spirit” (John 4:24), they view the conception of Christ as a miraculous event having nothing to do with sex or any physical act. Mormon leaders, on the other hand, consider Christ’s conception as a natural occurrence. Joseph Fielding Smith, Jr., the son of the 10th prophet of the church, made this plain in his book, Religious Truths Defined, page 44: “The birth of the Savior was a natural occurrence unattended with any degree of mysticism, and the Father God was the literal parent of Jesus in the flesh as well as in the spirit.” President Joseph Fielding Smith declared: “Christ was begotten of God. He was not born without the aid of Man, and that Man was God!” (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, p. 18).
Apostle Bruce R. McConkie further explained:

These name titles all signify that our Lord is the only Son of the Father in the flesh. Each of the words is to be understood literally. Only means only, Begotten means begotten; and Son means son. Christ was begotten by an Immortal Father in the same way that mortal men are begotten by mortal fathers. (Mormon Doctrine, 1979, pp. 546-547)

And Christ was born into the world as the literal Son of this Holy Being; he was born in the same personal, real, and literal sense that any mortal son is born to a mortal father. There is nothing figurative about his paternity; he was begotten, conceived and born in the normal and natural course of events. . . . Christ is the Son of Man, meaning that his Father (the Eternal God!) is a Holy Man. (Ibid., page 742)

President Brigham Young had this to say concerning the birth of Christ: “The man Joseph, the husband of Mary, did not, that we know of, have more than one wife, but Mary the wife of Joseph had another husband” (Deseret News, October 10, 1866). Apostle Orson Pratt also taught that Mary was God’s wife:

The fleshly body of Jesus required a Mother as well as a Father. Therefore, the Father and Mother of Jesus, according to the flesh, must have been associated together in the capacity of Husband and Wife, hence the Virgin Mary must have been, for the time being, the lawful wife of God the Father: we use the term lawful Wife, because it would be blasphemous in the highest degree to say that He overshadowed her or begat the Saviour unlawfully. It would have been unlawful for any man to have interfered with Mary, who was already espoused to Joseph; for such a heinous crime would have subjected both the guilty parties to death, according to the law of Moses. But God having created all men and women, had the most perfect right to do with his own creation, according to His holy will and pleasure: He had a lawful right to overshadow the Virgin Mary in the capacity of a husband, and beget a Son, although she was espoused to another; for the law which He gave to govern men and women was not intended to govern Himself, or to prescribe rules for his own conduct. It was also lawful in Him, after having dealt with Mary, to give her to Joseph her espoused husband. Whether God the Father gave Mary to Joseph for time only, or for time and eternity, we are not informed. Inasmuch as God was the first husband to her, it may be that He only gave her to be the wife of Joseph while in this mortal state, and that he intended after the resurrection to again take her as one of his own wives to raise up immortal spirits in eternity. (The Seer, Oct. 1953, page 158)

President Brigham Young maintained that “The birth of the Saviour was as natural as are the births of our children; it was the result of natural action. He partook of flesh and blood—was begotten of his Father, as we were of our fathers” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, p. 115). In a sermon delivered in the Tabernacle on April 9, 1852, President Young climaxed his teaching with the following explanation:

. . . remember from this time forth, and for ever, that Jesus Christ was not begotten by the Holy Ghost. I will repeat a little anecdote. I was in conversation with a certain learned professor upon the subject, when I replied, to this idea—“if the Son was begotten by the Holy Ghost, it would be very dangerous to baptize and confirm females, and give the Holy Ghost to them, lest he should beget children, to be palmed upon the Elders by the people, bringing the Elders into great difficulties.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, p. 51)

As we indicated earlier, some Mormons are so embarrassed by the teachings of the church concerning the birth of Christ that they would like to see them abolished. Unfortunately for these apologists, President Ezra Taft Benson, the current prophet of the LDS Church, has come down firmly on the side of Brigham Young and the other prophets and apostles. In The Teachings of Ezra Taft Benson, a book published in 1988, President Benson steadfastly maintains that God was the father of Christ “in the most literal sense”:

A fundamental doctrine of true Christianity is the divine birth of the child Jesus. This doctrine is not generally comprehended by the world. The paternity of Jesus Christ is one of the “mysteries of godliness” comprehended only by the spiritually minded. . . . Thus the testimonies of appointed witnesses leave no question as to the paternity of Jesus Christ. God was the Father of Jesus’ mortal tabernacle, and Mary, a mortal woman, was His mother. He is therefore the only person born who rightfully deserved the title “the Only Begotten Son of God.”. . .

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints proclaims that Jesus Christ is the Son of God in the most literal sense. The body in which he performed His mission in the flesh was sired by that same Holy Being we worship as God, our Eternal Father. Jesus was not the son of Joseph, nor was He Begotten by the Holy Ghost. He is the Son of the Eternal Father. (The Teachings of Ezra Taft Benson, pages 6-7)

The LDS doctrine concerning the birth of Christ certainly raises more questions than it answers. For instance, in Mormon theology we learn that prior to coming to earth both Jesus and Mary were born to God the Father and His wife in a pre-existent state. From this it is clear that Jesus was the spirit brother of Mary. It has been suggested that since Mary was the spirit daughter of the Father, it would be an act of incest for God the Father to have had a sexual relationship with her. While Apostle Orson Pratt probably would have argued that God’s laws were “not intended to govern Himself,” the idea of God having relations with his spirit daughter who was at that very time betrothed to Joseph seems to be out of step with the teachings of the Bible. We feel that an examination of the Mormon teaching concerning the conception of Christ reveals that it is far closer to paganism that it is to Christianity!
THE WORST WAR?

After we began working on this issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger, war broke out in Iraq. We, of course, feel very bad that a peaceful settlement could not be obtained, but we still pray that something may be worked out to minimize the loss of lives.

As we reflect upon the casualties, sorrow and the devastating consequences of war, we are reminded of a war we are all involved in which is far more important than any earthly war. This is the battle which is taking place with regard to the eternal destiny of our own souls. Jesus explained that there is nothing more important than this matter:

For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? (Matthew 16:26)

Jesus saw things from a far different vantage point than we do, and because of his view of the entire human situation, he made this startling statement:

And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell. (Matthew 10:28)

The Scriptures teach that we are in the camp of the enemy until we turn our lives over to the Lord. Jesus himself said:

He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad. (Matthew 12:30)

We are described as being "alienated" from God:

This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord, that ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind,

Having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart: (Ephesians 4:17)

Many people do not really understand that they are "alienated from the life of God." Others sense that they are estranged from God and wonder why they are not able to find him in their lives. Isaiah 59:1-2 throws important light on why we have become alienated from God:

Behold, the Lord’s hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; neither his ear heavy, that it cannot hear:

But your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you, that he will not hear.

J. B. Phillips observed that the “gulf between us and God is not merely an intellectual one . . . but the real gulf lies in the moral realm. You and I, through our own sins and failures, as well as by the infection of the sins of other people, are separated from God by a moral gulf” (Plain Christianity, p. 75).

Romans 3:23 makes it plain that “all have sinned and come short of the glory of God,” and Romans 3:9 states that all are “under sin.” It is because of our sinful and lost condition that we find that we have no fellowship with God. J. B. Phillips noted:

The Diagnoses of the world’s sickness . . . is that the power to love has been wrongly directed. It has either been turned in upon itself or given to the wrong things. The outward symptoms, and the results, of this misdirection are plainly obvious (at least in other people) in what we call “sin” or “selfishness.” The drastic “conversion” which God-become-Man called for is the reversal of the wrong attitude, the deliberate giving of the whole power to love, first to God, and then to other people. Without this reversal He spoke quite bluntly of a world doomed to destruction. (Your God Is Too Small, page 121)

Because of our sinful condition we do not know the personal God who wishes to have fellowship with us.

Myron Augsburger claims that we have made a prison for ourselves:

When Christ came into this world as our Savior he didn’t come just to save us from the problems we have. He came to save us from the problem that we are. We are the problem. We are hostile toward God. We have walled up our lives against Him to shut Him out. By hundreds of ways we cut ourselves off from every effort of God to get through to us. . . . The wall we have built becomes our own prison. (“The Cross and Forgiveness,” a recorded message by Myron Augsburger)

Besides teaching us that we are “alienated” from God, the Scriptures also reveal that the devil has blinded our minds so that we do not realize our lost condition:

But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost:

In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them. (2 Corinthians 4:3-4)

Because there was no hope in man, God provided a remedy.

In 2 Corinthians 5:18-19 we read:

And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation;

To wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation.

In “The Cross and Forgiveness,” Myron Augsburger speaks of Jesus as a bridge between God and man:

Jesus Christ didn’t only come into the world to reveal God. He came into the world to be a bridge between God and man—to be a mediator—to put one hand in God’s and the other hand in ours and bring us together. And so it is that one comes to the cross and finds that here God’s forgiveness to overcome man’s estrangement, man’s rebellion, man’s hostility, is expressed at a cost which was carried by Jesus Christ.

In John 8:12, Jesus declares: “. . . I am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life.” Unfortunately, men “loved darkness” and did not want the light which God had sent into the world. In John 3:19-20, the following appears:
And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil.

For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved.

J. B. Phillips observed:

Let us look for a moment at Jesus Christ. He was, I believe, God in human form. . . He couldn’t help arousing a genuine sense of sin. You can’t have Light coming into a dark and dirty room without showing up the muddle and mess and dirt! The very presence of one Good Man was bound to show up the weakness and selfishness and sin of the others. (Plain Christianity, page 50)

As a burglar fears a policeman with a flashlight, so we are afraid that the righteous light of Jesus Christ will expose our sin and selfishness. Fortunately, if we will give up and surrender our lives to the Lord we will be saved: “For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life.” (John 3:16)

Some people have felt that just an intellectual consent that Jesus is the Christ is sufficient for salvation. The Scriptures, however, teach that even the devils believe there is a God, but that they do not have salvation (see James 2:19). D. Shelby Corlett wrote:

Faith is more than a mere mental assent to truth. There is no more moral saving benefit in a mere mental acceptance of the truth that Jesus is the Son of God than in the mental acceptance of some scientific truth. Faith is the going out of the whole inner life toward God. We do not believe in Him unless we act on it, unless we give the whole life to Him. To believe in God is a definite attitude of the heart, a surrender, a decision, an acceptance, something active and continuous, bringing a state of confidence and trust in Him. (Christian Security, page 15)

The message given in the Scriptures seems clear: a great spiritual war is going on between the forces of truth and those of evil. If we are not “with” Jesus, we are in the wrong army. We need to flee from Satan’s army and yield ourselves to Jesus Christ. We need to give up light and truth and righteousness and love to Jesus and to our fellow men. (Christian Security, page 15)

The message given in the Scriptures seems clear: a great spiritual war is going on between the forces of truth and those of evil. If we are not “with” Jesus, we are in the wrong army. We need to flee from Satan’s army and yield ourselves to Jesus Christ. We are reminded of the people who lived in Germany at the time of Adolf Hitler. Like the devil, Hitler did not really love his people. He had his own selfish agenda, and in his lust for power he finally brought terrible destruction upon both himself and a large number of his followers. As Hitler gained power, many people could see that there was something wrong. Nevertheless, they allowed themselves to be blinded by the propaganda that was put forth. Many who wanted to stay neutral were swept into the destructive stream of wickedness.

All of us must carefully examine our own lives. Are we really on the Lord’s side? If we are trying to remain neutral we are giving comfort and aid to the enemy. If we are not fully committed to Christ, we need to yield to him before it is everlastingly too late.
MISSIONARY WORK IN UTAH

There are opportunities for those who are interested in volunteering for evangelistic work in Salt Lake City this summer. If interested call (801) 486-3800 or write to Associated Utah Christian Ministries, PO Box 750, Salt Lake City, Utah 84010.

2ND PRINTING ALREADY!

The new book, Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony: 1842-1990, by Jerald and Sandra Tanner, has turned out to be such a success that we have already begun a second printing so that we will not run out. This book contains the actual text of the 1990 revision of the highly secret endowment ritual and other accounts of the ceremony dating back to 1846. Also show all of the serious changes made in the ceremony in 1990. Price: $5.00

ROBERTS’ MANUSCRIPTS

In 1980, we published a photographic reproduction of Mormon historian B. H. Roberts’ secret studies of the Book of Mormon. These manuscripts, which were written by one of the greatest defenders of the Mormon Church, had been suppressed for many years because they raised many serious questions regarding the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon. Five years after our edition appeared, University of Illinois Press published the same material (including a chapter which we did not have). Unfortunately, the price of this book has gone up in the bookstores to $34.95. Because we feel that the high price of this book will keep many people from learning of Roberts’ critical views on the Book of Mormon, we have reprinted our work, Roberts’ Manuscripts Revealed. It normally sells for $13.95, but if it is ordered before March 31, 1991, the price will be only $11.95 (mail orders add 10%).

PLAN TO ATTEND!

CHRISTIAN INSTITUTE FOR MORMON STUDIES

June 13–15, 1991 — Salt Lake City Hilton

This exciting three-day conference brings Christians together from all over the country who share a vision for more effectively sharing the Good News of Jesus Christ with Mormon people.

Major speakers include:

* Ruth Tucker, PhD (Trinity Evangelical Divinity School)
* Paul Carden (Christian Research Institute)
* Sandra Tanner (Utah Lighthouse Ministry)
* David Crump, PhD (Salt Lake Pastor)

Challenging seminars will sharpen your understanding of ministry to and among LDS people. Seminars are aimed at Christians who want to grow in their understanding of:

* Issues in research on Mormonism
* Evangelism to Mormon people
* How to effectively minister to Christians in a Mormon dominated area

This conference is sponsored by the Utah Institute for Biblical Studies.

For a free brochure and registration fee information, either write or call Utah Lighthouse Ministry (801-485-8894) or call the Utah Institute for Biblical Studies (801-581-1900).

In 1989, we found ourselves faced with a very serious decision with regard to a story that had been leaked to us concerning charges that Paul H. Dunn, who had served as a General Authority in the Mormon Church for many years, had been deceitful in his writings and speeches. As some of our readers may know, this was not the first time that we found ourselves sitting on a powder keg.

Since we began publishing material regarding Mormonism over thirty years ago, we have brought to light a number of documents which have been suppressed and other important material relating to the Latter-day Saints. Some of it has been extremely controversial. We have, in fact, received letters from two Mormon apostles in which we were threatened with lawsuits if we did not desist from printing certain documents (see photographs of their letters in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 13-14). Although we continued to publish the material, the suits were never actually filed. One Mormon scholar, however, did attempt to sue us and even appealed the case to the Supreme Court of the United States. Fortunately, however, he did not succeed in his endeavor.

Some of the stories we have printed have seriously affected people’s lives and have caused some face-to-face confrontations which have been anything but pleasant. For example, eighteen months before Mark Hofmann murdered Steven Christensen and Kathy Sheets, we suggested that his “Salamander” letter may have been plagiarized from E. D. Howe’s anti-Mormon book Mormonism Unvailed, (see Salt Lake City Messenger, March 1984). Not surprisingly, this led to a weighty discussion with Mr. Hofmann later that year and another confrontation in 1985. On many occasions we have had people try to persuade us to print stories we did not feel were based on reliable evidence. When we received the information regarding Paul Dunn, however, we felt that it was probably true. Nevertheless, we realized immediately that if we published this information, it could have a devastating affect on Mr. Dunn’s life and career. If the story should turn out to be incorrect, we could find ourselves faced with a lawsuit for libel and might have to make a public retraction.

We investigated the matter and weighed the whole situation very carefully. While we felt that Paul Dunn’s deceptive tactics were deplorable, we were even more concerned about the possibility that church leaders were trying to cover up the matter.
We, therefore, decided to run a story concerning the matter in the October, 1989, issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger. At that time we were working on another story concerning the excommunication of George P. Lee, who had been a member of the First Quorum of the Seventy since 1975. On pages 4 and 5 of our newsletter we published a section entitled, “Removing More Seventies.” In that portion of the Messenger we wrote the following:

One would certainly think that the church would have replaced George P. Lee and filled the two quorums at the October 1989 general conference. Instead, however, 16 other members of the two quorums were either “excused from active service”—i.e., put on emeritus status—or completely released. Why the church would cut down the number of Seventies at this time is certainly a mystery.

Another curious thing about this matter is the fact that Paul H. Dunn, who once served as one of the seven members of the “Presidency of the First Quorum of Seventy” was “excused from active service” because of age or health. Some people seem to feel that this was not the real reason. They, in fact, believe it was for the “health” of the church. As far as age is concerned, there appear to be sixteen Seventies older than Mr. Dunn who were not put on emeritus status, and while he may have some problems with his health, many of the other General Authorities are not in good health. Apostle Bruce R. McConkie died of cancer, but was never put on emeritus status, and President Spencer W. Kimball had cancer, heart trouble and other problems but remained president of the church. The current president, Ezra Taft Benson, is 90 years old and very feeble, yet he remains in office.

It is suspected that the church leaders felt that Dunn would eventually become a liability to the church because of some investigative reporting which had been done by Lynn Packer. Mr. Packer, a nephew of Apostle Boyd Packer, at one time worked for the church’s television station, KSL. He was working with that station when the Hofmann story broke but was later fired. Packer felt that his aggressive reporting on the Hofmann affair and his earlier work on the Afco scandal played a role in his dismissal. The church simply did not want all the truth to come to light.

Although he was never indicted for any crime, Paul H. Dunn’s reputation suffered because of the Afco affair. The Wall Street Journal for Nov. 9, 1983, reported: “Paul H. Dunn . . . whose church salary is $40,000 a year, was a director of Afco Enterprises, a real-estate venture until 1978. Afco collapsed four years later; and its owner, Grant C. Affleck, was recently indicted for mail fraud, securities fraud and bankruptcy fraud. Despite Mr. Dunn’s 1978 resignation, records in the U.S. District Court civil suit here show that he continued to have ties with Afco until it entered bankruptcy proceedings in 1982. . . .”

Dunn acknowledged that those stories and others were untrue, but he defends fabrications as necessary to illustrate his theological and moral points. He compares his stories to the parables told by Jesus acknowledging, however, that Jesus’ parables weren’t about himself . . .

Unlike the Mormon apostles mentioned above, Paul Dunn did not send us a letter threatening litigation. He, in fact, did not respond in any way to the questions we had raised. Although we thought that members of the press in Utah would be interested in this story, there seems to have been little interest in getting to the bottom of the scandal. Almost a year and a half passed before we heard more about the matter. As is often the case with important stories regarding the Mormon Church, the news finally broke in a paper published outside of Utah. On February 16, 1991, the Arizona Republic published an article written by Richard R. Robertson which contained the following:

SALT LAKE CITY — Among Mormons, Elder Paul H. Dunn is a popular teacher, author and role model. As a prominent leader of the Church . . . for more than 25 years, he has told countless inspirational stories about his life: Like the time his best friend died in his arms during a World War II battle, while imploring Dunn to teach America’s youth about patriotism.

Or how God protected him as enemy machine-gun bullets ripped away his clothing, gear and helmet without ever touching his skin.

Or how perseverance and Mormon values led him to play major-league baseball for the St. Louis Cardinals.

But those stories are not true.

Dunn’s “dead” best friend isn’t dead; only the heel of Dunn’s boot caught a bullet; and he never played baseball for the St. Louis Cardinals or any other major-league team.

Dunn acknowledged that those stories and others were untrue, but he defends fabrications as necessary to illustrate his theological and moral points.

The church leaders felt that Dunn would eventually become a liability to the church because of some investigative reporting which had been done by Lynn Packer. Mr. Packer, a nephew of Apostle Boyd Packer, at one time worked for the church’s television station, KSL. He was working with that station when the Hofmann story broke but was later fired. Packer felt that his aggressive reporting on the Hofmann affair and his earlier work on the Afco scandal played a role in his dismissal. The church simply did not want all the truth to come to light.

Although he was never indicted for any crime, Paul H. Dunn’s reputation suffered because of the Afco affair. The Wall Street Journal for Nov. 9, 1983, reported: “Paul H. Dunn . . . whose church salary is $40,000 a year, was a director of Afco Enterprises, a real-estate venture until 1978. Afco collapsed four years later; and its owner, Grant C. Affleck, was recently indicted for mail fraud, securities fraud and bankruptcy fraud. Despite Mr. Dunn’s 1978 resignation, records in the U.S. District Court civil suit here show that he continued to have ties with Afco until it entered bankruptcy proceedings in 1982. . . .”

Dunn acknowledged that those stories and others were untrue, but he defends fabrications as necessary to illustrate his theological and moral points.

He compares his stories to the parables told by Jesus acknowledging, however, that Jesus’ parables weren’t about himself . . .

Other Mormon leaders apparently were concerned about this in September 1989, because, within weeks of investigating allegations that his war and sports stories were fabricated, they quietly placed Dunn, 66, on “emeritus” status “for health reasons.”

As a “general authority” since 1964, Dunn had been among the top 90 men who govern the 7.3 million-member worldwide church.

The church also pressured Salt Lake City freelance writer Lynn Packer, a Mormon, not to publish stories about Dunn’s fabrications. In the fall, after the church had terminated Packer’s teaching contract at Brigham Young University for pursuing the story, he provided information he has collected over the past four years to The Republic.

Despite Dunn’s “retirement,” his grandfatherly demeanor and down-home, self-deprecating storytelling style continue to make him a popular public speaker and author.
He also remains the most prolific author among current and former church leaders. He receives royalties from 23 inspirational cassette tapes and 28 books. They are among the more popular items in LDS bookstores.

Dunn said he doesn’t consider it deceitful to exaggerate or alter facts.

He said his technique is to “combine” elements of several true stories to create a single story that will better convey a message and capture an audience’s interest. . . .

“The combining of stories seems justifiable in terms of illustrating a point. My motives are pure and innocent,” Dunn said during an interview in Salt Lake City attended by his attorney and a friend.

“I haven’t purposely tried to embellish or rewrite history. I’ve tried to illustrate points that would create interest,” Dunn explained. “Combining war stories is simply putting history in little finer packages.” . . . Dunn’s retirement occurred within two weeks of the probe into his storytelling practices by top church officials, who had been given copies of Packer’s findings.

Dunn said he cooperated with the church’s investigation but was not advised of its conclusions. He denied that it was connected to his retirement, which he insisted was for poor health that has since improved. . . . the university [Brigham Young University] terminated Packer’s teaching contract, in part because he wanted to publish a story about his findings.

(Arizona Republic, February 16, 1991)

On February 21, 1991, the Salt Lake Tribune ran an Associated Press article by Vern Anderson which contained the following:

Lynn Packer was serving a Mormon mission in Germany in 1964 when he heard 39-year-old Paul H. Dunn had been appointed to the church’s hierarchy. . . . it was Packer’s relentless pursuit of Dunn over most of the 1980s that led to Saturday’s revelation by The Arizona Republic: the church man had fabricated many of the personal and war baseball stories that had fed his reputation as the faith’s most spellbinding speaker and popular author. . . .

Packer himself paid a high professional price for the research on Dunn . . . .

He ultimately lost his teaching position at church-owned Brigham Young University and today, working on a one-year contract at the University of Dortmund in Germany, feels beaten “to a pulp.”

Why did the story that Republic reporter Richard Robertson calls “the worst-kept secret in Salt Lake” take so long to come out?

The answer appears to lie in the church’s effort to avoid a scandal and in Packer’s own vulnerability as a BYU employee without tenure whose wife had been diagnosed with cancer early in 1987.

The combination led, on Sept. 30, 1987, to a “deal” between Packer and a “high church official” in which he withdrew the story he had submitted to United Press International in exchange for a guarantee of continued employment at BYU, according to Packer.

Packer declined to identify the official, but has told others it was his uncle, Elder Boyd K. Packer of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles.

“Lynn claims he had an agreement with his uncle through his father,” said BYU spokesman Paul Richards. “That the agreement fell apart when he continued to ask questions about Paul Dunn. When he continued to ask questions, Elder Packer felt he had not been true to the agreement.”

Through spokesman Jerry Cahill, Boyd Packer said Wednesday, “There was nothing ever stated. It never happened. There was no such agreement that Lynn Packer would be retained in exchange for no publication.”

In 1986, Lynn Packer . . . decided to freelance a story on Dunn’s involvement with AFCO Enterprises . . . the biggest real estate development in Utah history.

Dunn . . . claimed his tenure as an AFCO director had ended in 1978; Packer sought to prove it had lasted much longer. He also began looking at the veracity of Dunn’s stories . . .

“There isn’t a single significant baseball or war story I could find that was true,” said Packer, who in September 1987 complied under pressure with a BYU administrative request that he inform the church of his allegations. . . . Packer’s department chairman at BYU, Gordon Whiting, told him in a memo dated Sept. 30, 1987, that he should permit church leaders to deal privately with the Dunn matter.

“After providing the information, we accept the judgment of those responsible. We will not take accusations against a General Authority to the media,” Whiting wrote, adding that publication “will damage the church, will damage the university and will damage you.”

Fearing for his job, Packer agreed to the deal he said was offered him that night: don’t publish the story and you can teach at BYU as long as you want.

Packer bridles at suggestions by BYU officials that he was using coercion.

“They can never give you a time or a place when I went to anybody with that story and said, ‘Do this for me or else,’ he said. And I can show you the times and places and dates when they told it just the opposite: ‘Do the story and you’re history.’

Packer maintains that Elders James E. Faust and David B. Haight, Dunn’s immediate superiors in the Quorum of the Twelve, were aware of the arrangement. Like Boyd K. Packer, the pair declined to be interviewed, but denied through spokesman Bruce Olsen there was any deal. . . .

And yet, in a memo to church spokesman Richard Lindsay after the alleged deal was struck, Packer wrote: “I had received assurances, prior to my decision, that my job at BYU would be secure for the indefinite future if I withdrew the story.”

At BYU, Whiting decided in early 1988 not to renew Packer’s contract for the 1988-89 school year . . . .

“I thought the decision was mine to make,” Whiting said. After Packer completed his teaching duties in August 1990, he was given a year’s salary as severance pay, a move that surprised Whiting since it didn’t come out of his departmental budget.

“I think it probably looks to many people . . . like an effort to bribe him not to go with the Paul Dunn story,” Whiting said. . . .

For his part, Whiting said he was pained by ‘the degree to which the university has been pulled into this situation. And I guess I’m also pained at the church being pulled in.

But the church will have to fend for itself and do what it can to rescue its reputation for honesty and integrity. (Salt Lake Tribune, February 21, 1991)

Brigham Young University’s student newspaper, The Daily Universe, carried the story concerning Paul Dunn but later reported there was some strong opposition to the publication of material “which proved to be embarrassing to such a well-liked leader”:

. . . several communications students indicated they were stunned by the number of people they encountered who thought there should not have been any coverage of the information. One writer was even physically hit by someone who objected to the newspaper’s coverage. (The Daily Universe, February 21, 1991)
Paul Dunn’s war stories are even more fantastic than his claims concerning his baseball career. In the Mormon Church’s publication, New Era, August 1975, Mr. Dunn related some of his experiences. In this article we find the following:

A testimony was born . . . I’ve had verification upon verification that this church is true, that Joseph Smith was called and ordained to restore the gospel of Jesus Christ . . . Before I went into combat experience, I had . . . a patriarchal blessing given to me . . . that patriarchal blessing stated in a number of paragraphs that I would live . . . to a ripe old age . . . And one of the paragraphs indicated divine intervention in time of combat.

Now there were 1,000 of us in my combat team who left San Francisco on that fateful journey, and there were six of us who came back 2 1/2 years later. How do you like that for odds! And of the six of us, five had been severely wounded two or more times and had been sent back into the line as replacements. There had been literally thousands of incidents where I should have been taken from the earth by the enemy and for some reason was not. (New Era, August 1975, page 7)

Paul Dunn went on to relate that on one occasion his squad was caught behind enemy lines and took refuge in “a deep shell hole.” The situation was such that they could not spend the night there and were forced to flee through enemy fire. His companions asked him to “lead them in prayer” before they made their attempt to escape. We find the following on page 8 of the article in the New Era:

Well, the zero minute came, and we shook hands, and you never saw 11 men scamper like that before . . . Three or four of the others didn’t get above the surface of the ground; they were cut down with machine guns. One of my good friends was almost cut in two with a burst. . . . A thousand such incidents happened to me in two years of combat experience.

Richard Robertson commented as follows concerning Paul Dunn’s sensational claims:

Elder Paul H. Dunn’s exaggerated stories mention that he:

• Was the sole survivor among 11 infantrymen in a 100-yard race against death, during which one burst of machinegun fire ripped his right boot off, another tore off his ammunition and canteen belt and yet another split his helmet in half—all without wounding him. . . .

“A TANGLED WEB”

In his book, You and Your World, page 96, Paul Dunn told of “a priests adviser” he had when he was sixteen years old. According to Mr. Dunn, this man had a great influence on him “for good”:

We had a wonderful class. . . . as I went to leave . . . he said, “Now listen very carefully and I will teach you one that you’ll always remember.” He said, “Oh, what a tangled web we weave, when first we practice to deceive.” I’ve never forgotten it.

On page 24 of the same book, Mr. Dunn taught that “honesty” does not always bring “material reward.” He warned, however, that “Envy, dishonesty, and unfairness — all of these are excess baggage, and as such are not worth what it costs to carry them with us.”

Unfortunately, Paul Dunn did not follow the teachings found in his book and became entangled in his own web. His baseball stories, for example, provide ample evidence of his deceitful methods. In his tape, World War II Experiences, which we obtained at the Mormon Church’s Deseret Bookstore, Paul Dunn boasted: “I used to play with [the] Saint Louis Cardinals. That’s true.” In his book, You and Your World, page 128, we find this statement: “I used to play baseball with the St. Louis Cardinals. Now, it takes a lot of preparation to become a big league ball-player.”

In 1973, the church’s Deseret Book Company published a book by Paul Dunn entitled, Discovering the Quality of Success. On page 33 of that book, Mr. Dunn wrote that he went back to school “after five years of professional baseball...” In the Deseret News 1977 Church Almanac, page 74, we read that Dunn “played professional baseball for four years.”

Paul Dunn was obviously using his baseball stories to increase his popularity and to sell more of his books and tapes. The reader will remember that we have cited Lynn Packer as saying, “There isn’t a single significant baseball or war story I could find that was true . . .” Richard R. Robertson gave this information about the matter:

Dunn’s baseball stories are as legendary as his war stories. He has written and told audiences that he signed a contract to play for the St. Louis Cardinals after graduation from high school. . . . But in truth, Dunn never played a game for the St. Louis Cardinals or any major-league team.

The closest he came was playing six weeks “off-roster” in several practice and exhibition games in 1942 for the Pocatello (Idaho) Cardinals, a St. Louis Cardinal farm team. He was cut.

Baseball records show that Dunn signed a professional player contract in 1947 with the Ontario Orioles, in California’s “Class C” Sunset League. But he practiced only a few weeks, played only in the first regular game and then was released. (Arizona Republic, February 16, 1991)

It is obvious, then, that Paul Dunn was never a major-league player nor did he have four or five years experience as a “professional” baseball player. In the article from the Arizona Republic, we find this information: “In the case of his false claim to have played for the St. Louis Cardinals, he said youngsters can relate better to a major-league team than to the farm teams for which he briefly played.”
• Was one of only six in his 1,000-man combat group who survived, and was the only one of the six who wasn’t wounded.

He has since acknowledged that only 30 soldiers in his unit died during the entire war, but he said the exaggeration of numbers is unimportant. (Arizona Republic, February 16, 1991)

Another one of Paul Dunn’s “exaggerated stories” which Richard Robertson mentions in his article in the Arizona Republic is his account of how he “Miraculously survived being run over by an enemy tank, while others were crushed.” We will have more to say about this in our new book—What Hast Thou Dunn?

One of Paul Dunn’s most stirring tales is the story of the death of his good friend Harold Brown. It is found in Mr. Dunn’s tape-recorded message, World War II Experiences. Dunn claimed that on the night of May 11, 1945, Brown, who was “50 to 75 yards” away, was wounded by a shell which landed in his foxhole:

Well, it commenced to get daylight about 5:30 . . . I scampered over to the hole where he was, and it had almost filled up from the rain and . . . it’s all he could do to hold his head out of the water to stay alive. . . . Well, I pulled him out of that muddy hole and got him up on seemingly dry ground, and took off his helmet, loosened the bandoleers around his neck . . . to give him what comfort you can under those conditions and I took a clean canteen of water and washed his face. It was caked with mud and blood. How in the world he lived that night I don’t know. I counted, after his death, 67 shrapnel wounds in him, some large enough to where you could put your whole hand in. And yet, somehow, he had held on, but I found out why. As he lay there, his head limp back in my lap, he said, “Paul, I know this is the end,” and I’d say, “Harold, it isn’t. Just hold on. I’ll get you out of this . . .” “No, this is the end.” . . . He said, “I’ve held on as long as I could, cause I want you to do two things for me if you would.” “Why, I says, you just name it. It’ll be done.” . . .

He said, “If you ever live through this terrible ordeal, will you somehow get word to my mother . . . Will you assure her that I was faithful to the end in the principles she taught me. . . . Will you do it, Paul?” Gosh, would I do it! How thrilled I was to give him what comfort you can under those conditions.

And he said . . . “If you ever have an opportunity . . . to talk to the young people of America, will you tell them for me that it’s a privilege to lay down my life for them.” Now, with that testimony on his lips, he died, as did thousands like him in that night I don’t know. I counted, after his death, 67 shrapnel wounds in him, some large enough to where you could put your whole hand in. And yet, somehow, he had held on, but I found out why. As he lay there, his head limp back in my lap, he said, “Paul, I know this is the end,” and I’d say, “Harold, it isn’t. Just hold on. I’ll get you out of this . . .” “No, this is the end.” . . . He said, “I’ve held on as long as I could, cause I want you to do two things for me if you would.” “Why, I says, you just name it. It’ll be done.” . . .

Unfortunately, this moving story by Paul Dunn is only a fabrication. Richard Robertson revealed the following:

One of Dunn’s most dramatic embellished stories . . . is about the combat death of his closest wartime buddy, Harold Lester Brown. . . .

The problem with the story, Packer discovered, is that Brown didn’t die on Okinawa.

In fact, he hasn’t died yet.

Brown said from his home in Odessa, Mo., that he was perplexed by Dunn’s story.

“Maybe he got me mixed up with someone else,” Brown speculated, although he noted that he and Dunn have stayed in contact since the war—even visiting occasionally . . .

Dunn never has mentioned the story to him, he said.

Dunn didn’t get mixed up. It’s another one of those stories he “combined,” he said.

He said he based the story loosely on the death of another soldier, Phillip Cocroft, who was mortally wounded in a mortar attack that Dunn said he witnessed.

Cocroft didn’t live through the night or die in his arms, Dunn admitted.

Military records confirm that Cocroft died on Okinawa on May 15, 1945.

“I came home many months later, talking to kids in a teaching situation,” Dunn said. “All I did was take Harold Brown’s relationship (with me) and combine it with Ralph [sic] Cocroft’s dying.”

Once he had told the fabricated version of the story, Dunn said, he couldn’t change it.

“Rather than go back and change something where it would be deceitful, I just kept it the same,” he explained. (Arizona Republic, February 17, 1991)

Since Phillip Cocroft “didn’t live through the night or die in his [Dunn’s] arms,” this part of the story could not have applied to him. The tale certainly could not relate to Harold Brown because he is still alive. Moreover, Paul Dunn’s claim that “the very day I got back in this country, before going to my own home, I took a plane back to Missouri and reported to that dedicated family” the details of his friend’s courageous death has to be erroneous. According to the Arizona Republic, Harold Brown lives in Missouri. It seems impossible to believe, however, that Dunn would give a false report concerning Brown’s death to his family. While there may be some details in the story that are true—e.g., there was a war in 1945; Paul Dunn fought in that war; many soldiers were killed—all of the important parts of the tale concerning how God miraculously preserved a soldier with “67 shrapnel wounds” so that Paul Dunn could take an important message concerning patriotism “to the young people of America” have been fabricated.

CHANGING NAMES

While Paul Dunn would have us believe that his motives for telling these tall tales were pure, a careful examination of this whole matter does not tend to exonerate him. The Salt Lake Tribune, February 17, 1991, quoted the following from an apologetic statement made by Mr. Dunn: “I have on some occasions changed the names of people involved to provide confidentiality . . .” This statement does not explain his use of the name “Harold Brown” in his story concerning patriotism. Paul Dunn claims that it was actually “Phillip Cocroft” who died on “the island of Okinawa.” Since Cocroft was dead, there would be no reason to protect his confidentiality. It would appear, then, that if Mr. Dunn was trying “to provide confidentiality,” it would have been with regard to the fact that his story was spurious.

In the same statement quoted above, Paul Dunn wrote: “. . . I have never intended to mislead or to aggrandize my own circumstances, and I regret that such an impression may have been given” (Ibid.). Mr. Dunn’s claim that he has not attempted to “mislead” the public is absolutely incredible. One would wonder what he thinks the word “mislead” means. If he was not misleading people, what was he doing?
His statement that he did not intend “to aggrandize my own circumstances” is just as puzzling. It is obvious that his stories concerning his participation in professional baseball and his exaggerated yarns concerning World War II were given to make him more popular and consequently increased the sales of his books and tapes. Furthermore, Paul Dunn has been promoting a new business called “Sports-Values Training Centers.” In his article in the Arizona Republic, Richard Robertson observed that Dunn was “Relying partly on his reputation as a former professional athlete” in setting up this business. It is very doubtful that his tape, World War II Experiences, which is marketed by Covenant Communications, Inc., would have sold so many copies if Mr. Dunn had told only the truth.

Since the evidence against Paul Dunn is so devastating, one would think that the Mormon Church would have immediately stopped all sales of his books at their bookstores. Instead, however, they continued to sell Dunn’s books and tapes. On March 18, 1991, we went to an outlet of the church’s Deseret Bookstore in Salt Lake City and found a large display of tapes and books by Paul Dunn. We bought both books and tapes from the church’s bookstore for our research regarding Dunn’s fabrications. One of the tapes we bought was World War II Experiences. We were especially surprised to find the church still making a profit on a tape which had been so completely discredited.

The First Presidency of the Mormon Church has issued a statement which commends Paul Dunn for the “sacrifices he and his family have made, often at the cost of their own comfort and health.” This same statement maintains that Mr. Dunn was given emeritus status “In consideration of factors of age and health” and skirts around the issue of Dunn’s honesty by saying: “We have no way of fully or finally verifying the accuracy or inaccuracy of the current allegations or accounts that are now under challenge” (Deseret News, February 16, 1991).

THINKING’S BEEN DONE

The leaders of the Mormon Church are often referred to as “the brethren.” The president of the church is supposed to be able to receive revelations directly from God. The LDS Church, therefore, proclaims that it is the only true church led by a “living prophet.” President Brigham Young once boasted: “The Lord Almighty leads this Church, and he will never suffer you to be led astray if you are found doing your duty. You may go home and sleep as sweetly as a babe in its mother’s arms, as to any danger of your leaders leading you astray, for if they should try to do so the Lord would quickly sweep them from the earth” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, page 289). Mormons are encouraged to put all their trust in the church authorities and try not to do their own thinking if it conflicts with what the leaders teach. The ward teachers’ message for June, 1945, made the matter very plain:

Any Latter-day Saint who denounces or opposes, whether actively or otherwise, any plan or doctrine advocated by the “prophets, seers, and revelators” of the Church is cultivating the spirit of apostasy. . . . Lucifer . . . wins a great victory when he can get members of the Church to speak against their leaders and to “do their own thinking.” . . .

When our leaders speak, the thinking has been done. When they propose a plan—it is God’s plan. When they point the way, there is no other which is safe. When they give direction, it should mark the end of controversy. (Improvement Era, June 1945, page 354)

After the General Authorities of the Mormon Church discovered that Paul H. Dunn had been deceiving the people with his stories, they decided that the matter should not be known by the membership of the church. The people, they reasoned, must not discover that a man whom they had trusted as a church leader was guilty of fabricating stories.

Some newspaper articles contained information suggesting that Mormon Apostle Boyd K. Packer was instrumental in the cover-up of the story concerning Paul Dunn. While we do not have any independent confirmation concerning these allegations, we do know that Apostle Packer believes that negative information concerning General Authorities of the LDS Church should be swept under the rug. In an article which appeared in Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1981, he warned Mormon scholars against telling too much. Apostle Packer came down hard on those who would point out the “frailties of present or past leaders” and especially warned those “who are employed by the Church” against criticizing the “brethren.” It is not surprising, then, that when Apostle Packer’s nephew, Lynn Packer, continued to pursue the story on Dunn, the church’s Brigham Young University decided to terminate his teaching contract. Richard Robertson wrote the following:

Gordon Whiting, then chairman of the BYU communications department, had warned Packer in a memo that “publication of the Paul Dunn article will damage the church, will damage the university, will damage the department and will damage you.”

Whiting acknowledged that Packer’s contract was not renewed for the 1990-91 school year in part because Packer was violating church and university policies that prohibit public criticism of church leaders, even if the criticism is true. (Arizona Republic, February 16, 1991)

Even though Paul Dunn had fabricated stories, the LDS leaders seemed to feel that it was important to suppress this information because it would hurt the testimonies of church members. Mr. Dunn’s books, speeches and tapes apparently brought many people into the church and strengthened others in their faith. An examination of Dunn’s teachings show that he continually bore witness to the divine origin of the Mormon Church. He claimed, in fact, that he had a special witness that the LDS Church is God’s true church. In his book, Discovering the Quality of Success, page 28, he wrote: “. . . this is His Church that has been restored. Some of us have been given a special witness. So while you struggle and fight and even occasionally get discouraged, have faith in those who know.” In the Preface to his book, You and Your World, Paul Dunn related that during his years “as a General Authority” he frequently bore his witness that “the true Church has been restored in this age and is guided by revelation and a living prophet.”

Now that we know that Paul Dunn fabricated his stories concerning World War II and his relationship with the St. Louis Cardinals, his testimony to Joseph Smith and the Mormon Church has a hollow ring to it. We can hardly understand why church leaders did not immediately withdraw Dunn’s tapes and books from the church’s bookstores when the truth became known. Their inability to deal firmly with this issue leads to the conclusion that they believe the end justifies the means.

DUNN LIKE SMITH?

As we look back into Mormon history we discover that the same type of deception which Paul Dunn used with regard to his stories played a very prominent role in the formation of the Mormon Church. There are, in fact, very strong parallels between Paul Dunn and Joseph Smith. For example, Paul Dunn was not concerned about the literal truth of his tales. He admitted that he did not feel that it was wrong to “combine” elements of different stories to catch the attention of his audience. He is quoted in the article in the Arizona Republic as saying: “The combining of stories seems justifiable in terms of illustrating a point.”

Paul Dunn seems to have been very impressed with Joseph Smith’s story of his First Vision and referred to it in an article published in the church’s Improvement Era, June 1970, page 70:

That beautiful spring morning in 1820, God the Father and his Son Jesus Christ revealed themselves to a young boy whose name will never perish. That boy was Joseph Smith, the first prophet of this dispensation. . . . the Spirit whispers to us, “He was indeed a prophet.”

This is a remarkable story. David O. McKay, the ninth president of the church, maintained that the First Vision is the very “foundation of this Church” (Gospel Ideals, page 85). In his book Joseph Smith—Seeker After Truth, page 19, Apostle John A. Widtsoe emphasized: “The First Vision of 1820 is of first importance in the history of Joseph Smith. Upon its reality rest the truth and value of his subsequent work.” Unfortunately for Mormon apologists, some extremely important information concerning this vision has come to light. The evidence clearly shows that the story evolved and that Joseph Smith added elements which were not in the first handwritten account of the vision.

Prior to 1965, Mormon writers always insisted that Joseph Smith “told but one story” of the First Vision (see Joseph Smith the Prophet, by Preston Nibley, 1944, page 30). This was the account dictated by Joseph Smith to his scribes in 1838-39. It was first published in the Times and Seasons in 1842 and is the official account found in the Pearl of Great Price today. In 1965, however, a much earlier handwritten account was brought to light in an unpublished Brigham Young University thesis by Paul R. Cheesman. We were convinced that this account was written by Joseph Smith and published it to the world in 1965 under the title, Joseph Smith’s Strange Account of the First Vision. Because the document contradicted the official account, some members of the church doubted its authenticity. Although the Mormon leaders would make no public statement concerning the document, Professor James B. Allen, who later became Assistant LDS Church Historian, confirmed its validity and called it “One of the most significant documents of that period yet discovered.” He went on to say that the “manuscript has apparently lain in the L.D.S. Church Historian’s office for many years, and yet few if any who saw it realized its profound historical significance” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, page 35).

The Mormon leaders suppressed this important account of the First Vision for over 130 years, but after we printed it, thousands of copies were disseminated throughout the world. Finally, four years after we printed it, Dean C. Jesse, who was “a member of the staff at the LDS Church Historian’s Office,” made a public statement confirming the authenticity of the manuscript and stating that the document was written in 1831 or 1832:

On at least three occasions prior to 1839 Joseph Smith began writing his history. The earliest of these is a six-page account recorded on three leaves of a ledger book, written between the summer of 1831 and November 1832. . . .

The 1831-32 history transliterated here contains the earliest known account of Joseph Smith’s First Vision. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, pages 277-78)

In an article printed in Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, page 462, Dean Jessee made it clear that this was not only the first extant account of the First Vision, but it was the only account in “the actual handwriting of Joseph Smith.” Below is the important part of this account taken directly from a photograph of the original document:

. . . the Lord heard my cry in the wilderness and while in the attitude of calling upon the Lord in the 16th year of my age a pillar of light above the brightness of the sun at noon day come down from above and rested upon me and I was filled with the spirit of god and the Lord opened the heavens upon me and I saw the Lord and he spake unto me saying Joseph my son thy sins are forgiven thee. go thy way walk in my statutes and keep my commandments behold I am the Lord of glory I was crucified for the world that all those who believe on my name may have Eternal life behold the world lieth in sin at this time and none doeth good no not one they have turned aside from the gospel and keep not my commandments they draw near to me with their lips while their hearts are far from me and mine anger is kindling against the inhabitants of the earth to visit them according to this ungodliness and to bring to pass that which hath been spoken by the mouth of the prophets and Apostles behold and lo I come quickly as it was written in the cloud clothed in the glory of my Father . . .

A careful examination of this document reveals why church leaders suppressed it for 130 years. While there are a number of contradictions between this account and the official account published by the church, the most serious discrepancy involves the number of personages in the vision. In the later version, which is published in the Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith related: “. . . I saw two personages.” In the first account, however, the Mormon prophet only mentions one personage: “. . . I saw the Lord . . .” The context makes it very clear that the personage was Jesus Christ and that Joseph Smith did not include God the Father in his first handwritten account of the vision. Mormon historian James B. Allen commented: “In this story, only one personage was mentioned, and this was obviously the Son, for he spoke of having been crucified” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, page 40).

In his thesis, “An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith’s Early Visions,” page 63, Paul R. Cheesman tried to excuse the fact that the account which was suppressed only mentions one personage by stating: “As he writes briefly of the vision, he does not mention the Father as being present; however, this does not indicate that He was not present.” This explanation does not seem reasonable. Actually, in the first account Joseph Smith quoted the Lord as saying more words than in the official version. If God the Father had really appeared in this vision, Joseph Smith certainly would have included this information in his first account. It is absolutely impossible for us to believe that Smith would not have mentioned the Father if he had actually appeared in the vision. The only reasonable explanation for the Father not being mentioned is that Joseph Smith did not see God the Father, and that he made up this part of the story after he wrote the first manuscript. This, of course, throws a shadow of doubt upon the entire story.

Like Paul Dunn, Joseph Smith decided that the story he had written in 1832 needed some new elements to impress people with how important the vision actually was and to bolster up his own role as a prophet of the living God. What could catch the audience’s interest better than to have both the Father and the Son come down and personally visit him? Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe was highly impressed with Joseph’s final product:
It was an extraordinary experience. Never before had God the Father and God the Son appeared to mortal man. . . . The Father and the Son appeared to Joseph as persons, like men on earth in form. . . . Two personages, the Father and the Son, stood before Joseph. . . . There was no mingling of personalities in the vision. Each of the personages was an individual member of the Godhead. Each one separately took part in the vision.

While the Bible does not have any story concerning the Father and the Son coming down in the form of two exalted men, Joseph Smith was undoubtedly familiar with the account of the transfiguration: "While he yet spake, behold, a bright cloud overshadowed them: and behold a voice out of the cloud, which said, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him" (Matthew 17:5). The first Mormon prophet must have decided that it would make his story more soul-stirring if he incorporated this element into the narrative. He, therefore, borrowed part of the story from the Biblical account:

So, in accordance with this, my determination to ask of God, I retired to the woods to make the attempt. It was on the morning . . . in the spring of eighteen hundred and twenty. . . . I saw a pillar of light exactly over my head, above the brightness of the sun . . . . I saw two personages, whose brightness and glory defy all description, standing above me in the air. One of them spake unto me, calling me by name and said, pointing to the other—This is My Beloved Son. Hear Him! . . . I asked the Personages who stood above me in the light, which of all the sects was right. . . . and which I should join.

I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt; that: "they draw near to me for doctrines the commandments of men, having a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof." (2 Timothy 4:3, 2 Peter 2:1-12).

By the time Joseph Smith wrote this altered account of the First Vision he had decided that God the Father was an exalted man. He, therefore, incorporated this new theological idea into the vision by emphasizing that he actually "saw two personages." Another element he added to the reworked version was that the vision followed a revival which had just taken place in the vicinity. Wesley P. Walters, however, has conclusively established that no such revival took place in Palmyra in 1820. The revival actually began in the fall of 1824 and continued into 1825 (see our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 156-162).

In Joseph Smith’s 1835-36 diary there are other accounts of his First Vision which tend to add to the confusion. For instance, in one account Joseph Smith told Erastus Holmes regarding his "juvenile years, say from 6 years old up to the time I received the first visitation of Angels which was when I was about 14 years old" (An American Prophet’s Record: The Diaries and Journals of Joseph Smith, 1989, page 39). The Mormon leaders were apparently embarrassed that he did not mention either the Father or the Son. Consequently, in the published History of the Church, vol. 2, page 312, it has been changed to read: "... I received my first vision, which was when I was about fourteen years old . . . ." Another account in the same diary (page 51) has Joseph Smith saying that he "saw many angels in this vision."

For a thorough examination of the many conflicting statements in Joseph Smith’s account of the First Vision see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 143-153.

It seems shocking that Joseph Smith would so drastically alter his story and then claim that it was written "in truth and righteousness" (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History 1:2). Perhaps, however, we can learn something about his way of thinking from Paul Dunn’s confession regarding the falsification of stories. Mr. Dunn seemed to feel that he was an important religious leader who had a vital message for the world. According to the article in the Arizona Republic, “he doesn’t consider it deceitful to exaggerate or alter facts.” Dunn, in fact, was quoted as saying, “The combining of stories seems justifiable in terms of illustrating a point. My motives are pure and innocent . . . .” Paul Dunn, it would appear, sees nothing wrong with recasting his stories if the modifications help people become better Mormons or more patriotic. In Mr. Dunn’s mind, therefore, the end justifies the means.

In Joseph Smith’s case, he seems to have considered himself the greatest religious leader. He claimed that God specifically chose him to restore the true church to earth. Shortly before his death in 1844, Smith boasted:

If they want a beardless boy to whip all the world, I will get up on the top of a mountain and crow like a rooster. I shall always beat them . . . . My enemies . . . think that when they have my spoke under, they will keep me down: but the fools, I will hold on and fly over them . . . . I will come out on the top at last. I have more to boast of than ever any man had. I am the only man that has ever been able to keep a whole church together since the days of Adam. A large majority of the whole have stood by me. Neither Paul, John, Peter nor Jesus ever did it. I boast that no man ever did such a work as I. The followers of Jesus ran away from Him; but the Latter-day Saints never ran away from me yet. (History of the Church, vol. 6, pages 408-409)

Like Paul Dunn, Joseph Smith modified his stories to enhance his own image. While he criticized his enemies for being dishonest, he somehow felt that he himself was above accountability. He seems, therefore, to have had no qualms about stretching his own stories. He could justify his story of the First Vision in the same way that Paul Dunn rationalized his tales. Certain elements in the story are undoubtedly true. For example, he claimed that he “retired to the woods” to seek God’s answer as to which church he should join. Since this section of the country has many trees, it seems plausible that he could have gone into the woods to pray. In fact, just before Joseph Smith prepared his first handwritten account of the vision, he informed his wife in a letter from Greenville, Indiana, that he had "visited a grove" and had called upon God in “pray[er].” He claimed that he “Shed tears of sorrow for my folly in Suc[cer]ing the adversary of my Soul to have so much power over me,” but went on to state that “God . . . has fo[r]given my Sins . . . .” (Letter by Joseph Smith, dated June 6, 1832; see photographs of pages from this letter in The Personal Writings of Joseph Smith, pages 240-241)

It is interesting to note that this letter contains similarities to Joseph Smith’s earliest account of his First Vision which was written sometime between July 20 and Nov. 27 of the same year (1832). In both cases, Joseph Smith was convicted of his sins and went out in the woods to pray. He diligently sought the Lord and obtained forgiveness of his sins. In the letter he stated that he felt that “God . . . has fo[r]given my Sins . . . .” In his initial account of the First Vision Joseph Smith claimed that the Lord said, “Joseph my son thy sins are forgiven thee.”

The 1832 account, of course, maintains that Jesus Christ appeared to Joseph Smith. Fawn Brodie, however, felt that this might “have been the elaboration of some half-remembered dream stimulated by the early revival excitement and reinforced... by the rich folklore of visions circulating in his neighborhood” (No Man Knows My History, page 25). She also felt, however, that the presence of deity could have been “sheer invention.” Joseph Smith was certainly not the only one claiming a vision of Christ. In 1816 a minister by the name of Elias Smith wrote a book in which he told how he “went into the woods . . . a light appeared to shine from heaven . . . The Lamb once slain appeared to my understanding . . .” (The Life, Conversion, Preaching, Travels, and Sufferings of Elias Smith, by himself, vol. 1, pages 58-59). Eight years before Joseph Smith wrote his account of the First Vision (March 1, 1824), Alexander Campbell noted that, “Enthusiasm flourishes . . . This man was regenerated when asleep, by a vision of the night. That man heard a voice in the woods, saying, ‘Thy sins be forgiven thee.’ A third saw his Saviour descending to the tops of the trees at noon day” (The Christian Baptist, 1955 reprint, vol. 1, page 148).

Joseph Smith could have decided to incorporate a vision of Christ which someone else had into his own story about obtaining forgiveness for his sins in the woods. This, of course, would be the same type of method which Paul Dunn used. If Smith had actually seen the Lord over a decade earlier, he undoubtedly would have published that fact to the world. As far as we know, no one, including his own family, seemed to know anything about his claim that he saw Jesus in the woods.

In his 1838-39 account of the First Vision, Joseph Smith added additional elements into the story. As we have mentioned before, he linked the First Vision, which he claimed took place in 1820, to a revival which actually occurred in 1824-25. While the revival is an historical fact, Smith’s claim that it took place before the vision and that the dissension which accompanied the revival caused him to ask the Lord which church was right plainly shows that he was fabricating the story.

In the 1838-39 account of the First Vision, Joseph Smith added that when he asked the Lord which of the churches was right, he was told that he “must join none of them, for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt . . .” This idea is very similar to a revelation which Asa Wild claimed to have received many years earlier. It was published in the Wayne Sentinel—the paper to which the family of Joseph Smith apparently subscribed—on October 22, 1823:

It seemed as if my mind . . . was struck motionless . . . before the awful and glorious majesty of the Great Jehovah. . . . He also told me, that every denomination of professing Christians had become extremely corrupt . . . He told me further, that he had raised up, and was now raising up, that class of persons signified by the Angel mentioned by the Revelator, xiv. 6, 7, which flew in the midst of heaven; having the everlasting gospel to preach . . . he said that all the different denominations of professing Christians, constituted the New Testament Babylon . . .

We have already noted that Joseph Smith probably appropriated the words “This is my beloved Son . . . hear . . . him” from the account of the transfiguration found in Matthew 17:5. The most sensational addition, however, was that God the Father was actually physically present with Jesus Christ. There cannot be the slightest doubt that Joseph Smith slipped this part of the story in to promote his more recent theological views concerning God.

Marvin S. Hill, professor of American history at the church’s Brigham Young University, tried to defend the idea that Joseph Smith had a religious experience in the grove, but he had to admit that Joseph Smith’s official 1838-39 account has some real problems. He, in fact, suggested that the 1832 account of the vision was probably more accurate official account and that Joseph Smith may have changed his theological views concerning God:

It seems to me that everybody has approached the issue from the wrong end, by starting with the 1838 official version when the account they should be considering is that of 1832. Merely on the face of it, the 1832 version stands a better chance of being more accurate and unembellished than the 1838 account . . . I am inclined to agree that the religious turmoil that Joseph described which led to some family members joining the Presbyterians and to much sectarian bitterness does not fit well into the 1820 context detailed by Backman. . . . An 1824 revival creates problems for the 1838 account, not that of 1832. . . . If Joseph Smith in 1838 read back into 1820 some details of a revival that occurred in 1824, there is no reason to conclude that he invented his religious experiences. . . . If initially Joseph said one personage came to him in 1820, it became easier for Oliver Cowdery to confuse this visit with the coming of Moroni than it would have been a few years later when Joseph taught emphatically that there were three separate personages in the Godhead. . . . It seems to me that if the Latter-day Saints can accept the idea that Joseph gained his full understanding of the nature of God only after a period of time, instead of its emerging fullblown in 1820, then most of the difficulties with chronology can be resolved. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1982, pages 39-40)

Since the Mormon Church has canonized the 1838-39 account of the First Vision in the Pearl of Great Price, it is doubtful that the church will follow Professor Hill’s suggestion concerning giving “priority to the 1832 account” of the vision. At any rate, Thomas G. Alexander, who is also a professor at the church’s Brigham Young University, has also suggested that a theological shift in Joseph Smith’s view concerning the Godhead caused him to change his story from one to two personages (see Line Upon Line, edited by Gary James Bergera, 1989, page 54)

Joseph Smith did not hesitate to add new elements into his stories and often altered or deleted things that did not fit his current ideas. For example, he changed the name of the angel who was supposed to have appeared to him and revealed where the gold plates of the Book of Mormon were deposited. In the Elder’s Journal for July 1838, page 42, Joseph Smith gave the angel’s name as “Moroni.” Four years later, however, when he published his history in the Times and Seasons, the Mormon prophet changed his mind. He decided that the angel was really named “Nephi”: “He called me by name, and said unto me that he was a messenger sent from the presence of God to me, and that his name was Nephi” (Times and Seasons, April 15, 1842, page 753). In the original 1851 edition of the Pearl of Great Price, the name was also given as “Nephi”:

He called me by name and said unto me, that he was a messenger sent from the presence of God to me, and that his name was Nephi. (Pearl of Great Price, 1851 edition, page 41)

In current printings of the Pearl of Great Price, however, the name of the angel appears as “Moroni”:

He called me by name, and said unto me that he was a messenger sent from the presence of God to me, and that his name was Moroni;
The original handwritten manuscript dictated by Joseph Smith reveals that the name was originally written as “Nephi,” but that someone at a later date has written the word “Moroni” above the line. In our new book, Flaws in the Pearl of Great Price we present evidence to prove this change was made after Joseph Smith’s death.

Joseph Smith not only changed his stories concerning his visitations from deity and angels, but he also went so far as to alter the revelations which he claimed he received directly from the Lord and dictated to his scribes (see photographic proof in our book, Major Problems of Mormonism, pages 106-121). In a revelation which now appears as Section 27 of the Doctrine and Covenants, Joseph Smith added over 400 words.

AN EXTENSIVE FORGERY

In Major Problems of Mormonism, pages 82-91, we demonstrate that after Joseph Smith’s death, Brigham Young and the other early leaders of the Mormon Church followed the same deceptive path. They, in fact, committed one of the most extensive forgeries we have ever encountered. This was what they claimed was the History of the Church, by Joseph Smith himself. As early as 1965 we questioned whether Joseph Smith was really the author of such a voluminous work—about 2,200 handwritten pages. We suggested, in fact, that large portions were probably derived from other sources and changed to the first person to make it appear that Joseph Smith was the author. This, of course, is the type of thing that Paul Dunn was guilty of—e.g., attributing important patriotic remarks to Harold Brown which Brown did not utter.

It is interesting to note that in his book, You and Your World, page 16, Dunn pointed to the History of the Church as one of the great achievements of Joseph Smith:

He . . . wrote like Paul . . . His writings, letters, and spoken words are so extensive that it seems almost impossible that one man could do so much in so little time. . . . his own history, speeches, and minutes total over 3,200 pages.

In any case, after we published our theory that Joseph Smith never finished his History, Mormon scholars were completely silent concerning the matter for six years. In 1971, however, Dean C. Jessee, of the Mormon Church Historian’s Office published the startling admission that Joseph Smith did not actually finish his History of the Church before his death on June 27, 1844. Mr. Jessee revealed:

Not until Willard Richards was appointed secretary to Joseph Smith was any significant progress made on the History. . . . At the time of Joseph Smith’s death, the narrative was written to August 5, 1838. . . .

By February 4, 1846, the day the books were packed for the journey west, the History had been completed to March 1, 1843. . . . resumption of work on the History occurred on “Dec. 1, 1853 [when] Dr. Willard Richards wrote one line of History being sick at the time—and was never able to do any more.” . . .

The remainder of Joseph Smith’s History of the Church from March 1, 1843 to August 8, 1844, was completed under the direction of George A. Smith. . . .

The Joseph Smith History was finished in August 1856, seventeen years after it was begun. (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, pages 466, 469, 470, 472)

Dean C. Jessee frankly admitted that the manuscript was only completed to page 812 at the time of Joseph Smith’s death (Ibid., page 457). Since there were almost 2,200 pages, this would mean that over sixty percent of Joseph Smith’s History was not compiled during his lifetime! In an article published in the Journal of Mormon History, Dean Jessee conceded that the bizarre editorial procedures used by the leaders of his church in creating Joseph Smith’s History had a “distorting effect” on the work:

The format gives the impression that the history was written personally by Joseph Smith. A study of original documents, however, shows that much of its content was not the actual product of the Prophet’s mind . . . One notes a marked difference in style between those entries in the History that reflect Joseph Smith’s own thought and those that are the creation of his scribes. . . . since Joseph Smith’s diary did not provide an unbroken narrative of his life, gaps were bridged by using other sources, changing indirect discourse to direct as if Joseph had done the writing himself . . . by transferring other people’s words and thoughts to Joseph Smith, this editorial method produced a distorting effect for those who would study his personality from his personal writings. (Journal of Mormon History, vol. 3, page 37)

In Major Problems of Mormonism, pages 85-88, we show that two of Joseph Smith’s most famous prophecies printed in his History—the prophecy that the Mormons would become “a mighty people in the midst of the Rocky Mountains” and the predictions concerning Steven A. Douglas—were actually fraudulently created after his death in an attempt to glorify Joseph Smith’s prophetic ability.

While many Mormons are disgusted with Paul Dunn’s pious forgeries, if they will take a closer look at their own history, they will find that Dunn’s methods are exactly like those used by Joseph Smith, Brigham Young and others who helped establish the LDS Church. The only difference between Dunn and these leaders is that they depended on these methods to a far greater extent. The idea that “the end justifies the means,” of course, falls far short of the Biblical standard. Colossians 3:9 admonishes: “Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds;” and James 3:14 affirms that we should “lie not against the truth.”

More information concerning the Dunn affair and its implications for members of the Mormon Church will be found in our new publication—What Hast Thou Dunn?

A CONTROVERSIAL BOOK

In 1852, the First Presidency of the Mormon Church authorized Apostle Orson Pratt “to write and Publish Periodicals, Pamphlets, Books, &c., illustrative of the principles and doctrines of the Church...” Pratt’s publication, The Seer, printed in 1853-54, soon stirred up a hornet’s nest when he revealed a great deal concerning the Mormon doctrine of plural marriage. Pratt maintained that both God the Father and his Son Jesus Christ were polygamists and that the Virgin Mary was “the lawful wife of God” (see pages 158, 159, 172). In 1990, Eborn Books published a limited photo-reprint of The Seer together with an index. It is nicely done in a hardback binding and originally sold for $49.95. Fortunately, we were able to obtain 50 copies.
In our new book, Flaws in the Pearl of Great Price, we have compiled some very important information concerning the Pearl of Great Price, a book accepted by members of the Mormon Church as inspired scripture. It is, in fact, one of the four standard works of the church. Since most of the material contained in the Pearl of Great Price was supposed to have been given to the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith by divine revelation, it is considered more accurate than the Bible. The “Book of Moses,” contained in the first part of the Pearl of Great Price, purports to give an account of the Creation which God originally gave to Moses and later revealed to Joseph Smith. In the 1965 printing of Commentary on the Pearl of Great Price, by George Reynolds and Janne M. Sjodahl, page xi, we read:

“We need go no further in our research than to compare the story of the Creation of the earth and Man, and the history thereof down to the time of the Flood as it appears in the Book of Genesis (Old Testament) with these same writings, unimpaired or unmarred by the incidents of time, contained in the Pearl of Great Price, the Writings of Moses. At first they both were the same; the one (Genesis) effaced by the wisdom and carelessness of men, the other as it was revealed by God through the Prophet Joseph Smith.

The second part of the Pearl of Great Price contains the “Book of Abraham.” It was supposed to have been written on papyrus by Abraham himself about 4,000 years ago! According to Mormon officials, this same papyrus fell into Joseph Smith’s hands and he began translating it in 1835.

The Pearl of Great Price also contains Joseph Smith’s “inspired” translation of a portion of the book of Matthew, his own story concerning how God the Father and his Son Jesus Christ appeared to him, and how an angel from God revealed that some gold plates were buried near his home. Smith “translated” these plates and published the contents under the title, The Book of Mormon. The Pearl of Great Price concludes with Joseph Smith’s “Articles of Faith.”

The Pearl of Great Price was first published in book form in 1851 by Apostle Franklin D. Richards. Prior to Richard’s compilation, portions of the text he used had been published in early Mormon publications. In 1880, the Pearl of Great Price was canonized and at that time became one of the four standard works of the church.

“DRAMATICALLY CHANGED”

One of the problems relating to the Pearl of Great Price is the serious changes that have appeared in the text since it was published in 1851. Like Paul Dunn’s stories, new elements have been added to the text which were not in the original handwritten manuscript when it was first dictated. The portion of the Pearl of Great Price which has had the most drastic alterations made in it is the “Book of Moses.” The Book of Moses is actually only a part of a far larger work known as the “Inspired Version” of the Bible. Mormon Apostle Bruce R. McConkie stressed that the Inspired Version was given to Joseph Smith by revelation:

In consequence, at the command of the Lord and while acting under the spirit of revelation, the Prophet corrected, revised, altered, added to, and deleted from the King James Version of the Bible to form what is now commonly referred to as the inspired Version of the Bible. . . . The first 151 verses of the Old Testament, down to Genesis 6:13, are published as the Book of Moses in the Pearl of Great Price. But as restored by the Prophet the true rendition contains about 400 verses and a wealth of new doctrinal knowledge and historical data. . . . the marvelous flood of light and knowledge revealed through the Inspired Version of the Bible is one of the great evidences of the divine mission of Joseph Smith. (Mormon Doctrine, 1979, pages 383-384)

Actually, the Inspired Version of the Bible has been the source of much embarrassment for the Mormon Church leaders. It was never published during Joseph Smith’s lifetime. In fact, his wife, Emma, retained the manuscript and would not give it to Willard Richards, who had been sent by Brigham Young to obtain it (see History of the Church, vol. 7, page 260). Mormon Church leaders were never able to obtain the original manuscripts of the Inspired Version from Joseph Smith’s widow. She, in fact, turned them over to the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints—an offshoot of the Mormon Church. This was a great blow to the Mormon leaders because they considered the Reorganized Church to be an “apostate” organization.

To the chagrin of the Mormon leaders, in 1867 the Reorganized Church published Joseph Smith’s Inspired Version of the Bible. Brigham Young was very opposed to the idea of members of his church receiving the Revision from an “apostate” organization. Apostle Orson Pratt, on the other hand, wanted to accept it, and this caused some conflict with President Young.

After the Inspired Version was published by the Reorganized Church, it became obvious that there were serious discrepancies between it and the chapters the Mormon Church had published in 1851 in the Pearl of Great Price. According to James R. Harris, of the Mormon Church’s Brigham Young University, Brigham Young felt that the Reorganized Church’s publication was fraudulent: “The minutes of the School of the Prophets indicate that President Brigham Young regarded the Revision ‘spurious’ and that he brought Elder Pratt to some level of agreement with his position” (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1968, page 374, n. 23). President Young, on the other hand, had “high regard” for the first edition of the Pearl of Great Price (see The Story of the Pearl of Great Price, by James R. Clark, page 205). After President Young passed away, the church leaders completely repudiated his ideas concerning the accuracy of these books, for they changed the text of the Pearl of Great Price to agree with the Reorganized Church’s printing of the Inspired Version. In his M. A. thesis, written at Brigham Young University in 1958, James R. Harris acknowledged that “every major change in the American edition [i.e., the 1878 edition of the Pearl of Great Price] appears in identical form in the Inspired Revision” (“A Study of the Changes in the Contents of the Book of Moses From the Earliest Available Sources to the Current Edition,” typed copy, page 225).

The fact that the Mormon Church leaders changed the text of the Pearl of Great Price to agree with the Inspired Version indicates that they felt the “apostate” Reorganized Church had a more accurate version of the scriptures than they did! They, therefore, put more trust in the publication by the Reorganized Church than they did in the word of President Brigham Young, the second Prophet, Seer and Revelator of the church. It is rather interesting to note that Brigham Young died in 1877, and before a year had passed the new altered edition of the Pearl of Great Price...
Price was published. It is also significant that Orson Pratt, the apostle who disagreed with President Young over the accuracy of the Inspired Revision, was the editor of the 1878 edition.

In any case, in his M. A. thesis, James R. Harris freely admitted that the text of the Pearl of Great Price was “drastically” altered in 1878:

Orson Pratt was the Editor of the first American edition of the Pearl of Great Price . . . The American edition was more drastically changed than any previous publication by a member of the Church. (‘A Study of the Changes in the Contents of the Book of Moses . . . typed copy, page 226)

From the standpoint of omissions and additions of words, the American Edition is the most spectacular rendition. . . . Some of the words added to the American edition had impressive doctrinal implications. (Ibid., pages 224-225)

Although James R. Harris admits that serious changes were made in the Pearl of Great Price, he feels that Joseph Smith himself made the changes in manuscripts he worked on before his death. In other words, he believes that when the Mormon leaders changed the text of the Pearl of Great Price in 1878, they were bringing it into conformity with changes Joseph Smith made in the manuscripts during his lifetime. Richard P. Howard, Church Historian for the Reorganized Church, has released information which gives support to Dr. Harris’ idea. Howard, who has had access to the original manuscripts, shows that there were a number of different manuscripts involved in the production of the Inspired Version of the Bible and that Joseph Smith often revised his own revisions and left the manuscripts in a very confused state:

Many texts reveal that the process was not some kind of automatic verbal or visual revelatory experience on the part of Joseph Smith. He often caused a text to be written in one form and later reworded his initial revision. The manuscripts in some cases show a considerable time lapse between such reconsiderations . . .

A considerable number of places in NT #2 [as Mr. Howard now numbers the manuscripts] show that initially Joseph Smith considered certain texts in the King James Version to be either correct or in need of slight revision, but that on later consideration he decided to amend them further. Since the manuscript pages were already written and filled to the extent that the later corrections could not be included, the problem was solved by writing the text out on a scrap of paper and pinning or sewing it to the appropriate manuscript page. (Restoration Scriptures: A Study of Their Textual Development, 1969, pages 93, 96)

Therefore OT #3 represents a third draft manuscript of . . . Genesis 1-7, a second draft manuscript of Genesis 8-24:42a, and a first draft manuscript of the remainder of the Old Testament, although revised considerably by interpolations written in later years between the lines and on separate scraps of paper pinned to the manuscript pages. (Ibid., page 106)

. . . the manuscripts indicate rather clearly that Joseph Smith, Jr., by his continued practice of rerevising his earlier texts (occasionally as many as three times), demonstrated that he did not believe that at any of those points of rerevision he had dictated a perfectly inerrant text by the power or voice of God. . . . It is thus unnecessary and could be misleading to appear to claim “direct” revelation in the determination of the entire text of the Inspired Version as the preface written for the 1867 edition apparently implied. (Ibid., page 151)

Richard P. Howard’s admission that Joseph Smith rerevised his earlier text “occasionally as many as three times” is certainly a serious indictment against Joseph Smith’s work and plainly shows that his “Inspired Version” is anything but inspired. The fact that he could not make up his mind shows that he was tampering with the Scriptures according to his own imagination rather than receiving revelation from God. Mormon writer Truman G. Madsen also admitted that Joseph Smith “often revised a passage, later added to or amended it, and then, in a third attempt, clarified it further” (Improvement Era, March 1970, page 70).

The many changes that had to be made in the “inspired” renderings found in the Pearl of Great Price tend to undermine confidence in Joseph Smith’s work. As we indicated earlier, the most drastic revision of the Pearl of Great Price was made in 1878. In our new book, Flaws in the Pearl of Great Price, we have photographically reproduced the original 1851 edition of the Pearl of Great Price and carefully compared it with the church’s official 1989 printing. All of the changes that have been made have been noted in handwriting. The reader, therefore, can plainly see all of the words that were added, deleted or changed.

MOSES OR JOSEPH?

As one reads the first section of the Pearl of Great Price (the “Book of Moses”) the question arises as to whether the words were actually spoken to Moses by God over 3,000 years ago or if they came from the fertile imagination of someone who lived in the 19th century. To those familiar with the Bible, the phraseology of the document has the ring of ancient scripture. Unfortunately, however, it sounds just too much like the King James Version, which was first published in 1611. Many of the verses, in fact, have been plagiarized from the book of Genesis. We have used the Mormon Church’s own computer program, The Computerized Scriptures of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, to help us locate the verses which have been borrowed from the Bible. In Flaws in the Pearl of Great Price, Appendix 2, we show a large number of verses that have obviously been taken from Genesis. The most serious problem, however, is that material has also been taken from the New Testament. In our book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, we have dealt with the presence of New Testament quotations in Joseph Smith’s Book of Mormon, and since the situation is analogous to that found in the Book of Moses, we quote the following from our book:

It is very clear from the contents of the Book of Mormon that while the author was not a trained Bible scholar, he was rather familiar with the contents of the King James Version of the Bible. Although Mormon apologists are reluctant to face the facts, the evidence shows that Joseph Smith had the ability and the Biblical knowledge required to write the Book of Mormon. According to Smith’s earliest account of his life, written in 1832, he claimed he began studying the Bible when he was only about 12 years old. . . .

From letters and comments we have received, it is obvious that many believers in the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon do not have a correct understanding of the plagiarism issue with regard to that book. They often point out that some portions of the Bible are similar or even identical to other portions and feel that this demonstrates there is no problem with the Book of Mormon using parts of the Bible. It is true, of course, that such similarities do occur. For instance, many of the words of Jesus are taken from the Old Testament. In Deuteronomy 8:3 the following words of Moses are given: “... man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth he live.” In Matthew 4:4 these words are attributed to Jesus: “But he answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.” Since we have evidence that the book of Deuteronomy was in existence before the time of Christ from the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Septuagint translation of the Bible made in [the] third century B.C., it is obvious that Jesus could have quoted from it. There are, in fact, many quotations from it in the New Testament, and this is the very thing we should expect to find. . . . in the examples we have cited from the Bible, all of the cases of copying can be explained by simply stating the obvious fact that the authors used some known and available work. The problem with regard to the Book of Mormon, however, is that it has the ancient Nephites making extensive quotations from works that were not even in existence at that time. In fact, in the 1st and 2nd books of Nephi, the writings of the New Testament are cited 600 years before they were written! . . .

To those who really consider the matter, it should be obvious that the presence of many portions of the New Testament in the Book of Mormon is more out of place than to find the following words in a speech attributed to George Washington: “Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent, a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.” These words alone would be enough to prove the speech a forgery. While less than a century separated George Washington and Abraham Lincoln, in the Book of Mormon we have Lehi quoting from the New Testament book of Revelation almost seven centuries before it was written! (The first quotation appears on the second page of the Book of Mormon and is dated “About 600 B.C.” The book of Revelation is believed to have been written about A.D. 90.)

It is clear that the author of the Book of Mormon was holding a King James Version of the Bible in his hand when he produced it. He, therefore, could not have lived in 600 B.C. When all the evidence is examined, it is evident that he actually lived in 1830—some 2,430 years after Lehi was supposed to have fled from Jerusalem. (Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, pages 75, 79-81)

As we have already pointed out, Joseph Smith’s Book of Moses is also filled with material that has been plagiarized from the New Testament. Moses 6:52, for example, has quotations from a number of New Testament passages. Below we have set this verse in regular type and added similar material found in New Testament verses in bold type inside brackets:

52 And he also said unto him [Adam]: If thou wilt turn unto me, and hearken unto my voice, and believe, and repent of all thy transgressions, and be baptized [and be baptized—Acts 2:38], even in water, in the name of mine Only Begotten Son, who is full of grace and truth [only begotten of the Father;] full of grace and truth—John 1:14, which is Jesus Christ [which is Jesus Christ—1 Corinthians 3:11], the only name which shall be given under heaven, whereby salvation shall come [there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved—Acts 4:12] unto the children of men, ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost [ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost—Acts 2:38], asking all things in his name, and whatsoever ye shall ask, it shall be given you [Whatsoever ye shall ask . . . he will give it you—John 16:23]. (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Moses 6:52)

In Flaws in the Pearl of Great Price, Appendix 1, the reader will find over 150 parallels between the New Testament and the Book of Moses. There are undoubtedly other parallels that could be pointed out, but this should be sufficient to convince the reader of the modern origin of “Book of Moses.” All of the evidence points to the inescapable conclusion that the Mormon prophet was not working with an ancient text dating back to the time of Moses; instead he was borrowing from the King James Version of the Bible. Joseph Smith’s “Book of Moses” clearly bears all the earmarks of a spurious document and reminds us of the works of Paul Dunn. Like Dunn, Smith combined elements from more than one source to create his story of the early history of the world. He appropriated a large number of verses from the Old Testament, modified them to serve his own purposes and then added elements from a number of books in the New Testament.

In Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? we have a chart showing that there is a great deal of manuscript evidence for the Bible. Some of it, in fact, dates back even before the time of Christ! Joseph Smith’s Book of Moses, on the other hand, is without documentary support. The only handwritten manuscripts for the Book of Moses are those dictated by Joseph Smith in the early 1830’s.

As we have noted earlier, the Reorganized LDS Church has the original manuscripts of the Inspired Revision. Richard Howard, RLDS Church Historian, spent a great deal of time examining these manuscripts and seems to have concluded that the “Christian” material and the idea of putting the narrative into the first person came from the mind of Joseph Smith:

Viewing these subjects as he did from the vantage point of his own Christian background, Joseph Smith quite naturally would have tended to read into the symbolic preChristian language of the Old Testament certain uniquely Christian meanings. Therefore the content of all three of the documents comprising OT #1 . . . reflects the nineteenth century theological terminology of the prophet Joseph Smith. For example, references to the Holy Ghost and to the Only Begotten—terms arising from the early Christian community—help one to see that even at this early stage of development the text in a sense represents Joseph Smith’s studied theological commentary on the King James Version of the early Genesis chapters of the Bible.

This has been most difficult for students to perceive because of his practice, throughout the first . . . and the second . . . documents of OT #1, of phrasing the language in the first person singular, portraying God himself speaking to Moses the very words which, in turn, were apparently being apprehended verbally by Joseph Smith and dictated to his scribe in 1830, nearly three thousand years later. However, Joseph’s heavy reliance on the early seventeenth century Elizabethan English language and style of the King James Version throughout this second document makes this verbal inspiration approach to the language of the early Genesis chapters of his New Translation untenable. This becomes even more apparent when one considers the very complex, centuries-long process culminating in the King James text of 1611. (Restoration Scriptures, page 77)
BOOK OF ABRAHAM

As we have indicated earlier, the second part of the Pearl Great Price contains the “Book of Abraham.” It was supposed to have been written on Egyptian papyrus by Abraham himself about 4,000 years ago! According to Mormon officials, this same papyrus fell into Joseph Smith’s hands and he began translating it in 1835. If the papyrus were really written by Abraham, its discovery was probably one of the most important finds in the history of the world. To say that the papyrus would be worth a million dollars would be greatly underestimating its value, for it would be older than any portion of the Bible.

For many years Joseph Smith’s collection of papyri was lost and there was no way to check the accuracy of his translation. On November 27, 1967, however, the Mormon-owned Deseret News made the startling announcement that the collection had been rediscovered in the Metropolitan Museum of Art. The article went on to say: “Included in the papyri is a manuscript identified as the original document from which Joseph Smith had copied the drawing which he called ‘Facsimile No. 1’ and published with the Book of Abraham.” The importance of this find cannot be overemphasized; it, in fact, made it possible to put Joseph Smith’s ability as a translator of ancient Egyptian writing to an absolute test.

Although the Mormon Church tried to slow down the dissemination of material with regard to the Joseph Smith Egyptian Papyri, within six months from the time the Metropolitan Museum gave the papyri to the church, the Book of Abraham had been proven untrue! The fall of the Book of Abraham was brought about by the identification of the actual piece of papyrus from which Joseph Smith claimed to “translate” the book.

The identification of this fragment as the original from which Joseph Smith claimed to translate the Book of Abraham has been made possible by a comparison with Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar handwritten documents by Joseph Smith’s scribes which we photographically reproduced in 1966. Noted Egyptologists Richard A. Parker and Klaus Baer have translated this papyrus fragment and found that it is in reality the Egyptian Book of Breathings. Other Egyptologists have confirmed that it is nothing but the Book of Breathings. Even the Mormon apologist Hugh Nibley has admitted this identification. In fact, he has even made his own translation of the text (see The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri: An Egyptian Endowment, pages 18-45).

It is obvious, therefore, that the papyrus Joseph Smith claimed was the “Book of Abraham” is in reality an Egyptian funerary text known as the “Book of Breathings.” It is a pagan document which is filled with magical practices and the names of Egyptian gods and goddesses. It has absolutely nothing to do with either Abraham or his religion.

As in the case of the “Book of Moses,” Joseph Smith plagiarized extensively from the Old Testament in creating his “Book of Abraham.” He modified many of the verses which he lifted from the King James Version of the Bible. Strange as it may seem, he used quite a number of the same verses he had already incorporated into his “Book of Moses.” In many cases, however, he altered them in a different way than he had in his earlier work. Some of these changes were made because of his study of the Hebrew language, but a significant number were made because he had changed his views of the Godhead.

Toward the end of his life (June 16, 1844), Joseph Smith gave a speech in which he publicly taught that “the [Hebrew] word Eloheim ought to be in the plural all the way through—Gods” (History of the Church, vol. 6, page 476). The word Eloheim is used many times in Genesis. It is found, for example, in Genesis 1:3. It is interesting to compare this verse from the King James Version of the Bible with Joseph Smith’s “translation” in the books of Moses and Abraham. In the Bible we read: “And God said, Let there be light . . .” Joseph Smith changed this to read as follows in Moses 2:3: “And I, God, said: Let there be light . . .” Notice that Joseph has added the word “I,” thus making it even more apparent that the verse is referring to only one God. In the Book of Abraham, however, Joseph Smith completely reversed his position with regard to this matter, for in Abraham 4:3 we read: “And they (the Gods) said: Let there be light . . .” In our book, Flaws in the Pearl of Great Price, we photographically demonstrate how Joseph Smith continued to cast doubt on his earlier work (the Book of Moses) throughout the 31 verses of Abraham, Chapter 4. In this chapter Joseph Smith consistently translated the word Eloheim as “the Gods.” In the same book we also show that Smith added elements from other sources into his Book of Abraham. A good example is the fact that he put the “anti-black” doctrine, which was commonly held in his day, into the mouth of Abraham! Until 1978 the Mormon leaders banned blacks from the priesthood and would not let them be married in their temples. The Book of Abraham 1:21-27 was often used to support this discriminatory doctrine. The Book of Moses was also cited because it states that blacks were put under a curse.

While the Pearl of Great Price is filled with problems, the other two books of scripture which Joseph Smith produced are also laced with serious errors. Mormon apologists, of course, would like us to believe otherwise. Milton R. Hunter, for example, made this fantastic claim concerning Joseph Smith’s works:

The Prophet Joseph Smith produced for the world three new volumes of holy scriptures . . . and, in addition, he revised the Bible. No prophet who has ever lived has accomplished such a tremendous feat. There are only 177 pages in the Old Testament attributed to Moses, while Joseph Smith either translated through the gift and power of God or received as direct revelation from Jehovah 835 [pages]. (Deseret News, Church Section, July 18, 1970, page 14)

While we must agree that Joseph Smith produced a great deal of material that purports to be scripture, it does not appear that this material bears any evidence of divine inspiration. For those who would like to learn more about the problems in Joseph Smith’s “scriptures,” the Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants, we recommend our books Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon and Major Problems of Mormonism. For a very detailed study of the changes, plagiarism and other problems found in the Pearl of Great Price the reader should have our new publication Flaws in the Pearl of Great Price.

ARE YOU PART OF THE TEAM?

There are three main groups of people that provide most of the support for this ministry: One, Mormons who are very disturbed with the changes and cover-ups which have plagued their church. While they do not desire to leave Mormonism, they feel that our work is having a good effect upon the church. Two, ex-Mormons who desire to bring their friends to a knowledge of the truth. Three, Christians who have never been Mormons but have a concern for LDS people and desire to win them to the Lord. These people make it possible for us to carry on this important work.

Since we want a large number of people to read the books and come to the truth, we try to provide them at the lowest possible cost to our readers. Consequently, the money we receive from our books and tapes only covers about half the cost of running Utah Lighthouse Ministry. If it were not for those who provide donations to our ministry, we would be in serious trouble! We consider these people to be a vital part of our team. They are, in fact, making an important investment in the souls of people who have been misled with falsified information furnished by the LDS Church.

Lately, the Lord has really been blessing the work. Mormons are calling us on the phone, coming into the bookstore or writing to us concerning their doubts about the church, and many of these people are turning to the Lord. For example, the following appears in a letter we recently received:

I wanted you to know . . . that my wife, children and myself have, in essence, left the Mormon Church. I am now writing a letter to my bishop that explains our decision. . . . I plan to send copies of that letter to our friends who are still in the Mormon Church . . . In addition to this, each member of my family has accepted Jesus Christ as their personal Lord and Savior . . . we recognize that each of us owe the both of you and your ministry a great deal for getting us to that point. . . . In my opinion, your publications stand as an historically accurate and objectively based factual presentation . . . We . . . are grateful to have found the truth about the Mormon Church and most certainly, the love that Jesus Christ has for each of us.

I have often seen your names and publications labeled as anti-Mormon. In actuality, a more appropriate designation for your work is pro-truth. (Letter from Florida, dated March 4, 1991)

While we have been very pleased with the progress that has been made within the last few years, we look forward to the future with even greater expectations. The Mormons seem to be far more receptive to the message than at any time we can remember. Over a year ago we were surprised to learn that a woman who had left the Mormon Church many years ago had died and left us a good deal of money. She gave this gift because she appreciated the work we had done. We were able to use this money to obtain some very good printing equipment. We can now print almost twice as fast as we could on our old press. In addition, after the pages are printed we now have a sorter which automatically gathers them into books. The pages were previously collated by hand. This was a slow and difficult process. We thank God for this new equipment.

The Mormons are more open to the truth than ever before, and we now have the capability to disseminate the material they need in larger quantities. The Lord willing, we are prepared to move ahead with the work at an accelerated pace. Our readers can have a part in this important work in two different ways: They can remember the ministry in their prayers, and they can also help by providing donations which will help us to reach many more people. This is a non-profit organization and all donations are tax deductible. Send contributions to Utah Lighthouse Ministry, PO Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110.

A THIRD PRINTING!

The new book, Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony: 1842-1990, by Jerald and Sandra Tanner, has turned out to be such a success that we are planning a third printing. This book contains the actual text of the 1990 revision of the highly secret endowment ritual and other accounts of the ceremony dating back to 1846. Also show all of the serious changes made in the ceremony in 1990. Price: $5.00

IMPORTANT VIDEO!

Personal Freedom Outreach has produced a video on Mormonism which we highly recommend. It is entitled, Mormonism: The Christian View. The narration was done by Wesley P. Walters. It deals with Mormon history doctrines, the claim to authority, changes in doctrine, false prophecies, and witnessing suggestions. It is available for $24.00 (mail orders add 10% for shipping).

AT THE HILL CUMORAH

Berean Christian Ministries will again be coordinating a Christian witness at the Mormon Hill Cumorah Pageant scheduled for July 12-21, 1991. Over 100,000 people attend this Mormon pageant, south of Palmyra, New York. Please mark your calendar to pray for the Christian workers. If you would like to witness to the Mormons and their guests or want more information, send by June 17, 1991, a self addressed, long, stamped envelope to: Berean Christian Ministries, PO Box 1091, Webster, New York 14580.

PLAN TO ATTEND!

June 13–15, 1991 — Salt Lake City Hilton

This exciting three-day conference brings Christians together from all over the country who share a vision for more effectively sharing the Good News of Jesus Christ with Mormon people.

Major speakers include:

*Ruth Tucker, PhD (Trinity Evangelical Divinity School)
*Paul Carden (Christian Research Institute)
*Sandra Tanner (Utah Lighthouse Ministry)
*David Crump, PhD (Salt Lake Pastor)

Challenging seminars will sharpen your understanding of ministry to and among LDS people. Seminars are aimed at Christians who want to grow in their understanding of:

*Issues in research on Mormonism
*Evangelism to Mormon people
*How to effectively minister to Christians in a Mormon dominated area

This conference is sponsored by the Utah Institute for Biblical Studies.

For a free brochure and registration fee information, either write or call Utah Lighthouse Ministry (801-485-8894) or call the Utah Institute for Biblical Studies (801-581-1900).
A great deal has happened since we began working on the last issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger. For example, on April 23, 1991, we were informed that Darrick Evenson, a Mormon writer who has worked very hard in an attempt to discredit our work, had been unmasked as a deceiver. Mr. Evenson now admits that he was secretly engaged in dishonest practices to gather information which he could use to discredit people or organizations he disagreed with. He, in fact, confessed that he used aliases and a “Trojan horse” technique to carry out his questionable operations.

Some of our readers may remember that this is not the first “Trojan horse” that we have encountered in our work. Those who are familiar with our newsletter may remember that in October 1976 we received a letter from a man known as “Stan Fields.” He claimed he was an “Ex-Mormon for Jesus, and would like to be added to your mailing list . . . God’s blessings on you as you do His work, Sincerely in Christ.” This man spent a great deal of time spying on various people who were critical of the Mormon Church. We later learned that his real name was Steven Mayfield and that he was also working for the FBI at the time he sent us this letter. In 1980, we discovered his deceitful game and the fact that at that very time he was employed at the Mormon Church Office Building. We confronted him on the job and he confessed to his duplicity and consented to a tape-recorded interview (see our publication, Unmasking A Mormon Spy). During the time that Steven Mayfield was carrying out his nefarious operations, he went to great lengths to protect his “cover.” In a letter to Latayne Covett Scott, Mr. Mayfield went so far as to say that the Mormon Church was inspired by the Devil: “I read some of the Tanner’s material and became thoroughly convinced that the Mormon cult the church of my youth, the church of my ancestors was wrong, false, and Satan inspired.” In the same letter, Mayfield went on to complain concerning “the falseness of man-made religion (like Mormonism) which leads men to hell.” After he was exposed, Steven Mayfield admitted that these statements were only made in an attempt to gain the confidence of Mormon critics so that he could spy on them.

Besides the important development with regard to the unmasking of Darrick Evenson, some Mormon scholars at the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies (F.A.R.M.S.) became so upset with our book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, that they have published rebuttals. In addition, they have also made a vicious attack against some Mormon scholars who are also convinced that the Book of Mormon is not what it claims to be. We will have more to say about the charges later in this publication.

Evenson’s Claims

The editors of this newsletter (Jerald and Sandra Tanner) probably first became aware of the name Darrick Evenson when we read volume one of They Lie in Wait to Deceive, by Robert and Rosemary Brown. This book was written to show how “anti-Mormons work to obstruct and distort the truth.” While the first edition of this publication did not have anything about Mr. Evenson, after it was revised in 1982, two pages were devoted to a long letter written by Evenson. In this letter, dated October 26, 1981, we find the following:
My name is Darrick Troy Evenson, and I am writing you this letter in appreciation of your new book, "They Lie in Wait to Deceive." I, too, am no stranger to the anti-Mormon campaign of today. . . . I call it simply the "Counter-Mission." To be sure, when I was only a convert of a few months (this was back in February of 1979) I walked into a "Christian" bookstore looking for something that was written by the Church (you can see how naive I was back then). I glanced over to the far wall of the building and noticed dozens of books with the picture of the Salt Lake Temple on them. . . . But when I glanced at the sign above, it said, "Cult/Occult Section." I was confused. I picked up one of the books that were on the shelves and began to read. Something inside of me told me to put it down, but because of intense curiosity I had to read on . . . I read only a short ways into it when I recognized that the Church hadn’t printed that book. I spent about three hours in the bookstore, and I became familiar with all the anti-Mormon books that were there. I walked into that store a joyous person, but I did walk out a confused and embittered person. It struck me with such alarm and seriousness that I made a vow to myself. I vowed that if I had been deceived by the Church (as the Tanner’s and others said), then I wanted to know Who, What, Where, How, and Why! I immediately quit my job and quit school. . . . I took the money that I had saved up in the service to use in my search for the pro or con. I began to read, and I read so much that more and more questions were coming into my head, and no answers as of yet . . . I began to visit other churches. . . . All this time I was totally inactive from the Church. . . . I must now say that it was several times that I confided to my friend that the Church was false; the "evidence" to me then seemed so overwhelming. . . . At the sectarian libraries, there was NOTHING BUT anti-Mormon in regard to the church. However, even after I succumbed to the anti-Mormon propaganda, something inside me (which I recognize now as the Holy Ghost) kept telling me to dig deeper to find the truth. After awhile, I began to regularly study at the Institute libraries . . . One by one the claims of the anti-Mormons began to fall. Eventually, after 17 months of research and study, the last anti-Mormon claim fell. I then asked, in extreme violation of the "Tanner Code of Truth," my Heavenly Father in prayer to confirm my findings. And He did in a most joyful way! Now I have been fully active for more than a year, and I am now saving up for my mission. I want to share my knowledge and joy with others. . . . I read your book and I truly enjoyed it. To be sure many things . . . can point to the truthfulness of the divine mission of the Prophet Joseph Smith . . .

I still study the counter-mission . . . I remember that you mentioned in your book that you found other people who were exposing the counter-mission also. I feel that someday it could be productive for all these individuals to exchange information . . . I wish for a project that would get good, scholarly, apologetical works in the libraries—public libraries. . . . The goals of the counter-generation (the nationwide anti-Mormon campaign) is:

1) To use a well-financed campaign of misinformation to inject doubt, hoping to destroy the faith of the membership of the church; and . . . to halt the exodus of members of other churches into this church—while at the same time making a very good living in the process.

2) To carefully misinform the Christian public as to the origin, beliefs, and ultimate goals of the Church hoping to make it appear unpopular.

To the first goal they have overwhelmingly failed, except the part about “making a good living in the process.” Their campaign is now confined to investigators and new converts. To the second goal I can only say that so long as there exists uninformd people in the world this will persist to some extent. As you know, Christ said that in the latter days men shall persecute the Saints in his name. . . . Each individual must have the evidences presented to him without deceit. I have talked to many ministers who, after I had made my presentation to them, have admitted to me that there “maybe” was some misinformation given against the Church, but such means were justifiable because the “end” was so desirable!

I have been assaulted on several occasions. I am now positive that nothing can halt the counter-mission, for it is not of man alone (if you know what I mean). . . . I am sure there are many who fight against the Church in sincerity. They do so because they have been deceived by the likes of the Martin’s, Tanner’s, and . . . the Nelson’s . . .

Many here in Tacoma are looking forward to your next book. Truly, if there is anything I could do for you (I am quite a researcher), just let me know. Right now I am saving up for my mission; I feel that the joy that this gospel brings is, in me, bursting at the seams, and I must share it with everyone I can. . . . Our testimony is sure, and what a joy it truly brings! . . . (Letter by Darrick Evenson, as printed, in They Lie in Wait to Deceive, by Robert and Rosemary Brown, revised edition, vol. 1, pages 279-280)

Promoting Dissension

Our records show that Darrick Evenson was in contact with us as early as October, 1983, when he was serving as a missionary for the Mormon Church. In 1989, Horizon Publishers published a book by Mr. Evenson entitled, The Gainsayers: A Converted Anti-Mormon Responds To Critics of the LDS Church. On the dust jacket of Evenson’s book we find the following:

When new LDS convert Darrick Evenson encountered anti-Mormon literature for the first time, it devastated him. He naively accepted it as true, and it led him out of the Church into the ranks of the “Ex-Mormons for Jesus.” Darrick learned their “witnessing” approaches and techniques and began functioning with them in the fight against the Mormon Church. But as he became familiar with them and their message, he found himself increasingly uncomfortable in their midst. . . . And though they professed to “love” the Mormons, he found he found the “Ex-Mormon” motivation to be just the opposite. . . . As he encountered more and more instances of falsehoods and deception in the “Ex-Mormon” teachings, his conscience began to work on him more and more. He finally renounced his affiliation with them and returned to The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. . . . Darrick is aware that the message and methods of anti-Mormon gainsayers have kept many truth-seekers from hearing and accepting the gospel of Jesus Christ. . . . Anti-Mormon organizations such as “Saints Alive” and “Ex-Mormons for Jesus” are modern gainsayers in the truest sense of the word. . . . The author presents evidence which shows that the same techniques used by those who fought against Christ’s Church in the meridian of time . . . are being used against the Mormons today. Satan's work follows the same patterns down through time. . . .

A powerful chapter is devoted to a presentation of responses to many of the anti-Mormon distortions and misrepresentations currently being used. It is obvious that the author is well acquainted with the nature of yellow journalism used against the Church . . .
Although we had to admit that Darrick Evenson made some points regarding excesses in what is often called “the anti-Mormon” movement, we felt that the claims concerning his affiliation and work with “Ex-Mormons for Jesus” seemed somewhat nebulous. In any case, Mr. Evenson began visiting our bookstore, and it soon became obvious that one of his most important goals in life was to destroy our ministry. He claimed that he was investigating us and had found evidence that we had been very dishonest. Evenson maintained that he was working hand-in-hand with Robert and Rosemary Brown and others who opposed our work. A friend of Darrick Evenson, who is a devout Mormon, told us that in 1988 or 1989 Evenson moved in with the Browns to do research for them. It is unclear whether he was receiving a salary or just board and room. From research that Mike Mistretta has done, he feels that Evenson’s work at that time related to getting negative material for the Browns to use against Ed Decker. It has been suggested that the Browns felt that Mr. Evenson’s research was not progressing as rapidly as they had anticipated and that he left about a week after he moved in with them. Whether he continued working for the Browns is not known, but those involved in other ministries to Mormons claim that Mr. Evenson often represented himself as working for the Browns.

In his attempt to create problems for critics of the Mormon Church, Darrick Evenson has used some very divisive tactics. Mr. Evenson was aware that we have been accused of being secret agents for the Mormon Church and that we have some differences of opinion with Ed Decker. Evenson seized upon these facts and attempted to stir up a serious battle between us. He visited our bookstore and related to Sandra that Mr. Decker had told him he had enough information on Jerald to put him away for life. Since we did not have any confidence in Darrick Evenson, we dismissed this statement as a trick on his part to create problems between the two ministries. Mr. Evenson also told Sandra at that time that he had evidence that Ed Decker was living an immoral life and said that he would give us this material if we would print it. Sandra said that she was not interested in receiving the material.

This incident, of course, made us wonder if Darrick Evenson had told Ed Decker that we had made some inflammatory comments concerning him in the hope that he would say something outlandish about us. Later we learned the truth about the matter. On May 4, 1991, Ed Decker was on Mike Mistretta’s radio program which is broadcast on KHEP in Phoenix, Arizona. (We should probably mention here that Mike Mistretta has provided us with a great deal of important information regarding Darrick Evenson which we have put to good use in this article. Because of financial problems Mr. Mistretta has temporarily suspended broadcasting. He hopes to be back on the air on 1280 AM in October. Any of our readers who would like to help Mike Mistretta can send contributions to Saints Alive In Jesus, PO Box 54762, Phoenix, AZ 85078.) At any rate, Mr. Decker revealed on Mistretta’s program that Darrick Evenson had told him that we had been in contact with the Browns to obtain the “filth” they had on Decker:

About four weeks ago I got a phone call . . . it was Darrick on the phone and he . . . said that he was working as a research assistant for Robert and Rosemary Brown . . . that has been his story for many years with us. . . . At any rate, he called and said he had some very serious filth about me that he was going to expose . . . that he had control of it and that I should make sure that it got out. Darrick said, “I’ll scratch your back if you scratch my back . . . I have the ability to get rid of all this information away from the Browns and the Tanners if you promise that in a little while, in a week or so or a few days something is going to come out about me and you have to keep your mouth shut. If you open your mouth, I’m going to reveal all this. And I said, “Darrick you’re blackmailing me.”

The truth about the matter is that we have not talked to the Browns since 1981 and have not requested any derogatory material about any of the church’s critics from either the Browns or Darrick Evenson. At one time the Browns’ lawyer contacted us in an attempt to force us to retract a statement we had made about them in the Salt Lake City Messenger. Although we refused to back down from our statement, no lawsuit was ever filed. For more information concerning our opposition to the Browns’ work see our publication, Can The Browns Save Joseph Smith. An article by Steve Eaton in the Brigham Young University student newspaper indicated how the Browns felt about us after we wrote this book: “Mrs. Tanner said she will sometimes send people . . . a book . . . titled ‘Can the Browns save Joseph Smith?’ The Browns said the Tanner book will only get the Tanners in trouble. ‘That book is going to hang them,’ Mrs. Brown said” (The Universe, August 10, 1982). Although nine years have passed since the Browns made this threat, they have still been unable to get the noose around our neck.

Unfortunately, however, Darrick Evenson must have convinced Ed Decker that we were in league with the Browns. On Mike Mistretta’s radio program Mr. Decker went on to say that he had to call his pastor “and let him know that he was going to be getting material from the Browns, the Tanners or . . . probably just Darrick that says that I’m having sex with three young women in my office and that I’m committing sodomy . . . .” Mr. Decker also claimed that he had a copy of a tape-recorded telephone conversation with Darrick Evenson in which Evenson told him “that he got that material from Robert and Rosemary Brown . . . that is their material that he got with them to use to destroy me . . . he will release it to the Tanners who are negotiating with the Browns to get the material . . . And I have that on tape.” On the same radio show, Ed Decker said that the publication of material against him is “not a particular problem, but don’t blackmail me first and be on tape because the day the stuff hits the street, the day that Darrick Evenson releases it, is the day that I’ll have him arrested for blackmail.”

As we indicated earlier, we did not receive material about these accusations from Darrick Evenson and have never negotiated with the Browns to obtain any material at all. Even if the Browns had such information, it seems unlikely that they would allow anyone to obtain a copy before publication. We understand that they are very closefisted with regard to their research materials and question the fact that they would allow Darrick to run around the country with copies of such documents. Furthermore, we should point out that Darrick Evenson’s claims cannot be trusted and that he is prone to make rash judgments with regard to people with whom he disagrees. For example, the last time he was in our bookstore, two Christian ladies came in to talk to Sandra about the Mormon Church. Mr. Evenson, however, took it upon himself to engage them in a heated discussion about Mormonism and Christianity. Evenson became extremely upset and began to make derogatory comments about them. Although he had never met these women before they came into the bookstore, he claimed that he knew they were lesbians and began to use explicit language with regard to their supposed sexual sins. Finally, the situation became so intolerable that Sandra had to ask him to leave the bookstore. (This was only the second time in almost thirty years that we had had to ask a Mormon to leave our store.) Although a statement made on a radio station indicated that Darrick was physically ejected, he actually left under his own power.

Trojan Horse Toppled

In his book, The Gainsayers, Darrick Evenson’s middle name is abbreviated: “Darrick T. Evenson.” The reader will remember, however, that in the letter Robert and Rosemary Brown published seven years earlier, he referred to himself as “Darrick Troy Evenson.” As we will show, Darrick later assumed the alias, “Troy Lawrence,” to carry out his deceitful work. The word “Troy” is interesting because it fits well with Evenson’s statement that he used a “Troy horse” technique in his secret operations. The reader may remember that in the story of the Trojan War, the Greeks left a huge wooden horse outside the city of Troy. The horse was actually filled with warriors, but the Trojans, not recognizing the trick, desired to have it and breached the wall of their own city to take the horse in. During the night the men who were in the wooden horse came out and the Greek troops destroyed the city of Troy and most of its inhabitants.

Darrick Troy Evenson’s “Troy horse” method of operation was actually working very well until Constance Cumbey began throwing away some back issues of a publication which she had concerning Mormonism. The reader may remember that Constance Cumbey wrote a book attacking the New Age Movement. It was published under the title, The Hidden Dangers of the Rainbow, and stirred up a great deal of controversy. It is interesting to note that Walter Martin, a well-known critic of the Mormon Church, was one of Cumbey’s most vocal critics and stirred up a great deal of controversy. It is noted that although Darrick claimed “to have been a member” (see back cover of New Age Messiah Identified), as Cumbey read about Darrick Evenson in The Inner Circle, she recalled that the original manuscript she had looked at had the name Darrick Evenson on it. In a FAX letter to Huntington House Publishers, dated May 1, 1991, Constance Cumbey wrote:

Now as regards Darrick T. Evenson, let’s recap the events. I was contacted . . . last summer about a manuscript you were thinking of publishing. Teresa told me excitedly that this man had been converted out of the New Age and believing in Benjamin Creme’s Maitreya the Christ and had since his conversion gone back into Tara Center, gained access to their computer “working long feverish hours” and learned the identity of the New Age “messiah.”

My immediate counsel to Teresa Trosclair was one of caution. I told her that this type of tactic was often used by New Agers to have Christians scurrying after something that was just not so. Teresa seemed disappointed at my response but asked if I would be willing to talk with the “young man” and review his manuscript. I told her I would be willing to do both, but I was extremely skeptical about the entire business. The manuscript and a tape from Darrick Evenson were sent . . . He continually left messages pressing me for a decision on his manuscript. . . . I was home one evening when I received a phone call from Darrick T. Evenson. Darrick said to me, “I know you can’t endorse my manuscript and I know why. After much prayer, I have decided to withdraw the manuscript and abandon that project. Since I came to the Lord reading your book, I want to help you in anyway I can.” Walter Martin unfairly attacked you and I have talked with Huntington House and they agree with me that it would be good to do a book about it. . . . I thought the new project had splendid possibilities and I did encourage Darrick. He called again asking me to bundle up all my documentation on Walter Martin and send it to him. . . . but I never got around to sending it.

Darrick called me again . . . and said that since it was my work that had brought him out of the New Age Movement . . . that he just wanted to help me in any way possible. I told him . . . I had trouble getting up the steam to continue to do my newsletters. Darrick suggested he could work with me . . . We vaguely agreed to talk more about it in the future. A few weeks later I received a faxed message from Darrick Evenson demanding my mailing list to get out an issue of something he called “World Crusade Journal.” . . . I faxed . . . a message saying “I send my mailing list to nobody, particularly without copy.” . . .

Throughout all of this, I had no idea that you were publishing the book that Darrick told me he had abandoned! . . . I thought nothing more of Darrick Evenson until I was throwing out back issues of The Inner Circle, an anti-Mormon paper that has never been kind to me. As you know, I found a 1989 article entitled “The facts on Evenson.” . . . I immediately called Teresa Trosclair to share this with her and rejoice in the fact that the Lord had spared us this particular snare. I heard Teresa groan and I said, “Teresa, you didn’t publish him, did you?” Teresa replied, “15,000 copies.” I said, “Teresa, I warned you.” She said, “I know.” . . . The next day Mark called and vigorously and almost affectionately defended “Troy” (Troy Lawrence) who had always been known to me as Darrick T. Evenson . . . I demanded and received a conference call between “Troy” and Mark Trosclair . . . the next day.

As Mark is witness to on that conference call, “Troy” denied that he in THE GAINSAVERS claimed to have been a former part of Ex-Mormons for Jesus or indeed that he had ever been a Mormon. Mark accepted these lying denials at face value . . .

Ed Decker says he received threats of blackmail for false allegations by Darrick/Troy four weeks ago. This would have exactly coincided with the time I discovered the article that quoted Ed Decker. (FAX letter by Constance Cumbey to Huntington House Publishers, dated May 1, 1991)
Since Darrick Evenson knew that Constance Cumbey was acquainted with Ed Decker and that she was aware of the deceitful game Darrick was playing, he must have realized that it was only a matter of time before Mr. Decker would find out the truth. It seems reasonable, therefore, to believe that this might have led Evenson to contact Decker and threaten him with exposure if he did not keep quiet about the dual role which Darrick himself was playing.

Not a Mormon?

We first learned of Darrick Evenson’s duplicity on April 23, 1991, when we received a phone call from Al Kresta. Mr. Kresta has a radio program called “Talk From The Heart” on WMUZ FM in Detroit, Michigan. He said that he was concerned about a man who went by the name of “Troy Lawrence” whom he was about to interview on his program. He had reason to believe that the man’s real name was Darrick Evenson and wondered what we knew about him. Sandra was able to give Mr. Kresta a report concerning the insulting language Darrick had used in our bookstore just the day before.

Before the radio interview took place, Al Kresta read the following comment from the book Darrick Evenson had written attacking the New Age movement: “Someone put in my hands a copy of a little book entitled The Hidden Dangers of the Rainbow by Constance Cumbeby. This powerful book precipitated my conversion out of the New Age deception and into the light of Christianity” (New Age Messiah Identified, page 2). Mr. Kresta felt that he should call Cumbeby before the interview and find out what she knew about the author. Cumbeby, of course, informed him of Evenson’s deception. This led Kresta to call us as well as others for more information.

The radio program started out in a peaceful way as Al Kresta began questioning Darrick Evenson about his book and concerning his involvement in the New Age movement. The fireworks, however, began shortly after Kresta asked Evenson if he had written any other books. He replied that he had written another book entitled, The Secret Message of the Zodiac for Here’s Life Publishers. (Here’s Life is a noted Christian publishing company that has published books by Josh McDowell.) Evenson stated that the purpose of that book “was to be like a ‘Trojan horse’ for New Agers.” To Evenson’s surprise, Kresta then asked if he had also published a “book called The Gainsayers?” Evenson responded truthfully to that question: “Yeah, I did.” Kresta then asked if it was true that he was “writing as a Mormon” in that book. The following dialogue then ensued:

EVENSON: Well, what I do is I’m also going to do one for the Masons and I’m also going to do one for the Catholics.

KRESTA: Are you a Mormon?

EVENSON: No, I’m not.

( Interview of Darrick Evenson on Al Kresta’s radio program; transcribed from a tape-recording of “Talk From The Heart,” April 23, 1991)

Darrick Evenson confessed that he had written material “under a few different names.” He then began to show animosity towards Al Kresta and said, “I think it’s very dishonest of you to know that you’re supposed to keep all my aliases that way . . .” Evenson seemed to know that Constance Cumbey had exposed him. He, therefore, launched into an attack on the woman he had praised in his book. He spoke of her “many outrageous reactionary statements.” He went on to say that one organization felt that she was “a nut” and implied that he held the same opinion.

Darrick Evenson told the radio audience that “Constance Cumbey believes that Jerald and Sandra Tanner, who have been preaching against Mormonism for thirty years . . . and who also published another book by Moody Monthly [Moody Press] — she believes that Moody Monthly, Moody Bible Institute, is a Mormon front. She believes that Jerald and Sandra Tanner are actually Mormons because this is what Ed Decker has told her, and she believes it.” Constance Cumbey was listening to the program on her radio and when she heard this statement about us and Moody Press she called Al Kresta on the phone. Mr. Kresta asked her if Moody was a “front for the Mormon Church”? Cumbey responded: “That is pure fiction . . . I’ve never heard that in my life except out of Troy—Darrick Evenson’s mouth just a minute ago. That’s what prompted my phone call to you.”

Later in the interview, Darrick Evenson made this comment to Constance Cumbey: “You told me that Jerald and Sandra Tanner were, in fact, Mormon fronts.” In her reply, Cumbey said, “I never told you that . . . No, I’ve never made such a statement to you.” Evenson then claimed that Cumbey had told him that “the late Dr. Walter R. Martin, was probably . . . a Mormon front.” Although Constance Cumbey admitted that she had serious disagreements with Walter Martin over the New Age Movement, she denied the allegation that she had said he was a “Mormon front”: “No, I never made that statement . . .”

In the same interview Darrick Evenson denied again that he was a Mormon: “I’m not a Mormon. I’m not a Mormon.” On another part of the tape Evenson stated: “I wrote for the Mormons as being a Mason. I wrote for the Mormons as being a Mormon. I wrote for the New Agers as being a New Ager, which I was. I was raised that. I’m also going to write a book for the Catholics.” When Al Kresta asked Evenson if he was going to write as though he were an ex-Catholic, Mr. Evenson responded: “No. I was going to write . . . as if I was a Catholic . . . ” When Kresta continued to point out the deceptive methods that Darrick Evenson was using, Evenson finally became upset with him and emphatically stated, “Sir, sir, you are a liar!” According to Al Kresta, Mr. Evenson later threatened that the station would be hearing from his lawyer.

Now that we know what a treacherous game Darrick Evenson was playing, we wonder if this might help explain how some Mormon critics came to the conclusion that we were really spies who were working for the Mormon Church. Although the idea probably did not originate with Mr. Evenson, he certainly wanted Ed Decker to believe that we were negotiating with the Browns to obtain material against him. After the rumor concerning us secretly working for the Mormon Church was spread about, there was a claim put forth that “in the last few weeks, there has been information from several high level LDS sources” which confirmed the charge. It was alleged that this secret information was “given to two or more people, and on several occasions.” No information, however, was given as to whether this important knowledge was derived from a telephone conversation or delivered in person. It is certainly possible that Darrick Evenson or others working with him in his “Trojan horse” scheme could have impersonated LDS officials. Although we have no real evidence that this did in fact occur, it would certainly be the type of thing that would fit very well in Mr. Evenson’s plan of attack—i.e., to stir up serious trouble between those involved in ministries.

In any case, shortly after Darrick Evenson was interviewed on Al Kresta’s program, he was interviewed on the “Steel On Steel” radio program on KLTT in Colorado. In spite of the fact that he had previously admitted on the Detroit radio station that he was the “Darrick Evenson” who wrote the book The Gainsayers, when he was questioned on KLTT he denied that fact. He acknowledged, however, that he “deceived” the people in the New Age movement to gain his information. He claimed that he had “also infiltrated other groups in order to get information I need . . . I’ve done that with the Mormons. I’ve done that with the Masons, and I’m trying to do that with the Jehovah’s Witnesses . . .” When he (“Troy Lawrence”) was first asked if he was, in fact, Darrick Evenson, he evaded the issue. He revealed, however, that he had “a number of pseudonyms and I work with a number of individuals.” He went on to state that he would not “reveal who I’m working with; I’m not going to reveal my other pseudonyms.”

Darrick Evenson said that “back in 1987 I started working with individuals for ideas and ways to get material to witness to different cultists and whatever in their hands . . .” When he was asked later in the interview what he knew about Darrick Evenson, he replied: “I’m working with him.” He went on to state, “I’m not that individual.” Shortly after that, however, Constance Cumbey called in on the phone and affirmed that Troy Lawrence and Darrick Evenson “are the same” individual and that “the original [manuscript] copies I have of the book, New Age Messiah Identified, are signed ‘Darrick T. Evenson.’”

On May 20, 1991, Darrick Evenson provided a letter to Huntington House Publishers in which he made the preposterous claim that his book, The Gainsayers, was actually a book which was critical of the Mormon Church. Moreover, notwithstanding his public denial on KLTT, in the letter to Huntington House Mr. Evenson admitted that he and Troy Lawrence were actually the same person. The following is taken from Darrick Evenson’s letter (the original is almost entirely in capital letters):

There have been reports surfacing from certain parties that I, Darrick Evenson (Troy Lawrence) am a Mormon. The rumors of me being a Mormon have been greatly exaggerated!!! In other words, yes, I did write a book supposedly “for” the Mormon Church. However, all one needs to do to recognize my methods is to read the back cover of New Age Messiah Identified. On the back cover it says that I “played the part” of a New Age advocate after my conversion to Christianity. I even helped write several pro-New Age articles. All this was for the same reason a cop pretends to be a drug smuggler, or a spy pretends to work for the other side.

In The Gainsayers I revealed thus far “secret” Mormon Church doctrines that rank-and-file Mormons never see. They read it because it seems to defend Mormonism, but does it? It does condemn certain exaggerations and misinformation by the film “The God Makers” . . . This was the “key” that set the book before thousands of Mormon eyes . . . I used such criticism as the bate . . . The Mormons took it, and now the secret doctrines of Mormonism is being shown to thousands of Mormons who would have never have known otherwise.

Huntington House never knew about “The Gainsayers” until Constance Cumbey told them. I didn’t tell them because I wanted to be a respected Christian publisher before all else . . . and Huntington House just barely printed the book in the first place. I didn’t want to give them one more thing to think about. I wanted to be published! . . .

If I am a Mormon, or a Mason, or a New Ager, or just a guy out for a buck or a laugh, then Huntington House cannot be blamed. . . . I did my homework, and they did their’s to the best of their ability. . . . if I am a Christian, then Decker and Constance has injured a good work for selfish reasons. Keep an eye on both of them for the next few years, and I think you’ll see who has been giving you a line. (Letter by Darrick Evenson to Huntington House Publishers, dated May 20, 1991)

The reader will remember that when Darrick Evenson was on WMUZ Radio, he was asked if he were a Mormon. He replied, “I’m not a Mormon.” When he was asked a second time, he gave the same answer. All of the evidence, however, indicates that Mr. Evenson has been a Mormon for many years.

In the letter published in Robert and Rosemary Browns’ book, They Lie In Wait To Deceive, Darrick Evenson wrote that in “February of 1979” he was “a convert of a few months.” He claimed that for a while he had been disturbed by “anti-Mormon” literature but at the time he wrote the letter (October 26, 1981), he had “been fully active for more than a year, and I am now saving up for my mission.”

In his book, The Gainsayers, Mr. Evenson said that he “served a mission in California” (page 22). Eric Pement has written an article entitled, “Troy Lawrence Identified,” which was published in Cornerstone magazine, vol. 20, no. 95, 1991. In this article (page 16) we find that the Missionary Department of the Mormon Church has confirmed to Mr. Pement that Darrick T. Evenson completed an 18-month mission for the church: “According to the Missionary Department of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Darrick T. Evenson was a full-time Mormon missionary from July 1983 to January 1985, stationed in San Jose, Calif.”

Our own records show that Evenson had us send material to him in October 1983. The address given was 220 Bery Court #5, Morgan Hills, California. A map shows that Morgan Hills is close to San Jose. In June, 1984, Mr. Evenson sent a letter to Bill McKeever from “Mountain View”—another city located near San Jose.

In order to serve on a mission for the church a man has to be a member of the church in good standing. Moreover, he must be ordained an Elder in the Melchizedek Priesthood and receive his endowments in a secret ritual in a Mormon temple. While serving on his mission he is supposed to use the word “Elder” before his name. In the letter to Mr. McKeever, Darrick Evenson conforms to this pattern. His name is signed, “Elder Darrick Evenson.” From the evidence presented it is evident that Darrick Evenson was indeed a missionary for the Mormon Church.

It seems very curious that Darrick Evenson would now deny the church he has defended for so many years. While we can not be certain of his motive, it may be possible that he wants to spare his church the embarrassment that is certain to follow the unveiling of his duplicity. If Mr. Evenson were able to convince people that he never really was a Mormon, he could place the whole scandal in a different light. In his book New Age Messiah Identified, Evenson would have us believe that he is a “born-again” Christian: “I . . . became a born-again Christian in 1984.” (page ?) On page 47 he describes himself as a “fundamentalist” Christian, and on page 199 he says: “I discovered, to my surprise, that Evangelical Christianity was the only system consistent with the observable facts. After my intellectual conversion, I had a born-again experience.”

Prior to his visit to our bookstore on April 22, 1991, Darrick Evenson continually stressed that Mormonism was the true form of Christianity. This idea is clearly set forth on page 101 of his book, The Gainsayers:

Jesus is the Christ, the son of the living God. Joseph the Prophet is the high Prophet of God over the sixth dispensation, and the prophet-herald of Christ. If one rejects the herald the King has sent, he likewise rejects the King that sent him . . . Jesus is the Christ, and Joseph is His Prophet.

In his last visit to our bookstore, Mr. Evenson said that he believed in the Bahai religion and that this group fulfilled one of the prophecies given by Joseph Smith. As we have noted earlier, on this occasion Evenson used some very crude and insulting language to two women who were in the bookstore. Sandra finally asked him how he could claim to be a Christian and talk that way. He responded: “Who said I claim to be a Christian?” This was a surprising statement to be coming from the mouth of a man who previously claimed to be a member of an organization he felt was Christ’s true church on earth—i.e., Mormonism.

While Darrick Evenson seemed to be denying that he was any type of Christian when he visited our bookstore, he has subsequently maintained on radio stations that he is, in fact, a Fundamentalist Christian who was “born-again” in 1984. If Mr. Evenson could successfully palm off this deception on the public, he would save Mormonism from a great deal of embarrassment. According to this scenario, Evenson would not be a Mormon who had gone astray and deliberately set out to deceive Christian publishers and those who have ministries to Mormons; instead, he would be a “born-again” Christian who used unethical means to try to destroy Mormonism! Instead of being an embarrassment to the Mormon Church, he would be pointed out as a wicked outsider who was persecuting the LDS faith. We, of course, do not believe that it is possible for Mr. Evenson to pull off such a brazen deception. The facts all point in the opposite direction.

It also seems likely that a financial motive might have played a part in Darrick Evenson’s decision to repudiate Mormonism. In his book, The Gainsayers, Mr. Evenson accused ex-Mormons of profiting from their work on Mormonism:

While working in the anti-LDS movement, I also observed several instances in which anti-Mormons tried to fabricate or exaggerate their Mormon backgrounds. They would attempt to establish that they somehow held stature or prominence among the Latter-day Saints before leaving the LDS Church. . . . It also became increasingly clear to me that their deceptive teachings and half-truths were the very antithesis of the gospel of Jesus Christ . . . . their anti-Mormon claims and assertions fell, one by one . . . .

I regained my testimony of the Gospel and Church of Jesus Christ . . . . I was back among the Saints of the Most High . . . . I also discovered that if one will check the statements, claims, and credentials of most of the outspoken anti-Mormon adversaries, he will eventually discover just who is telling the truth and who is opposing the Lord’s work . . . .

The only difference between being an ex-Mormon and being an “ex” anything else is that you can make a profit being an ex-Mormon, even making it a full-time occupation! . . . .

So, if anyone wants to ask the Latter-day Saints what they believe, the Saints are more than happy to tell them. And if anyone wants to know what the anti-Mormons are saying, the Saints will show them what the anti’s are saying in books that weigh both sides of the argument. An offering plate won’t be passed in front of them, and the Saints won’t ask for love offerings or send them a price list! (The Gainsayers, pages 20, 22-25)

It is interesting to note that after he wrote his book, New Age Messiah Identified, Darrick Evenson himself set out to speak in Protestant churches and received “love offerings.” We know that in one church in Arizona he received $50 for a short presentation. Moreover, in the back of his book, he offers his World Crusade Journal for “$12.00” a year and asks for gifts: “We would appreciate any financial support to our ministry; that support will allow us to continue bringing the Gospel of Jesus to New Agers across the nation.”

While Darrick Evenson probably made some money from his book attacking ministries to Mormons, he apparently had far greater success with his books concerning the zodiac and the New Age movement which were published by Christian publishers. We have been told that Mr. Evenson thought that his book, New Age Messiah Identified would bring him about $50,000 the first year and that there were plans to eventually market about 200,000 copies! One of Mr. Evenson’s associates claimed that Evenson felt that he would be financially secure for the rest of his life because of this book. When his mask began to fall off, he found himself faced with a financial dilemma. If he admitted that he was really a Mormon, he would probably lose all royalties from the Christian publishers. He had misrepresented himself to them as someone who was a New Ager and was “born again” in 1984. Since he served as a missionary for the Mormon Church from July 1983 to January 1985, he could not have become an “Evangelical Christian” in 1984.

In his book, The Gainsayers, page 16, he had an entirely different story; he maintained that he attended a “Protestant church” when he was a young man: “I accepted the Lord as my personal Savior when I was fifteen.” According to the chronology Evenson gave in the Browns’ book, this would have been in the mid-1970’s—about eight years earlier than the date given in New Age Messiah Identified, page 7—i.e., “1984”) In The Gainsayers, pages 16-17, he stated that “When I was eighteen, I was invited to services of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints . . . after considerable study and preparation, I was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints . . . and shortly thereafter, after more prayer and study, I received a personal testimony that Jesus truly was the Christ, and that Joseph Smith was His Prophet.”

In the New Age Messiah Identified, however, Darrick Evenson claimed he was brought up as an occultist:

I was raised a Theosophist . . . I was taught to view Christians, or at least the “fundamentalist” variety, as bizarre, fanatical, ignorant, and, above all, dangerous . . . . In my young adulthood I became an ardent student of the occult. I initiated several of my friends into the occult. Later, after I became a born-again believer, I used the contacts and knowledge that I had in the occult to go “undercover” back into the New Age. (page 46)

Besides these contradictory stories, Darrick Evenson also referred to his own Mormon religion as one of the “cults” that teach false doctrines. We find the following in New Age Messiah Identified:

Here we see a genuine delineation between the truth of the Gospel and the lies of the cults. True Christians believe in the resurrection of the body. Jehovah’s Witnesses, Moonies, all the various cults and aberrations of Christian thought, deny the reality of the physical resurrection. Some Mormons claim to believe in the resurrection of the body, but their error lines up with the esotericists in their belief that God is a man who advanced to a higher level of perfection. Not dissimilar to Creme’s and other secret temple teachings of the esoteric mystery religions. Only those who hold to the Scriptures as God’s revelation, have any chance of not being deceived. (New Age Messiah Identified, page 55)

The Cults are growing at alarming rates: Mormonism, Russellsim (Jehovah’s Witnesses, etc.), and even the lesser cults, such as Armstrongism, are growing so fast that they can’t build churches fast enough to house their converts. . . . Something needs to be done. (Ibid., page 197)

Darrick Evenson’s duplicity is clearly revealed by the following information which has come to light. In his book, The Gainsayers, Evenson vigorously attacks the film, “The God
On page 166 of his book, Mr. Evenson commented: “This chapter has been a brief refutation of some of the major accusations that are the very foundation of the film and book ‘The God Makers’ and other similar anti-Mormon works. Have the gainsayers been accurate in portraying what Latter-day Saints ‘really’ believe? It is obvious that accuracy has not been their objective. Instead, they have intentionally sought to distort the truth and malign the Saints.” Chapter 6 of Evenson’s book is entitled, “The God Makers’ Film: An Example of Extreme Anti-Mormon Propaganda.” This 24-page chapter is devoted to explaining and refuting the charges of the films, “The God Makers” and “Temple of the God Makers.”

One would think that after making such an attack on the two films mentioned above, Darrick Evenson would have nothing but contempt for those who had a part in producing them. As unbelievable as it may seem, however, in the “Acknowledgments” for his new book Mr. Evenson pays tribute to Pat Matrisciana: “I would like to thank the following individuals and organizations for making this book possible: Pat Matrisciana of Jeremiah Films . . .” (New Age Messiah Identified, page 1). It is a well-known fact that Pat Matrisciana’s Jeremiah Films did “The God Makers” and “Temple of the God Makers” for Ed Decker’s organization!

In his article in Cornerstone magazine, page 24, Eric Pement reveals that there is even more to the story:

“Troy Lawrence” met Pat Matrisciana, owner of Jeremiah Films, at a prophecy conference in 1989 and told Matrisciana he was a former New Ager. He said he’d been converted after reading God’s of the New Age, written in 1985 by Pat’s wife, Caryl. “Troy” wanted to publish a new manuscript and needed help finding a publisher. Pat contacted Huntington House on his behalf. (Pat had no idea Darrick/Troy had just published a book attacking Pat’s film Gods of the New Age as a “perverted” portrayal of Mormon doctrine.) Ironically, when his New Age book Messiah Identified came in 1991, “Troy” said he had been converted through reading Constance Cumbey’s Hidden Dangers of the Rainbow in 1984!”

In April, 1991, Darrick Evenson must have realized that his devious past had caught up with him. If he admitted he was really a Mormon who was posing as an orthodox Christian, he stood in danger of losing his royalties, “love offerings” from churches and donations to a so-called non-profit organization he had set up. Mr. Evenson chose to repudiate his connection with Mormonism and maintain that he was really a “born-again” believer in the Evangelical Protestant faith. This desperate action, however, will probably not save Evenson’s reputation as a “Christian” writer.

Although we may never know for certain, we feel that at one time Darrick Evenson really believed the Mormon faith. His book, The Gainsayers, which was published two years before New Age Messiah Identified, may really reflect the views he held at the time he penned it. He probably believed that Mormonism was the only true religion and that those who attack it must be very evil and even satanically inspired. Below are some interesting quotations from the book. The reader will note his fervent appeals for honesty and truth:

The gainsayers of today are well organized and financed. . . . They’re aggressive and rapidly expanding their outreach . . . They spread many false and slanted reports about the Church. Their anti-Mormon propaganda frequently utilizes numerous “yellow journalism” techniques of deception to mislead the perceptions of those who read it. . . .

I was rather upset, and I was determined to speak with the leaders of the ministry in order to set things straight. I was beginning to feel that it wasn’t ethical to use lies in order to destroy what they thought was a lie; it didn’t make sense to me. (The Gainsayers, pages 14, 15, 20)

. . . the truth is that every accusation can be answered to not only refute it, but to bring an added testimony that Jesus is the Christ, and Joseph is His latter-day prophet! . . . it is the work of Satan to oppose the work of God by trying to deceive men into believing that the truth is a lie and his lie the truth. His influence is clearly seen on the anti-Christ movement against the Saints in both former and latter-days! . . .

Who are the gainsayers? Today as in ancient times, they are anti-Christians who do all they can to thwart the true work of God. (Ibid., pages 94-95, 100)

. . . I heard about incidents where Ex-Mormons for Jesus (who probably had never been Mormons) were attending Testimony Meetings at local LDS Church meetinghouses, going up to the microphone, and giving their ‘testimonies’ that Joseph Smith was a false prophet and that the Mormon Church was false as well.

This sickened my very soul! How could anyone who professed to believe in Christ deceptively approach and enter any church with such audacious and deceptive conduct as that? . . . I couldn’t justify this conduct in my heart, to myself, or to my Lord. . . . I spoke with several Ex-Mormons for Jesus . . . I explained to them how I felt and how I couldn’t justify the deception involved in their movement to myself. I began to point out to them the deceptive nature of some of their witnessing techniques and to refute their claims. . . . I kept them on one subject . . . asking them how it could possibly be justified for them to lie and misrepresent in the name of Christ? (Ibid., pages 106-107)

While it could be argued that these comments were only part of an act by Darrick Evenson, we are inclined to believe that they represented his true feelings about Mormonism. We tend to believe that he really felt that Mormonism was true and that he was going to stop the mouths of the “gainsayers.” His zealous and hostile attitude toward Mormon critics might even be compared to Apostle Paul’s confrontations with Christians before he became converted to their faith.

When he began his research Darrick Evenson may have really believed that the Mormon Church was led by revelation. In his book, page 138, he stated: “Sandra Tanner . . . says she knows of a Mormon bishop that doesn’t believe in Mormonism. Again, no name is given.” Mr. Evenson could not seem to believe that this was the case and came down to the bookstore to question her on this matter. She, of course, did not reveal the bishop’s name. While this did not set very well with Evenson, some time later he returned and admitted that he himself had encountered a bishop who did not believe. Like many others, Darrick Evenson could have started out as a true believer, but when he learned how devastating the case is against Mormonism he may have lost faith in all religion.

Non-Profit?

On pages 198-199 of New Age Messiah Identified, Darrick Evenson claimed that he had a publication known as “The World Crusade Journal” and had also set up a nonprofit organization to counter cults and the occult: “The World Crusade Journal is the official publication of The Society for the Propagation & Revival of the Gospel, Incorporated. You can call us the S.P.R.G. We are named after the first Protestant missionary society: The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG).” One page 201 of his book, Mr. Evenson stated: “All donations to the S.P.R.G. Inc. are tax deductible.” On the next page the address for his non-profit organization is given: “S.P.R.G. Inc., P.O. Box 9535, Tacoma, WA 98409.” Toward the bottom of the page we read that “The Society for the Propagation and Revival of the Gospel, Incorporated, is a non-profit evangelistic organization.”

In a letter to Huntington House Publishers, dated May 2, 1991, Ed Decker claimed that a check with the IRS showed that Darrick Evenson had never set up such an organization: “...we were able to get access to the IRS’s national database for non-profit Corporations this morning... Darrick’s SPRG is nowhere in the system. Name similarity checks showed nothing either... This means that the book offers tax receipts for a non-existent corporation with a fraudulent offer of Federal Tax deductible receipts.” An organization which desires to gain non-profit status has to be incorporated in some state before it can even begin to be considered by the Federal Government. As we have shown, the address Darrick Evenson lists for his “non-profit” organization is in Tacoma, Washington. Mr. Decker, however, claimed on Mike Mistretta’s radio program that a check with the state of Washington revealed no such organization. Both Decker and Mistretta, however, stated that in a tape recorded conversation Mr. Evenson claimed that he had really set the organization up in Arizona. Mike Mistretta, therefore, checked with the state of Arizona and found nothing that even resembled the name that Evenson had given.

Although such an organization was never actually set up in Arizona, information which we have shows that at one time Darrick Evenson was hoping to be involved with Robert Brown in a new non-profit organization in Arizona. This information came from Evenson himself. Mr. Evenson seems to have felt that he could frighten us by revealing what he and other Mormons were planning to do to oppose our work. On June 20, 1988, he called for...it will provide the Saints with reasonable and ...tax deductible contributions...” This certainly seems to make it clear that Darrick Evenson was planning on working hand-in-hand with the Browns in this project. What the Browns thought about the matter might be another story.

In a footnote on page 15 of the document, we read that “many people have contributed to this effort under its former name—the Religious Research Association.” This was an organization which was set up by the Browns, and sometimes hazardous, nature of this work the Committee shall deem some OPERATIONS overt and some covert. It shall be the job of SPECIAL SERVICES to conduct OPERATIONS; meaning activities of a special nature not covered by the other departments of the Committee.

We need your help... Your financial support is needed, so that we may continue to research and publish the truth about those who misrepresent the Church and its teachings. Those that contribute at least $25 will receive one year’s issues of THE WATCHMAN QUARTERLY JOURNAL.

Information will be gathered and organized on the anti-LDS Movement and message. Researchers will then investigate the claims, credentials, and allegations of anti-LDS ministers, their publications, and its impact on the Saints. When the truth is documented it will be prepared and published in either books, cassette tapes, video tapes, pamphlet[s], or by the film media... The Watchtower Committee will serve as the umbrella organization for all groups and individuals who wish to defend the faith. ... #14. SPECIAL SERVICES shall be responsible for the OPERATIONS of the Committee. Because of the sensitive, and sometimes hazardous, nature of this work the Committee shall deem some OPERATIONS overt and some covert. It shall be the job of SPECIAL SERVICES to conduct OPERATIONS; meaning activities of a special nature not covered by the other departments of the Committee.

We need your help... Your financial support is needed, so that we may continue to research and publish the truth about those who misrepresent the Church and its teachings. Those that contribute at least $25 will receive one year’s issues of THE WATCHMAN QUARTERLY JOURNAL.

It is interesting to note that the address given, “P.O. Box 2671, Mesa AZ 85204,” is the same as Brownsworth Publishing Co., Inc. (see the title page of They In Wait To Deceive, vol. 3). This is the publishing company that markets the Browns’ books. The name “Brownsworth” may be a combination of the name Brown with the last six letters of the name of the editor of They Lie In Wait To Deceive volumes. Her name is Barbara Ellsworth. In any case, the phone number listed in the Proposal is the same number listed on the back cover of volumes two and three of the Browns’ books, They Lie In Wait To Deceive: “INQUIRES: (602) 834-5676.” This certainly seems to make it clear that Darrick Evenson was planning on working hand-in-hand with the Browns in this project. What the Browns thought about the matter might be another story.

In November, 1990, Darrick Evenson was in Arizona working on setting up an organization to counter Mormon critics. He no longer used the name “Watchman Committee” — this time it was to be called “Zion’s Camp Committee” or “ZCC.” On November 5, 1990, The Arizona Latter-Day Sun, a newspaper printed for Mormon people, devoted a good deal of space concerning his attempt to organize the committee. We find the following in that article:

Arizona Latter-day Saints are invited to participate in a new organization for the defense of the Faith. The new group is called Zion’s Camp Committee...
Many Arizona Latter-day Saints will remember the work of Robert and Rosemary Brown of Mesa. They have been writing “defense of the Faith” books since 1980. They literally put one well-known anti-Mormon permanently out-of-business.

The Browns will soon have volume four of their “They Lie In Wait to Deceive” series. Volume Four will be an expose of J. Edward Decker and The God Makers film. . . . Dr. Gilbert Scharffs, an Institute instructor at the University of Utah, wrote an exhaustive work entitled “The Truth About The God Makers.” . . . Dr. Scharffs is also now working on the Zion’s Camp Committee.

In 1985 Darrick Evenson, a former anti-Mormon, but now a returned missionary, wrote The Gainsayers. This book too, has proved to be very useful in helping people respond to the anti-LDS movement and messages.

“But haven’t the Brethren warned us not to debate with the anti-Mormons?”

“Yes, indeed, the purpose of Zion’s Camp Committee is not to debate anti-Mormons, but to provide missionaries and members with materials that will help them with investigators and new converts who, inevitably, come into contact with anti-Mormon writings or individuals,” says Evenson.

“The Brethren have stated that we should reply ‘positively’ to our critics. This can only be done if people have the right information, and know how to use it rightly as well. Zion’s Camp Committee has, collectively, hundreds of years of experience in this field.” . . .

A publication is now being prepared for LDS “defenders of the Faith” and their supporters. The newsletter is called “The Latter-day Saints’ Messenger & Advocate.” The Zion’s Camp Committee invites those interested to contact them.

The group is looking for LDS “defenders of the Faith,” and those who wish to support their effort in defending the Faith.

The article went on to refer the reader to “P.O. Box 1186, Provo, Utah 84603.” In addition, it gave a phone number in Arizona where Darrick Evenson could be contacted. The reader will notice that the article mentions a newsletter called “The Latter-day Saints’ Messenger & Advocate.” The Proposal that Mr. Evenson sent to us in 1988 also stated: “THE MESSENGER & ADVOCATE is the Committee NEWSLETTER.”

It is interesting to note that the newspaper article cited above mentioned that Dr. Gilbert Scharffs was “working on the Zion’s Camp Committee.” When we contacted Dr. Scharffs, he seemed to have no recollection of working on this particular committee. He did say, however, that Darrick Evenson had invited him to some of the meetings regarding a new organization he was trying to set up. Out of curiosity Scharffs attended “two or three meetings.” While he told Mr. Evenson that he “would help” him with questions that might arise, he did not want to be an official member of the organization. Later, however, when he read the first issue of The Messenger & Advocate, he was surprised to find his name listed on the “Advisory Board” of the organization.

At any rate, some time after sending us the Proposal, Mr. Evenson came to our bookstore. At that time he had a revised plan for the organization. He made a sketch on a small piece of paper which we still have in our possession. The words, “Watchtower Committee,” which were in the original Proposal, still appeared but they were no longer the name of the organization itself. The name “Zion’s Camp Committee” did not appear on this paper. The name of the organization was to be “S.P.R.G.” The reader will remember that Darrick Evenson later used this abbreviation when appealing for funds in his book, New Age Messiah Identified: “Address all correspondence to: S.P.R.G. Inc., P.O. Box 9535, Tacoma, WA 98409.” On the sheet of paper Evenson left with us he did not specify what the letters “S.P.R.G.” stood for. We have already noted that in the book written for orthodox Christians, Evenson said the letters stood for “The Society for the Propagation & Revival of the Gospel.” Since the organization he informed us about was supposed to be for the purpose of countering Mormon critics and since the LDS Church claims to have the “restored gospel” of Jesus Christ, we speculated that the letters could have stood for something like the following: The Society for the Propagation of the Restored Gospel. An associate of Darrick Evenson confirmed that this was correct.

While we knew that Mr. Evenson wanted to set up such an organization to counter the work of Mormon critics, we had no reason to believe that he had actually set up a corporation. The reader will remember that the records for both Washington and Arizona revealed nothing about Darrick forming a corporation. On July 21, 1991, however, we received a very important phone call from an individual who informed us that he believed that Darrick Evenson did form a corporation in Utah. We found that this information was correct and obtained photocopies of the “Articles of Incorporation.” Mr. Evenson did indeed set up such an organization. Article I of this document reads as follows:

“The name of the corporation shall be the following: THE SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE RESTORED GOSPEL, INC.” This corporation was “approved on the 5th day of July 1990.”

It is obvious that Darrick Evenson could not reveal to the publishers of his book, New Age Messiah Identified, that he had set up this organization in Utah because its name would clearly show that it was to promote Mormonism, not to fight the New Age movement and other cults! In any event, Utah law requires that there should be three trustees. Mr. Evenson, who was one of the trustees, gave his address as 340 East 600 North, No. 5 in Provo, Utah. Two other men are listed as trustees; one lives in Salt Lake City and the other in Mt. Vernon, Washington. We were particularly interested in the man who lives in Washington. His name is given as “Corbin Volluz.”

When we called Mr. Volluz, who is a lawyer, we found that he was very open and friendly. He said that he was interested in seeing some type of organization being set up to counter Mormon critics and had some interest in what Darrick Evenson proposed to him. He stated, however, that the appearance of his name on the Articles of Incorporation “was not with my consent.” He claimed he had never given Mr. Evenson permission to use his name and was surprised when he got a document from Evenson stating that he was treasurer of the organization! He later sent Darrick a letter asking that he refrain from using his name with regard to the organization.

The Articles of Incorporation are notarized by Martin S. Tanner, a lawyer who has a radio program on religion on KTKK in Salt Lake City. Mr. Tanner also seemed cordial and open about the matter. He said that he prepared the incorporation papers for Darrick Evenson. Although Evenson had to pay the filing fee charged by the state, Mr. Tanner did not charge him for his work on the papers. He did not believe that the organization ever got off the ground. He told Darrick Evenson that he could not claim that donations to the organization were tax deductible until he received approval from the Internal Revenue Service. He had no knowledge as to whether Mr. Evenson ever requested tax exempt status from the IRS.

On July 26, 1991, we checked with the IRS to see if Darrick Evenson had filed a request for a non-profit organization under the name he was using in Utah, “The Society for the Propagation of the Restored Gospel.” The result was the same as before: no organization using that name has applied for tax-exempt status. It would appear, therefore, that unless Mr. Evenson can come forth with some evidence that there has been a mistake, he is involved in a fraudulent operation which is against the law.

We have recently been given a copy of a “Proposal” drawn up by Darrick Evenson for an organization known as “Zion’s Watchmen Committee.” It is dated “April 1990,” and is similar in many respects to the document we received in 1988. The Zion’s Watchmen Committee is put forth in this proposal as “A Division of The Society for the Propagation of the Restored Gospel. Darrick Evenson is listed on page 11 of this document as the “Director” of the organization. Like the first organization Mr. Evenson tried to set up, the purpose of Zion’s Watchmen Committee was “to counter the campaign of misinformation promulgated by the wealthy and powerful anti-LDS Movement.” This document has a great deal of information on the work of the Browns and indicates that the Browns “Religious Research Association was the forerunner of the Zion’s Watchmen Committee of The Society for the Propagation of the Restored Gospel.”

Death Threats

In the Salt Lake City Messenger for July 1990, we reported that Ed Decker claimed he had received a “call from a man who told him he was part of an assassination team that received directions from a member of the First Presidency in the Mormon Church. According to Decker, the man said that three people had been marked for death. One of the authors (Jerald Tanner) was among that number and was to be killed with a bomb.” We found it very hard to believe that a member of the First Presidency would be involved with an assassination team. That they would use a bomb to commit a murder seemed even more unlikely. The Hofmann scandal clearly demonstrated how much publicity the use of bombs can generate. Would the Mormon leaders be so foolish as to bring national attention to their problems they have with us by using a bomb?

We had almost forgotten about this supposed threat to our lives when Darrick Evenson came into our bookstore on April 22, 1991. After the confrontation which ensued and Mr. Evenson was asked to leave the premises, he made a very strange statement; he referred to the murderous plan mentioned above and suggested that there may really be something to it and that we should take it as being a serious threat. While we still could not believe that a member of the First Presidency [Gordon B. Hinckley] would be involved in such a project, we began to wonder what Evenson knew about the phone call. Could it be possible that he or one of his associates made such a call in an attempt to cause fear and dissension among the ministries? He, in fact, knew that Ed Decker had been leveling serious charges against Hinckley for some time and seemed to be very angry about the matter. Perhaps he wanted Decker to make some foolish move against Hinckley. While we may never know whether Darrick Evenson knew anything about the origin of the mysterious phone call, it seems obvious that he was so upset about being asked to leave our bookstore that he used the incident in an attempt to strike terror into our hearts.

From all that we can learn, Darrick Evenson has a reputation for being very combative. In the interview on Mike Mistretta’s radio program on KHEP, Ed Decker suggested that Darrick Evenson may be a dangerous man:

[have said], “he scares me.” . . . one man said, “you know I’m a married man with four kids, I’m a Mormon but you know my wife gets real nervous around him . . . he scares us.”

Darrick Evenson, however, claims that it is the other way around—he is the one who is being persecuted and “assaulted” by over zealous Mormon critics and people involved in the New Age movement. In his letter to the Browns, They Lie In Wait To Deceive, vol. 1, 2nd edition, page 280, Mr. Evenson claims that some Mormon critics have cursed him “to the eternal flames of Hell to be tortured continually forever. I have even been assaulted on several occasions.”

On the back cover of New Age Messiah Identified, we read:

After years of undercover investigation, late night clandestine meetings and disguised rendezvous with New Age elite, Troy Lawrence unveils the secret plans spawned by the occult hierarchy. Placing his life on the line, this former disciple of Benjamin Creme . . . provides photos of the New Age Messiah . . . “I’ve placed my life in danger to get this information out,” says Lawrence, “we all know what has happened to some who have come out of the New Age movement . . . ”

On page 3 of his book, Darrick Evenson related:

But the paper trail . . . led me from California to Karachi . . . from the Ahmadiyya movement to a small but powerful group called the “Hassassins.” A group so dangerous we derive the term “assassins” from them.

My life has been threatened many times, I have been physically attacked, and I’ve even been the victim of a high-speed chase—all in the hope of silencing me. I have, however, never regretted my decision to go public (not even after I learned that fellow laborer Randall Baer had been mysteriously killed).

Darrick Evenson would have us believe that it was necessary for him to use the alias “Troy Lawrence” because he feared assassination. We, of course, believe that the real reason was that he wished to hide his real identity from Mormons and those who criticized the LDS Church.

In 1990, Mr. Evenson came to the Salt Lake Alliance Church to hear a presentation on Mormonism by Dick Baer. He took offense over what was said and began to interrupt the meeting. The situation became so serious that Pastor Gary Atwood finally had to ask him to leave. Evenson left the building but before doing so threatened that he would “get” the pastor! For some time he paced back and forth on the sidewalk in front of the church as though he were stalking the pastor. Although those who were present feared for Pastor Atwood’s safety, Mr. Evenson finally left the area. Fortunately, he has never returned to the church.

Some of the Latter-day Saints we talked to about Darrick Evenson were concerned about his violent outbursts and even apologized for his behavior. At least two Mormons felt that he could be dangerous to others. One, in fact, suggested that he was like a “keg of dynamite ready to go off.”

Because of Darrick Evenson’s contentious attitude and unpredictable behavior, we have been somewhat concerned about reporting this story. We felt, however, that it was very important for people to have this information. We would ask those who have an interest in our ministry to hold us up in prayer.

In addition, the reader should remember Mr. Evenson in prayer. After all, he has probably experienced a great deal of emotional distress in his long and unsuccessful battle to counter critics of the Mormon Church. He put a great deal of effort into trying to set up a large and powerful organization that would silence the “gainsayers,” and must have been very disappointed when he was unable to rally the support he envisioned. Moreover, his attempt to establish himself as an important writer on the occult has been brought to a screeching halt by the exposure of his dual identity. Darrick’s greatest need is to find peace with God through submission to Jesus Christ.

Serious Questions

Darrick Evenson’s deceitful actions have placed a number of publishers in an embarrassing position. In his article in Cornerstone magazine, page 24, Eric Pement informs us that Here’s Life Publishers “has ceased publication” of Evenson’s book, The Secret Message of the Zodiac, and that “full credit will be given for returns of Zodiac.” On July 16, 1991, we contacted Huntington House Publishers and were told that The New Age Messiah Identified, was “indefinitely” out of stock and that there were no plans to republish it at the present time.

Mormon publisher Duane Crowther, owner of Horizon Publishers, finds himself in a very awkward position. He himself has played an important role in defending the church against its critics. Mr. Crowther, for example, has produced a cassette tape entitled, Recognizing Techniques of Deception in Anti-Mormon Literature. In a printed summary of his tape, Mr. Crowther has “Ten Questions to Ask About the Critic.” In this list we find the following:

3. Do I perceive him to be trustworthy, and a person of integrity?
4. Is he a seeker after truth, who refrains from misrepresenting my church’s doctrines and history? . . .
9. Do I feel the Holy Spirit in him, and in me, when he talks to me, or when I read his writings?

Duane Crowther also recommends that when “a critic attacks the Church, evaluate the integrity of both his literature and the critic himself . . .” Mr. Crowther appeals to Christians to be honest about what they promote: “Christians are faced with a growing problem of ethics. Should Christian bookstores stock religious literature which attacks various denominations when those books are shown to rely heavily on yellow journalism techniques? Should individuals read them or quote from them?”

After making these solemn warnings concerning responsibility, Duane Crowther finds himself in the position of being the publisher of a book written by a man who seems to be without principle. One would think that Mr. Crowther would be so convicted by his own statements that he would immediately cease selling the book. Unfortunately, however, this has not been the case. Eric Pement says that “Evenson’s Mormon publisher, Duane Crowther, is uncertain whether he will continue printing The Gainsayers. He is aware Evenson is trying to play both sides of the fence, but told one of our researchers he is inclined to reprint the book anyway. He believes many of the arguments defending Mormonism are valid, since he rewrote much of the original manuscript himself to make it suitable for publication. Gainsayers is also one of their better-selling books” (Cornerstone, page 24).

On July 15, 1991, we called Duane Crowther’s Horizon Publishers and found that his company was still selling copies of Evenson’s book. Moreover, on July 21, 1991, we went to the Mormon Church’s own bookstore, Deseret Book, and found that it was also still selling The Gainsayers! The church seems to be very unpredictable with regard to what it will sell or ban. On July 11, 1991, the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

A fast-selling book . . . was pulled off the shelves at Deseret Book and, according to the author, threatened with shredding this week.

“We think his excuse for these “Trojan horse” methods falls flat for several reasons: First and foremost, it’s biblical. . . . God’s people have “renounced the hidden things of shame, not walking in craftiness” [2 Cor. 4:2] but have laid aside “all guile [and] hypocrisy” [1 Peter 2:1] . . . if Evenson is doing “undercover” work in Mormonism, Masonry, the Watchtower, etc., he is making false professions and giving false testimony in the process.

We feel that there are still many missing pieces to the Darrick Evenson puzzle. For example, he claimed that “a number of individuals” were involved with him in his “Trojan horse” activities. (We have become aware of another man who professes to be a critic of the Mormon Church but is using an alias. Furthermore, in his writings this man sometimes refers to himself as “The Trojan Warrior.” We have reason to believe that “The Trojan Warrior” is in contact with another man who has used an alias in the past.) Darrick Evenson has stated that he had “a number” of aliases (we only know of “Troy Lawrence”) and that he wrote “under a few different names.” While one of Darrick Evenson’s associates would only confirm what we already knew about Mr. Evenson, he did state that he felt we only knew part of the tale. He claimed that it was an incredible story of intrigue. He frankly admitted that Evenson had infiltrated numerous Christian organizations which we do not know about.
When we printed the fact that Steven Mayfield was spying on Mormon critics, many people contacted us with information concerning him. If any of our readers recognize Darrick Evenson’s picture as someone they know under another name or if they have any letters from him or any additional material concerning him we would appreciate knowing about it. Send any information to Utah Lighthouse Ministry, PO Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110 or call us at 801-485-8894.

Besides the people we have mentioned earlier, we also want to thank a number of Mormons who have helped us by providing information concerning Darrick Evenson. Only one of them tried to talk us out of doing the story. Most of them felt that the story needed to be told to the public, and some even came to us with very important information. Three of the LDS people we talked to made it clear that they did not want their names to appear in the newsletter.

Mormon Scholars Scolded

As we indicated earlier, the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies (F.A.R.M.S.) has made a vicious attack on some of the liberal Mormon scholars who are expressing doubts about the historicity of the Book of Mormon. These scholars are accused of being wolves in sheep’s clothing, and one writer even refers to them as offering “a Trojan horse” to an unsuspecting Mormon audience. Although the controversy has been simmering for a number of years, it boiled over after Signature Books published a book edited by Dan Vogel entitled, The Word of God: Essays on Mormon Scripture. This book, which contains contributions from a number of Mormon scholars, did not set well with some of the Mormon professors at the church’s Brigham Young University and others who are involved with F.A.R.M.S. Stephen E. Robinson, chairman of the Department of Ancient Scripture at BYU, was incensed with the book. He compared the views expressed in the work to those of Korihor, the notorious “Anti-Christ” who was “struck dumb” because of his unbelief (see Book of Mormon, Alma, chapter 30). Professor Robinson wrote:

Korihor’s back, and this time he’s got a printing press. Korihor, the infamous “alternate voice” in the Book of Mormon, insisted that “no man can know of anything which is to come” . . . in its continuing assault upon traditional Mormonism, Signature Books promotes with its recent and dubiously titled work, The Word of God, precisely these same naturalistic assumptions of the Korihor agenda in dealing with current Latter-day Saint beliefs . . . this is a propaganda piece . . .

Variations on a single theme recur, offered like a Trojan horse, in most of the essays in The Word of God. . . .

For years anti-Mormons have hammered the Church from the outside, insisting that Joseph Smith and the Latter-day Saint scriptures he produced were not what they claimed to be. By and large the Latter-day Saints simply ignored these attacks. Whether Signature Books and its authors will convince the Saints of the same hostile propositions by attacking from the inside remains to be seen. . . . What the anti-Mormons couldn’t do with a frontal assault of contradiction, Signature and Vogel would now accomplish with a flanking maneuver of redefinition. . . .

The uniformity of perspective among the essays, the pervasive use of the straw man, and the absence of any opposing viewpoint identify The Word of God as a work of propaganda. . . .

I suppose by now it is clear that I did not like this book.

. . . Give me a Walter Martin anytime, a good stout wolf with his own fur on, instead of those more timid or sly parading around in their ridiculous fleeces with their teeth and tails hanging out. Give me “Ex-Mormons for Jesus” or the Moody Bible Tract Society, who are at least honest about their anti-Mormon agenda, instead of Signature Books camouflaged as a “Latter-day Saint” press. I prefer my anti-Mormons straight up. (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 3, 1991, pages 312, 314, 317-318)

Brigham Young University professor Louis Midgley also leveled his sights at Dan Vogel and Signature Books. He asserted that Vogel has not demonstrated “that his stance involves more than a murky sentimentalism or a confidence game aimed at accomplishing covertly what has not been done directly—namely, eradicating by radical transformation the faith resting on Joseph Smith’s prophetic claims” (page 296). On page 299, he charged that Dan Vogel “found a new patron in George D. Smith, owner of Signature Books . . . part of Smith’s effort involves showing that the Book of Mormon is not an authentic ancient history, that is, not simply true.”

Professor Midgley felt that Vogel’s book “leaves the restoration exactly where the enemies of the Church have always wanted it—repudiated” (page 305). Midgley also launched into an attack on Joseph Smith’s New York Reputation Reexamined, published by Signature Books, and called the author, Roger I. Anderson, “a career apostate” (page 306).

These articles, printed by F.A.R.M.S., set off a train of events which eventually led to the possibility of a law suit in which Mormon scholars on both sides of the question might have to face each other in court. Finally, however, F.A.R.M.S. decided to back down and issue a carefully worded “Correction or Clarification” in its newsletter:

Also, in Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, volume 3, statements are made that could be construed as calling unspecified contributors to The Word of God: Essays on Mormon Scripture and Signature Books, Inc., “dishonest” and “hard-core anti-Latter-day Saints.” These statements were the reviewer’s interpretation of portions of the book, and no personal connotation was intended.

The opinions expressed in the reviews are those of the reviewers alone and do not necessarily represent the position of F.A.R.M.S. (Insights: An Ancient Window, July 1991, page 6)

In an Associated Press story, Vern Anderson reported that F.A.R.M.S. claimed it was not really worried about a suit for libel but issued the statement in “a spirit of reconciliation”:

To his critics, George D. Smith is a shadowy figure of considerable wealth bent on reshaping Mormonism by digging through its past. To colleagues, he’s a shy man of principle in pursuit of truth.

As president of Signature Books, an independent publisher of Mormon-related history and literature, Smith is committed to unfettered historical inquiry....

Mormon Church-owned Deseret Book this month pulled two of Signature’s titles from its shelves. One of them, “Joseph Smith’s New York Reputation Reexamined,” by Rodger Anderson, had been named the Mormon History...
Association’s best first book. The other was “The Word of God: Essays on Mormon Scripture.”

At the same time, F.A.R.M.S. at Brigham Young University issued a “correction or clarification” . . .

The clarification in the F.A.R.M.S. newsletter came after a call from Signature’s attorney. Foundation founder John W. Welch said it was issued in a spirit of reconciliation, not worry that anyone had been libeled.

Indeed, Welch personally believes the Anderson book to be “expressly anti-Mormon” and its publisher as prone as anyone to the bias he claims to abhor.

Signature’s founding in 1981 grew out of the church’s decision to cancel a planned 16-volume history of the faith and to muzzle its own historical department. Smith . . . and his Mormon wife jumped at the chance to publish some of the rejected work. . . .

But if the so-called “apologists” and “revisionists” are merely at odds on the field of Mormon history, they are locked in a relative death grip over what most church members see as the cornerstones of Mormon doctrine . . . . (Salt Lake Tribune, July 22, 1991)

Signature Books has printed some very important works on Mormon history. Those who are interested in receiving a catalogue can write to them at 564 W. 400 N., Salt Lake City, UT 84116. Their phone number is: (801) 531-1483.

Tiff Over a Black Hole

Since we began publishing material on Mormonism in 1959, we have waited in vain for the church to make a response. Although a large number of people have left the Mormon Church because of our publications, church leaders seem to feel that their best policy is silence. Since they apparently cannot find a way to refute our allegations, they believe that the less people know about our publications the better. In an article written in Utah Holiday, February 1978, David Merrill observed: “The official attitude of the Mormon hierarchy toward the Tanners has been one of silence and apparent unconcern. They have, however, actively discouraged LDS scholars and intellectuals from jousting with the Tanners . . .”

Prior to the publication of our book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, in 1990, church scholars at Brigham Young University and F.A.R.M.S. followed the church leaders’ advice and studiously avoided locking horns with us. With the publication of our work on the “black hole,” however, they apparently realized that it was time to speak up. After remaining virtually silent for over thirty years, Mormon scholars have suddenly come out like an army to attack us. They have recently published three reviews, containing seventy-five pages, directing our work on the theory of a black hole in the Book of Mormon! These reviews appear in F.A.R.M.S.’ publication, Reviews of Books on The Book of Mormon, vol. 3.

While the Mormon apologists who wrote these articles against us are not as vicious in their attack as those who took on the Mormon scholars who they consider to be “disaffected Latter-day Saints,” they are rather condescending in their approach. Furthermore, one of the authors, John A. Tvedtnes, directly accuses us of dishonesty:

> Jerald and Sandra Tanner are two of the best known critics of the Latter-day Saint Church, its doctrines, history, and scriptures. As such, it is strange to see them come out with a book in which they profess themselves to be the “good guys” (my wording) in the anti-Mormon debate. They claim, for example, to have believed in the divine origin of the Book of Mormon as late as 1960, and that they began a sincere search to prove that the book was true, but found more and more evidence that it was not. This, they write, was painful to them (pp. 1, 7). (Reviews of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 3, page 188)

In a footnote at the bottom of the same page, John Tvedtnes argues that our account of how we came to disbelieve the Book of Mormon is simply not true:

> These statements are at variance with what Sandra Tanner once told me about how she came to lose her faith as a teenager, and make me wonder how they can criticize Joseph Smith for making similar “changes” in his story.

This is certainly a very serious charge to make against our integrity, and we assure the reader that it is without foundation in fact. What we wrote in our book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, concerning our early belief in the Book of Mormon is absolutely correct. We not only believed in the authenticity of the Book of Mormon in 1960, but we continued to believe in it until 1962. While Mr. Tvedtnes cannot find a scintilla of evidence to support his charge, we have abundant proof that we were supporting the Book of Mormon until near the end of 1962. We have, for example, a book which was given to us by the noted Mormon scholar Francis W. Kirkham. In this book Dr. Kirkham made the following inscription: “To newly found friends and believers in the Book of Mormon. Mr & Mrs Jerald Tanner. Frances W. Kirkham[,] Salt Lake City, Utah[,] July 22, 1960.” Furthermore, in a book “Copyright 1962,” Mormon writer Kate B. Carter wrote the following:

> . . . Jerald Tanner . . . when asked what he and his followers believed, wrote: “We believe the Bible and the Book of Mormon to be the word of God. . . .”

Mr. Tanner has written a number of tracts which he distributes freely on such subjects as the Book of Mormon, Priesthood, Marriage, proof that the Book of Mormon and the Bible agree . . . (Denominations that Base Their Beliefs on the teachings of Joseph Smith, 1962, page 51)

Prior to our marriage in 1959, we had read a tract by David Whitmer entitled An Address to All Believers in Christ. Whitmer, of course, was one of three witnesses to the Book of Mormon. We were impressed with his message that the Book of Mormon was authentic but that the church had fallen into some serious errors such as polygamy (see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 568, for a statement concerning this matter). Like David Whitmer, who separated himself from the Mormon Church, we continued to believe in the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon and promoted belief in it until 1962. John Tvedtnes seems to feel that there is a contradiction because “Sandra Tanner once told me about how she came to lose her faith as a teenager . . .” There is no misrepresentation here. Sandra was eighteen years old at the time we were married. She was still a teenager until January 1961. She lost faith in the teachings of the Mormon leaders while “a teenager,” but did not lose faith in the Book of Mormon until late in 1962 when she read The Golden Bible, by M. T. Lamb.

It is interesting to note that Darrick Evenson was promoting the same theory as John Tvedtnes—i.e., that we were not really believers in the Book of Mormon in the early 1960’s. While we cannot determine whether Mr. Tvedtnes got the idea from Mr. Evenson or vice versa, we do know that Evenson visited F.A.R.M.S. and that a representative from that organization... attended one of his meetings. In any case, we feel that Mr. Tvedtines and F.A.R.M.S. should publish a retraction concerning this erroneous charge.

Although three Mormon apologists have devoted seventy-five pages to our book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, we cannot see that they have made a dent in the theory. Moreover, some major errors appear in the reviews. We have been working on a detailed response to the allegations found in these reviews. In preparing this response we have discovered a great deal of new evidence to show that the Book of Mormon is not taken from ancient gold plates, but is in reality a 19th-century production. We plan to publish our response to the critics within the next few months.

We feel that Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon is one of the most important studies that we have published and that all our readers should be aware of its contents.

Walters’ Last Sermon

As the reader may know, Pastor Wesley P. Walters had a great deal to do with bringing to light the true history of Mormonism. He was a man who loved the Mormon people and labored very hard to bring them the truth. The following extracts are taken from his last sermon, “For All The Saints.” It was delivered on October 21, 1990, at the church in Marissa, Illinois, where Walters served as pastor for 33 years:

WHAT IS A SAINT? Ephesians 1: 1, 2

1 Paul an apostle of Christ Jesus by the will of God, to the saints in Ephesus, the faithful in Christ Jesus:
2 Grace and peace to you from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. . . .

God had already told us in the Old Testament—centuries before Paul ever addressed his letter “To the Saints.”

Psalm 50:5: Gather to me my saints—those who have made a covenant to me by sacrifice.

So a saint is one who has entered into relationship with God by means of a blood sacrifice... It takes on a special meaning of a blood sacrifice for sin—and points to that one perfect bold sacrifice for sin—the Lord Jesus our Messiah.

Behold, the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world.

So a saint is one who looks exclusively to the Son of God and the pouring out of his life’s blood as his only hope for forgiveness. Now in Ephesians, Chapter 1:4-5, Paul elaborates more fully upon what it means to be one of God’s Saints:

For he chose us in Him before the creation of the world to be holy and blameless in His sight. In love He predestined us to be adopted as His sons through Jesus Christ, in accordance with His pleasure and will.

Consider how infinitely small a cosmic speck this earth of ours is—

We are but a blip amidst our galaxy of billions of stars—
And our galaxy is but one of thousands upon thousands of galaxies in the universe that extends beyond where the most powerful of our telescopes can see.

And upon this microscopic speck we call the earth, our world, are some 5 billion of us crawling around—so minute that we can not even be seen from a weather satellite a few thousand miles from our earth. In our vast universe we are by comparison a million times smaller than the smallest electron in an atom.

Yet the mind-boggling thing is that we—who are totally imperceptible in the vastness of space—are not only known to God, but even loved by him from the distant ages of eternity.

That the Mighty God who framed the vastness of the universe should fix his love upon us who are less than a whisper, who are but as a vapor that quickly vanishes—is indeed the enigma of the ages.

Yet he did more than love us in eternity. . . .

We have redemption through his blood—the forgiveness of sins. Can you imagine such a cosmic figure as the Son of God—by whom this vast universe was called into existence—becoming one of us, just so he could pay the price of sin!

This is almost beyond belief. So highly exalted and valued was this person, the Son of God, that (as one theologian expressed it) . . . it would have been a lesser crime to have crucified every man, woman and child who ever lived, or would live, than to have killed the Lord of Glory.

Can you imagine any person of such exaltation and dignity doing this? Let alone the God who made us and against whom we rebelled.

An English poet pictured God as having forgotten this rebelling world. . . . But far from forgetting the world, He was redeeming it. “He loved me, and gave Himself for me.” . . .

Archeologists are always on the lookout for seals, —“le Meleck” — “Belonging to the King” — stamped in the soft clay and fired.

It identifies that vessel as forever belonging to the King—15 centuries later it still bears witness of this.

God has set His seal upon us—He has given His children His stamp of ownership—the Holy Spirit. The Spirit marks us as belonging to God forever.

“They shall never perish!”

What can we say to all this? Hallelujah! Praise the Lord! Glory to God! Amen and Amen! . . .

It should break our hearts for gratitude. It should bring tears of devotion to our eyes. It should make our souls sing for joy and leap with praises.

Did you see the Cincinnati Reds when they won the Series? They came out of the dugout, leaping and shouting... and the World Series is nothing compared to what God has won for us in His own Son.

Paul said it so well. “We are more than conquerors through Him who loved us.” If you are a saint, rejoice! If you are not, then hurry to make a covenant with God through his Son Jesus, the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world. Amen.

UTAH LIGHTHOUSE MINISTRY
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH  84110
On July 2, 1991 we were presented with a copy of a very sensational memo purported to have been written by a General Authority of the Mormon Church. This memo was authored by Glenn L. Pace, Second Counselor in the Presiding Bishopric of the church. It is dated July 19, 1990, and is directed to the “Strengthening Church Members Committee” of the Mormon Church. In the memo Pace states that he has met with “sixty victims” of “ritualist child abuse,” and that “All sixty individuals are members of the Church.”

The contents of the document are so startling that we wondered if it might be a forgery created by someone who wanted to embarrass the church. Because of our concern regarding the memo’s authenticity, we decided not to make it public until we could learn more about it. We did give a copy to a woman who was doing research on incest, and she was able to meet with Glenn L. Pace concerning the matter. She claimed that Pace informed her that he had now interviewed over one hundred victims of ritualistic abuse.

On October 2, 1991, we gave a copy of the memo to another researcher who is very well versed in the operations and history of the Mormon Church. He was very suspicious about the authenticity of the document and noted that he did not think the church had a committee called “Strengthening Church Members Committee.” He decided to call Glenn Pace about the matter. While Pace was not available at that time, he was able to discuss the memo with the secretary. She acknowledged that there is indeed a “Strengthening Church Members Committee,” and was surprised to know that he had a copy of the memo on “Ritualistic Child Abuse.” She informed him that the document was prepared solely for the Committee and that he was not supposed to have a copy. She instructed him, therefore, to destroy his copy of the memo and to tell the person he obtained the copy from that his or her copy should also be destroyed.

We, of course, felt that the memo should be available to members of the church. Therefore, on pages 3-8 of this issue of the Messenger we have made a photographic reproduction from our copy of the document so that those who are interested can inspect it in its entirety and draw their own conclusions. The reader will notice that the words “DO NOT REPRODUCE” are printed by hand on the first page of the memo. These words were already on the copy when we received it.

At this point we do not feel prepared to take any strong position as to the conclusions Bishop Pace has reached with regard to his interviews. We are, in fact, caught on the horns of a dilemma. On the one hand, it is very hard to believe that such an evil conspiracy has been going on for so long without detection.

We try to be very cautious about accepting stories concerning conspiracies unless strong evidence can be marshaled to support the accusations. We have seen too many people make the mistake of leveling serious accusations against individuals and organizations without carefully considering all of the facts.

On the other hand, however, we have to ask ourselves this question: Can the testimony of so many individuals, that seems to agree on some key points, be totally disregarded? Psychiatrists, of course, would point out that we cannot blindly accept the statements of those who are mentally ill because they sometimes have a difficult time separating reality from fantasy. Since Glenn Pace presents only a general overview of the problem in his report to the Committee, it is difficult to really evaluate his conclusions. It is reported that there is a 40-page report which would throw more light on the issue. Unfortunately, however, it is not available to the public. In any case, if Pace has correctly read the situation and a satanic group like he envisions is functioning within the Mormon Church, it would have to be one of the most diabolical conspiracies in existence today.

Bishop Pace strongly believes that “these activities are real and cannot be ignored” (page 6 of his report) and states that “the Church needs to consider the seriousness of these problems” (page 4). Even though Pace goes so far as to charge that “bishops, a patriarch, a stake president, temple workers, and members of the Tabernacle Choir” may be involved and that “sometimes the abuse has taken place in our own meetinghouses” (page 5), he does not believe the Mormon Church itself is behind the satanic activity; instead, he feels that “the Church is being used” (page 4). If the activities Pace speaks of are actually taking place, we would tend to agree with his conclusion that the church is the victim of a group of pernicious deceivers. The fact that “a stake president” and “bishops” may be involved does not indicate the church itself is implicated in a conspiracy. It should be pointed out that there are thousands of bishops in the Mormon Church. Nevertheless, as we will explain later, there are some things in LDS Church history and doctrine that make the church vulnerable to infiltration by occultists who wish to use it for their own purposes.

In any case, Glenn Pace must be commended for spending a great deal of time and emotional energy in trying to help these people who are troubled with serious psychological problems. Even if he is unable to prove his theory concerning “Ritualistic Child Abuse” in the Mormon Church, he has had the courage to step out and call this matter to the attention of the leadership of the church.

Aside from the question of whether a group of Satanists are secretly functioning within the framework of the LDS Church, Glenn Pace’s memo raises another important issue—i.e., it brings to light an additional reason for the deletion of some of the oaths which had always been an extremely important part of the Mormon temple ritual. The deletion of these oaths occurred in April 1990. As we will explain later, it is possible that the information that Pace was receiving in his interviews during 1989-90 could have influenced church leaders to remove the oaths. On page 4 of his memo, Bishop Pace noted that “many” of those who had allegedly participated in satanic rites claimed that they had “their first flashback” while “attending the temple for the first time.” When they took the oaths and heard “the exact words” in the temple ceremony that they had previously heard in the satanic ritual, “horrible memories were triggered.”

It is possible that when church leaders became aware of this information, they ordered the offending portions of the ceremony deleted so that they would not continue to have an adverse effect on some church members. Then, too, if satanic rites with similar wording actually existed, the General Authorities of the church may have been concerned that this would eventually become known to the public and cause embarrassment to the church. Whatever the case may be, the oaths which were a vital part of the temple ceremony at the time Glenn Pace began his interviews have been removed.

We have been somewhat apprehensive about bringing Pace’s memo to light because of the effect it could have on other people’s lives. If his conclusions are correct and the perpetrators of these evil deeds are apprehended and brought to justice, we will be very pleased with the result. If, on the other hand, it causes a witch hunt which leads nowhere, we will certainly be disappointed. The serious implications of this whole matter cannot be overstated. We hope that our readers will use good judgment and not spread unfounded rumors. If, however, they do have important information on this subject, they should report it to the proper law enforcement officials.

At the LDS Church’s 161st semi-annual General Conference, the Mormon leaders took a strong public stand against child abuse. On October 7, 1991, the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints “condemns in the harshest of terms” physical, psychological and sexual abuse, said Thomas S. Monson, second counselor in the First Presidency.

Offenders should be brought to justice for their “wicked and devilish conduct . . . Liars, bullies who abuse children, they will one day reap the whirlwind of their foul deeds,” he said.

Glenn Pace’s suggestion concerning the possibility of an organized conspiracy to sexually abuse children is not new to residents of Utah. In a highly controversial trial, which took place in 1987, a man by the name of Alan B. Hadfield was convicted on seven counts of “sodomizing and sexually molesting his son and daughter” (Salt Lake Tribune, January 13, 1988). In the same newspaper, under the date of December 16, 1987, we find the following:

PROVO—As many as 40 people in the same Lehi neighborhood were implicated as child sex abusers by their own offspring and other children in the area, a therapist testified Tuesday.

Dr. Barbara Snow, the principal therapist who broke an alleged widespread pattern of child sexual abuse centered in one ward of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, spent nearly six hours on the stand during the second day of the trial of Alan B. Hadfield.

Many people felt that Dr. Snow planted ideas of sexual abuse in the minds of the children. A psychiatrist we discussed the situation with said that although he had questions about Dr. Snow’s methods, he talked about the matter with another psychiatrist who had interviewed the children. He was surprised to learn that this man had reached similar conclusions—i.e., that there were probably many people involved in the scandal. Since he has a great deal of respect for this man’s work, he feels there may have been something to the statement that there was an organized sex-abuse ring functioning in Lehi. However this may be, although officials indicated that additional charges might be filed, no one else has been prosecuted for the purported abuse. Many people in Utah still feel that Mr. Hadfield was innocent of the charges and that the accusations made by the children against him and other members of the Mormon ward in which he lived were without foundation in fact. This was certainly a very difficult case and it is very hard to know who was telling the truth.

On January 13, 1988, the Salt Lake Tribune ran a story that indicated that sex-abuse rings might be functioning in other parts of the state of Utah:

A spokesman for the Utah Psychiatric Association has issued a startling message: Organized child abuse is not a far-fetched notion. Adults and youths in organized groups or rings appear to be sexually abusing children in Utah.

Dr. Paul L. Whitehead, public affairs representative for the association in Salt Lake City, said mental-health professionals have identified clusters of sex-abuse groups in several communities in the state. But so far, only one member of what they say is such a group has been brought to trial—and convicted.

At this point the reader should take the time to carefully read Glenn L. Pace’s work on “Ritualistic Child Abuse.” In the pages that follow after our photographic reproduction of the memo, we will try to throw some light on the important matters Bishop Pace has brought to our attention.
MEMORANDUM

Date: July 19, 1990
To: Strengthening Church Members Committee
From: Bishop Glenn L. Pace
Subject: Ritualistic Child Abuse

Pursuant to the Committee's request, I am writing this memorandum to pass along what I have learned about ritualistic child abuse. Hopefully, it will be of some value to you as you continue to monitor the problem. You have already received the LDS Social Services report on satanism dated May 24, 1989, a report from Brent Ward, and a memorandum from myself dated October 20, 1989 in response to Brother Ward's report. Therefore, I will limit this writing to information not contained in those papers.

I have met with sixty victims. That number could be twice or three times as many if I did not discipline myself to only one meeting per week. I have not wanted my involvement with this issue to become a handicap in fulfilling my assigned responsibilities. On the other hand, I felt someone needed to pay the price to obtain an intellectual and spiritual conviction as to the seriousness of this problem within the Church.

Of the sixty victims with whom I have met, fifty-three are female and seven are male. Eight are children. The abuse occurred in the following places: Utah (37), Idaho (3), California (4), Mexico (2), and other places (14). Fifty-three victims are currently living in the State of Utah. All sixty individuals are members of the Church. Forty-five victims allege witnessing and/or participating in human sacrifice. The majority were abused by relatives, often their parents. All have developed psychological problems and most have been diagnosed as having multiple personality disorder or some other form of dissociative disorder.

Ritualistic child abuse is the most hideous of all child abuse. The basic objective is premeditated—to systematically and methodically torture and terrorize children until they are forced to dissociate. The torture is not a consequence of the loss of temper, but the execution of well-planned, well-thought out rituals often performed by close relatives. The only escape for the children is to dissociate. They will develop a new personality to enable them to endure various forms of abuse. When the episode is over, the core personality is again in control and the individual is not conscious of what happened. Dissociation also serves the purposes of the occult because the children have no day-to-day memory of the atrocities. They go through adolescence and early adulthood with no active memory of what is taking place. Oftentimes they continue in rituals through their teens and early twenties, unaware of their involvement. Many individuals with whom I have spoken have served missions and it has not been until later that they begin to remember. One individual has memories of participating in rituals while serving as a full-time missionary.

The victims lead relatively normal lives, but the memories are locked up in a compartment in their minds and surface in various ways. They don't know how to cope with the emotions because they can't find the source. As they become adults and move into another environment, something triggers the memories and, consequently, flashbacks and/or nightmares occur. One day they will have been living a normal life and the next they will be in a mental hospital in a fetal position. The memories of their early childhood are recalled in so much detail that they once again feel the pain that caused the dissociation in the first place.

There are two reasons why adults can remember with such detail events that happened in their past: First, the terror they experienced was so stark that it was indelibly placed in their mind. Second, the memory was compartmentalized in a certain portion of the mind and was not subjected to the dilution of experiences of ensuing years. When it is tapped, it is as fresh as if it happened yesterday.

The memories seem to come in layers. For example, the first memory might be of incest; then they remember robes and candles; next they realize that their father or mother or both were present when they were being abused. Another layer will be the memory of seeing other people hurt and even killed. Then they remember having seen babies killed. Another layer is realizing that they participated in the sacrifices. One of the most painful memories may be that they even sacrificed their own baby. With each layer of memory comes another set of problems with which they must deal.

Some have said that the witnesses to this type of treatment cannot be trusted because of the victim's unstable condition and because practically all of them have some kind of dissociative disorder; in fact, the stories are so bizarre as to raise serious credibility questions. The irony is that one of the objectives of the occult is to create multiple personalities within the children in order to keep the "secrets." They live in society without society having any idea that something is wrong since the children and teenagers don't even realize there is another life occurring in darkness and in secret. However, when sixty witnesses testify to the same type of torture and murder, it becomes impossible for me, personally, not to believe them.

I mention multiple personalities because the spiritual healing which must take place in the lives of these victims cannot happen without their priesthood leaders understanding something about it.

The spiritual indoctrination which takes place during the physical abuse is one of the most difficult to overcome. In addition to experiencing stark terror and pain, the children are also instructed in satanic doctrine. Everything is completely reversed: white is black, black is white, good is bad, bad is good, Satan is going to rule during the Millennium.

Children are put in a situation where they believe they are going to die—such as being buried alive or being placed in a plastic bag and immersed in water. Prior to doing so, the abuser tells the child to pray to Jesus to see if He will save her. Imagine a seven year old girl, having been told she is going to die, praying to Jesus to save her and nothing happens—then at the last moment she is rescued, but the person saving her is a representative of Satan. He uses this experience to convince her that the only person who really cares about her is Satan, she is Satan’s child and she might as well become loyal to him.

Just before or shortly after their baptism into the Church, children are baptized by blood into the satanic order which is meant to cancel out their baptism into the Church. They will be asked if they understand or have ever felt the Holy Ghost. When they reply that they have, they will be reminded of the horrible things they have participated in and will be told that they have become a son (or daughter) of perdition and, therefore, have no chance of being saved or loved by our Father in heaven or Jesus.

All of this indoctrination takes place with whichever personality has immered to endure the physical, mental, and spiritual pain. Consequently, there develops within each of these individuals the makings of what I call a civil war. As the memories begin to surface, there are personalities who feel they have given themselves to Satan, and there is no hope for forgiveness. The core person is an active member of the Church, often with a temple recommend. As integration takes place, the civil war begins. Sometimes, in an interview, personalities of the dark side have come out. They are petrified or perhaps full of hate for me and what I represent. Eventually those personalities need to be dealt with spiritually and psychologically.
Most victims are suicidal. They have been brainwashed with drugs, hypnosis, and other means to become suicidal as soon as they start to tell the secrets. They have been threatened all of their lives that if they don't do what they are told their brother or sister will die, their parents will die, their house will be burned, or they themselves will be killed. They have every reason to believe it since they have seen people killed. They believe they might as well kill themselves instead of wait for the occult to do it. Some personalities feel it is the right thing to do.

The purpose of this detail is to stress the complexity of psychological and spiritual therapy for these individuals. Our priesthood leaders, when faced with such cases, are understandably at a loss of how to respond. Orthodox counsel is completely ineffective. For example, some victims have been told that this all happened in their past and that they should put it behind them and get on with their lives. This is just not possible. Part of the spiritual therapy necessary is for priesthood leaders to assist with the conversion process of the personalities who have been indoctrinated into satanism. Victims must integrate their personalities so that they can function as whole persons and be able to deal with their problems and then get on with their lives. Often, some of the parts will begin to act out--perhaps promiscuously--and a good intentioned priesthood leader, following the General Handbook of Instructions, will disfellowship or excommunicate an individual. All this does is reinforce the satanic indoctrination of the victims that they are no good.

I'm sorry to say that many of the victims have had their first flashbacks while attending the temple for the first time. The occult along the Wasatch Front uses the doctrine of the Church to their advantage. For example, the verbiage and gestures are used in a ritualistic ceremony in a very debased and often bloody manner. When the victim goes to the temple and hears the exact words, horrible memories are triggered. We have recently been disturbed with members of the Church who have talked about the temple ceremony. Compared to what is happening in the occult along the Wasatch Front, these are very minor infractions. The perpetrators are also living a dual life. Many are temple recommend holders. This leads to another reason why the Church needs to consider the seriousness of these problems. In affect, the Church is being used.

I go out of my way to not let the victims give me the names of the perpetrators. I have told them that my responsibility is to help them with spiritual healing and that the names of perpetrators should be given to therapists and law enforcement officers. However, they have told me the positions in the Church of members who are perpetrators. Among others, there are Young Women leaders, Young Men leaders, bishops, a patriarch, a stake president, temple workers, and members of the Tabernacle Choir. These accusations are not coming from individuals who think they recognized someone, but from those who have been abused by people they know, in many cases their own family members.

Whatever the form of abuse our main concern is for the victims, but there are legal ramifications. We are disturbed to receive reports that a scoutmaster has abused the boys in his troop. It is not difficult to imagine what would happen if we learn that a bishop or stake president has participated in the abominations of ritualistic child abuse. Not only do some of the perpetrators represent a cross section of the Mormon culture, but sometimes the abuse has taken place in our own meetinghouses.

I don't pretend to know how prevalent the problem is. All I know is that I have met with 60 victims. Assuming each one comes from a coven of 13, we are talking about the involvement of 800 or so right here on the Wasatch Front. Obviously, I have only seen those coming forth to get help. They are in their twenties and thirties for the most part. I can only assume that it is expanding geometrically and am horrified the numbers represented by the generation who are now children and teenagers.

Another reason for concern is that there are several doctrinal issues that need to be resolved. The Church and society in general are very skeptical as to whether the occult and its activities do exist. There is no First Presidency statement relative to some of the doctrinal issues: What does a priesthood leader tell individuals who come forward and say that they have participated in these rituals—which may include human sacrifice? Should they have a temple recommend? Will they ever be forgiven? There are questions regarding free agency and accountability. Is a person who has been raised in an occult from infancy accountable for things that take place in a dissociated state, even though those acts were committed after the age of eight? I have formed my own opinions to these questions and have done the best I can. However, I don't have the mantle to make these doctrinal and policy decisions. I have relied on the mantle of a bishop regarding discernment and being a common judge.

The few priesthood leaders who have had to face these issues are crying out for help because they don't want to give their own opinions and yet there is no place to go for an answer. A bishop will go to his stake president who says he doesn't believe it is happening and that the member is just crazy. The stake president might go to an Area Presidency who will react in a similar way. Most people are afraid to surface it to the First Presidency for fear of getting the same reaction and don't want to appear crazy themselves for asking the question.

I hope you will excuse me if I am being presumptuous, but I am concluding this paper with scriptures I feel support my belief that these activities are real and cannot be ignored.

The things I have been writing about go back to Cain and Abel:

And Satan said unto Cain: Swear unto me by thy throat, and if thou tell it thou shalt die; and swear thy brethren by their heads, and by the living God, that they tell it not; for if they tell it, they shall surely die; and this that thy father may not know it; and this day I will deliver thy brother Abel into thine hands.

And Satan swore unto Cain that he would do according to his commands. And all these things were done in secret.

And Cain said: Truly I am Mahan, the master of this great secret, that I may murder and get gain. Wherefore Cain was called Master Mahan, and he gloried in his wickedness. (Moses 5:29-31.)

All of the experiences I have heard about have to do with secrecy, swearing not to tell, murdering to get gain and power:

Wherefore Lamech, being angry, slew him, not like unto Cain, his brother Abel, for the sake of getting gain, but he slew him for the oath's sake.

For, from the days of Cain, there was a secret combination, and their works were in the dark, and they knew every man his brother. (Moses 5:50-51.)

And then in Moses 6:15 we learn that as people began to fill the earth, so did these secret works:

And the children of men were numerous upon all the face of the land. And in those days Satan had great dominion among men, and raged in their hearts; and from thenceforth came wars and bloodshed; and a man's hand was against his own brother, in administering death, because of secret works, seeking for power.
The Book of Mormon is replete with descriptions of these secret murderous combinations as well as prophecies that they will always be with us:

And our spirits must have become like unto him, and we become devils, angels to a devil, to be shut out from the presence of our God, and to remain with the father of lies, in misery, like unto himself; yea, to that being who beguiled our first parents, who transformeth himself nigh unto an angel of light, and stirreth up the children of men unto secret combinations of murder and all manner of secret works of darkness. (2 Nephi 9:9.)

Wherefore, for this cause, that my covenants may be fulfilled which I have made unto the children of men, that I will do unto them while they are in the flesh, I must needs destroy the secret works of darkness, and of murders, and of abominations. (2 Nephi 10:15.)

And there are also secret combinations, even as in times of old, according to the combinations of the devil, for he is the founder of all these things; yea, the founder of murder, and works of darkness; yea, and he leadeth them by the neck with a flaxen cord, until he bindeth them with his strong cords forever. (2 Nephi 26:22.)

In Alma, we find that the Lord commanded some of the prophets not to write any of the secret works, especially of the secret oaths, so that they would not become known by generations to follow, but that they might be warned that they do exist:

And now, I will speak unto you concerning those twenty-four plates, that ye keep them, that the mysteries and the works of darkness, and their secret works, or the secret works of those people who have been destroyed, may be made manifest unto this people; yea, all their murders, and robbings, and their plunderings, and all their wickedness and abominations, may be made manifest unto this people; yea, and that ye preserve these interpreters. . . .

I will bring forth out of darkness unto light all their secret works and their abominations; and except they repent I will destroy them from off the face of the earth; and I will bring to light all their secrets and abominations, unto every nation that shall hereafter possess the land.

And now, my son, we see that they did not repent; therefore they have been destroyed, and thus far the word of God has been fulfilled; yea, their secret abominations have been brought out of darkness and made known unto us.
And now, my son, I command you that ye retain all their oaths, and their covenants, and their agreements in their secret abominations; yea, and all their signs and their wonders ye shall keep from this people, that they know them not, lest peradventure they should fall into darkness also and be destroyed.

For behold, there is a curse upon all this land, that destruction shall come upon all those workers of darkness, according to the power of God, when they are fully ripe; therefore I desire that this people might be destroyed. (Alma 37:21, 25-28.)

In Helaman, the name of Gadianton is introduced and becomes descriptive throughout the Book of Mormon relative to the secret combinations.

But behold, Kishkumen, who had murdered Pahoran, did lay wait to destroy Helaman also; and he was upheld by his band, who had entered into a covenant that no one should know his wickedness.

For there was one Gadianton, who was exceedingly expert in many words, and also in his craft, to carry on the secret work of murder and of robbery; therefore he became the leader of the band of Kishkumen. . . .

And when the servant of Helaman had known all the heart of Kishkumen, and how that it was his object to murder, and also that it was the object of all those who belonged to his band to murder, and to rob, and to gain power, (and this was their secret plan, and their combination) the servant of Helaman said unto Kishkumen: Let us go forth unto the judgment-seat. (Helaman 2:3-4, 8.)

It was true then as it is now that these things were not known by the general populace or by the government:

And it came to pass in the forty and ninth year of the reign of the judges, there was continual peace established in the land, all save it were the secret combinations which Gadianton the robber had established in the more settled parts of the land, which at that time were not known unto those who were at the head of government; therefore they were not destroyed out of the land. (Helaman 3:23.)

In chapter 6, we learn that in spite of the Lord's command to the prophets not to write these things, Satan is capable, and always has been, of revealing his secrets to his followers just as the Lord has revealed His will to the prophets.
And now behold, those murderers and plunderers were a band who had been formed by Kishkumen and Gadianton. And now it had come to pass that there were many, even among the Nephites, of Gadianton's band. But behold, they were more numerous among the more wicked part of the Lamanites. And they were called Gadianton's robbers and murderers. . . .

But behold, Satan did stir up the hearts of the more part of the Nephites, insomuch that they did unite with those bands of robbers, and did enter into their covenants and their oaths, that they would protect and preserve one another in whatsoever difficult circumstances they should be placed, that they should not suffer for their murders, and their plunderings, and their stealings.

And it came to pass that they did have their signs, yea, their secret signs, and their secret words; and this that they might distinguish a brother who had entered into the covenant, that whatsoever wickedness his brother should do he should not be injured by his brother, nor by those who did belong to his band, who had taken this covenant.

And thus they might murder and plunder, and steal, and commit whoredoms and all manner of wickedness, contrary to the laws of their country and also the laws of their God.

And whosoever of those who belonged to their band should reveal unto the world of their wickedness and their abominations, should be tried, not according to the laws of their country, but according to the laws of their wickedness, which had been given by Gadianton and Kishkumen.

Now behold, it is these secret oaths and covenants which Alma commanded his son should not go forth unto the world, lest they should be a means of bringing down the people unto destruction.

Now behold, those secret oaths and covenants did not come forth unto Gadianton from the records which were delivered unto Helaman; but behold, they were put into the heart of Gadianton by that same being who did entice our first parents to partake of the forbidden fruit. . . .

Yea, it is that same being who put it into the heart of Gadianton to still carry on the work of darkness, and of secret murder; and he has brought it forth from the beginning of man even down to this time.
And behold, it is he who is the author of all sin. And behold, he doth carry on his works of darkness and secret murder, and doth hand down their plots, and their oaths, and their covenants, and their plans of awful wickedness, from generation to generation according as he can get hold upon the hearts of the children of men. (Helaman 6:18, 21-26, 29-30.)

In light of this scripture, it is naive for us to think these things would not exist in our own generation. We know this is the last dispensation, the dispensation of the fulness of times. Surely Satan would not "pass" on this most important dispensation.

In Helaman 8:1 we learn that people in high places were members of the Gadianton band and secret combinations:

And now it came to pass that when Nephi had said these words, behold, there were men who were judges, who also belonged to the secret band of Gadianton, and they were angry, and they cried out against him, saying unto the people: Why do ye not seize upon this man and bring him forth, that he may be condemned according to the crime which he has done?

We have allegations to indicate that this is true of people in high places today in both the Church and the government who are leading this dual life. The secret combinations were mentioned all through the Book of Mormon. In Mormon 1:18-19 we read that these Gadianton robbers were still alive and well and functioning:

And these Gadianton robbers, who were among the Lamanites, did infest the land, insomuch that the inhabitants thereof began to hide up their treasures in the earth; and they became slippery, because the Lord had cursed the land, that they could not hold them, nor retain them again.

And it came to pass that there were sorceries, and witchcrafts, and magics; and the power of the evil one was wrought upon all the face of the land, even unto the fulfilling of all the words of Abinadi, and also Samuel the Lamanite.

In Mormon 8:27 there is a prophecy that secret combinations will be among us in our time:

And it shall come in a day when the blood of saints shall cry unto the Lord, because of secret combinations and the works of darkness.
The extent of the evil that mankind will perpetrate on another is told in Moroni 9:10:

And after they had done this thing, they did murder them in a most cruel manner, torturing their bodies even unto death; and after they have done this, they devour their flesh like unto wild beasts, because of the hardness of their hearts; and they do it for a token of bravery.

Many of us have read this all of our lives and click our tongues at how awful it would be to live in such a time. Those victims with whom I have spoken testify to these things going on all around us today. In Ether we are told that they will exist amongst us, the gentiles, and we are also warned that we should do something about it:

And now I, Moroni, do not write the manner of their oaths and combinations, for it hath been made known unto me that they are had among all people, and they are had among the Lamanites.

And they have caused the destruction of this people of whom I am now speaking, and also the destruction of the people of Nephi.

And whatsoever nation shall uphold such secret combinations, to get power and gain, until they shall spread over the nation, behold, they shall be destroyed; for the Lord will not suffer that the blood of his saints, which shall be shed by them, shall always cry unto him from the ground for vengeance upon them and yet he avenge them not.

Wherefore, 0 ye Gentiles, it is wisdom in God that these things should be shown unto you, that thereby ye may repent of your sins, and suffer not that these murderous combinations shall get above you, which are built up to get power and gain—and the work, yea, even the work of destruction come upon you, yea, even the sword of the justice of the Eternal God shall fall upon you, to your overthrow and destruction if ye shall suffer these things to be.

Wherefore, the Lord commandeth you, when ye shall see these things come among you that ye shall awake to a sense of your awful situation, because of this secret combination which shall be among you; or wo be unto it, because of the blood of them who have been slain; for they cry from the dust for vengeance upon it, and also upon those who built it up. (Ether 8:20-24.)
In summary, we live in the last dispensation of the fulness of times and Satan is here with his secret combinations in all of the ugliness that existed in previous dispensations. The scriptures prophesy to that reality. I also believe that the scriptures cited and many others that could be quoted argue against our being passive about the problem. I don't want to be known as an alarmist or a fanatic on the issue. Now that I have put what I have learned in writing to you, I feel the issue is in the right court. I hope to take a low profile on the subject and get on with the duties which I have been formally assigned. This is not to say I would not be willing to be of service. Over the last eighteen months I have acquired a compassionate love and respect for the victims who are fighting for the safety of their physical lives and, more importantly, their souls.
TOO SENSATIONAL?

While the report on ritualistic abuse appears to have been written by a man who is very sincere and really believes what he is reporting, many rational people will have a difficult time believing the statement that forty-five of the sixty victims “allege witnessing and/or participating in human sacrifice” (page 1). Although we would not want to claim that this would be impossible, it does seem that it would be very difficult to cover up that many murders. It is possible, however, that there may be a way to reconcile this in the report itself. On page 3, Bishop Pace reported that “Children are put in a situation where they believe they are going to die—such as being buried alive or being placed in a plastic bag and immersed in water.”

If a child only saw someone being buried, but did not witness that the person was later “rescued” (i.e., dug up again), the impression would be left that the person was, in fact, dead. Furthermore, it would be possible to actually stage a fake human sacrifice. Individuals who are cruel enough to bury people alive and then rescue them at the “last moment,” would certainly not hesitate to perform a pretended sacrifice. Since these rituals were supposed to have taken place by the light of “candles,” it would be easy to fool children with a knife having a blade that goes back into the handle instead of penetrating the child. (We are familiar with a magic trick in which a large needle which resembles a sword appears to pass right through a person.) The use of some blood from an animal would help to make the whole thing believable. This, of course, is only speculation on our part.

In his book, The Darker Side of Evil, Corruption, Scandal and the Mormon Empire, page 109, Anson Shupe alleges that in the Hadfield case children told “stories of orgies where participants wore costumes and the adults took photographs. Worship of Satan was demanded.” While we have not had time to examine the transcript of this trial to confirm that Satanism was alleged to have been involved, there are some interesting parallels to Pace’s memo in newspaper reports of the trial. One “little girl talked about one instance when people had cameras hanging from the ceiling, needles being stuck in her, blood being drawn and people coming out of graves” (Salt Lake Tribune, December 16, 1987).

The reader will remember that Glenn Place also wrote concerning the tactic of children being placed “in a plastic bag and immersed in water” to terrorize them (page 3) and also revealed that if they did not do what they are told “their brother or sister will die, their parents will die . . . or they themselves will be killed” (page 4). On December 17, 1987, the Tribune reported an allegation that Hadfield’s son was held under the water:

Whitehead said children who have been sexually abused often have also been threatened. Such was the case of Alan Hadfield’s children, who testified that their father said “he would drown them and kill their mother” if they told. The 12-year-old Hadfield boy testified that when he was younger his father held him at the bottom of a swimming pool to dramatically prove his threat.

We, of course, do not know whether there is any connection between the Hadfield case and Bishop Pace’s research. Although it is possible that Pace could have talked with some individual(s) linked to the Lehi scandal, he specifically said that those he interviewed “are in their twenties and thirties for the most part.” Since the Hadfield trial took place a little less than five years ago, it seems unlikely that these “children” would have been old enough to fit Pace’s description.

In any case, from his interviews Bishop Pace reached the conclusion that a significant number of people must be involved in the occultic activity: “All I know is that I have met with 60 victims. Assuming each one comes from a coven of 13, we are talking about the involvement of 800 or so right here on the Wasatch Front” (page 5). (Salt Lake City is part of the Wasatch Front.) Glenn Pace seems to be multiplying the number of people in each coven with the number of victims he interviewed (60). On page 1 of his report, however, he made it clear that he believes there could be “twice or three times” as many victims—possibly as many as 180. He simply had not had the opportunity to interview them at the time he wrote the report. On page 5, he made this sobering statement: “Obviously, I have only seen those coming forth to get help.” It appears, then, that Pace envisions a large number of people participating in these satanic activities.

FLASHBACKS IN TEMPLE

One of the most interesting parts of Glenn Pace’s report is concerning “flashbacks” which he claims those who have been ritually abused experienced when they went through the Mormon temple ritual for the first time:

I’m sorry to say that many of the victims have had their first flashbacks while attending the temple for the first time. The occult along the Wasatch Front uses the doctrine of the Church to their advantage. For example, the verbiage and gestures are used in a ritualistic ceremony in a very debased and often bloody manner. When the victim goes to the temple and hears the exact words, horrible memories are triggered. We have recently been disturbed with members of the Church who have talked about the temple ceremony. Compared to what is happening in the occult along the Wasatch Front, these are very minor infractions. The perpetrators are also living a dual life. Many are temple recommend holders. (Memo by Glenn Pace, page 4)

No one, of course, is allowed to go through the Mormon temple endowment ceremony without a special recommend. What Glenn Pace is obviously alleging is that some trusted members of the Mormon Church, who have recommends to go through the temple, have been using some of the “exact words” and “gestures” found in the Mormon ceremony in a highly secret satanic ritual which they participate in on other occasions. He gives no information as to where they meet, but in the same memo (page 5) he says that “sometimes the abuse has taken place in our own meetinghouses.”

When Glenn Pace speaks of the “gestures” in the temple ritual, he is undoubtedly referring to the execution of the “penalties.” There can be little question that these penalties were originally derived from Masonry. Joseph Smith himself was a member of that fraternity. We find the following in Joseph Smith’s History of the Church who have talked about the temple ceremony.

The Masons had some very bloody oaths in their ritual. Capt. William Morgan, who had been a Mason for thirty years, exposed these oaths in a book printed in 1827. After publishing his book, Freemasonry Exposed, Morgan disappeared and this set off a great controversy over Masonry. In any case, on pages 21-22 of his book, Morgan revealed the oath that Masons took in the “First Degree” of their ritual: “. . . I will . . . never reveal any part or parts, point or points of the secret arts and mysteries of ancient Freemasonry . . . binding myself under no less penalty than to have my throat cut across, my tongue torn out by the roots . . . . On page 23, Morgan went on to show that the Masons graphically demonstrated the penalty. They were told to draw "your right hand across your throat, the thumb next to your throat, your arm as high as the elbow in a horizontal position."

There is an abundance of information from early sources to demonstrate that the "The First token of the Aaronic Priesthood" in the Mormon temple ceremony was derived from the oath given in the "First Degree" of the Masonic ritual. In Temple Mormonism, published in 1931, page 18, we find this information concerning the Mormon ritual:

The left arm is here placed at the square, palm to the front the right hand and arm raised to the neck, holding the palm downwards and thumb under the right ear.

Adam—"We, and each of us, covenant and promise that we will not reveal any of the secrets of this, the first token of the Aaronic priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign and penalty. Should we do so, we agree that our throats be cut from ear to ear and our tongues torn out by their roots." . . .

Sign—In executing the sign of the penalty, the right hand palm down, is drawn sharply across the throat, then dropped from the square to the side.

The bloody nature of this oath in the temple endowment was verified by an abundance of testimony given in the Reed Smoot Case. For example, in vol. 2, page 78, J. H. Wallis, Sr., testified: "...I agree that my throat be cut from ear to ear and my tongue torn out by its roots from my mouth."

Some time in the first half of the 20th century, a major change was made concerning the penalties in the endowment ceremony. The bloody wording of the oath mentioned above was entirely removed. Nevertheless, Mormons were still instructed to draw their thumbs across their throats to show the penalty. In the 1984 account of the ritual the wording was modified to remove the harsh language regarding the cutting of the throat and the tearing out of the tongue:

"The Sign is made by placing the left arm on the square, placing the right hand across the chest with the thumb extended and then drawing it rapidly from left to right and dropping it to the side" (Temple Mormonism, page 20).

As in the case of the First Token of the Aaronic Priesthood, the most offensive wording was deleted from this part of the Mormon ceremony a number of decades ago. The "execution of the penalty," however, was still retained in the ritual until April, 1990.

In the First Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood, Mormons were originally instructed to say that if they revealed "any of the secrets of this, the First Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood . . . we agree that our bodies be cut asunder in the midst and all our bowels gush out" (Temple Mormonism, page 20). The offensive words in this oath were removed from the temple ceremony many years ago, but Mormons continued to execute the sign of the penalty until just recently. In the 1984 account of the ritual the participants were instructed to bring "the left hand in front of you with the hand in cupping shape, the left arm forming a square, the right hand is also brought forward, the palm down, the fingers close together, the thumb extended, and the thumb is placed over the left hip. (Officiator makes sign.) This is the sign. The execution of the penalty is represented by drawing the thumb quickly across the body and dropping the hands to the side." (For a detailed treatment concerning the modification of the temple oaths see our book Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony: 1842-1990.)

Even after the oaths had been modified to remove the bloody wording, the execution of the penalties continued to upset many members of the church. As we indicated earlier, they were finally removed in April 1990. After the execution of the penalties was deleted, John Dart reported the following:

In pleading to never reveal the ritual, Mormons formerly made three motions—drawing one’s hand quickly across the throat, another indicating one’s heart would be cut out and the third suggesting disembowelment.

"That’s why I stopped going to the temple because [the ritual] was so offensive," said a former woman member in Salt Lake City. (Los Angeles Times, May 5, 1990)

If Glenn Pace’s theory is correct, some Mormons who were "living a dual life" reverted to using the type of "bloody" wording which was found in the temple ceremony many years ago. They may have made the wording even stronger than it was in the early Mormon Church. Although they retained some of the "exact words" which were in the modern version of the temple endowment, they changed the ceremony into a satanic ritual.

If this is the case, one can only begin to imagine how terrifying it would be for those who had been ritually abused in satanic ceremonies to encounter some of the same "gestures" and "wording" in what they sincerely believed was the House of the Lord. This certainly seems to be the type of thing that would bring a "flashback" to people who had erased these bad memories from their minds. It is unlikely that Glenn Pace would focus in on this particular issue, which could cause so much embarrassment to the church, if he did not really believe that it is a serious problem. In his memo he seems to be apologetic concerning his discovery: "I’m sorry to say that many of the victims have had their first flashbacks while attending the temple for the first time" (page 4).

As we noted earlier, it is possible that the information that Glenn Pace was receiving in the interviews he conducted in 1989-90 could have influenced church leaders to entirely remove the offensive "gestures" and wording concerning “different ways in which life may be taken” from the temple ceremony. At the beginning of his memo, Pace spoke of “the LDS Social Services report on satanism dated May 24, 1989, a report from Brent Ward, and a memorandum from myself dated October 20, 1989 in response to Brother Ward’s report.” In his memo, dated July 19, 1990, Pace indicated that he had been working with the victims for the “last eighteen months” (page 12). This would mean that he began his work toward the end of 1988 or early in 1989. It seems likely, then, that before church leaders made the changes in the ritual, they would have been aware that many members of the church who claimed to have been ritualistically abused were having “flashbacks” in which “horrible memories were triggered” when they first went through the temple. It is true, of course, that other members of the church who had never been abused felt that the oaths were unchristian and should be removed. It is possible that these two factors working together resulted in the major changes that were made in the endowment ceremony in April 1990.

In his report, page 5, Glenn Pace informs the reader that members of the satanic group not only do temple work but even serve as “temple workers.” If this is the case, we would presume that these occultists would prefer to work in places where they would have intimate contact with the people going through the ceremonies. Prior to the revision of the temple ceremony in 1990, those who went through the ritual were required to go through what was known as the “Five Points of Fellowship.” This part of the ritual would have been very appealing to a Satanist who desired close physical contact with those who pass through the ceremony. Reporting on changes made in the ceremony, the Los Angeles Times, May 5, 1990, gave this information concerning the removal of the “Five Points of Fellowship” from the temple ceremony:

> Also dropped is an “embrace” of a man representing God, who stands behind a ceiling-to-floor veil. Reaching through a slit in the veil, the church member puts his or her hand to the back of the deity and presses against him at the cheek, shoulders, knees and feet with the veil between them. The contact at “five points of fellowship,” including the hand to his back, has been omitted, although the member must still give a secret handshake and repeat a lengthy password.

There can be no question that the “Five Points of Fellowship” were originally derived from Masonry. In Duncan’s Masonic Ritual and Monitor, page 120, we read that in Masonry the candidate can only receive “the grand Masonic word on the five points of fellowship.” In 1827, fifteen years before Joseph Smith revealed the temple ritual to the Mormons, William Morgan wrote the following concerning the use of the five points of fellowship in Masonry:

> He (the candidate) is raised on what is called the five points of fellowship . . . This is done by putting the inside of your right foot to the inside of the right foot of the person to whom you are going to give the word, the inside of your knee to his, laying your right breast against his, your left hands on the back of each other, and your mouths to each other’s right ear (in which position alone you are permitted to give the word) . . . (Freemasonry Exposed, page 84)

Joseph Smith, of course, participated in this Masonic ritual when he became a Master Mason. It is not surprising, then, that when he created the Mormon temple ceremony he included the Five Points of Fellowship. It is clear from the description of the Five Points of Fellowship in the 1984 version of the temple ritual that Smith borrowed from Masonry:

> Peter: The Five Points of Fellowship are “inside of right foot by the side of right foot, knee to knee, breast to breast, hand to back, and mouth to ear.” (Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony: 1842-1990, page 96)

Since the revision of the ceremony in 1990, those who participate in the ritual are only instructed to place “left arms . . . upon right shoulders.” They no longer are required to be positioned with the “inside of right foot by the side of right foot, knee to knee, breast to breast, hand to back, and mouth to ear.” Furthermore, all the wording concerning the “Five Points of Fellowship” has been completely deleted. These words previously appeared in five different places in the ritual—the “Lord” spoke of the “Five Points of Fellowship” twice; “Peter” referred to the “Five Points of Fellowship” twice, and the recipient mentioned them once. In the 1990 revised version all references to the Five Points of Fellowship have been cut out.

In our book, Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony, page 30, we speculated that the Five Points of Fellowship may have been removed to avoid the possibility that temple workers might become too intimate with those who pass through the ceremony:

> While it is good that the Mormon leaders removed this Masonic element from the endowment ceremony, some people who have been involved in temple work feel that the reason it was dropped was because some of the women felt the five points of contact (especially the placing of the “inside of your knee to his”) were too intimate. There were complaints that men playing the role of the Lord sometimes took advantage of the situation. We were also told that even some of the men felt they had a problem with the “Lord” behind the veil. Since a large number of men have played the role of the Lord in the various temples throughout the world, it is certainly possible that complaints could have been made at various times. . . . it is very possible that the “Five Points of Fellowship” were removed because this part of the ritual seemed awkward or embarrassing to some members of the Mormon Church.

Now that we have read Glenn Pace’s memo, which suggests that some Satanists may be serving as “temple workers,” we wonder if it is possible that church leaders may have been concerned that these people might be using the Five Points of Fellowship for evil purposes. By limiting participants to merely place their “left arms . . . upon right shoulders” church leaders have made it almost impossible for any intimate embrace to take place.

OCCULTIC INFILTRATION

Our research leads us to believe that some occultists deliberately set out to infiltrate churches or groups to gain converts to their way of thinking. When we were in Milwaukee, Wisconsin we found evidence that people involved in witchcraft had penetrated some of the Old Catholic churches—splitter groups from the Roman Catholic Church. They were using these groups to obtain converts to witchcraft and were involved in weird sexual practices (see our book, The Lucifer-God Doctrine, pages 23-27).

As we noted earlier, there are some things in LDS Church history and doctrine that make the church vulnerable to infiltration by occultists and others who wish to use the church for their own ends. One of the church’s most important problems has been with regard to polygamists. In the past, significant numbers of Mormons became converted to the practice of polygamy through reading the writings of the early leaders of the Mormon Church. Joseph Smith, the first Mormon prophet, declared that God gave him a revelation that he was to enter into the practice. This revelation is still published in the Doctrine and Covenants, one of the four standard works of the church. We find the following in that revelation: “Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you my servant Joseph . . . if any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another, and the first give her consent, and if he espouse the second, and they are virgins, and have vowed to no other man, then is he justified; he cannot commit adultery . . . And if he have ten virgins given unto him by this law, he cannot commit adultery . . . therefore is he justified” (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 132, verses 1, 61-62). Joseph Smith was obedient to the commandment and proceeded to marry dozens of plural wives before he was murdered in 1844.

Today, the Mormon Church does not allow its members to practice polygamy, and those who do so are excommunicated. This, of course, creates a real problem in the minds of many members of the church. They reason that if God commanded the church to practice polygamy through its first prophet, they should be allowed the same privilege. Since church leaders never really repudiated the doctrine itself, teach that it will be lived in heaven, and still retain the revelation on polygamy in the Doctrine and Covenants, many Mormons have secretly entered into the practice. These people are known as Mormon Fundamentalists.

Prior to the time the church received a revelation to let blacks hold the priesthood in 1978, there were a large number of people who were “living a dual role”—i.e., pretending to be good Mormons but living in polygamy and secretly meeting with other Fundamentalists when possible. Unlike the satanic group which Glenn Pace envisions, these people believed most of the doctrines of the church and hoped to reinstate the practice of plural marriage in the church. After the blacks were granted the priesthood, many of the Fundamentalists who were still in the Mormon Church felt that the church had gone so far off course that it was hopeless to try and reform it. They, therefore, decided to give up working secretly within the church and terminated their membership. Nevertheless, we believe that there are probably still many within the Mormon Church who are secretly practicing polygamy and playing a dual role so that they will not be excommunicated.

While most Mormon Fundamentalists are peaceful and seem sincere in their beliefs, there are some very radical people among them. For example, a Fundamentalist group known as The Church of The Lamb of God has been responsible for over 20 murders (see the Houston Chronicle, June 28, 1988).

Charges of sexual abuse have sometimes been leveled against members of Fundamentalist sects. On September 16, 1990, the Salt Lake Tribune published an article which contained the following:

CRESTON, British Columbia—A sexual assault trial unfolding in this tiny community is uncovering the 45-year-old history of a polygamy colony. . . . the colony is home to an estimated 300 people who follow the illegal practice of polygamy.

One male member is facing trial this week in B.C.’s provincial court for sexually assaulting two of his three wives, one stepson and one teen-age girl. He can’t be named under Canadian law to protect the identity of the victims.

The accused’s brother was convicted earlier this year of sexually assaulting his wife’s sister. . . . colony members are part of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, a break-away group from the Mormons.

Four members of a polygamist group in Ogden, Utah were recently charged with sexually abusing children:

OGDEN—Three women members of a polygamist sect were arraigned Thursday morning on charges of sexually abusing children under the age of 14. . . . The purported male leader of the group, Arvin Shreeve, 61, was arraigned last week on two counts of aggravated sexual assault or, in the alternative, sodomy on a child involving two boys under the age of 14. . . . On Aug. 2, police raided seven homes of group members in a north Ogden neighborhood and removed nine children.

Mr. Shreeve later pleaded guilty to sex abuse charges saying that he did not want to have the children put in a position of having to testify in court.

We recently received information indicating that sex abuse and the creation of pornography may be going on in another polygamist group.

It is alleged that the Mormon Fundamentalist, John W. Bryant created his own set of “sacred ordinances” which permitted promiscuity. Steven L. Shields says that at “a young age, John W. Bryant, the Presiding Patriarch of the Church of Christ (Patriarchal), began receiving visions . . . He was given certain knowledge by the Lord which pertained to the temple ordinances” (Divergent Paths of the Restoration, 1982, page 197).

In his book on Mormon polygamy Richard S. Van Wagoner gave the following information:

Like many other Independent Fundamentalists, Bryant first converted to mainstream Mormonism. Obsessed with early Mormon teachings on polygamy, he . . . took a second wife, Dawn Samuels (not her real name). With Dawn set apart as “The High Priestess of the Last Dispensation,” Bryant began bestowing his newly revealed ordinances on others . . . Bryant wrote prolifically while operating a Salt Lake City bookstore. Dawn joined him in highly secretive “sacred ordinances” which soon evolved into sexual rites.

Bryant would conduct a special “marriage ceremony before each time we had intercourse with someone we weren’t married to.” Dawn adds that there were various levels to this procedure . . . For instance, if a single person were sealed into mine and John’s family, then all the sexual rights of marriage existed within that unit as long as John approved.’ This applied to heterosexual and homosexual couplings. ... the group soon attracted notoriety because of Bryant’s expansion of the third level of ordinances—family sealings. He was sealed within many families, and “soon it was opened up so that sex, even incest, could be with almost anyone, anytime.” (Mormon Polygamy, Second Edition, pages 214-216)

There are a number of Fundamentalist sects in Utah, other states, and also in Canada and Mexico. In the 1960’s it was estimated that there were about 100 such groups. Although most of the individual groups are rather small, it is believed that there are tens of thousands of Fundamentalists. There are a number of things that happened in the early history of the Mormon Church which might tend to attract occultists. For example, in Joseph Smith’s time those who were caught up in magical practices sometimes used “Seer Stones” to find buried treasures. Joseph Smith himself was involved in this practice. In 1826 he was brought before Justice Albert Neely to be examined regarding this practice (see photographic proof in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 32-35). A few years later he used this same method to translate the Book of Mormon. David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, wrote: “I will now give you a description of the manner in which the Book of Mormon was translated. Joseph would put the seer stone into a hat, and put his face in the hat; drawing it closely around his face to exclude the light; and in the darkness the spiritual light would shine. A piece of something resembling parchment would appear, and on that appeared the writing” (An Address To All Believers In Christ, 1887, page 12). Many witnesses confirmed this statement and even the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts referred to the use of a Seer Stone in translating the Book of Mormon (see A Comprehensive History of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, vol. 1, page 129).

This, of course, reminds one of the practice of crystal gazing which is widely practiced in the occult. In addition, as we have previously noted, Joseph Smith joined the Masonic Fraternity and plagiarized material from its rituals which he used in his temple endowment ceremony. The founders of modern witchcraft also borrowed from Masonic rites. This, of course, has created some important parallels between witchcraft and Mormonism, and some writers have jumped to the conclusion that Mormonism was taken from witchcraft. Actually, Smith borrowed from the Masons in the 1840’s, long before modern witchcraft came into being.

Without exception all the cult members I have met have believed, or at least pretended to believe, that their magical-sexual-religious rites are of immemorial antiquity. ... It would be nice if this was so, but alas, it isn’t! With one or two dubious exceptions all the covens of the modern witch-cult owe their existence to the activities of Gerald Gardiner, an eccentric Englishman who died in 1964. (Sexuality, Magic and Perversion, page 4)

Noted authority on religion and the occult, J. Gordon Melton, has issued a statement showing that Mormonism was not derived from witchcraft but rather that both had a common ancestor in Masonry. For more information on this matter see The Lucifer-God Doctrine, pages 50, 65, 66. It is true that the Smith family had some magic papers and Joseph Smith himself possessed a Jupiter talisman (see photographs of these items relating to magic and astrology in our book, Mormonism, Magic and Masonry). Nevertheless, we have no data to show that he was part of any witchcraft or satanic group in the early 1840’s when he began working on the temple ceremony. There is, on the other hand, very good evidence to show that Smith borrowed heavily from Masonry in creating his ritual (see our book, Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony: 1842-1990, pages 143-151).

It is possible also that the church’s reputation for promoting polygamy during the 19th century might catch the attention of those in the occult who have radical views on sexual behavior. About thirty years ago we encountered an occultist by the name of William C. Conway who was vying to combine the teachings of Mormonism with those of the Druids. He believed in Joseph Smith and accepted the Mormon Fundamentalist doctrine that polygamy should still be practiced, but combined these beliefs with the teaching of reincarnation. He claimed, in fact, that he had been visited by “Our Druid Brother—the Mormon’s Prophet Joseph Smith Jr. REINCARNATED.” He claimed to have “the Urim and Thummin—also the genuine ‘Seer-stone’” (see The Lucifer-God Doctrine, pages 57-58).

In the late 1960’s a man by the name of Barney C. Taylor founded the Mental Science Institute. Mr. Taylor had been a Mormon who participated in the temple ceremony in 1949. At some point Taylor became deeply involved with the occult and began using the name “Eli.” His Mental Science Institute combined many of the teachings of Mormonism with witchcraft. For example, Joseph Smith seems to have created a new word by slightly modifying the Hebrew word for star—kobol: “And I saw the stars ... and that one of them was nearest unto the throne of God ... And the Lord said ... the name of the great one is Kolob, because it is near unto me ...” (Book of Abraham 3:2-3). Eli, likewise, had a Kolob in his system of Druidic witchcraft: “Then one giant yellow sun; a world of very high vibrations, came into the Universe. This was the world of KOLOB, the first” (The Second Book of Wisdom, page 10).

In a revelation published in the Doctrine and Covenants, Section 76, Joseph Smith revealed that there are three kingdoms in heaven, the celestial, terrestrial and telestial. In his book, The First Book of Wisdom, page 22, Eli also used these three words: “All worlds, celestial, terrestrial and telestial, are inhabited by beings with physical bodies suited for their worlds.” While the final r is missing in “terrestrial,” it is obvious that Eli was borrowing from Mormonism. It is interesting to note that the word “telestial” is not a real word but was coined by Joseph Smith.

It has been claimed by William Schnoebelen, a man who “was ordained and appointed a High Priest after the order of Melchizedek” in the Mental Science Institute, that Eli’s group had a “Wiccan wedding” ritual with similarities to the Mormon temple ceremony. In fact, in a copy of some pages of the document he has provided there are strong parallels to the temple rites. This typewritten document is entitled, “Ye Rite of Handfasting.” In this ceremony, as in the Mormon temple ritual, a man and woman are sealed together “for time and all eternity.” Unfortunately, we have been unable to trace it back to Eli himself or to show that the photocopies of the ritual were made prior to 1985; consequently, we cannot be certain of the document’s authenticity. Nevertheless, it does seem possible that Eli might have incorporated elements of the temple ceremony into his own witchcraft ritual. As we have shown, he had been through the Mormon temple and borrowed heavily from Mormonism in creating other documents we have examined. It has also been alleged by W. Schnoebelen that Eli urged occultists to go through the Mormon temple because he believed it had important “occult power...that could be achieved nowhere else” and had “important Masonic” secrets which had been removed from “American Masonry.”

William Schnoebelen has also brought forth two typewritten pages from another occult ritual which is purported to be from the Grimorum Verum. It is entitled, “Lituria De Ecclesia Gnostica Spiritualis.” Since it relates to Satanism and Glenn Pace has suggested that Satanists may be operating in the Mormon Church, we felt that we should say something about it. Because it contains parallels to the Mormon temple ceremony some people have been led to believe that this document provides evidence that the Mormon temple ceremony is borrowed from Satanism. In our book, The Lucifer God Doctrine, we have clearly shown that such is not the case. A careful examination of the document reveals that it could not date back to the time of Joseph Smith. In fact, we have found that part of it was plagiarized from Aleister Crowley’s “Ecclesiae Gnosticae Catholicae Canon Missae.” It could have been written at any time between 1918 and 1985. At any rate, an examination of the document shows that someone has taken a part of the Mormon temple ceremony and combined it with a satanic document.

William Schnoebelen claims that he obtained it from a “hard core satanic group.” Evidence shows that after working with Eli in the Mental Science Institute, Mr. Schnoebelen wanted to go deeper into the occult: He eventually became a member of Anton LaVey’s organization, “The Church of Satan.” He claims, however, that he did not obtain the document from LaVey’s group but rather another organization that “claimed to be affiliated in California.” On the first page of this document he claims, however, that he did not obtain the document from LaVey’s group but rather another organization that “claimed to be affiliated in California.” On the first page of this document we find the following:

(Let the altar be garbed in solar colors . . . Magister in scarlet with green satin apron. Seven candles lit. A Chosen Priestess of the Order should be upon the altar nude. . . . Other than Magister and Priestess, a Lucifer and Sister are needed.) . . .

M [Magister]: Before the mighty and ineffable King of Hell, and in communion with his children everywhere . . . I proclaim that Lucifer rules the earth; and ratify and renew my covenant to recognize and honor him in all things without reservation: to abjure all pretenions [sic] of righteousness and give myself wholly, body and soul, to the iniquities and evil which alone are pleasing to him, and likewise painful to our pallid adversaries. I acknowledge him to be the One, True God; and desire in return his manifold aid in the successful accomplishment of my lusts, and the fulfillment of my true will.

The seventh page of this same document contains a section which has unquestionably been taken from the Mormon temple ceremony:

M: May you have health in the navel, marrow in the bones, strength in the [word blacked out by Mr. Schnoebelen “in the interest of decency”) and in the sinews; and power in the priesthood be upon you and upon your posterity through all generations of time and throughout all eternity.

The reader will notice that this particular part of this evil ritual is taken from the “Ceremony At The Veil” in the Mormon endowment ceremony:

Lord: . . . “Health in the navel, marrow in the bones, strength in the loins and in the sinews, power in the Priesthood be upon me, and upon my posterity through all generations of time, and throughout all eternity.” (Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony: 1842-1990, page 141)

There are two views one may take with regard to the satanic document mentioned above: 1. It is a document created by someone familiar with both the occult and the LDS temple ceremony to be used in an actual satanic ritual. 2. It is a ritual created by someone who is trying to promote the theory that Mormons copied directly from Satanists. (For more information on the Mental Science Institute, Aleister Crowley and the question of the authenticity of the two occultic documents mentioned above see The Lucifer-God Doctrine, pages 41-58.)

THE BEAST AND ABUSE

If one were to accept the satanic or Luciferian document mentioned above as an actual ritual which was used by occultists, then the question arises as to whether it could have anything to do with Bishop Pace’s theory concerning a satanic group which abuses children. As we noted earlier, we have found definite evidence that the document cited above contains material taken from the writings of Aleister Crowley. In the book, Magic, page 130, Crowley wrote: “Before I touched my teens, I was aware that I was The Beast whose number is 666.” The Book of Revelation in the Bible, of course, indicates that the Beast with the number “666” is the Anti-Christ. In any case, Crowley created rituals in which homosexual magic was practiced. William Schnoebelen, as it turns out, was a disciple of Aleister Crowley. In a book Schnoebelen has written he told of his own descent into homosexual magic and how this type of belief could lead one to seek “younger and younger sexual partners.” The following is taken from his book:

I progressed in LaVey’s order and was finally made a Warlock in the Church of Satan . . . I was doing studies in Crowley’s Book of the Law and the Book of Revelations . . . when I read the famous passage in Rev. 13:18 about the number of the Beast . . . I was overwhelmed with a pillar of astral light . . . I KNEW with an unshakable certainty that Rev. 13:18 was the answer I had sought. Contained within its numerology was the secret that Aleister Crowley was a reincarnation of Jesus Christ! I was driven to my knees by the sublime beauty of this truth; and felt the power of magick upon me as never before. . . . I was brought in touch with higher ranking satanists from Chicago. I was initiated into their circle by signing a covenant with Satan for my soul. . . . Though the rites now began to include blood sacrifice (including my own) I was not deterred. . . . I knew Crowley had used blood in his rituals . . . I signed a pact in my own blood with Satan. He received complete control of my body and soul. . . . It would take five years of searching and a perilous time in the dreadful crucible of Mormonism, that clever counterfeit of Christianity, before I would really come to know Jesus Christ as my Lord . . . (Wicca: Satan’s Little White Lie, 1996, pages 44, 45, 48-49)

We have already documented the pervasive influence of Aleister Crowley upon the beginnings of Wicca . . . most Witches, myself included, find it necessary to study his material and “plug themselves into” the magical current of Crowley’s demon spirit guide, a mysterious being named Aiwass: Aiwass is another name for Set, an Egyptian god . . . (Ibid., page 192)

I have already mentioned the descent into blood rites, but additionally sexual perversity of the vilest sort enthralled many of them. I was not immune either. . . . Many of us became involved in sado-masochism and bondage and discipline. . . .

Sodomy is especially “sacred” to Set . . . It opens what are called the ‘Typhonion’ tunnels, channels through which extremely powerful demons, like the horrible Choronzon, can travel from the “alternate reality” and emerge into this universe and enter the sex partner’s body. . . .
This also explains the sudden meteoric rise of interest in the child as a sexual object, and the terrible seductiveness of child pornography. We often ask ourselves, “How could a person be sexually attracted to a small child?” It does not seem sane or normal, and of course it is not. Yet, throughout his life, Crowley attempted to invoke the Crowned and Conquering Child.

A key element within the Aiwass current and the Left-hand path is that of the beguiling or fascinating child. Crowley’s magical current was designed to compel an interest in ever younger and younger sexual partners . . . Add to this the sexually vampiric belief that the younger the person you abuse, the more power or vitality you can extract from them, and you have a potent recipe which explains the obsession with children. Witches who practice this kind of sexual Tantra believe they are both emotionally and literally stealing the youth of the child they are abusing. . . . My first ritual homosexual experience came through Witchcraft . . .

In the course of that pursuit of “Wisdom,” I got deeper into magical homosexuality and the strange alchemy of perversion. Tragically, I must confess that I began to enter groups where Nazi magick and serious vampirism were practiced and child pornography was also being used and produced. (Ibid., pages 197-200)

While we do not endorse many of the conclusions found in this book published by Chick Publications, our research has demonstrated that this former Satanist was undoubtedly deeply involved in the evil practices he has mentioned. One thing is certain: Mr. Schnoebelen did deceive Mormon officials, and they allowed him to become a member of the church on August 10, 1980. Furthermore, his “testimony” as to the truthfulness of the LDS Church was published by Bookcraft, a company which prints books by the General Authorities of the church and other Mormon writers. As unbelievable as it may seem, it is still being sold at the church’s Deseret Bookstore (see From Clergy to Convert, by Stephen W. Gibson, pages 67-73). The Mormons apparently thought they had made a prize catch when they brought the Schnoebelens into the church. In the book he is referred to as a former “parish priest” and his wife as a former “nun.” One year after he joined the church (August 31, 1981), William Schnoebelen went through the Mormon temple and was sealed to his wife “for time and for eternity.” It should be noted that his wife was also deeply involved in the occult—she was, in fact, a witch.

Mormon Church officials, who are supposed to have special powers of discernment, were totally oblivious to the fact that a Satanist had passed through the temple. Schnoebelen claimed that as he was going through the ritual he was “thinking, boy, these guys are teaching satanism, I mean, I was really on seventh heaven at this point.” He remained in the LDS Church, posing as a faithful Mormon, until 1984. According to his own statement, during this time he was secretly working to promote the occult. In Wicca: Satan’s Little White Lie, page 10, he wrote: “Up to our departure from the city of Milwaukee in 1984, we were presiding over one of the oldest and largest networks of covens in the Midwest.”

Although we may never know what success he had in proselyting Mormons into Wicca and Satanism, Schnoebelen and his wife did penetrate into the church without being detected. Moreover, weird sexual practices—both heterosexual and homosexual—seem to have been practiced in the satanic and witchcraft groups he was connected with. While he did not actually say that he himself was involved in “ritualistic child abuse,” he did indicate that he was indoctrinated into the idea that “the younger the person you abuse, the more power or vitality you can extract from them.”

CONCLUSION

While the material presented in this newsletter does not prove Glenn Pace’s theory concerning a well organized and highly secret satanic group practicing ritualistic child abuse in the LDS Church, it does throw some light on the ability of occultists to infiltrate the church and even the temple itself.

Even though Bishop Pace has laid out a very persuasive argument for the existence of a satanic group in the Mormon Church, it still seems very difficult to believe that a group of the size he envisions could go undetected for so long. Although we are not prepared at this time to declare that such a conspiratorial band really exists, our minds are open to examine any evidence regarding this matter that comes to our attention. If any of our readers have any information that will throw light on this subject, they can mail it to Utah Lighthouse Ministry, PO Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110. We would be especially interested in Pace’s 40-page report. In addition, we would request that our Christian friends pray for us at this time that we may have discernment from the Lord and not jump to any erroneous conclusions.

The fact that portions of the temple ceremony caused “many” people to have devastating flashbacks should be of grave concern to the Mormon people. Even those who do not claim to have been ritualistically abused have been terrified by the oaths. On June 30, 1990, a woman wrote us a letter in which she stated:

Your article brought back old memories for me about my first temple experience in June of 1972 as a convert to Mormonism from Christianity. I, too, felt that what I was doing was wrong. Actually, a feeling of dread came over me as I began to take the blood oaths, and I knew I was doing something that was absolutely against everything Christianity had taught me. The feeling increased . . . and I just kept praying in my mind, “Dear God, just get me out of here alive,” over and over.

While some Mormons seem to be rejoicing that church leaders have finally had the insight to remove some of the offensive wording in the endowment ceremony, they have not faced the serious implications of the whole matter. That important portions had to be trimmed out plainly shows that Mormon Church president Ezra Taft Benson was wrong when he said: “The endowment was revealed by revelation . . .” (The Teachings of Ezra Taft Benson, 1988, page 250). It is clearly a man-made ceremony which heavily borrowed from Masonry.

Mormonism teaches that only Mormons who receive their endowments and are married for eternity can obtain the highest exaltation in the hereafter. Church leaders declare that “eternal life” only comes through temple marriage. For example, President Spencer W. Kimball, the twelfth prophet of the church, said: “Only through celestial marriage can one find the strait way, the narrow path. Eternal life cannot be had in any other way.” (Deseret News Church Section, November 12, 1977). This teaching is clearly unbiblical. The Bible, in fact, proclaims that “whosoever believeth in him [Jesus] should not perish, but have eternal life” (John 3:15). It is our prayer that Mormons everywhere will cease trusting in a temple ceremony that is filled with Masonry and man-made ideas and put their complete faith in Jesus Christ—the one who said, “I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father, but by me” (John 14:6).

SALT LAKE CITY UT  84110
In the last issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger we reported allegations that a satanic cult had taken root in the Mormon Church. This newsletter (November 1991) proved to be the most popular issue we have ever printed. A number of our readers ordered many copies to distribute to their friends. Consequently, we were immediately forced into a second printing of this issue and still have copies available free at our bookstore.

In that issue we photographically reproduced a highly secret memo written by a General Authority of the Mormon Church. This memo was authored by Glenn L. Pace, Second Counselor in the Presiding Bishopric of the church. It is dated July 19, 1990, and is directed to the “Strengthening Church Members Committee” of the Mormon Church. In the memo Pace stated that he had met with “sixty victims” of “ritualistic child abuse,” and that “All sixty individuals are members of the Church.”

On October 25, 1991, Dawn House reported that church spokesman Don LeFevre confirmed that Glenn Pace had indeed written such a memo:

The 12-page report was . . . printed in the November issue of Salt Lake City Messenger, a newsletter published by Jerald and Sandra Tanner . . .

Mr. Pace referred calls on the July 1990 memo to the church’s public relations department. Spokesman Don LeFevre declined to discuss internal church reports. But he said Mr. Pace had sent a memo on ritualistic child abuse to a committee called the Strengthening Church Members Committee. (Salt Lake Tribune, October 25, 1991)

We had originally turned over a copy of this memo to the Associated Press and were told that if the memo was authentic, a story would be printed. When it appeared that the Associated Press was dragging its heels (almost three months had passed), we felt that we should print it ourselves. We mailed copies of the Messenger to the three major television stations in Salt Lake City, and on October 24, 1991, it became the lead story on the evening news on Channel 4. From what we understand, Paul Murphy, who investigated the story, had been trying to get a statement from the Mormon Church regarding the authenticity of the memo. Just minutes before going on the air, he made one last attempt. He asked a church spokesman if the church was going to deny the authenticity of the memo. The reply was that there would be no denial.

Channel 2, likewise, ran the story on its evening news. Surprisingly, the Mormon Church’s own station, KSL (Channel 5), ran the story on its 10 o’clock newscast. It was, in fact, a frank and accurate account of the contents of the memo and of the serious implications for the church. A number of stories concerning satanic ritual abuse and the Mormon Church were presented on all three of the major stations in the days that followed. The day the story broke all three of the television stations showed pictures of the first page of the Salt Lake City Messenger, and this brought a flood of people to our bookstore to pick up copies.

The following day, both the Salt Lake Tribune and the Mormon Church’s Deseret News printed the story. Both papers also published additional stories in the days that followed. The Chicago Tribune later sent a reporter, James Coates, to investigate the story. He wrote an article which contained the following:

SALT LAKE CITY — Top officials of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints say they are investigating reports from members that, as children, they witnessed human sacrifices and suffered “satanic abuse” at the hands of renegade Mormon-affiliated cliques.

Glenn L. Pace, a member of the church’s three-man presiding bishopric, reported in a memorandum . . . that he is personally convinced at least 800 church-affiliated Satanists now are practicing occult rituals and devil worship . . .

Pace’s memo, marked “Do Not Reproduce” at the top, was made public last week by anti-Mormon crusaders Jerald and Sandra Tanner, who also played a key role in publicizing the so-called “White Salamander Letter.”

BOOK ON SATANIC ABUSE

Satanic Ritualistic Abuse and Mormonism, by Jerald and Sandra Tanner. We are now in the process of preparing a book which will not only have the important material found in issues 80 and 81 of this newsletter, but also significant new information concerning the subject. It will contain a full-size reproduction of Bishop Glenn Pace’s startling memo which set off the controversy regarding Satanic abuse in the Mormon Church. Regular Price: $5.00

Pre-publication Special: $4.00

Must be ordered before May 31, 1992

The letter, which Jerald Tanner exposed as a forgery, made it appear that church founder Joseph Smith had been involved in folk magic . . .

“The Satanists’ ceremonies often are based loosely upon the Mormon church’s own rituals,” Pace wrote.

“For example, the [Mormon church] verbiage and gestures are used in a [satanic] ritualistic ceremony in a very debased and often bloody manner,” he wrote. “When the victim goes to the temple and hears the exact words, horrible memories are triggered.” (Chicago Tribune, November 3, 1991)

This whole matter of ritualistic abuse received additional attention when the television program Inside Edition devoted some time to the subject. This was rather significant because just weeks before the same program had put down some claims of satanic ritualistic abuse in England. Those who produced the program concerning Mormonism seem to have seriously considered Bishop Pace’s claims regarding ritualistic abuse.

CHURCH’S REACTION

The Mormon Church has a very good public relations department which carefully protects the church’s image. Consequently, we felt that there might be an attempt to sidestep this embarrassing problem. We reasoned that church leaders might try to throw some doubt on the issue by pointing out that although Bishop Pace was very sincere in his research, some psychiatrists and law officials have been very skeptical concerning claims of satanic ritualistic abuse. Instead, however, the church issued a carefully worded statement which provides support for Pace’s claims. Just one day after the story concerning Satanism in the Mormon Church was reported on television, the church owned Deseret News reported:

> Officials from The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints said Friday they are evaluating reports that satanic cults dedicated to sexually abusing children are operating within the church.

The issue arose Thursday with television news reports about an internal church memo suggesting that as many as 800 people may be involved in the practice along the Wasatch Front.

“Satanic worship and ritualistic abuse are problems that have been around for centuries and are international in scope,” said a statement issued Friday by the church public affairs department. “While they are, numerically not a problem of major proportions among members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, for those who may be involved they are serious.”

The church has strived to help local ecclesiastical leaders understand and deal with the issue, the statement said, citing a Sept. 18 message from the First Presidency “reaffirming their concern about such distasteful practices and encouraging vigilance in detecting and treating situations that may arise.” . . . Bishop Pace said satanic abusers in Utah “represent a cross-section of the Mormon culture.” The cults’ members, he wrote, may include Young Women and Young Men leaders, bishops, a patriarch, a stake president, temple workers and members of the Tabernacle Choir. The abuses have even taken place in church meeting houses, he said. (Deseret News, October 25, 1991)

It seems reasonable to believe that if Mormon leaders had any serious doubts about the validity of the accusations of satanic abuse in their church, they would have expressed them at that time. Instead, however, they freely admitted there was a problem. It would appear, therefore, that Mormon officials believe that there is a satanic group operating in the church. While their acknowledgement of the problem does not of itself prove the charges, it certainly adds a great deal of weight to the accusations. Mormon Church leaders undoubtedly know a great deal about what goes on within their own church. Bishops, stake presidents and others would be likely to bring information on ritualistic abuse to their attention. Furthermore, Church Security has ex-FBI agents and others trained in law enforcement who would undoubtedly bring reports of this type of activity to the attention of Mormon officials.

The first page of Bishop Pace’s memo makes it clear that the church has been investigating the problem of ritualistic abuse since at least 1989: “You have already received the LDS Social Services report on satanism dated May 24, 1989, a report from Brent Ward, and a memorandum from myself dated October 20, 1989 in response to Brother Ward’s report. Therefore, I will limit this writing to information not contained in those papers.” There are, therefore, at least three important documents which the church possesses which probably throw important light on this subject. As we understand it, the memo Pace wrote “in response to Brother Ward’s report” is a 40-page document. According to Dawn House, at first Brent Ward would neither confirm nor deny that he had written a report for the church: “The memo [the 12-page report published in the Messenger] refers to an earlier report by Brent Ward, former U.S. attorney for Utah and a Mormon. Mr. Ward said he would neither confirm nor deny the report’s existence” (Salt Lake Tribune, October 25, 1991). The following day, however, Jon Ure wrote the following:

> A former U.S. Attorney for Utah confirmed Friday he conducted research for a report to the Mormon Church on satanic child abuse. . . . Brent Ward . . . said he reported on ritualistic abuse at the request of a Mormon general authority, shortly after Mr. Ward resigned as U.S. Attorney in January 1989. (Salt Lake Tribune, October 26, 1991)

AN INVESTIGATION

We are happy to report that immediately after our publication of the Pace memo a great deal of information concerning satanic ritual abuse in the Mormon Church came to light. Victims, who claimed they had been forced to participate in the evil rituals, gave their stories on all three of Salt Lake City’s major television stations. In addition, therapists who were treating victims of the abuse came forth to support the charges. Moreover, it was disclosed that there was a committee that had already been delving into the accusations. On October 25, 1991, the Deseret News reported:

> Bishop Pace is one of 27 community leaders sitting on a ritual-abuse subcommittee of the Governor’s Commission for Women and Families. The committee, whose members also include therapists, law enforcement personnel, attorneys, religious leaders, former U.S. Attorney Brent Ward, an aide to Sen. Orrin Hatch, an assistant attorney general and first lady Colleen Bangerter, has been meeting since February 1990.

The Salt Lake Tribune for November 13, 1991, said that “Noemi Mattis, who co-chairs the governor’s task force . . . holds a doctorate in psychology and is in private practice as a therapist.” The same article quoted Mattis as saying that ritualistic abuse is prevalent: “I know that it is widespread . . .
All I can tell you is that my phone has been filled with people who are calling to say they are survivors or therapists who have patients who are.”

At the time Bishop Pace wrote his report, he claimed he had “met with 60 victims.” On page 1 of his report, however, he made it clear that he believed there could “be twice or three times” as many victims—possibly as many as 180. On page 5, he made this sobering statement: “Obviously, I have only seen those coming forth to get help.” It appears, then, that Pace envisions a large number of people participating in these satanic activities. In a television interview on the program Take Two (Channel 2), Noemi Mattis revealed that she had made the startling discovery that there were actually “360” victims in this area who were being treated for ritualistic abuse! In another interview, which appeared later on the same station, Dr. Corydon Hammond, a psychologist who also served on the governor’s committee on ritualistic abuse, gave a figure of “366.”

In his memo, Bishop Pace referred to “allegations” that “people in high places today in both the Church and the government” are “leading this dual life” (page 10). In his television interview, Dr. Hammond stated that evidence indicated that Satanists had actually encouraged their people to become doctors. These doctors could then provide drugs for use in ritualistic practices and help in brainwashing the children. Noemi Mattis also alleged that Satanists in Utah were being trained as doctors to help carry out illegal activities. (A doctor, for instance, could help cover up the fact that people have been murdered.) Moreover, Mattis indicated that there was evidence that Satanists were being trained as morticians. She also claimed that survivors of the satanic rituals had told of bodies being ground up or burned. These are certainly very serious accusations that are coming from two members of the governor’s committee!

Dr. Hammond further disclosed that victims who didn’t know one another were giving the same names of physicians, law enforcement people and other prominent individuals who participated in the ritualistic abuse.

Noemi Mattis claimed that the governor’s 27-member ritual abuse committee was originally very skeptical of the claims of satanic abuse. As the evidence piled up, however, it seemed obvious that there was reason to call for an investigation. Consequently, on November 22, 1991, the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

Gov. Norm Bangerter has promised to recommend more investigators for the child-abuse unit of the Utah attorney general’s office to look into allegations of ritualistic child sexual abuse. . . . The task force sponsored by the Governor’s Commission on Women and Children recommended the hiring of investigators to look into allegations of ritualistic abuse.

Two days later the Salt Lake Tribune supported Governor Bangerter’s decision to appoint investigators to look into the charges of ritualistic abuse. The Tribune called his plan an “open-minded, compassionate approach” and stated that it “deserves public and legislative support.” On January 25, 1992, the following appeared in the same newspaper: “Gov. Norm Bangerter’s proposal to hire four new investigators in the attorney general’s investigation of ritualistic child abuse allegations has received a legislative budget analyst’s approval.” The same article noted that it would cost $250,000 to fund the investigation for the fiscal year beginning July 1.

A REAL CONTROVERSY

During the past few years there has been a growing controversy regarding claims of satanic ritualistic abuse. The Psychiatric Times—Medicine & Behavior, published the following:

A debate over the authenticity of “ritual abuse,” the systematic physical and/or emotional torture of an individual by a group, has some psychiatrists pitted against each other. Defenders insist children are being victimized in the name of Satan . . . and tell vivid stories about horrendous sexual, physical, and emotional abuses. Others maintain that many of the stories are the product of emotionally unstable patients . . .

In March, Bennett G. Braun, M.D., began another study to analyze the cases of 50 alleged victims of ritual cults. . . .

Braun admitted that if ritual abuse proves to be a hoax, perpetrated by patients and exaggerated by the media, he and other psychiatrists who have treated hundreds of “victims” might wind up looking like fools. But, he said, that possibility doesn’t intimidate him. . . . “I’d rather make mistakes than ignore what I’m hearing. Nobody wanted to believe that Hitler was committing atrocities either.” (The Psychiatric Times—Medicine & Behavior, April 1991, page 54)

While a large number of Christians believe that satanic ritualistic abuse is a real phenomenon, some Christian writers have expressed skepticism. Bob and Gretchen Passantino, for example, have printed a number of articles in which they criticized the claim that there is a large satanic conspiracy engaged in abusing children. They have been kind enough to send us a good deal of material on the subject which we have carefully considered before preparing this newsletter. At the present time we are not as skeptical of claims regarding satanic ritualistic abuse as the Passantinos; however, we feel that they have done a tremendous job of pointing out that some Christian writers have made false and misleading statements in their treatment of Satanism. We feel that it is important to take these things into consideration when evaluating such a serious matter.

The Christian Research Institute has also provided us with a great deal of material (both pro and con) regarding satanic ritualistic abuse. A number of other people and organizations have sent us material dealing with both sides of the question. We have tried to look objectively at the arguments of those representing both viewpoints and draw our own conclusions. One of the most vocal critics of satanic ritualistic abuse in Utah is David Raskin. In an article published in the Salt Lake Tribune, we find the following:

Gov. Norm Bangerter’s Task Force on Child Abuse is being used to foment mass hysteria in the form of a nonexistent evil called satanic ritualistic child abuse, a noted psychologist alleges.

David Raskin, a University of Utah professor in psychology, said Tuesday state government has become the pawn of those who believe ritualistic child abuse exists despite a lack of supporting evidence.

“These people have built an industry on this: government, money, jobs, insurance. If somebody said, you know you have been led down the primrose path and all of this is fantasy, the budgets disappear, the jobs disappear and people are left very embarrassed,” Mr. Raskin said. (Salt Lake Tribune, November 13, 1991)

While we agree that hard forensic evidence concerning satanic ritualistic abuse is scanty, we find it very difficult to totally dismiss the testimony of so many victims. When Dr. Raskin accuses people of being led down “the primrose path,” it brings to mind the fact that Raskin himself has spent at least some time on that path. In 1985 he was convinced that Mark
Hofmann did not plant the bombs that killed two people. The Salt Lake Tribune, November 20, 1985, reported: “Mark W. Hofmann . . . has passed a lie detector test indicating he is telling the truth when he says he did not plant the bombs, his defense attorney said Tuesday. . . . Dr. David Raskin—a world-renowned polygraph expert and psychologist . . . was one of two experts who verified the Hofmann examination.” Although Hofmann admitted he had made a mistake after Hofmann confessed to the murders, the January 27, 1987, issue of the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

Police and prosecutors . . . still are angry at the doubt sewn in the community by the release of those test results by defense attorneys. . . . Those disclosures “had a huge impact on the public perception of this investigation,” said Salt Lake City Police Detective Ken Farnsworth. And those disclosures not only by the defense lawyer but statements made by the examiners—didn’t do the reputation of the polygraph any good, said several polygraph experts. “I think they did us all a great disservice,” said one licensed polygraph expert who asked that his name not be used.

We feel that Dr. Raskin has been rather harsh in his accusations against therapists and members of the Governor’s Committee. The Salt Lake Tribune also felt that Raskin went too far in his criticism. In an editorial published November 18, 1991, we find the following:

The ugliness of ritualistic abuse is entering another realm. Now Utah scholars, therapists and government officials are hurling mean accusations at one another, confusing an already skeptical public and further imperiling the apparent victims.

David Raskin . . . who himself is paid to refute child-abuse claims in court, contends the state has become a pawn of therapists who would foment hysteria about satanic abuse for financial gain.

While skepticism is justified in any scientific endeavor, quick, cynical dismissal of accounts of ritualistic abuse could prove unconscionably dangerous and cruel to those who might have experienced it. Unless taken seriously, adult victims cannot be effectively treated and child victims cannot be rescued.

In fact, several credible scholars and clinicians, including some at the University of Utah, as well as officials from Utah law enforcement and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints consider ritual abuse, satanic and otherwise, a real threat. Some have contributed to the state task force’s work.

It would be stretching it to say these people are motivated by profit. Time spent on the task force is volunteered.

HUMAN SACRIFICE?

If satanic ritualistic abuse is actually being practiced in Utah, as the evidence seems to suggest, it is possible that some of the ideas came from the teachings of Aleister Crowley. In his book, Of Hoffman’s “a very significant effect on the world of the occult. In his book, Who has been called “the Devil’s chief emissary on earth,” had the ideas came from the teachings of Aleister Crowley. Crowley, Utah, as the evidence seems to suggest, it is possible that some of Hoffman’s “were the normal heterosexual magic of the ninth degree of the O.T.O. . . . the homseexual magic of Crowley’s own devising . . . (Sexuality, Magic and Perversion, page 108). On page 113 of the same book, King speaks of the use of a “goat” in the sexual magic Crowley was engaged in. The goat was eventually used as a “blood-sacrifice.” Crowley even recorded some of his bizarre “sex magic” (including homosexual acts) in his diaries. As some of Crowley’s teaching became known, many people began to consider him the “most evil” man in the world.

In his book, Magick, Aleister Crowley noted that “the highest spiritual working” required the sacrifice of a male child:

It is necessary for us to consider carefully the problems connected with the bloody sacrifice . . . the bloody sacrifice has from time immemorial been the most considered part of Magick. . . .

It would be unwise to condemn as irrational the practice of those savages who tear the heart and liver from an adversary, and devour them while yet warm. In any case it was the theory of the ancient Magicians that any living being is a storehouse of energy . . . At the death of the animal this energy is liberated suddenly.

The animal should therefore be killed within the Circle, or the Triangle, as the case may be, so that its energy cannot escape. . . . For the highest spiritual working one must accordingly choose that victim which contains the greatest and purest force. A male child of perfect innocence and high intelligence is the most satisfactory and suitable victim . . .

Those magicians who object to the use of blood have endeavored to replace it with incense . . .

But the bloody sacrifice, though more dangerous, is more efficacious; and for nearly all purposes human sacrifice is the best . . . The method of killing is practically uniform. The animal should be stabbed to the heart, or its throat severed, in either case by the knife. (Magick, pages 217, 219, 220, 222)

In 1966, Anton Szandor LaVey founded the Church of Satan in San Francisco. Like Aleister Crowley, LaVey took a very strong stand against Christianity. Three years after he founded his church, LaVey published The Satanic Bible. In this book LaVey wrote the following:

6 I dip my forefinger in the watery blood of your impotent mad redeemer, and write over his thorn-torn brow: The TRUE prince of evil—the king of the slaves! . . . I gaze into the glassy eye of your fearsome Jehovah, and pluck him by the beard; I uplift a broad-axe, and split open his worm-eaten skull! (The Satanic Bible, 1969, page 30)

Although LaVey says that “Satanism condones any type of sexual activity which properly satisfies your individual desires—be it heterosexual, homosexual, bisexual, if you choose” he claims that “Satanism would not intentionally hurt others by violating their sexual rights. Satanism does not advocate rape, child molesting, sexual defilement of animals, or any other form of sexual activity which entails the participation of those who are unwilling . . . (The Satanic Bible, pages 67, 70). In his book The Satanic Rituals, 1972, page 206, LaVey claimed that “Satanists . . . have no wish to offend further the sensibilities of the self-righteous by luring apple-cheeked boys and girls into 'unholy rites and unspeakable orgies.' . . . we recognize the importance of working within the legal framework of society.”

Anton LaVey tries to downplay the idea of human sacrifice by Satanists. He, in fact, claims that they would not want to sacrifice a baby:

The use of a human sacrifice in a Satanic ritual does not imply that the sacrifice is slaughtered “to appease the gods.” Symbolically, the victim is destroyed through the working of a hex or curse, which in turn leads to the physical, mental or emotional destruction of the “sacrifice” in ways and means not attributable to the magician. . . .

The only time a Satanist would perform a human sacrifice would be if it were to serve a two-fold purpose; that being to release the magician's wrath in the throwing of a curse, and more important, to dispose of a totally obnoxious and deserving individual.

Under NO circumstances would a Satanist sacrifice any animal or baby! . . .

When a person, by his reprehensible behavior, practically cries out to be destroyed, it is truly your moral obligation to indulge them their wish. (The Satanic Bible, pages 88-90)

Al Carlisle, a Utah State Prison psychologist, does not agree with the statement that Satanists would not “sacrifice any animal or baby.” According to the Salt Lake Tribune, August 3, 1986, Dr. Carlisle said:

... individuals who are at the cult level have no qualms about killing others. “I know one guy who witnessed a dozen sacrifices back east,” he said. “They believe the prime energy in a person is in the blood. They sacrifice the person and believe that those who consume the blood will receive the power.”

Dr. Susan J. Kelley observed that although “devil worship has existed as long as Christianity, modern satanism began as an occult revival in the last century. . . . because Christianity believes that children are special to God, satanism, which negates Christianity, considers the desecration of children to be a way of gaining victory over God . . .” (Cultic Studies Journal, vol. 5, no. 2, 1988, page 229).

After we published Bishop Pace’s memo, some Mormons who were victims of satanic ritualistic abuse contacted us about the matter. The following is taken from a letter by a woman who was involved in the cult:

On the subject of “ritual abuse”—Issue #80 . . . I was such a person who was disfellowshipped, and then excommunicated from the Mormon Church[,] Page 4 of Bishop Glenn L. Pace’s Memorandum describes my situation. To say anything more would be moot. Take care not to “witch-hunt[]].” These groups (Satanic) take great delight in getting people to “chase their own tails”—It’s called “creating chaos”—and this “chaos” is one of the things that makes them thrive. Also note: The Mormons aren’t the only ones to face this—There are Christian denominations all over the U.S. that have had to deal with this . . . If I can be of assistance let me know. (Letter dated November 20, 1991)

The observation that the “Mormons aren’t the only ones to face this” is certainly true. Satanic ritualistic abuse, in fact, is reported in many parts of the country and in a number of churches. Some feel, however, that Utah has a large number of victims reporting ritualistic abuse when that number is compared to the population of the state. An investigation in Utah, where there appears to be a concentration of cases, could undoubtedly throw important light on cases throughout the United States.

Bishop Pace has indicated in his report that Mormon victims claim that they were “baptized by blood into the satanic order which is meant to cancel out their baptism into the Church” (page 3). Since Mormons believe their children do not reach accountability until they are eight years of age, they do not baptize them until they arrive at that age. Significantly, a number of the survivors report ritualistic abuse around the time they were baptized at the age of eight. For example, Dawn House wrote the following concerning one of the victims:

“Perhaps I’ll always remember the baptism because it clicked into my self-esteem,” she said. “One minute I was white and pure, then made to be black. I thought that I can look like I’m pure but I’m really not.”

She remembers a man marking her face and breasts black in a mock religious ceremony, shortly after her baptism in the Church . . . when she was 8 years old.

“My mother told me this was another part of my baptism and to . . . be a good girl. The man took me into a big room and told me to remove my clothes. He put a black cloth over my head and marks on my body.

“We went to another room where adults were dressed in black. There was a star drawn on the floor . . . I was placed in the middle of the star . . . I looked around to see candles and then, a baby calf in a cage. I heard the animal cry, almost like a baby. Part of the ritual was killing the calf.

“I was given a vial of red liquid, perhaps blood, to drink. There may have been a drug in it because I passed out. When I woke up, I was bleeding from the vagina. I remember seeing my mother staring at me, and I wondered why she was doing this to me, but I was too frightened to do or say anything. I was trying so hard to be a good girl.” (Salt Lake Tribune, November 3, 1991)

We were recently told by the mother of one of the survivors that her daughter was gang raped in the basement of a Mormon ward house when she was eight years old. Another victim we talked to claimed that when she was eight years old she was also taken to the basement of a Mormon ward house and raped by a number of men and was forced to drink blood. This woman claims that in her case those involved were not wearing black robes but rather white Mormon temple apparel.

Critics of satanic ritualistic abuse sometimes point out that accounts given by victims throughout the United States and other countries are remarkably similar. From this they conclude that the victims borrowed their stories from accounts given by others. While this has undoubtedly occurred in some cases, it is hard to believe that all of these people are borrowing from others.

The stories given by Mormons regarding Satanic abuse are similar in many respects to those related by victims in other parts of the United States. However, it appears that the rituals have been modified to fit Mormon beliefs. That a number of victims would claim they were “baptized by blood” or abused when they were eight years old seems important. It is highly unlikely that the three women mentioned above knew each other’s stories. They lived in different parts of the United States and were separated by hundreds of miles. It would be interesting to know how many other cases of this phenomenon Glenn Pace found in his research.

Even more significant is the fact that the Satanists appear to have incorporated portions of the Mormon temple ceremony into their rituals. Bishop Pace wrote the following, in his memo:
I’m sorry to say that many of the victims have had their first flashbacks while attending the temple for the first time. The occult along the Wasatch Front uses the doctrine of the Church to their advantage. For example, the verbiage and gestures are used in a ritualistic ceremony in a very debased and often bloody manner. When the victim goes to the temple and hears the exact words, horrible memories are triggered. We have recently been disturbed with members of the Church who have talked about the temple ceremony. Compared to what is happening in the occult along the Wasatch Front, these are very minor infractions. The perpetrators are also living a dual life. Many are temple recommend holders. (Memo by Glenn Pace, page 4)

Satanic ritualistic abuse is so extremely brutal that many of the victims develop amnesia. Their minds simply cannot face what has happened. Later in life, however, something can trigger the horrible memory which has been blocked out. Although they do not involve satanic ritualistic abuse, examples of this were reported in Time magazine, October 28, 1991, page 86:

Last November in Redwood City, Calif., George Franklin was convicted of killing an eight-year-old girl in 1969; the case was based largely on the testimony of his daughter Eileen Franklin-Lipsker, who had repressed the memory of her playmates murder for 20 years. This month in Pittsburgh, Steven Slutzker is scheduled to go on trial for the 1975 fatal shooting of John Mudd Sr. Slutzker was charged after the victim’s son, who was 5 when his father died, claimed he had a flashback memory of the murder. . . . at least a dozen states since 1988 have amended their statute of limitations for bringing charges to allow for delayed discovery of childhood sexual abuse.

On page 87 of the same article we find that Eileen Franklin-Lipsker remembered the murder of her playmate after “A glance from her own six-year-old daughter, who bears a striking resemblance to the murdered child, brought back scenes of the chilling event. Experts say emotional, evocative moments can often exhume long-buried memories.”

Bishop Pace’s statement that “many of the victims have had their first flashbacks while attending the temple for the first time” certainly raises some serious questions. Pace freely admits that when “the victim goes to the temple and hears the exact words, horrible memories are triggered.” It is clear, then, that Bishop Pace is convinced that Satanists are using portions of the Mormon temple ceremony in their abusive rituals. According to Dawn House, the “nightmares” of the victim she interviewed “were triggered when she attended a Mormon temple ceremony for the first time. She said the temple handshakes, oaths and clothes brought back memories. ‘Every time I went, I came back crying,’ she said. ‘My bishop said it was Satan trying to tempt me, telling me I shouldn’t go’” (Salt Lake Tribune, November 3, 1991).

Before Mormons go through the temple endowment ritual they must pass through the washing and anointing ceremonies. A victim of ritualistic abuse told us that she became terrified when she went through the washing and anointing ceremonies. After that her mind blanked out and she went through the rest of the ritual in a zombie-like state.

According to a psychiatrist, a woman he treated reached the part of the Mormon temple ceremony in which a man playing the role of Lucifer threatens those who are going through the ritual that “If they do not walk up to every covenant they make at these altars in this temple this day, they will be in my power” (Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony: 1842-1990, page 127). This undoubtedly triggered a flashback concerning what happened to the woman when she was ritually abused. In satanic ceremonies a man sometimes poses as the devil and, according to one witness, Satanists chant, “Satan has all power.” The idea of someone playing the role of the devil and threatening those going through the temple ceremony that he could have them in his “power” could be terrifying for those who have previously passed through satanic ceremonies. Although the devil is commanded “to depart” in the Mormon temple ritual, the woman mentioned above had already had the flashback and was absolutely devastated by the threat.

We talked to the son of another woman who had been satanically abused. This woman also had her first “flashback” when passing through the Mormon temple ritual and was deeply disturbed by the matter. Unfortunately, her son did not know exactly which part of the ritual caused the trauma.

Since Glenn Pace has stated that “many of the victims” received their first flashbacks in the temple, his research would undoubtedly throw important light on exactly which portions of the ceremony brought back memories of satanic rituals. It should be remembered that Bishop Pace is a General Authority in the Mormon Church. Because of his important position in the church, it seems highly unlikely that he would want to admit that Satanists had been able to infiltrate the church and use “the exact words” of the temple ritual in their degrading ceremonies. One can only conclude that the evidence that this has taken place must be overpowering. Some of this information may be found in Glenn Pace’s 40-page report on the subject.

While Pace’s 12-page report is certainly shocking, the statements made by the victims themselves, which came forth after we published the memo, contain details that are even more appalling. If we accept these accounts as authentic, we are forced to conclude that one of the most diabolical conspiracies one could ever imagine has gained a real foothold right in the shadow of the Mormon temple.

With regard to human sacrifice, Glenn Pace stated in his memo that of the “sixty” people he interviewed, “forty-five victims allege witnessing and/or participating in human sacrifice” (page 1). This would mean that 75% of these Mormons declared that they had witnessed murder! This figure seems to be close to that derived from a study conducted by Walter C. Young, Roberta G. Sachs, Bennett G. Braun and Ruth T. Watkins. They studied thirty-seven different victims of ritual abuse in “four separate hospitals across the country” and found that 83% of the patients claimed they witnessed human sacrifice (“Patients Reporting Ritual Abuse in Childhood: A Clinical Syndrome,” published in Child Abuse & Neglect, vol. 15, page 183).

DEATH OF BABY X

In the last issue of our newsletter we pointed out that it would be extremely difficult to cover up all of the human sacrifices which are alleged to have occurred in satanic rituals. We went on to suggest that it would be possible to actually stage a fake human sacrifice and explained how this could be accomplished. Since making this suggestion, however, we have heard some accounts of human sacrifices which contain such graphic details that it is more difficult to explain them away in this manner. In any case, whether the sacrifices are real or fake, most of the victims believe they have witnessed ritualistic murders and this has a profound effect on their lives.

With regard to David Raskin’s charge that there is a paucity of hard evidence on ritualistic abuse, it is interesting to note that some important information has been uncovered in Idaho.
This information could relate to what has been going on in Utah. From what we can learn, charges of satanic activity have surfaced in Provo, which is the home of the Mormon Church’s Brigham Young University, Salt Lake City, Bountiful, Ogden and Logan. We have been told that Bear Lake is also a place where Satanists are active. This lake begins in northern Utah and stretches up into southern Idaho. To the west of Bear Lake is the town of Rupert, Idaho. Rupert appears to be only about forty miles from the Utah border.

On the first page of his memo, Bishop Glenn Pace wrote that he had questioned three victims from the state of Idaho, and on November 8, 1991, KTVX (Channel 4) reported that Pace had, in fact, interviewed people from the city of Rupert with regard to satanic abuse. This information becomes rather important when we consider the case of “Baby X.” On October 23, 1990, the Seattle Post-Intelligence carried an article concerning the “Killing of Baby X.” In this article we find the following:

RUPERT, Idaho—. . . No deed was fouler than that perpetrated on Baby X.

When her tiny, charred corpse was found in a garbage dump almost a year ago, Baby X was hardly recognizable as human. An autopsy produced an even more horrifying discovery.

Before she was burned, Baby X . . . had been disemboweled and mutilated.

There long had been rumors of satanic cults in southern Idaho, of ritual killing and sacrifice.

But never in the memory of anyone in local law enforcement had the body of a possible victim ever been found. . . . Then, in July, there was a sudden and unexpected development 1,000 miles away, in California. A 10-year-old boy told authorities there he had witnessed the ritual sacrifice of an infant in his home state, in Idaho. . . .

His bizarre story and crude drawings bore striking similarities to a possible Baby X death scene, investigators said . . .

Kerry Patterson, a forensic pathologist . . . was called to assist the county coroner with the autopsy . . .

The remains were those of a girl, no more than 3 weeks old. . . . The abdominal organs had been cut out. Only the lungs and a portion of the upper heart chamber were left. Both feet were cut off, as well as the right arm from the shoulder.

The infant was dismembered before she was burned with gasoline, Patterson concluded.

While it has been suggested the baby could have died of pneumonia and that a predator might have been responsible for the missing body parts, no one seems to contest that the baby’s body was burned.

On January 4, 1991, the South Idaho Press reported that Sgt. Tim Hatcher of the Minidoka Sheriff’s Department traveled to California to interview the boy who claimed he saw a child sacrificed: “Hatcher said . . . that the boy very closely described a scenario similar to the Baby X case. . . . The boy also used words like ‘witch, sacrifice and devil’ and drew a picture of a barrel with fire and a baby, according to Hatcher.”

The boy also claimed that he was a victim of ritual abuse. The following was printed in the Salt Lake Tribune, on September 16, 1991:

RUPERT, Idaho — Authorities say drawings and descriptions by a child questioned in an abuse investigation indicate the child may have witnessed and been a victim of satanic rites. . . . Rupert police obtained the drawings last year. The child drew five pictures for Rupert Police Detective Terry Quinn . . . . The detective was not prepared for what he saw. Ghostly people, some frowning, others blank-faced, fill the pictures. One drawing shows people gathered around a table on which someone lies with male genitals exposed. . . . Another drawing shows two people on a table, hearts exposed. . . . After drawing the pictures, the child explained what they showed, Quinn said. “They put me on a table with a Bible. The devil is there. They pray to the devil. The devil makes these people hurt me. They hurt me so bad. They hurt me in the private parts. They have hurt me so many times.”

On November 8, 1991, KUTV reported that this boy’s house was located only a few miles from where Baby X was found! It is also interesting to note that after we published Pace’s memo, a victim of ritualistic abuse gave her story on KTVX (Channel 4). She claimed that her grandfather (a bishop in the Mormon Church) and her grandmother (who was president of the local ward Relief Society) were leaders in a satanic cult. She maintained that she saw her baby brother murdered and that she was forced to have a ritualistic abortion. As in the case of Baby X, her baby was burned!

WHY IN UTAH?

In the last issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger we stated that we concurred with Bishop Pace’s statement that the Mormon Church was a victim of a group of pernicious deceivers. While we have no reason to believe that the church itself is involved in promoting this evil conspiracy, the extent of satanic ritualistic abuse in Utah seems to raise some important questions about Mormonism.

One, since the Mormon leaders claim to have the same powers as the ancient Apostles in the Bible, why were they unable to detect that “bishops, a patriarch, a stake president, temple workers, and members of the Tabernacle Choir” (Pace Memo, page 5) were involved in these evil practices? Ezra Taft Benson, the thirteenth prophet of the Mormon Church, has boasted that church leaders have special discernment which is far superior to “earthly knowledge.” Why, then, did it take psychiatrists and psychologists to ferret out the facts concerning ritualistic abuse?

Two, why is it that the Mormon Church, which claims to be the only true church on the face of the earth, is so vulnerable to infiltration by occultists?

In the last issue of the Messenger, we pointed out that there are some things in LDS Church history and doctrine that make the church susceptible to deceivers who would use it for their own wicked purposes. One of the church’s most important problems has been with regard to polygamy. Unfortunately, Joseph Smith, the first Mormon prophet, declared that God gave him a revelation that he was to enter into plural marriage. This revelation is still published in the Doctrine and Covenants, one of the four standard works of the church. We find the following in that revelation: “Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you my servant Joseph . . . if any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another, and the first give her consent, and if he espouse the second, and they are virgins, and have vowed to no other man, then is he justified; he cannot commit adultery . . . And if he have ten virgins given unto him by this law, he cannot commit adultery . . . therefore is he justified” (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 132, verses 1, 61-62). Joseph Smith was obedient to the commandment and proceeded to marry dozens of plural wives before he was murdered in 1844.

Today, the Mormon Church does not allow its members to practice polygamy, and those who do so are excommunicated. But since church leaders never really repudiated the doctrine itself, teach that it will be lived in heaven, and still retain the revelation on polygamy in the Doctrine and Covenants, many Mormons have secretly entered into the practice. These people are known as Mormon Fundamentalists. Unfortunately, in some cases the practice of polygamy seems to open up the door for other sexual practices which are extremely harmful to children and young women. We have, in fact, learned that a number of women who are involved in the polygamous movement are also being treated for satanic ritualistic abuse.

From the accounts we have studied, it appears that incest plays an important role in cases of satanic ritualistic abuse. While the present leaders of the Mormon Church condemn incestuous relationships, during the time of Joseph Smith and Brigham Young some strange things were taught concerning this matter. Joseph Smith, for instance, “married five pairs of sisters” and even a “mother” and her own “daughter” (No Man Knows My History, page 336). In her book, Intimate Disciple, page 317, Mormon writer Clair Noall verified that Smith did marry a mother and her daughter: “Sylvia Lyon, Patty’s daughter and the wife of Windsor J. Lyon, was already sealed to Joseph. This afternoon she was to put her mother’s hand in the Prophet’s.” Fanny Stenhouse, who at one time had been a firm believer in Mormonism and had even allowed her husband to take another wife, wrote the following:

Marriages have been contracted between the nearest of relatives; and old men tottering on the brink of the grave have been united to little girls scarcely in their teens; while unnatural alliances of every description, which in any other community would be regarded with disgust and abhorrence, are here entered into in the name of God . . . It is quite a common thing in Utah for a man to marry two or even three sisters. . . . I know also another man who married a widow with several children; and when one of the girls had grown into her teens he insisted on marrying her also . . . and to this very day the daughter bears children to her step-father, living as wife in the same house with her mother! (Tell It All, 1874, pages 468-69)

The anti-Mormon writer Joseph H. Jackson charged that Joseph Smith himself “feigned a revelation to have Mrs. Milligan, his own sister, married to him spiritually.” That Smith believed that a man could be married for eternity to his own sister has been confirmed by an entry added to Joseph Smith’s private diary after his death. It appears under the date of October 26, 1843, and reads as follows:

The following named deceased persons were sealed to me (John M. Bernhisel) on Oct. 26th, 1843, by Pres. Joseph Smith—

Maria Bernhisel, Sister—
Brother Samuel’s wife, Catherine Kremer
Mary Shatto (Aunt) . . .
Recorded by Robt. L. Cambell
July 29, 1868[.] (Joseph Smith’s Diary, October 26, 1843, Church Historical Department)

The reader will notice that Bernhisel claimed that he was sealed to his sister by Joseph Smith. Now, if the doctrine of Celestial Marriage were true, in the resurrection John Bernhisel would find himself married to his own sister, Maria Bernhisel!

There is evidence that John Taylor, who became the third prophet of the Mormon Church, promised his own sister that she could be sealed to him. Under the date of February 25, 1889, L. John Nuttal, a very prominent Mormon recorded the following:

Agnes Schwartz & her daughter Mary called this morning to see Prest. Woodruff . . . She said that her brother John the late President John Taylor had told her some 30 years ago that if she could not be reconciled to continue with any of her husbands she might be sealed to his brother William or himself, and she now wanted to be sealed to him. (Journal of L. John Nuttal, vol. 2, pp. 362-63 of typed copy at Brigham Young University Library)

Benjamin G. Ferris, who was Secretary of the Territory of Utah, reported the following concerning Brigham Young’s views on incest:

Their system of plurality has obliterated nearly all sense of decency . . . There are a number of cases in which a man has taken a widow and her daughter for wives at the same time. One has a widow and her two daughters. There are also instances of the niece being sealed to the uncle, and they excite no more attention than any ordinary case. . . . Brigham Young stated in the pulpit, in 1852, that the time might come when, for the sake of keeping the lineage of the priesthood unbroken, marriages would be confined to the same families: as, for instance, the son of one mother would marry the daughter of another by the same father . . . Why should not the blood of the priesthood, like that of the Incas, be kept pure? (Utah And The Mormons, 1854, pages 252-253)

As early as 1852 Brigham Young, the second prophet of the Mormon Church, did comment on brothers and sisters marrying:

I feel like swearing by the Gods, and all the Holy Angels. I will just keep myself to myself and not mingle with them and I mean to say to my sons and daughters, marry one another and keep together, but that would be considered as treasonable and wicked by the world. I expect they would hang me before they passed sentence on me. (Sermon by Brigham Young, February 22, 1852, as published in The Teachings of President Brigham Young, compiled and edited by Fred C. Collier, vol. 3, page 60)

Joseph Smith, of course, contended that “God himself, who sits enthroned in yonder heavens, is a man like unto one of yourselves . . .” (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, pages 613-614). He also taught that God was married and had billions of spirit children in the pre-existence. In other words, according to Smith’s theology, we were all born to God and his wife and lived as his sons and daughters before coming to earth. Brigham Young reasoned that since all people who come to the earth were originally brothers and sisters, that there is really no problem with brothers and sisters marrying. On October 8, 1854, Brigham Young made these controversial comments:

Then I reckon that the children of Adam and Eve married each other; this is speaking to the point. *I believe in sisters marrying brothers, and brothers having their sisters for wives. Why? Because we cannot do otherwise. There are none others for me to marry but my sisters. “But you[a] would not pretend to say you would marry your father and mothers daughter.” If I did not I would marry another of my sisters that lives over in another garden . . . Our spirits are all brothers and sisters, and so are our bodies; and the opposite idea to this has resulted from the ignorant, and foolish traditions of the nations of the Earth. . . .

This is something pertaining to our marriage relation. The whole world will think what an awful thing it is. What an awful thing it would be if the Mormons should just say we believe in marrying brothers and sisters. Well we shall be under the necessity of doing it, because we cannot find anybody else to marry. (The Teachings of President Brigham Young, vol. 3, pages 362, 368)
The strange teachings of Joseph Smith, Brigham Young and other early Mormon leaders concerning polygamy and incest have caused confusion in the minds of many Mormons and may have helped open the way for satanic ritualistic abuse in the church.

MORMONS & SACRIFICE

Notwithstanding the fact that Satanist Anton LaVey down plays the idea of animal or human sacrifice, many investigators believe that at least some Satanists are involved in this type of ritualistic activity. We have already quoted Aleister Crowley as saying that “A male child of perfect innocence and high intelligence is the most satisfactory and suitable victim.”

In over thirty years of studying Mormonism we have never found any doctrine which encourages the killing of an innocent child. There are, however, some unusual ideas concerning sacrifice which we should take a look at.

For example, while Joseph Smith condemned the practice of animal sacrifices after the death of Christ in his Book of Mormon (3 Nephi 9:19), he later wrote that, “These sacrifices, as well as every ordinance belonging to the Priesthood, will, when the Temple of the Lord shall be built, and the sons of Levi be purified, be fully restored and attended to in all their powers, ramifications, and blessings” (History of the Church, vol. 4, page 211).

According to Wandle Mace, a devout Mormon, Joseph Smith instructed his followers to offer an animal sacrifice in the Kirtland Temple: “Joseph told them to go to Kirtland, and cleanse and purify a certain room in the Temple, that they must kill a lamb and offer a sacrifice unto the Lord which should prepare them to ordain Willard Richards a member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles” (“Journal of Wandle Mace,” page 32, microfilmed copy at Brigham Young University Library). Wilford Woodruff, who later became the fourth prophet of the Mormon Church, claimed that President Brigham Young disclosed that when the temple was completed in Utah, it would have a sacrificial altar: “Under the pulpit in the west End will be a place to Offer Sacrifices. There will be an Altar prepared for that purposes [sic] so that when any sacrifices are to be offered they should be offered there” (Wilford Woodruff’s Journal: 1833-1898, December 18, 1857, vol. 5, page 140).

Although it is clear that the first two prophets of the Mormon Church believed that animal sacrifice would be an important part of the “gospel,” we know of no accounts of any animal sacrifice in Mormonism after the 1840s.

From the evidence we have examined, it appears that Joseph Smith’s interest in blood sacrifices did not originally come from reading the Old Testament but rather from his participation in the occult. Joseph Smith’s involvement in magic practices had always been denied by the Mormon Church until 1971, when Wesley P. Walters discovered an original document which proves that Joseph Smith was a “glass looker” and that he was arrested and examined before a justice of the peace in Bainbridge, N.Y. in 1826. This document is Justice Albert Neeley’s bill showing the costs involved in several trials held in 1826. The fifth item from the top mentions the examination of “Joseph Smith The Glass Looker” (see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 34, for a photograph of the complete document).

This document confirmed the historicity of the examination record which had been published since 1873. In this document Joseph Smith admitted that he used a Seer Stone which he placed in his hat to try to locate buried treasures. The reader will no doubt be struck by the similarity to the magical practice of crystal gazing which is widely practiced in the occult. In Joseph Smith’s time magicians and other individuals influenced by the occult used this method to find buried treasures and lost items. In the printed record we read that Joseph Smith said “That he had a certain stone which he had occasionally looked at to determine where hidden treasures in the bowels of the earth were; that he . . . had occasionally been in the habit of looking through this stone to find lost property for three years . . .” (see complete transcript in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 32).

A few years after Smith’s run in with the law, he was using this same method—a stone placed in a hat—to translate the Book of Mormon. David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, wrote: “I will now give you a description of the manner in which the Book of Mormon was translated. Joseph would put the seer stone into a hat, and put his face in the hat, drawing it closely around his face to exclude the light; and in the darkness the spiritual light would shine. A piece of something resembling parchment would appear, and on that appeared the writing” (An Address To All Believers In Christ, 1887, page 12). Many witnesses confirmed this statement and even the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts referred to the use of a seer stone in translating the Book of Mormon (see A Comprehensive History of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, vol. 1, page 129).

Besides the magical stone, the money diggers often offered animal sacrifices to the demons who guarded the treasures. There seems to be a good deal of evidence to show that Joseph Smith and others in his family participated in blood sacrifices in their money digging operation. For example, in an affidavit William Stafford related:

I, William Stafford, having been called upon to give a true statement of my knowledge, concerning the character and conduct of the family of Smiths . . . do say . . . A great part of their time was devoted to digging for money . . . .

Joseph Smith, Sen., came to me one night, and told me, that Joseph Jr. had been looking in his glass, and had seen not many rods from his house, two or three kegs of gold and silver, some feet under the surface of the earth . . . I accordingly consented to go . . . Joseph, Sen. first made a circle, twelve or fourteen feet in diameter. This circle, said he, contains the treasure. He then stuck in the ground a row of witch hazel sticks, around the said circle, for the purpose of keeping off the evil spirits . . . the old man . . . by signs and motions, asked leave of absence, and went to the house to inquire of young Joseph the cause of our disappointment. He soon returned and said, that Joseph had remained all this time in the house, looking in his stone and watching the motions of the evil spirit . . . it caused the money to sink . . . . the old man observed . . . we had made a mistake in the commencement of the operation; if it had not been for that, said he, we should have got the money.

At another time . . . Old Joseph and one of the boys came to me one day, and said that Joseph Jr. had discovered some very valuable treasures, which could be procured only in one way . . . a black sheep should be taken on the ground where the treasures were concealed—that after cutting its throat, it should be led around a circle while bleeding. This being done, the wrath of the evil spirit would be appeased: the treasures could then be obtained . . . I let them have a large fat sheep. They afterwards informed me, that the sheep was killed pursuant to commandment; but as there was some mistake in the process, it did not have the desired effect. This, I believe is the only time they ever made money-digging a profitable business.

BLOOD ATONEMENT RITUAL

One of the most unusual teachings found in the early Mormon Church is the doctrine of “blood atonement.” In a manuscript written in 1839, Reed Peck said that the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith claimed he had a revelation in which Apostle Peter told him that he had killed Judas: “He [Joseph Smith] talked of dissenters and cited us to the case of Judas, saying that Peter told him in a conversation a few days ago that [he] himself hung Judas for betraying Christ . . .” (The Reed Peck Manuscript, page 13).

Although the doctrine of blood atonement was kept secret at first, when the Mormons were isolated in Utah and had more power, they began to boldly teach that certain people needed to be put to death. For example, on September 21, 1856, President Brigham Young, the second prophet of the church, publicly proclaimed that certain sins could only be atoned for by the shedding of the sinner’s own blood:

> There are sins that men commit for which they cannot receive forgiveness . . . and if they had their eyes open to their true condition, they would be perfectly willing to have their blood spilt upon the ground, that the smoke thereof might ascend to heaven as an offering for their sins; and the smoking incense would atone for their sins, whereas, if such is not the case, they will stick to them and remain upon them in the spirit world.

> I know, when you hear my brethren telling about cutting people off from the earth, that you consider it is strong doctrine, but it is to save them, not to destroy them. . . . I know there are transgressors, who if they knew themselves, and the only condition upon which they can obtain forgiveness, would beg of their brethren to shed their blood, that the smoke thereof might ascend to God as an offering to appease the wrath that is kindled against them, and that the law might have its course. I will say further; I have had men come to me and offer their lives to atone for their sins.

> It is true that the blood of the Son of God was shed for sins . . . yet men can commit sins which it can never remit . . . There are sins that can be atoned for by an offering upon an altar, as in ancient days, and there are sins that the blood of a lamb, or a calf, or of turtle doves, cannot remit, but they must be atoned for by the blood of the man. . . . You have been taught that doctrine, but you do not understand it. (Sermon by Brigham Young, Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pages 53-54; also published in the Mormon Church’s Deseret News, October 1 1856, page 235)

> Since this sermon was published in the official organ of the Mormon Church and was reprinted in the church’s own publication in England, there can be no doubt that blood atonement was an important doctrine of the church. In addition, there are many other sermons, diaries, and manuscripts which contain information on this doctrine. In Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 400-402, we provide documentation to show that there were at least eleven different offenses for which a person could be put to death in early Utah—murder, adultery, immorality, stealing, using the name of the Lord in vain, refusing to receive the gospel, marriage to an African, covenant breaking, apostasy, lying, counterfeiting and condemning Joseph Smith or consenting to his death.

President Brigham Young said that if the Mormons really loved their neighbors they would be willing to kill them to save their souls:

> Now take a person in this congregation . . . and suppose that . . . he has committed a sin that he knows will deprive him of that exaltation which he desires, and that he cannot attain to it without the shedding of blood, and also knows that by having his blood shed he will atone for that sin, and be saved and exalted with the Gods, is there a man or woman in this house but what would say “shed my blood that I may be saved . . .”

> All mankind love themselves, and let these principles be known by an individual, and he would be glad to have his blood shed. That would be loving themselves, even unto an eternal exaltation. Will you love your brothers and sisters likewise, when they have committed a sin that cannot be atoned for without the shedding of their blood? Will you love that man or woman well enough to shed their blood? . . .

> I could refer you to plenty of instances where men have been righteously slain, in order to atone for their sins. . . . I have known a great many men who left this Church for whom there is no chance whatever for exaltation, but if their blood had been spilled, it would have been better for them . . . This is loving our neighbor as ourselves; if he needs help, help him; and if he wants salvation and it is necessary to spill his blood on the earth in order that he may be saved, spill it . . . That is the way to love mankind. (Deseret News, February 18, 1857; also reprinted in Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pp. 219-20)

Although Brigham Young equated blood atonement with “loving our neighbor,” it seems obvious that vengeance often played the most important role when the doctrine was actually applied. Joseph F. Smith, who served as the sixth prophet of the church, once admitted that he was about to stab a man if he even expressed approval of the murder of Joseph Smith. Under the date of December 6, 1889, Apostle Abraham H. Cannon recorded the following in his journal:

> About 4:30 p.m. this meeting adjourned and was followed by a meeting of Presidents Woodruff, Cannon and Smith and Bros. Lyman and Grant. . . . Bro. Joseph F. Smith was traveling some years ago near Carthage when he met a man who said he had just arrived five minutes too late to see the Smiths killed. Instantly a dark cloud seemed to overshadow Bro. Smith and he asked how this man looked upon the deed. Bro. S. was oppressed by a most horrible feeling . . . After a brief pause the man answered, “Just as I have always looked upon it—that it was a d___d cold-blooded murder.” The cloud immediately lifted from Bro. Smith and he found that he had his open pocket knife grasped in his hand in his pocket, and he believes that had this man given his approval to that murder of the prophets he would have immediately struck him to the heart. (Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon, Dec. 6, 1889, pp. 205-206; see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 403, for an actual photograph from the journal)

> If Joseph F. Smith had “struck” the man “to the heart,” the killing would have been considered more an act of vengeance than a ritualistic act. If, on the other hand, a person consented to die for his or her transgressions, the sacrifice could have ritualistic overtones. John D. Lee, who served on the Council of Fifty in the early Mormon Church, told of a case where there was prayer involved. Lee reported that a man by the name of “Rosmos Anderson” committed adultery with his step-daughter. He was “placed under covenant that if they again committed adultery, Anderson should suffer death.” Lee went on to state:
Soon after this a charge was laid against Anderson before the Council, accusing him of adultery with his step-daughter. . . . it was the Bishop’s Council. . . . the Council voted that Anderson must die for violating his covenants. Klingensmith went to Anderson and notified him that the orders were that he must die by having his throat cut, so that the running of his blood would atone for his sins. . . . His wife was ordered to prepare a suit of clean clothing, in which to have her husband buried . . .

Klingensmith, James Haslem, Daniel McFarland and John M. Higbee dug a grave in the field near Cedar City, and that night, about 12 o’clock, went to Anderson’s house and ordered him to make ready to obey the Council. . . . Anderson knelt down upon the side of the grave and prayed, Klingensmith and his company then cut Anderson’s throat from ear to ear and held him so that his blood ran into the grave.

As soon as he was dead they dressed him in his clean clothes, threw him into the grave and buried him. They then carried his bloody clothing back to his family, and gave them to his wife to wash, when she was again instructed to say that her husband was in California. (Confessions of John D. Lee, 1880, pages 282-283)

In Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? we have documented that a large number of people were killed in Nauvoo and early Utah because of the church’s teaching regarding blood atonement (see pages 398-404-A, 428-450, 493-515). Since Brigham Young and other church leaders were stressing the doctrine of blood atonement in 1857, it is obvious that this doctrine played a very important role in the Mountain Meadows Massacre. Mormon historian B.H. Roberts called this massacre "one of the most lamentable episodes in Utah history, and in the history of the church."

The Mormons believed that there were people among the emigrants who persecuted them before they came west. Brigham Young had once counseled: “. . . in regard to those who have persecuted this people . . . if any miserable scoundrels come here, cut their throats” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, page 311). The Mormons who lived in southern Utah held a “special priesthood meeting” at Cedar City and decided that the emigrants “should be done away with.” The priesthood leaders decided to “stir up the Indians” and have them attack the company. When it became apparent that the Indians could not overpower the emigrants, the Mormons came up with an insidious and cowardly plan to destroy them.

Mormon writer William E. Berrett gave this description of the massacre:

It was a deliberately planned massacre, treacherously carried into execution . . . a flag of truce was sent to the emigrant camp and terms of surrender proposed. The Emigrants were to give up their arms. The wounded were to be loaded into wagons, followed by the women and children, and the men to bring up the rear . . . they were to be conducted by the whites to Cedar City . . . the march began.

. . . The white men at a given signal, fell upon the unarmed emigrant men . . . Only the smallest children were spared. (The Restored Church, 1956, pages 468-469)

In May 1861, Brigham Young visited the site of the massacre. His actions on this trip demonstrated that he approved of the massacre. Wilford Woodruff, who later became the 4th president of the Mormon Church, travelled with Young and wrote the following in his journal:

We visited the Mountain Meadow Monument put up at the burial place of 120 persons . . . A wooden Cross was placed on top with the following words: Vengence is mine and I will repay saith the Lord. President Young said it should be Vengence is mine and I have taken a little. (Wilford Woodruff’s Journal, May 25, 1861, vol. 5, page 577)

Juanita Brooks, who did a great deal of research on the Mountain Meadows Massacre, believed that Brigham Young did not order the massacre. Nevertheless, she felt that Young and Apostle George A. Smith set up the conditions which led to the tragic event. Mrs. Brooks was, in fact, convinced that Brigham Young was involved as an accessory after the fact and took part in a cover-up of the crime. In her book, The Mountain Meadows Massacre, 1970, page 219, she firmly stated her belief that “Brigham Young was accessory after the fact, in that he knew what had happened, and how and why it happened. Evidence of this is abundant and unmistakable, and from the most impeccable Mormon sources.” For more information on the Mountain Meadows Massacre see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 493-515.

INTERESTING PARALLELS

There are a number of similarities between the Mormon practice of blood atonement and the satanic practice of human sacrifice:

1. In both cases human beings are sacrificed to please a deity.
2. Both ceremonies have an emphasis on the importance of blood being poured out. In Mormonism, as we have shown, it was taught that when “blood was spilt upon the ground,” the “smoking incense would atone” for a persons “sins.” While it appears that many people were sacrificed in early Mormonism in a vindictive way, some may have been killed because the early Mormons loved them and did not want them to become “angels to the devil.” Satanists, on the other hand, appear to sacrifice people for purely selfish purposes—in e., they feel that the blood of the person sacrificed gives them power.
3. Cutting a person’s throat is believed to be a good way to put a victim to death in satanic rituals. The early Mormons also used this method on many occasions.

While there are a number of parallels between blood atonement and satanic sacrifice, there are some important differences. One of the most important is that the Mormons did not delight in the sacrifice of children. Some Satanists, on the other hand, seem to find the practice of sacrificing children very appealing. It is true that the early Mormons were implicated in murdering a number of children in the Mountain Meadows Massacre, but the Indians were chosen to actually kill most of them. John D. Lee, who carried the white flag of truce to the emigrants, later revealed that just before the massacre, “Major Higbee reported as follows: ‘It is the orders of the President, that all the emigrants must be put out of the way. President Haight has counseled with Colonel Dame . . . none who are old enough to talk are to be spared.”’ (Confessions of John D. Lee, page 232)

On page 237 of the same book, Lee said that the “Indians were to kill the women and large children so that it would be certain that no Mormon would be guilty of shedding innocent blood—if it should happen that there was any innocent blood in the company that were to die. Our leading men all said that there was no innocent blood in the whole company.”

John D. Lee went on to say that after the massacre he learned that a very small child had been killed: “. . . one little child about six months old . . . was killed by the same bullet.
that entered its father’s breast; it was shot through the head. . . . I saw it lying dead when I returned to the place of slaughter” (page 241). On pages 242-244, Lee also claimed that a Mormon by the name of Knight brained a boy that was about fourteen years old. The boy came running up to our wagons, and Knight struck him on the head with the butt end of his gun, and crushed his skull. . . . Just after the wounded were all killed I saw a girl, some ten or eleven years old, running toward us . . . she was covered with blood. An Indian shot her before she got with-in sixty yards of us. . . . I walked along the line where the emigrants had been killed, and saw many bodies lying dead and naked on the field, near by where the women lay. I saw ten children . . . they were from ten to sixteen years of age . . . When I reached the place where the dead men lay . . . Major Higbee said, “The boys have acted admirably . . . all of the — — Gentiles but two or three fell at the first fire.” He said that three or four got away some distance, but the men on horses soon overtook them and cut their throats.

The killing of children by the early Mormons at Mountain Meadows seems to have stemmed from the belief that it would have been impossible to perpetuate a cover-up if the older children had been saved. As we indicated earlier, we know of no teaching concerning the sacrifice of children by LDS leaders. Moreover, in all of the cases of blood atonement we have studied we do not know of a single case in which a child was murdered as the result of orders coming from the prophet of the Mormon Church. It has, of course, been alleged that Satanists in fairly high positions in the church have been engaged in sacrificing infants, but so far no one has suggested that the top leadership of the church is involved.

As we have noted earlier, Brigham Young taught that the practice of blood atonement was motivated by love—i.e., the victims were actually going to be saved from becoming “angels to the devil” through the sacrifice of their own lives! While it is hard for any Christian or civilized person to accept the Mormon doctrine of blood atonement, the idea of Satanists or other occultists sacrificing innocent children just so that they can gain power is far more appalling.

RECENT MURDERS

Although the Mormon Church seems to have abandoned the practice of blood atonement in the 19th century, some of the Mormon Fundamentalists have continued both teaching and practicing the doctrine. There have been a number of assassinations since 1972 in which the victims’ blood was “spilt on the ground.”

In August 1972, Joel LeBaron was murdered. His brother, Ervil LeBaron was arrested and convicted. Unfortunately, Ervil LeBaron’s conviction was later overturned (Salt Lake Tribune, May 29, 1980), and the shedding of blood continued. The Tribune, December 28, 1974, gave this information:

A woman was reported slain Friday in a new outbreak of fighting between rivals in a dissident religious sect . . . first reports indicated a house was set afire and [the] occupants shot as they ran out. . . . Kraus said as many as 10 other persons were reported wounded . . . The LeBaron family was excommunicated from the Church . . . several years before the sect was formed because of what Mormon church officials said was apostasy and polygamy.

In 1975 another murder occurred in California. One of LeBaron’s disciples, Vonda White murdered a man named Dean Grover Vest. According to the Tribune, July 13, 1978, “In his opening statement in the murder and conspiracy trial . . . Rempel said he would prove that she killed Dean Grover Vest . . . by order of LeBaron to achieve ‘blood atonement.’ Vest was planning on ‘defecting’ from the Church of the Lamb of God at the time of the killing . . .” On July 20, 1978, the Tribune revealed that “Sullivan said LeBaron told him that God said ‘to have a woman, Vonda White, to blood atone him . . . She would . . . fix him a hot meal . . . get behind him and shoot him in the back of the head until he was dead.’” Vonda White was convicted and sentenced to “life in prison” for the blood atonement slaying of Mr. Vest.

In April 1975, Ervil LeBaron had Robert Simons assassinated in Utah. LeBaron continued to order the blood atonement of those who would not accept his leadership, and on November 25, 1978, the Salt Lake Tribune reported that, “Investigators have said he may be responsible for between 20 and 29 slayings stemming from his leadership of the Church of the Lamb of God.”

In 1977, LeBaron had Rulon C. Allred, who was also a Mormon Fundamentalist, blood atoned. According to an article printed in the Tribune on March 4, 1979, two women “went into Dr. Allred’s office with guns blazing, shooting the victim seven times . . .” Years later Rena Chynoweth, a member of a team that was sent to kill Allred, revealed her involvement in the murder. In her book, The Blood Covenant, 1990, page 207, she stated: “I knew the moment had come to do what I was sent there to do. . . . I pulled out the gun, and fired at him. There were seven shots in my clip and I emptied it. I heard him gasp, ‘Oh, my God!’ once as he fell to the floor, bleeding.” It should be noted that Rena Chynoweth was one of LeBaron’s thirteen wives. Fortunately, LeBaron was finally brought to justice in May, 1980, for ordering the murder of Dr. Allred, and on August 16, 1981, he was found dead in his cell at the Utah State Prison. An autopsy was performed but the cause of death was not determined.

The Mormon prophet Brigham Young once said that any man who found his “brother in bed with his wife, and put a javelin through both of them would be justified, and . . . would atone for their sins . . . I would at once do so . . . I have no wife whom I love so well that I would not put a javelin through her heart, and I would do it with clean hands. . . .” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, page 247). Ervil LeBaron, likewise, believed that in certain cases a man should blood atone his own wife. Lloyd Sullivan claimed that he had been having problems with his wife, Bonnie, and that LeBaron told him the Lord wanted him to take Bonnie to the “deep south and deep-six her there” (Prophet of Blood: The Untold Story of Ervil LeBaron and the Lambs of God, by Ben Bradley, Jr. and Dale Van Atta, 1981, page 273).

Ervil even went so far as to order the death of his own daughter: . . . Lloyd was in the Perth Street warehouse when he noticed Ervil’s pride and joy, a green-over-white LTD, was sagging measurable. “I wonder if Rebecca’s in the trunk,” Ervil commented idly to Lloyd, who opened the trunk about four inches and was stunned to see Rebecca Chynoweth lying there, blood running from her nose. She was obviously dead.

Later, Ervil . . . instructed Lloyd to tell nephew John Sullivan to get a shovel and bring it over to Thelma Chynoweth’s house immediately . . . Don Sullivan . . . would recall that . . . LeBaron was a passenger in a car Don was driving, when Ervil began a conversation with the blunt statement that he had “gotten rid of Rebecca.” . . . “we sent her a one-way ticket,” LeBaron replied, “she couldn’t get along and the Lord ordered to send her a one-way ticket.” . . . Sullivan was still incredulous at the implication. He later confessed “astonishment at the idea that he could kill his own daughter.” . . . he [Sullivan] pressed as if he were a prosecutor . . .
“The Lord ordered her to be blood-atoned, so He had her blood atoned.” LeBaron replied . . . Ervil said, matter-of-factly, “Rebecca is no longer with us.” (Prophet of Blood, pages 229-31)

Ervil LeBaron’s widow, Rena Chynoweth, points out that the death of LeBaron has not stopped the bloodshed:

Ervil never committed any of the murders himself. He didn’t have to. He had loyal followers like us to carry out his “God-given” commands. Like Charles Manson, he stayed behind the scenes, targeting his victims and sending us, his hardcore disciples, out as his executioners. . . . Now that Ervil is dead, some of his own sons have become avenging angels of his will. The blood-stained hand of Ervil LeBaron has reached beyond his grave.

For the past three years my family and I have been in hiding. My name is on a “hit list” Ervil drew up shortly before his death. What was my “crime”? . . . What were the “crimes” of some of the other victims? The answer is that we were traitors, defectors from Ervil’s flock. We committed the unpardonable sin of breaking away from him. In so doing we, in effect, signed our own death warrants. (The Blood Covenant, page 5)

Rena Chynoweth was not exaggerating concerning the danger facing those who fell out of favor with the LeBaron group. On June 28, 1988, the Houston Chronicle reported the death of four people, two of whom were brothers of Rena:

The hand of a dead man reached out to kill Monday. The first to die was Mark Chynoweth, gunned down in his North Houston appliance store. That killing was followed by Chynoweth’s brother, Duane Chynoweth, and Duane’s daughter, Jennifer, executed when they attempted to deliver a washing machine. The fourth to die was Eddie Marston in Irving, yet another former proselyte of a renegade cult leader . . . Ervil LeBaron lies buried in a north Houston grave, but his sons continue to kill.

The LeBarons are not the only ones who have tried to keep the early Mormon teaching of blood atonement alive. Don and Ron Lafferty were once members of the Mormon Church. Ron Lafferty, in fact, claimed that he “served in three bishoprics” (Salt Lake Tribune, August 11, 1984). Ron acknowledged that he began to have an interest in polygamy based on revelation from God, their suffering does not begin the fact that they try to sweep these things under the rug instead of openly dealing with them leaves the door wide open for occultists who wish to penetrate the Mormon Church.

be cut. He asked Ron if they had to do it that way, he asked, “Can’t we just shoot them?” and Ron said, “No, that it had to be done that way.” On January 11, 1985, the Tribune reported: “The woman, while pleading for her daughter’s life . . . had her throat cut from ear to ear, according to testimony in the trial.”

The description of the murders given in the Salt Lake Tribune on January 8, 1985, reminds one of a blood atonement killing in early Utah which was described by John D. Lee:

. . . Daniel Charles Lafferty . . . told companions it was “no problem” to cut the 15-month-old child’s throat as she lay in her crib. “I felt the spirit . . . it was with me,” he said . . . Chief Utah County Attorney Wayne Watson . . . gave jurors a “road map” of the case . . . “They then slashed her [Brenda Lafferty’s] throat with a 10-inch blade . . . and held her head back so the blood would spill from her body.”

Mr. Watson, his voice cracked with emotion, said that then Dan Lafferty took the razor-edged knife “and walked down the hallway to that bedroom—with the baby crying ‘Mommy!’ ‘Mommy!’—and he cut her throat.”

The teachings of the early Mormon Church on human sacrifice, polygamy and incest could easily be used by Satanists to promote their own agenda. Furthermore, the fact that there are people in Utah who are still involved in these practices makes the state a fertile field for satanic worship. While the sexual abuse and sacrifice of children in satanic rituals seems far more evil than blood atonement and plural marriage, it would certainly be easier for those who believe in these teachings of the early Mormon Church to fall into Satanism. It is true, of course, that the current leaders of the Latter-day Saints are trying to suppress some of the more embarrassing teachings of Joseph Smith and Brigham Young. Nevertheless, the fact that they try to sweep these things under the rug instead of openly dealing with them leaves the door wide open for occultists who wish to penetrate the Mormon Church.

THERE IS HOPE

While it is very painful for Latter-day Saints to learn that Joseph Smith, Brigham Young and other leaders of the early Mormon Church brought forth doctrines which could not be based on revelation from God, their suffering does not begin to compare with that experienced by victims of satanic ritual abuse. Whether these victims are Mormons, members of other churches or no church at all makes no difference. They suffer such indescribable pain in both their bodies and their minds that many of them commit suicide. For example, on November 17, 1991, The Herald Journal, published in Logan, Utah, printed an obituary which contained the following:

Michelle Tallmadge, 23, died early Saturday morning Nov. 16, 1991, in Logan. . . . In her childhood Michelle was subject to severe ritualistic abuse. When these memories surfaced at a later age she was never able to resolve the memories with who she wanted to be. After four years of unbearable pain she left this life of her own accord.

Many of those who were victims of satanic ritual abuse have admitted that eventually they became so disturbed in their minds that they participated in ceremonies in which human sacrifices occurred. Some, in fact, have acknowledged that they sacrificed their own child in these rituals. Unfortunately, in Mormonism this presents a perplexing problem because Joseph Smith taught:

A murderer, for instance, one that sheds innocent blood, cannot have forgiveness. David sought repentance at the hand of God . . . for the murder of Uriah; but he could only get it through hell: he got a promise that his soul should not be left in hell. . . . [Murderers] could not be baptized for the remission of sins for they had shed innocent blood. (Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith, 1942, page 339)

One of the authors [Sandra] recalls that in the late 1950’s her teacher at the Mormon Institute of Religion told her he had a friend who had committed murder. This teacher was rather distraught because his Mormon religion really had nothing to offer to this murderer who had been sentenced to death. Even if he fully confessed and repented, he would never be able to dwell with God in the celestial kingdom. According to Joseph Smith’s theology, he would be forever excluded in the telestial kingdom.

Bishop Glenn Pace seemed to grasp the serious implications of the matter. In his memo, page 5, he asked: “What does a priesthood leader tell individuals who come forward and say that they have participated in these rituals—which may include human sacrifice? Should they have a temple recommend? Will they ever be forgiven? . . . Is a person who has been raised in an occult [setting] from infancy accountable for things that take place in a dissociated state, even though those acts were committed after the age of eight? . . . there is no place to go for an answer.”

Mormonism seems to have no clear answers to these questions. Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth prophet, claimed:

Through the atonement of Christ all mankind may be saved . . . But man may commit certain grievous sins—according to his light and knowledge—that will place him beyond the reach of the atoning blood of Christ . . . Joseph Smith taught that there were certain sins so grievous . . . that they will place the transgressors beyond the power of the atonement of Christ. If these offenses are committed, then the blood of Christ will not cleanse them from their sins even though they repent. (Doctrines of Salvation, 1959, pages 133-35)

In the 1979 printing of his book, Mormon Doctrine, Apostle Bruce R. McConkie still maintained that “there are some serious sins for which the cleansing blood of Christ does not operate . . .” (page 92).

The LDS teaching that the blood of Christ cannot cleanse from all sin is diametrically opposed to the teachings of the Bible. In 1 John 1:7 we read that “the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.” While Mormon doctrine concerning the atoning blood of Christ is very confusing, orthodox Christianity holds out a real hope for those unfortunate people who have become so deeply entangled in the occult that they have become involved in human sacrifice. The promise of forgiveness is freely available to all. “If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness” (1 John 1:9).

It does not matter how evil our life has been; if we turn to the Lord in true repentance, he will take away our sins and give us a new heart filled with love, joy and peace. We simply have to put our full trust in the fact that God loves us and has provided salvation through Jesus Christ: “For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life” (John 3:16).

If those who have been involved in satanic ritual abuse or human sacrifice will fully turn themselves over to the Lord, they can be completely forgiven. Those who have committed themselves to the Lord can rest in Psalm 103:11-12: “For as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is his mercy toward them that fear him. As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us.” It is a wonderful feeling to know that we are completely at peace with God and that we longer have to feel guilty for the past. This, of course, does not mean that we have a license to sin in the future. God has, in fact, called us to holy living (see Colossians 3:1-17).

While those who have participated in the evils of satanic ritual abuse often have a hard time believing in God or that he can completely forgive their sins, many Mormons and members of other churches have another misconception that can be spiritually fatal: this is the failure to recognize their own sinful nature. The Apostle Paul pointed out the problem in Romans 3:23: “For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God.” Since we all have become trapped in our own sin and selfishness, we all stand in danger of losing our souls if we do not turn to the Lord: “For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord” (Romans 6:23). Everyone of us, therefore, needs to acknowledge our own sinful and desperate condition before God and accept the free gift of salvation which comes through his grace: “For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God” (Ephesians 2:8).

Although it is easy for those of us who have never been involved in satanic ritual abuse to condemn the wickedness of those who have become entangled in it, we should remember that it is only through God’s great mercy that we have been kept from the type of environment that leads people to commit such dreadful acts. Had we found ourselves in the same circumstances, it is likely we would have turned out the same way or even worse! If we fail to recognize our own sinful condition, we become as the Pharisee mentioned by Jesus:

Two men went up into the temple to pray; the one a Pharisee, and the other a publican. The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself, God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican. I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess. And the publican, standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner. I tell you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other: for every one that exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted. (Luke 18:10-14)

CONCLUSION

In pleading with victims and/or perpetrators of the horrors of ritualistic abuse to turn to Jesus for spiritual healing, we do not mean to discourage them from receiving treatment from qualified therapists. The trauma and confusion caused by ritualistic abuse are so severe that those involved in any way really need professional help. We would urge those who even feel that they may have a problem to seek help from those who are qualified. Our readers should pray for the victims and even the perpetrators of this terrible abuse. The investigators and therapists working in the area of ritualistic abuse certainly need a lot of prayer. Besides the tremendous pressure of trying to help the ritually abused, many of those who counsel with them are fearful for their own safety.

We would solicit the prayers of Christians as we continue to pursue the truth about satanic ritualistic abuse. Pray that we will not be deceived about this important matter. We neither want to minimize nor to exaggerate the extent of this evil. We just want to know the truth about the matter. Pray also for our safety as we look into this dark and sinister area of the occult. One never knows what to expect when prying into illegal activities. For example, when we suggested in the March 1984 issue of the Messenger that Mark Hofmann’s “Salamander letter” was a forgery, we had no idea that he would later kill two people to protect his bogus document business.

We are now in the process of preparing a book entitled, Satanic Ritualistic Abuse and Mormonism. This book will not only have the important material found in issues 80 and 81 of the Salt Lake City Messenger, but it will also contain significant new information concerning the subject. It will of course have Bishop Glenn Pace’s startling memo which set off the controversy regarding the practice of ritualistic abuse in the Mormon Church.

THE LIGHTHOUSE NEEDS A HOME!

As the ministry has continued to expand we have become increasingly aware that Utah Lighthouse Ministry desperately needs a home of its own so that it can effectively meet the needs of the growing number of people who are searching for the truth. Because we ship a large number of books, tracts and tapes throughout the world, some people who visit our bookstore are surprised to learn that we have a relatively small work area. At the present time, in fact, all of the work is done in our own house and in the garage! Besides the fact that we are running out of space to store the material, the bookstore is far from adequate for the number of people who come in to talk or browse. It is only 16 x 12 feet to begin with and the book cases and desk take up part of this area. The room often becomes so crowded that customers leave before they are able to obtain all of the publications or information they need.

Fortunately, a small house next to ours became available and the ministry was able to obtain it. At first we thought the house was unusable and we were preparing to tear it down and use the lot for a new building. Upon further examination, however, we found that under the stucco there is a good brick structure which is of historical interest. It was probably built toward the end of the 19th century.

At the present time we are thinking of removing the stucco and restoring the house. It would make a very good bookstore and would be much larger than the one in our house. In addition, we would like to add on a building at the back of the house where our publishing and shipping operations could be done in a more efficient manner. At the present time we do not have enough money to complete such a project (around $65,000). We would ask our friends to pray for us that if this is the Lord’s will, he will show us how to proceed. We do have eight acres of land on the bank of the Deer Creek Reservoir, in Heber Valley, which was donated to us a number of years ago. Perhaps some of those who believe in our ministry might be interested in buying this land or donating to our building project.

Utah Lighthouse Ministry is a non-profit organization which ministers to many people and provides support for 44 children through World Vision. Those who are interested in helping our ministry can send their tax-deductible contributions to Utah Lighthouse Ministry, P.O. Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110. Contributions and orders can now be made over the phone (801-485-8894) with Visa or MasterCard.

PLAN TO ATTEND!

Christian Institute For Mormon Studies

June 25-27, 1992 — Salt Lake Hilton

This exciting three-day conference brings Christians together from all over the country who share a vision for more effectively sharing the Good News of Jesus Christ with the Mormon people.

Major speakers include:

- Ron Enroth, PhD (Professor of Sociology at Westmont College)
- Sandra Tanner (Utah Lighthouse Ministry)
- David Crump, PhD (Salt Lake Pastor)

Over 20 challenging seminars will sharpen your understanding of ministry to and among LDS people. This conference is sponsored by the Utah Institute for Biblical Studies.

For a free brochure and registration fee information, please call or write Utah Lighthouse Ministry (801-485-8894) or call the Utah Institute for Biblical Studies (801-581-1900). Tapes are still available from last years’ conference. Just request CIMS tape list of speakers and costs.

Did Abuse Cause Changes in the Temple Ritual?

In 1990 we published the book, Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony: 1842-1990. At that time we had not heard of Bishop Pace’s memo on ritualistic abuse. After we read the memo, however, it seemed obvious that some of the changes made in the ceremony may have stemmed from the fact that satanists were using portions of the ritual in their ceremonies. The reader will remember that Pace said that this caused some of the victims who had been ritualistically abused to have “flashbacks” when they first went through the Mormon temple ritual: “When the victim goes to the temple and hears the exact words, horrible memories are triggered.” We feel that it is very significant that the LDS Church would make major changes in the ritual just before charges of satanic abuse surfaced. In our publication on the temple ceremony the reader can see why some of these changes had to be made. In addition, we have shown that Joseph Smith borrowed a great deal of his ritual from Masonry. This book contains the actual text of the new (1990) version of the highly secret ritual and other accounts of the endowment ritual dating back to 1846. It also shows all the changes recently made in the ceremony. Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony: 1842-1990 is available from Utah Lighthouse Ministry for only $5.00 a copy — 2 for $9.00 — 5 for $19.00 — 10 for $30.00 (minimum mailing charge $1.50).

SOLVING THE MYSTERY OF THE JOSEPH SMITH PAPYRI

A book analyzing Joseph Smith’s translation of the “Book of Abraham” has caused a real stir in Utah. It is written by Charles M. Larson and is entitled, By His Own Hand Upon Papyrus: A New Look At The Joseph Smith Papyri. We understand that before the book was offered for sale, about 30,000 copies were sent without charge to members of the Mormon Church. Almost all the homes in one stake received a free copy. One man told us that his bishop was so upset with the book that he warned members of his ward not to read it. This, of course, made the man very curious and he came to our bookstore to purchase a copy.

Mormon scholars seem to be very worried that Larson’s book will cause members to lose faith in the Book of Abraham. The Mormon apologist John Gee, a researcher for the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies (F.A.R.M.S.), has written a review of this book which is published in Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 4, 1992. While Mr. Gee tries very hard to find some way to belittle Mr. Larson and undermine his work, we do not feel that he has successfully answered the major issues. He, in fact, has made his own mistakes.

For example, on pages 93-94 of his article, Mr. Gee quotes from a cover letter which was sent out with copies of Larson’s books. He notes that the letter says that the book contains “the first ever published color photographs of the Joseph Smith papyri collection.” Gee then asserts that this claim is not true and goes on to state:

...the publishers... are mistaken in thinking that they are publishing the first color photographs of the Joseph Smith papyri. They are nearly a quarter century too late for that, for The Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints published a complete set of color photographs of the Joseph Smith papyri in the February 1968 Improvement Era.

While the photographs in the Improvement Era give the appearance of being “color” reproductions of the papyri (we ourselves once thought they were full-color photographs), the printing was apparently done with sepia ink, a dark brown or reddish-brown ink. This worked fairly well because papyrus is basically brown. Unfortunately, however, some of the papyri contain “rubrics”—portions written in red ink. Wherever rubrics appeared on the papyrus, the characters did not reproduce well in the church’s magazine, The Improvement Era. Instead of being red, they appear to be a very light brown and sometimes fade out to the point that they are hardly readable. In the photographs found in Larson’s book, however, real color printing has been used. Consequently, the rubrics come out red and are very readable.

While Michael Marquardt believes John Gee is wrong about the February 1968 issue of the Improvement Era having real color photographs of the papyri, he feels that the cover of another issue did have a color photograph of one fragment of papyrus, Facsimile No. 1.
It is interesting to note that when the church received the papyri on November 27, 1967, church leaders only allowed four or five black and white pictures to be published. Reed Durham, an instructor at the LDS Institute of Religion at the University of Utah asked if we could furnish photographs of all eleven pieces of papyri for the library at the Institute. We replied we could not obtain copies and wondered why he was not able to obtain them from his own church. He stated that when he contacted the church’s Deseret News, he was told they had a large number of copies of photographs of all the Papyri, but had been ordered not to release them. Later, however, Grant Heward was able to obtain photographs from another source after being refused by the Mormon Church. When the Deseret News learned that Mr. Heward had the photographs, it caused a great deal of excitement, and word went out that photographs had fallen into the hands of the enemies of the church. Mormon leaders knew that if they did not release all the photographs, we would print them.

Evidence seems to indicate that there were originally no plans for any pictures of the papyri to appear in the February 1968 issue of the Improvement Era and that the publication of the photographs of the papyri were inserted at the last minute in a hasty and peculiar manner. In the table of contents on page 1 we read that pages “33-48” are devoted to a section called “Era of Youth.” In the midst of this section, beginning at page 40, the Era of Youth abruptly ends and ten pages of photographs of the papyri are inserted. After this the Era of Youth starts again and continues to page 48 as the table of contents indicated. Two pages of the Era of Youth were deleted at the place where the 10 pages of photographs were added. This, of course, created a problem in the page numbers. To solve this the photographs of the papyri are numbered as pages 40, 40-A, 40-B, etc.

This unusual method of producing the February issue of the church’s magazine seems to show that once word got out that our friend Grant Heward had photographs, the church rushed to get them into print. Church leaders certainly did not want these photographs to appear first in the Salt Lake City Messenger! This hasty attempt to get the pictures into print may have made it expedient to use sepia ink instead of going through the added trouble of making full color pictures.

Although we do not have the space here to deal in depth with John Gee’s arguments, we will examine some of his work and also his sensational claim that papyri have been found that contain the name Abraham. Some of Gee’s other arguments about Joseph Smith’s translation of the Book of Abraham have already been refuted in our book Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? Chapter 22.

4,000 YEARS OLD?

According to Mormon writers, the “Book of Abraham” was supposed to have been written on papyrus by the Biblical patriarch Abraham about 4,000 years ago! Mormon apologist Sidney B. Sperry said that “the Book of Abraham will some day be reckoned as one of the most remarkable documents in existence . . . the writings of Abraham . . . must of necessity be older than the original text of Genesis” (Ancient Records Testify in Papyrus and Stone, 1938, page 83). Mormon leaders felt the Book of Abraham was so important that they canonized it as scripture and published it in the Pearl of Great Price—one of the four standard works of the church.

The evidence shows that while Joseph Smith had the Egyptian papyri, he allowed many people to freely examine them. This was entirely different from the secretive attitude he had with regard to the “gold plates” from which he translated the Book of Mormon. He was very careful to keep those plates concealed from the general public. Although Joseph Smith let some of his close associates look at the plates, he never allowed experts to examine them. Naturally, this caused many people to wonder if the Mormon prophet really had the plates he described. Others suggested that he may have had some plates which were fabricated to fool his friends and family but that they were neither ancient nor made of gold. In any case, Smith claimed that he eventually returned the plates to the angel who had brought them. Consequently, there is no way to check Smith’s claim that he translated the Book of Mormon from gold plates.

While one has to depend upon Joseph Smith’s own story and the testimony of the Book of Mormon witnesses concerning the plates, in the case of the Book of Abraham it can be established with certainty that Joseph Smith had some ancient Egyptian papyri which were purchased from Michael Chandler while he was in Kirtland, Ohio. While there is no question about the papyri’s authenticity, many people have had serious reservations regarding the accuracy of Smith’s translation. Unfortunately, while Joseph Smith had the papyri in his possession the science of Egyptology was in its infancy. Therefore, Joseph Smith’s work as a translator could not be adequately tested. To make matters worse, after Smith’s death the Mormon Church lost control of the papyri and it was believed that they were destroyed in the Chicago fire.

Since neither the gold plates nor the Egyptian papyri were available, it appeared that Joseph Smith’s ability as a translator would never be tested. However, on November 27, 1967, the church’s Deseret News announced one of the most significant events in Mormon Church history:

NEW YORK—A collection of papyri manuscripts, long believed to have been destroyed in the Chicago fire of 1871, was presented to The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints here Monday by the Metropolitan Museum of Art. . . Included in the papyri is a manuscript identified as the original document from which Joseph Smith had copied the drawing which he called “Facsimile No. 1” and published with the Book of Abraham.

After the papyri were recovered by the church, many Mormons felt that Joseph Smith’s work would be vindicated. Church apologist Hugh Nibley, however, was not optimistic about the matter and warned his people that there was trouble ahead. On December 1, 1967, the Daily Universe, published at Brigham Young University, reported these statements by Dr. Nibley:

“The papyri scripts given to the Church do not prove the Book of Abraham is true,” Dr. Hugh Nibley . . . said Wednesday night. “LDS scholars are caught flat footed by this discovery,” he went on to say.

Since Nibley was supposed to be the Mormon Church’s top authority on the Egyptian language, such a pessimistic assessment must have jolted Mormons who read his comments. After all, anyone could see that there were three rows of hieroglyphic writing on the right side of the papyrus which Joseph Smith used as Facsimile No.1 in his Book of Abraham. In addition, another row of hieroglyphic writing appeared on the left side of the papyrus. Since the papyrus was surrounded by Egyptian writing, how could it fail to prove the Book of Abraham? If Joseph Smith really knew how to translate Egyptian, the writing would prove that the scene found in Facsimile No.1 showed “The idolatrous priest of Elkenah attempting to offer up Abraham as a sacrifice.”

As it later turned out, when the writing found on the papyrus was translated by Klaus Baer, Associate Professor of Egyptology at the University of Chicago’s Oriental Institute, it became clear that the papyrus was a pagan document which had absolutely no relationship to Abraham. The translation, in fact, revealed that the papyrus was really made for a dead man named “Hor”—after the Egyptian god Horus. Experts who have examined this papyrus agree that it is drawing of Osiris, the Egyptian god of the dead, being prepared for burial by the god Anubis. The fact that this is a funerary papyrus is made clear in Dr. Baer’s translation of the line on the left side of the papyrus: “May you give him a good, splendid burial on the West of Thebes just like . . .” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, page 117). Since the text of Joseph Smith’s Book of Abraham says that Abraham survived the attempt to take his life, there would have been no reason to speak of burial. Furthermore, the Egyptians would not have given a sacrificial victim a “splendid burial on the West of Thebes.”

Since the Egyptian papyri did not support Joseph Smith’s Book of Abraham, Hugh Nibley was not anxious for a translation to come forth. In the Spring 1968 issue of Brigham Young University Studies, page 251, Dr. Nibley made this revealing comment: “We have often been asked during the past months why we did not proceed with all haste to produce a translation of the papyri the moment they came into our possession. . . . it is doubtful whether any translation could do as much good as harm.”

We were very disappointed with Hugh Nibley’s attempt to make light of the importance of the Joseph Smith Papyri. We turned to Grant Heward who was studying Egyptian at the time. Mr. Heward had been excommunicated from the Mormon Church because he dared to question the authenticity of the Book of Abraham. Heward was convinced that the papyrus Joseph Smith identified as the Book of Abraham was in reality the Egyptian “Book of Breathings”—a pagan document which was actually a condensed version of the “Book of the Dead.” We were impressed with Heward’s argument and printed his observations in the March 1968 issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger. It seemed like a bold move to make at the time, but within a few months the identification was confirmed by leading Egyptologists.

In addition, Mr. Heward prepared the first rendering of some of the text from the Joseph Smith Papyri which we printed in the same issue of the Messenger. The portion he used was taken from what Joseph Smith identified as the Book of Joseph. In reality, however, Mr. Heward demonstrated that it was taken from the Egyptian Book of the Dead. It related to a dead woman “Transforming into a Swallow.”

It is interesting to note that even though the original Joseph Smith Papyri had been found, leaders of the Mormon Church seemed to have had no desire to produce a translation of the papyri for their people. Like Dr. Nibley, they must have felt that it was “doubtful whether any translation could do as much good as harm.” The three Egyptologists who allowed their work to be published by Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought were not commissioned by the church. Dialogue is actually an independent publication which is not controlled by the church and often prints articles that are disturbing to some of the top leaders of the church.

A DEVASTATING FIND

While the discovery that the papyri Joseph Smith believed contained the Book of Abraham and the Book of Joseph were nothing but pagan Egyptian funerary texts came as a great blow to church leaders, a far more distressing development occurred. Within six months from the time the Metropolitan Museum gave the papyri to the church, the Book of Abraham had been proven untrue! The fall of the Book of Abraham was brought about by the identification of the actual fragment of papyrus from which Joseph Smith claimed to translate the book. The identification of this fragment was made possible by a comparison with Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar—handwritten documents we photographically reproduced in 1966. Charles M. Larson gives this information about this matter:

Smith’s “Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar,” as it has come to be called, had never really been lost or missing. For a long time it was simply ignored, and more recently it had been considered restricted. It was among that portion of early Church records the Mormons managed to take with them when they left Nauvoo in 1846, and it was included in the list of materials recorded in the Church Historian’s Office Journal as having been deposited in the Historian’s vault in Salt Lake City in 1855. . . . as late as 1960 . . . Dr. Sperry remarked at BYU’s Pearl of Great Price Conference that he did not know whether or not the Church authorities would yet allow it to be published, adding that he thought “it would be a little premature, perhaps, to do it now, until we can really do a good job of it.”

Others who had occasion to come into contact with the material apparently disagreed with the Church’s reluctance in the matter. Late in 1965 a microfilm copy of the entire work was “leaked” to Jerald and Sandra Tanner of Modern Microfilm Company (now Utah Lighthouse Ministry). The Tanners were former Mormons who were rapidly gaining a reputation for printing documents relating to Mormonism that, though authentic, made Church officials uncomfortable. By 1966 the Tanners had produced the first complete photomechanical reprint and transcription of the entire Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar. But contrary to what most Mormons evidently expected, publication of the Alphabet and Grammar in no way substantiated Joseph Smith’s ability to translate ancient Egyptian. Quite the opposite, for the book turned out to be nothing but page after page of nonsensical gibberish. Though it had apparently succeeded at one time in impressing unsophisticated minds, the work was unable to withstand the scrutiny of experts.

Professional Egyptologists to whom the Alphabet and Grammar was submitted for examination were quick to point out that the material in Joseph Smith’s notebook bore no resemblance at all to any correct understanding of the ancient Egyptian language. As one of them, I. E. Edwards, put it, the whole work was “largely a piece of imagination and lacking in any kind of scientific value.” He added that it reminded him of “the writings of psychic practitioners which are sometimes sent to me.” (By His Own Hand Upon Papyrus, pages 42-43)

When characters in the original Egyptian papyri were compared with those copied into the translation manuscripts of the Book of Abraham, found in Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar, it became apparent that one piece of papyrus supplied the characters which Joseph Smith claimed to translate as the Book of Abraham! This papyrus was identified in the Mormon Church’s publication Improvement Era, February 1968, page 40-I, as “XI. Small ‘Sensen’ text (unillustrated).” We presented photographic evidence that Joseph Smith used the “Sensen” text to create his Book of Abraham in the March 1968 issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger. In Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? we have additional proof that Smith used this papyrus. Surprisingly, Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, asked us to work with Grant Heward to prepare an article presenting the evidence. This article, “The Source of The Book of Abraham Identified,” was published in Dialogue, Summer 1968, pages 92-98.

Egyptologist Klaus Baer accepted this identification without question. Speaking of the “Sensen” papyrus, Dr. Baer wrote:
“Joseph Smith thought that this papyrus contained the Book of Abraham” (Ibid., page 111). In footnote 11 of the same article, Professor Baer observed: “This identification is now certain.” Mormon scholar Richley Crapo spoke of “the startling fact that one of the papyri of the Church collection, known as the Small Sen-Sen Papyrus, contained the same series of hieratic symbols, which had been copied, in the same order, into the Book of Abraham manuscript next to verses of that book! In other words, there was every indication that the collection of papyri in the hands of the Church contained the source which led to a production of the Book of Abraham” (Book of Abraham Symposium, LDS Institute of Religion, Salt Lake City, April 3, 1970, page 27).

Although Mormon apologist Hugh Nibley later reversed his position in a desperate attempt to save the Book of Abraham, in 1968 he frankly admitted that Joseph Smith used the “Sensen” papyrus for the text of the Book of Abraham. At a meeting held at the University of Utah on May 20, 1968, Dr. Nibley made these comments:

> Within a week of the publication of the papyri, students began calling my attention . . . to the fact that, the very definite fact that, one of the fragments seemed to supply all of the symbols for the Book of Abraham. This was the little “Sensen” scroll. Here are the symbols. The symbols are arranged here, and the interpretation goes along here and this interpretation turns out to be the Book of Abraham. Well, what about that? Here is the little “Sensen,” because that name occurs frequently in it, the papyrus in which a handful of Egyptian symbols was apparently expanded in translation to the whole Book of Abraham. This raises a lot of questions. It doesn’t answer any questions, unless we’re mind readers.

At one point Dr. Nibley became so desperate to save the Book of Abraham that he suggested the “Sensen” text may have a second meaning unknown to Egyptologists (see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 319-320).

In his article in Dialogue, pages 111-113, Egyptologist Klaus Baer set forth another serious problem confronting those who would try to save the Book of Abraham: the papyrus Joseph Smith identified as Facsimile No. 1 from the Book of Abraham was originally part of the same scroll which contained the “Sensen” text—i.e., they were both part of the Book of Breathings. The two pieces had been cut apart in Joseph Smith’s time and mounted on paper, but Dr. Baer demonstrated that they fit together perfectly. Dr. Hugh Nibley later acknowledged that they were both part of the Book of Breathings: “It can be easily shown by matching up the cut edges and fibres of the papyri that the text of the Joseph Smith ‘Breathing’ Papyrus (No. XI) was written on the same strip of material as Facsimile No. 1 and immediately adjoining it” (The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri: an Egyptian Endowment, 1975, page 13).

The text of the Book of Abraham itself demonstrates that the drawing appearing as Facsimile No. 1 was supposed to be at the beginning of the scroll just as Professor Baer’s research has revealed. The original manuscripts of the Book of Abraham, as they appear in Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar, reveal that Joseph Smith was using characters from the “Sensen” papyrus when he “translated” the first chapter of the Book of Abraham. In Abraham 1:12 the patriarch Abraham was supposed to have said the following: “And it came to pass that the priests laid violence upon me, that they might slay me also, as they did those virgins upon this altar; and that you may have a knowledge of this altar, I will refer you to the representation at the commencement of this record.” It is clear, therefore, that the picture shown as Facsimile No.1 was the start of the papyrus scroll, and that Joseph Smith was claiming to translate from the very next portion—the Small “Sensen” text.

A larger “Sensen” text follows the Small “Sensen” text. The name “Abraham” does not appear on any of the three pieces of papyri. On the other hand, the Egyptian name Hor appears on every piece. We have found it in at least nine places. Although the original piece of papyrus Joseph Smith used to prepare Facsimile No. 3 is missing, Egyptologists have also found the name “Hor” on the printed facsimile. Professor Baer believes the scene shown in Facsimile No. 3 ended the Book of Breathings which was prepared for the man Hor who had died and needed the magical papyrus which contained the charms which were necessary to reach the “world of the hereafter.”

Hugh Nibley was willing to concede that Facsimile No. 3 was probably part of the original Book of Breathings scroll:

> For the Book of Breathings is before all else, as Bonnet observes, a composite, made up of “compilations and excerpts from older funerary sources and mortuary formulas.” . . .

Of particular interest to us is the close association of the Book of Breathings with the Facsimiles of the Book of Abraham. . . . the text of Joseph Smith Pap. No. XI was written on the same strip of material as Facsimile Number 1; the writing begins immediately to the left of the “lion-couch” scene. The British Museum Book of Breathings[s], “the Kerasher Papyrus,” has both the “lion-couch” scene . . . and a scene resembling our Facsimile Number 3 . . . This stands at the head of the “Kerasher” text, and suggests that our Fac. No. 3 was originally attached at the other end of the Joseph Smith Papyrus, coming after the last column, which is missing . . . the Book of Breathings . . . contains the essential elements of the Egyptian funerary rites from the earliest times . . . The Book of Breathings is not to be dismissed, as it has been, as a mere talisman against stinking corpses; it is a sermon on breathing in every Egyptian sense of the word. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1971, pages 158, 160, 162, 164, 166)

All of the evidence adds up to the inescapable conclusion that although Joseph Smith claimed to translate the Book of Abraham from the papyrus he had in his possession, the words that he dictated came from his own imagination. That papyrus, in fact, contains a pagan text having nothing to do with Abraham or his religion. We have counted the names of at least fifteen Egyptian gods or goddesses which appear on the papyrus but it contains absolutely nothing regarding the God of the Bible.

Since the Joseph Smith Papyri were rediscovered and translated by Egyptologists, a number of prominent Mormon scholars seem to have been living in a fantasyland with regard to the Book of Abraham. Instead of facing the truth about Joseph Smith’s work, they have come up with a number of incredible explanations. Dr. Hugh Nibley has led the parade by setting forth all sorts of reasons why a person should go on believing the Book of Abraham even though the evidence clearly shows it is the work of Joseph Smith’s own imagination. Since the discovery of the papyri in 1967, Professor Nibley has stubbornly fought against the truth with regard to the Book of Abraham. Although he put up many smoke screens to try to divert attention from the real issues, he has not been successful in silencing the opposition. In Sunstone, December 1979, Edward Ashment, a Mormon Egyptologist who has worked in the Translation Department of the church, demonstrated that Dr. Nibley’s work on the Joseph Smith Papyri was filled with serious errors. He, in fact, demolished Nibley’s arguments at every turn.

In a response, published in the same issue, Hugh Nibley acknowledged that “Since hearing Brother Ashment I have to make some changes in what I have said already” (Ibid., page 51). On page 49 of the same article, we find this startling statement coming from the church’s chief apologist for the Book of Abraham: “I refuse to be held responsible for anything I wrote more than three years ago.”

GEE’S MAGICAL PAPYRI

One of the more desperate attempts to save the Book of Abraham is the attempt to link it to late magical papyri. John Gee, the Mormon apologist who has criticized Charles Larson’s book, has been trying very hard to promote this view. On page 116 of his rebuttal to Larson, John Gee reported: “David Cameron discovered an Egyptian lion couch scene much like Facsimile I explicitly mentioning the name Abraham.” Mr. Gee has provided research on this subject for an article published by F.A.R.M.S. and has also prepared an article for the church’s magazine, The Ensign.

The “lion couch scene” Gee speaks of is found in the Leiden Papyrus I 384. The F.A.R.M.S. article concerning this matter caused some Mormons to be very excited because it stated that the “lion couch scene” shows “Anubis standing over a person . . .” (Insight: An Ancient Window, September 1991, page 1). Many were undoubtedly led to believe that the “person” on the couch must be Abraham as shown in Facsimile No. 1 of the Book of Abraham. Unfortunately for Mormon apologists, this has not turned out to be the case. Mormon Egyptologist Edward Ashment claimed that it was actually a woman who was lying on the couch. In his article published in The Ensign, July 1992, page 61, John Gee acknowledged that this is the case: “the figure on the lion couch in this papyrus is a woman.”

While many Mormon apologists have argued that Facsimile No. 1 shows a priest with a human head attempting to sacrifice Abraham, it has been obvious to Egyptologists for many years that the standing figure is really the jackal-headed god Anubis preparing the deceased for burial. The rediscovery of the Joseph Smith Papyri shows that the head was missing on the original papyrus, and it is clear that Joseph Smith made an imaginative restoration which is incorrect. In the papyrus John Gee speaks of it is obvious that the woman is being attended by the jackal-headed god. As we have shown, the article in Insights plainly states that it is “Anubis standing over a person . . .”

In The Ensign, Mr. Gee reveals that even the text speaks of the jackal-headed god:

Later in the text we read, “I adjure you spirits of the dead, [by] the dead (pharaohs) and the demon Balsamos and the jackal-headed god and the gods who are with him." . . . The “jackal-headed god” is most likely Anubis, who usually officiates in lion couch scenes . . .

It is obvious, then, that this papyrus provides no support for the sacrificial scene found in Facsimile No. 1.

If this papyrus were dated 2,000 years earlier, the discovery of the name Abraham on it might be significant. It, of course, would not prove the Book of Abraham to be true, but would merely establish that the name “Abraham” was known in Egypt at that time.

One of the problems with the Book of Breathings Papyrus—the text Joseph Smith believed was the Book of Abraham—is that it is not old enough to have been written by Abraham. According to Josiah Quincy, Joseph Smith claimed that the papyrus he had contained the very handwriting of Abraham himself. “That is the handwriting of Abraham, the father of the Faithful . . .” (See Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 321 for additional evidence concerning this matter). A number of Mormon scholars feel that Abraham lived in the twentieth century B.C.

When the Joseph Smith Papyri were rediscovered, it soon became obvious that they were not nearly old enough to support Joseph Smith’s claims concerning the Book of Abraham. Dr. Hugh Nibley admitted that the Book of Breathings only dated back to the first century: “. . . It has now become apparent . . . that our Joseph Smith Book of Breathings is one of a very special and limited and uniquely valuable class of documents clustering around a single priestly family of upper Egypt in the first century A.D.” (The Message of the Joseph Smith Papyri: An Egyptian Endowment, 1975, page 3). Since the Book of Breathings—which, of course, contains the drawing Joseph Smith used for Facsimile No. 1 in his Book of Abraham—was written about 2,000 years after the time of Abraham, the Mormon Church is faced with a serious dilemma.

The magical texts which John Gee uses as evidence for the Book of Abraham present an even greater problem. In the article published in Insights, page 1, it is claimed that the texts “date to about the same time as the Joseph Smith papyri.” According to Edward Ashment, however, they were not written until the third century A.D. In his article published in The Ensign, page 60, Mr. Gee agrees they date “to the third century A.D. . . . “ As we will show, they are so far removed from the time of Abraham that they are of no value.

In 1978 Morton Smith published a book entitled, Jesus The Magician. While we disagreed with his conclusion that Jesus was a magician (see Salt Lake City Messenger, January 1986), Professor Smith presented a great deal of material concerning the type of magical papyri we are dealing with here.

Although we know that Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt, the Bible indicates that many of them desired to return. By the fifth century B.C. there was a colony of Jews living at Elephantine in Egypt. Even though these Jews built a temple, it “has been argued by some scholars that the Jerusalem priests regarded the Jews in Egypt as semi-heretical, and therefore did not encourage them in their apostasy” (The Bible and Archaeology, by J. A. Thompson, 1962, page 226).

In any case, we know that by the time of Jesus there was a large Jewish population in Egypt, which was at that time a Roman province. Jesus, himself, was brought to Egypt by his father and mother to escape the rage of Herod. On page 62 of his book, Jesus The Magician, Morton Smith says that “There was a long standing legend that the god of the Jews was a donkey, or donkey-headed. . . . The Jews were among the largest groups of foreigners in Egypt, so their god, Iao, was identified with Seth.”

F. F. Bruce says that “Philo of Alexandria estimated about A.D. 38 that there were at least a million Jews in Egypt and the neighboring territories. We may subject this figure to a substantial discount, but the Jewish population of Egypt was certainly very great. In Alexandria itself at that time one out of the five wards of the city was entirely Jewish and a second was very largely so” (New Testament History, 1980, page 136). Bruce felt that “Christianity had found its way to Alexandria by A.D. 41” (Ibid., page 294).

It is obvious that there would have been a good deal of information available in Egypt concerning the God of Israel and important Biblical characters long before the magical papyri were written. It is no surprise, then, that the names of prominent individuals mentioned in the Bible turn up in the magical texts written in the third century A.D. Many of those who practiced magic wanted to use the names of as many gods and religious leaders as possible and seemed to have little concern about mixing the Hebrew God and Biblical characters with Egyptian gods. C. K. Barrett observed: “Those in particular who practiced magic were willing to

On pages 34-35, Barrett quotes from the Paris Magical Papyrus, written about A.D. 300. This text tells how to exorcise demons. We cite the following from this lengthy text:

The adjuration is this: “I adjure thee by the god of the Hebrews Jesu [Jesus], Jaba, Jae, Abraoth, Aia, Thoth, Ele, Elo, Aeо, Eu, Jibaech, Abarmas, Jabarau, Abelbel, Lona, Abra, Maro . . . I adjure thee by him who appeared unto Osrael [Israel] in the pillar of light and in the cloud by day, and who delivered his word from the taskwork of Pharaoh and brought upon Pharaoh the ten plagues because he heard not. I adjure thee, every daemonic spirit, say whatsoever thou art. For I adjure thee by the seal which Solomon laid upon the tongue of Jeremiah and he spake . . . I adjure thee by the great God Sabaoth, through whom the river Jordan returned backward . . . ”

The reader will notice that the author mixed Jesus in with the Egyptian god Thoth. It is hardly surprising, then, that we would find the name Abraham—one of the most important characters in the Bible—mentioned in the magical papyri. On page 114 of his book, Morton Smith pointed out that, “Jesus’ name was used in spells as the name of a god. So were the names of Adam (PGM III. 146), Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of Moses and Solomon who were famous as magicians.”

On page 63, Morton Smith quotes PGM IV, line 1233:

“Be blessed, God of Abraham. Be blessed, God of Isaac. Be blessed, God of Jacob. Jesus Christ, holy spirit, son of the Father, who art under the Seven and in the Seven, bring Iao Sabaoth. May your power increase . . . until you drive out this evil demon, Satan.”

On page 69, we find this statement by Smith: “The Jew’s God, Yahweh . . . was particularly famous for his usefulness in magic. In the magical papyri (which contains a sprinkling of Jewish spells, but are mainly pagan documents) his name outnumbers that of any other deity by more than three to one.” Smith quotes the following from “an invocation of the world ruler the Good Demon”: “For I have taken to myself the power of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and of the great god-demon Iao Ablanathanalba” (page 102).

In the article published in The Ensign, page 60, John Gee notes that there is a similarity between a verse in the Bible and the magic names used in the papyri. He says: “The first reference occurs in a chapter on how to make a signet ring. One of the steps is to ‘bring a white stone’ and ‘write this name upon it . . . Abraham, friend of m[an].’” This, of course, is similar to Revelation 2:17, which speaks of “a white stone, and in the stone a new name written . . .” It is interesting to note that this is the only mention of “a white stone” in the entire Bible.

The fact that both documents mention “a white stone” with a “name” written on it seems too close to be a coincidence. The book of Revelation, of course, was not written until about A.D. 90. This would be around 2,000 years after the time of Abraham. The implications of this quotation from the book of Revelation in the papyrus are clear: the author of the text in the magical papyrus must have either seen or heard someone read from the book of Revelation. Once it is conceded that the author was acquainted with the book of Revelation, then it is also easy to believe that he or she had access to other information contained in Bible manuscripts and would have known about Abraham. It should also be noted that the magical papyrus speaks of “Abraham, friend of m[an].” This sounds like a quotation from the book of James, which speaks of Abraham as “the Friend of God” (James 1:23).

Speaking of the same papyrus, John Gee says:

“ . . . second instance of Abraham’s name occurs in a description of how to use a ring to obtain “success and grace and victory.” As a part of his invocation, the petitioner says, “O mighty god, who surpasseth all powers, I call upon thee, Ioa, Sabaoth, Adonai, Elohim, [six other names], Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, [82 more names].” The first four names are Hebrew for “LORD of hosts, my Lord, God.” (The Ensign, July 1992, page 60)

The brackets found in the quotation above appear in the original publication. From this it is clear that the name Abraham in this section of the text was only one of ninety-five names that were being invoked! It would appear, then, that the name Abraham was just one of many magic names needed so that the person who recited the spell would be able to use “a ring to obtain ‘success and grace and victory.’”

There seems to be no evidence that the name Abraham came from any ancient Egyptian source or that it had anything to do with the Book of Abraham. Although John Gee’s writings may have given some members of the Mormon Church the idea that evidence had been found to support Joseph Smith’s translation, when the facts are known, it is clear that the magical papyri, dating to the third century A.D., provide absolutely no support for the Book of Abraham. Mr. Gee’s attempt to make a case from these second-rate papyri tends to show how empty-handed Mormon apologists are when it comes to defending the Book of Abraham. Mormon scholars cannot find the name of Abraham on any part of the papyrus which Joseph Smith claimed was written by Abraham himself and even contained Abraham’s own signature. Therefore, they have turned to magical papyri which were written two centuries after the text Smith translated as the Book of Abraham. We find it especially strange that they would make an issue of the name Abraham on other papyri, when it cannot be found on the papyrus scroll Joseph Smith designated as the Book of Abraham.

On page 62 of his article in The Ensign, John Gee acknowledges that the texts he has cited do not really inform us about Abraham or his history:

Rhodes then proceeds to give possible explanations why the text of the recently discovered papyri does not match the text in the Pearl of Great Price.” One of Rhode’s suggestions is that the “copy of Abraham’s record” which Joseph Smith used “possibly passed through the hands of many scribes and had become editorially corrupted to the point where it may have had little resemblance to the original . . .” For this reason Joseph Smith may have used the “Urim and Thummim, or simply through revelation” revealed what Abraham had originally written.

Michael Rhodes was chosen to write two articles for the Encyclopedia of Mormonism. In vol. 1, page 136, Rhodes set forth the idea that Joseph Smith chose pagan drawings as illustrations for his Book of Abraham: “in summary, Facsimile 1 formed the beginning, and Facsimile 3 the end of a document known as the Book of Breathings, an Egyptian religious text . . . The association of these facsimiles with the book of Abraham might be explained as Joseph Smith’s attempt to find illustrations from the papyri he owned that most closely matched what he had received in revelation when translating the Book of Abraham.”

In a letter to a member of the Mormon Church who was troubled with regard to the origin of the Book of Abraham, Michael Rhodes spoke of a theory he proposed in his article in the Ensign, July 1988, page 51. Rhodes had stated that it was possible that the Book of Abraham “may have been taken from a different portion of the papyri rolls in Joseph Smith’s possession.” In the letter, however, Rhodes made it clear that he no longer considered that as a very promising option. He went on to give more information concerning the idea that the Book of Abraham did not really come from the papyrus scroll in Joseph Smith’s possession:

> Before I start, let me say that I . . . like you, definitely favor the second; namely that Joseph Smith did not have the actual text of the Book of Abraham before him, but that it was revealed to him . . . The first option I proposed seems pretty unlikely to me now. There is no doubt that the original Papyrus of Facsimile Number 1 belongs to the Book of Breathings text. The name of the owner of the Papyrus, Hor son of Userwer, is found both on this papyrus and in the text of the Book of Breathings . . . although we do not have the original of Facsimile Number 3, the name Hor can clearly be read in the hieroglyphs on this facsimile, and it seems very probable that this illustration was originally located at the end of the Book of Breathings papyrus now in the Church’s possession. I am not ruling it out completely, but I think it is unlikely that Joseph Smith ever had the actual text of the Book of Abraham in his possession . . . This still leaves us with the problem of how Facsimile Number 1, a commonly found representation of the god Anubis preparing the body of Osiris (or the deceased) for burial, that is part of an Egyptian funerary document that was produced nearly 2000 years (about 60 A.D.) after Abraham, can possibly be the illustration Abraham refers to in his book. The best explanation I have for this is that in the original papyrus Abraham, had drawn an illustration of himself being sacrificed on an altar by the priest of Elkenah. In the process of translation, this illustration was revealed to Joseph Smith and he saw that it was similar to the one found at the beginning of the Book of Breathings. Joseph Smith therefore used it (with some modifications) as Facsimile Number One. One of the most obvious modifications is the changing of the head of the god Anubis (who has a jackal’s head) to that of a man. Another is putting a knife in the standing figures hand. (Both the head and the knife are missing in the papyrus as it exists today.)

Joseph Smith may have used the other facsimiles found in the Book of Abraham similarly. I certainty don’t claim this is the only possible explanation; it is simply the best I have been able to come up with so far.

(Letter by Michael D. Rhodes, dated July 10, 1988)

This extraordinary letter gives the reader an idea of how far some Mormon scholars will go in their attempt to save the Book of Abraham. It is also interesting to note that after writing this letter, Michael Rhodes seems to have changed his mind again concerning the question of whether Joseph Smith really had the Book of Abraham papyrus. In his article published in the Ensign, July 1988, page 51, Rhodes had held out the hope that the Book of Abraham may “have been taken from a different portion of the papyri rolls in Joseph Smith’s possession”—a portion which has since disappeared.

By the time he wrote the letter cited above, however, he had decided that Smith probably “did not have the actual text of the Book of Abraham before him . . . I think it is unlikely that Joseph Smith ever had the actual text of the Book of Abraham in his possession.” To our surprise, when we read an article by Michael Rhodes printed in Review of Books, vol. 4, 1992, we discovered that he seems to have reverted to the idea that Joseph Smith may have had a roll of papyrus. On page 122, Rhodes claimed that “a contemporary source indicates that the scroll of the book of Abraham was not part of the papyri fragments now in the possession of the Church.”

He cites from a letter written by Charlotte Haven in 1843. Haven claimed that Joseph Smith’s mother “opened a long roll of manuscript, saying it was ‘the writing of Abraham and Isaac, written in Hebrew and Sanscrit,’ and she read several minutes from it as if it were English.” Because the papyri the church now has in its possession were supposed to have been cut into sheets by this time and therefore could not have been a “long roll of manuscript,” Rhodes seems to conclude that there was a third roll of papyrus which has been lost. This interpretation, which is also held by John Gee, is erroneous. Significant evidence points to the conclusion that there were only two rolls of papyrus. Joseph Smith’s History contains this information: “On opening the coffins, he [Mr. Chandler] discovered . . . something rolled up . . . which, when examined, proved to be two rolls of papyrus, previously mentioned. Two or three other small pieces of papyrus, with astronomical calculations, epitaphs, &c., were found with others of the mummies” (History of the Church, vol. 2, page 349).

Although the text mentions that there were “Two or three other small pieces of papyrus,” Joseph Smith never identifies a third roll of papyrus. Furthermore, while Charlotte Haven’s statement contains some interesting information, it contains a number of factual errors. She says that Mother Smith told Haven that the roll contained the “writing of Abraham and Isaac written in Hebrew and Sanscrit.” Mormon leaders have never claimed that the Book of Abraham was written in “Hebrew and Sanscrit.” Joseph Smith’s History makes it abundantly clear that the Book of Abraham was supposed to be written in “Egyptian characters” (History of the Church, vol. 2, page 320).

While Haven’s account says that the roll was written by “Abraham and Isaac,” to our knowledge, Joseph Smith did not claim that Isaac wrote anything in the Book of Abraham. As early as 1969, the Mormon scholar Jay M. Todd saw the discrepancies in Haven’s account and made this observation: “One wonders if Sister Smith were not just throwing out names of languages she had heard; or, one wonders if Charlotte is reporting accurately. Until more evidence is gathered, the sum and value of Charlotte’s report remains clouded on several issues” (The Saga of the Book of Abraham, by Jay M. Todd, page 249).

Jay Todd also noted the discrepancy with regard to Haven’s claim that Lucy Smith opened a roll of papyrus. The preponderance of the evidence shows that both rolls had been cut up by the time Charlotte Haven saw them. Her statement, of course, could be reconciled by claiming that what she meant was that Lucy Smith laid out the various pieces of the document side-by-side so that it appeared in the same order as when the roll was first opened up.

In our book, The Case Against Mormonism, vol. 2, pages 121-122, we give four different accounts by people who saw the original papyri in Nauvoo. Besides citing the letter by Charlotte Haven, we have included accounts by Josiah Quincy, Henry Caswall and an account appearing in a newspaper known as The Quincy Whig. These accounts are written in the period from 1840 to 1844. Charlotte Haven’s account is the only one which talks of “a long role of manuscript” being opened. Because the manuscripts were so very fragile (a number of pieces had already broken off), it would not seem reasonable that Lucy Smith would unroll them time after time to display them to the many visitors who came to see the papyri.

As early as 1840, The Quincy Whig, reported that there were “numerous fragments of Egyptian papyrus” which were in “several frames, covered with glass.” The same paper reported that Joseph Smith said: “‘These ancient records . . . have been unrolled and preserved with great labor and care’” (The Quincy Whig, October 17, 1840, as cited in Ancient Records Testify in Papyrus and Stone, pages 51-52).

When Caswall examined the papyri in 1842, he found the rolls had been cut into “sheets of papyrus” and were kept in “glazed slides, like picture frames” (The City of the Mormons; or, Three Days at Nauvoo, in 1842, pages 22-23).

Both these accounts were written before Charlotte Haven’s letter was penned in 1843. The other account, however, was written by Josiah Quincy, who visited Joseph Smith in 1844. He also claimed that the papyri “were preserved under glass and handled with great respect” (Figures of the Past, 1883, as cited in Among the Mormons, page 136).

In his article in Review of Books, pages 121-122, Michael Rhodes used a statement made by Caswall to support his argument that there may be a third role of papyrus containing the Book of Abraham: “In 1842, the fragments we now have were described as being mounted in ‘a number of glazed slides, like picture frames, containing sheets of papyrus, with Egyptian inscriptions and hieroglyphics.’” He then proceeded to quote Charlotte Haven’s letter to support his thesis of a third roll. If Rhodes had cited more of Caswall’s statement, his argument would have fallen apart. Henry Caswall made it very clear that the very sheets that had been cut up contained the Book of Abraham. We quote the following from Caswall’s book, pages 22-23:

> The storekeeper . . . drew forth a number of glazed slides, like picture frames, containing sheets of papyrus, with Egyptian inscriptions and hieroglyphics. These had been unrolled from four mummies, which the prophet purchased at a cost of twenty-four hundred dollars. By some inexplicable mode, as the storekeeper informed me, Mr. Smith had discovered that these sheets contained the writings of Abraham, written with his own hand while in Egypt. Pointing to the figure of a man lying on a table, he said, “that is the picture of Abraham on the point of being sacrificed. That man standing by him with a drawn knife is an idolatrous priest of the Egyptians.”

It seems obvious from this that Joseph Smith did not possess another roll of papyrus.

John Gee uses the exact argument found in Rhodes’ article on page 107 of his review of Larson’s book. Like Rhodes, Gee fails to provide the important context. He does, however, use the last two sentences of the quote we have cited from Caswall five pages earlier in his article while trying to prove another point (see page 102). Unfortunately, however, even on page 102 he uses ellipsis signs (dots) to omit the statement that “Mr. Smith had discovered that these sheets contained the writings of Abraham, written with his own hand while in Egypt.”

Because of the amount of material between the two quotes and the omission of the important portion regarding the fact that the Book of Abraham roll had been cut into sheets, it is doubtful that one person in a thousand would ever know that Gee’s quotation actually refuted what he was trying to prove.

Many Mormon scholars would probably charge us with dishonesty if we did this sort of thing. In any case, an examination of some of the wording in Gee’s quotation with that found in Rhodes’ article seems to show that one scholar borrowed from the other. Below is a comparison:

> In 1842, the fragments we now have in the Joseph Smith Papyri were mounted in “a number of glazed slides, like picture frames, containing sheets of papyrus, with Egyptian inscriptions and hieroglyphics.” The next year, in 1843, a nonmember named Charlotte Haven visited Lucy Mack Smith and wrote a letter to her own mother about it: “Then she [Mother Smith] turned to a long table . . .” (John Gee, Review of Books, page 107)

> In 1842, the fragments we now have were described as being mounted in “a number of glazed slides, like picture frames, containing sheets of papyrus, with Egyptian inscriptions and hieroglyphics.” The next year, in 1843, Charlotte Haven, a nonmember, visited Joseph Smith’s mother, Lucy Mack Smith and wrote a letter to her own mother about it, saying: “Then she [Mother Smith] turned to a long table . . .” (Michael Rhodes, Review of Books, pages 121-122)

It would appear from the comparison above that one of these two authors did the original research on this quotation but failed to realize that if the quote from Caswall was taken in its entirety, it would refute the entire argument that there was another roll of papyrus. The other author then blindly followed the first into the ditch. We, of course, do not know who made the original mistake, but feel that it resulted from an overzealous attempt to save the Book of Abraham.

Even if Rhodes and Gee could have established that there was a third papyrus, it would not have solved the serious problem faced by the church. The reader will remember that in the Book of Abraham, 1:12, Abraham was supposed to have said that he included a drawing of the attempt to slay him “at the commencement of this record.” Now, it is obvious to all who examine the matter that the drawing in the Book of Abraham matches the drawing found in Hor’s Book of Brethreaths. Both John Gee and Michael Rhodes acknowledge this to be true.

If, then, Joseph Smith had another roll of papyrus which really contained the Book of Abraham, why did he not use the drawing which Abraham himself said he placed at the beginning of that roll? Why would Smith switch over to the pagan Book of Brethreaths and use an illustration (Fac. No. 1) from that roll? The problem goes even deeper: why would the prophet include Fac. No. 3 at the end of the record? The reader will remember that Michael Rhodes said that “the name Hor can clearly be read in the hieroglyphs” on Fac. No. 3 and that this drawing was probably “originally located at the end of the Book of Brethreaths papyrus.” In addition, Smith added Fac. No. 2 in the middle. As we have shown, this is also a pagan document. In the first printing of the Book of Abraham in the Times and Seasons, Joseph Smith called every one of these drawings “A Facsimile From The Book of Abraham.”
The thesis set forth by Rhodes and Gee would actually lead one to believe that the prophet rejected the drawing Abraham himself put at the beginning of his record and added a substitute and two other drawings created by idol worshippers! This in itself would show that Joseph Smith was not inspired when he produced the Book of Abraham.

Brigham Young University scholar James R. Harris concluded that the papyri rediscovered in 1967 did not vindicate Joseph Smith’s work and turned to the idea that the Book of Abraham came through revelation, not through a translation of the papyrus scroll. He even warns members of the church against holding out the hope that a papyrus manuscript may yet be found that will confirm Joseph Smith’s work:

Facsimiles 1 and 3 were created from separate vignettes of a single Sensen text. Facsimile 2 was created from a disk-shaped amulet that was placed under the head of the deceased . . .

It is important to understand, precisely speaking, that in their original context, these illustrations have no connection with the Book of Abraham. The three facsimiles are, in fact, reproductions of real Egyptian documents. (The Facsimiles of the Book of Abraham, A Study of the Joseph Smith Egyptian Papyri, 1990, page 5)

These two scrolls appear to have been regarded by Church leadership as scrolls of Abraham and Joseph. An understanding of the content of the papyrus fragments and the manner in which they were used by Joseph and Oliver, makes it very improbable that there are now or ever were any other Abraham or Joseph scrolls in the Joseph Smith Egyptian collection.

If we had some of the missing fragments of these documents there is every reason to believe that they would contain more of the same material as that on the present fragments: spells and formulas to protect the deceased and insure his or her continuation in the future state. . . .

As a caution, if the hope of acquiring an Egyptian text of Abraham is perpetuated as a major possibility, the perpetrators may be guilty of leaving future generations of Latter-day Saints with the same vulnerability that has resulted in many spiritual casualties in this generation. It is to the end that such casualties be diminished that I have undertaken this study. (Ibid., pages 86-88)

The suggestion that Joseph Smith may have obtained the Book of Abraham by way of direct revelation and not from the papyrus is now held by a number of prominent Mormon scholars. The problem with this attempt to escape the serious implications of the evidence furnished by the papyri is that it flies in the face of everything Joseph Smith ever wrote or allowed to be published about the subject. In the History of the Church, Smith made it clear that he had the very writings of Abraham and Joseph in his possession. He even claimed that he received this material through translating the hieroglyphs:

Soon after this, some of the Saints at Kirtland purchased the mummies and papyrus . . . I commenced the translation of some of the characters or hieroglyphics, and much to our joy found that one of the rolls contained the writings of Abraham, another the writings of Joseph of Egypt . . . (History of the Church, vol. 2, page 236)

Joseph Smith not only said that he was going to translate the records, but he also maintained he produced a “correct translation” of the documents:

The record of Abraham and Joseph, found with the mummies [sic] is beautifully written . . . I have given a brief history of the manner in which the writings of the fathers, Abraham and Joseph, have been preserved, and how I came in possession of the same—a correct translation of which I shall give in its proper place. (History of the Church, vol. 2, pages 348, 350-51)

In his History, Joseph Smith indicated that in 1835 he spent a good deal of time working on his translation of the Egyptian papyri:

The remainder of this month, I was continually engaged in translating an alphabet to the Book of Abraham, and arranging a grammar of the Egyptian language as practiced by the ancients. (History of the Church, vol. 2, page 238)

October 1.—This afternoon I labored on the Egyptian alphabet . . . during the research, the principles of astronomy as understood by Father Abraham and the ancients unfolded to our understanding, the particulars of which will appear hereafter. (Ibid., page 286)

Tuesday, [Nov.] 24.—. . . In the afternoon we translated some of the Egyptian records . . .

Thursday, 26.—Spent the day in translating Egyptian characters from the papyrus . . . (Ibid., page 320)

At the beginning of the handwritten manuscript of the Book of Abraham, Joseph Smith asserted that it was a “Translation of the Book of Abraham written by his own hand upon papyrus and found in the catacombs of Egypt” (see photograph of the first page of the manuscript in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 312).

The introduction to the Book of Abraham still maintains that it was “Translating From The Papyrus, By Joseph Smith” (Pearl of Great Price, The Book of Abraham, Introduction).

In spite of Joseph Smith’s many statements that he translated the Book of Abraham from the Egyptian language, Mormon apologist Hugh Nibley made this astounding assertion: “Joseph Smith never pretended to understand Egyptian, nor that the Book of Abraham was a work of his scholarship . . .” (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, page 176). In the same article Nibley said that he had “never spent so much as five minutes with the Egyptian Grammar”—i.e., Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar.

A PAGAN BOOK?

The attempt by Mormon scholars to escape Smith’s own statements that he translated the Book of Abraham from the papyrus appears to be a flight from reality. It is clear that they realize there is no way to defend Smith’s work as a translator of Egyptian writing. Consequently, they are forced to resort to some kind of a theory that allows Smith to be a prophet even though his translation does not coincide with what is found on the papyrus. The idea that there was another papyrus scroll which Joseph Smith never had in his possession and that God revealed the text of that papyrus to Smith by revelation seems to stretch one’s credulity beyond the breaking point.

Even if a person could accept this theory, it raises another insurmountable problem: why would God allow his prophet to use three pagan documents (the facsimiles) to illustrate his Book of Abraham? The facsimiles are filled with pictures of and praises to these heathen gods. For example, Mormon scholar
Michael Rhodes has translated Facsimile No. 2 and admits that the text “seems to be an address to Osiris, the god of the Dead, on behalf of the deceased…” (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1977, page 274). On page 270 of the same article, Rhodes acknowledges that the same facsimile has a drawing of the “Hawk-headed Re”—the Egyptian sun god. Numerous other gods and pagan scenes are shown on the facsimiles. Rhodes himself admits that there is a “strange assortment of gods, animals, and mixtures of both” on Facsimile No. 2 (Ibid., page 273). To have such an array of pagan gods and activities in a book purporting to have been written by Abraham appears to be in direct contradiction to the first commandment:

I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt have no other gods before me. (Exodus 20: 2-3)

Charles Larson makes some interesting observations concerning this matter in his new book:

Quite early in the game Dr. Nibley had given the impression that he felt that Mormon people ought to be willing to accept any association that could be found—even to pagan Egyptian mythology if need be—so long as it left open possibilities.

However, Nibley’s approach in this regard is certainly in sharp conflict with the Bible, one of the four LDS standard works. Throughout the Old Testament it is abundantly clear that God took great pains to dissuade the children of Israel from any contact with the false gods and idolatrous practices of their pagan neighbors. . . . God specifically admonished his people to repudiate and completely forsake the gods of Egypt, to whom they had been exposed during their years of captivity there (Joshua 24: 14). The Old Testament records that every time the children of Israel fell into pagan idolatry, they experienced God’s chastening (Judges 2: 2, 3, 11-15).

The New Testament likewise teaches the same principle that God does not use pagan or ungodly vessels to bear His truth. . . .

Since the Joseph Smith Papyri have been identified with absolute certainty as prayers to pagan Egyptian gods that, by biblical definition are ripe with occultism, it is inconceivable, given the holy character of God, that He would associate Himself or His revelation in any way with these pagan religious documents. This fact alone is ample grounds for totally rejecting the Book of Abraham as a revelation from the one True and Living God. (By His Own Hand Upon Papyrus, pages 119-120)

John Gee argues that the Book of Breathings “is addressed to no Egyptian gods; rather, it is addressed to a human individual and reminds him of promises made to him and things he has experienced” (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 4, page 100). While this diversionary tactic may be technically correct, those who take the time to read the text will find that the deceased is promised help from Re (the sun god), Uto (the cobra goddess), Nekhbet (the vulture goddess), Geb (the earth god), Shu (the god of air), and other gods and goddesses. (See Klaus Baer’s translation in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, pages 116-126.) As noted earlier, we found at least fifteen pagan gods and goddesses mentioned on this papyrus!

Moreover, we have shown that the Mormon scholar Michael Rhodes has translated Facsimile No. 2 of the Book of Abraham and acknowledges that the text “seems to be an address to Osiris, the god of the Dead, on behalf of the deceased…” In addition, the rest of the Joseph Smith Papyri contains prayers to pagan deities.

We have to agree with Charles Larson’s statement on page 166 of his book: “. . . It is surely inconceivable that the God of the Bible would compromise his exclusivity as the one, true God by co-mingling His revelation with the idolatrous pagan teachings and rites of Egypt as expressed in the Joseph Smith Papyri.”

RELIGIOUS PORNOGRAPHY?

Figure 7 of Facsimile No. 2 of the Book of Abraham has caused some embarrassment to Mormon officials. In fact, it was considered so “explicit” that it was falsified in some printings of the Pearl of Great Price. In 1981, however, it was restored to match the original woodcut prepared under Joseph Smith’s direction. (In Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 341-343, 369-D, we discuss this pornographic drawing in detail and give photographic evidence of the falsification.) Joseph Smith stated that “Fig. 7. Represents God sitting upon his throne, revealing through the heavens the grand Key-words of the Priesthood; as, also, the sign of the Holy Ghost unto Abraham, in the form of a dove.” It is actually an extremely crude representation of the pagan fertility god Min!

We have previously spoken of a letter written to Michael Rhodes by a member of the LDS Church who was troubled with regard to the authenticity of the Book of Abraham. In this letter, dated June 30, 1988, we find the following: “. . . how do you account for the Explanation of the Facsimiles? . . . Figure 7 of Facsimile 2 is described by Joseph as being Heavenly Father with an erection?”, whereas it is really the Egyptian god Min.”

Michael Rhodes did not mention the problem with regard to Fig. 7 in his response. However, in his article published in BYU Studies in 1977, he gave a very honest explanation of this part of Facsimile No. 2:

7. A seated ithyphallic god with a hawk’s tail, holding aloft the divine flail. . . . The seated god is clearly a form of Min, the god of the regenerative, procreative forces of nature, perhaps combined with Horus as the hawk’s tail would seem to indicate. . . . The procreative forces, receiving unusual accentuation throughout the representation, may stand for many divine generative powers, not least of which might be conjoined with the blessings of the priesthood in one’s posterity eternally. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1977, page 273)

The Mormon writer Ian Barber responded to our work with regard to the god Min. He tried to defend the Book of Abraham but had to admit that Fac. 2, Fig. 7, shows an “ithyphallic” god:

The seated god Min in Figure 7 . . . is an ithyphallic deity. The Tanners call this “a pornographic representation,” and remark that it is “hard to believe that Abraham would draw an obscene picture of God.” . . . For the Egyptians, the ritual portrayal of the phallus was not understood to be obscene, but rather symbolic of the divine, generative powers, and it was even respectfully mumified on occasion. The Tanners are correct in implying that such an emphasis would be inappropriate in our contemporary Western culture, and that the explicit portrayal offended Mormon sensibilities is evidenced by the fact that the phallus has been removed from several printings of the Pearl of Great Price . . . (What Mormonism Isn’t, page F-5)

In his book, Abraham in Egypt, Dr. Hugh Nibley acknowledges that Min was an Egyptian sex god who indulged in promiscuity and incest with his family and even his own mother:

As the supreme sex symbol of gods and men, Min behaves with shocking promiscuity. “The Egyptians,” wrote Plutarch, “are accustomed to call Horus ’Min’ meaning visible” referring to the symbol of reproduction publicly paraded at his festival. . . . The Greeks identified him with the lustful Pan . . . His sacred plants were aphrodisiacal . . . and he is everywhere represented as indulging in incestuous relationships with those of his immediate family . . . The rites of Min were secret, and the Chief Priest was "the Director of the Mysteries of the god in his character of Kamutef," literally the Bull of His Mother . . . His special bull titles always denote his too-intimate relationship with his mother . . . For he is the divine beast, the irrepresible rampart bull ready for anything. In this regard he is the double of Seth, the two occupying prehistoric shrines directly opposite each other . . . Their outstanding characteristic, as Te Velde describes it, is their insistence on going "beyond the bounds" of discretion and morality, completely unrestrained in their appetites and passions . . .

The whip that the Min-images hold with upraised arm is always viewed as a fertility symbol . . . Some Egyptologists have maintained that it signifies that Min took advantage of his mother by brute force, seizing the matriarchal rule of the land by violence and incest . . . What suggested that was his commonest epithet, Ka-mut-ef, "Bull of his Mother," the fide that the youthful successor to the throne went by at the coronation . . . (Abraham in Egypt, 1981, pages 210-211)

That Joseph Smith would identify this promiscuous god who engaged in incest with his own mother as "God sitting upon his throne" shows a complete lack of inspiration.

Unfortunately for Mormon apologists trying to save the Book of Abraham, the problem with regard to the ithyphallic-god Min spills over onto Facsimile No. 1. As we have shown, Dr. Hugh Nibley has pointed out that the expression "Bull of his Mother" is applied to the god Min. When the Egyptologist Klaus Baer translated the original papyrus from which Fac. No. 1 was taken, he found these words: "Min Bull-of-his-Mother" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, page 116).

The problem may even go much deeper. Egyptianist Richard A. Parker pointed out that the portion of the original papyrus which was missing when the Mormons obtained it was incorrectly restored by Joseph Smith. According to Professor Parker, the papyrus really contained a sexual scene before the papyrus was damaged:

This is the well-known scene from the Osiris mysteries, with Anubis, the jackal-headed god, on the left ministering to the dead Osiris on the bier. The pencilled (?) restoration is incorrect. Anubis should be jackal-headed. The left arm of Osiris is in reality lying at his side under him. The apparent upper hand is part of the wing of a second bird which is hovering over the erect phallus of Osiris (now broken away). The second bird is Isis and she is magically impregnated by the dead Osiris and then later gives birth to Horus . . . (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1968, page 86)

The Egyptologist Klaus Baer agreed with Professor Parker: "He [Osiris] was almost certainly represented as ithyphallic, ready to beget Horus, as in many of the scenes at Dendera" (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1968, page 119). Since Facsimile No. 2 shows the ithyphallic god Min, it seems possible that a sexual scene would be shown on Facsimile No. 1. Dr. Hugh Nibley argues against this interpretation, but we have shown that his reasoning is fallacious (see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?, page 350). Nibley acknowledges, however, that there are "a number of procreation scenes in which the mummy is begetting his divine successor or reincarnation" (Improvement Era, October 1968, page 78).

In his book, By His Own Hand Upon Papyrus, page 102, Charles Larson restores the scene according to the interpretation given by Egyptologists. Below his restoration, he comments as follows: "Isis, meanwhile, has taken the form of a falcon and hovers over the groin of Osiris who holds his phallus (hence this is known as an ithyphallic drawing) in anticipation of the procreative act which will make Isis pregnant with their son Horus."

John Gee argues that the reconstructed drawing appearing in Charles Larson's book makes no sense: "Not only is his restoration of Joseph Smith Papyrus I obscene, it is impossible . . . . the reconstruction is too crude to have been done by a good artist" (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 4, pages 101-102). While Mr. Gee labels Larson's reconstruction as "ocscene" and "impossible," he neglects to mention the fact that it was based on the statements of two noted Egyptologists, Klaus Baer and Richard A. Parker. (It is interesting to note that when Professor Parker translated the important portion of the Book of Breathings, Dr. Hugh Nibley publicly stated that he was "the best [Egyptologist] in America for this particular period and style of writing.")

As to Gee's statement that the drawing in Larson's book is obscene, most Christians would feel that it is more obscene, even blasphemous, to have a drawing of the ithyphallic god Min identified in the Book of Abraham as "God sitting upon his throne" (see Facsimile No. 2, Figure 7).

Instead of attacking Larson's restoration, John Gee should be discussing the false restorations in the facsimiles found in the Book of Abraham. The fact that Joseph Smith instructed Reuben Hedlock to make incorrect restorations in the woodcuts of the Book of Abraham facsimiles is acknowledged by noted Mormon scholars. James R. Harris, who felt that Joseph Smith sometimes operated under the power of inspiration, admitted that this was not always the case: "When he was not inspired, and consequently operated on his own wisdom, Joseph Smith did not demonstrate an ability to interpret or to make appropriate restorations of damaged portions of the documents" (The Facsimiles of the Book of Abraham, A Study of the Joseph Smith Egyptian Papyri, page 4).

We have already quoted Michael Rhodes concerning the "obvious modifications" in Facsimile No. 1. Edward H. Ashment also frankly discussed Joseph Smith's false restorations:

It can be clearly ascertained that portions of Reuben Hedlock's Facsimiles 1 and 2 were conjecturally restored. Moreover, according to the diary entry for Friday, March 4, 1842, in the History of the Church, it is apparent that the prophet was connected with their production . . . he probably was not as concerned with having historically accurate restorations of Facsimiles 1 and 2 as he was with having complete pictures to publish in the Times and Seasons. Neither he nor Reuben Hedlock would have known that a standing human body would have a dog's head (Facsimile 1, Fig. 3), nor that a bird would have a human head (Facsimile 1, Fig. 1) . . . . It seems that they completed each damaged section with what was to them logical or important for whatever reason: a man's head on a man's body . . . a bird's head on a bird's body . . . (Sunstone, December 1979, page 44)

The evidence against the Book of Abraham is absolutely devastating. That Mormons would continue to endorse the Book of Abraham in the face of this evidence is almost beyond belief. Charles M. Larson made this comment concerning the sad state of affairs which now exists:

Sometime during the mid-1850s . . . an LDS Apostle named Orson Pratt confidently laid a dramatic challenge before the world: " . . . convince of our errors of doctrine, if we have any,
by reason, by logical arguments, or by the Word of God, and we will be ever grateful for the information, and you ever will have the pleasing reflection that you have been instruments in the hands of God of redeeming your fellow beings from the darkness which you may see enveloping their minds.”

Orson Pratt was no doubt confident that a successful case against the claims of Mormonism would never be presented because one simply did not exist. Over a century-and-a-half of close scrutiny, though, has proven the opposite to be the case. It is this fact which probably best explains why the contemporary LDS Church has shifted from the bold, confrontational stance of Pratt’s day, to one of cautioning members to “rely on faith and not on historical fact” . . . The message coming from LDS spokesmen today appears to be more and more one of accommodation: If facts fail to justify faith (what one wishes to believe), then faith should overrule facts. This sort of thinking is evasive, and must be set aside if any real reckoning with the facts is to take place.

But going back to Pratt, the challenge he made is a valid one, and the tendency of contemporary LDS figures to rationalize away problems instead of confronting them only underlines the fact that serious problems do exist. If error or falsehood within a religious system exists, it should be exposed, and using reason and the Word of God to do so makes a great deal of sense. Exposing error is the right thing to do, as only good can be the ultimate result of people learning the truth.

We are not only justified, then, in examining the evidences challenging the truth of the Book of Abraham which God has graciously allowed to come forth, we are firmly obligated to do so. And it is quite possible that the case against the Book of Abraham is the strongest evidence ever provided to test the truthfulness of Joseph Smith’s claims . . . .

One by one, virtually every Mormon belief about the Book of Abraham once considered essential to its support and regarded as faith promoting, has been shattered by the facts.

Not one trace of reliable evidence has appeared that would support the LDS view of the Book of Abraham as an authentic scripture, while an enormous amount of evidence is available to show that it is a man-made production of the nineteenth century, created by Joseph Smith to support his claim among his people to be a “prophet, seer, and revelator.” . . . When an individual fails to respond openly and honestly to such a problem it only passes the problem—and the pain of dealing with it—to someone else, multiplying ignorance and hurt in the process . . . .

So much potential pain to loved ones and future generations could be avoided! How? By placing truth ahead of convenience, by being honest with ourselves and with others.

The question of meeting challenges to our faith really does matter, because truth matters. The Bible gives us the promise that “the truth shall make you free” (John 8: 32)—and that includes being free from delusion. (By His Own Hand Upon Papyrus, pages 169, 171, 175, 181)

We highly recommend Charles Larson’s new book. We feel that he has done a very good job of presenting the case against the Book of Abraham. He has also examined and refuted some of the theories Mormon scholars have brought forth in their attempts to save Joseph Smith’s work. Besides taking a very close look at mistakes made by Dr. Hugh Nibley, he also deals with misrepresentations and errors in the book written by Robert and Rosemary Brown. This is the first full-size book devoted almost entirely to presenting the evidence against the Book of Abraham. In addition, it contains beautiful color photographs of nine pieces of the Joseph Smith Papyri. By His Own Hand Upon Papyrus: A New Look At The Joseph Smith Papyri is available from Utah Lighthouse Ministry.

ROPER ATTACKS

Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?

In a new publication by the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies (F.A.R.M.S.), the Mormon scholar Matthew Roper shows deep concern over the effect our book Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? has had upon the public:

The first edition of Mormonism: Shadow or Reality? was published by the Tanners in 1963 under the title, Mormonism: A Study of Mormon History and Doctrine. Since that time the Tanners’ Magnum opus has been published in no less than five editions, the most recent being in 1987. In 1980, in an attempt to facilitate wider distribution of their work, they published a condensed version [The Changing World of Mormonism] through Moody Press. Since their debut as vocal anti-Mormons in the early 1960s, the Tanners have produced and distributed numerous other works attacking various aspects of Mormon history, scripture, and doctrine.

There are several reasons why this book merits review. First, the Tanners are considered by their fellow critics to be among the foremost authorities on Mormonism and the Book of Mormon. Their arguments are central to most anti-Mormon attacks on the Book of Mormon today. One recent critic describes Mormonism: Shadow or Reality? as “the heavyweight of all books on Mormonism.” Even some of the more sophisticated Book of Mormon critics will often repeat methodological errors exemplified in the Tanners’ work . . . . This review will focus only on the Tanners’ criticisms of the Book of Mormon in chapters five and six of Mormonism: Shadow or Reality? (pp. 50-125). (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 4, 1992, pages 169-170)

THIRTY YEARS OF SILENCE

The reader will notice that in the quotation above Matthew Roper said the book Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? “merits review.” This is in sharp contrast with what church officials have said in the past. A spokesman for the church’s Deseret Bookstore wrote: “We do not have a specific response to the Tanner book. Perhaps it does not deserve the dignity of a response” (Letter written January 19, 1977). A man who talked to Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards claimed that Richards “told me to quit studying materials put out by the Tanner’s . . . . I told him “surely some day there will be an answer to these questions.” He told me there never would be an answer and I should stop my inquiries.”

There was an anonymous rebuttal to Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? printed in 1977 (see our response in Answering Dr. Clandestine: A Response to the Anonymous LDS Historian), but the church itself has never put forth an official response. Since we began publishing material on Mormonism in 1959, we have waited in vain for the church itself to make a response to our work. Although a large number of people have left the Mormon Church because of our publications and many others have been very concerned because their church has not published a rebuttal, Mormon leaders seem to feel that their best policy is silence.

TRIPPING AT THE FIRST HURDLE

While Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? contains over 600 pages of material, Matthew Roper’s response deals with only
The Tanners state, “The Mormon Church claims that the witnesses to the Book of Mormon never denied their testimony. There are, however, . . . statements in Mormon publications which would seem to indicate that the witnesses had some doubts” (page 50). They then quote a statement by Brigham Young: “Some of the witnesses of the Book of Mormon, who handled the plates and conversed with the angels of God, were afterwards left to doubt and to disbelieve that they had ever seen an angel.” Unfortunately the Tanners have left out the rest of the statement, giving the false impression that Brigham Young had reference to the three or eight witnesses. The full quote reads as follows:

“The witnesses of the Book of Mormon, who handled the plates and conversed with the angels of God, were afterwards left to doubt and to disbelieve that they had ever seen an angel. One of the Quorum of the Twelve—a young man full of faith and good works, prayed, and the vision of his mind was opened, and the angel of God came and laid the plates before him, and he saw the angel, and conversed with him as he would with one of his friends; but after all this, he was left to doubt, and plunged into apostasy, and has continued to contend against this work. There are hundreds in a similar condition.”

The Tanners would mislead their readers by using this quotation as evidence against the Book of Mormon witnesses. But none of the eleven were ever members of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles. Brigham Young was referring to one of several other early Mormons who had similar experiences, but not to one of the official Book of Mormon witnesses as the Tanners clearly imply. (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 4, 1992, pages 171-172)

Matthew Roper’s accusation concerning this quotation by Brigham Young raises a serious question with regard to the superficiality of his review. If Mr. Roper had examined the very next page (page 51), he would have found a photographic copy of not only the quotation but also the entire page of Brigham Young’s sermon! In the caption below the reproduction we stated: “A Photograph of the Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, page 164. In this sermon Brigham Young claims that some of the witnesses were left to disbelieve that they had seen an angel.”

Now, this certainly raises a question with regard to Matthew Roper’s claim that we were trying to “mislead” our readers. Why would we include a photograph of the document if we were trying to deceive people?

Even if we had not included the photograph of Brigham Young’s statement, there would be no reason for Roper to attack us in the way he did. We, in fact, fail to see how we have misused the quote.

A careful reading of Brigham Young’s statement reveals that he was referring to different cases of apostasy. First he spoke of some of the Book of Mormon witnesses having doubt and disbelief concerning the gold plates from which the Book of Mormon was supposed to have been translated and also regarding the angel who showed them the plates. President Young then claimed that a member of the “Quorum of the Twelve” also had an experience in which an “angel of God came and laid the plates before him,” but he later “was left to doubt, and plunged into apostasy.” Young then concludes with the statement that “hundreds” had likewise fallen into a state of unbelief.

The reader will notice that Brigham Young indicated there was more than one witness of the Book of Mormon who had grave reservations about the book. Young, in fact, stated that “Some of the witnesses . . . were afterwards left to doubt and to disbelieve that they had ever seen an angel.” We know, therefore, that President Young felt that two or more of the witnesses had fallen into disbelieve at some point in their lives.

It would appear that Mr. Roper would like his readers to believe that none of the original witnesses ever had seasons of doubt with regard to the Book of Mormon. He seems to be trying to redefine Brigham Young’s statement about “some of the witnesses of the Book of Mormon” so that it does not refer to any of the original eleven witnesses whose names appear in the book. While there may be some exceptions to the rule, we believe that almost all Mormons would think of these eleven men when they read Brigham Young’s words, “the witnesses of the Book of Mormon.” (There are actually two separate statements by the witnesses of the Book of Mormon. The first contains the “Testimony of Three Witnesses”—Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer and Martin Harris. These men claim that an angel of God showed the plates to them. The second statement is by eight men who said they saw the plates, although they did not claim that an angel showed the plates to them.)

It is interesting to note that on April 6, 1855, Brigham Young gave another sermon in which he stated that “most of the witnesses of the Book of Mormon have died . . .” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, page 249). The reader will notice that President Young used exactly the same words as he did in the quotation cited in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? It is obvious that he was referring to the eleven men whose names appear in the Book of Mormon because he said that most of these witnesses were dead. Research shows that Brigham Young was correct about this matter; by 1855 only four of the eleven witnesses were still alive. Just above the portion we cited, Young indicated that “Martin Harris” was probably still alive, but “Oliver Cowdery has gone to his long home . . .” Harris and Cowdery, of course, were among the witnesses whose names appear in the Book of Mormon.

Although none of the witnesses ever gave a written statement repudiating the Book of Mormon, some of them did seem to have seasons of skepticism about the authenticity of that work. In our book, The Case Against Mormonism, vol. 2, page 16, we give photographic proof that after Oliver Cowdery (one of the three witnesses) was excommunicated from the Mormon Church, he joined the Methodist Church. Mormon writer Richard Anderson admits that Cowdery was affiliated with the Methodists, but he claims that Cowdery did not deny his testimony: “The cessation of his activity in the Church meant a suspension of his role as a witness of the Book of Mormon. Not that his conviction ceased, but he discontinued public testimony . . . he logically affiliated himself with a Christian congregation for a time, the Methodist Protestant Church at Tiffin, Ohio” (Investigating the Book of Mormon Witnesses, 1981, page 57).

In 1885, G. J. Keen, who was a member of the Methodist Church which Cowdery joined, gave an affidavit in which he stated:

We . . . submitted his name to the church, and he was unanimously admitted a member thereof.

At that time he arose and addressed the audience present, admitted his error and implored forgiveness, and said he was sorry and ashamed of his connection with Mormonism.

He continued his membership while he resided in Tiffin, and became superintendent of the Sabbath School, and lived an exemplary life while he resided with us. (Affidavit quoted in The True Origin of the Book of Mormon, by Charles A. Shook, Cincinnati, Ohio, 1914, pages 58-59)
On July 15, 1841, the Mormon Church’s official publication, Times and Seasons, printed a poem which made it clear that the Mormons believed that Oliver Cowdery had denied his testimony to the Book of Mormon. The following appeared in the poem:

Amazed with wonder! I look round
To see most people of our day,
Reject the glorious gospel sound,
Because the simple turn away.

Or prove that Christ was not the Lord
Because that Peter cursed and swore?
Or Book of Mormon not his word
Because denied, by Oliver?

(Times and Seasons, vol. 2, page 492)

Martin Harris, who was also one of the three witnesses of the Book of Mormon, was excommunicated from the church. Even the noted Mormon apologist Richard Anderson had to admit that his life showed “religious instability.” Professor Anderson also revealed the following:

The foregoing tendencies explain the spiritual wanderlust that afflicted the solitary witness at Kirtland. In this period of his life he changed his religious position eight times, including a rebaptism by a Nauvoo missionary in 1842. Every affiliation of Martin Harris was with some Mormon group, except when he was affiliated with the Shaker belief . . . (Improvement Era, March 1969, page 63)

Martin Harris’ involvement with the Shakers raises some serious doubts regarding his belief in the Book of Mormon. We feel that a believer in the Book of Mormon could not accept these revelations without repudiating the teachings of Joseph Smith. The Shakers, for example, felt that “Christ has made his second appearance on earth, in a chosen female known by the name of Ann Lee, and acknowledged by us as our blessed Mother in the work of redemption” (Sacred Roll and Book, page 358).

The Shakers, of course, rejected the Book of Mormon and all of the revelations received by Joseph Smith. They had their own book which they claimed came from heaven. It was entitled, A Holy, Sacred and Divine Roll and Book; From the Lord God of Heaven, to the Inhabitants of Earth. More than sixty individuals gave testimony to the “Sacred Roll and Book.” Although not all of them mention angels appearing, some of them tell of many angels visiting them—one woman told of eight different visions. On page 304 of this book we find the testimony of eight witnesses: “We, the undersigned, hereby testify, that we saw the holy Angel standing upon the house-top, as mentioned in the foregoing declaration, holding the Roll and Book.”

Joseph Smith only had three witness who claimed to see an angel. The Shakers, however, had a large number of witnesses who claimed they saw angels and the book. There are over a hundred pages of testimony from “Living Witnesses.”

The evidence clearly shows that Martin Harris accepted the Shaker’s “Sacred Roll and Book” as a divine revelation. Clark Braden made this revealing statement about this matter:

Harris declared repeatedly that he had as much evidence for a Shaker book he had as for the Book of Mormon. (The Braden and Kelly Debate, page 173)

There is a Mormon source which indicates that Martin Harris even claimed to have a greater testimony to the Shakers than to the Book of Mormon. In a thesis written at Brigham Young University, Wayne Cutler Gunnell stated that on December 31, 1844, “Phineas H. Young [Brigham Young’s brother] and other leaders of the Kirtland organization” wrote a letter to Brigham Young in which they stated:

There are in this place all kinds of teaching; Martin Harris is a firm believer in Shakerism, says his testimony is greater than that of the Book of Mormon. (Martin Harris—Witness and Benefactor to the Book of Mormon, 1955, page 52)*

The fact that Martin Harris would even join with such a group shows that he was unstable and easily influenced by charismatic leaders. We feel, therefore, that his testimony that the Book of Mormon was of divine origin cannot be relied upon. How can we put our trust in a man who was constantly following after strange movements like the Shakers and the Strangites?

David Whitmer, the last member of the group known as the three witnesses of the Book of Mormon, was also excommunicated from the Mormon Church and never returned. While we know of no evidence that he repudiated the Book of Mormon, he rejected the Doctrine and Covenants, believed that Joseph Smith was a fallen prophet and claimed that God himself told him that he should leave the Mormon Church:

If you believe my testimony to the Book of Mormon; if you believe that God spake to us three witnesses by his own voice, then I tell you that in June, 1838, God spake to me again by his own voice from the heavens, and told me to “separate myself from among the Latter Day Saints, for as they sought to do unto me, so should it be done unto them.”(An Address to all Believers in Christ, 1887, page 27)

Mormons cannot accept this testimony by their own witness without destroying faith in Joseph Smith. In Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 57, we present evidence showing that David Whitmer gave a revelation from the Lord which strongly condemned Mormonism.

At any rate, Mr. Roper has also accused us of using “underhanded” tactics when citing from Richard Anderson’s work. In a response we are preparing we will demonstrate that this is not the case. Roper has, in fact, made the same type of error as he did when he accused us of suppressing part of Brigham Young’s quotation. If he had carefully read all of Chapter 5 of our book, he would not have fallen into this serious error. The rebuttal we are now working on will deal with two different attacks on our work by Matthew Roper and also articles by John A. Tvedtnes and L. Ara Norwood.

Since this is the first time that F.A.R.M.S. has attempted to respond to Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? we felt that it would be an excellent time to have a sale on this book. When our book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, was reviewed by F.A.R.M.S., we had a similar type of sale to get the book “into the hands of as many people as possible.” Mormon apologist Daniel C. Peterson, however, responded as follows: “But maybe the real idea was to make a sale on the old car before the wheels and doors fall off and the customer discovered what a lemon he was looking at” (Review of Books, 1992, Introduction, page lxxv). In a footnote on the page before, Peterson said that he accepted Roper’s attack against Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? because he “thought it made a number of important points, and because most contemporary anti-Mormon writers depend heavily upon the Tanners. Attending to the roots seemed an efficient way of dealing with the branches.”

Despite the ridicule we may receive from Daniel Peterson, we sincerely believe that Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? will continue to provide very good transportation for those who want to tour the hidden sites of Mormonism and learn the real truth about the church. While many church members believe the F.A.R.M.S. vehicle gives a good tour of these areas, it actually skirts around some very important areas so that it can stay on the smoother roads of Mormonism.
Satanic Murders

Shortly after finishing the printing of our new book, Satanic Ritual Abuse and Mormonism, some new information with regard to Satanism came to light. The first development was the confession of a satanic human sacrifice by two women in Brazil. The following appeared in a newspaper published in Arizona on July 11, 1992:

RIO DE JANEIRO—A Brazilian woman and her daughter have confessed to killing a 7-year-old boy as a sacrifice to the devil in a bloody ritual to help save their family’s fortunes, police said Friday. The women and five other alleged devil worshipers strangled Evandro Ramos Caetano, mutilated his body and drained his blood to offer on an altar to Satan, said Jose Maria Correa, civil police head in Parana state, where the killing occurred.

Police found the boy’s rotting body in a forest near Guaratuba . . . “It was a black-magic ritual involving the number 7,” Correa said . . . . “He was found with his chest slit open . . . It was terrible, indescribable.

In a taped confession to military police, Celina and Beatriz Abage, daughter and granddaughter of Guaratuba Mayor Aldo Abage, said they kidnapped the boy by luring him with candy. In the tape, a transcript of which was printed in Jornal do Brasil . . . Beatriz Abage said the boy was sacrificed “to bring more fortune, justice to my family.” Seven alleged participants in the ritual are under arrest, including Celina and Beatriz Abage, and a man police believe was the leader, Osvaldo Marceneiro, known as The Warlock.

The mayor, who has not been directly implicated in the case, has fled, leaving municipal offices in chaos. Angry residents of Guaratuba stoned his house. Correa said police were investigating the disappearance of another child, named Leandro . . . . (The Arizona Republic, July 11, 1992)

In our book, Satanic Ritual Abuse and Mormonism, we reported that Glenn Pace, the Mormon General Authority who wrote the memo which exposed satanic ritual abuse in the church, interviewed some people in the city of Rupert, Idaho, a city which is located about forty miles from the Utah border. In November, 1989, the remains of a baby were found in a metal drum at a landfill near the city. On October 23, 1990, the Seattle Post-Intelligencer reported that “No deed was fouler than that perpetrated on Baby X . . . Before she was burned, Baby X . . . had been disemboweled and mutilated.” Sometime later a boy who had lived near the landfill where Baby X was found, told authorities that he had witnessed satanic ceremonies in which babies were mutilated and burned. The boy also maintained that his own family was involved with a group of Satanists who participated in the sacrifices and that he also had been ritually abused (see his drawings in Satanic Ritual Abuse and Mormonism).

People who live in the area believe that there is a satanic cult that functions in both southern Idaho and northern Utah. It is reported that this group has two High Priests. One, it is claimed, lives in a rural area of Bannock County, Idaho, and goes by the cult name “Rosheebea-Son of Oliver.” The other leader lives in Logan, Utah, and is known as “The Raven.”

In June, 1992, an inconceivably gruesome murder occurred in Burley, Idaho, a city about seven miles from Rupert. Christopher Clark stated that the body of Benito Ruiz Carabeo “was found June 24, carefully disemboweled and placed in five triple-strength garbage bags . . .” (South Idaho Press, July 28, 1992). An investigation showed that the body had been cut into fourteen pieces. Two brothers, Luis and Anastacio Rodriguez, were wanted for questioning, but it is feared that they have fled to Mexico. While some feel that this is just another brutal murder, others believe that it is related to the occult. On July 28, 1992, Christopher Clark reported: “From the condition of the body and the death’s correlation to an occult calendar date, authorities have not ruled out a cult motive for the murder” (Ibid.).

Sometime before the murder, a woman from Burley came forth seeking protection. She claimed that she had been a member of a satanic cult which mutilated and killed victims. She had come to fear, however, that she might become the next victim of the cult and allowed a video tape to be made of her confession. The video tape was made in the presence of Christopher Clark, Noel Croft and Ralph Barranger. Paul Murphy, of KTVX (Channel 4) in Salt Lake City, was able to gain access to the video and show portions on the evening news on August 14, 1992. The woman maintained that cult members had conspired to commit the murder two years before the crime actually took place: “. . . it was a contract that we’d written in our own blood and we’d signed in our own blood that in two years . . . we would do . . . this big sacrifice.” Paul Murphy commented: “Weeks before the murder, an alleged former cult member did leave a message on video tape. She predicted the date and place of a satanic human sacrifice.”

As noted above, the man was killed either on or very close to “an occultic calendar date,” the Summer Solstice, which occurs on June 21 or 22. Satanists consider the Summer Solstice as a very important Sabbat. It would be an ideal time for a sacrifice. When he was interviewed by Paul Murphy, Rupert’s coroner and mortician, Arvin Hansen, pointed out that the body “was cut into different sections . . . it was cut into different types of cuts like a meat cutter would cut them.” It was also revealed that part of Carabeo’s body had been skinned. In regard to this it is interesting to note that there have been charges that Satanists who perform human sacrifices sometimes skin their victims. There was, in fact, speculation that Baby X “may have been skinned before she was burned” (Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 23, 1990). The woman who predicted that someone would be sacrificed in the area of Burley seemed to be familiar with the practice of skinning the victims. In addition, we have been informed she told of drinking the blood of sacrificial victims. According to Christopher Clark, the same woman told of many human sacrifices being performed by this satanic cult—possibly as many as thirty. She also reported that many of the victims came from the transient population in the Salt Lake City area.

We, of course, do not know for certain that her story is true, but even the Cassia County Sheriff Billy Crystal had to admit that her prediction of a ritual murder at the time of the Summer Solstice was rather remarkable. Sheriff Crystal also acknowledged to Paul Murphy that the Burley case has some resemblance to the ritual sacrifice of fifteen people near Matamoros, Mexico. Murphy noted that Carabeo’s spine had been cut out. This seemed to be a common practice at Matamoros. In Sacrifice: A Father’s Determination to Turn Evil into Good, 1990, page 119, we find that “After death, Mark’s body was mutilated. The spine was cut free so the sect could use it as a necklace. Before the men buried the victim, Constanzo ordered El Dubi to cut the legs off at the knee.” The cult believed that necklaces made from the spine would bring good luck and therefore used them in their occultic ceremonies. On page 177 of the same book, we read that the removal of the spine was “a trademark found on bodies.” The sheriff’s statement regarding Matamoros was very interesting to us because we had previously written of a possible connection on pages 67-69 of our book on ritual abuse: “Some people in the Rupert area believe that there is a relationship between the Baby X case and what went on in the city of Matamoros, Mexico, in 1989. They claim, for example, that people from the area have been in Idaho’s Minidoka county and suspect that they may be involved in smuggling drugs.” It has even been suggested that there may have been a synthesis of Satanism and the bizarre practices of the Matamoros cult.

MORMON LEADERS SUPPRESS “KEY” ITEM IN MURDER CASE

THE TRUE MCLELLIN DOCUMENTS FOUND IN FIRST PRESIDENCY’S VAULT!

On October 15, 1985, a bomb exploded in Salt Lake City, Utah, killing Steven F. Christensen, a Mormon bishop. Later that morning, Kathleen Sheets, the wife of another bishop, was killed when she picked up a package containing a booby-trapped shrapnel bomb. The following day, a Mormon document dealer named Mark Hofmann was seriously injured when a bomb exploded in his car.

After an intensive investigation, it was discovered that Mark Hofmann was the bomber. Hofmann was transporting a third bomb he had constructed at the time of the explosion. Although this bomb was prepared to kill someone else, it accidentally went off in his own car. Hofmann later confessed to the murders and was sent to the Utah State Prison.

In October, 1986, before Mr. Hofmann pleaded guilty, we published the book, Tracking the White Salamander. About two months after Mr. Hofmann pleaded guilty in 1987, we published a second book, Confessions of a White Salamander. In these books we discussed many important details regarding Hofmann’s murders and the forged documents he sold to the Mormon Church and other collectors. Three other books were published the following year. The first book to appear was Salamander: The Story of the Mormon Forgery Murders, by Linda Sillitoe and Allen Roberts, two Mormon historians. The second book was entitled, Mormon Murders, by Steven Naifeh and Gregory White Smith. The last book, A Gathering of Saints: A True Story of Money, Murder and Deceit, was penned by Robert Lindsey, a reporter for the New York Times.

The authors of all three of these books interviewed investigators and all reached the conclusion that some leaders had not been forthright in their contacts with law enforcement officials. In addition, they felt that the church had been suppressing important documents from its members.

The Mormon Church leaders were very disturbed about the bad publicity and on September 18, 1988, the Los Angeles Times reported that “sources within the Mormon media establishment . . . said the church already has begun a battle against what it believes is the most serious attack against the church since the polygamy controversy... The church has embarked on a massive study of the books and news articles in an attempt to assemble a master list of errors, misquotes and exaggerations. ‘Our response to all the allegations made against the church will be made public in about 60 days,’ [Richard P.] Lindsay said.”

Notwithstanding this public announcement, this “master list of errors, misquotes and exaggerations” has never been made public. Some time later, however, it was announced that Richard E. Turley, Jr., managing director of the LDS Church Historical Department, was writing a book which would give the church’s side of the issue. Mr. Turley’s work has finally appeared under the title, Victims: The LDS Church and the Mark Hofmann Case.
TURLEY’S BOMBHELL!

While Richard Turley seems to have nothing to say about the two books we have written on the subject, he attacks all three of the other books. He does, however, make observations concerning our work on the Salamander letter and other questionable documents. His comments with regard to our work are generally good and contain nothing requiring a response.

One strange thing about the Turley book is that although the index lists thirteen different pages which refer to our work, it does not have a single reference to the three books he is attacking. Moreover, the names of the authors (Sillitoe, Roberts, Naifeh, Smith and Lindsey) never appear in the index. It seems that everything he has written about these authors is found in the footnotes. Mr. Turley apparently does not want these authors or their books to have more publicity than they have already received.

However this may be, in his footnotes Mormon apologist Richard Turley tries to undermine the authenticity of these books. He seems to be especially upset with charges that church leaders were trying to cover up facts during the investigation and does his best to try to smooth over these accusations. Unfortunately for the Mormon Church, however, Mr. Turley’s laborious work of shoring up faith in church leaders comes crashing to the ground when a person reaches page 248 of his book. It is at that point that Turley divulges one of the most embarrassing secrets that a Mormon historian has ever revealed. Mr. Turley begins by saying that “March 1986 brought a startling discovery.” Turley goes on to explain that at that time church officials became aware of the fact that they had an important part of the McLellin collection concealed in the First Presidency’s vault and that it had been there since 1908!

William E. McLellin was one of the original members of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles in the Mormon Church. He was well acquainted with Joseph Smith and other church leaders and knew a great deal about what was going on in the early church. Later, however, he turned against the church and accused Joseph Smith of altering the revelations which are found in the Doctrine and Covenants. The current edition of the Doctrine and Covenants still contains an “Explanatory Introduction” which purports to be the “Testimony of the Twelve Apostles to the Truth of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants.” According to Daniel Macgregor, William McLellin claimed that this “Testimony” was “a base forgery.” (Changing of the Revelations, page 32)

McLellin was very upset that Joseph Smith would change revelations given by God. The Salt Lake Tribune for Oct. 6, 1875, printed this statement regarding McLellin: “His faith was first shaken by the changes made in the revelations. He had been careful to keep copies of the originals, presented proof that all the early revelations were changed three times, and considerably amended before they appeared in their present form.”

In 1838, Oliver Cowdery, one of the Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon, claimed that Joseph Smith had “A dirty, nasty, filthy affair” with a young woman named Fanny Alger (see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 203-204). William McLellin claimed to have some explosive information on this matter. He asserted that Joseph Smith’s wife, Emma, had told him about this affair. In his book, Mormon Polygamy: A History, 1986, page 6, Richard S. Van Wagoner wrote: “McLellin’s 1872 letter described Alger’s relationship with Joseph Smith. ‘Again I told [your mother],’ the former apostle wrote, that ‘I heard that one night she missed Joseph and Fanny Alger. She went to the barn and saw him and Fanny in the barn together alone. She looked through a crack and saw the transaction!!!’ She told me this story too was verily true.’ McLellin also detailed the Alger incident to a newspaper reporter for the 6 October 1875 Salt Lake Tribune.” In 1852 Mormon Church leaders acknowledged that Joseph Smith practiced plural marriage, but they were silent concerning an incident in the barn.

Those who are familiar with the Hofmann case know that Mark Hofmann falsely claimed that he had discovered the McLellin collection and that he was helping the church obtain the collection so that it would not fall into the hands of the anti-Mormons who would use it to embarrass the church. Since William McLellin had made some startling charges like the one regarding the Fanny Alger affair, church leaders would naturally be nervous concerning what such a collection might contain. In his confession, Hofmann described a conversation he allegedly had with Gordon B. Hinckley, a member of the church’s First Presidency, regarding the McLellin collection:

A Well, of course, I basically told him that I could tell him what my fears were concerning its getting in to the enemy’s hands, or whatever. . . . And his interest wasn’t so much in having the Church obtain it as having it go someplace where—In fact, I would almost say he almost didn’t want the Church to obtain it, he just wanted to make sure it did not fall in to the enemy’s hands which was good since I knew I didn’t have it, I knew the Church couldn’t obtain it. (Hofmann’s Confession, page 529)

Eventually, it was decided that Hugh Pinnock, a General Authority in the Mormon Church, would help Mark Hofmann obtain a loan of $185,000 from First Interstate Bank so that he could go to Texas and obtain the McLellin collection. According to Richard Turley, Pinnock felt that the collection required special protection: “Pinnock offered to arrange for secure transportation of the documents by jet or armored car, but Hofmann said he would send them back to Utah by registered mail, adequately insured” (Victims, page 124). The transaction was to be very confidential. David E. Sorensen, “who had recently been asked to preside over the church’s Canada Halifax Mission,” would buy the collection and hide it away from the enemies of the church. Later, however, he would donate it to the church. Richard Turley reported that “Sorensen later recalled that Pinnock ‘asked if I would listen to a matter of concern to the church’ and determine if I would be in a position or interested in helping.’ . . . Sorensen recalled, ‘Elder Pinnock was interested in seeing if I might purchase the collection. If so, would I consider donating it to the church at a later date.’ . . . Sorensen later remembered saying that he would be happy to help the church if he could but wanted to ‘investigate the matter in a business-like way’” (Ibid., page 136).

Bishop Steven Christensen was supposed to authenticate the McLellin collection for Sorensen on October 15, 1985. Since Mr. Hofmann did not have the collection, he killed Steven Christensen that morning so that the transaction could not take place.

When church leaders later discovered that they already had the most significant part of the McLellin collection hidden in the First Presidency’s vault and that it had been there since 1908, they found themselves on the horns of a dilemma. If they admitted that they had the collection all along, it would prove the charge made by critics that the church suppressed important documents from their people. In the Salt Lake City Messenger for August 1985, we spoke of the “role that Mormon leaders have taken in suppressing important documents.” We noted that in 1983, Gordon B. Hinckley, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, secretly acquired a letter - later found to have been forged by Mark Hofmann—which purported to be in Joseph Smith’s own hand and linked the prophet to money-digging and magic. President Hinckley believed the letter was authentic. He paid Mr. Hofmann $15,000 for the letter and then hid it in the First Presidency’s vault.

When researchers learned what happened and said that it was being suppressed, the church decided to “stonewall.” A spokesman for the church said: “The church doesn’t have the letter. . . . It’s not in the church archives or the First Presidency’s vault” (Salt Lake Tribune, April 29, 1985). Finally, when it became clear that some Mormon scholars had photocopies of the letter and were going to turn them over to the news media, the church backed down, and the same spokesman admitted his earlier statement was “in error”: “The purported letter was indeed acquired by the church. For the present it is stored in the First Presidency’s archives . . . .” (Salt Lake Tribune, May 7, 1985).

In the issue of our newsletter cited above, we made this observation: “The First Presidency’s archive or vault, where the 1825 letter was concealed, is undoubtedly the ultimate ‘black hole.’ Documents which are embarrassing to the Mormon Church disappear into this bottomless abyss and are seldom heard of again.’’

The fact that church leaders could lose sight of the McLellin collection in the First Presidency’s vault for almost eight decades shows just how dark it is inside the “black hole’’ which contains the deeper secrets of Mormonism.

The disappearance and rediscovery of the McLellin collection would almost make one wonder if the right hand knows what the left hand is doing at church headquarters. While Mormons might expect this type of thing to happen at some bureaucratic agency, they will have a difficult time explaining how this could happen in a church which is supposed to be led by direct revelation from God. The implications are very serious indeed. For example, how can one explain the fact that Mormon leaders were helping Mark Hofmann obtain a collection from Texas which they already had in their own vault?

In view of the circumstances, it would be very difficult for church leaders to come forth and admit they had made such a serious mistake. On the other hand, however, they faced a far more serious problem if they did not reveal the existence of the McLellin collection. To continue to suppress the existence of the collection would mean that church leaders would have to deliberately keep a key piece of evidence hidden from investigators who were working on the Hofmann case. Unfortunately for the Mormon Church, Richard Turley makes it very clear that church leaders chose to keep law enforcement officials completely in the dark concerning the existence of the McLellin collection.

The importance of this piece of evidence cannot be overstated. While investigators seemed to have a great deal of evidence that Mark Hofmann forged documents and defrauded investors in his schemes, they had a real problem establishing a motive for the murders. At first some investigators believed that the bombings might relate in some way to the Salamander letter. (Hofmann had sold the Salamander letter to Steven Christensen for a great deal of money.) This theory, however, could not be confirmed by any evidence. Christensen apparently believed the letter was genuine and seemed pleased that Hofmann had sold it to him.

The McLellin collection, on the other hand, seemed to provide an explanation for the murder of Steven Christensen. Hofmann’s reluctance to produce the collection was very upsetting to Christensen. Since Hofmann did not have the collection, there was nothing he could do except to continue to give Mr. Christensen excuses. Consequently, friction continued to mount between the two men. At Hofmann’s preliminary hearing, Curt Bench said that about three weeks before the murders, Steven Christensen called him and wanted him to convey a message to Mark Hofmann. Bench testified that Christensen told him that “a member of the First Quorum of Seventy and an apostle . . . were upset because Mark had defaulted on a loan to a bank and had written a check and the check had bounced . . . They were quite upset over this and said some very serious things could happen as a result of that not being taken care of.”

Curt Bench went on to say: “Steve told me that various things could occur if Mark didn’t make good and some of them were he would certainly lose his credibility and credit with the Church and with President Hinckley, that criminal action could be taken, that he could conceivably go to jail, he could also be sued by the bank or even by the Church if the Church was sued. He could lose his membership in the Church . . . . It was very serious. And Steve wanted me to convey that to Mark . . . .” Bench also testified that “Steve used the term crook” when referring to Hofmann. (Tracking the White Salamander, page 24)

Investigators did not believe that Mark Hofmann had the McLellin collection to turn over to Mr. Christensen and felt that this was Hofmann’s motive for killing Christensen—by getting rid of Christensen he could buy some time. They could not, however, actually prove that Hofmann did not have the documents hidden away some place. There was no way to know for certain. If Mr. Hofmann should produce the collection at the time of his trial, it would destroy the motive for murder and could ruin the murder case. The Mormon Church, of course, had the vital information needed by prosecutors in the First Presidency’s vault. Church leaders knew that there was no way that Mark Hofmann could produce McLellin’s diaries because they already had them. It is plain, therefore, that Mormon Church leaders were suppressing some of the most important evidence in the entire case!

A close examination of Richard Turley’s book shows that

BOOK ON McLELLIN

THE TRUE STORY OF THE McLELLIN COLLECTION, by Jerald and Sandra Tanner. We are now in the process of preparing a book that will not only deal with the rediscovery of the genuine McLellin collection, but will also discuss Mark Hofmann’s bogus “McLellin collection.” It will show how Hofmann used blackmail-like tactics to get a General Authority of the Mormon Church to obtain $185,000 for him so the collection would not fall into the hands of the “enemies of the church. In addition, this book will provide Hofmann’s own confession with regard to his fake collection. The book will also contain important information on the ex-Mormon Apostle William E. McLellin and some of his writings. Regular Price: $4.00

Mormon Church leaders were engaged in a conspiracy of silence with regard to the McLellin collection to save the church’s image. The following quotations from Turley’s book make this very clear:

March 1986 brought a startling discovery. Historical Department personnel seeking information about William McLellin had contacted Dean Jessee. . . . Jessee visited the department and explained to Glenn Rowe that he had found some interesting information about McLellin in his research files. Jessee’s notes referred to correspondence in the department’s uncatalogued Joseph F. Smith collection. The correspondence mentioned McLellin’s diaries and other belongings. . . . Rowe and his staff searched the collection and located letters that amazed church officials.

The first letter had been written by J. L. Traughber of Doucette, Texas . . . Dated January 13, 1908, and addressed to the librarian of the church, the letter explained that Traughber had an original copy of A Book of Commandments . . . what Traughber offered next was even rarer. He wrote, “I also have the Journal, in part, of Elder W. E. McLellin for the years 1831, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.” Traughber said he had tried to get more of the journal from McLellin’s widow, but she had refused to give them up “as she said she did not want some things to be known.” Traughber said he also had some manuscript books that McLellin had written. . . . and offered to sell them for fifty dollars.

On January 18, 1908, President Joseph F. Smith and his counselors wrote to President Samuel O. Bennion of the Central States Mission. The Presidency . . . instructed Bennion on how to handle the offer: “While we have studiously avoided expressing any particular desire on our part to purchase the things mentioned by Mr. Traughber, we desire you to know that we would like very much to possess McClellan’s [sic] Journal, if for no other reason than to prevent the writings of this unfortunate and erratic man, whose attitude after his apostacy was inimical to the Prophet Joseph Smith, from falling into unfriendly hands; and for this reason alone, we feel quite willing to pay the price asked for these things . . . .” The Presidency also suggested that Bennion contact McLellin’s widow to obtain the rest of the journals, even if their acquisition were to cost another fifty dollars.

The letter to Bennion mentioned an interview Joseph F. Smith and another church leader had had with McLellin in 1878, when McLellin had told them he had writings he wished to publish. The Presidency wrote Bennion that the manuscripts . . . might be the same ones McLellin had mentioned in 1878. “We hope they are,” the First Presidency wrote, “as it would be an act of mercy on our part to purchase them, and thus prevent them from being published by unfriendly hands to the injury of innocent people.”

Rowe and his staff also found a February 12, 1908, response from Bennion to the First Presidency. Bennion reported that he . . . had acquired the proffered materials from Traughber. . . . He said he would send all the acquired items to the First Presidency that day by registered mail.

Rowe had kept his new supervisor, Richard Turley, informed about Jessee’s clue and the letters to which it led. Turley told Dean Larsen about the letters, and Larsen informed (apostles) Packer and Oaks, who in turn contacted the First Presidency. When Gordon Hinckley learned of the letters, he asked Francis Gibbons if the First Presidency’s vault contained the items the letters mentioned. Gibbons searched the vault. Hinckley and the other church officials then learned to their astonishment, that the church had owned McLellin’s journals and manuscripts all along.

The journals . . . revealed a man deeply dedicated to his religion. . . . The little manuscript books, on the other hand, typified the later McLellin, an avowed enemy of the church. . . .

Like the materials the Tribune had discovered, the McLellin items found in church possession were not the McLellin collection touted by Hofmann. . . . Unlike the Tribune’s discovery, however, the church’s McLellin materials included a key item from the collection Hofmann claimed to have bought. That item, McLellin’s early journals, confirmed to church officials that Hofmann was a fraud.

The discovered documents did not fall within any of the subpoenas issued to the church, and thus officials were not legally obligated to mention them to anyone. Still, it was apparent they were relevant to the case, and those involved in the discovery felt the documents’ existence should be revealed. Yet disclosing them would not come without a cost. Church officials had sought to dispel the notion that they were buying documents to hide them. Disclosure of the newly discovered McLellin materials, however, would reinforce notions of church suppression because those documents had in fact been bought at the direction of the First Presidency and locked away nearly eighty years earlier, eventually to be forgotten. . . . Alluding in his journal to the day’s remarkable discovery, [Apostle] Oaks wrote, “Today [Boyd K. Packer] & I learned that the Church has some documents that have been unknown until now, but will be of great interest when they are revealed, as they should be prior to the Hofmann trial (in my opinion).”

What church officials did not know was that there would be no trial. (Victims: The LDS Church and the Mark Hofmann Case, pages 248-251)

This is a shocking disclosure to be coming from the pen of Richard Turley, managing director of the LDS Church Historical Department. As the reader will see from the quotation above, Mr. Turley acknowledges that he himself became aware of the fact that the church had the McLellin collection in March 1986. Although Turley practiced law before becoming a historian, he obviously felt it was more important to protect the church than to tell investigators working on the Hofmann case about this important matter. The church continued to suppress knowledge of the collection for six years after it was rediscovered.

Why Turley would reveal the matter at this time is a matter of speculation. It could be that Mr. Turley was bothered by his role in the matter and felt compelled to bring out the truth. On the other hand, there could have been concern that too many people knew what had happened and that the “enemies of the church” would eventually find out about the cover-up and publish the facts to the world. When Mormon leaders are convinced that something embarrassing is about to leak out, they sometimes try to get the information out first. For example, the Mormon Church at first denied that the 1825 letter existed, but then rushed to print it when it was discovered that scholars were preparing to release it to the press. In any case, we are very pleased that Mr. Turley has revealed this information.

After Mormon historian Dean Jessee reported the existence of the correspondence mentioning the McLellin collection, a number of people became aware of the fact that the church had obtained the collection. Church archivist Glenn Rowe received the information from Jessee. Rowe, in turn, reported the matter to Richard Turley and Turley relayed the information to Dean Larsen. Larsen then informed apostles Boyd K. Packer and Dallin H. Oaks about the matter. These two apostles “contacted the First Presidency.” The First Presidency is composed of President Ezra Taft Benson (the Prophet, Seer and Revelator of the church), President Gordon B. Hinckley and President Thomas S. Monson. Francis Gibbons was the one who finally found the McLellin collection in the vault. In addition, members of Glenn Rowe’s staff also knew about the matter.
Although at least a dozen people knew about the McLellin collection, no one seems to have reported the matter to investigators. Those on the lower levels may have felt that church leaders would tell police that the McLellin collection had been found. Instead, the highest leaders of the church chose to remain silent and put the church in a cover-up situation. Since the church is supposed to have a “living prophet,” one would think that he would point out that the information must be reported to investigators.

Furthermore, Apostle Dallin H. Oaks had enough legal knowledge that he should have demanded that a full report be immediately turned over to the police. Richard Turley says that Apostle Oaks “served as a United States Supreme Court clerk, University of Chicago law professor, American Bar Foundation executive director, Brigham Young University president, and Utah Supreme Court justice” (Victims, page 116). Mr. Turley also states that “Oaks’s experience as a lawyer and judge made him sensitive to investigators’ need for any information that might help solve a crime . . . .” (Ibid., page 163).

On page 171 of the same book, Turley reports that after the bombings, Shannon Flynn came to church headquarters and talked with Apostle Oaks. Flynn wanted to know what to tell investigators. Oaks responded, “As soon as I learned that Mark Hofmann had been the object of a bomb, I knew that I had some facts that would help police . . . . I talked to two F. B. I. agents. I told them everything I knew about it. The Church is going to cooperate fully and it has absolutely nothing to hide. Sometimes there are some confidential transactions but this is a murder investigation. Confidentiality is set aside. We will cooperate fully.”

On page 153, Turley tells of Mark Hofmann coming to Apostle Oaks’ office: “Hofmann said he thought bombing investigators might want to question him. He worried about what to tell them. Oaks told him to tell the truth. . . . Oaks said that as far as he knew, Hofmann’s activities with the McLellin collection, though confidential . . . . had nothing to do with the bombing investigation. Police probably would not ask him about the deal. If they did, he should answer truthfully and completely.”

Richard Turley shows that Oaks also gave Alvin Rust similar advice: “[Martell] Bird recorded, ‘He told Brother Rust that he should tell the truth in every instance, and that he should not be worried at all about the Church, because when the facts all come out, the Church will have no need to be embarrassed . . . .’” (page 175).

On December 11, 1985, Apostle Oaks addressed members of the Historical Department. According to Turley, Oaks encouraged employees to be forthright: “Of the bombing investigation, he said, ‘We are like others in that we must cooperate fully in an investigation and tell the truth on all matters material to that investigation’” (page 226).

While at first Apostle Oaks claimed that he told the F. B. I. “everything I knew” about the Hofmann case and freely gave advice to others about how they should be completely honest and provide all relevant information to investigators, when he realized that the church would be embarrassed by the truth, he clammed up just like the other church leaders. While Richard Turley claimed that “Oaks’s experience as a lawyer and judge made him sensitive to investigators’ need for any information that might help solve a crime,” when he saw the church was in danger, he put a bridle on his tongue and joined in the conspiracy of silence.

The reader will remember that Turley quoted this statement from Apostle Oaks’ journal on the day that the McLellin collection was discovered: “Today [Boyd K. Packer] & I learned that the Church has some documents that have been unknown until now, but will be of great interest when they are revealed, as they should be prior to the Hoffmann trial (in my opinion).”

While Turley seems to feel that this entry shows Oaks’ openness, it seems to foreshadow the possibility of a cover-up. The reader will note, for example, that Oaks does not mention the fact that he is talking about the McLellin collection. He merely states: “I learned that the Church has some documents . . . .” Why would he hesitate to identify the documents? If Turley had not revealed that Oaks was talking about the McLellin collection, a person reading his diary today would not know what he was talking about and would assume that whatever the documents were, they had been made available.

Apostle Oaks’ statement that “when they are revealed, as they should be prior to the Hoffmann trial (in my opinion)” seems to suggest that there was a possibility that they would not be revealed prior to the trial. (They, of course, would be of no value to prosecutors after the trial.) The words, “in my opinion” seem to imply that if the other church leaders did not want them available, Oaks would support the decision.

If the church had no plans for a cover-up, Apostle Oaks would have written something like the following: “Today I learned the Church has had the McLellin collection stored in a vault since 1908. Since this is very important to the Hoffmann case, we have called the county prosecutor and informed him of this development. He will pick up the documents in the morning.”

Oaks’ statement that the documents should be revealed “prior to the Hoffmann trial” certainly raises an important question. By March 4, 1986, the day Oaks made the entry in his journal, church leaders were well aware of the fact that prosecutors were preparing for Mark Hofmann’s preliminary hearing. If the prosecution could not produce sufficient evidence at that hearing, Hofmann would be set free and there would be no trial. For this reason investigators were working feverishly to obtain the evidence necessary to be sure that Hofmann would be bound over for trial. The fact that the Mormon Church had rediscovered the McLellin collection would have been extremely important to their case.

Since Apostle Oaks did not mention anything about revealing the McLellin collection “prior to the Hoffmann trial,” it is obvious that church leaders were planning to keep it suppressed at least through the preliminary hearing. The preliminary hearing did not start until April 14, 1986. This gave church leaders almost a month and a half to turn over the McLellin collection to investigators. Instead of coming clean, however, they chose to keep the documents hidden. The General Authorities of the church were already concerned enough about the bad publicity the church would receive during the preliminary hearing and must have hoped that no trial would ever occur. This, of course, is exactly what happened and the church never had to reveal the truth about the McLellin collection to investigators.

Since Salt Lake County prosecutors did not have the important piece of evidence that the church could have provided, their case on the murders was not as strong as it could have been. They were obviously concerned about the strength of their case. Robert Lindsey reported the following: “At the end of a week of testimony, David Biggs [one of the prosecutors] wrote in his journal: ‘I really feel as if we’ve missed the “glue” that connects the pieces of this puzzle together. The pieces don’t seem to want to stay together. We have evidence, motive, murder, but it is all just a degree off. I’m still trying to find out what the problem is’” (A Gathering of Saints: A True Story of Money, Murder and Deceit, page 317).

As we have already shown, Richard Turley has admitted that the McLellin collection in the church vault “included a key item” which “confirmed to church officials that Hofmann was a fraud.” Turley also acknowledged that “it was apparent they [the McLellin documents] were relevant to the case, and those involved in the discovery felt the documents’ existence should be revealed.” A person certainly does not have to be a lawyer to know that the church should have immediately made these documents available.

Church leaders had publicly stressed how they were cooperating with investigators. In the beginning, the church officials pledged “our fullest cooperation with city, county and federal authorities in the investigation” (Victims, page 165). Hugh Pinnock, the General Authority who helped Hofmann obtain the loan for $185,000, wrote a letter to Steven Christensen’s widow in which he said: “Several of us have talked with law enforcement people. We want them to know whatever is relevant” (Ibid., page 176).

On October 19, 1985, “the church issued its news release . . . ‘From the outset of this investigation,’ the release noted, ‘the Church has cooperated fully with federal, state, and local law enforcement officials, responding to every inquiry and request. The Church will continue to cooperate with law enforcement officials to bring to light any facts that may contribute to this investigation’” (page 177).

A VERY BAD EXAMPLE

Church leaders obviously broke their pledge to “bring to light any facts” that would help investigators. Richard Turley tried to justify the church’s suppression of the records by saying: “The discovered documents did not fall within any of the subpoenas issued to the church, and thus officials were not legally obligated to mention them to anyone” (page 250). This is certainly a very poor excuse. It seems analogous to a person finding a pistol used to commit a murder and then maintaining there was no obligation to turn the gun over to police because it had not been subpoenaed.

Investigators certainly would have subpoenaed the McLellin collection if they had any idea that the church had it. On October 19, 1985, the Mormon Church issued a news release which stressed that the McLellin collection had never been purchased by the church: “So far as we have been able to determine, no Church officials or personnel have ever seen the ‘M’Lellin Collection, nor has it been purchased by the Church, directly or indirectly” (Victims, page 178).

On October 23, 1985, the church held a press conference. According to Richard Turley, President Gordon B. Hinckley said: “I had never heard of the McLellin collection,” Hinckley said, and he asked Hofmann what was in it . . . ‘I have never seen any such collection,’ Hinckley continued, ‘and know nothing about it beyond that’” (Ibid., pages 191-192). Turley quotes Apostle Dalin Oaks as saying the following at the same press conference: “‘Moreover,’ Oaks explained, ‘to have the church involved in the acquisition of a collection at this time would simply fuel the then current speculation reported by the press that the church already had something called the McLellin collection or was trying to acquire it in order to suppress it’” (page 193).

Since Mormon leaders had emphatically stressed that they had never seen the McLellin collection and that the church had not obtained it, law enforcement officers had no reason to think otherwise. When the collection came to light, Mormon officials should have immediately reported the discovery. Instead, however, they took advantage of the fact that investigators were in the dark concerning the matter.

That there was, in fact, a conspiracy of silence is evident from the following: Hugh Pinnock, the General Authority who arranged the loan of $185,000 for Mark Hofmann, was called upon to testify at Hofmann’s preliminary hearing. The following is taken from an official tape recording of the hearing:

ROBERT STOTT—To your knowledge, did any authority in the LDS Church ever obtain or possess the McLellin collection?
HUGH PINNOCK—No.

This would have been a very good time for Mr. Pinnock to have said, “Yes, the McLellin collection has been in our vault since 1908.” Richard Turley tries to explain away this testimony by saying: “He [Pinnock] had not been told about the McLellin materials discovered the previous month” (Victims, page 274). It may be true that Hugh Pinnock was not told about the discovery, but if this is the case, it raises a very important question: why would the other church leaders keep him in the dark about such an important issue. The answer, of course, must be that they were doing their best to hide the information from investigators and feared that if Pinnock knew about the collection he might have to tell prosecutors about it.

HINCKLEY NOT CALLED

Even if Hugh Pinnock did not know about the discovery, President Gordon B. Hinckley, who many believe is really running the church because of President Ezra Taft Benson’s age, knew all about the matter. He was subpoenaed to testify at the preliminary hearing about two weeks after he learned that the church had the McLellin collection in its vault.

Richard Turley gives this interesting information about a meeting Hinckley had with the prosecutors:

Before the preliminary hearing, Hinckley received a visit from prosecutors Bob Stott and David Biggs. Church counsel Wilford Kirton also attended the meeting . . .

Biggs recalled that they told Hinckley why they were there, and then Kirton began to do most of the talking. Eventually, however, the prosecutors explained that they needed to talk to Hinckley so they could find out what his relationship had been with Hofmann. Hofmann had claimed a close relationship with the church leader, telling people that he had Hinckley’s private numbers and could get hold of him day or night, in the country or out. Prosecutors wanted to know when, where, and how many times Hinckley had met with Hofmann and with Christensen.

Hinckley said he had met about half a dozen times with Hofmann, but he could not recall any information about those meetings beyond what he had told investigators earlier. His answers frustrated both Stott and Biggs. “President Hinckley was very little help, extremely little help,” Stott later said. “His memory of the occasions was very poor.” . . . Though he kept a journal, Hinckley had been forced to turn to Francis Gibbons when trying to reconstruct for investigators the meetings he had with Hofmann. (Victims, pages 253-255)

Although we may never know what President Hinckley told the prosecutors concerning the McLellin collection at that time, one thing is certain: he did not reveal that the church had the collection in its vault.

All accounts seem to agree that Mr. Hinckley did not want to testify at the preliminary hearing. Although there were probably a number of reasons why he did not want to be questioned under oath, he must have been very concerned that he would be asked questions which might lead to the disclosure of the rediscovery of the McLellin collection. Richard Turley gives this information:
Because Hinckley was so busy, [church counsel Wilford] Kirton suggested to the prosecutors that they postpone calling him as a witness until the trial itself rather than using him at the preliminary hearing. Hinckley added that he would prefer not to testify. Kirton’s suggestion riled Stott, who thought the attorney was being patronizing. “How old is he?” Stott later asked, recalling the incident. “Anyway, the old experienced lawyer going to tell the young lawyer how to handle the case, I became very incensed at that . . . he’s saying, ‘Why don’t we do it this way? Why don’t we save President Hinckley for the trial and don’t use him at the prelim.’? I got a little upset at that, him trying to tell me how to run my case. And so I just told him, “I’m in charge. I need President Hinckley. And he’ll testify.” . . .

Kirton let it be known explicitly, “Is there some way we could get along without President Hinckley?” Stott recalled. “Is there some way that he could have a deposition or whatever it takes?”

Stott told Kirton the only way the prosecution would consent to have Hinckley not testify at the preliminary hearing would be for the defense to agree to stipulate to what the prosecution wanted Hinckley to testify about if he were present: that he bought the Stowell letter from Hofmann on a certain date for a given price. Kirton and Hinckley asked Stott if he would broach the subject with the defense, and he agreed to do so. (Victims, pages 255-256)

President Hinckley finally got his way and did not have to testify at the preliminary hearing. Robert Lindsey wrote the following regarding Hinckley’s escape from testifying at the hearing:

To most members of the prosecution team, it was plain that Mark Hofmann had blackmailed the church. It was equally clear that leaders of the church were terrified that Gordon B. Hinckley would be required to testify against him and would be forced to testify, under oath, about his dealings with Hofmann.

From the first weeks of the investigation, lawyers for the church sought to head off this possibility. . . . Shortly before the preliminary hearing was scheduled to begin, David Biggs and Bob Stott met with Hinckley. . . .

Hinckley said it was not in the best interests of the church that he be subpoenaed to testify at the preliminary hearing . . . He had far more important things to do as a member of the First Presidency’s Office than to appear in court; Hofmann’s hearing was insignificant compared with the important challenges that he faced in his job . . .

Gordon Hinckley was not summoned as a witness after all.

Judge Grant, a devout Mormon, later attributed his absence to the trial attorneys’ concern for Hinckley’s health. But church spokesmen said Hinckley was not ill, and in fact the reasons were more complex than that. Ron Yengich, Hofmann’s lawyer, was no more eager to have the leader of the church that dominated the community raise the specter of his having been blackmailed by his client than the church wanted a man close to its Prophet to appear to have been blackmailed.

Yengich agreed to accept a statement—a stipulation . . . (A Gathering of Saints, pages 311, 318)

The stipulation itself proves to be embarrassing to the church now that it is known that President Hinckley knew about the rediscovery of the McLellin collection before the stipulation was entered into. According to Richard Turley, the “stipulation, which Biggs noted was ‘prepared and signed by Mr. Yengich and Mr. Stott,’ identified Gordon Hinckley and stated that he met with Hofmann sometime between January 11 and 14, 1983 . . . Finally, it stated that Hinckley ‘has never seen nor possessed nor has any knowledge of the whereabouts of a document or a group of documents known as the McLellin Collection’.” (Victims, page 303)

It is clear, then, that notwithstanding the fact that President Hinckley was fully aware of the rediscovery of the McLellin collection, both the prosecution and the defense understood him to say he never knew anything about any “group of documents known as the McLellin Collection.”

Richard Turley tries to minimize the importance of this by saying that the stipulation was “read into the [court] record without Hinckley ever seeing it. Had he reviewed it, Hinckley could have revised the stipulation to reflect the church’s discovery of McLellin materials in its possession” (Ibid.). The reader will notice that while Turley says that Gordon B. Hinckley “could have revised the stipulation,” he does not go so far as to say that he “would” have revised it. In any case, it is clear that President Hinckley not only refused to provide the important information about the McLellin collection to the prosecution, but his statements made to those who took part in the stipulation led them to believe that he had absolutely no knowledge of the location of any McLellin material.

A DANGEROUS GAMBLE

In holding back the McLellin collection from investigators, the Mormon Church was taking a real risk. As we stressed earlier, Richard Turley admitted that the collection included “a key item” which convinced church leaders “Hofmann was a fraud.” Moreover, Turley acknowledged that this “key item” was “relevant to the case.” This raises a very important question: what if the suppression of the McLellin collection by church leaders made it impossible for prosecutors to get Hofmann bound over for trial? If prosecutors had failed to make a strong enough case, we could have had a cold-blooded murderer walking the streets of Salt Lake City today. Although there is no way of knowing for certain, it is reasonable to believe that Hofmann might murder again.

If church leaders were convinced that Hofmann was a fraud after learning about the McLellin collection, why was Judge Grant not allowed to see this highly significant part of the evidence?

Richard Turley explains that the church hoped that the prosecutors had sufficient evidence without the church revealing the discovery of the McLellin collection: “If the prosecution’s evidence was as strong as some sources had hinted, the preliminary hearing would almost certainly result in Hofmann’s being bound over for trial” (Victims, page 251). Turley, however, tries to show that the church did not have an inside track on what was going on in the Salt Lake County Attorney’s Office: “The cautious distance being kept between church headquarters and investigators meant church officials remained largely unaware of the direction the investigation was taking, except to the extent they could piece together clues from media reports, subpoenas, and other sources” (Ibid.).

Turley reports that on February 6, 1986, Apostle Dallin Oaks expressed doubts regarding the prosecution’s ability to prevail: “Dallin Oaks, who viewed the case with his extensive legal background, began to wonder about the adequacy of the murder case against Hofmann and about whether, even at this late date, the prosecution had filed its charges prematurely. ‘I hope the prosecution has more evidence on the murder charges than the newspaper speculation has hinted,’ he confided in his journal” (Ibid., page 243).

It is certainly deplorable that church leaders would take such a gamble with regard to a person charged with two murders just so they could protect the church’s image. On page 251, Turley tries to justify this by making this strange statement: “Because a preliminary hearing was not a trial to determine ultimate guilt or innocence, state law would allow prosecutors to try again if they failed during the first hearing to prove probable cause.” Turley seems to be hinting that if the prosecutors did not succeed the first time around, the Mormon Church could bring forth the McLellin collection and a second preliminary hearing could be conducted.

Does Mr. Turley realize the implications of what he is suggesting? The preliminary hearing extended over five weeks causing great pain to the relatives of the victims. In addition, it cost a great deal of money. It seems hard to believe that if prosecutors were unsuccessful in their first attempt to bind Hofmann over for trial, that church leaders would have stepped forward with the McLellin collection. The church was already very upset with the bad publicity it had received. In the Messenger for September 1987, page 8, we quoted Apostle Dallin Oaks as saying: “In the course of this episode, we have seen some of the most sustained and intense LDS Church-bashing since the turn of the century. . . . the Church and its leaders have been easy marks for assertions and innuendo ranging from charges of complicity in murder to repeated recitals that the Church routinely acquires and suppresses church history documents in order to deceive its members and the public.”

If church leaders had come forth with the McLellin collection after an unsuccessful preliminary hearing, it would have caused a far greater outcry than they encountered during the early investigation of the bombings. The church would have been accused of covering up and protecting a murderer to save face with the public. A second preliminary hearing would have probably taken a good deal of time to schedule and complete. In the meantime a murderer would have been running loose. Furthermore, investigators and prosecutors would have been incensed at church leaders who had hidden a “key item” from them. Many of them were already upset with the church’s lack of cooperation. Fortunately, Judge Grant did find there was enough evidence to warrant a trial.

Richard Turley makes this peculiar statement regarding the period after the hearing: “When the curtain closed on the preliminary hearing, church officials . . . anticipated a long intermission before the next acts began in the legal drama. While waiting for the curtain to rise again, they continued to cooperate with investigators and prosecutors gathering evidence in the case” (Victims, page 307). How Turley can convince himself that the church was cooperating when they were withholding one of the most important pieces of evidence is very difficult to understand. That church leaders would continue to hide this vital information from investigators is almost beyond belief.

THE PLEA BARGAIN

The new information about the suppression of the McLellin collection also raises questions regarding the plea bargain which finally ended the Hofmann case without a trial. It seems obvious that church leaders did not want the case to go to trial and were hoping that some kind of agreement could be reached. Although President Hinckley managed to maneuver his way out of testifying at the preliminary hearing, he probably would have been called as a witness at the trial. Hinckley would have been very uncomfortable testifying concerning the McLellin collection when he knew that it was being suppressed in the First Presidency’s vault. Furthermore, Glenn Rowe knew about the rediscovery and it seems likely that he would be called as a witness.

If prosecutors had an airtight case they probably would have sought the death penalty and would not have agreed to the type of plea bargain they entered into. Although we may never know for certain, the fact that the church refused to provide important evidence it had in its possession may have made the prosecutors more willing to accept the agreement and cancel the trial.

SERIOUS IMPLICATIONS

The suppressive actions of the top leaders of the Mormon Church have done more damage to the church than the “enemies of the church” could have done in many years. It is going to be very difficult to sweep this matter under the rug. Their actions will undoubtedly haunt the church for many years to come.

As stated earlier, in 1908 Joseph F. Smith, the sixth prophet of the church, ordered that the McLellin collection be purchased by the church to keep it “from falling into unfriendly hands.” If President Smith had made the collection available to researchers instead of suppressing it, its contents would have been known by researchers and Mark Hofmann never could have claimed to have the collection because scholars would have known that it was in the church archives. Consequently, Steven Christensen would not have become involved in trying to obtain the collection from Hofmann and Christensen and Kathleen Sheets would probably be alive today.

In trying to keep Hofmann’s purported McLellin collection from falling into unfriendly hands, Hugh Pinnock followed in the footsteps of President Smith and opened the way for the tragedy when he arranged a loan of $185,000 for Hofmann to purchase the imaginary collection.

As if this is not bad enough, when church leaders discovered the real collection, they were so embarrassed that they kept it hidden from investigators. This conspiracy of silence forced investigators to spend untold hours trying to pin down the truth about the collection. If the church had been forthcoming about the matter, investigators could have spent this time in pursuing more profitable areas. The church’s silence concerning this matter definitely hurt prosecutors and left them with a weaker hand in their dealings with Hofmann’s lawyers.

While it is true that the General Authorities of the Mormon Church have preached openness, honesty and trust in God from the pulpit, when it came right down to it some of the very highest leaders of the church were unable to live up to the lofty teachings they have set forth. They apparently did not believe that the God they serve was able to handle the embarrassing situation the church found itself in. Therefore, they proceeded to protect the church with their own strategy. In their attempt to save the church, they gave an advantage to a man whom they knew was a desperate criminal who was charged with murder. Their behavior with regard to this matter did not match up with their twelfth Article of Faith: “We believe in being subject to kings, presidents, rulers, and magistrates, in obeying, honoring, and sustaining the law.”

While it is true that they did not receive a subpoena for the McLellin collection, it was only because they kept its existence well hidden from the prosecution. Now that this information has come to light, the actions of these leaders speak louder than their words. The message seems to be that the church’s image is more important than the truth, even to the point of withholding key evidence in a murder investigation! We feel that this is a terrible example to set before the youth of the church.
WHAT’S IN THE VAULT?

While Richard Turley stresses the cooperation by church officials during the investigation, the evidence seems to provide a different story. Robert Lindsey relates the following:

. . . Salt Lake City detective Jim Bell spoke at a meeting that had been called to review what detectives knew . . . He said he suspected the church was concealing information about Hofmann and the murders.

“They’re hiding something; the church is doing everything it can to make this as difficult as possible. I’ve never seen anything like this in a homicide investigation.” (A Gathering of Saints, page 236)

Lindsey went on to say that “many of the investigators” felt “that they were being stonewalled by leaders of the church” (Ibid.). On pages 268-269 of the same book, we find this information:

The salamander letter and several other documents Hofmann had sold to the church were still in Washington at the FBI laboratory. When Ted Cannon [Salt Lake County Attorney] pressed the church to let his investigators look at the originals of those that were still in Salt Lake City, a lawyer for the church said that would be impossible, because some of the documents were extremely confidential and the church did not want to risk having them made public.

Cannon said that if the church declined to provide the documents voluntarily, he would subpoena them - and indeed, he subsequently did so. But, to head off a court fight over the subpoena, Cannon surrendered to a demand by the church’s lawyers to keep the substance of the documents a secret.

“The content and meaning and interpretations to be placed upon what is iterated within the documents,” Cannon wrote to Wilford Kirton, the church’s lawyer, “is either immaterial or of secondary concern as far as this investigation is concerned. . . . every reasonable measure will be employed to secure not only the documents themselves, but the contents thereof, from scrutiny or discussion by anyone outside the authorized investigative team. . . .”

Cannon agreed to let church officials maintain a sign-in/sign-out log identifying everyone who examined the documents and agreed with the church’s demands that members of his staff would have to turn over to the church all notes, photocopies, photographs and negatives made during examination of the documents. Cannon ended his letter with an expression of thanks for the church’s cooperation, a clause that brought snickers from many of those in the War Room [i.e., the room where investigators met to discuss strategy in the Hofmann investigation].

Richard Turley acknowledges that there were some problems regarding documents the prosecution wanted and goes so far as to say that at one point Church leaders were preparing to resist a subpoena:

The next morning, [Apostle] Dallin Oaks telephoned Rowe . . . Rowe described the burden the request imposed on the Historical Department and the risks it posed to the 261 books and manuscripts involved. Oaks, in turn, wrote to Thomas Monson of the First Presidency about the request. “It would be a very large burden and risk for the Church to produce 261 books and manuscripts, or to copy them,” Oaks observed. He also doubted the investigators really needed all they were seeking. He recommended that the church go to court to resist the subpoena, even though “our differences with the County Attorney would then become public.” After drafting the letter, Oaks received a telephone call from his fellow Historical Department adviser, [Apostle] Boyd Packer . . . Hinckley and Packer both backed Oak’s recommendation. (Victims, page 248)

As it turned out, the Mormon Church did not go to court to resist any of the subpoenas, but it did impose very unusual restrictions on the use of its documents. This quibbling with investigators over access to documents undoubtedly cost prosecutors a good deal of time that could have been spent on more important matters.

Michael P. George, of the county attorney’s office, felt that President Hinckley was not telling the truth about his dealings with Hofmann. On page 224 of his book, Richard Turley provided this information:

In response to other questions, Hinckley said he knew of no dealings between Hofmann and general authorities of the church beyond those already mentioned. Mike George later explained that “what we were talking about at that time was other dealings involving Hofmann in regards to documents being sold to members of the First Presidency.” When Hinckley said he knew of no others, George did not believe him.

Hinckley answered based on his recollections, supplemented by information provided him by Francis Gibbons and Glenn Rowe. Two pieces of information had eluded church officials, however, in their attempts to reconstruct Hofmann’s dealings with the church. They recalled that the Grandin printing contract had been purchased by the Historical Department using funds provided by the First Presidency. Later research would convince them, however, that the transaction itself was closed in Hinckley’s office.

The other elusive item was the Bullock-Young letter. Hofmann had given it free to Hinckley for the church . . . In the more than four years that had elapsed since the gift, Hinckley had forgotten about it . . . Later, Gibbons would rediscover the Bullock-Young letter and bring it to Hinckley’s attention, but on December 9, 1985, when George and Farnsworth interviewed him, the document had been forgotten.

The Bullock letter was a very controversial Hofmann forgery which church leaders assumed was authentic and suppressed in the First Presidency’s vault. Mark Hofmann had previously sold the Mormon Church a document he had forged in which Joseph Smith blessed his son, Joseph Smith III. According to former Church Archivist Donald Schmidt, Hofmann received material from the archives which was valued “in the neighborhood of $20,000” for the blessing document. This blessing indicated that Joseph Smith III was the prophet’s true successor, not Brigham Young.

In the letter to President Brigham Young, Thomas Bullock indicated that he would not turn over the blessing because he feared Young would destroy it. Bullock told Young that he did not have “licence to destroy every remnant of the blessing which he received from his Father...I will not, nay I can not, surrender that blessing, knowing what its certain fate will be if returned . . .” (Victims, page 61).

This letter tended to put Brigham Young in a very bad light, and therefore Mormon leaders felt it must be suppressed. Turley relates that Mark Hofmann brought the Bullock-Young letter directly to President Gordon B. Hinckley:

After Hinckley read the document, Hofmann said he was a believing, active Latter-day Saint, that he wanted to give the original document to Hinckley, and that he did not want to blackmail the church . . . Hinckley asked, “Are you telling me that you wish to give this document to the Church without cost?”
President Hinckley was obviously fooled by Mark Hofmann’s clever attempt to make him believe he was a faithful Mormon. Since Hofmann told him that he had not even retained a copy of the letter for himself, Hinckley apparently thought that he could hide it in the First Presidency’s vault and that it would never be brought to light.

It seems unlikely that Hinckley would have forgotten such an important transaction with Hofmann. In any case, Richard Turley gives this information about the matter on pages 232-233 of his book:

Also on January 8, Francis Gibbons transferred to Dean Larsen the original and a typescript of the Bullock-Young letter, which Gibbons had rediscovered. . . . It was overlooked until Gibbons happened across it.

The rediscovery of the letter put church officials in an awkward position. Because the letter had been forgotten, it had not been mentioned in the church’s news conference or in previous interviews with investigators. Undoubtedly, its discovery would subject church officials to ridicule. Despite the likelihood of criticism, however, Hinckley directed Gibbons to turn the letter over to investigators. In his memorandum to Larsen, Francis Gibbons wrote, “The brethren understand you will make this letter available to the Salt Lake County Attorney under a subpoena which has been served on the Church to produce all documents in its possession received from Mark W. Hofmann . . .”

Michael George, of the county attorney’s office, was rather upset when he learned of the existence to the Thomas Bullock letter. In A Gathering of Saints, page 274, Robert Lindsey reports what happened when the “rediscovery” of the letter became known:

After being issued a subpoena, the church had released to Throckmorton and Flynn what it said were all of the documents it had acquired from Hofmann since 1980, including some that it had previously kept secret.

When the First Presidency’s Vault yielded the letter presented to Gordon Hinckley by Hofmann in which Thomas Bullock accused Brigham Young of having tried to destroy the Blessing of Joseph Smith III, it caught the War Room by surprise.

“What else are they hiding?” Michael George demanded. “None of the church historians I’ve talked to — Don Schmidt, Leonard Arrington, Dean Jesse — even knew this existed. They’ve never heard of it. What else do they have? Who knows what’s in the First Presidency’s Vault?”

Now that we know that the McLellin collection was also hidden in the First Presidency’s vault, Michael George’s question concerning what else is in the vault seems almost prophetic.

Mormon leaders were not only uncooperative with investigators when it came to providing historical documents, but they were secretive regarding other matters as well. The book, Mormon Murders, claimed that a detective by the name of John Foster wanted to get a copy of a page from “the Church Administration Building log” which showed Hofmann had come to the church offices on a certain day. According to Naifeh and Smith, when Foster “went to pick up the photocopy, every entry except the one relating to Hofmann had been whitened out . . . giving police no way to determine if relevant entries had been whitened out along with irrelevant ones” (page 302).

Richard Turley, on the other hand, maintained that “the log photocopy attached to Foster’s police report has no whitened-out entries. Investigative Information Memo #840 . . .” (Victims, page 439, footnote 1). After making this point, however, Turley turns right around and says that “there was one Administrative Building log page on which extraneous entries were whitened out before being given to police. It was a page for October 15, 1985, that was furnished to investigators who asked when Hofmann met with [Apostle] Dallin Oaks on that day. The unmasked entry answered their question, and they did not ask to see the other entries, which had been whitened out because they were irrelevant to the question and because church officials felt ethically bound to protect church visitors’ privacy unless required by investigators to do otherwise” (Ibid., pages 439-40).

That the Mormon Church would find it necessary to hide such information from the police is certainly strange. We would expect that type of reaction from the CIA or the FBI, but to have a church which proclaims that it operates “in full light” with “no secrecy about its doctrine, aim, or purpose” behave in such a manner makes one rather curious as to what is really going on. It also seems strange that there was no attempt to force the church leaders to produce the original log. While there may not have been anything else of importance in the log, the fact that most of the material was deleted would make one wonder if Hofmann met with Apostle Oaks more than once on the day of the two murders or if other important figures involved with Hofmann or the McLellin transaction were in Oaks’ office that day. The entire log book should have been subpoenaed and thoroughly examined for all meetings between church leaders and Hofmann as well as others who were in any way associated with Hofmann’s document deals. We seriously doubt that other people in Salt Lake City would have received the preferential treatment which the LDS leaders received in the Hofmann investigation.

At any rate, on page 247 of his book, Richard Turley admits that this was not the only time that the church “removed or masked information” provided to investigators:

When Mike George delivered one [subpoena] the next day, the county’s request had expanded to “any records, check slips, logs, cards, or other documentation of visits to the LDS Church Historical Archives and the documents, books, catalogs, letters, information, etc” that Hofmann and five others had used since 1975. . . .

The next day, February 20, a county investigator delivered a subpoena to the church’s Missionary Department asking for missionary records pertaining to Hofmann and one of his associates. . . . library circulation records and missionary records dealt with living individuals and thus raised issues of privacy that were hot topics among legal scholars, librarians, and archivists across the United States. Church officials felt a responsibility to comply with the subpoenas while at the same time fulfilling their legal and ethical responsibility to safeguard the privacy of living individuals. Thus in responding to requests for information, officials sometimes removed or masked information not specifically required by the investigators. When Kirton received the missionary records, he reviewed them and eliminated portions not required by the subpoena. . . . On February 27, Kirton sent the screened materials on to the county.

Although the tide of Richard Turley’s book begins with the word Victims, it is basically the story of only one victim, the Mormon Church. The story of the real victims of the tragedy seems to be glossed over. While we have to agree that the church was a victim of Mark Hofmann’s devious plans, we feel that Richard Turley, Apostle Dallin Oaks and other church officials have painted a role of martyrdom which does not fit with the facts.

When a person carefully examines the evidence, it becomes evident that church leaders shot themselves in the foot. The Mormon church hierarchy must accept a great deal of blame for the tone of the books and articles which have tended to embarrass the church. The fact that church leaders alienated a significant number of the investigators who worked on the Hofmann case with their secrecy and lack of cooperation seems to have made a very negative impression on the authors who interviewed them.

It seems that the Mormon leaders and the investigators were on a collision course from the day of the bombings. Church officials felt that in order to prevent embarrassment to the church they had to remain as quiet as possible about the McLellin collection Hofmann had dreamed up and the role Hofmann, Christensen and Sorenson were playing in its suppression. The investigators, on the other hand, needed this very information to solve the murder case. Although the Mormon leaders’ main concern seems to have been to protect the church and themselves from embarrassment, they ended up obstructing the investigation, wasting the valuable time of investigators and, consequently, delaying the arrest of the murderer.

TESTING THE PROPHETS

If the leaders of the Mormon Church did not make such extravagant claims concerning their prophetic ability to detect and fight off evil influences, it might be easier to accept the idea that they were martyrs in the Hofmann scandal. Joseph Smith, the first Mormon prophet, maintained that in his youth he had seen a vision of both God and Christ. In this vision he was told that all other churches were corrupt. The following statement by Smith is taken from the Pearl of Great Price, one of the four standard works of the church:

...I asked the Personages who stood above me in the light, which of all the sects was right... and which I should join. I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt; that: “they draw near to me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me, they teach for doctrines the commandments of men, having a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof.” He again forbade me to join with any of them... (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History 1:18-20)

Mormon leaders teach that all other churches are in a state of apostasy, More than fifty pages of the Introduction to the History of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are devoted to proving that all churches except the Mormon Church are in apostasy. The following is found on page XL: “Nothing less than a complete apostasy from the Christian religion would warrant the establishment of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.” Church members are taught that only men who hold the Mormon priesthood have the authority to administer in the ordinances of the gospel. Consequently, those who perform baptisms in other churches do not operate with any authority and such baptisms are invalid in the sight of God.

The Mormons, as we have pointed out, claim to be led by revelation from God. Apostle Bruce R. McConkie made these claims regarding Mormon revelation:

Our Lord’s true Church is established and founded upon revelation. Its identity as the true Church continues as long as revelation is received to direct its affairs... without revelation there would be no legal administrators to perform the ordinances of salvation with binding effect on earth and in heaven... Since The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is the Lord’s true Church; and since the Lord’s Church must be guided by continuous revelation... we could safely conclude... that the Church today is guided by revelation... the Spirit is giving direct and daily revelation to the Presiding Brethren in the administration of the affairs of the Church... The presence of revelation in the Church is positive proof that it is the kingdom of God on earth. ... For those who reject these revelations there awaits the damnation of hell. (Mormon Doctrine, 1979, pages 646, 647, 650)

Apostle McConkie also stated: “Members of the First Presidency, Council of the Twelve, and the Patriarch to the Church—because they are appointed and sustained as prophets, seers, and revelators to the Church—are known as the living oracles.” (Ibid., page 547)

Unfortunately for church leaders, Mark Hofmann has put the claim of revelation in the church to the acid test and found that the “living oracles” are just as fallible as other men. Because of this, President Hinckley, Apostle Oaks and other Mormon leaders find themselves in a very embarrassing position. At a time when revelation was really needed, they seemed to be completely in the dark as to what was going on.

In his youth Mark Hofmann undoubtedly was taught that Mormon Church leaders were led by revelation and had the gift of discernment to detect deceivers. The prophet Joseph Smith, in fact, claimed he received a revelation from God himself warning him that his enemies were falsifying an important religious document (see Doctrine and Covenants, Section 10). Hofmann, however, finally came to the conclusion that the church was not led by revelation and that he could even deceive the “living prophets” and the top Mormon scholars. In his confession, Mr. Hofmann said that he could “look someone in the eye and lie” and didn’t believe that “someone could be inspired” in a religious sense as to what “my feelings or thoughts were.” He claimed that he “had lost faith in the Mormon Church” and that he “wasn’t fearful of the Church inspiration detecting the forgery.” (Hofmann’s Confession, pages 99, 112)

Not only did church leaders fail to forsee through revelation the threat Hofmann presented to the church, but they completely ignored the many warnings about Hofmann’s documents which began appearing in our newsletter about eighteen months before the bombings. In Victims, page 89, Richard Turley commented about this matter: “Surprisingly, the article [in the Salt Lake City Messenger, March 1984] concluded, “While we would really like to believe that the [Salamander] letter attributed to Harris is authentic, we do not feel that we can endorse it until further evidence comes forth...” ” The Los Angeles Times, August 25, 1984, reported that “The Tanners suggestion of forgery has surprised some Mormons, who note that the parallels in wording... could be taken as evidence of authenticity.” Thirteen months before the murders, September 1, 1984, the church’s own Deseret News printed the fact that “outspoken Mormon Church critics Jerald and Sandra Tanner suspect the document is a forgery, they told the Deseret News.” In an article published in the New York Times after the bombings, Robert Lindsey wrote:

In a newsletter that he publishes with his wife, Sandra, Mr. Tanner began raising questions about their authenticity, in some cases comparing the texts with known Mormon writings. But if senior Mormon officials were aware of his warnings, they apparently paid little attention. Several of the church’s highest officials have acknowledged negotiating to acquire documents from Mr. Hofmann until the day of the first two bombings. (New York Times, February 16, 1986)

Richard Lindsey has a quotation from Hugh Pinnock, the Mormon General Authority who was working on the McLellin transaction, which indicates that church leaders still believed in Hofmann two or three days after the bombings. Writing on April 17, 1986, Pinnock observed: “It seems that Hofmann has left a trail of evidence. The only effective manner to understand this situation is to realize that M[ark] H[ofmann] was well considered before 10-17 or 18th even though he fooled us all. M[ark] H[ofmann] did not internalize the gospel.” (Victims, page 271)

Apostle Dallin Oaks met with Mark Hofmann just hours after he had killed Kathleen Sheets and Steven Christensen. Oaks never suspected that Hofmann was involved in the bombings and encouraged him to go on with the McLellin transaction. On page 153 of Victims, Richard Turley wrote: “Oaks asked Hofmann if he still intended to proceed with the closing on the collection . . . Oaks told him he ought to get in touch with David E. West, Sorensen’s attorney, who would doubtless wonder how Christensen’s death would affect the transaction. . . . Oaks thanked Hofmann for his work in discovering church documents and for his willingness to sell the McLellin collection to someone ‘friendly to the church.’”

Apostle Oaks later made a feeble attempt to explain why church leaders were unable to detect Hofmann’s evil plans (see Confessions of a White Salamander, page 64). He commented: “But why, some still ask, were his deceits not detected by the several Church leaders with whom he met?” Oaks maintained that Church leaders “cannot be suspicious and questioning” of the many people they meet with every year and noted that if “they fail to detect a few deceivers . . . that is the price they pay to increase their effectiveness in counseling, comforting, and blessing the hundreds of honest and sincere people they see.”

Apostle Oaks never really answered the question. Mark Hofmann was not meeting with church leaders for “counseling, comforting, and blessing.” He was meeting with them for the express purpose of deceiving them so that they would give him large amounts of money and authentic documents in exchange for his fraudulent documents. Furthermore, he had many visits with high Mormon officials. These meetings went on for years, yet church leaders were unable to discern the wicked plan that Hofmann had in his heart.

While the Mormon leaders claim to have the same powers as the ancient apostles in the Bible, their performance with regard to Mark Hofmann certainly did not match up to that of Apostle Peter when he caught Ananias and Sapphira red-handed in their attempt to deceive the church with regard to a financial transaction: “But Peter said, Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost, and to keep back part of the price of the land?” (Acts 5:3).

In a revelation given by Joseph Smith on March 8, 1831, the Lord warned against being “seduced by evil spirits, or doctrines of devils. . . . beware lest ye are deceived; and that ye may not be deceived seek ye earnestly the best gifts . . . it is given by the Holy Ghost to some to know the diversities of operations . . . to others the discerning of spirits. . . . And to the bishop of the church, and unto such as God shall appoint . . . are to have it given unto them to discern all those gifts lest there shall be any among you professing and yet be not of God” (Doctrine and Covenants 46:7, 8, 16, 23, 27).

Mormon Apostle Bruce R. McConkie proclaimed that church leaders did have the gift of discernment: . . . the gift of the discerning of spirits is poured out upon presiding officials in God’s kingdom; they have it given to them to discern all gifts and all spirits, lest any come among the saints and practice deception. . . . There is no perfect operation of the power of discernment without revelation. Thereby even ‘the thoughts and intents of the heart’ are made known. . . . Where the saints are concerned . . . the Lord expects them to discern, not only between the righteous and the wicked, but between false and true philosophies, educational theories, sciences, political concepts and social schemes. (Mormon Doctrine, page 197)

It would seem that if these powers were really functioning in the church today, the “Prophet, Seer and Revelator” would have received a revelation warning him concerning Mark Hofmann’s “cunning plan” to defraud and disgrace the church. Furthermore, a revelation regarding his deception would have prevented two people from dying.

Spencer W. Kimball, who was the prophet and president of the church at the time Hofmann first began deceiving church leaders, was supposed to be a “seer” and have the power to “translate all records that are of ancient date” (Book of Mormon, Mosiah 8:13). The Book of Mormon also says that “a seer is greater than a prophet . . . a seer is a revelator and a prophet also; and a gift which is greater can no man have . . . a seer can know of things which are past, and also of things which are to come, and by them shall all things be revealed, or, rather, shall secret things be made manifest, and hidden things shall come to light. . . .” (Mosiah 8: 15-17).

When Mark Hofmann brought the forged Anthon transcript, which was supposed to contain characters Joseph Smith copied from the gold plates of the Book of Mormon, President Kimball was unable to translate the characters. Instead of using the “seer stone,” he examined the characters which appear on the transcript with a magnifying glass. Not only did he fail to provide a translation, but he was unable to detect that the church was being set up to be defrauded of a large amount of money and many historical items out of its archives. Moreover, he entirely failed to see the devastating and embarrassing effect this transaction and others which followed would have on the Mormon Church. If ever revelation from the Lord was needed, it was on that day in 1980 when Mark Hofmann stood in the presence of President Kimball.

As President Kimball grew older, he became less able to function and President Gordon B. Hinckley took over many of his responsibilities and became to all appearances the acting president of the church. Hinckley, who posed with Mark Hofmann, President Kimball and other church leaders in a photograph taken in 1980, was also deceived on a number of occasions by Mr. Hofmann. He, together with Apostle Boyd K. Packer (also shown in the picture), approved many of the deals the church made with Hofmann.

It appears that if the Mormon Church was ever led by revelation, it has been lacking since Mark Hofmann came into the church offices with the Anthon transcript. The inability of Mormon leaders to detect the religious fraud perpetrated upon them raises a question with regard to their testimony regarding the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. After all, if they could not determine that Hofmann’s documents—which were supposed to be only 150 years old—were forgeries, how can we trust their judgment with regard to a record which is supposed to be ten times as old?

The reader will remember that Apostle McConkie maintained that “the Spirit is giving direct and daily revelation to the presiding Brethren in the administration of the affairs of the Church.” One would think that if such revelation was in operation, Mark Hofmann would have been exposed years before the bombings. With regard to the inability of the Mormon leaders to detect that the Hofmann documents were fraudulent, a person might argue that these documents were not really important spiritual writings, and therefore the Lord did not see fit to intervene when the General Authorities examined them. The truth of the matter, however, is that they contained extremely important material directly relating to spiritual affairs. The Salamander letter, for example, changed the story of the Angel Moroni appearing to Joseph Smith to that of a cantankerous and tricky “old spirit” who transformed himself from a white salamander and struck Joseph Smith. Mormon Apostle Dallin Oaks tried to reconcile the Salamander letter with Joseph Smith’s account by saying: “One wonders why so many writers neglected to reveal to their readers that there is another meaning of ‘salamander,’ which may even have been the primary meaning. . . . That meaning . . . is ‘a mythical being thought to be able to live in fire.’ . . . A being that is able to live in fire is a good approximation of the description Joseph Smith gave of the Angel Moroni . . . the use of the words white salamander and old spirit seem understandable.” (“1985 CES Doctrine and Covenants Symposium,” pages 22-23) After the Salamander letter was proclaimed a forgery, Apostle Oaks must have been very embarrassed that he ever made such an outlandish statement.

Significantly, some of the purported Joseph Smith writings which Hofmann sold to the church contain revelations from the Lord himself. For instance, the Joseph Smith III Blessing document gives this message from the Lord: “Verily, thus saith the Lord: if he abides in me, his days shall be lengthened upon the earth, but, if he abides not in me, I, the Lord will receive him, in an instant, unto myself.”

Mark Hofmann also forged an 1838 Joseph Smith letter to his brother, Hyrum, which the Mormon Church purchased in 1983. This letter was in its entirety a revelation purporting to come from the Lord. It begins with the words, “Verily thus Saith the Lord,” and ends with the word “Amen.” The fact that Mormon leaders were not able to recognize the spurious nature of these revelations casts doubt upon their ability to discern the truthfulness of the other revelations given by Joseph Smith.

The church has always claimed that it is virtually impossible for a person to write a revelation that would compare with Joseph Smith’s. It now appears, however, that there is someone who can write revelations comparable to Joseph Smith’s and that it is even possible to get them past the scrutiny of the highest leadership of the Mormon Church.

As we have noted earlier, another thing that shows the church’s lack of revelation in times of crisis is the way the rediscovery of the McLellin collection was handled. President Spencer W. Kimball died about three weeks after the bombings, and Ezra Taft Benson became the 13th prophet on November 10, 1986. It was only four months after Benson became president of the church that the McLellin collection was found in the First Presidency’s vault. On page 250 of his book, Richard Turley affirms that this information was reported to the First Presidency in March 1986.

One would think that at this vital period in the church’s history President Benson, “the living prophet,” would have had the insight to inform the other members of the First Presidency that the McLellin collection must be made available to investigators. Instead of Benson receiving the word of the Lord to point the church in the proper way, it seems that the heavens were silent and the Mormon leaders were left to their own devices. While there are probably some Mormons who would suggest that President Benson was led by the Lord to suppress the discovery, we believe that most members of the church would feel that such an idea would be unthinkable.

Some may excuse Benson’s failure in this matter by saying that he was too advanced in age to deal with such problems. While there may be some truth in such an argument (he was 86 years old at that time and just recently turned 93), this explanation does not provide much comfort to the faithful. If Benson is not really capable of leading the church through revelation, who is in control? Although there were six General Authorities in the Mormon Church who were informed about this matter, none of them stepped forward to help investigators!

Although Apostle Dallin Oaks would have us believe that “Criticism is particularly objectionable when it is directed toward Church authorities,” there seems to be no way to get around the fact that they must bear a great deal of the responsibility in the Hofmann affair. If they had been open and forthright about historical documents, Mr. Hofmann would not have approached them with his blackmail-like documents with the idea of filling his pockets with the church’s money. Hofmann’s knowledge of the fact that church leaders were anxious to keep anything embarrassing from falling into the hands of church critics set the stage for the tragic events which followed.

We understand that Lynn Packer, the man who brought to light the story concerning Paul Dunn’s deception, was working on the story concerning the rediscovery of the McLellin even before we became aware of it. It is reported that his article on the subject may appear in the November issue of Utah Holiday magazine. We are looking forward to this article.

THE WARNKE PROBLEM

In our book, Satanic Ritual Abuse and Mormonism, we wrote the following: “While we have been aware of the influence of the occult for many years, we were always somewhat suspicious of some of the tales of ex-Satanists. We have always tried to be very cautious about accepting stories concerning conspiracies unless strong evidence could be marshaled to support the accusations. We have seen too many people make the mistake of leveling serious accusations against individuals and organizations without carefully considering all of the facts” (page 1). Unfortunately, we have learned that there is a serious question with regard to Mike Warnke’s story regarding his involvement in Satanism. Warnke is a noted Christian comedian who wrote the book, The Satan Seller. Mr. Warnke claimed that he became a satanic high priest and had 1,500 followers! Warnke, in fact, claimed to be working for the Illuminati.

Christian writers Jon Trott and Mike Hertenstein, who have done extensive research concerning Mike Warnke’s life, claim that they were unable to verify his claims concerning Satanism. They, in fact, feel they have evidence to disprove his published statements. They note, for example, that he started attending San Bernardino Valley College on September 13, 1965, and then make this observation: “Mike writes in The Satan Seller that it was after he started college that he first was introduced to drugs, sex, and finally Satanism. And he continues, it was only after the Satanists threw him out of their coven that he joined the navy. Warnke’s military records say he entered the navy on June 2, 1966. Therefore, whatever happened in Mike’s life regarding Satanism had to have happened between September 13, 1965, and June 2, 1966” (Cornerstone, vol. 21, no. 98, page 9).
This, of course, gives Mike Warnke less than nine months to become a Satanist and advance to his high position in Satanism. Trott and Hertenstein quote the following from Warnke’s book, Schemes of Satan: “In my own case, being away from home at college and not having any close friends there meant that almost no one could have known what was happening to me except, of course, the members of the Satanic Brotherhood, and they were not telling!” (Ibid.) Trott and Hertenstein go on to reveal the following:

In reality, Mike Warnke simply did what countless other freshmen have done: he found a new circle of friends. We found that new circle, and they were not part of the Satanic Brotherhood. None of these people are mentioned by Warnke in The Satan Seller or anywhere else.

Greg Gilbert was one of Mike’s first and closest friends at college. . . . Greg reflects upon the notoriety of his old college roommate. “After Mike became a star, I assumed that since he had gotten this far with his Satan story, he’d always get away with it. I never knew what to do. Who could you tell?” . . .

Greg’s college girlfriend, Dawn Andrews, gave us her assessment. . . . “I remember how upset I was when The Satan Seller came out, because what Warnke said was a lie. He has a very fertile imagination.”

Dyana Credelitch was another of Mike Warnke’s college friends introduced by Greg. “After he got famous, I always wanted to write him a letter and say, Mike, remember me? The one you gave the silver cross to? When were you able to have this coven of fifteen hundred people? Don’t you remember, about the most exciting thing we used to do was play croquet in Greg’s backyard?” (Ibid.)

The same article points out that Mike Warnke became engaged to a woman after he entered college and that she knew nothing about his satanic activities:

> It was there that Lois Eckenrod, a girl who was soon to be his fiancée, joins the story. “Mike and I, met in September or October, that first semester at Valley,” Lois said. “It was only a couple of months before we got engaged. Hardly a day went by that we didn’t see each other.”

His friends remember Mike Warnke as thin, with . . . short hair . . . Yet Mike says in The Satan Seller that when college started . . . His hair, he writes, was already collar length. Within a short time, he claims to have become a full-fledged hippie: “I . . . bought some black pants and freaky shins. My hair was longer than ever, and I bleached it blond . . . ”

“He looked like everybody else,” says Greg. . . .

On his Mike Warnke Alive! album, Mike further claims: “I’d had hepatitis four times from shooting up with dirty needles. I had scabs all over my face from shooting up crystal. I was a speed freak. I weighed 110 pounds soaking wet. My skin had turned yellow. My hair was falling out. My teeth were rotting out of my head. I’d been pistol-whipped five or six times. My jaw had been broken. My nose had been almost ripped off. I had a bullet hole in my right leg. Two bullet holes in my left leg.”

Greg Gilbert and the others saw Mike on a daily basis, and say that it is totally impossible for Mike to have had hepatitis, facial scabs from injecting “crystal,” and wounds from being shot three times. “Without us knowing it? It’s a lie,” Greg says.

Lois’s reaction to Mike’s tale? “That’s just make-believe,” she states. “Mike never fell in with drugs . . . I was training to be a nurse, and I think I would have known if he was using drugs. I wouldn’t have dated Mike if he were drugged.” . . . Tim Smith . . . states he never saw Warnke with long hair or in the drug-induced emaciated state he claimed to be during that period . . .

By Christmas of 1965, Mike and Lois were seeing each other on a daily basis. “It was pretty fast that we said we were going to get married,” says Lois. “Within two or three months of school starting, he gave me a rose ring with a diamond in it. It cost $60. He had to make payments on it. . . .”

In The Satan Seller, Warnke has gone through his drugs, sex, and promotion to high priest before Christmas of 1965. . . . Shirley Schrader says Mike had Christmas dinner in Crestline with the family. “He didn’t seem emaciated by drugs to me,” she says. . . .

According to The Satan Seller, Mike Warnke’s reign as a satanic high priest ends, apparently sometime in the spring of 1966, when Warnke crumpled under the strain of too much responsibility and too many drugs. On a “Focus on the Family” radio broadcast, he described his appearance at this time: “I had white hair. It was about down to my belt . . . I had six-inch fingernails; I painted them black.” . . . On the Mike Warnke Alive! album he describes his hair length the night before boot camp: “It hit me just below the pockets.” He continues: “The night before I went to boot camp I went to this party. . . . I smoked a bunch of dope and ate a bunch of reds . . . the girl I was with decided the thing that would really be cute is if she braided my hair . . . She . . . braided it all together, and hung a jingle bell on the end of each braid.”

Lois says she was the girl who gave Mike his going-away party. When she heard this story for the first time in 1979, she was furious. “I couldn’t believe it when I heard that!” she says. “I’m the one who gave him the going-away party! We never touched drugs. He never had long hair—his hair was short, short, short!”

On page 8, Cornerstone has a photograph of Mike Warnke reportedly taken April 30, 1966. Instead of showing that he had white hair reaching down to his belt, it supports his fiancée’s claim that his hair “was short, short, short!”

The reader may wonder what effect the charges against Warnke will have on our views regarding Satanic ritual abuse. Actually, we have never cited Mike Warnke as an authority on this subject. Although we had no idea of the depths of the problem, we had heard there might be questions regarding his claims about Satanic involvement. Consequently, we did not consult his books in preparing our material.

Actually, Mike Warnke’s works present a problem with regard to the claim that human sacrifice takes place in Satanic rituals. When he was interviewed on The Oprah Winfrey Show, Warnke claimed he was never involved in such sacrifices:

> WINfrey: Did you witness killings?

Mr. WARNKE: No, I never did. *I never witnessed a human sacrifice . . . you just heard rumors of it even within the occult . . . (The Oprah Winfrey Show, September 30, 1986, Transcript #8607, pages 8-9)

While Mike Warnke claimed he had 1,500 followers in the satanic cult, he stated that he had no first-hand information about human sacrifice. For this reason the book, The Satanism Scare, page 130, uses Warnke as a witness against those who hold to the idea of satanic ritual abuse. If Mike Warnke was really involved in an important position in Satanism, his statement that he had no personal knowledge of human sacrifices might throw some doubt on the stories told by the survivors of satanic ritual abuse. Unless, however, Warnke can in some way overthrow the strong case that Cornerstone has built against him, his testimony concerning Satanism is of no value to either side of the controversy. Those who would like to know more about the Warnke problem can obtain a copy of Cornerstone, vol. 21, no. 98, for $2.00 from Cornerstone, 939 W. Wilson Ave., Chicago, IL 60640.
“WE HAVE NO KING BUT CAESAR”

In the Bible, we are told that when Pilate brought Jesus before his enemies, “they cried out, ‘Away with Him, away with Him! Crucify Him!’” Pilate said to them, ‘Shall I crucify your King?’ The chief priests answered, ‘We have no king but Caesar!’ So he delivered Him to them to be crucified. So they took Jesus and led him away” (New King James Version, John 19: 15-16).

Like the chief priests who lived almost 2,000 years ago, we are all confronted with the question of what we are going to do with Jesus. Are we going to receive him as the king of our lives or crucify him in our hearts? Jesus himself said: “He who is not with Me is against Me, and he who does not gather with Me scatters” (Matthew 12:30). God has given each of us a free will so that we can make our own decision. We can either fall down before him and cry out, “My Lord and my God” (John 20: 28), or we can be like those mentioned in a parable who said, “We will not have this man to reign over us” (Luke 19:1).

The Bible says there are eternal consequences involved in this decision. Speaking to those who questioned his divinity, Jesus said:

“He who believes in the Son has everlasting life; and he who does not believe the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abides on him.” (John 3:36)

In our natural condition we are not fit subjects for the kingdom of God. In Isaiah 59:1-2 we read:

Behold, the Lord’s hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; nor His ear heavy, that it cannot hear.
But your iniquities have separated you from your God; and your sins have hidden His face from you, so that He will not hear.

In his book, Plain Christianity, page 75, J. B. Phillips speaks of the gulf that separates us from God: “For the gulf between us and God is not merely an intellectual one—it is not that God is infinitely wise and we, by comparison, blundering fools, though that is true—but the real gulf lies in the moral realm. You and I, through our own sins and failures, as well as by the infection of the sins of other people, are separated from God by a moral gulf.”

In Romans 3:23 we find that “all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God.” Because of our sinful condition we do not know the personal God who wishes to have fellowship with us. Fortunately, however, God has prepared a way for our salvation through the death of Jesus Christ on the cross:

And you He made alive, who were dead in trespasses and sins, in which you once walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit who now works in the sons of disobedience, among whom also we all once conducted ourselves in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, and were by nature children of wrath, just as the others.

But God, who is rich in mercy, because of His great love with which He loved us, even when we were dead in trespasses, made us alive together with Christ (by grace you have been saved), and raised us up together, and made us sit together in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus, that in the ages to come He might show the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness toward us in Christ Jesus.

For by grace you have been saved through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God, not of works, lest anyone should boast.

For we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God prepared beforehand that we should walk in them. (Ephesians 2:1-10)

Although we usually think of the emperors of Rome when we hear the word “Caesar,” anything which controls our lives and keeps us from coming to the Lord could be considered to be as tyrannical to our soul as Caesar was to the people who lived in the Holy Land during the time of Jesus. When the Pharisees were trying to trick Jesus, they brought him a coin. Jesus looked at it and said:

“Whose image and inscription is this?” They said to Him, “Caesar’s.” And He said to them, “Render therefore to Caesar the things that are Caesar’s, and to God the things that are God’s.” (Matthew 22:20-21)

If we become enslaved to the desire for money, for instance, we find ourselves worshipping in the court of Caesar. We find these words of Jesus recorded in Matthew 6:19-21:

Do not lay up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and rust destroy and where thieves break in and steal; but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust destroys and where thieves do not break through and steal.
For where your treasure is, there your heart will be also.

The way of Caesar is the popular way. It is disastrous when we put our desires for fame, power or riches above our relationship with the Lord. In John 5:44, Jesus warned: “How can you believe, who receive honor from one another, and do not seek the honor that comes from the only God?” While it is certainly worth it, there is a price we have to pay if we desire to follow Jesus:

Then Jesus said to His Disciples, “If anyone desires to come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me.
“For whoever desires to save his life will lose it, and whoever loses his life for My sake will find it.
For what is a man profited if he gains the whole world, and loses his own soul? Or what will a man give in exchange for his soul?”

We accepted the Lord into our lives over thirty years ago and have never been sorry for that decision. While life on this earth is not always easy, we have great joy and peace and have received many answers to prayer. Moreover, we look forward to the time when we will have inexpressible joy in the kingdom of heaven.

Instead of saying, “We have no king but Caesar,” we would urge all our readers to turn their lives over to God so that they can say:

“WE HAVE NO KING BUT JESUS”

SALT LAKE CITY UT 84110
A real controversy has been raging in Salt Lake City ever since the film The Godmakers II was shown at a local church. The reason the film created such a heated debate was that it openly accused the acting head of the Mormon Church, President Gordon B. Hinckley, of committing homosexual acts with another man and even with "feminine looking boys . . . about fifteen or sixteen years old . . . just little youngsters, babies." In addition, he was accused of consorting with prostitutes.

Lawsuit Threatened

On February 25, 1993, the Salt Lake Tribune reported the following:

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is threatening to take legal action against the producers of the anti-Mormon video "God Makers II." The video 'contains numerous false statements that violate the privacy rights' of Gordon B. Hinckley . . . said Salt Lake attorney Patrick A. Shea this month in a letter to Patrick and Caryl Matrisciana of Jeremiah Films Inc. The statements in question, relating to the personal conduct of President Hinckley, "are entirely false," said Mr. Shea, who is representing the LDS Church. . . . Ed Decker, who narrated the film and helped research and write it, said this is the first legal action the LDS Church has threatened against them.

Even before a lawsuit was threatened, a number of the important ministries to Mormons informed us that they would not carry the video because it was too sensationalistic in its approach. Dick Baer, a prominent critic of the Mormon Church, took issue with the contents of the film when he was interviewed by a newspaper:

A local resident who played a major role in the production of a film a decade ago which classifies Mormonism as a mind-controlling cult is distancing himself from the just released sequel.

Richard D. Baer . . . says the follow-up to the 1983 movie . . . misses the mark. Baer says "God-Makers II" is sensational and dwells on the bizarre. Baer and Ed Decker . . . parted company in 1984, when Baer began his own organization to, he says, expose the radical differences between Mormonism and traditional Christianity. . . .

"Ed has a penchant to sensationalize, embellish on facts and center on bizarre issues to try to shock people," Baer says. "This film will so turn Mormons off it will be difficult to even talk to them."

Baer is not the only LDS critic refusing to support the new film. For instance, Sandra Tanner, who has written many books about Mormonism, including one that convinced Baer to leave the church, is not endorsing "Godmakers II." (The Sacramento Union, Dec. 26, 1992)

As the article cited above indicates, Dick Baer did play a major role in the first film. The reader may remember that Baer was present with Ed Decker in the lengthy scene at the lawyers’ office. Mr. Baer now operates Ex-Mormons and Christian Alliance, PO Box 530, Orangevale, CA 95662. In 1986, the Public Communications/Special Affairs Department of the Mormon Church prepared a list of ten “CRITICS OF THE CHURCH.” Mr. Baer’s name appeared in third place on that list. Because of Dick Baer’s role in the first film and his extensive work with Mormons, his critical evaluation of The Godmakers II is very significant.

Careful Research?

Before looking at the charges against President Hinckley, we need to take a look at another part of the video that throws some light on the question of whether the material presented in the film was thoroughly researched. In discussing the coming forth of the Book of Mormon, the narrator (Ed Decker) asserted:
“There is strong evidence that in 1824 Joseph Smith actually had to dig up the body of his dead brother Alvin and bring part of that body with him to the Hill Cumorah in order to gain access to the gold plates on which were written the Book of Mormon.” To further illustrate this startling claim, a repulsive looking drawing of a skeleton is shown!

The truth of the matter, however, is that there is absolutely no evidence to support such an accusation. The idea that Joseph Smith would consider digging up his brother to obtain the plates actually came from the mind of document forger Mark Hofmann and was set forth by him in his infamous “Salamander letter.” In Hofmann’s forgery, the “old spirit” told Joseph Smith to “bring your brother Alvin [to the Hill Cumorah].” Joseph says he is dead shall I bring what remains but the spirit is gone . . . .” The rest of the letter, however, makes it clear that even Mark Hofmann did not go as far as Mr. Decker in saying that the spirit actually required Joseph to dig up his brother’s body.

In 1987, Mr. Hofmann confessed to prosecutors that he forged the Salamander letter. He, in fact, was questioned about the very part of the letter that mentioned Alvin: “Q: What about, ‘shall I bring what remains’, talking about Alvin? A: Part of that was from my own imagination and part was from . . . different stories that I tied together” (Hofmann’s Confession, 1987, pages 441-442). Although Hofmann believed that Joseph Smith was involved in magical practices, he was not able to come up with any evidence that Joseph Smith was commanded to bring his brother’s body to the hill. Since Hofmann’s confession that he forged the Salamander letter has been known for over five years, it seems hard to believe that anyone would still be maintaining that there is “strong evidence” that Joseph dug up Alvin’s remains to please the spirit. In any case, the use of this discredited tale should alert the reader to be careful about accepting statements in Godmakers II without doing further checking.

Ed Decker and others who have brought accusations of immorality against President Gordon B. Hinckley claim that they have hard evidence to support the charges. Our examination of that evidence, however, raises many questions with regard to its validity. While we cannot say with absolute certainty that there is no truth in the accusations, on the basis of the evidence that we have examined, we find the charges difficult to accept. In fact, we find it hard to believe that they would be made public without some confirming evidence from more reliable sources.

Lest the reader should misunderstand our position, we do not wish to be considered apologists for President Hinckley or the Mormon Church. In fact, in the last issue of our newsletter we severely criticized Hinckley and other church authorities for suppressing the McLellin Collection from prosecutors in the Mark Hofmann case. Nevertheless, we feel that it is our duty to present our readers with well-balanced research on this issue. We are deeply concerned about such serious charges being made on evidence that seems questionable. We are very sensitive to this issue because we ourselves have been the target of very malicious stories circulated by members of the Mormon Church.

The evidence against Mr. Hinckley comes from four individuals. The first is Charles Van Dam. Mr. Van Dam made many serious charges against Hinckley in a video tape, made on July 17, 1988. He died of AIDS just months after making his statement. Van Dam maintained he had a homosexual relationship with Hinckley that lasted from “about 1964 to 1966.” He also claimed that Hinckley was involved in sexual parties and “heavy drinking.” Moreover, he charged that Hinckley was a “frequent customer” of prostitutes. Van Dam indicated that he procured prostitutes for Hinckley and that “he wanted wild, kinky girls . . . Girls that wouldn’t mind being tor____ tied up and things like that. He was a kinky man.”

According to Mr. Van Dam, Hinckley would provide the used car lot he (Van Dam) worked for “a hundred thousand, two hundred thousand dollars at a whack” and that “a lot of it” went out to pay for the “girls and guys” involved in the sexual encounters. Finally, however, Hinckley was supposed to have warned Van Dam and others to flee from the state of Utah to avoid an investigation. Later, when Van Dam was in Denver, he received money from Salt Lake City that he felt “had to come from the church.” He bought a liquor store and “two gay bars,” and they were used as fronts to “launder” money for the people in Salt Lake. Eventually, however, the law caught up with Mr. Van Dam. He was called before a grand jury and “went to the penitentiary for telling the grand jury to hang it in their ear, that I wasn’t going to testify against them Salt Lake people.”

A careful examination of Van Dam’s interview raises questions regarding his motive, reliability and competency. For instance, the video shows that he was rather bitter against the Mormon Church because he had been expelled from the church. When Van Dam was asked why he was excommunicated, he responded: “Homosexuality.” Although this would not necessarily invalidate Van Dam’s story, it does raise the question of revenge. Moreover, there is another element in Van Dam’s story that seems improbable. He claimed that Gordon Hinckley, the very man he had previously had sexual relations with, chastised him for his deviant behavior just before his excommunication! Mr. Van Dam claimed that in 1969 or 1970, when he “went up to the Church Office Building to be excommunicated—for an interview,” he found himself in the presence of Hinckley who rebuked him for his homosexual lifestyle. Van Dam claimed that he argued with Hinckley at that time: “I told him, I said, how can you . . . sit in judgment on me, when you’re as big a queer as I am.” Mr. Van Dam said that Hinckley refused to listen to his argument, and he was excommunicated. He went on to state: “They kicked me out of the city—threatened my life.”

It seems very hard to believe that if Hinckley really had a homosexual affair with Charles Van Dam, he would turn right around and help engineer his excommunication. As strange as it may seem, Van Dam also maintains that the church was giving him money to keep him quiet. If this was really the case, why would Hinckley want to have him excommunicated and risk having the whole story come out? This does not make any sense.

One of the most disturbing portions of Charles Van Dam’s story relates to another encounter he supposedly had with Hinckley before he was reprimanded in the Church Office Building. Van Dam maintained that when he was living in California, the following incident occurred: “I was just a deacon . . . they wanted to elevate me to a priest, and in order to do that they’ve got to have a General Authority come down and interview you, and he [Hinckley] came to the stake presidency and to the stake conference . . . .” Van Dam went on to state: “. . . when I walked in and saw him there, I said, ‘there is no way that this man is going to sit in judgment on me.’”

To those who are familiar with Mormonism, this is a preposterous statement. All worthy boys who are 12 years of age can be ordained deacons. At the age of 14 they become teachers, and when they turn 16 they are ordained priests. While the office of priest is a very important office in the Catholic Church, in Mormonism it is just the third step in the lesser or Aaronic Priesthood. Every boy who lives a worthy life is expected to become a priest. Contrary to Van Dam’s statement that “a general authority” of the church has to “interview” those who would be priests, the interview is conducted by the local bishop. of the ward in which the candidate lives. The General Handbook of Instructions, 1983, page 29, makes it very clear that those who seek the office of "Priest, teacher, or deacon" are "INTERVIEWED AND ORDAINED. . . By or under direction of [the] bishop."

Since it is highly unlikely that any such incident could have occurred, a shadow of doubt is cast on the rest of Charles Van Dam's statements concerning Gordon B. Hinckley. With regard to Van Dam's moral character, his own interview seems to speak for itself. He acknowledged participation in criminal activity and admitted he refused to testify before a grand jury. His interview of July 17, 1988, contains no evidence to show that he had repented of his evil activities. In our opinion, viewing this video in its entirety severely weakens Van Dam's story. The Godmakers II uses short extracts from another interview, and, of course, none of the problems found in the first video are mentioned.

Another factor that needs to be considered when we look at Charles Van Dam's story is his mental state at the time he was interviewed. One of the problems associated with AIDS is that the patient can suffer from dementia. Dementia is defined in The American Medical Association Family Medical Guide, page 296, as "an incurable disorder of the brain in which there is a progressive loss of memory and other intellectual functions so that the mind gradually ceases to function normally and the affected person slowly becomes increasingly confused, incapable of sensible conversation, unaware of the surroundings and generally incapacitated." The Merck Manual of Diagnosis and Therapy, 1977, page 1542, says that sometimes a person suffering from dementia "may embark on foolish and ill-judged, perhaps illegal activities . . ." In the video interview, Charles Van Dam showed some signs of confusion in telling his story. The interviewer tried to explain why Mr. Van Dam was making confusing statements by admitting that he had "dementia." When he asked Van Dam to explain the disorder, he responded: "Well, it's a forgetfulness that comes with AIDS . . . you lose contact in reality in remembrances — in memory banks back years ago and then all of a sudden they'll come to you." While Van Dam was able to talk fairly well, his own admission about struggling with dementia raises the question of his reliability as a witness. The Godmakers II is completely silent concerning the fact that Charles Van Dam suffered from dementia. Moreover, it does not mention anything about his death.

We talked to three non-Mormons who were acquainted with Charles Van Dam before he made the video attacking Gordon B. Hinckley. None of these men seemed to have any personal knowledge about the accusations against Hinckley, and all of them felt that Van Dam was unreliable. One of them, who worked at a used car lot with Van Dam, said that he remembered Van Dam's wild stories concerning his criminal activities. At that time, Van Dam was not implicating the Mormon Church, but claimed he had been working for the Mafia in Chicago. This man felt that Van Dam was prone to telling tall tales.

In The Godmakers II three people were used to shore up the charges against Hinckley. These witnesses — Viola (Vi), Ben and Louie — all seem to be of questionable character. William Claudiin was present when these individuals made the affidavits and has given us copies. These statements raise a number of problems that are not discussed in the film.

The first affidavit, dated Sept. 17, 1988, was given by Viola. In her statement she admitted she was having "an affair" with a married man who she said was Gordon Hinckley's friend. She maintained there were "very kinky" parties held at a "house on the East side" but she "wouldn't [sic] take part in it, so, I would have _____take me home. I knew it was time to leave before the kinky things started." This contradicts a statement by Van Dam in his video. He claimed that one night he came home to find a very wild bisexual party going on and that Viola was one of those he found on the premises. At any rate, she recalled that at one time Hinckley "was sitting next to me on a couch with a drink in one hand and his arm around a Girl with the other. . . . They then got up and went into a bedroom. . . . I was much aware of the use of the rooms and what went on inside." Viola made it clear that prostitutes were present at the "kinky" parties. In his affidavit Louie said that "Viola was a favorite of the group . . . ."

Viola apparently knew nothing at that time about a sexual relationship between Hinckley and Van Dam, but she said, "It doesn't [sic] surprise me now to know that Hinckley and Chuck were Bed partners."

Viola admitted that when "the heat started to come down," she "left Salt Lake." While she does not give the reason, in his video Charles Van Dam explained that he and his associates fled to escape the law.

The second affidavit, dated July 8, 1988, was given by a man named Ben. According to Charles Van Dam, he was involved in the scheme to "launder money" in Denver. In any case, Ben claimed that "one night in particular Chas and I came to his house and found all the Bedrooms full — His Booze all drunk and two additional people. . . . on his couch . . . . Chas went Crazy [sic] — yelling [.] Screaming and telling the [expletive deleted] to get . . . out of his house. — I witnessed _______ and Gordon Hin[c]kley running out the Door trying to Put on their pants over their temple Garments — By the Way."

Ben's statement that Charles Van Dam chased Gordon B. Hinckley out into the night under such embarrassing conditions certainly seems hard to believe. As strange as it may seem, Van Dam himself maintained that he did drive Hinckley out of the house in the manner described above.

This does not fit well with the rest of Van Dam's story. As noted earlier, he claimed that Hinckley was providing hundreds of thousands of dollars to support the car lot and the evil activities that were going on. In another place in the 1988 video he said that "the church was definitely involved" in the matter. In The Godmakers II, Van Dam related: "I was personally involved with the apostle Gordon Hinckley sexually. We became financially involved in a house at 2213 Lakeline Drive. We bought the house for a party pad, and Gordon Hinckley came up there all the time and I had to arrange women for him, I had to arrange booze for him."

In the 1988 video, Van Dam claimed that the money "was given to me" to buy the house that was to be used for sexual purposes and that finally "the church took it back, or someone took it back and they ended up selling it . . . ." According to his own story, then, it was not really his house and he would not have the right to throw people out who were using it for the purpose for which it was intended. If Gordon Hinckley was really the benefactor, as Van Dam maintained, it seems highly unlikely that Van Dam would treat him in such a humiliating manner. In the video Van Dam portrays Hinckley as a Mafia-like person who would not hesitate to kill to protect his interests. If this were really the case, why would he allow Van Dam to run him off from the premises without retaliating in some way?

Ben's affidavit also raises an important question with regard to these alleged sexual activities actually took place. Viola set the time frame in "the early to mid 1960's, namely 1964 thru 1967 . . . ." Charles Van Dam said that his sexual encounters with Hinckley took place "about 1964 to 1966." Louie's affidavit says that he parted "a lot" with Van Dam, "especially from 1964 to 1966." Ben maintained that "Over a period of 2 1/2 to three
(3) years the activities took place . . . The years of 1964 thru 1966 were the main years that this part took place in Chas Van Dam’s house . . . .

Actually, nothing could have taken “place in” Van Dam’s house during the year 1964, nor in the first eleven months of 1965, because the Salt Lake County Abstracts book and the real estate contract for the house show that it was not purchased by Van Dam until December 1, 1965. This, of course, does not rule out the possibility that these activities were taking place at the car lot or at other locations.

One very important omission in The Godmakers II is that it never gives any indication of when these sordid affairs were supposed to have taken place. The reason may be that the producers did not want viewers to know how long ago it was that these events allegedly occurred. If we can believe Van Dam’s producers did not want viewers to know how long ago it was that supposed to have taken place. The reason may be that the high officials of the church would be carrying on with black prostitutes in front of a number of individuals who might betray him. Even if the prostitutes did not recognize him at first, they might see his picture in newspapers and on television. This hypocritical behavior would certainly raise the possibility of either exposure or blackmail.

The Godmakers II charges that there has been an “extraordinary media blackout” which “stopped the hottest story of the 80’s concerning one of the top Mormons in the world.” Actually, the truth of the matter is that the news media felt that the story was not credible. We were pressured to break the story in our newsletter about four years before The Godmakers II appeared. It was felt that if we published it, the controversy would be picked up by reporters. We refused the offer, and on Jan. 17, 1989 we published an attack against the story entitled, A Statement Concerning Some Charges of Immorality Made Against a Mormon Leader. Since we did not feel that it was right to reveal Gordon Hinckley’s name, we referred to him only as “Elder Accused.” Because of the sensitive nature of the subject and the fact that we might unwittingly add fuel to the fire, we did not advertise the publication. We did, however, give copies to various ministries working with Mormons and people who asked about the charges against Hinckley.

Steven Naifeh was also asked to break the story. The reader will remember that Naifeh co-authored The Mormon Murders, an anti-Mormon book referred to in the Godmakers video. Although Naifeh pulled no punches in his attack on Gordon B. Hinckley in the book, he informed us that he simply could not believe the evidence presented with regard to Hinckley’s sexual improprieties and therefore had no interest in breaking the story.

In a “Special Update Report,” printed in January 1993, Ed Decker candidly admitted that The Godmakers II “is not a film to use in wooing Mormons.” In our opinion, the use of Charles Van Dam’s story distracts from the real reasons why one should oppose Mormonism. To focus on unsubstantiated charges against one of the LDS leaders comes across as sensationalism. It seems to encourage Christians to approach Mormons with derision instead of compassion, and, as Dick Baer has stated, it will “so turn Mormons off it will be difficult to even talk to them.”

The case against President Hinckley seems to be based on some very questionable statements. Since there is no hard evidence to support the accusations, we would advise all those working with Mormons to refrain from disseminating the story. Even if absolute proof should turn up, a Christian would still have to consider the fact that twenty-six to twenty-eight years have passed since the alleged offenses occurred and there is always the possibility that there was repentance and a change of life style during that interval.

If it could be established that the Mormon Church is secretly promoting a doctrine of polygamy, adultery or homosexuality, then it would undoubtedly be our Christian obligation to bring the evidence to light. As it is, however, we only have charges that one General Authority in the Mormon Church has engaged in sexual behavior that is forbidden by the church itself. Mr. Van Dam never suggested that Hinckley taught that this was church doctrine or that he had the approval of other members of the church hierarchy. While we feel that it is important to expose Joseph Smith’s doctrine of polygamy which played an important role in the early history of the Mormon Church, we seriously question whether Christians should be involved in disseminating unsupported charges of immorality.
Joseph Smith claimed that in 1823 an angel appeared to him and stated that gold plates were buried in a hill near his home. The angel explained that the plates contained “an account of the former inhabitants of this continent,” and that they also contained “the fullness of the everlasting Gospel.” Four years later Smith received the plates, and began “translating” them “by the power of God.” The translation was published in 1830 under the title of The Book of Mormon. After translating the Book of Mormon, Joseph Smith founded the Mormon Church—a church that now has over eight million members.

Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt declared:

The Book of Mormon claims to be a divinely inspired record. . . . If false, it is one of the most cunning, wicked, bold, deep-laid impositions ever palmed upon the world, calculated to deceive and ruin millions . . . if true, no one can possibly be saved and reject it; if false, no one can possibly be saved and receive it . . .

If, after a rigid examination, it be found an imposition, it should be extensively published to the world as such; the evidences and arguments on which the imposture was detected, should be clearly and logically stated . . . if investigation should prove the Book of Mormon true . . . the American and English nations . . . should utterly reject both the Popish and Protestant ministry, together with all the churches which have been built up by them or that have sprung from them, as being entirely destitute of authority . . . (Orson Pratt’s Works, “Divine Authenticity of the Book of Mormon,” Liverpool, 1851, pp. 1-2)

Our study of the Book of Mormon has extended over a period of thirty years and has led us to conclude that it is not an ancient or divinely inspired record, but rather a product of the nineteenth century. Mormon apologists, of course, have resisted the evidence set forth in our books, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? and Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon. Although the church itself has been completely silent concerning our work, L. Ara Norwood, Matthew Roper, John A. Tvedtnes, and a few other Mormon apologists have recently assailed our work. We have been preparing a response to these critics that will be available soon.

In the book, Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 4, 1992, Matthew Roper maintains that some of the nineteenth-century sources we suggested as possible sources for the Book of Mormon are rather weak (see pages 176-192). For many years we have maintained that at the time Joseph Smith “translated” the Book of Mormon there were a number of books that claimed the Indians were the descendants of the ancient Israelites—an idea that is strongly set forth in the Book of Mormon. Mr. Roper acknowledged:

The Tanners correctly point out that the Book of Mormon appeared at a time when many people believed that the Indians were descendants of the lost ten tribes. Books by James Adair, Elias Boudinot, Ethan Smith, and others are fairly representative of the early nineteenth-century literature which supported such an idea. The Tanners suggest that the Book of Mormon was just one of many such books (pp. 81-84). While it is true that general similarities or parallels can be drawn between these works and the Book of Mormon, I believe that the differences are far more significant. (Ibid., page 186)

A Striking Parallel

The reader will notice that in the quotation above Mr. Roper mentioned a book written by James Adair. This book, A History of the American Indians, was originally published in 1775. We have seen quotations from it in other books written in the nineteenth century, but never took the time to examine the book until we encountered a reprint published by Promontory Press. While we noticed that Adair’s book presented “Observations, and arguments, in proof of the American Indians being descended from the Jews,” and a great deal concerning their customs and history, at first we did not see anything that was too impressive. Toward the end of the book, however, we made the startling discovery that it had a portion so similar to the Joseph Smith’s work that we could not escape the conclusion that Joseph Smith either had the book in his hand or a quotation from it when he was writing the Book of Mormon. On pages 337-378, James Adair wrote the following about the Indians:
Through the whole continent, and in the remotest woods, are traces of their ancient warlike disposition. We frequently met with great mounds of earth, either of a circular, or oblong form, having a strong breastwork at a distance around them, made of the clay which had been dug up in forming the ditch on the inner side of the inclosed ground, and these were their forts of security against an enemy . . . About 12 miles from the upper northern parts of the Choktah country, there stand . . . two oblong mounds of earth . . . in an equal direction with each other . . . A broad deep ditch inclosed those two fortresses, and there they raised an high breast-work, to secure their houses from the invading enemy.

In the book of Alma, which is found in the Book of Mormon, we find some extremely important parallels to the writings of Adair in chapters 48, 49, 50, and 53:

Yea, he had been strengthening the armies of the Nephites, and erecting small forts, or places of resort; throwing up banks of earth round about to enclose his armies . . . the Nephites were taught . . . never to raise the sword except it were against an enemy . . . they had cast up dirt round to shield them from the arrows . . . the chief captains of the Lamanites were astonished exceedingly, because of the wisdom of the Nephites in preparing their places of security . . . they knew not that Moroni had fortified, or had built forts of security in all the land round about . . . the Lamanites could not get into their forts of security . . . because of the higness of the bank which had been thrown up, and the depth of the ditch which had been dug round about . . . they [the Lamanites] began to dig down their banks of earth . . . that they might have an equal chance to fight . . . instead of filling up their ditches by pulling down the banks of earth, they were filled up in a measure with their dead . . . And [Moroni] caused them to erect fortifications that they might secure their armies . . . Teancum . . . caused that they should commence laboring in digging a ditch round about the land . . . And he caused that they should build a breastwork of timbers upon the inner bank of the ditch; and they did cast up dirt out of the ditch against the breastwork of timbers . . . (Book of Mormon, Alma, 48:8, 14; 49:2, 5, 13, 18, 22; 50:10; 53:3-4)

The thing that first struck us about the quotation from Adair’s book was the four words, “their forts of security.” These identical words are found in the book of Alma! It is interesting to note that these words are used only once in the Book of Mormon, Alma 49:18, and never appear in the Bible. The three words “forts of security” are found in 49:13, but are never found in any other place in the Book of Mormon or the Bible. The last two words (“of security”) are never found together in the Bible and appear only seven times in the Book of Mormon. Except for one instance (3 Nephi 4:15), all of these are in the book of Alma. It would appear, then, that Joseph Smith latched on to some wording he did not usually use, and the evidence seems to indicate that the source was Adair’s book.

The word “breastwork” (written as “breast-work” in Adair’s work) appears twice in each of the references cited above. The Bible never uses this word, and it appears only three times in the entire Book of Mormon. The other occurrence is in Mosiah 11:11 and has nothing to do with military matters. It was used concerning a pulpit.

The words “which had been dug” are found in both extracts. This word combination is never found in the Bible or in any other place in the Book of Mormon.

Both the Book of Mormon and Adair’s book contain the words “the ditch.” Joseph Smith used this word “ditch” three times in the section concerning the Nephite fortifications but never used them again in the rest of the Book of Mormon. Both quotations use the words “the ditch.” These two words were used again in Alma 62:21, but do not appear in any other part of the Book of Mormon.

We find the words “secure their” in both works. This combination is never found in the Bible and appears only this one time in the Book of Mormon. The words “an equal” are found in both extracts. While they are found in one other place in the Book of Mormon (Mosiah 29:38), they never appear in the Bible.

The three words “against an enemy” appear in both books. Joseph Smith only used them once in the Book of Mormon (Alma 14:14), and this combination never appears in the Bible. Adair uses the expression “mounds of earth.” While Joseph Smith never used these exact words, he did refer to “banks of earth.”

We find it extremely hard to believe that all of these similar word patterns could happen by chance. In addition to the material cited above, there are other similarities between the writings of James Adair and Joseph Smith. For example, the Book of Mormon claims that the ancient Jews who came to the New World were all “white, and exceedingly fair and delightsome . . .” (2 Nephi 5:21). Those who rebelled, however, were cursed with “a sore cursing . . . the Lord God did cause a skin of blackness to come upon them.” Adair’s book, likewise, talks of a change in skin color: “The Indian tradition says, that their forefathers in very remote ages came from a far distant country, where all the people were of one colour . . .” (page 194).

The Book of Mormon states that before the ancient Nephites left Jerusalem, they had been instructed by the “Lord” to bring with them some “plates of brass” which had the sacred Jewish scriptures engraved upon them.
(1 Nephi 3:3). The plates were carefully protected by the ancient religious leaders and were apparently buried in “the hill Cumorah” along with many other plates (Mormon 6:6). This idea of brass plates being buried could have come from James Adair’s book. On pages 178-179, we find this information:

In the Tucabatches . . . are two brazen tables, and five of copper. They esteem them so sacred as to keep them constantly in their holy of holies . . . Old Bracket, an Indian . . . gave the following description of them: . . . The shape of the two brass plates . . . [was] about a foot and a half in diameter.

He said — he was told by his forefathers that those plates were given to them by the man we call God; that there had been many more of other shapes . . . and some had writing upon them which were buried with particular men; and that they had instructions given with them, viz. they must only be handled by particular people . . . He only remembered three more, which were buried with three of his family . . .

On page 122 of Adair’s book, we find the words, “for the space of three days and nights . . .” This is very close to Alma 36:10, “for the space of three days and three nights . . .” It is also noteworthy that while Joseph Smith uses the words “month” or “months” sixteen times in the Book of Mormon, in one instance he uses the term “moons”; “. . . for the space of nine moons” (Omni 1:21). On page 125 of Adair’s History of the American Indians we find the following “. . . for the space of four moons . . .

We are convinced that Joseph Smith read a number of books and articles about the Indians — especially books equating them with the ancient Israelites. His own mother, Lucy Smith, tells that Joseph had a fervent interest in the ancient Indians before he received the plates from which he “translated” the Book of Mormon:

During our evening conversations, Joseph would occasionally give us some of the most amusing recitals that could be imagined. He would describe the ancient inhabitants of this continent, their dress, mode of travelling, and the animals upon which they rode; their cities, their buildings, with every particular; their mode of warfare; and also their religious worship. This he would do with as much ease, seemingly, as if he had spent his whole life with them. (Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith the Prophet, and his Progenitors for Many Generations, 1853, page 85)

Cloud of Darkness!

Robert Williams, of North Wales, discovered an important parallel between the Book of Mormon and the Preface of the King James Bible. The Preface, of course, was written by the translators and was dedicated to “The Most High And Mighty Prince James . . . King Of Great Britain, France, And Ireland, Defender Of The Faith, &c.” While the translators used words and combinations of words in the Preface which are found in the text of the King James Version, they also used language which is not in the biblical text.

If it could be demonstrated that the Book of Mormon contains word combinations peculiar to the Preface, which was not published before 1611, it would cast serious doubt upon the claim that it was written in ancient times by the Nephites. Mr. Williams found other parallels to the Preface and asked us to use our computer to make a more complete search. After completing the research, we felt that there was a strong possibility that Joseph Smith borrowed from it. In the Preface we find the following:

. . . clouds of darkness would so have overshadowed this Land, that men should have been in doubt which way they were to walk . . . the appearance of Your Majesty, as of the Sun in his strength, instantly dispelled those supposed and surmised mists . . . (The Holy Bible, Preface; as printed by the Mormon Church in 1979)

In the Book of Mormon we find two very strong parallels to this part of the Preface:

. . . the cloud of darkness, which had overshadowed them, did not disperse . . . (Helaman 5:31)

. . . the cloud of darkness having been dispelled . . . (Alma 19:6)

The reader will notice that there are some startling similarities: 1. The expression “clouds of darkness” or “cloud of darkness” is not found in the text of the Bible. 2. The word “overshadowed” does not appear in the Old Testament, and the New Testament cannot be appealed to as the source because the ancient Nephites did not have access to it. Joseph Smith, of course, did have the New Testament in his Bible. 3. The word “dispelled” is not found in the Bible and Joseph Smith never used it again in the Book of Mormon.

Another interesting parallel is that the statement in the Preface indicates that the appearance of King James, like “the Sun in his strength, instantly dispelled” the dark mists. The verse in Alma 19:6 was also written concerning a king whose name was Lamoni. It speaks of “the light which did light up his mind . . . yea, this light had infused such joy into his soul, the cloud of darkness having been dispelled . . .” The Preface speaks of both King James and Queen Elizabeth. Although Joseph Smith used the words king or kings 228 times in the book of Mosiah (the book that precedes Alma), he never mentioned a queen until the chapter in question, Alma 19, and while it appears a number of times in the book of Alma, it is not used in any of the other books found in the Book of Mormon. The word “queens” is used in the Book of Mormon, but it is obviously taken from a prophecy in the Bible, Isaiah 49:23, and is not related to any queens living during the period covered by the Book of Mormon.
In our book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, we demonstrated that Joseph Smith had a tendency to plagiarize different expressions from the Bible and then use them over and over again. For example, the phrase “the lamb of God” appears only in the New Testament, John 1:29 and 36. The Mormon prophet latched onto these words and then used them twenty-eight times in the book of 1 Nephi alone! He soon grew weary of them, however, and they only appear six more times in the rest of the Book of Mormon. Smith’s inclination to grab onto expressions and then repeat them is also evident in the rest of the Book of Mormon. Smith’s inclination to plagiarize different expressions from other books or conversations he had with different people, since the Preface is only two pages long, we think that many parallels could prove to be significant.

And it came to pass that they were overshadowed with a cloud of darkness . . . behold the cloud of darkness, which had overshadowed them, did not disperse . . . the Lamanites could not flee because of the cloud of darkness which did overshadow them . . . he saw through the cloud of darkness . . . the Lamanites said unto him: What shall we do, that this cloud of darkness may be removed from overshadowing us? And Aminadab said . . . You must repent . . . and when you shall do this, the cloud of darkness shall be removed from overshadowing you . . . the cloud of darkness was dispersed. And it came to pass that when they cast their eyes about, and saw that the cloud of darkness was dispersed from overshadowing them, behold, they saw that they were encircled about . . . by a pillar of fire.

After this repetitious section of the Book of Mormon, Joseph Smith never used the words “cloud of darkness” again; instead he used the words “mist of darkness” or “mists of darkness.” It is interesting to note that the word “mists” (plural) is not found in the text of the Bible, but it does appear in the Preface of the King James Bible. It is, in fact, in the very paragraph which mentions “clouds of darkness.”

In addition to the parallels mentioned above, in our computer examination of the Preface we found forty-five word parallels (ranging from two to four words in a row) which are not found in the text of the King James Version. While many of them could have come from Joseph Smith reading other books or conversations he had with different people, since the Preface is only two pages long, we think that many parallels could prove to be significant. The following are just ten examples: “rule and reign over” — “sacred word” — “because the fruit thereof,” — “eternal happiness,” — “it, nay” — “the immediate” — “itself abroad in the” — “great hopes” — “most sacred” — “did never.” Most of the forty-five word combinations are found in the books Alma and Helaman — the very books which contain the parallel concerning the “cloud of darkness.”

New Computer Study

On October 7, 1979, the Provo Herald reported that some Mormon researchers at Brigham Young University had turned to a computer in an attempt to prove that the Book of Mormon is genuine:

Wordprint comparisons between the Book of Mormon and the known 19th century writings of Joseph Smith and Mr. Spalding show conclusively that neither of these persons, authored the book, the scientists say. . . . their research indicates that the book was authored by at least 24 different writers, and possibly more, whose styles bear no resemblance to that of Joseph Smith . . . or other 19th century writers whom they examined . . .

One of the tests went so far as to indicate that “odds against a single author exceeded 100 billion to one,” the statisticians noted in the report.

In the Salt Lake City Messenger for December 1979 we observed that the list of “24 Major Book of Mormon Authors Used in the Study,” seems to be somewhat padded (see The New Era, November 1979, page 11). For instance, we find Isaiah listed as one of the authors. Since Isaiah is a book in the Bible and since the Book of Mormon itself acknowledges that it is quoting from Isaiah, we do not feel that it should be included in this study. If the researchers are going to include Bible authors as part of the list of “Book of Mormon Authors,” they might as well add Moses, Matthew and Malachi (see Book of Mormon, Mosiah 13; 3 Nephi 12-14; and 3 Nephi 24-25).

The BYU researchers stretched the matter even further by including the “Lord” as “quoted by Isaiah” as part of the “24 Major Book of Mormon Authors.” Also included in this list is the “Lord,” “Jesus” and the “Father.” It would appear, then, that the researchers created four “Book of Mormon Authors” out of the Father and the Son! On page 11 of their study in The New Era, the researchers admit: “Since the term Lord can refer either to the Father or the Son, we separated the words attributed to the Lord from those attributed to the Father or to Christ.” This list of “24 Major Book of Mormon Authors,” therefore, appears to be overstated.

In the same newsletter we noted that we were in favor of computer studies with regard to the Book of Mormon and would especially like to see a study showing the parallels between the King James Version and the Book of Mormon. We indicated that a good computer study would probably reveal more than 24 different authors in the book. In fact, we felt that it would probably find words written by Moses, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Job, David, Solomon, Ezekiel, Daniel, Jonah, Micah, Malachi, Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Paul, James, Peter, Jude, etc.

When we later did our computer research for the book,
Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, we demonstrated that there were many quotations from New Testament writers that had been plagiarized by the author of the Book of Mormon. These extracts were found in portions of the Book of Mormon that were supposed to have been written before the time of Christ. For example, we found a good deal of material lifted from the biblical books of Matthew, Revelation, John, Romans, Luke, Acts, 1 Corinthians, 2 Corinthians, Hebrews, Mark and other New Testament books.

In Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 3, page 170, Matthew Roper stated: “In their recent book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, Jerald and Sandra Tanner have presented perhaps the most extensive list of alleged plagiarism ever assembled by hostile critics of the Book of Mormon.”

Our computer research with regard to the Book of Mormon does not agree with that done by the BYU researchers. While it is clear that there has been extensive plagiarism in the Book of Mormon, we believe the evidence shows that one style of writing pervades the entire book, and it is the same style found in Joseph Smith’s other scriptural works.

Even some Mormon scholars have questioned the work of the BYU apologists. John A. Tvedtnes, a Hebrew scholar, who has taught at Brigham Young University, the University of Utah and the Brigham Young University Center for Near Eastern Studies, has publicly proclaimed that he does not accept the research. In a response to our work on the Book of Mormon, Tvedtnes spoke of “the stylistic computer studies of the scriptures done at Brigham Young University and in Berkeley, California.” He then frankly stated: “I have my own reasons for rejecting those studies, however, and hope to express them elsewhere” (Ibid., page 229).

Recently another computer study of the Book of Mormon has come to our attention. It is entitled, “A Multivariate Technique for Authorship Attribution and its Application to the Analysis of Mormon Scripture and Related Texts.” The research was done by David I. Holmes, a Senior Lecturer in Statistics at Bristol Polytechnic, and was published by Oxford University Press for the Association for History and Computing. In this article David Holmes explained that he used fourteen large blocks of text from the Book of Mormon (amounting to over 120,000 words), documents written or dictated by Joseph Smith between 1828 and 1833, three samples of approximately 10,000 words from the early revelations printed in the Doctrine and Covenants, text from the book of Isaiah and Joseph Smith’s Book of Abraham. After Holmes finished his study, he was convinced that the claim of multiple authorship in the Book of Mormon was fallacious:

The most impressive statistical analysis carried out on the Book of Mormon is that undertaken by Larsen, Rencher and Layton. . . . The authors conclude that their results all strongly support multiple authorship of the Book of Mormon yet their whole case rests on the assumption that the frequency of occurrence of non-contextual function words is a stylistic discriminator. The article claims that there is no resemblance between the authors of the Book of Mormon and the nineteenth century authors sampled, but the case rests on usage of words such as “unto, behold, yea, forth, verily, lest and nay” which would all naturally be prominent in an archaic biblical-type style, but could hardly be expected to occur with the same frequency elsewhere, even in the early nineteenth century. Against this background, the aim of my research is to complement historical and scientific studies into the authenticity of the Book of Mormon by subjecting it and related Mormon scripture to stylistic analysis. In this paper it is understood that a particularly effective measure for purposes of discrimination between writers is the vocabulary richness of a text. . . .

We may summarize by noting that the analyses have shown that the Joseph Smith and Isaiah samples form distinct and separate clusters, whereas all other samples tend to cluster together. . . .

The formation of the clustering observed here, provides evidence of the utility of the multivariate technique advocated by this study. . . .

An important discovery is the fact that the samples of writings from the various prophets who purportedly wrote the Book of Mormon do not form prophet-by-prophet clusters. The dendrogram in Figure 2 shows that only the two samples from Alma display internal homogeneity . . . There appears to be no real difference between Alma’s vocabulary richness and Mormon’s vocabulary richness within the Book of Alma, a conclusion in direct contradiction to the findings of Larsen and the Brigham Young University team. This study has not found, therefore, any evidence of multiple authorship within the Book of Mormon itself. Variation within samples from the same prophet is generally as great as any variation between the prophets themselves.

Two of the three “revelations” samples are also indistinguishable from the Book of Mormon prophets. . . . The dendrograms and principal components plots place the Book of Abraham text (AB) firmly in the main “prophet” cluster, its nearest neighbour being sample R1 from Moroni. In terms of vocabulary richness, clearly the Book of Abraham is indistinguishable from the Book of Mormon prophets and from samples D2 and D3 of Joseph Smith’s revelations. . . .

It is my conclusion, from the results of this research and the supporting historical evidence, that the Book of Mormon sprang from the “prophetic voice” of Joseph Smith himself, as did his revelations and the text of the Book of Abraham. We have seen that the style of his “prophetic voice” as evidenced by the main cluster of the textual samples studied, differs from the style of his personal writings or dictations of a personal nature. (History and Computing, vol. 3, no. 1, 1991, pages 14, 20-21)

David I. Holmes’ statement that Joseph Smith’s “prophetic voice” differs from that found in private writings is of course to be expected. In his scriptural writings he was trying to make the wording sound ancient. Wesley P. Walters observed:

In addition to borrowing biblical names and events, the Elizabethan style of the English King James Bible was adopted. Phrases from both the Old and New Testament were frequently borrowed by Joseph Smith. Wording such as “go the way of all the earth,” (Mos. 1:9 / Josh. 23:14), “sackcloth and ashes” (Mos. 11:25 / Dan. 9:3), and “applied your hearts to understanding” (Mos. 12:27 / Pr. 2:2) are found throughout the book. Furthermore, even the material not derived from the Bible was cast into the King James style. Consequently there is a continual use of “thee”, “thou” and “ye”, as well as the archaic verb endings “est” (second person singular) and “eth” (third person singular). Since the Elizabethan style was not Joseph’s natural idiom, he continually slipped out of this King James pattern and repeatedly confused the forms as well. Thus he lapsed from “ye” (subject) to “you” (object) as the subject of sentences (e.g. Mos. 2:19; 3:34; 4:24), jumped from plural (“ye”) to singular (“thou”) in the same sentence (Mos. 4:22) and moved from verbs without endings to ones with endings (e.g. “yieldeth . . . putteth,” 3:19). (The Use of the Old Testament in the Book of Mormon, by Wesley P. Walters, 1990, page 30)

Our own computer study of the Book of Mormon has certainly not been as sophisticated as that of David I. Holmes, but we have reached similar conclusions. We approached the problem from a different angle. After noticing that the same phrases of two or more words appear time after time throughout Joseph Smith’s scriptures, we used the computer to identify hundreds of these groups of words and feel that they provide powerful evidence that the Book of Mormon, the Inspired Version of the Bible, the Doctrine and Covenants and the Pearl of Great Price were all the product of one mind.

B. H. Robert’s Doubts

As unbelievable as it may seem to many members of the Mormon Church, the noted Mormon historian B. H. Roberts also came to believe that there was a strong possibility that Joseph Smith borrowed from books that were available to him at the time he wrote the Book of Mormon. Roberts, of course, was one of the greatest scholars the church has ever known. He not only prepared the “Introduction and Notes” for Joseph Smith’s History of the Church (seven volumes), but he also wrote the six-volume work, A Comprehensive History of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. He is also noted for his many works defending the Book of Mormon.

After studying Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews, published in 1825, Roberts listed eighteen parallels between it and the Book of Mormon. He wrote two very significant manuscripts which were suppressed for many years because of the fear that the contents would prove harmful to the Mormon Church. Fortunately, we obtained copies of both manuscripts and printed photographs from them in 1979. In 1980 we photographically reproduced both manuscripts under the title Roberts’ Secret Manuscripts Revealed. The manuscripts were later printed by the University of Illinois Press in a hard-back book entitled Studies of the Book of Mormon.

In his secret manuscripts B. H. Roberts acknowledged that Joseph Smith himself could have written the Book of Mormon from the information that was available to him at the time. The deeper B. H. Roberts delved into the relationship between the Book of Mormon and books by Ethan Smith and Josiah Priest, the more his faith in the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon began to erode. In his second manuscript, “A Book of Mormon Study,” B. H. Roberts really began to openly express his own personal doubts about the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon. In the extracts which follow the reader will see that B. H. Roberts was seriously disturbed by many things he found in the Book of Mormon:

One other subject remains to be considered in this division . . . viz.—was Joseph Smith possessed of a sufficiently vivid and creative imagination as to produce such a work as the Book of Mormon from such materials as have been indicated in the preceding chapters . . . That such power of imagination would have to be of a high order is conceded; that Joseph Smith possessed such a gift of mind there can be no question. . . .

In the light of this evidence, there can be no doubt as to the possession of a vividly strong, creative imagination by Joseph Smith, the Prophet, an imagination, it could with reason be urged, which, given the suggestions that are found in the “common knowledge” of accepted American antiquities of the times, supplemented by such a work as Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews, would make it possible for him to create a book such as the Book of Mormon is. (Studies of the Book of Mormon, pages 243, 250)

If from all that has gone before in Part 1, the view be taken that the Book of Mormon is merely of human origin . . . if it be assumed that he is the author of it, then it could be said there is much internal evidence in the book itself to sustain such a view.

In the first place there is a certain lack of perspective in the things the book relates as history that points quite clearly to an undeveloped mind as their origin. The narrative proceeds in characteristic disregard of conditions necessary to its reasonableness, as if it were a tale told by a child, with utter disregard for consistency. (Ibid., page 251)

There were other Anti-Christs among the Nephites, but they were more military leaders than religious innovators . . . they are all of one breed and brand; so nearly alike that one mind is the author of them, and that a young and undeveloped, but piously inclined mind.
A New Witness for God

Roberts acknowledged that in the Book of Mormon. In his secret writings, however, as their creator. It is difficult to believe that they are the product of history, as their creator. It is difficult to believe that they are the product of history, (Ibid., page 271)

These words did not come from the lips of an uninformed and bias “anti-Mormon” writer, but rather they are the carefully worded pronouncements of the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts — believed by many to have been the greatest apologist the church has ever produced. While Professor Truman Madsen, of the church’s Brigham Young University, has asserted that Roberts was merely using the ‘Devil’s Advocate’ approach to stimulate thought,” a careful reading of the material leads one to the inescapable conclusion that he was in the process of losing faith in the historical claims of the Book of Mormon. Why else would B. H. Roberts have made the comment concerning Book of Mormon stories which we cited above?: “The evidence I sorrowfully submit, points to Joseph Smith as their creator. It is difficult to believe that they are the product of history . . .”

In his earlier faith-promoting work, A New Witness for God, a three-volume work published in 1909, B. H. Roberts insisted that Joseph Smith did not have access to books from which he could create a “ground plan” for the Book of Mormon. In his secret writings, however, Roberts acknowledged that in A New Witness for God he did not take sufficiently into account the work of Josiah Priest . . . Priest himself, indeed, published a book . . . The Wonders of Nature and Providence, copyrighted by him June 2nd, 1824, and printed soon afterwards in Rochester, New York, only some twenty miles distant from Palmyra . . . this book preceded the publication of the Book of Mormon by about six years. At the time I made for my New Witness the survey of the literature on American antiquities, traditions, origins, etc., available to Joseph Smith and his associates, this work of Priest’s was unknown to me; as was also the work of Ethan Smith, View of the Hebrews — except by report of it, and as being in my hands but a few minutes . . . it is altogether probable that these two books . . . were either possessed by Joseph Smith or certainly known by him . . .

Moreover, on subjects widely discussed, and that deal in matters of widespread public interest, there is built up in the course of years, a community of knowledge of such subjects, usually referred to as “matters of common knowledge” . . . Such “common knowledge” existed throughout New England and New York in relation to American Indian origins and cultures: and the prevailing ideas respecting the American Indians throughout the regions named were favorable to the notion that they were of Hebrew origin . . . And with the existence of such a body of knowledge, or that which was accepted as “knowledge,” and a person of vivid and constructive imaginative power in contact with it, there is little room for doubt that it might be possible for Joseph Smith to construct a theory of origin for his Book of Mormon in harmony with these prevailing notions; and more especially since this ‘common knowledge’ is set forth in almost handbook form in the little work of Ethan Smith . . . It will appear in what is to follow that such “common knowledge” did exist in New England, that Joseph Smith was in contact with it; that one book, at least, with which he was most likely acquainted, could well have furnished structural outlines for the Book of Mormon; and that Joseph Smith was possessed of such creative imaginative powers as would make it quite within the lines of possibility that the Book of Mormon could have been produced in that way. (Studies of the Book of Mormon, pages 152-54)

On page 192 of the same book, B. H. Roberts asked this question: “Could an investigator of the Book of Mormon be much blamed if he were to decide that Ethan Smith’s book with its suggestion as to the division of his Israelites into two peoples; with its suggestion of ‘tremendous wars between them’; and of the savages overcoming the civilized division led to the fashioning of chiefly these same things in the Book of Mormon?”

Roberts felt that “the likelihood of Joseph Smith coming in contact with Ethan Smith’s book is not only very great, but amounts to a very close certainty” (page 235). Further on in the same chapter, B. H. Roberts made these observations:

But now to return . . . to the main theme of this writing — viz., did Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews furnish structural material for Joseph Smith’s Book of Mormon? It has been pointed out in these pages that there are many things in the former book that might well have suggested many major things in the other. Not a few things merely, one or two, or a half dozen, many; and it is this fact of many things of similarity and the cumulative force of them that makes them so serious a menace to Joseph Smith’s story of the Book of Mormon origin . . .

The material in Ethan Smith’s book is of a character and quantity to make a ground plan for the Book of Mormon . . .

Can such numerous and startling points of resemblance and suggestive contact be merely coincidence? (pages 240, 242)

We feel that all those who are interested in knowing the truth about the Book of Mormon should read B. H. Roberts’ Studies of the Book of Mormon. Although the hardback edition was selling for $35, Signature Books has recently reprinted it in a reasonably priced paperback edition. We normally sell it for $14.95, but if it is ordered before June 30, 1993, the price will be only $13.95. In addition, we are having a sale on our book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon. It usually sells for $5.00, but is on sale for only $4.00 a copy. Those who are interested in having a copy of both of these books (a $19.95 value) can obtain them for Only $16.95 if ordered before June 30 (please remember to add 10% of total order or $1.50 for minimum postage and handling on mail orders).
Extracts From Letters Received In 1992

“Last month, I entered the Missionary Training Center in Provo prepared to serve a full-time mission . . . Within two weeks, however, I discovered the MTC is nothing more than an institution for mind control. After realizing the eternal consequences of pursuing blind obedience of a man (the ‘prophet’), I demanded to be excused from my ‘calling’ . . . Please rush me any information you have concerning the LDS Church. I want to correct my knowledge of ‘truth restored.’ ” (Letter from California)

“My wife & I just finished reading your book ‘Changing World of Mormonism’ it is excellent, well documented, unbiased, just excellent! We have been ‘Mormons’ for 17 years. . . . I did not comprehend the degree of fraud & deception . . .” (Letter from Missouri)

“You have one lord & master and he is Satan. You are of contention and against the Savior . . . I will testify against you at the judgment bar — you will be held responsible . . . to avoid any contention I have not included my name. You only need to be told one thing and that is ‘Satan Depart’ . . . you are in it for the money. Is this not of Satan? I pray for you —!” (No address)

“Thank you for all the research you have done, for your wonderful courage . . . I am currently LDS — and am trying to get out . . . My roots are deep so this has not been an easy decision . . . I am reading right now your books, ‘Major Problems of Mormonism’ & ‘Covering Up The Black Hole In The Book of Mormon[.]’

“The more I read the more I look I feel — I have certainly been naive about so much.” (Letter from Idaho)

“My wife and I have been members of the L.D.S. church for 18 and 14 years, respectively. In the last 5 years we felt we were standing still and going nowhere. Naturally we looked at ourselves first, then started to question a few things[.] It went from A to Z rather quickly and we found ourselves unable to continue with our callings, going to the temple, paying tithes, etc., but we still need answers that is why we have got in touch with you hoping you can enlighten us to the truth of many things. We have a strong belief in Jesus Christ and God the father, but after that well, we believe in the Bible & that[.] is it. What first got us going was the fact Joseph Smith was a Mason . . .” (Letter from Australia)

“I left the Mormon Church 1 1/2 [years] ago after many years of activity — Your book ‘Mormonism Shadow or Reality’ proved to me it was wrong . . . I’ve become a born again Christian and am so grateful that I’ve learned the truth before it was too late to do anything about it. I’ve asked to have my name removed from membership . . . Again Thank you from the bottom of my heart.” (Letter from Texas)

“O full of all subtility [sic] and all mischief, thou child of the Devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the lord! . . . I did not ask for your propaganda . . .

“People such as you who do not even have the brain that God gave geese are quite sick. May I suggest that before you do this again you become educated in Israel and in Hebrew so you don’t sound like an illiterate idiot. Because I am not an uneducated child like you probably are . . . you sick and perverted people need to worry about God’s forgiveness.” (Letter from Utah)

“How can I ever thank you enough for the truth that has set me free. I am also a former Mormon born and raised in the Church (5th generation) I am giving my life to my Lord & Savior tonight in a water baptism and I delight in studying the scriptures.” (Letter from Utah)

“I have been reading some [of] your tracts which you sent . . . I have come away from the Mormons and have turned my life over to Jesus.” (Letter from Utah)

“You need to worry about God’s forgiveness.” (Letter from Tennessee)

“I’[m] 20 years old, born under the covenant, as of February of this year, ‘Apostate.’ I removed my name from the records, and know from the Bible that I am Saved. I’ve started a little ‘mini-ministry’ . . .” (Letter from Arizona)

“I have seen you on video tapes from the John Amkerberg [sic] Show . . . Let me first thank you from the bottom of our hearts for the ‘light and knowledge’ that you have given me, my family, and my friends concerning Mormonism. I can’t believe that I swallowed this false religion for so long. I thank My Heavenly Father and His Son Jesus for this awakening. . . . Please find two letters attached. One is our request for removal of our names from the Church records and the other is a standard letter I use to write to my other friends who are still taken with this false doctrine.” (Letter from Florida)
“I first learned of the Tanner’s work seven years ago. It has taken that many years for truth to sink in! . . . As a convert of 30 years you can appreciate my problem. . . . Thank you for your work and fight for truth.” (Letter from California)

“We are subscribers to the Salt Lake City Messenger. My husband is an ex-Mormon and we were both raised in Salt Lake. One of my earliest recollections regarding information about ‘the Church’ not being true was hearing about your husband and you and how you were able to leave it. This was probably in the late 60’s and was the first time I had heard that people could really leave. Your story made such an impact on me. We are ever thankful for your ministry because of the encouragement it gave me to search for the truth, years later my husband, and hopefully the impact we are now having on others for the Lord. . . . Your ministry is so important and we really appreciate receiving the Salt Lake City Messenger.” (Letter from Texas)

“My husband & I recently . . . came onto a book . . . we noticed your names mentioned . . . we started to think seriously of having our names stricken from Church records. Finally, we decided to do a little more research, so we went to a Christian bookstore in Provo called His Place . . . we noticed several books written by you. We bought a few of them Mormonism: Shadow or Reality, Major Problems of Mormonism, 3,913 Changes in the Book of Mormon and Flaws in the Pearl of Great Price. Reading these books led us to check out some books on the Masons.

“Seeing all of the documented evidence against the Mormon Church through reading your books has completely changed our minds about the Church.

“Since our son, ____, was born, we’ve had some pressure from family members to have him blessed, but we had decided that instead of having him blessed as a member of the Church at such a young age, we’d wait until he was older & let him decide for himself what religion he wanted to pursue. Now thanks to you & your books, we can give him a chance to see what the Mormon religion is truly based on.

“We have been completely enthralled in your books since we got them, and have spent hours and hours studying them. We would like to receive your newsletter so we can keep up-to-date with your writings.

“Thanks to you, we’ve opened our eyes to what the Mormons are truly teaching us. Thank you so much for that. Please keep up the good work . . .” (Letter from Utah)

“I recently accepted the Lord Jesus Christ into my life. It will be three months ago on the 14th that I was saved. Before that time I was a Mormon. I almost went on a mission for the LDS Church. The Lord told me not to do it, I mean I had my call and I also went through the temple. . . . The last little while I have been having some problems with my family especially my parents. They just don’t understand why I’m doing what I’m doing . . . It’s really been hard on me, so I turn to my Christian friends for help and then I turn to [the] Lord for help because I know that what my friends can’t help me with, He can. . . .

“I was just writing to see if you could give me any advice or any information on how to face the struggles that I’m having or just becoming stronger in Christ. If you could do that for me I would really appreciate it.” (Letter from Idaho)

“We are on your mailing list for the ‘Salt Lake City Messenger.’ Please remove us from that mailing list. . . . I’m sorry that you feel such a need to spread blatant lies. A Christ-like attitude will get you farther in life.” (Letter from Tennessee)

“As a former Mormon who has accepted Christ and is now studying for the ministry, I am very interested in receiving a list of any publications available through your ministry. Your book, ‘The Changing Face [sic] of Mormonism’ was pivotal to my decision to leave the LDS church. For sixteen years I struggled with the nagging suspicion that the church was built on a foundation of lies and fabrications — reading your book was the coup de grace to my tattered faith in a false prophet.

“Praise God that he has raised up people like you. Your courage, scholarship, and persistence is truly a ‘lighthouse’ to those of us who were chained to such a great deception. I eagerly await hearing from you and learning about how I can support your vital work.” (Letter from California)

“I am a very thankful new Christian that has just come out of mormonism. I recently gave my heart to the Lord & now the battle is with my family.” (Letter from Washington)

“Thank you for your ministry. I was a Mormon for seventeen years and my sweet wife was born and raised Mormon. . . . After the lessons by the missionaries, I honestly believed the Mormon Church was true . . .

“As an F-15 pilot for the Air Force, I left for a remote — tour in Iceland. On my way through Dallas, Texas, I stopped and went through the temple ceremonies by myself for the first time. Never before did I see the darkness and asked myself the question: What are we doing and why? After passing through the vail [sic] into the celestial room, I decided to sit and contemplate and pray about the rituals; before I even began, the Holy Spirit whispered in my ear, ‘Leave, this is wrong.’ I didn’t know who the Holy Spirit was at the time, but that was too vivid and too real. I left and never returned . . .

“Separated by thousands of miles, came the trials of a struggling marriage cause by communication difficulties. At the point of failure, our dear gracious Father let me fall from the skys [sic] by letting me contract multiple sclerosis (M. S.). This meant the end of flying with the wings of man; but, my new flight with the true Jesus is far more rewarding. . . . In 1991, the Air Force medically retired me at 100 percent disabled. My commander called me in three months prior to my retirement and relieved me of duty because of the difficulties I was having. He told me to go home and take care of my family matters. So I took care of the most important matter; our salvation.

“For three months, II Tim 2:15, Prov 15:28, I Thes 5:21, and John 8:32 was followed; I studied, proved, and sought truth. What I found was that the Mormon Church had the ‘flavor’ of Christianity but lacked substance . . . We now have the ‘true’ Jesus in our lives with the help of Christian ministries like yours bringing the ‘true’ Word to Mormons . . . The names of my family are pulled from the Mormon records and are now on the rolls of a ‘Christian’ church. Thank you for your help!!

“I am bringing God’s Word to all our mormon friends and families. Christian cadets from the Air Force Academy are calling on my help in bringing truth to Mormon cadets leaving on missions. I may be medically retired, but I’m not dead! I will continue to bring the true word of God to mormons . . . Thank you for your ministry.” (Letter from Colorado)

“I was a very active temple ‘worthy’ and temple attending Mormon for 15 years before starting to fully realize the corruption within the Church and even more recently how the occult played such a big role in its origins and practices. Interestingly, it wasn’t until I was exposed to a lot of New Age things in CA and other psychic practices that the light started truly coming on for me about the Mormon Church. I still find myself struggling to unlearn or resolve what I was taught in the Church (Mormon). . . . I . . . have numerous Mormon acquaintances . . . I want to help reach many of them in the future after I get more stable and sure myself of my new and true knowledge of Christ and the actual facts surrounding the Mormon Church.

“Presently I am attending a Bible study meeting and a ‘know your Bible’ meeting as well as church with Bible believing Christians . . . I’m really seeing how much the Mormon Church distorted the Bible even as I read it on my own without Mormon footnotes & commentaries to do my thinking for me.” (Letter from Nebraska)

“I received your letter yesterday and all your pamphlets and copy sheets today. I have finished reading them. I am sick at heart, that I could of been one of the millions that has fallen for this [i.e., Mormonism]. . . . I had even thought to ask you to take my name off the mailing list until these last two mailings. You have been very straightforward with me. That is not what I’ve gotten from the members. . . . How could I of not seen any of this? I have been studying this faith for 2 years. . . .

“My questions started hitting me when I purchased the book ‘Gospel Principles.’ . . . It’s kind of like a lovely Christmas package all wrapped so beautifully but when opened the outer is more pleasant than the inner.

“I use to feel bad toward you because my new friends said that you was wrong. I want to ask your forgiveness and to say I am packing away everything I possess of LDS literature. . . .

“May God keep you in his tender care and guide your feet on the path to help others. . . . My prayers will be with you always.” (Letter from Texas)

“You have been a blessing in my life and also in my wife’s life in more ways than one. When I met my wife she was a devoted mormon. I was a christian that didn’t know what God wanted to do with my life. I was concerned with many of the things she was saying as far as doctrine was concerned but I didn’t know a good way of refuting them. That’s when I bought ‘[Mormonism:] Shadow or Reality.’ That is when I knew what God wanted in my life! I found myself studying the bible much more than just my devotion time and also slowly building a apologist library! At the same time I was witnessing to now my wife and after three months of phone calls (I lived in So. Cal. and she lived in Salt Lake City) she accepted Christ moved down to Cal. and later we got married! I am now . . . going to college and getting my philosophy degree, witnessing and studying on the way! Maybe I can start a Lighthouse up here! . . . You are in our prayers always.” (Letter from Minnesota)

“Thank you so very much for the research and material you sent me in response to our telephone conversation. You were very kind and generous and I appreciate your personal concern. Just to have been able to talk with you and discuss briefly my personal situation gave me an abundance of courage that I need right now. . . .

“I feel ashamed and embarrassed to admit that I was once in the ministry, but over the years became callused to the effects the music ministry had on my life. . . . I saw so much good in the Church that I ‘wanted to believe’ the LDS story. I went for the ‘whole enchilada.’ My wife and I even went back to Nauvoo and the Carthage jail. I ate it up until it finally hit me after a few short visits to the Temple in L. A.

“If there is anything good that has come from this experience, I am now, for the first time in my life, ‘sincerely hungry’ to read the Bible with more interest than I ever had before. I read at least two to four chapters every day. I didn’t read this much when I was in Bible School! Since the Church is still so visibly pres[en]t in my life, it seems I have such a strong and urgent interest in reading and knowing more about the real truth of Joseph Smith and the LDS Church that has taken three years of my life. . . . God bless your efforts.” (Letter from California)
Support the Lighthouse

When we first began our work with the Mormon people we had a very difficult time getting their attention. After thirty years of ministry in Salt Lake City, however, things have really changed. Some members of the LDS Church are now very hungry for the truth and seek us out. Many of these people are turning to the Lord.

If we are able to complete our new bookstore and offices this year, we will be able to reach many more people. The most important thing a person can do for our work is to pray that God will open the eyes of those that we minister to and that He would give us the encouragement and strength to continue.

Since we provide our materials at the lowest possible cost to our readers, the money we receive from our books and tapes only covers about half the cost of operating Utah Lighthouse Ministry. If it were not for those who provide donations to our ministry, we would be in serious financial trouble. We consider these people to be a vital part of our team. They are, in fact, making an important investment in the souls of people who have been misled with falsified information furnished by the LDS Church.

Utah Lighthouse Ministry is a non-profit organization that ministers to many people and provides support for 44 children through World Vision. Those who are interested in helping our ministry can send their tax-deductible contributions to Utah Lighthouse Ministry, PO Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110. Contributions and orders can now be made over the phone (801 465-8894) [Web-editor: and over the internet] with Visa, MasterCard or Discover Card.

Church Hides Documents From Prosecutors

In our last newsletter we revealed that Gordon B. Hinckley and other members of the Mormon hierarchy had important McLellin documents that they deliberately suppressed from prosecutors in the Hofmann murder-forgery case to save the church from embarrassment. We noted that the material was a “key piece of evidence” needed in the investigation. Later we published the book, The Mormon Church and the McLellin Collection, and showed that those involved in the case were disturbed by the church’s attempt to cover up this important matter. We quoted the following from an article written by Lynn Packer:

“Grant said the case may have taken a different course had the church promptly disclosed. He said a significant shift in public opinion against Hofmann might have prompted Hofmann’s attorneys to enter plea negotiations before the preliminary hearing began, rather than after, as they did” (Ibid., page 36).

Gerry D’Elia, one of the prosecutors, was very disturbed by the church’s suppression of the McLellin collection:

“I can’t believe that nobody came forward with it,” says Gerry D’Elia . . . “It was a waste of our time and taxpayers’ money.” Mr. D’Elia believes the information would have helped prosecutors. Knowing the church already had the McLellin collection could have established Hofmann’s motives. “Our biggest problem was the motive — that goes to the heart of the case,” says Mr. D’Elia. (Salt Lake Tribune, October 31, 1992)

We have recently issued a 2nd edition of The Mormon Church and the McLellin Collection. In this edition we have modified our conclusions regarding the Oliver Cowdery history. In the 1st edition we reported that two Mormon officials made comments that indicated the church had that early history. Further investigation, however, leads us to conclude that these officials may have been mistaken about the matter. Those who already have the 1st edition can receive the relevant material free upon request.

Our new book, The Mormon Church and the McLellin Collection, examines William McLellin’s charges against Joseph Smith and the Mormon Church. It contains important extracts from McLellin’s unpublished papers. In addition, it has a great deal of material regarding the church’s suppression of the collection. This book usually sells for $5.00, but if it is ordered before June 30, the price will be only $4.00. (Mail orders please add $1.50 minimum postage and handling.)

MORMON INQUISITION?

LDS LEADERS MOVE TO REPRESS REBELLION

While the Mormon Church continues to grow at a rapid rate (it now has close to 9,000,000 members [1993]), it is obvious that internal problems are also beginning to mount. Consequently, church leaders have decided to take an uncompromising stand against Mormon historians who wish to tell the unvarnished truth about church history and other dissenters within the church.

FIVE EXCOMMUNICATED

In an apparent show of strength just before the October, 1993, General Conference of the Mormon Church, six prominent church members were summoned to stand trial in church courts for apostasy. On October 2, 1993, the Salt Lake Tribune reported concerning the results of those trials:

Three men and three women have been charged with apostasy for their writing and speaking about Mormon subjects. Paul Toscano, Avraham Gileadi, D. Michael Quinn, Maxine Hanks and Lavina Fielding Anderson were excommunicated. Lynne Kanavel Whitesides was disfellowshipped.

During the council, Ms. Whitesides was accused of “creating friction” with her Mormon feminist statements on television. She also was charged with failure to support church leaders by saying, also on TV, she couldn’t “find any evidence of Christ in [Elder] Packer’s last speech.”

She was disfellowshipped... for “conduct contrary to the laws of the church.”...

Lavina Fielding Anderson was excommunicated for a single article in the independent Mormon journal, Dialogue. The LDS Intellectual Community and Church Leadership chronicled episodes of intimidation against Mormon thinkers for the last 20 years. . . .

LDS historian D. Michael Quinn has had three such councils within the last four months. . . .

While he didn’t attend the council, he wrote a defense. “I vowed I would never again participate in a process which was designed to punish me for being the messenger of unwanted historical evidence and to intimidate me from further work in Mormon history,” he wrote.

But he did reaffirm his faith that “Jesus is the Christ, that Joseph Smith was God’s prophet of the Restoration and that Ezra Taft Benson is the prophet, seer and revelator on the Earth today.”

The council was kind. They put him on probation. But in July, the punishment was upgraded to disfellowshipment. This week, while he was in California, his stake leaders excommunicated him. . . . Avraham Gileadi, a conservative theologian and writer, was excommunicated for his writings about the Apocalypse and the Book of Isaiah. He . . . declined to talk with the press about his experience.
Some of those who were excommunicated used to write articles for the church’s official publication, The Ensign. D. Michael Quinn, for instance, has written at least six articles for The Ensign, and about the same number for Brigham Young University Studies. It seems ironic that this man, who was once held in high esteem within the church, is now considered to be an “anti-Mormon.”

It was, in fact, D. Michael Quinn who lifted his pen in 1977 in an attempt to refute our work. Dr. Quinn wrote a pamphlet entitled, Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s Distorted View of Mormonism: A Response to Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? According to Richard Stephen Marshall, Mormon historian Reed Durham gave him the following information:

> He also said that due to the large number of letters the Church Historian’s Office is receiving asking for answers to the things the Tanners have published, a certain scholar (name deliberately withheld) was appointed to write a general answer to the Tanners. . . . This unnamed person solicited the help of Reed Durham on the project. The work is finished but its publication is delayed, according to what Leonard Arrington told Durham, because they can not decide how or where to publish it. . . . it will probably be published anonymously, to avoid difficulties which could result were such an article connected with an official Church agency. (“The New Mormon History,” by Richard Stephen Marshall, A Senior Honors Project Summary, University of Utah, May 1, 1977, page 62)

As Dr. Durham predicted, Michael Quinn’s work was “published anonymously.” The words, “By a Latter-day Saint Historian,” appear where Quinn’s name should be found on the front cover and the first page of the book. The coming forth of the anonymous rebuttal was shrouded in secrecy. While we knew Zion Bookstore was the distributor of the response, we were unable to find out where the booklets were printed. In almost all books the name of the publisher is listed at the beginning of the book. When we asked Sam Weller, the owner of the bookstore, where he had obtained them, he replied that he did not know! and that it was all a very secret operation. He claimed that he received a letter giving details of how he could handle the pamphlet, but that the writer was not identified. He maintained that he received 1,800 free copies of the pamphlet and was told that he could use any money he made to reprint the booklet.

We talked with Wilfrid Clark, who works for Mr. Weller. Clark claimed that all he knew about the matter was that Zion Bookstore received an anonymous letter containing a key to room in a self storage company on Redwood Road. He said that he personally went to the company and picked up the books.

In our book, Answering Dr. Clandestine: A Response to the Anonymous LDS Historian, pages 1-6, we show how we broke through the maze to learn that D. Michael Quinn was the author of the rebuttal. This identification was confirmed by David Mayfield, who worked for the Historical Department of the church at the time the rebuttal was being prepared.

Those who were in authority over Quinn must have had a great deal of trust in him; otherwise, they would not have allowed him to work on such a secret project which could cause the church great embarrassment if the details of it became known.

An organization known as Mormon Miscellaneous, located at 8912 South 700 East, Sandy, UT 84070, still reprints and sells Dr. Quinn’s rebuttal to us. Now that Quinn has been excommunicated from the Mormon Church, it will be interesting to see if this organization will continue to sell the pamphlet. It would seem that there should at least be some attempt to clarify what has taken place. Instead of the words, “By a Latter-day Saint Historian” appearing at the front of the booklet, it should read something like, “By an Ex-Latter-day Saint Historian.”

While D. Michael Quinn still maintains his belief that Joseph Smith was a prophet, he has obviously become more critical of the church leaders suppressing important documents. In the booklet he prepared in 1977, he criticized us for being upset that the General Authorities of the church were suppressing important documents from their people:

> An extension of the Tanners’ selective use of evidence is the fact that they often make assertions and draw conclusions without referring to evidence that qualifies, challenges, or refutes their argument. For example, they berate the LDS Church for “Suppression of Records.” . . . the Tanners cast the LDS Archives in a sinister light because it was closed to the public for many decades, but fail to comment that this closed-archive practice is not only consistent with the policy of most businesses (including the richly historical Hudson’s Bay Company), but also with that of most religious and charitable organizations. (Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s Distorted View of Mormonism: A Response to Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 13-14)

Not long after Dr. Quinn wrote the statement cited above, he had his own first-hand encounter with the suppressive policies of the church and did not like what he experienced. In his research Quinn discovered that for a number of years after the 1890 Manifesto, which was supposed to stop the practice of polygamy, a number of prominent church leaders and others were secretly given permission to take plural wives. Quinn pursued information concerning this subject but found that church leaders would not allow him to examine some important documents in the First Presidency’s vault. In his article, “On Being a Mormon Historian (and its Aftermath),” D. Michael Quinn wrote the following:

President Hinckley telephoned in June 1982 to say that he was sympathetic about a request I had written to obtain access to documents in the First Presidency’s vault but that my request could not be granted . . .

In May 1984 my college dean told me he had been instructed by “higher authority” to ask me not to publish a paper I had just presented to the Mormon History Association. It was a historical survey of the public activity of general authorities in business corporations. The dean apologized for having to make this request. I agreed not to publish my presentation and told no one about the incident.

In 1985, after Dialogue published my article “LDS Church Authority and New Plural Marriages, 1890-1904,” three apostles gave orders for my stake president to confiscate my temple recommend . . . I was told that three apostles believed...
I was guilty of “speaking evil of the Lord’s anointed.” The stake president was also instructed “to take further action” against me if this did not “remedy the situation” of my writing controversial Mormon history. . . . I told the stake president that this was an obvious effort to intimidate me from doing history that might “offend the Brethren”[i.e., the highest leaders of the church] . . . The stake president also saw this as a back-door effort to have me fired from BYU. . . .

I find it one of the fundamental ironies of modern Mormonism that the general authorities who praise free agency, also do their best to limit free agency’s prerequisites — access to information, uninhibited inquiry, and freedom of expression. (Faithful History: Essays on Writing Mormon History, edited by George D. Smith, 1992, pages 90-93, 95)

D. Michael Quinn finally found the church leaders’ attempt to control their history so repressive that he felt he could no longer do research at the church archives:

In June 1986 the staff of the church historical department announced it was necessary to sign a form which Elder Packer declared gave the right of pre-publication censorship for any archival research completed before signing the form. I and several others refused to sign the form and have not returned to do research at LDS church archives since 1986. (Ibid., page109, footnote 52)

D. Michael Quinn has shown a great deal of courage throughout his ordeal with church leaders and officials at Brigham Young University. In 1981, he did something that very few Mormon scholars dared to do: he publicly took issue with Apostles Ezra Taft Benson and Boyd K. Packer, two of the most powerful leaders of the Mormon Church. To make things even worse for Quinn, Benson became president of the church in 1985.

It was on November 4, 1981, that Quinn delivered a monumental address before a student history association at Brigham Young University. In the Salt Lake City Messenger, March 1982, we called it “One of the best speeches ever given by a Mormon historian.” Newsweek referred to it as a “stirring defense of intellectual integrity.” In this speech, Dr. Quinn revealed that church officials “viewed with understandable misgiving this burgeoning exploration of Mormonism’s fluid past,” and then went on to make these significant comments:

The concern of these Church leaders has not been assuaged by the fact that contemporary with the proliferation of Mormon historians and histories there has been a shift in anti-Mormon propaganda from doctrinal diatribe to the polemical use of elements from the Mormon past to discredit the LDS Church today. In reaction to this confluence of developments, two members of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles (Ezra Taft Benson and Boyd K. Packer) have specifically identified Latter-day Saint historians as the source of difficulty. . . . General authorities in recent years have criticized Mormon historians for republishing in part or whole out-of-print Church publications such as the 1830 Book of Mormon, the Journal of Discourses (edited and published for thirty-two years under the auspices of the First Presidency), and statements taken from former Church magazines published for the children, youth, and general membership of the Church. It is an odd situation when present general authorities criticize historians for reprinting what previous general authorities regarded not only as faith-promoting but as appropriate for Mormon youth and the newest converts.

Elder Packer specifically warns against historians using “the unworthy, the unsavory, or the sensational,” from the Mormon past, merely because it has been previously published somewhere else, and he berates historians for their “exaggerated loyalty to the theory that everything must be told.” But this raises the question of personal honesty and professional integrity. If a historian writes about any subject unrelated to religion, and he purposely fails to make reference to pertinent information of which he has knowledge, he is justifiably liable to be criticized for dishonesty. . . .

In connection with Elder Packer’s counsel to avoid reference to previously published sensitivities, Elder Benson warns historians against environmental explanations of the background of revelations and developments in LDS history . . .

Like the questions of previously published items, a historian writing about a non-religious subject would be considered inept at best and dishonest at worst if he described someone’s innovation or contribution without discussing the significance of previously existing, similar contributions and ideas of which the historical person was undoubtedly aware. If a Latter-day Saint historian discusses the revelation to Joseph Smith about abstinence from tobacco, strong drinks, and hot drinks, and then fails to note that during the 1830s religious reformers and social reformers were involved nationally in urging abstinence from these identical things, any reader has cause to criticize the historian’s accuracy, to question his motives, and to doubt any affirmation the historian might give to the revelation’s truth. . . . If we write Mormon history as though its revelations and developments occurred without any reference to surrounding circumstances, we undermine the claims for the Restoration of living prophets . . . Boyd K. Packer demands that Mormon historians demonstrate and affirm that “the hand of the Lord [has been] in every hour and every moment of the Church from its beginning till now.” . . . Mormon historians may share the convictions of the Nephite prophets and Boyd K. Packer that the “hand of the lord” operates throughout history and that “His purposes fail not,” but they also have an obligation to examine the evidence, reflect upon it, and offer the best interpretations they can for what has occurred in Mormon history. . . .

A more serious problem of Mormon history is involved in the implications of Boyd K. Packer’s demand that historians demonstrate that “the hand of the Lord [has been] in every hour and every moment of the church from its beginning till now.” Every Mormon historian agrees with Ezra Taft Benson that “we must never forget that ours is a prophetic history,” but there are serious problems in the assertion or implication that this prophetic history of Mormonism requires “the hand of the Lord” in every decision, statement, and action of the prophets. . . . Central to the apparent demands of Elders Benson and Packer is the view that the official acts and pronouncements of the prophets are always the express will of God. This is the Mormon equivalent of the Roman Catholic doctrine of papal infallibility. . . .

Mormon historians would be false to their understanding of LDS doctrines, the Sacred History of the Scriptures, the realities of human conduct, and the documentary evidence of Mormonism if they sought to defend the proposition that LDS prophets were infallible in their decisions and statements. . . . the Mormon historian has both a religious and professional obligation not to conceal the ambivalence, debate, give-and-take, uncertainty, and simple pragmatism that often attend decisions of the prophet and First Presidency, and not to conceal the limitations, errors, and negative consequences of some significant statements of the prophet and First Presidency. In like manner, however, the Mormon historian would be equally false if he failed to report the inspiration, visions, revelations, and solemn testimonies that have also attended prophetic decisions and statements throughout Mormon history.

A few critics have been more specific in their criticism of Mormon historians who portray the human frailties of LDS leaders. Ezra Taft Benson observes that Mormon historians tend “to inordinately humanize the prophets of God so that their human frailties become more evident than their spiritual qualities,” and Boyd K. Packer has recently made the following comments about a Mormon historian’s talk: “What that historian did with the reputation of the President of the Church was not worth doing. He seemed determined to convince everyone that the prophet was a man. We knew that already. All of the prophets and all of the Apostles have been men. It would have been much more worthwhile for him to have convinced us that the prophet was a prophet; a fact quite as true as the fact that he was a man. He has taken something away from the memory of a prophet. He has destroyed faith.”

This is, in part, related to the infallibility question. Elder Packer criticizes historians for eliminating the spiritual dimension from their studies of prophets, and he accuses such historians of distortion for failing to deal with such a fundamental characteristic. Yet Elders Benson and Packer also demand that historians omit any reference to human frailty (aside from physical problems, I suppose) in studies of LDS leaders, and emphasize only the spiritual dimension. Elder Packer quite rightly observes that omitting the spiritual, revelatory dimension from the life of a Church leader would also deny the existence of the spiritual and revelatory, but it is equally true that omitting reference to human weaknesses, faults and limitations from the life of a prophet is also a virtual denial of the existence of human weaknesses and fallibility in the prophet. Must Church history writing portray LDS leaders as infallible, both as leaders and as men? This is not the Sacred History we know.

Sacred History (which is contained in the Bible, Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants, and Pearl of Great Price) is an absolute refutation of the kind of history Elders Benson and Packer seem to be advocating. Sacred History presents the prophets and apostles as the most human of men who have been called by God to prophetic responsibility. Sacred History portrays the spiritual dimensions and achievements of God’s leaders as facts, but Sacred History also matter-of-factly demonstrates the weaknesses of God’s leaders. Examples are the scriptural accounts of Abraham’s abandonment of his wife Hagar and son Ishmael, Noah’s drunkenness, Lot’s incest, Moses’ arrogance, Jonah’s vacillation, Peter’s impetuosity and cowardice. . . . Moreover, the Doctrine and Covenants contains frequent condemnations of Joseph Smith by the Lord. Sacred History affirms the reality of divine revelation and inspiration, but also matter-of-factly demonstrates that God’s leaders often disagree and do not always follow His revelations consistently. . . .

According to the standards of history apparently required by Ezra Taft Benson and Boyd K. Packer, such a writer of Scriptural Sacred History is suspect at best and faith-destroying at worst. . . . The recent biography of Spencer W. Kimball is virtually Sacred History in its presentation of a loveably human prophet of God, whereas the Mormon history of benignly angelic Church leaders apparently advocated by Elder Benson and Packer would border on idolatry.

Ezra Taft Benson, Boyd K. Packer, and Professor Midgley accuse Mormon historians of writing Church history to accommodate non-Mormon scholarship, but Elder Packer, in particular, advocates another type of Accommodation History. He assails the philosophy and conduct of Mormon historians because their objective Church history “may unwittingly be giving ‘equal time’ to the adversary,” and because such history “may be read by those not mature enough for ‘advanced history’ and a testimony in seedling stage may be crushed.” . . . Boyd K. Packer is not advocating the gradual exposure of the Saints to historical truth. He excludes that possibility by warning historians against publishing objective history even in professional journals that “go far beyond the audience that they have intended, and destroy faith,” and he assails Mormon historians who “want to tell everything whether it is worthy or faith promoting or not.” Elder Packer is not advocating Paul’s doctrine of milk before meat, but he demands that Mormon historians provide only a church history diet of milk to Latter-day Saints of whatever experience. . . . a diet of milk alone will stunt the growth of, if not kill, any child.

Aside from urging the kind of Church history that would not surprise or offend even the newest convert, Boyd K. Packer urges that historians write Church history from a siege mentality to deny any information that enemies of the Church could possibly use to criticize the Church. By this standard, most of the Old Testament, the Gospel of John, many of Paul’s epistles, and the Book of Revelation would never be approved for inclusion in the Bible. . . . Why does the well-established and generally respected Mormon Church today need a protective, defensive, paranoid approach to its history that the actually embattled earlier Saints did not employ?

Ezra Taft Benson and Boyd K. Packer want Church history to be as elementary as possible and as defensive as possible. This is Accommodation History for consumption by the weakest of the conceivably weak Saints, for the vilest of the conceivably vile anti-Mormons, and for the most impressionable of the world’s sycophants. . . .

The Accommodation History advocated by Elders Benson and Packer and actually practiced by some LDS writers is intended to protect the Saints, but actually disillusions them and makes them vulnerable. . . . The tragic reality is that there have been occasions when Church leaders, teachers, and writers have not told the truth they knew about difficulties of the Mormon past, but have offered to the Saints instead a mixture of platitudes, half-truths, omissions, and plausible denials. Elder Packer and others would justify this because “we are at war with the adversary” and must also protect any Latter-day Saint whose “testimony [is] in seedling stage.” But such a public-relations defense of the Church is actually a Maginot Line of sandy fortifications which ‘the enemy’ can easily breach and which has been built up by digging lethal pits.
into which the Saints will stumble. A so-called “faith-promoting” Church history which conceals controversies and difficulties of the Mormon past actually undermines the faith of Latter-day Saints who eventually learn about the problem from other sources... In warning Mormon historians against objective history and against telling too much truth about the Mormon past, Boyd K. Packer says, “Do not spread disease germs!” To adopt the symbolism of Elder Packer, I suggest that it is apostates and anti-Mormons who seek to infect the Saints with disease germs of doubt, disloyalty, disaffection, and rebellion. These typhoid Marys of spiritual contagion obtain the materials of their assaults primarily from the readily available documents and publications created by former LDS leaders and members themselves. Historians have not created the problem areas of the Mormon past; they are trying to respond to them. Believing Mormon historians like myself seek to write candid Church history in a context of perspective in order to inoculate the Saints against the historical disease germs that apostates and anti-Mormons may thrust upon them. The criticism we have received in our efforts would be similar to leaders of eighteenth century towns trying to combat smallpox contagion by locking up Dr. Edward Jenner who tried to inoculate the people, and killing the cows he wanted to use for his vaccine.

The central argument of the enemies of the LDS Church is historical, and if we seek to build the Kingdom of God by ignoring or denying the problem areas of our past, we are leaving the Saints unprotected. (On Being A Mormon Historian, by D. Michael Quinn, 1982, pages 2, 8-10, 13-14, 16-22; revised and reprinted in 1992 in Faithful History: Essays On Writing Mormon History, pages 69-111)

In the “Aftermath” which appears in Faithful History, Michael Quinn stated that after he gave this talk, he was warned by “active and inactive Mormons, and even non-Mormons” not to publish this essay. Nevertheless, he gave Sunstone permission to publish it. The “publicity resulted in meetings with my college dean and with a member of the First Presidency.... Neither Dean Hickman nor President Hinckley gave direct instructions, but both advised against publication of ‘On Being a Mormon Historian.’ A few days later, I asked Sunstone’s editors not to print the already-typeset essay.” (Faithful History, page 89)

When we discovered that Sunstone was not going forward with the publication of this important speech, we suspected that a great deal of pressure was being exerted to suppress Dr. Quinn’s essay. Since we felt that no publisher connected with Mormonism would dare print the speech, we published it ourselves in early 1982. Quinn did not ask us to do it, and we had no communication with him—either directly or indirectly—regarding the subject. We published it because we believed the Mormon people had a right to know what was going on in their church.

Church leaders were distressed with Quinn when Newsweek ran a story entitled, “Apostles vs. Historians,” on February 15, 1982. Quinn reported that one of the church leaders warned him that Apostle Boyd K. Packer, whom he had criticized in his speech, could remain vengeful long after having a disagreement: “A few days later, a general authority invited me to his office. He warned me that he found Elder Packer to be easily offended and vindictive years afterwards” (Faithful History, pages 89-90).

On page 103 of the same book, footnote 22, Michael Quinn told of an experience he had with Apostle Boyd K. Packer:

When Elder Packer interviewed me as a prospective member of Brigham Young University’s faculty in 1976, he explained: “I have a hard time with historians because they idolize the truth. The truth is not uplifting; it destroys. I could tell most of the secretaries in the church office building that they are ugly and fat. That would be the truth, but it would hurt and destroy them. Historians should tell only that part of the truth that is inspiring and uplifting.”

Although he did not use the same graphic example, in a speech given in 1981, Apostle Boyd K. Packer made these comments:

There is a temptation for the writer or the teacher of Church history to want to tell everything, whether it is worthy or faith promoting or not. Some things that are true are not very useful.

Historians seem to take great pride in publishing something new, particularly if it illustrates a weakness or mistake of a prominent historical figure. . . .

The writer or the teacher who has an exaggerated loyalty to the theory that everything must be told is laying a foundation for his own judgment. . . .

That historian or scholar who delights in pointing out the weaknesses and frailties of present or past leaders destroys faith. A destroyer of faith . . . places himself in great spiritual jeopardy. He is serving the wrong master, and unless he repents, he will not be among the faithful in the eternities . . .

In the Church we are not neutral. We are one-sided. There is a war going on and we are engaged in it. (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1981, pages 263-264, 266-267)

Interestingly, many Mormon intellectuals feel that Apostle Boyd K. Packer is the moving force behind the present purge going on in the church. An Associated Press article mentioned that, “The actions came just months after Elder Boyd K. Packer of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles identified feminists, homosexuals and intellectuals as the three dangers facing The Mormon Church” (Salt Lake Tribune, September 20, 1993).

Church officials, however, have denied that the excommunications have been directed from the highest levels of the church and claim that it is local leaders who have instigated the trials. It seems highly unlikely, however, that so many prominent people would be called in by local leaders in such a short period of time. The whole thing seems to be orchestrated from above. As indicated above, it appears that the timing of the purge was related to the General Conference of the Mormon Church. Church leaders seem to be making a statement that those who continue to question the authority and policies of church will be cut off.

Some important information regarding Apostle Packer’s involvement in the purge came to light on October 10, 1993, when the Arizona Republic printed the following:
. . . a small but influential number of “saints” claim their leaders are silencing legitimate internal debate in the name of maintaining doctrinal purity, conformity, obedience and faith. . . .

The situation is complicated by the fact that the church’s president and prophet, 94-year-old Ezra Taft Benson, is silenced by infirmity.

Benson’s counselors and quorums run church affairs. Critics claim that the void has robbed the church of direction and perhaps even of divine inspiration, and that ambitious elders may be leading the Brethren astray. . . .

Dallin Oaks, 61, a member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles . . . said the sanctions were not part of an orchestrated effort to silence critics.

“There is no purge,” said the former BYU president, who has dismissed critics as “publicity hounds” and “wolves.”

However, Oaks did not deny that Boyd K. Packer, a senior apostle may have improperly met with the leader of a church court hearing excommunication proceedings against author and lawyer Paul Toscano.

Toscano, 48, an outspoken women’s rights supporter, was “ex’d,” as church members call excommunication, on Sept. 19.

In addition, Oaks acknowledged that the Strengthening the Members Committee, which some members liken to an intelligence agency but which Oaks calls a “clipping service,” may have monitored speeches, writings and activities of those suspected of apostasy and passed on material to church officials.

“Elder Packer does not have the authority to make church policy,” Oaks said of the man many dissidents believe plays a key role in the crackdown. . . .

Oaks said that “Elder Packer is having any conversations with” the court, “it is outside the normal channels and . . . if he gave a directed verdict (against Toscano), that is contrary to policy and irregular, and it is contrary to what I know about Elder Packer and the way he operates.”

Packer acknowledged Thursday that he met in July with fellow church leader Loren Dunn and Toscano’s stake president, Kerry Heinz, to discuss Toscano. He said Heinz requested the meeting.

“We talked doctrine and philosophy,” Packer said. “I did not instruct him to hold a disciplinary council and absolutely did not direct a verdict. That is against church policy. When he (Heinz) left, I did not know what he would do.” . . .

Last month, John Beck, 33, of Provo, resigned the church and quit his job as a BYU business professor.

“My problems had to do with the ethics of the university,” he said, “which comes down to their not telling the truth. They are firing people not for the reasons they say.”

His wife, Martha Nibley Beck, 30, daughter of famed pro-church scholar Hugh Nibley, said she left her job as a BYU sociology professor in July after the school removed Carol Lee Hawkins as leader of the Women’s Symposium . . .

“The church is moving toward social isolation,” Martha Beck said . . .

BYU spokeswoman Margaret Smoot said that the removal of Hawkins was routine . . .

However, Smoot’s predecessor, Paul Richards, 57, who left BYU last year, ridiculed that notion . . . “The church wants to portray this image of being unified in all it does. . . . It wants Mormons to be unquestioning—something I believe goes against church teachings and portrays a great insecurity.

“I worked in public affairs for the church for 13 years, and I had to lie all the time, and this has really battered my faith.” (Arizona Republic, Oct. 10, 1993)

The same issue of the Arizona Republic revealed that the Mormon prophet’s grandson had decided to leave the church because of the church’s misrepresentation of the facts:

Pulitzer Prize-winning cartoonist Steve Benson—first grandchild of Ezra Taft Benson, the ailing head and prophet of the Mormon Church—has resigned from the church. . . . His wife of 16 years, Mary Ann Benson, 36, also resigned. . . . The Bensons said they resigned to protest what they believe is an increasingly intolerant church leadership. . . .

He said the example set by his conservative, outspoken 94-year-old grandfather . . . gave him the fortitude to make an emotionally wrenching split from the church.

“There is an old Mormon hymn,” he said in explaining his resignation, ‘Do what is right, let the consequence follow, battle for freedom in spirit and might.’

“In order to be truly obedient, one must be allowed the right to think, question, doubt, and search for truth. The modern church is intolerant of these God-given rights. . . . I didn’t leave the church. The church left me.”

Mary Ann Benson said leaving the church was “painful, yet exhilarating.”

“Since I’ve left, I feel very empowered and free, free to define my relationship with God, follow my purpose in life and free to finally find peace,” she said.

Steve Benson said he believes one sign of the church’s “dysfunctionality” was reaction to his statements in July on his grandfather’s infirmity.

At that time, Benson said he believed that due to his failing health, his grandfather was incapable of exerting any true leadership.

“I hated to see the church manipulate him and . . . use him to falsely prop up the notion that he is actively leading the church,” he said.

“Local church leaders called me in to explain my actions. I received anonymous letters, some hateful, from church members—in essence damning me to hell and telling me I was possessed by the devil.” (Arizona Republic, Oct 10, 1993)

The following day, October 11, 1993, the Salt Lake Tribune reported some other statements made by Steve Benson:

“I could not, in good conscience, be in an organization that was destroying the spirituality of the very souls of its members,” Mr. Benson said Sunday. “In the name of freedom of religion, the church has turned freedom of speech on its head.”

“[I left] because of the current atmosphere of fear, intolerance and intimidation in this dark period of the church we’re groping through now,” he said. . . .

“I felt the church had put a theological plastic bag over my head that was spiritually and intellectually suffocating me,” he said. . . .
Be [by?] refusing to be silenced, and by leaving a church he believes to be run by a “corrupt” leadership, he said he has lived up to his grandfather’s expectations.

The next day an article written by Vern Anderson of The Associated Press reported a new development. The article was captioned, “Oaks Lied To Protect Fellow Apostle”:

The grandson of Mormon Church President Ezra Taft Benson contends that a church apostle lied in order to cover up a more senior apostle’s role in the excommunication of a Mormon dissident.

Pulitzer Prize-winning cartoonist Steve Benson said Monday his decision last week to resign from the church was based in part on Elder Dallin H. Oaks’ statements to a reporter about Elder Boyd K. Packer.

Elder Oaks admitted late Monday he “could not defend the truthfulness of one of the statements” about Packer, who is considered by many to be behind the church’s recent crackdown on dissidents.

Oaks told Arizona Republic reporter Paul Brinkley-Rogers on Oct. 1 that he had “no knowledge” of whether Packer had met with Kerrin Heinz, the local ecclesiastical leader for ... Paul Tascano, before Heinz excommunicated Tascano on Sept. 19.

However, in a “personal and confidential” letter to Oaks on Oct. 6, Benson reminded the apostle that in a private meeting Sept. 24, Oaks had told Benson he was “distressed and astonished” that Packer had met with Heinz.

He quoted Oaks as saying of Packer, “You can’t stage manage a grizzly bear,” and added that “it was a mistake for Packer to meet with Heinz and a mistake for Heinz to ask for the meeting.”

Benson said he was making his letter to Oaks public because he was fed up with church leaders shading the truth.

In an interview Monday evening, Oaks declined to confirm or deny most of Benson’s assertions about a pair of private interviews the church prophet’s grandson had in September with Oaks and Elder Neal A. Maxwell, another member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles.

However, Oaks, a former Utah Supreme Court justice, acknowledged that his single statement to reporter Brinkley-Rogers about having no knowledge of the Packer-Heinz meeting was one “I could not defend.”

“It was not a truthful statement,” Oaks said.

Benson’s letter to Oaks had warned the apostle that unless he set the record straight, Benson would feel no obligation to honor the promise of confidentiality he had earlier given Oaks and Maxwell.

Oaks called The Republic’s reporter that night and retracted the “I have no knowledge of whether he [Packer] did” statement.

Oaks did not retract other statements in the interview... that Benson had alleged—and Oaks denies—were false or deliberately misleading.

Oaks ... stressed that Benson at least three times had assured him and Maxwell that their meetings ... were confidential and would never be publicly discussed.

“I think that Steve Benson is just going to have to carry the responsibility for whatever he relates about a confidential meeting,” Oaks said.

Benson said he felt acutely the moral dilemma of having promised confidentiality, but then having seen deliberate efforts to mislead the public about Packer’s role in the Toscano affair.

“I had to decide to be a party to the cover up or be faithful to my own convictions,” Benson said. “I had to let Elder Oaks walk a plank of his own making.” (Salt Lake Tribune, October 12, 1993)

The more church leaders said on the subject, the worse it began to look for Oaks, Packer and other church leaders. Apostle Packer eventually revealed that he had the approval of the Council of the Twelve Apostles to meet with Heinz. On October 17, 1993, the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

Mormon Church Apostle Boyd K. Packer said he had the endorsement of the Council of the Twelve Apostles when he met with an ecclesiastical leader who later excommunicated a member of the church.

Packer told the church-owned Deseret News Friday that when stake president Kerrin Heinz asked through a midlevel church official to meet with Packer, Packer asked his fellow apostles in a meeting whether he should.

“...I felt there may be some sensitivity about his request,” Packer said.

Since Apostle Oaks is a member of the Council of the Twelve Apostles, he must have known about this meeting even before it occurred. The fact that he told Steve Benson about the meeting after it took place, shows that it was on his mind and that he was deeply concerned about the matter. In light of the above, the fact that Oaks was not forthright about the matter casts a very bad light on the whole affair.

Apostle Dallin Oaks allowed his own church’s newspaper to interview him about the matter. Notwithstanding the fact that Oaks had shot himself in the foot, he proceeded to attack the Associated Press:

“Life isn’t fair,” Elder Oaks said. “Somebody said that time heals all wounds. But it’s also true that time wounds all heels,” he added in jest. But in a serious tone, Elder Oaks ... said he feels “wounded” by an Associated Press story that he said dwelled on his admission that he made a statement he couldn’t defend, and downplayed his efforts to promptly correct his unintentional error.

“It impugned my integrity and seriously distorted the account of the facts as it was presented,” Oaks said in an interview this week.

The apostle said he didn’t willfully mislead a news reporter. He explained that he had misspoken during an hour-long interview and when he was notified of that, he called the reporter to retract a “statement I could not defend.”

In his interview with the Deseret News, [Steve] Benson said what Elder Oaks told him didn’t square with what was said to the reporter. ... he transmitted a confidential letter to Elder Oaks pointing that out. Benson said he also warned that if the apostle did not “set the record straight” he would no longer feel obligated to keep their discussion confidential. ... Elder Oaks said, he reviewed the transcript of his interview with the reporter and found he couldn’t defend his comment about having no knowledge of Packer meeting with Heinz.

“How do you make a statement like that? I can’t give any better explanation than the fact that I was talking a mile a minute and I just said something that on mature reflection I (concluded), ‘I can’t defend the truthfulness of that,’” Elder Oaks said. . . . after later learning that Elder Oaks left intact the other comments that troubled Benson, Benson said he followed through on his threat to go public. (Deseret News, October 16, 1993)

Apostle Oaks would apparently like people to believe that he merely made a mistake when he said he did not know Apostle Packer met with Heinz. This, of course, is very difficult to believe. Ironically, Oaks himself has released a partial transcript of his interview with The Arizona Republic which establishes beyond all doubt that he was not forthright about the matter:

Oaks: “As for Elder Packer, Elder Packer does not have a specific responsibility for any area in the church. . . . So, if Elder Packer is having any conversations with Kerry Heinz, it is outside the normal channel. That’s all I can say. I have no knowledge of whether he did. But if he did and if he gave a directed verdict or anything like that, that is contrary to policy. It is irregular and it’s contrary to what I know of Elder Packer and the way he operates.” (Salt Lake Tribune, October 17, 1993)

As we have shown, Apostle Oaks tried to divert attention away from his fallacious statement by attacking the Associated Press. Oaks claimed the story “impugned my integrity and seriously distorted the account of the facts . . . .” The Associated Press responded as follows:

Bill Beech, bureau chief for The Associated Press in Salt Lake City said the AP story was based on a tape-recorded interview with Oaks, was accurate and made no distortions.

Though Packer said Friday that he had the support of the Council of the Twelve in meeting with Heinz, Benson wrote in an Oct. 6 letter to Oaks that Oaks had told him “it was a mistake for Packer to meet with Heinz and a mistake for Heinz to ask for the meeting.” . . . in another letter Friday to Oaks, Benson appealed to the apostle to correct what Benson believes are other conflicts between Oak’s private version and the public statements about Packer’s involvement.

“You were provided an opportunity to set the record straight completely,” he wrote. “You chose only to correct one of three falsehoods.” (Salt Lake Tribune, October 17, 1993)

Apostle Dallin Oaks finally became so upset over the charge that he had lied that he did something very few General Authorities have done in recent years: he wrote an article regarding the matter which was published in the Salt Lake Tribune on October 21, 1993. In this article Apostle Oaks said, “I did not lie to the reporter,” and went on to declare: “My perception of this matter is simple. I have been the victim of double-decker deceit: 1, betrayal of promises of confidentiality, and 2, false accusations of lying.”

While Apostle Oaks maintained that there is no orchestrated effort to silence critics in the church and that, “There is no purge,” the evidence all seems to point in the opposite direction. Allen Roberts, coeditor of Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, commented as follows:

Elder Dallin Oaks has attempted to persuade the public that “there is no purge” on the reasoning that six lost people are of no numerical consequence given the church’s membership of 8.5 million. Recently excommunicated historian Michael Quinn had this to say about Elder Oaks’ notion that it takes more than six people to constitute a purge: “That is like saying there wasn’t a purge at Tiananmen Square because only 200 people were killed out of one billion Chinese.” . . . The purge is more widespread and far greater in scale than any have heretofore reported. (Private Eye Weekly, October 20, 1993)

The Religion Section of the Salt Lake Tribune, October 16, 1993, contained an article entitled, “More Stories Point to LDS Leaders As Source of Dissident Crackdown.” In this article Peggy Fletcher Stack presented some important information which seems to establish that there is indeed a “purge” going on and that it is being directed from the highest levels of the church. In our new book, The Mormon Purge, we have more information regarding this important subject.

While we believe that the Mormon Church and other organizations have every right to excommunicate those who will not conform to its teachings, it is extremely disturbing that the Mormon leaders would work in a clandestine manner to accomplish their purpose. As one of the dissidents has pointed out, the top officials have tried to shield themselves, giving the appearance that they are benign, good-natured individuals, while those on the lower levels have to take all the blame for the excommunications. It may be true that the top leaders of the church felt that it is necessary to remove some members to preserve the church, but they should have had the courage to stand up and accept responsibility for their actions.

Now that the cover-up seems to be unraveling, the First Presidency and the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles have issued a statement which seems to indicate that the excommunications will continue. In this statement we find the following:

We have the responsibility to preserve the doctrinal purity of the church. We are united in this objective. . . .

The longstanding policy of church discipline is outlined in the Doctrine and Covenants: “We believe that all religious societies have a right to deal with their members . . . according to the rules and regulations of such societies. . . . They can only excommunicate them from their society, and withdraw from them their fellowship.” (Doctrine and Covenants 134:10.). . . .

The general and local officers of the church will continue to do their duty and faithful church members will understand. (Salt Lake Tribune, October 17, 1993)

Although a statement like this coming at a time of tenseness in the LDS Church is likely to silence many church members, it could also cause further dissension. In view of the backlash which has already occurred because of the excommunications, it remains to be seen whether church leaders will continue with the purge.
One thing that is obvious about the whole affair is that many members of the church are becoming polarized over the issues and the rhetoric is becoming louder. For example, Allen Roberts wrote the following:

All fingers seem to point to Elder Boyd Packer, acting president of the twelve apostles, as the prime force behind what has been called the “Mormon Inquisition.” While Elder Packer, nicknamed “Darth Packer” by the irreverent because of his cold and detached personal style, is a far cry from Torquemada (the 15th century Inquisitor General of the Spanish Inquisition), his speeches, instructions to lower ranking authorities, and direct contacts with local leaders have shown him to be the prime orchestrator of top-level-organized punishment. . . . Raised by an authoritarian German father, Packer and his brothers entered the military during World War II instead of serving missions. This military influence had an indelible impact on Packer’s view of the church, according to a close family acquaintance, “He sees the church as an army. He is one of its generals and the members are privates who should march in step and do what they are told without question.” (Private Eye Weekly, October 20, 1993)

On October 18, 1993, the Salt Lake Tribune revealed the following:

A threat apparently intended for excommunicated LDS historian D. Michael Quinn was delivered by phone Saturday night to the home of the wrong Michael Quinn.

The baby sitter of Michael D. Quinn answered the phone call . . . Michael D. Quinn, who is a member of the Elders Quorum in his ward in Bountiful, explained:

“The 15 year-old baby sitter answered the phone and a male voice asked for Michael Quinn. She said he could not come to the phone. . . .

“The man told her to give me this message, ‘I’m tired of the statements he’s making about the LDS Church. I’m tired of hearing him criticize the church. He’d better start keeping to himself if he doesn’t. I have his phone number and I know where he lives. I’ll come get him. I hate him. He stinks.’ Then he hung up. . . .

Angered by the threat after he spoke to the nonhistorian, Mr. Quinn, the historian, said Sunday:

“Threatening phone calls are a new low in the current atmosphere of repression in the LDS Church. I hold Apostle [Dallin H.] Oaks personally responsible for inciting such sick-minded Mormons. Apostle Oaks publicly stated that the feminists and scholars excommunicated in September were actually wolves. Utah sheepherders kill wolves rather than allow them to wander around and kill sheep. Elder Oaks has increased the paranoia of Mormons toward differences of opinion and dissent. I refuse to remain quiet while. . . Oaks and [Apostle] Boyd K. Packer demonize anyone they don’t agree with. It would have been more Christian of Apostle Oaks to describe excommunicated persons as ‘lost sheep.’ That might have avoided giving encouragement to the self-appointed vigilantes in the Mormon community.”

THE THINKING HAS BEEN DONE

In our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 183-84, we present a number of statements from Mormon leaders which clearly teach blind obedience to the authorities of the church. One of the most controversial is a Ward Teachers’ Message which appeared in the official organ of the church, The Improvement Era, in 1945:

Any Latter-day Saint who denounces or opposes, whether actively or otherwise, any plan or doctrine advocated by the “prophets, seer, and revelators” of the Church is cultivating the spirit of apostasy. Lucifer...wins a great victory when he can get members of the Church to speak against their leaders and to “do their own thinking” . . .

When our leaders speak, the thinking has been done. When they propose a plan—it is God’s plan. When they point the way, there is no other which is safe. When they give direction, it should mark the end of controversy. (The Improvement Era, June 1945, page 354)

Mormon apologists, who do not want to face the fact that their leaders require very strict obedience to their counsel, have found a letter written by the eighth president of the church, George Albert Smith, which they feel invalidates the quotation cited above. It was published in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1986, pages 38-39. President Smith was responding to a question by a Unitarian minister who was upset by the article which appeared in the Mormon Church’s official organ.

In response, President Smith wrote: “I am pleased to assure you that you are right in your attitude that the passage quoted does not express the true position of the Church.”

President Smith’s letter raises a very serious question: why did Smith write this letter to a private individual, who was not a member of the church instead of making a public correction in the church’s Improvement Era? If the article did not really represent the position of the church, Smith should have demanded a retraction. Mormon apologists have been unable to point to any public statement by Smith repudiating the article.

It should be noted also that this notorious Ward Teachers’ Message was also printed in the church’s newspaper, Deseret News, Church Section, on May 26, 1945. It is clear, then, that the Latter-day Saints read this message in both the Deseret News and The Improvement Era. Moreover, the ward teachers presented this lesson in the homes of the Mormon people.

Unfortunately, the Mormon Church has a history of giving out false statements to those who are not members of the church when embarrassing information comes to light. Moreover, there have been times when even members of the church have been deliberately deceived about what was going on by church leaders to protect the image of the church. It was Joseph Smith himself who set the example in this regard.

Mormon Church records clearly show that Joseph Smith was deeply involved in the secret practice of polygamy while he was in Nauvoo, Illinois, yet on May 26, 1844, just a month before he was murdered, he absolutely denied any connection with the practice:

What a thing it is for a man to be accused of committing adultery, and having seven wives, when I can only find one. I am the same man, and as innocent as I was fourteen years ago; and I can prove them all perjurers. (History of Church, vol. 6, page 411)
Joseph Smith actually had far more than seven wives when he made this statement. Those who will take the time to examine the church’s own Doctrine and Covenants, Section 132, will find that Smith had already received plural wives when he gave the revelation on the subject in 1843. In that revelation we find the following:

And let mine handmaid, Emma Smith [Joseph’s wife], receive all those that have been given unto my servant Joseph, and who are virtuous and pure before me . . .

And again, as pertaining to the law of the priesthood if any man . . . have ten virgins given unto him by this law, he cannot commit adultery, for they belong to him, and they are given unto him; therefore is he justified. (Doctrine and Covenants 132:52, 61-62)

For more information on the false statements regarding polygamy by Joseph Smith and other Mormon leaders see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?, pages 245-248. After the Manifesto, almost fifty years later, the top Mormon leaders publicly proclaimed that they were not allowing any more polygamous marriages. These statements, however, were absolutely false (see pages 231-244b of the book cited above). As noted above, D. Michael Quinn found himself in serious trouble with church leaders for revealing the truth about this matter.

The belief that the interests of the Mormon Church are sometimes more important than the truth has continued right up until the present time. We have already shown that Apostle Dallin Oaks told Steve Benson in private that he knew Apostle Packer met with Kerry Heinz, but when Oaks was asked about the matter by the press, he claimed he had no knowledge about such a meeting.

While we may never know exactly what was on President George Albert Smith’s mind when he wrote the letter to the minister, it is obvious that his public silence concerning this serious matter left the Mormon people with the strong impression that they should never question the decisions of the leaders of the church.

The purge which is now going on in the Mormon Church tends to demonstrate that the present leaders of the church want their people to believe that, “When our leaders speak, the thinking has been done. When they propose a plan—it is God’s plan. . . . When they give direction, it should mark the end of controversy.”

The statement made in The Improvement Era in 1945 appears to be the basis for a statement which appeared in the church’s publication, The Ensign, some thirty-three years later. In an address given by Young Women General President Elaine Cannon in 1978 we find the same type of reasoning:

Tonight President Kimball extends an invitation . . . for all of us as women to follow him as he follows the Savior. . . . He is our leader, in all the world of would-be leaders, who can guide us back to the presence of God. . . . Personal opinions may vary. Eternal principles never do.

When the prophet speaks, sisters, the debate is over. . . . we emphatically and happily declare, “I will be obedient! I will help strengthen others that they may be so too!” (The Ensign, November 1978, page 108)

The following year, 1979, the First Presidency Message, written by President N. Eldon Tanner, First Counselor in the First Presidency, endorsed Elaine Cannon’s statement as an important truth regarding Mormonism:

Recently . . . Young Women President Elaine Cannon made the following statement: “When the Prophet speaks . . . the debate is over.” (The Ensign, November 1978, p. 108)

I was impressed by that simple statement, which carries such deep spiritual meaning for all of us. Wherever I go, my message to the people is: Follow the prophet . . .

It is difficult to understand why there are so many people who fight against the counsel of the prophet . . .

Latter-day Saints should be able to accept the words of the prophets without having to wait for science to prove the validity of their words. We are most fortunate to have a living prophet at the head of the Church to guide us . . .

True Latter-day Saints . . . know that the messages of the prophet have come from the Lord and have the concurrence of all the General Authorities . . . Whose side are we on? When the prophet speaks the debate is over. (The Ensign, August 1979, pages 2-3)

The reader will notice the close agreement between the statement made in 1945 and the one which appeared in 1979. The 1945 Ward Teachers’ Message contained this statement: “When our leaders speak, the thinking has been done. . . . When they give direction, it should mark the end of controversy.”

The 1979 First Presidency Message reads: “When the prophet speaks the debate is over.” As far as we can determine, the same basic message—that church members are to give unquestioned obedience to the pronouncements of the church—appears in both statements.

NON-FUNCTIONAL PROPHETS

Mormon leaders maintain that the LDS Church is “the only true church” upon the face of the earth. Moreover, it is claimed that the church is led by direct revelation from God through the “living prophet,” who is also the president of the church. No one else can give revelations to the church.

In our book, The Changing World of Mormonism, published by Moody Press in 1980, page 439, we pointed out that the Mormon Church had been confronted with some serious problems and that the ability to deal with these issues was complicated by the fact that some of the Mormon leaders were very old. David O. McKay, the ninth prophet, lived to be ninety-six years old. He was in very poor health toward the end of his life and was hardly in any condition to function as prophet, seer and revelator for the church.

Instead of appointing a younger man after McKay’s death, church leaders chose Joseph Fielding Smith who was ninety-three years old. Smith lived to be ninety-five, and the leadership of the church passed to Harold B. Lee who was seventy-three years old. Lee lived less than two years and Spencer W. Kimball became president. Kimball lived to be ninety years old, but was in very poor health toward the end of his life and could not really lead the church. Ezra Taft Benson became president of the church in 1985. Although he is now ninety-four he is still sustained as the living prophet.
The way the Mormon hierarchy is structured there seems to be little hope of younger leadership, and even less hope for any new revelations from the “living prophet.” The problem is that the president of the Council of the Twelve Apostles always becomes prophet of the church. Since this system is based on seniority, it is almost impossible for younger men to move to the top.

Interestingly, the average age of the last five prophets of the church was eighty-one years when they attained that position. This should be contrasted with the fact that Joseph Smith was only in his twenties when he assumed the role of prophet of the Mormon Church. The present system, therefore, seems to insure that only a man who is already old can become prophet. The effect of this policy is that those who are appointed prophets are very likely to become senile or in bad health during their presidency.

The Mormon system works in such a way as to bring a man into the highest office in the church at the very time when he is least competent to adequately perform his duties. While the highest leaders of the church have forced many of those on lower levels to retire (i.e., go on emeritus status), they will not retire themselves and the “living prophet” is never removed no matter how incompetent he becomes.

It has become very obvious that at the present time the Mormon Church does not really have a functioning prophet. The whole claim that the church is superior to all others because it has a “living prophet” now seems to be in jeopardy. Although church leaders have tried very hard to cover up the seriousness of the situation, the truth is becoming widely known to the Mormon people.

As we have shown above, when Steve Benson publicly questioned the fact that his grandfather was capable of leading the church, he was called in to explain his actions. On July 10, 1993, three months before Steve Benson left the church, Vern Anderson of the Associated Press reported that President Ezra Taft Benson’s grandson was deeply concerned regarding his grandfather’s growing problem of senility:

As Mormon Church President Ezra Taft Benson approaches his 94th birthday, the years have stilled his voice, clouded his mind and raised questions about the faith’s rigid order of succession.

Attired in a sweatshirt and fed by others, Benson spends his days in supervised seclusion in an apartment overlooking Temple Square. He is an infirm retiree in a church that doesn’t officially retire its “prophet, seer and revelator.”

The incongruity struck a 13-year-old Benson great—grandson the other day as he poured his breakfast cereal: “Dad, why do they call him prophet when he can’t do anything?”

The boy’s father is Steve Benson, a practicing Mormon who won a Pulitzer Prize this year for the political cartoons he draws . . .

His son’s question is one reason Benson decided to speak openly for the first time about his grandfather’s decline . . .

A more compelling motivator, however, is what he believes are misleading efforts by the church’s hierarchy to preserve an image of a more vibrant Ezra Taft Benson, an image less problematic for the core Mormon belief in a literal prophet of God.

“I believe the church strives mightily to perpetuate the myth, the fable, the fantasy that President Benson, if not operating on all cylinders, at least is functioning effectively enough, even with just a nod of the head, to be regarded by the saints as a living, functioning prophet,” he said.

That is not the grandfather Benson saw when he visited in March from Arizona, or whom he has seen struggle with encroaching senility during much of his 7-year administration.

“The last time I saw him he said virtually nothing to me,” said Benson . . . “He looked at me almost quizzically, as if he were examining me.”

In earlier visits, the former U.S. agriculture secretary . . . could manage at least a word or two. . . .

Benson, who has not spoken in public for more than three years, was already suffering memory loss when he assumed the presidency in 1985 at age 86. His grandson said facing church audiences became a frightening experience for a man who once had relished the pulpit.

While some church “general authorities” are retired at 65, the granting of emeritus status does not extend to the faith’s 12 apostles or three-member First Presidency, the belief being God will choose his leaders and the length of their service.

Steve Benson sees the practice as needlessly impractical. “I don’t think God would expect us to be bound legally or structurally to a system that obviously isn’t working,” he said.

Gordon B. Hinckley, Benson’s first counselor, has taken pains in recent sermons to stress the church does not face a leadership crisis. . . .

A request to interview Hinckley or an apostle about the church’s pattern of succession was declined through spokesman LeFevre . . . Steve Benson, 39, said it has been some time since his grandfather has been capable of participating in any way in the administration of the church’s affairs, although that is “an image that people deeply, almost desperately want to believe.”

“And I’m not demeaning or ridiculing that desire to believe. I’m just saying that what the church is presenting to the members to believe is not factual,” he said. (Salt Lake Tribune, July 10, 1993)

The Arizona Republic, July 13,1993, published an article containing the following:

The grandson of the Mormon Church’s president is being battered and praised by Mormons for revealing last week that the aged Ezra Taft Benson cannot physically or mentally lead the Church . . . The Arizona Republic’s political cartoonist, has received numerous telephone calls from Mormons, who clearly are split on the issue. . . .

One woman left a message for Benson saying that although he spoke the truth, he never should have made his opinions public.

Some members in wards . . . prayed Sunday for their church leader, affirming their faith in his leadership despite Benson’s statements that his grandfather, at 93, is “not in the loop” and cannot attend to church affairs. . . .

Don LeFevre, spokesman for the 9 million-member church, said . . . that Benson’s counselors review major church decisions with the prophet at his home, where he must be tended with round-the-clock care.
Steven Benson said the notion that the president’s two counselors, Gordon Hinckley and Thomas Monson, could review anything with his grandfather is nonsense.

“The debate is so emotional because it is a matter of trust,” Benson said. “If the church hides the truth about nonfunctional prophets, members then may ask, ‘What else is the church hiding?’”

In an article appearing in the Salt Lake Tribune, July 21, 1993, Steve Benson was quoted as saying: “The point I was trying to make is that President Benson is the prophet in title only, not in role. President Benson is not carrying out his role. “He can’t,” the grandson, an active Mormon, said Tuesday.”

The fact that President Benson’s counselors did not have a great deal of confidence in his ability to function became evident when documents filed with the state of Utah were examined by the Salt Lake Tribune:

Documents on file with the state of Utah are strong evidence that the parent corporation of the Mormon Church no longer is being directed by its president, Ezra Taft Benson.

It is the first time since the corporation was founded 70 years ago that anyone other than the church president has obtained total authority over Utah’s most powerful corporation.

The documents, at the Utah Department of Commerce, were signed with a machine that duplicates the signature of 94-year-old President Benson. They were filed six months before President Benson . . . made his last public speech.

Church leaders said this week the filings and the use of a signature machine were routine, and done with President Benson’s approval. . . . Today, the corporation owns all church assets—including a multibillion-dollar portfolio of financial and property holdings. . . .

Entitled “Certificates of Authority” and dated May 23, 1989, the documents say Presidents Hinckley and Monson can keep those complete powers—even if President Benson becomes disabled or is determined by a court to be incompetent. . . . the church made no announcement of the change. It has continued to portray President Benson as the ultimate power behind church affairs. . . .

Fran Fish, notary public administrator for the state Department of Commerce, said signatures written by machine are legal . . .

Still, Ms. Fish . . . said use of a signature machine on state corporate filings “is certainly out of the norm.” . . . Steve Benson . . . has said that his aging grandfather no longer possesses the mental faculties to handle church affairs.

“The church has misrepresented the condition of President Benson and stated flatly that his role as prophet has in no way been impeded,” Steve Benson said this week. “My grandfather has become a storefront mannequin while the business of the store is conducted behind closed doors.”

He said a signature machine has replaced his grandfather’s hand on all personal and family correspondence.

“Evidently,” Steve Benson said, “the signature machine had not been programmed to sign, ‘Grandpa.’” (Salt Lake Tribune, August 15, 1993)

Mormon Church leaders appear to be on the horns of a dilemma with regard to their non-functional prophet, Ezra Taft Benson. On the one hand, it is maintained that only a revelation given to the prophet could change this extraordinary policy of the church. On the other hand, however, President Benson is obviously incapable of giving such a revelation. Vern Anderson observed: “The strict apostolic succession—which church spokesman Don LeFevre said would require a revelation from ‘the Lord to his prophet’ to change—has fostered a gerontocracy” Salt Lake Tribune, July 10, 1993).

While the present situation with regard to President Benson must be very perplexing to the General Authorities of the Mormon Church, a worse scenario might be if the apostle with the most seniority were already mentally incompetent when installed as prophet. In view of the way medical advancements are lengthening people’s lives, it is even conceivable that a “prophet” might live for a quarter of a century without contributing anything to the church.

It is apparent that the Mormon Church’s claim to be led by a “Prophet, Seer, and Revelator,” is not substantiated by the facts. The Bible relates that the prophet Moses lived to be extremely old, but it goes on to say that “his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated” (Deuteronomy 34:7). We certainly cannot say this of most of the recent prophets of the Mormon Church. While it is claimed that these men are “living prophets,” they seem to become mere figureheads as they advance in age.

The Mormon forger Mark Hofmann put the “living prophet,” President Spencer W. Kimball, to the acid test and demonstrated that the so-called “living oracles” are just as fallible as other men. At a time when revelation was really needed in the church, Kimball seemed to be completely oblivious to what was really going on. President Kimball was unable to detect that the documents Hofmann was selling to the church were forgeries.

Two of the documents even contained revelations purportedly written by Joseph Smith himself, yet Kimball had no knowledge that they were spurious. After President Kimball died, the prophet Ezra Taft Benson had no spiritual insight regarding the matter. He failed to realize that the documents were forgeries, and church officials made it very difficult for investigators to examine the documents.

Moreover, during the criminal investigation that followed after Hofmann killed two people, the Mormon Church discovered that it had the real McLellin Collection in its vault. This would have provided very important evidence of fraud on Mark Hofmann’s part because he was trying to sell them items they already had in their own vault. Instead of coming forth with information regarding the collection, church leaders decided to suppress this evidence from investigators. Mormon Church official Richard Turley has acknowledged that this matter was brought to the attention of the First Presidency, and Apostles Boyd K. Packer and Dallin H. Oaks. While one would assume that only the “living prophet” could make such an important decision, we do not have any hard evidence that Benson made the decision to cover up the existence of the collection. If Ezra Taft Benson was responsible for the cover-up, it was a terrible decision which caused embarrassment to the church. On the other hand, if his counselors in the First Presidency and Apostles Oaks and Packer did not consult him, it would tend to provide further evidence that the “living prophet” is only a figurehead. For much more information regarding this matter see our book, The Mormon Church and the McLellin Collection, pages 1-16.
As we have shown, Mormon leaders tell their people that “When the prophet speaks the debate is over.” We feel that this type of absolute obedience can be very dangerous. In Jeremiah 17:5 we find this admonition: “Thus saith the Lord; Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, whose heart departeth from the Lord.”

As we were preparing this newsletter, it became more obvious all the time that we would not have the room to include many significant items concerning the purge that is going on in the Mormon Church. It seems that new developments are occurring almost every day. Consequently, we decided to do a book on the subject which should be of great interest to our readers. A very important part of this book will deal with the suppression of the 16-volume sesquicentennial history of the Mormon Church. Extremely important church documents including a secret memorandum to President Gordon B. Hinckley—have been turned over to us detailing the duplicity Mormon officials used when they squelched the history which many trusting Mormon historians had spent untold hours preparing.

Our new book regarding the Mormon Church’s attempt to silence its historians and other dissidents is entitled, The Mormon Purge. We are offering a special price on this book. It will normally sell for $3.00, but if it is ordered before December 31, 1993, the price will be only $2.00! On the first page of this newsletter the reader will find an extra special offer if this book is ordered in conjunction with the book, The Godmakers II. (Mail orders please add $1.50 minimum postage.)

GOD MAKERS II LAWYER THREATENS TANNERS WITH SUIT

Unfortunately, our last newsletter regarding the video The God Makers II, has stirred up a real hornet’s nest. While we tried to be very accurate and tactful in our presentation, in an article entitled, “The Tanners Strike Again,” J. Edward Decker exclaimed:

One would think that I’d have developed some sort of immunity by now. Truth is, having felt the prick of both, I’d rather take my poison in a coke glass than from the pen of a some so-called brother and sister in Christ. I’m just about fed up with them. Arsenic is a whole lot easier to swallow. . . . they are out to rip the God Makers movie to shreds . . . It’s these constant two-by-fours across the back of my head that are starting to get me mad . . . the Tanners state with a straight face, “Nevertheless, we feel that it is our duty to present our readers with well-balanced research on this issue.” I’m sorry but that is just plain Hogwash! Either the Tanners are the greatest dupes in the business or bald faced liars. I’m weary of giving them the benefit of the doubt. (Saints Alive in Jesus newsletter, March-April, 1993)

Ed Decker sent a copy of his newsletter to a lawyer named Douglas A. Wallace. Wallace, in turn, wrote us a threatening letter in which he stated:

As you may already know, I represent Ed Decker, Bill Claudin, Patrick and Caryl Matriscianna [sic] as well as Jeremiah Films in connection with “God Makers II.” . . .

As attorney for “God Makers II,” et al, I can say that the most disappointing thing that could happen with regard to the film is the failure of the “CHURCH” . . . to actually file a lawsuit for slander. . . . It would be the epitome of my life to defend such a lawsuit for I have lived these past 58 years for no reason other then to expose the Mormon Menace.

If the “CHURCH” fails to bring such action, then I will be looking elsewhere to expose the fraud by seizing opportunity to file a lawsuit against slanderous, spurious articles such as you have written. (Letter from Douglas A. Wallace, dated April 10, 1993)

In spite of the threat of a lawsuit we completed a 94-page book concerning the video entitled, Problems In The Godmakers II. While we do not wish to argue with the accusations made by Ed Decker and Douglas Wallace in this newsletter, those who read the book will find our side of the story.

Since our last newsletter we made two extremely important discoveries which throw important light on the validity of the video:

One, while the video charges that Gordon B. Hinckley, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, was involved with prostitutes and had a homosexual affair with a man named Charles VanDam in the 1960s, we have had contact with a man who was closely associated with VanDam during the “mid 1970’s.” This man says that VanDam was not telling the same story at that time. He maintains that although VanDam told him about his wild parties with a Mr. Hinckley, it was not President Gordon B. Hinckley!

In a letter, dated May 10, 1993, VanDam’s former associate affirmed: “He [VanDam] was not a stable person. . . . He lived in extreme exaggeration of lies - fantasy & a violent temper . . . He boasted & bragged to me that it was . . . [another Hinckley] not the Gen[eral] Authority that he partied with!!!” We have verified the fact that this man was closely associated with Mr. VanDam. It would appear, then, that the chief witness against Gordon B. Hinckley changed his story sometime after the mid 1970’s. We found numerous other problems with VanDam’s statements.

Two, one of the most moving and important portions of the video involves the death of a woman named Lillian Chynoweth. While the video leads the viewer to believe that she was murdered, the truth of the matter—verified by the Houston Police Department—is that Lillian committed suicide!

Since we completed the book we have become aware of the fact that lawyers for both Jeremiah Films and the Mormon Church have been making some very serious charges. For example, in a letter to Patrick A. Shea, the lawyer representing the Mormon Church, Douglas Wallace charged:

There are issues relating to regular prostitutionual sexual servicing of Mr. Hinckley at the Hotel Utah along with other Authorities on the day of their regular weekly meetings in the Salt Lake Temple, and there are issues relating to assault and attempted murder of the prostitute and the murder of a young male following a verbal confrontation with Mr. Hinckley over the severity of his abuse of the young boy. (Letter from Jeremiah Films’ lawyer Douglas Wallace, dated March 5, 1993)
It is interesting to note that William Claudin, who spearheaded the investigation directed at Gordon B. Hinckley, was very forthright with us concerning what he learned about the charges of church leaders being furnished with prostitutes in the Hotel Utah. On May 7, 1993, he frankly admitted that when further investigation was done, it became apparent that the prostitute who related the story was not telling the truth about certain things. Although he still believed there could be some truth to the accusations, he felt that it was best to withdraw her testimony about Hinckley and other church leaders. For more information on this matter see Problems in the Godmakers II, page 34. We have no further information regarding the charge that a young man was murdered.

On March 18, 1993, the lawyer representing the church, responded to Wallace, Claudin, Decker and the Matriscianas. In this two-page letter he seems to assert that Patrick Matrisciana, of Jeremiah Films, tried to blackmail the church:

I understand that Mr. Matrisciana is a “businessman” to quote his own words. His offer for me to simply buy the raw tape of “God Makers II,” and thus solve the problem of any distribution of the false information was, and is, clearly unacceptable. I rejected the first offer and would not accept this type of extortion as a means of resolving this dispute. . . .

Mr. Claudin has not responded directly but in his wanderings in Southern Utah continues to promote the video and makes representations regarding an “X-rated God Makers II” video which will be coming out shortly. (Letter from Patrick A. Shea, dated March 18, 1993)

It is unlikely that any deal was struck between the church and Jeremiah Films because the film company later produced a 27-minute video entitled, The Truth About Mormon President Gordon B. Hinckley, which was taken from the 6 to 8 hours of “raw tape” which Jeremiah Films had in its possession. (V. Leah Walker has informed us that when she called Jeremiah Films on May 5, 1993, she was told that all of the footage except for the 27 minutes used in the video mentioned above, was destroyed. See her letter in Problems in the Godmakers II, pages 21-22.) In any case, in our opinion the 27-minute video really adds nothing to what appeared in the video, The God Makers II. Instead, it demonstrates Charles VanDam’s tendency to exaggerate.

It is certainly obvious that some very serious charges involving criminal behavior have been made by lawyers on both sides of the controversy.

Even though we have been threatened with a lawsuit for expressing our opinion on The God Makers II, we do not feel that we can remain silent about problems in the video. Since we are convinced that it is a very important matter, we are offering a special price on our book, Problems in the Godmakers II. Although this book normally sells for $4.00, if it is ordered before December 31, 1993, the price will be only $3.00. On the first page of this newsletter the reader will find an extra special offer if this book is ordered in conjunction with the book, The Mormon Purge. WHY WE LEFT THE CHURCH

Like Steve and Mary Ann Benson, over thirty years ago we found it necessary to ask Mormon officials to strike our names from the roles of the Mormon Church. Our research revealed that there have been many serious changes made in Joseph Smith’s revelations and other material printed by the church. In addition, we found many other serious problems. Below is a condensed version of our statements as they appear in our book, The Changing World of Mormonism.

Statement by Sandra Tanner. Since I was born and raised in the Mormon Church, and am a great-great-grandchild of Brigham Young, I had very strong ties to the Mormon faith. . . . As a teenager my life centered around the Mormon church. Because I was active and paying my tithing I thought I was in pretty good standing with God. I knew I sinned but I felt my activity in church would somehow outweigh what I did wrong. I believed (as the Mormons teach) that I was inherently good. I had no fear of God’s judgment. Besides the things that were wrong in my own life, I began to have doubts about my church. . . .

When I started college I enrolled in the Mormon Institute of Religion class. I started asking questions in class, trying to find answers to my doubts. But one day my institute teacher took me aside and told me to please stop asking questions in class. There was a girl attending the class who was thinking of joining the church and I was disturbing her with my questions. What a surprise! I had hoped to find answers to the many things that were bothering me and now I had been silenced.

Shortly after this I met Jerald and we began studying the Bible and Mormonism together. As we studied I began to see the contradictions between the Bible and the teachings of the Mormon church.

I had grown up thinking that Brigham Young was one of the greatest men that ever lived. . . . Then Jerald had me read some of Brigham Young’s sermons in the Journal of Discourses on blood atonement. I was shocked! I knew what Brigham Young was saying was wrong but I couldn’t reconcile these sermons with the things I had always been taught concerning him. . . .

Jerald also showed me the changes that had been made in Joseph Smith’s revelations. The thought kept coming to me that if God had actually given those revelations to Joseph Smith why would they need rewriting? Surely the Creator of the universe could say it right the first time!

As I studied I not only found errors in Mormonism, I also began to comprehend there was something wrong in my own life. As I studied God’s Word I realized I was a sinful hypocrite. In spite of my sins I had thought I was right with God. Yet the Bible says: “For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord” (Rom. 6:23).

God reaches out to man, not because he deserves it, but because God loves him. John wrote: “Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins” (1 John 4:10). Paul wrote: “But God, who is rich in mercy. . . . even when we were dead in sins, hath
I now want to share with you the particular events of the day I surrendered my heart and life to Jesus Christ:

Early one morning (October 24, 1959) I decided to listen to the radio for a while. I turned to the Christian radio station and listened to a sermon. The minister was preaching on the great love of God and the mercy offered to us through Jesus Christ. Nothing ever struck me with such force. I opened my heart to God and accepted Christ as my own personal Saviour. The Holy Spirit flooded my soul with such joy that I wept for over an hour. . . . How glorious to know Christ died for my sins so I could have a new life in Him.

Our lives testify to all we meet whether or not we are truly Christians. Paul wrote: “But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: against such there is no law” (Gal. 5:22-23).

Statement by Jerald Tanner. I was born and raised in the Mormon church, and before I was eight years old I felt that it was the only true church. . . . My conviction was so strong that I was shocked to hear a boy in Sunday school say that he didn’t know for certain that the church was true. I felt that it was strange indeed for a person to be a member of the Mormon church and yet not know it was the only true church.

I believed very strongly that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God and that I belonged to the only true church. When I was about eighteen years old I had to face reality. I can remember that the first time I saw David Whitmer’s pamphlet, An Address to All Believers in Christ, I threw it down in disgust. After throwing it down, however, I began to think that perhaps this was not the right way to face the problem. If David Whitmer was wrong in his criticism of Joseph Smith, surely I could prove him wrong. So I picked up the pamphlet and read it through. I found that I could not prove David Whitmer wrong, and that the revelations Joseph Smith gave had been changed. . . .

Since that time I have found more and more proof that the church in which I was raised is in error. The most important thing that I found, however, was not that the church was in error, but that I myself was in error. I found that I was a sinner in need of a Saviour. The Mormon church had taught me good morals, but they had not taught me much concerning the power of Christ that could change my life. There was much talk about Joseph Smith, but very little talk about Christ. Consequently, I began to think I had the power within myself to overcome sin, I didn’t see how much I needed the help of God to overcome it. So I turned from one sin to another until I was deeply in bondage to sin. I found no help in the Mormon church; they were too busy preaching about the glory of the church, Joseph Smith, etc. They were too busy singing “praise to the man who communed with Jehovah” and “We thank thee O God for a prophet” to tell me about the Saviour I needed so badly. . . . there was almost nothing in the services that could give life and peace to my dying soul. . . . if Christ had been preached instead of Joseph Smith, I would, perhaps, have received Christ into my life in the Mormon Church. As it was, however, I was nineteen years old before I heard the true message of Christ preached, and that was in another church. A short time later I received Christ into my life and found peace, joy, and deliverance from sin. As the Apostle Paul expressed it: “Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new” (2 Cor. 5:17).

After we left the LDS Church we published a great deal of material concerning Mormonism and eventually set up Utah Lighthouse Ministry. Many Mormons have come to know the Lord in a personal way through this material.

KEEP THE LIGHT ON!

Besides the work on Mormonism, Utah Lighthouse Ministry provides support for forty-four children through the World Vision relief program. As we indicated in our last newsletter, the money we receive from our books and tapes only covers about half the cost of operating Utah Lighthouse. If it were not for the donations to our ministry, we would be in serious financial trouble. We consider those who help us with our expenses to be a vital part of our team. Even more important, however, are the prayers of those who support this ministry. Please pray that God will open the eyes of those we minister to and that he would give the encouragement and strength we need to continue in this difficult work.

Utah Lighthouse is a non-profit organization. Those who are interested in helping our ministry can send their tax-deductible contributions to Utah Lighthouse Ministry, PO Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110. Both contributions and order can now be made over the phone (801) 485-8894 with Visa, MasterCard or Discover Card.

The battle began in the year 1830 when the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith published the Book of Mormon. Smith proclaimed that an angel had revealed that the ancient inhabitants of the New World had written a religious history on gold plates and that God had given him the power to translate the record. Moreover, the prophet maintained that “the Book of Mormon was the most correct of any book on earth, and the keystone of our religion, and a man would get nearer to God by abiding by its precepts, than by any other book” (History of the Church, vol. 4, page 461).

Besides his assertion that the Book of Mormon was far superior to the Bible, he charged that the Bible had been changed by “Ignorant translators, careless transcribers, or designing and corrupt priests . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 6, page 57).

Furthermore, Joseph Smith boldly proclaimed that all other churches were false and that Mormonism was the only true religion. He claimed, in fact, that both God the Father and his Son Jesus Christ appeared to him bringing the message that all other churches “were wrong”: “I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight . . .” (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History 1:19).

No Middle Ground

Joseph Smith’s uncompromising attack on traditional Christianity led to a great deal of conflict with those who did not accept his beliefs. Not surprisingly, Smith’s adversaries began to study the Book of Mormon and protested that they found some serious errors in the book. The Mormon Church, on the other hand, continued to proclaim that the Book of Mormon was the most important and accurate book on earth. For example, Apostle Orson Pratt declared:

The Book of Mormon claims to be a divinely inspired record . . . If false, it is one of the most cunning, wicked, bold, deep-laid impositions ever palmed upon the world, calculated to deceive and ruin millions . . . if true, no one can possibly be saved and reject it: if false, no one can possibly be saved and receive it . . .

If, after a rigid examination, it be found an imposition, it should be extensively published to the world as such; the evidences and arguments on which the imposture was detected, should be clearly and logically stated. . . .

But on the other hand, if investigation should prove the Book of Mormon true . . . the American and English nations . . . should utterly reject both the Popish and Protestant ministry, together with all the churches which have been built up by them or that have sprung from them, as being entirely destitute of authority . . . (Orson Pratt’s Works, “Divine Authenticity of the Book of Mormon,” Liverpool, 1851, pages 1-2)

After the death of Joseph Smith and the first apostles, the Mormon Church continued to proclaim the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon. The church has greatly prospered since the days of these early leaders and now claims to have about 9,000,000 members [1994].

Like other believers in the Book of Mormon, we originally accepted the work at face value and felt that the book contained “the fulness of the everlasting Gospel.” In fact, we were convinced that it would be the tool God would use to bring sincere people throughout the world to true Christianity. When we began our research with regard to Mormonism, we sincerely wanted to silence the critics and prove that the Book of Mormon came from the hand of God. Although it was very painful at first, our eyes were eventually opened to perceive that there were some serious problems in Joseph Smith’s major work.

Our study led us to the conclusion that the Book of Mormon is not an ancient or divinely-inspired record, but rather a product of the nineteenth century. Since the early 1960’s we have published a number of books following Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt’s advice to state “clearly and logically” the “evidences and arguments on which the imposture was detected.”

LDS Scholars Very Upset

An article written by David Merrill pointed out that the Mormon leaders tried to restrain church scholars from dealing with our publications: “The official attitude of the Mormon hierarchy towards the Tanners has been one of silence and apparent unconcern. They have, however, actively discouraged LDS scholars and intellectuals from jousting with the Tanners...” (Utah Holiday, February 1978, page 7).

A spokesman from the church’s Deseret Bookstore wrote: “We do not have a specific response to the Tanner book. Perhaps it does not deserve the dignity of a response” (Letter written Jan. 19, 1977).

A man who talked to Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards claimed that Richards “told me to quit studying materials put out by the Tanner’s... I told him ‘surely some day there will be an answer to these questions.’ He told me there never would be an answer and I should stop my inquiries” (Letter dated August 13, 1978).

Since we began publishing in 1959, the LDS Church has never put forth any official rebuttal. We have waited in vain for thirty-five years for the church itself to make a response to our work. Although a large number of people have left the Mormon Church because of our publications and many others have been very concerned because their church has not published a rebuttal, Mormon leaders seem to feel that their best policy is silence. Since they apparently cannot find a way to successfully refute our allegations, they evidently believe that the less people know about our publications the better. Consequently, they have maintained a conspiracy of silence for thirty-five years while we have continued to distribute books throughout the world.

Prior to the publication of our book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, church scholars at Brigham Young University and F.A.R.M.S. followed the church leaders’ advice and studiously avoided dealing with our publications. With the publication of our work on the “black hole,” however, they apparently realized that our ideas were having a significant impact upon some Mormon scholars and that it was time to speak up. After remaining almost silent for over three decades, Mormon scholars suddenly came out like an army to attack us. The plan was to have a number of scholars simultaneously tear into our work. Between 1991 and 1993 there were seven critical reviews which appeared in F.A.R.M.S. publications. Besides the four responses to Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, there were two rebuttals to Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? and a response to our book, Archaeology and the Book of Mormon. All of these articles were specifically written to counter our work regarding the Book of Mormon.

In one of the reviews BYU scholar Matthew Roper showed deep concern over the effect our book Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? has had upon the reading public:

The first edition of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? was published by the Tanners in 1963 under the title, Mormonism: A Study of Mormon History and Doctrine. Since that time the Tanners’ magnum opus has been published in no less than seven editions, the most recent being in 1987. In 1980, in an attempt to facilitate wider distribution of their work, they published a condensed version [The Changing World of Mormonism] through Moody Press. Since their debut as vocal anti-Mormons in the early 1960s, the Tanners have produced and distributed numerous other works attacking various aspects of Mormon history, scripture, and doctrine.

There are several reasons why this book merits review. First, the Tanners are considered by their fellow critics to be among the foremost authorities on Mormonism and the Book of Mormon. Their arguments are central to most anti-Mormon attacks on the Book of Mormon today. One recent critic describes Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? as “the heavyweight of all books on Mormonism.” Even some of the more sophisticated Book of Mormon critics will often repeat methodological errors exemplified in the Tanners’ work. . . . This review will focus only on the Tanners’ criticals of the Book of Mormon in chapters five and six of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? (pp. 50-125). (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 4, 1992, pages 169-170)

It is interesting to note that in the quotation above Matthew Roper said the book Mormonism—Shadow or “Reality? “merits review.” This, of course, is in sharp contrast with what church officials have said in the past.

Although Daniel C. Peterson, editor of Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, denied that F.A.R.M.S. had an organized campaign directed against our work, he did acknowledge that something had to be done to keep our work from spreading:

Ah, they will respond, but why “three reviews, containing seventy-five pages”? . . . The Tanners are manifestly impressed by the sheer bulk of the reviews, and by the number of reviewers. . . . To set the record completely straight on the issue at hand here, I originally asked two reviewers to look at the Tanners’ book . . . a third, unsolicited review arrived, which I happened to like. So I published it, as well. However, the Tanners will probably see the lengthy review [of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?] appearing at pp. 169-215 of the present volume as evidence that I speak with forked tongue, and that there is indeed a new F.A.R.M.S. campaign against them. Why, otherwise, review a book published in 1987? But, again, the piece printed here was an unsolicited submission. I accepted it because I thought it made a number of important points, and because most contemporary anti-Mormon writers depend heavily upon the Tanners. Attending to the roots seemed an efficient way of dealing with the branches. (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 4,1992, p. lxxiv)

In our newsletter, The Salt Lake City Messenger, for August 1991, we announced we were preparing a detailed rebuttal to the F.A.R.M.S. articles. Unfortunately, after we began working on this book, a number of important matters came up which delayed the publication of our response. Consequently, scholars at F.A.R.M.S. began to boast that we were not able to deal with their scholarship. For example, Professor Daniel C. Peterson triumphantly proclaimed that the book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, (“and other books by the Tanners dealing with the Book of Mormon have been subjected to lengthy and devastating criticism . . . but the Tanners have failed to reply. One suspects they cannot (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 6, no. 1, 1994).

Contrary to Peterson’s assumptions, we have no reason to fear the criticism set forth by Mormon scholars and feel we have successfully answered their objections in our new book, Answering Mormon Scholars. Furthermore, we have also been working on a second volume which will respond to other accusations made against our work. Our 179-page response, Answering Mormon Scholars, regularly sells for $6.00 but is now available at a special price of $5.00 if ordered before August 15, 1994.

A Condescending Review

The most condescending review of our book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, was done by Tom Nibley. This review, which was published in Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 5, 1993, was recommended in the F.A.R.M.S. publication, Insights: An Ancient Window, July 1993: “Reviews in volume 5 cover a wide range of topics . . . Several of the reviews examine works critical of the Book of Mormon. One of the most engaging of these reviews is a spirited look by Tom Nibley at the Tanners’ Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon.”

On page 274 of this rebuttal, Tom Nibley goes out of his way to make it clear that he is the son of noted Mormon scholar Dr. Hugh Nibley: “Shortly after the papyri were turned over to the Church they were given over to the tender mercies of one Hugh Winder Nibley (yes, the one sometimes referred to by me, my brothers and sisters as ‘Daddy’). . . .”

In his article Tom Nibley has a number of terms which he uses to refer to us in a mocking manner:

“our super sleuths” page 275
“our learned mentors” page 276
“our gallant pedagogues, the Tanners” page 278
“the febrile brains of our dedicated cognoscenti” page 278
“our honored exegetes” page 279
“our meritorious mentors” page 280
“our learned oracles” page 282
“our revered gurus” page 283
“our perspicacious pedagogues” page 283
“our canny counselors” page 283
“our erudite educators” page 284
“professorial pedagogues such as, well—the Tanners!!!” page 284
“our formidable savants” page 285

Although we feel that Mr. Nibley has every right to ridicule us, we wonder why the editors of Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, which is supposed to be a scholarly publication, would allow such disdainful material to appear in their publication.

Tom Nibley acknowledges that he is not really a scholar and is not familiar with much of the material we deal with:

In my ramblings through Hollywood and environs in search of employment I occasionally encounter a gentleman named Robert Pierce (we’re actors who often audition for the same parts) who has made something of an avocation out of studying anti-Mormon literature. As I have taken exception to some of the things he has said, he provided me a copy of Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon by Jerald and Sandra Tanner. Of the Tanners, he informed me, “They are specifically known for their thoroughness and non-ad hominem approach.” And he challenged me to examine their work.

The gauntlet having thus been thrown, I thought, “I might as well pick it up.” So let’s take a look at the Tanners and their thrilling expose... I make no claim to being a scholar and am not familiar with much of the literature with which the Tanners work, but there are some things they bring up that I do know something about. (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 5, 1993, page 273)

Tom Nibley’s own admission that he is “not familiar with much of the literature” which we deal with is certainly true. A very good example of his lack of knowledge regarding our work is found on page 288 of Review of Books on the Book of Mormon. He strongly asserts that we grab on to “any straw that they think might break the Church’s back, although they take pains to distance themselves from things like the Spalding manuscript and Mark Hofmann, things that have been completely debunked.”

Tom Nibley, of course, is referring to the Mormon forger Mark Hofmann, who sold many forged documents to the Mormon Church and other collectors. His statement would give the reader the impression that after Hofmann’s documents were “debunked” we distanced ourselves from the forgeries. The truth of the matter, however, is that we were the first ones to publicly cast doubt on Mark Hofmann’s documents.

About eighteen months before the police and federal officials began investigating Mr. Hofmann, we printed the fact that we had serious reservations about his Salamander letter. Under the title, “Is It Authentic?” we published the following in our newsletter, The Salt Lake City Messenger:

At the outset we should state that we have some reservations concerning the authenticity of the letter, and at the present time we are not prepared to say that it was actually penned by Martin Harris. ... We will give the reasons for our skepticism as we proceed with this article. (Salt Lake City Messenger, March 1984, page 1)

We went on in the same newsletter to reveal disturbing parallels between the Salamander letter and E. D. Howe’s Mormonism Unvailed, published in 1834, and then noted:

While we would really like to believe that the letter attributed to Harris is authentic, we do not feel that we can endorse it until further evidence comes forth. (Ibid., page 4)

The Salamander letter was supposed to have been written by Martin Harris, one of the Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon in 1830, just months after the Book of Mormon was first published. The contents of this letter were very embarrassing to the Mormon Church. In Joseph Smith’s official story of how he received the gold plates from which the Book of Mormon was translated he said that the Angel Moroni (the name was given as Nephi when Joseph Smith printed the story in the Times and Seasons) appeared to him and revealed the location of the plates. In Hofmann’s forgery, however, Harris claimed that Smith told him that when he went to get the plates, instead of an angel appearing, a “white salamander” in the bottom of a hole “transfigured himself” into a “spirit” and “struck me 3 times.”

While we expected that some anti-Mormon critics might be upset with our insinuation of forgery, we were surprised to find that some of the top Mormon scholars opposed our research. On August 25, 1984, John Dart wrote the following in the Los Angeles Times:

... unusual caution about the letter’s genuineness has been expressed by Jerald and Sandra Tanner, longtime evangelical critics of the Mormon Church. ... The Tanners’ suggestion of forgery has surprised some Mormons, who note that the parallels in wording also could be taken as evidence for authenticity.

On September 1, 1984, the Mormon Church’s own Deseret News reported:

... outspoken Mormon Church critics Jerald and Sandra Tanner suspect the document is a forgery, they told the Deseret News. ... Jerald Tanner ... says similarities between it and other documents make its veracity doubtful.”

In the months that followed, we printed a great deal of material questioning the authenticity of the Salamander letter (see the Salt Lake City Messenger for September 1984, January 1985, June 1985, August 1985). On August 22, 1984, we published the first part of a booklet entitled, The Money Digging Letters. In this pamphlet we made it clear that we were investigating all of Mark Hofmann’s major discoveries. The next day Mr. Hofmann came to our bookstore to defend his documents. He appeared to be almost to the point of tears as he pled his case as to why we should trust him. It was about fourteen months later that Hofmann committed two murders that led to his arrest.

On February 23, 1987, Mark Hofmann appeared in court and confessed he had murdered two people and forged documents. When Mr. Hofmann later made a more detailed confession of his crimes for the County Attorney’s Office, he admitted that he had indeed used Howe’s book, Mormonism Unvailed. This, of course, vindicated the theory we had proposed three years earlier in the March 1984 issue of the Messenger.

If Tom Nibley really did not know what happened in the Hofmann case before, he should have found out when he read Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, pages 1-7, where we discussed both Mormon and anti-Mormon forgeries. The facts regarding Mark Hofmann’s forgeries were clearly set forth in that part of the book. Whether Mr. Nibley misunderstood the material presented, or deliberately distorted the facts is hard to determine. What is clear, however, is that his appraisal of the situation is not supported by the facts. He claims that we are “naive and credulous when it comes to grabbing any straw” that they think might break the Church’s back ...” (page 288). The Mark Hofmann affair, however, demonstrates just the opposite.
A Fierce Battle Within

While there have always been people in the Mormon Church who had doubts about the authenticity of the Book of Mormon, most of them have been afraid to publicly express them for fear they might be ostracized or even excommunicated from the church. Significantly, even the noted Mormon historian B. H. Roberts became very skeptical of the Book of Mormon during the last decade of his life. Although he did not publicly express his doubts, Roberts did prepare two important manuscripts that were suppressed for many years because of the fear that the contents would prove harmful to the Mormon Church.

We were able to obtain copies of Roberts’ secret manuscripts and published them in 1980 under the title Roberts’ Manuscripts Revealed. Five years later the University of Illinois Press printed these manuscripts in a book entitled, Studies of the Book of Mormon, and in 1992 Signature Books published a paper-back edition. Mormon scholar Truman G. Madsen acknowledged that the manuscripts were indeed prepared by B. H. Roberts but maintained that Roberts was merely playing “the ‘Devil’s Advocate’ approach to stimulate thought” (see Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1979, pages 440-42).

We cannot agree with Professor Truman G. Madsen’s assessment of this matter. A careful reading of Roberts’ manuscripts leads one to believe that he was in the process of losing faith in the divine origin of the Book of Mormon. Although Roberts may have started out merely playing the part of the “Devil’s Advocate,” he seems to have played the role so well that he developed grave doubts about the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. In his secret manuscripts B. H. Roberts made these revealing comments:

One other subject remains to be considered in this division . . . viz.— was Joseph Smith possessed of a sufficiently vivid and creative imagination as to produce such a work as the Book of Mormon from such materials as have been indicated in the preceding chapters . . . That such power of imagination would have to be of a high order is conceded; that Joseph Smith possessed such a gift of mind there can be no question . . .

In the light of this evidence, there can be no doubt as to the possession of a vividly strong, creative imagination by Joseph Smith, the Prophet, an imagination, it could with reason be urged, which, given the suggestions that are found in the “common knowledge” of accepted American antiquities of the times, supplemented by such a work as Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews, would make it possible for him to create a book such as the Book of Mormon is. (Studies of the Book of Mormon, pages 243, 250)

If from all that has gone before in Part 1, the view be taken that the Book of Mormon is merely of human origin . . . if it be assumed that he is the author of it, then it could be said there is much internal evidence in the book itself to sustain such a view.

In the first place there is a certain lack of perspective in the things the book relates as history that points quite clearly to an undeveloped mind as their origin. The narrative proceeds in characteristic disregard of conditions necessary to its reasonableness, as if it were a tale told by a child, with utter disregard for consistency. (Ibid., page 251)

There were other Anti-Christs among the Nephites, but they were more military leaders than religious innovators . . . they are all of one breed and brand; so nearly alike that one mind is the author of them, and that a young and undeveloped, but piously inclined mind. The evidence I sorrowfully submit, points to Joseph Smith as their creator. It is difficult to believe that they are the product of history, that they came upon the scene separated by long periods of time, and among a race which was the ancestral race of the red man of America. (Ibid., page 271)

A careful reading of the material cited above leads one to the inescapable conclusion that B. H. Roberts had serious doubts about the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. It is hard to believe that a sincere believer would make the comment concerning Book of Mormon stories which we cited above: “The evidence I sorrowfully submit, points to Joseph Smith as their creator. It is difficult to believe that they are the product of history . . .”

These revealing words did not come from the lips of an uninformed and bias “anti-Mormon” writer, but rather they are the carefully-worded pronouncements of the Mormon historian B. H. Roberts — believed by many to have been the greatest defender of the faith that the church has ever produced.

B. H. Roberts’ opinion regarding the Book of Mormon must carry a great deal of weight because he had access to some of the most important records in the church archives. According to Richard S. Van Wagoner and Steven C. Walker, Roberts “Became senior president of the First Council of Seventy” and was appointed “assistant Church historian in 1901 . . .” (A Book of Mormons, 1982, pages 246-247). James B. Allen and Glen M. Leonard inform us that “In May 1901 President Joseph F. Smith appointed B. H. Roberts to edit Joseph Smith’s History of the Church for republication” (The Story of the Latter-day Saints, 1976, page 447). Roberts also wrote the six-volume Comprehensive History of the Church.

The book, Studies of the Book of Mormon, set forth a document which contains compelling evidence that Roberts was struggling with serious doubts about the authenticity of the Book of Mormon right up until the time of his death in 1933. This information comes from the “Personal Journal of Wesley P. Lloyd, former dean of the Graduate School at Brigham Young University and a missionary under Roberts in the Eastern States Mission.” of regarding it as the strongest evidence we have of Church Divinity, he regards it as the one which needs the most bolstering. His greatest claim for the divinity of the Prophet Joseph lies in the Doctrine and Covenants.” (“Private Journal of Wesley P. Lloyd,” August 7, 1933, transcribed from photographs of the handwritten journal reproduced in the F.A.R.M.S.’ publication, Did B. H. Roberts Lose Faith in the Book of Mormon? 1986, by Truman G. Madsen and John W. Welch)

This appears to be the last important statement B. H. Roberts made on the Book of Mormon before his death. Although Roberts had spent a good portion of his life defending the Mormon Church, he became very disturbed with the church’s suppressive policy as he reached the end of his life. According to Lloyd’s journal, Roberts even “offered to resign” his position as a General Authority of the Mormon Church over the problems he was having with the church.

That B. H. Roberts did not have faith in all of Joseph Smith’s claims has been verified by some significant information which came to our attention in 1992. One of the most important declarations that Joseph Smith made was that John the Baptist appeared to him and Oliver Cowdery in 1829 and restored the Aaronic Priesthood. According to D. Michael Quinn, a noted authority on Mormon history who had access to sensitive church documents, Joseph F. Smith, the sixth president of the church, claimed that Roberts doubted the reality of this important tenant of the church. Dr. Quinn also demonstrated that Roberts had a serious dispute with Heber J. Grant, the seventh prophet of the church, regarding the alteration of church history:

. . . B. H. Roberts, a seventy, had problems directly involved with the writing of Church history. In November 1910, Church President Joseph F. Smith told the Salt Lake Temple fast meeting that Elder Roberts doubted that Joseph had actually received a priesthood restoration from John the Baptist. Church president Heber J. Grant also required B. H. Roberts to censor some documents in the seventh volume of the History of the Church. Elder Roberts was furious. “I desire, however, to take this occasion of disclaiming any responsibility for the mutilating of that very important part of President Young’s manuscript,” Roberts replied to President Grant in August 1932, “and also to say, that while you had the physical power of eliminating that passage from the History, I do not believe you had any moral right to do so.” (Sunstone, February 1992, pages 13-14)

Many years ago we were amazed to learn that a prominent Mormon scholar stated she believed in the Book of Mormon but did not accept the story of the gold plates. We felt that such a thing could not be possible because it would mean that Joseph Smith’s story concerning how he obtained and protected the plates would be fraudulent. In our way of thinking, if Joseph Smith did not actually receive gold plates from an angel of God, it would be unreasonable to accept the “translation” that is printed in the Book of Mormon.

The conversation then drifted to the Book of Mormon and this surprising story he related to me. . . . a Logan man by the name of Riter persuaded a scholarly friend who was a student in Washington to read thru and to criticize the Book of Mormon. . . . Riter sent the letter to Dr[.] Talmadge who studied it over and during a trip east ask[ed] Brother Roberts to make a careful investigation and study and to get an answer for the letter.

Roberts went to work and investigated it from every angle but could not answer it satisfactorily to himself. At his request Pres. Grant called a meeting of the Twelve Apostles and Bro. Roberts presented the matter, told them frankly that he was stumped and ask[ed] for their aide [sic] in the explanation. In answer, they merely one by one stood up and bore testimony to the truthfulness of the Book of Mormon. George Albert Smith in tears testified that his faith in the Book had not been shaken by the question. . . . No answer was available. Bro[.] Roberts could not criticize them for not being able to answer it or to assist him, but said that in a Church which claimed continuous revelation, a crisis had arisen where revelation was necessary. After the meeting he wrote Pres. Grant expressing his disappointment at the failure . . . It was mentioned at the meeting by Bro[.] Roberts that there were other Book of Mormon problems that needed special attention.

Richard R. Lyman spoke up and ask[ed] if they were things that would help our prestige and when Bro[.] Roberts answered no, he said then why discuss them. This attitude was too much for the historically minded Roberts[.]. . .

After this Bro[.] Roberts made a special Book of Mormon study. Treated the problem systematically and historically and in a 400 type written page thesis set forth a revolutionary article on the origin of the Book of Mormon and sent it to Pres[.] Grant. It[‘]s an article far too strong for the average Church member but for the intellectual group he considers it a contribution to assist in explaining Mormonism.

He swings to a psychological explanation of the Book of Mormon and shows that the plates were not objective but subjective with Joseph Smith, that his exceptional imagination qualified him psychologically for the experience which he had in presenting to the word the Book of Mormon and that the plates with the Urim and Thummim were not objective.

He explained certain literary difficulties in the Book . . . These are some of the things which has made Bro[.] Roberts shift his base on the Book of Mormon. Instead Mormon. We have since learned that many Mormons who say they believe the Book of Mormon, actually feel that there were not any ancient Nephites or Lamanites in the New World, but that Joseph Smith himself authored the book. They feel, however, that although the Book of Mormon is not historical, it does contain many good teachings and therefore can be considered as “scripture.”

Just a few months ago, we were very surprised to hear Van Hale, a noted defender of the Mormon Church, express doubts about the historicity of the Book of Mormon. Mr. Hale, who co-hosts a radio show on KTKK in Salt Lake City, was asked what he really believed about the story of the Nephites and Lamanites mentioned in the Book of Mormon. In response, Hale affirmed that he believed that the Book of Mormon is inspired scripture, but then went on to explain that when he served on a mission for the church, he had a book containing pictures of ancient American ruins which he felt proved the Book of Mormon to be historically true. Later, however, as he began to study the matter he realized that the evidence did not prove the Book of Mormon to be true. After many years of diligent study he finally came to lean toward the view that the Book of Mormon is “an inspired parable” (KTKK Radio, February 6, 1994).

During the past few years a number of Mormon scholars have become increasingly vocal about their doubts regarding the historicity of the Book of Mormon. Even though they know they may face excommunication, they continue to publicly express their views.

Wolves In Sheep’s Clothing?

While we knew that Mormon scholars were very upset with us, the treatment we received was mild compared with the wrath poured out on some of the church’s own scholars by the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies. For a number of years it has been evident that many of those associated with F.A.R.M.S. have been very disturbed with Mormon scholars who expressed doubts about the Book of Mormon. In 1991, F.A.R.M.S. launched a vicious attack against some of the more liberal scholars who were expressing doubts about the historicity of the Book of Mormon. They were accused of being wolves in sheep’s clothing and of even offering “a Trojan horse” to an unsuspecting Mormon audience. Stephen E. Robinson, chairman of the Department of Ancient Scripture at BYU, was incensed with the book, The Word of God: Essays on Mormon Scripture, published by Signature Book. He compared the views expressed in the work to those of Korihor, the notorious “Anti-Christ” who was “struck dumb” because of his unbelief (see Book of Mormon, Alma, chapter 30). Professor Robinson declared:

> Korihor’s back, and this time he’s got a printing press. Korihor, the infamous “alternate voice” in the Book of Mormon, insisted that “no man can know of anything which is to come” . . . In its continuing assault upon traditional Mormonism, Signature Books promotes with its recent and dubiously titled work, The Word of God, precisely these same naturalistic assumptions of the Korihor agenda in dealing with current Latter-day Saint beliefs. . . . this is a propaganda piece . . .

For years anti-Mormons have hammered the Church from the outside, insisting that Joseph Smith and the Latter-day Saint scriptures he produced were not what they claimed to be. Whether Signature Books and its authors will convince the Saints of the same hostile propositions by attacking from the inside remains to be seen . . . What the anti-Mormons couldn’t do with a frontal assault of contradiction, Signature and Vogel would now accomplish with a flanking maneuver of redefinition . . .

I suppose by now it is clear that I did not like this book. . . . Give me a Walter Martin anytime, a good stout wolf with his own fur on, instead of those more timid or sly parading around in their ridiculous fleeces with their teeth and tails hanging out. Give me “Ex-Mormons for Jesus” or the Moody Bible Tract Society, who are at least honest about their anti-Mormon agenda, instead of Signature Books camouflaged as a “Latter-day Saint” press. I prefer my anti-Mormons straight up. (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 3, pages 312, 314, 317-318)

The following year, Professor Daniel C. Peterson, editor of Review of Books, warned of an “anti-Mormon” movement within the church itself:

> We have seen that George D. Smith and Signature Books reject the title “anti-Mormons.” . . . Are “anti-Mormons” mere mythical beasts, the stuff of persecution-fixated Latter-day Saint imaginations? If not, how would we recognize an “anti-Mormon” if we saw one? . . .

Nobody would suggest for a moment that George D. Smith and Dan Vogel fit the traditional “anti-Mormon” mold in all respects. There are a number of differences between them and the late “Dr.” Walter Martin, and between them and the Tanners . . .

In the past, anti-Mormon attacks almost invariably came from outside the Church; for the most part, they still do. For the first time since the Godbeite movement, however, we may today be dealing with a more-or-less organized “anti-Mormon” movement within the Church. With “anti-Mormon Mormons,” as Robert McKay puts it . . .

Should we be concerned about the possibility of unwholesome opinions, even enemies, within the Church? Jesus certainly seemed to think that internal enemies were a possibility. “Beware of false prophets,” he said, “which come to you in sheep’s clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves” (Matthew 7:15). . . . So the possibility of enemies among the membership of the Church seems established. (Review of Books, vol. 4, pp. liv-lvi)

In 1993 a book was published which caused a great deal of consternation among scholars at Brigham Young University and F.A.R.M.S. They obviously feared that it could have a profound effect on those who believe in the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. The book,
New Approaches to the Book of Mormon, was edited by the Mormon scholar Brent Lee Metcalfe. Brent Metcalfe had formerly served as a missionary for the Mormon Church and later worked for Church Security. Ironically, like us, Mr. Metcalfe started out as an apologist for the Book of Mormon. Metcalfe not only believed in the authenticity of the Book of Mormon, but he strongly supported the leaders of the church.

Sometime around 1979, after he had returned from his mission, Brent Metcalfe began coming to our bookstore to argue with us about the truthfulness of Mormonism. Although he was just a young man at that time, it did not take long for us to perceive that he was one of the strongest defenders of the Mormon Church that we had encountered. It was obvious, in fact, that if he kept up his research, he would soon be a formidable opponent.

Unfortunately for Mormon scholars, as Brent Metcalfe continued his research, he began to see serious problems in the Book of Mormon and finally concluded it was not an actual historical account written by the ancient Nephites.

When New Approaches to the Book of Mormon was published, defenders of the Mormon Church realized that they were confronted with a very serious problem indeed. Consequently, F.A.R.M.S. reacted in an unprecedented manner by launching a massive attack — rebuttal containing 566 pages (see Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 6, no. 1, 1994). This volume of Review of Books has fourteen authors dealing with the ten scholars who wrote essays for New Approaches to the Book of Mormon.

Since this two-pound tome contains 120 pages more than the book it is answering, it is obvious that F.A.R.M.S. is deeply concerned about the effect the work edited by Brent Metcalfe will have on the public.

While Brigham Young University professor Louis Midgley was very displeased with both Brent Metcalfe and New Approaches to the Book of Mormon, he made this revealing comment about the book:

The most imposing attack on the historical authenticity of the Book of Mormon has been assembled by Brent Lee Metcalfe. . . . the publication of New Approaches is an important event. It marks the most sophisticated attack on the truth of the Book of Mormon currently available either from standard sectarian or more secularized anti-Mormon sources, or from the fringes of Mormon culture and intellectual life. (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 6, no. 1, 1994, pages 211-214)

New Approaches to the Book of Mormon: Explorations in Critical Methodology normally sells for $26.95, but if it is ordered from Utah Lighthouse before August 15, 1994, the price will be only $23.95 plus postage. (Note—this book is written in scholarly language and may be difficult for some people to understand.)

Vern Anderson, a reporter for The Associated Press, noted that the response prepared by F.A.R.M.S. to New Approaches to the Book of Mormon seemed to be rather spiteful in tone:

When Brent Metcalfe compiled a book of essays last year suggesting that Mormonism’s founding scriptures wasn’t the ancient history it purports to be, he expected some criticism.

Nearly a year later, he’s getting it, in a vitriolic volume that exceeds his own book by 100 pages and seeks to expose him as a faith-destroying secularist masquerading, badly, as a well-meaning pursuer of historic truth. . . .

“Pseudo-pious,” “shoddy pseudoscholarship,” “deceptive and specious” and “distorted” are just some of the barbs aimed at Metcalfe and other contributors to New Approaches to the Book of Mormon . . .

Metcalfe and the nine other essayists in New Approaches — most of them at least nominal Mormons — place the Book of Mormon squarely in the 19th century. Most, including Metcalfe, see it as entirely Smith’s creation. A few agree it is frontier fiction but believe it contains inspired truths.

The essayists . . . question the book’s authenticity on a variety of levels — textual, archaeological, demographic and linguistic. (Salt Lake Tribune, March 19, 1994)

As the battle between liberal Mormon scholars and those supporting F.A.R.M.S. became more intense, some of the rhetoric became very harsh. Since Brent Metcalfe was the editor of New Approaches to the Book of Mormon, he became a special target of ad hominem attacks by Mormon scholars. Consequently, a good deal of innuendo and ridicule were heaped upon him.

For example, Brigham Young University professor Daniel C. Peterson, who edits the Review of Books, ridiculed Mr. Metcalfe for what he perceived to be his gullibility in promoting the documents forged by Mark Hofmann (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 6, no. 1, 1994, pages 528-529, 544-545, 551). Unfortunately, in his attempt to castigate Brent Metcalfe, Peterson failed to tell his readers that the Mormon Church itself bought many of Hofmann’s documents and church leaders supported him until the very end.

Furthermore, some of the church’s top scholars helped validate the very documents which later turned out to be forgeries. How, then, can Professor Peterson single out Brent Metcalfe for failure to detect Hofmann’s deceit? One would think that Peterson would be far more concerned that the leaders of the church, who are supposed to be inspired by God to detect evil conspiracies, would fall for Hofmann’s nefarious deception. It is clear, therefore, that Peterson has used a double standard in making his accusation against Metcalfe.

Moreover, we should also point out that Daniel Peterson, who serves on the Board of Directors of F.A.R.M.S., fails to tell his readers that F.A.R.M.S. itself was deeply involved with promoting Hofmann’s forged documents. In fact, the staff at F.A.R.M.S. accepted the Salamander letter as an authentic document. This, of course, is understandable since Mark Hofmann was a very clever forger. The problem,
However, is that these scholars went much further. While it should have been obvious to anyone who carefully read the letter that it contained a devastating blow to the Mormon Church, the scholars at F.A.R.M.S. became apologists for the letter. The Foundation proceeded to whitewash the contents of the letter so that it would appear acceptable to the Mormon people. In a F.A.R.M.S. Update entitled Moses, Moroni, and the Salamander, we find the following:

> Martin Harris’ letter [the Salamander letter] . . . has dismayed some people. *Harris talks of a “white salamander” which was “transfigured” into “the spirit” otherwise known to us as the Angel Moroni . . . as new research is showing, the salamander has been thought for millennia to have supernatural and extraordinary powers . . . Obviously, much has changed culturally since 1830. Some of us may wince at the suggestion that an angel of God should be associated with, or described as, a salamander. But to people then, no image or description would better fit the appearance of a brilliant white spiritual being, once a valiant soldier, now dwelling in a blazing pillar of light, shockingly pure and glorious, speaking with the voice of God while flying through the midst of Heaven, than the salamander! Moroni should be flattered . . .

Still, it was predictable that people would not understand this. (Moses, Moroni, and the Salamander, June 1985)

While Brent Metcalfe clearly recognized that the contents of the Salamander letter discredited the Book of Mormon, scholars at F.A.R.M.S. went so far as to suggest that the Salamander letter provided additional support for the Book of Mormon! In the Church Section of the Mormon newspaper, Deseret News, June 2, 1985, the following was printed:

> The recently discovered Martin Harris letter . . . adds evidence to support Harris’ account of his interview with Prof. Charles Anthon, according to researchers at the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies (FARMS). . . .

> John W. Welch, president of the foundation, said the phrase “short hand Egyptian” is a scholarly term that Harris probably would not have learned on his own.

> “The phrase almost certainly came from Anthon,” declared Welch. “It is a very precise term that was used by scholars in the 1820s and would have been known to just a few students of ancient languages . . . it is highly unlikely that the phrase was part of Harris’ vocabulary.”

In the F.A.R.M.S. publication, Why Might a Person in 1830 Connect an Angel With a Salamander? page 1, footnote 1, the staff reported that they had found “further evidence in favor of the authenticity of the [Salamander] letter” in the portion of the letter which mentioned short hand Egyptian. Actually, the appearance of these words in the Salamander letter did not help establish its authenticity. On the contrary, it only demonstrated that the forger of the letter plagiarized these words from a letter by W. W. Phelps which was published in Mormonism Unvailed, page 273.

In our opinion, F.A.R.M.S.’ unusual response to the salamander scandal raises the question of how far its researchers will go to save Joseph Smith. The fact that they tried so desperately to explain away the obvious occultic implications of the Salamander letter causes us to have serious apprehension concerning their work.

In view of the failure of church leaders, F.A.R.M.S., and Mormon historians to detect that Hofmann was forging documents and selling a “nonexistent” McLellin collection, it seems incredible that Professor Daniel Peterson would point his finger at Brent Metcalfe.

A Disgusting Joke?

Brigham Young University professor William J. Hamblin, who also serves on the Board of Directors at F.A.R.M.S., was very upset with Brent Metcalfe. His anger against Metcalfe led him into making a very offensive mistake. When he prepared his response to Mr. Metcalfe, he included what he termed “a joke” which eventually caused embarrassment to F.A.R.M.S., Brigham Young University and the Mormon Church. Associated Press writer Vern Anderson wrote an article concerning the matter which was published in the church’s own newspaper:

> The salvos contained in the 566-page “Review of Books on the Book of Mormon” come as no surprise, given the longstanding animus between scholars associated with FARMS, many of them professors at church-owned Brigham Young University, and those published by the independent Signature Books. . . . Recently a review by BYU history professor William Hamblin containing an encrypted message “Metcalfe is butthead” — was hastily edited out after the “Review” had gone to press. (Deseret News, March 22-23, 1994)

As we understand it, “Butthead” is an animated character that appears on MTV and is known for his crude and stupid behavior.

After reading that the demeaning comment “was hastily edited out after the ‘Review’ had gone to press,” we closely examined our copy of Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 6, no. 1, to see if any remnants of the acrostic remained in the book. To our surprise, we found that even after the article was revised, twelve of the original sixteen characters remained (see pages 434-442 of the F.A.R.M.S. publication). In this particular acrostic the first letter of each paragraph was used to form the words. (It should be noted, however, that if a paragraph was part of a quotation from another source, it was not counted as part of the acrostic.)

Below we show the original message Professor William Hamblin wrote and the way it was later altered in an attempt to cover up his vindictive attitude toward Brent Metcalfe. The reader will note that in the modified version we have shown letters that have been changed with asterisks:
METCALFE IS BUTTHEAD
MET FE I' BUT* HEA*

It seems evident that those who were more sensible at F.A.R.M.S. realized that Hamblin’s so-called “joke” could have a very serious effect on the foundation and scrambled to correct the problem. According to Brent Metcalfe, the book had already gone to press when the encrypted message was discovered. William Hamblin seems to have realized that he made a very serious error in judgment and tried to pacify Mr. Metcalfe by claiming it was only a joke:

I am writing to apologize for my private practical joke. Whenever I write a paper Dan Petersen [Daniel C. Peterson] will be editing, I always include a joke or two for his enjoyment — fake footnotes, comments about space aliens and the golden plates, etc. The acrostic was simply a light-hearted joke for Dan’s amusement. . . . (Computer message by William Hamblin, dated March 14, 1994)

Brent Metcalfe wrote the following concerning Professor Hamblin’s attempt to belittle him:

When I heard rumors that William J. Hamblin, FARMS board member and BYU historian, had a caustic encryption in his review . . . I summarily dismissed them. Surely no legitimate scholar would stoop to such an inane level. However, it seems that I underestimated Hamblin’s “scholarly” prowess. In the latest “Review of Books on the Book of Mormon” Hamblin had the first letter of succeeding paragraphs spell out the message:

I say “Hamblin HAD” because the “Review” has gone back to press to rectify Hamblin’s demeaning remark. I have been told that Daniel C. Peterson, FARMS board member and “Review” editor, approved its inclusion — I am unaware of other FARMS board members who may have known. Frankly, I’m stunned. Hamblin and Peterson’s behavior is contrary to all Mormon ethics I was taught.

Do Hamblin and Peterson’s methods typify the brand of “scholarship” FARMS, BYU Department of History, and BYU Department of Asian and Near Eastern Languages cultivates and endorses? Evidently some have shifted from apologist to misologist. (Computer message by Brent Metcalfe, dated March 8, 1994)

If BYU professor Daniel C. Peterson did approve the publication of the rude statement, as Metcalfe claims, this would mean that at least two members of the F.A.R.M.S. Board of Directors were involved in the so-called “joke.” In this regard, it should be remembered that Professor Hamblin acknowledged that he always included “a joke or two for his [Peterson’s] enjoyment. . . . The acrostic was simply a light-hearted joke for Dan’s amusement.” Hamblin apparently believed that Professor Peterson would find the “joke” amusing.

On March 9, 1994, The Daily Herald, published in Provo, Utah, printed an Associated Press article concerning the bizarre incident:

SALT LAKE CITY— Independent Mormon scholar Brent Metcalfe is shaking his head over a practical joke . . .

Metcalfe edited the 1993 “New Approaches to the Book of Mormon,” published by Signature Books, which raised the hackles of many traditional scholars into the scripture that is foundational of the Mormon faith.

Indeed, the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies, or FARMS, planned to release on Wednesday a 600-page book rebutting the essays in Metcalfe’s book.

And thereby hangs the tale.

According to Metcalfe, the rude message was to have been spelled out in the first letter of the first words of the opening paragraphs of an article written for the FARMS book by William Hamblin, a history professor at Brigham Young University.

The coded message was to have read, “Metcalfe is butthead,” Metcalfe said. He said he learned about it from someone who had seen the article.

Metcalfe said that according to the, er, scuttlebutt, FARMS learned about the encryption just as the volume was going into print, quickly halted the press run and rewrote and reprinted the offending pages.

But FARMS editor Brent Hall would not confirm that Tuesday.

“The book will be out tomorrow. The book that will come out tomorrow will not have that,” Hall said.

“We had some problems with the book — footnote problems, binding problems, and an article that we thought needed some revision, which was done.”

Was the article Hamblin’s?

“That was the article,” Hall said. . . .

Both Hamblin and Peterson seem to be very skillful in making ad hominem attacks on those with whom they differ. Since Professor Peterson serves as editor of Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, he sets a very bad example for contributors to that publication. Anyone who examines the articles written by Daniel C. Peterson, William Hamblin, Louis Midgley, and some of the other Mormon scholars will see that they have sometimes been mean spirited in their attempt to save the church.

Although Metcalfe is a powerful debater, in the book he has edited he has not used the vitriolic type of approach which appears so frequently in Review of Books on the Book of Mormon. Professor William Hamblin accused Metcalfe of “academic immaturity” on page 522 of his response. We feel that Hamblin should take a careful look at his own writings. If we had written the tasteless acrostic mentioned above and had directed it at William Hamblin or Daniel C. Peterson, we would never hear the end of it. These scholars certainly use a double standard when they deal with those they perceive to be enemies of the church.

Plagiarism From John?

On page 76 of Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, we printed photographic proof that Joseph Smith plagiarized from a New Testament book in writing his Book of Mormon. The material was taken from the eleventh chapter of the book of John. This portion of John’s book relates the story of Jesus raising Lazarus from the dead.

The parallels between the two stories are astounding:

One — In both stories a man seems to die and a period of time elapses:

And it came to pass that after two days and two nights they were about to take his body and lay it in a sepulchre. (Bible, John 11:17)

Then when Jesus came, he found that he had lain in the grave four days already. (Book of Mormon, Alma 19:1)

Two — Both Martha and an unnamed queen use the words “he stinketh”:

. . . others say that he is dead and that “he stinketh . . .” (Alma 19:5)

. . . by this time he stinketh . . . (John 11:39)

Three — Both Ammon and Jesus use the word “sleepeth” with regard to the man:

. . . he sleepeth . . . (Alma 19:8)

Lazarus sleepeth . . . (John 11:11)

Four — Both Ammon and Jesus say that the man will rise again:

. . . he shall rise again . . . (Alma 19:8)

Thy brother shall rise again. (John 11:23)

Five — As we will show below, the conversation between Ammon and the queen contains phrases that are strangely similar to those used by Jesus and Martha.

Six — In both cases the man arose:

. . . he arose . . . (Alma 19:12)

he that was dead came forth . . . (John 11:44)

The fact that there are so many parallels between Alma 19 and John 11 is almost impossible to explain unless one admits that plagiarism is involved. There are not only many similar thoughts, but even the use of uncommon words and expressions. It seems obvious, too, that the author of the Book of Mormon was plagiarizing from the Bible rather than the other way around. The Nephites could not have had the King James Version of the New Testament, and the Apostle John certainly did not have the Nephite scriptures. The only logical conclusion, therefore, is that sometime after the King James Bible was published in A.D. 1611, someone borrowed from it to create the story in the Book of Mormon. Not surprisingly, the evidence clearly points to Joseph Smith the Mormon prophet.

Unfortunately, John Tvedtnes, who has criticized our work in the F.A.R.M.S. publication Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, could not accept what should be obvious to unbiased observer and protested as follows:

The Tanners compare four verses (Alma 19:1, 5, 8, 12) from the account of the raising of King Lamoni with the story of the raising of Lazarus in John 11, from whence they believe it was plagiarized. There are, to be sure, some similarities, since, in each case, someone was brought back from the dead. But the Tanners have gone too far. Even a cursory glance at their schematic comparison (p. 76) shows that the order of events is quite different in the two accounts. There are also substantive differences. For example, while Lamoni had been lying (presumably dead) on his bed for two days and two nights (Alma 19:1), Lazarus had been dead and buried for four days (John 11:17). The Tanners’ use of selected verses from both accounts stacks the evidence of plagiarism in their favor. When one compares the complete accounts from Alma and John, the parallels seem insignificant indeed.

Nevertheless, one can say that if the parallels are all valid, because of their number alone, they could be taken as prima facie evidence that the account in Alma 19 was taken from John 11. It behooves us, therefore, to examine each of the supposed parallels to determine their validity.

The Tanners point, for example, to the fact that Lazarus had “lain in the grave” (John 11:17) and that the people were about to “lay [Lamoni’s body] in a sepulchre” (Alma 19:1). But where else would one lay a dead body? (Or do they expect Joseph Smith to have written “toss it”!!) If Joseph Smith copied from John, why didn’t he use the word “grave,” rather than “sepulchre”? . . .

The idea of the dead stinking (Alma 19:5; John 11:39) is not exclusive to John; it is found in Isaiah 34:3. So, too, the use of the term “sleep” in the sense of “die” (Alma 19:8; John 11:11) is found in several Old Testament passages (Deuteronomy 31:16; 2 Samuel 7:12; 1 Kings 1:21; Psalms 13:3; Jeremiah 51:39, 57; Daniel 12:2).

The words “he shall rise again,” common to Alma 19:8 and John 11:24, are the only strong point in the Tanners’ case. Though the phrase is used six times in the Old Testament, it is never used of the dead. But its very existence in pre-Nephite texts weakens the case for plagiarism from John 11.

There are several weak parallels which are made even weaker by virtue of the fact that the ones we have noted above are invalid. (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 3, 1991, pages 226-227)

John Tvedtnes’ first comment concerning the charge of plagiarism from the book of John contains an error. He states “The Tanners compare four verses (Alma 19:1, 5, 8, 12) from the account of the raising of King Lamoni with the story of the raising of Lazarus . . .” Actually, as those who examine our photograph will see, we used five verses from Alma, chapter 19.

While we would not even mention this matter under normal circumstances, John Tvedtnes has criticized us for minor mistakes even claiming that we have either “covered up” evidence or that our “attention to detail is surely to be questioned.” In this case, however, Tvedtnes has failed to notice that in our photograph we have included Alma 19:9, a verse which contains thirty-nine words. Significantly, this one verse has four extremely important parallels which Joseph Smith took from John 11:25-27.
In the three verses from the book of John we find the following:

Jesus said unto her . . . Believest thou this? She saith unto him . . . I believe that . . .

Alma 19:9 reads:

. . . Ammon said unto her: Believest thou this? . . . she said unto him . . . I believe that . . .

While we have never claimed that our comparison of the stories regarding Lazarus and Lamoni uses only words found in the book of John or the New Testament, it is very interesting to note that the words “Believest thou this,” cited above, are only found once in the entire Bible and this is in John 11:26!

As we have shown above, in John Tvedtnes’ criticism of our work he commented: “The idea of the dead stinking (Alma 19:5; John 11:39) is not exclusive to John; it is found in Isaiah 34:3. So, too, the use of the term ‘sleep’ in the sense of ‘die’ (Alma 19:8; John 11:11) is found in several Old Testament passages (Deuteronomy 31:16; 2 Samuel 7:12; 1 Kings 1:21; Psalms 13:3; Jeremiah 51:39, 57; Daniel 12:2).”

John Tvedtnes seems to be skirting around something very important here. Notice that while he uses the words “stinking” and “sleep,” he fails to cite the actual words found in our study — i.e., “stinketh” and “sleepeth.” The word “stinketh” is only used twice in the entire Bible. Furthermore, what we actually have is a two word parallel, “he stinketh.” These two words are never used together in the entire Bible except in John 11:39! Furthermore, Joseph Smith never used the word “stinketh” again in the Book of Mormon. The word “sleepeth” is only used seven times in the Bible. It seems incredible to believe that by coincidence the phrase “he stinketh” and the word “sleepeth” would appear in one chapter of the book of John and later be found together in just one chapter of the Book of Mormon.

In his response John Tvedtnes asked: “If Joseph Smith copied from John, why didn’t he use the word ‘grave,’ rather than ‘sepulchre’? Tvedtnes seems to have a very simplistic view of plagiarism. Clever plagiarists, of course, try to be careful not to make their writings so similar to the source material that they are detected. The Mormon forger Mark Hofmann, for example, borrowed heavily from a book written by E. D. Howe when he wrote his notorious Salamander letter. The book stated that when Joseph Smith described his trip to acquire the gold plates which contained the Book of Mormon, he claimed that he “looked into the hole, where he saw a toad, which immediately transformed itself into a spirit . . .” In the Salamander letter, however, Hofmann wrote that Joseph Smith said that “when I take it up the next morning the spirit transfigured himself from a white salamander in the bottom of the hole . . .” In view of this information, we might ask Tvedtnes the following question: “If Mark Hofmann was copying from a book which mentioned a toad, why didn’t he use the word “toad,” rather than the words “white salamander?”

In his confession Mr. Hofmann explained that “the idea for the White Salamander was derived from the toad in . . . Howe’s book. Salamander, from my reading of folk magic, seemed more appropriate than a toad.” He went on to say he “decided to spice it up.” Hofmann also explained that “not wanting to sound like I was plagiarizing from a book, I used the word transfigured rather than transformed” (for a more complete statement about the plagiarism involved see our book, Confessions of a White Salamander, pages 12-13).

As noted above, in his criticism of our work regarding Lazarus and Lamoni, John Tvedtnes charged that “There are also substantive differences. For example, while Lamoni had been lying (presumably dead) on his bed for two days and two nights (Alma 19:1), Lazarus had been dead and buried for four days (John 11:17).” This, of course, could easily be explained by comparing Hofmann’s method of slightly modifying the language in his forgeries. On the other hand, however, it should also be pointed out that the words “two days” are also found in John 11:6: “. . . he [Jesus] abode two days in the same place.” It is certainly possible that Joseph Smith borrowed these words when he wrote Alma 19:1 and 5.

In his review of our work John Tvedtnes asserted:

The words “he shall rise again,” common to Alma 19:8 and John 11:24, are the only strong point in the Tanner’s case. Though the phrase is used six times in the Old Testament, it is never used of the dead. But its very existence in pre-Nephite texts weakens the case for plagiarism from John 11.

John Tvedtnes has made a serious mistake with regard to this matter. The words “he shall rise again” appear only once in Matthew, Mark, Luke and John in the New Testament (a total of four times in all). This phrase, however, is never found in the Old Testament! We carefully checked this matter with the church’s computer program, The Computerized Scriptures of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. We do not know how Tvedtnes was able to discover the phrase “six times in the Old Testament.” Exodus 21:19 and Isaiah 24:20 have the two words “rise again,” but the four-word parallel, “he shall rise again,” is never found in the Old Testament. We even checked this matter in Strong’s Exhaustive Concordance of the Bible. This study also yielded no occurrences of that phrase in the Old Testament. In addition, Michael Marquardt checked out the matter on his computer and was unable to find the references John Tvedtnes mentioned.

It is obvious, then, that John Tvedtnes saw six references, containing twenty-four words, that are just not there. The reader will remember that Tvedtnes argued that the “very existence” of the four-word phrase “in pre-Nephite texts weakens the case for plagiarism from John 11.” Now that the facts are known, it is obvious that it is Tvedtnes’ argument that has been weakened. Contrary to his assertion, this phrase never appears in “pre-Nephite texts.”
As noted above, on page 226 of his rebuttal, John Tvedtnes charged: “The Tanners’ use of selected verses from both accounts stacks the evidence of plagiarism in their favor.” Those who take the time to carefully examine the evidence will see that this charge is without foundation. Because of Tvedtnes’ assertion that we have stacked the deck in our favor we decided to do a more detailed study of the matter.

We reasoned that if Joseph Smith was borrowing from the book of John when he wrote the material concerning the raising of king Lamoni in the book of Alma, there might be supporting evidence in other material which appears near Alma, chapter 19. Consequently, we made a careful examination of chapters 18, 19 and 20 of the book of Alma. This study provided very strong evidence that our original conclusions were correct: Smith had indeed relied heavily on the Gospel of John when he wrote these three chapters of Alma in the Book of Mormon.

We searched for phrases of two or more words which are not found in the Old Testament. Although we were particularly interested in finding phrases from the book of John, we also included many other references from other New Testament books which may have been borrowed by Joseph Smith in writing these three chapters which are found in the Book of Mormon. While we would not claim that we discovered every parallel in our study, we found 166 parallels! We have published this study in our new book, Answering Mormon Scholars.

Since the two-or-more-word phrases which appear in the study are not found in the Old Testament, it seems clear that there has been a great deal of plagiarism from the New Testament. Although it is true that some of the 166 examples may only be coincidences, there are far too many strong parallels to brush the matter aside. The 166 examples, of course, were found in just three chapters of the Book of Mormon. It is very significant that the events mentioned in the Book of Mormon were supposed to have occurred about 90 B.C., which is about 120 years before Jesus even began his public ministry. Moreover, the books of the New Testament were not written until years after that time.

Among the 166 examples we noted in the three chapters of the Book of Mormon, we found forty-seven parallels to the book of John. Some of them provide strong evidence of plagiarism. Our discovery of significant parallels between the Book of Mormon and the Gospel of John led us to make an extensive comparison between the writings of John and the Book of Mormon. What we found was really astounding: the Book of Mormon is filled with quotations from the book of John. In addition to the Gospel of John, the epistles of John (found toward the end of the New Testament) were also plagiarized in Joseph Smith’s work. Significantly, even Smith’s Doctrine and Covenants is permeated with material from the writings of John. Although we do not have the room to present this significant material here, we hope to be able to print it sometime in the future.

In Answering Mormon Scholars we demonstrate that time after time defenders of Mormonism who have written for F.A.R.M.S. have utterly failed to understand our arguments and have reached erroneous conclusions. We highly recommend this book to those who want to know our side of the debate.

Mormon Prophet Dies

Ezra Taft Benson, the thirteenth prophet of the church, died on May 30, 1994. Howard W. Hunter, who is 86 years old and in poor health, was chosen to be the fourteenth Prophet, Seer and Revelator of the Mormon Church. Gordon B. Hinckley and Thomas S. Monson have been retained as counselors in the First Presidency.

Inventing Mormonism

We are pleased to announce that the long-awaited book, Inventing Mormonism, by Wesley P. Walters and H. Michael Marquardt is now available from Utah Lighthouse Ministry. Many years ago it became evident to us that Walters and Marquardt were two of the most knowledgeable researchers on Mormonism that we had ever encountered. Because of their expertise on the subject we constantly sought their advice. Without the insights, material and encouragement they freely gave us, we would have had a far more difficult time preparing our own work on Mormonism.

After years of painstaking research on Mormon history and doctrine, Walters and Marquardt decided to write a book on the origin of Mormonism. Unfortunately, however, before the work was completed Wesley Walters passed away. Since that time, H. Michael Marquardt has worked diligently with Walters’ widow, Helen Walters, to complete this important project. Mrs. Walters had helped Wesley in his research and had developed a good understanding of his thinking about early Mormonism.

The reader may remember that Wesley Walters made two of the most important discoveries regarding Mormonism. First, that the revival which supposedly led Joseph Smith to pray and receive a visitation from God and Jesus Christ in 1820 did not occur at that time. Walters found historical evidence that the revival actually occurred in 1824-25! This, of course, undermined the whole story of the First Vision and the coming forth of the Book of Mormon.

Second, Walters discovered Justice Albert Neely’s bill showing the costs of a court case involving Joseph Smith which took place in Bainbridge, New York, in 1826. This remarkable discovery of the original bill verified a transcript of the examination which was printed in 1873. Mormon officials had always claimed the transcript was a forgery. Before the discovery Dr. Hugh Nibley was especially adamant that the transcript was not authentic. In his book The Myth Makers, we find this revealing statement: “...if this court record is authentic it is the most damning evidence in existence against Joseph Smith.” Dr. Nibley’s book also states that if the authenticity of the court record could be established, it would be “the most devastating blow to Smith ever delivered...” (The Myth Makers, 1961, page 142). Mormon scholars now accept the evidence concerning Joseph Smith’s run-in with the law. The testimony given at the examination was especially devastating because it linked Joseph Smith to money-digging and proved that he was involved in the occultic practice of looking in a seer stone to find buried treasure. Justice Neely, in fact, referred to Smith as “Joseph Smith The Glass Looker” in the bill he wrote. Some years after Wesley Walters discovered the Neely bill, H. Michael Marquardt went back to New York and discovered additional evidence verifying the authenticity of the document Walters had found.

We highly recommend the book Inventing Mormonism: Tradition and the Historical Record to those who want to know the truth about the origin of Mormonism.

Mormon Purge Continues

Since we published the last issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger, the Mormon Church has continued to excommunicate those who publicly express dissenting opinions. For example, on April 9, 1994, the Salt Lake Tribune reported: “David P. Wright, a professor of Biblical Studies and Hebrew at Brandeis University who questioned the origins of the Book of Mormon, has been excommunicated from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.” Wright had formerly taught at the church’s Brigham Young University before he was dismissed. He wrote a very interesting article for the book, New Approaches to the Book of Mormon, in which he argued that Joseph Smith plagiarized from the Bible to create the Book of Mormon. He also noted that “there is evidence that Smith’s other ‘ancient’ compositions are not actually ancient but arise out of his interactions with biblical texts and religious ideas of his period” (New Approaches to the Book of Mormon, page 207).

Two weeks after David P. Wright’s excommunication was revealed in the Tribune, the Washington Post reported:

A Fairfax County man who works as a lawyer for the Central Intelligence Agency was excommunicated from the Mormon church yesterday for conducting a newspaper letter-writing campaign about the history and teachings of his religion... Barrett said he has done nothing wrong. “It is kind of ironic. I’m fairly well-received at the CIA when I counsel them we have to tell the truth. When I try to tell these same principles to church leaders, I have a big problem.” (Washington Post, April 23, 1994)

Is There Something Better?

About thirty-four years ago we became acquainted with the noted Mormon scholar Francis W. Kirkham. On July 22, 1960, Dr. Kirkham gave us a copy of his book, A New Witness for Christ in America, and inscribed the following on one of the pages: “To newly found friends and believers in the Book of Mormon. Mr. & Mrs. Jerald Tanner.”

As noted earlier, at that time we were zealous believers in the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon. It all seemed so simple: we would spend our days proclaiming the genuineness of the book, and God would vindicate his own work by bringing many people to the knowledge of the truth. As it turned out, however, we began to encounter problems in the Book of Mormon which made it increasingly difficult to continue on the course we had planned for our lives. Surprisingly, the more familiar we became with the Bible, the more questions we had concerning the Book of Mormon. While the basic doctrines of the Book of Mormon seemed to be in agreement with the Bible (we cannot say this for many of the doctrines Joseph Smith later brought into the church), the wording found in the Book of Mormon appeared to be so strikingly similar to that found in the Bible that it raised the specter of plagiarism.

As we carefully examined the issue, it became evident that the author(s) of the Book of Mormon had copied from the King James Version of the Bible. This, of course, presented a serious problem to our faith because the King James Version was not printed until 1611 A.D. It troubled us deeply that the Book of Mormon prophet Nephi, who lived almost 600 years before Christ, parroted some of the language of Apostle Paul, who lived after the coming of the Lord.

We had an extremely difficult time dealing with what we had discovered. When we began our research, we sincerely wanted to prove the Book of Mormon true and to silence the critics. The Book of Mormon itself admonished us to “ask God, the Eternal Father, in the name of Christ, if these things are not true; and if ye shall ask with a sincere heart, with real intent, having faith in Christ, he will manifest the truth of it unto you, by the power of the Holy Ghost.” (Moroni 10:4) Consequently, we spent a great deal of time praying for God’s direction in the matter, but he did not “manifest the truth of it” to us. In fact, the more we looked into the matter, the more evidence we found against its authenticity. God seemed to be telling us something we did not want to hear, and we found it extremely painful to face the facts which we encountered. With God’s help, however, we carefully examined the issue and concluded that the Book of Mormon is not authentic. Our study, which has stretched over a period of more than thirty years, has brought forth a mountain of evidence substantiating our conclusions regarding the Book of Mormon (see our books Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? and Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon).

While many people tried to talk us out of our decision to lay aside the Book of Mormon, we found a peace and joy in biblical Christianity that is far greater than anything we sacrificed in giving up the Book of Mormon. Many years have passed since we mustered up our courage to face the facts. Even though we had to make a number of adjustments in our lives and thinking, we have never regretted our decision.

While we still have trials and disappointments, our belief in Christ has given us strength and peace in knowing that “all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose” (Romans 8:28).

Those of us who have turned our hearts over to Christ, know that he provides the light we need for guidance in our lives in this world. We would encourage all those struggling with the problems of Mormonism to lay aside that burden and put their trust in Christ. Jesus Himself gives this invitation in Matthew 11:28-30:

Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.
Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls.
For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light.

Building A Home
For the Lighthouse

In the March, 1992, issue of our newsletter we reported: “As the ministry has continued to expand we have become increasingly aware that Utah Lighthouse Ministry desperately needs a home of its own so that it can effectively meet the needs of the growing number of people who are searching for the truth. At the present time, in fact, all of the work is done in our own house and in the garage! . . . the bookstore is far from adequate for the number of people who come in to talk or browse. . . . The room often becomes so crowded that customers leave before they are able to obtain all the publications or information they need.”

Since the time we wrote the above, we were able to fix up another garage to work in. Nevertheless, we are rapidly running out of space. Fortunately, the ministry already owns a piece of land next door and we have decided to move out in faith and begin the building. The architect has completed the blueprints and a number of companies have given us a bid. The high bid was $200,000, but the three lowest bids were around $153,000. The electrical work, which will be done by another company, and other expenses will probably run the bill up to about $160,000. At the present time, Utah Lighthouse Ministries has only $25,000 set aside for building and another $43,700 has been promised by the end of Summer. Fortunately, the ministry can borrow $86,000 to complete the project. Perhaps some of those who believe in this ministry might be interested in donating to our building project. Although we do not like to face it, we realize that we will not be around forever and would like to see the Lighthouse have its own home so that the ministry can continue after we are gone.

Utah Lighthouse is a non-profit organization which ministers to many people and provides support for 44 children through World Vision. Those who are interested in helping our ministry can send their tax deductible contributions to UTAH LIGHTHOUSE MINISTRY, PO Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110. Both contributions and orders can be made over the phone (801-485-8894) with Visa, MasterCard or Discover Card.

THE GODS OF MORMONISM

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (commonly referred to as the Mormon Church) now claims to have 9,000,000 members and proclaims itself to be the only true church. Mormon Apostle Bruce R. McConkie emphatically declared:

This Church is “the only true and living church upon the face of the whole earth” (D. & C. 1:30), the only organization authorized by the Almighty to preach his gospel and administer the ordinances of salvation, the only Church which has power to save and exalt men in the hereafter. . . . There is no salvation outside this one true church, the Church of Jesus Christ. (Mormon Doctrine, 1979, pages 136, 138)

JOSEPH SMITH’S VISION

Besides claiming that the Mormon Church is the only true church in existence today, Mormon leaders also assert that they alone have the correct understanding regarding the Godhead. Joseph Smith, the first prophet of the Mormon Church, affirmed that he had a vision in 1820 which demonstrated that the Father and the Son were two separate and distinct personages:

So, in accordance with this, my determination to ask of God, I retired to the woods . . . I saw a pillar of light exactly over my head, above the brightness of the sun, which descended gradually until it fell upon me. . . . When the light rested upon me I saw two Personages, whose brightness and glory defy all descriptions, standing above me in the air. One of them spake unto me, calling me by name and said, pointing to the other —This is My Beloved Son. Hear Him!

My object in going to inquire of the Lord was to know which of all the sects was right, that I might know which to join. . . . I asked the Personages who stood above me in the light, which of all the sects was right (for at this time it had never entered into my heart that all were wrong)—and which I should join.

I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt; that: “they draw near to me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me, they teach for doctrines the commandments of men, having a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof.”

He again forbade me to join with any of them . . . I went home . . . I then said to my mother, “I have learned for myself that Presbyterianism is not true.” (The Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History 1:14, 16-20)

Because of Joseph Smith’s story of the First Vision, and other statements made by him, Mormons believe that God Himself is actually an exalted man. In 1883, George Q. Cannon, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, emphasized the importance of Smith’s vision:

The first account we have of the visitation of divine beings in this dispensation, is the account that is given to us by the Prophet Joseph Smith himself, concerning the visit of the Father and the Son. . . . the very conception of the nature of God—that is, of His characteristics—had entirely faded from the human mind, and He was deemed to be something other than He is. . . . There was no man scarcely upon the earth that had a true conception of God; the densest ignorance prevailed; and even ministers of religion could not conceive of the true idea, and there was mystery associated with what is called the Trinity—that is, with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. But all this was swept away in one moment by the appearance of the Almighty Himself—by the appearance of God, the Father, and His Son Jesus Christ, to the boy Joseph . . . In one moment all this darkness disappeared, and once more there was a man found on the earth, embodied in the flesh, who had seen God . . . Faith was again restored to the earth, the true faith and the true knowledge concerning our Creator . . . This revelation dissipated all misconceptions and all false ideas, and removed the uncertainty that had existed respecting these matters. The Father came accompanied by the Son . . . Joseph saw that the Father had a form; that He had a head; that He had arms; that He had limbs; that He had Feet; that He had a face and a tongue with which to express His thoughts . . . it seems that this knowledge had to be restored as the basis for all true faith to be built upon. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 24, pages 371-372)

Although Joseph Smith’s account of the First Vision sounds very impressive to those who do not know the whole story regarding this vision, a thorough historical investigation has demonstrated conclusively that it cannot be used to support the Mormon doctrine regarding God. Surprisingly, in 1965 we learned that there was another account of the First Vision written by Joseph Smith himself. When this account is compared with the official version published by the church, it becomes glaringly apparent that there are irreconcilable differences.

Moreover, this account was written in 1832, which is several years prior to the official version Joseph Smith dictated to his scribe. The official version was written about 1838, but it was not published until 1842. Consequently, the 1832 account is considered by historians to be the most accurate account of Joseph Smith’s story.

We first published this early account of the First Vision in 1965 under the title, Joseph Smith’s Strange Account of the First Vision. Because the document was so unusual, some members of the Mormon Church doubted its authenticity. Although the Mormon leaders would make no public statement concerning the document, Professor James B. Allen, who later became Assistant Church Historian, admitted that the document was genuine. In an article published in 1966 he commented:

One of the most significant documents of that period . . . is a handwritten manuscript . . . by Joseph Smith. It contains an account of the early experiences of the Mormon prophet and includes the story of the first vision. . . . the story varies in some details from the version presently accepted . . . The manuscript has apparently lain in the L.D.S. Church Historian’s office for many years, and yet few if any who saw it realized its profound historical significance. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1966, page 35)

Mormon leaders suppressed this account of the First Vision for over 130 years, but after we printed it thousands of copies were circulated throughout the world. Finally, four years after we published the document, Dean C. Jessee of the Church Historian’s Office made a public statement confirming the authenticity of the manuscript:

On at least three occasions prior to 1839 Joseph Smith began writing his history. The earliest of these is a six-page account recorded on three leaves of a ledger book, written between the summer of 1831 and November 1832. . . . The 1831-32 history transliterated here contains the earliest known account of Joseph Smith’s First Vision. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1969, pages 277-278)

In an article written in 1971, Dean Jesssee confirmed that the account was actually penned by Joseph Smith: “This is the only known account of the vision in his own hand. Most of his writings were dictated, which is not to say that other accounts are less authentic” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1971, page 86).

A careful examination of this document reveals why the Mormon leaders never published or referred to it. Below is the important portion of this account of the First Vision taken directly from a photograph of the original document. The reader will notice that while this early account speaks of Jesus appearing, it never even mentions God the Father:

. . . the Lord heard my cry in the wilderness and while in the attitude of calling upon the Lord in the 16th year of my age a piller of light above the brightness of the sun at noon day come down from above and rested upon me and I was filled with the spirit of god and the Lord opened the heavens upon me and I saw the Lord and he spake unto me saying
Joseph my son thy sins are forgiven thee. go thy way walk in my statutes and keep my commandments behold I am the Lord of glory I was crucified for the world that all those who believe on my name may have Eternal life behold the world lieth in sin at this time and none doeth good no not one they have turned aside from the gospel and keep not my commandments they draw near to me with their lips while their hearts are far from me and mine anger is kindling against the inhabitants of the earth to visit them according to this ungodliness and to bring to pass that which hath been spoken by the mouth of the prophets and Apostles behold and lo I come quickly as it was written of me in the cloud clothed in the glory of my Father .

Joseph Smith, therefore, decided to embellish his account. To catch the audience’s interest better than to have both the Father and the Son appeared to Joseph as persons, like men on earth in form. They spoke to him as persons. . . .

From the early days of Christianity, the erroneous doctrine of the nature of God had led to . . . the conception that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, the Godhead, were One, a unity. . . .

This false doctrine was laid low by the First Vision. Two personages, the Father and the Son, stood before Joseph. The Father asked the Son to deliver the message to the boy. There was no mingling of personalities in the vision. Each of the personages was an individual member of the Godhead. Each one separately took part in the vision. (Joseph Smith: Seeker After Truth, Prophet of God, 1951, pages 4-7)

Now that Joseph Smith’s 1832 handwritten account of the First Vision has come to light, Apostle Widtsoe’s arguments come crashing to the ground. It is clear that the official account Smith wrote six years later was embellished to fit his changing view of God. When Joseph Smith published the Book of Mormon in 1830, his views concerning God were similar to those held by Christian ministers of his day. Although Smith believed that there was only one God when he “translated” the gold plates of the Book of Mormon, he later decided that there were two Gods and eventually concluded that there were many Gods.

The fact that Joseph Smith’s first written account of the First Vision only mentioned one personage is consistent with what he believed about God when he dictated the Book of Mormon. The Book of Mormon, proclaimed that Christ was God Himself manifest in the flesh:

And now Abinadi said unto them: I would that ye should understand that God himself shall come down among the children of men, and shall redeem his people. And because he dwelleth in flesh he shall be called the Son of God, and having subjected the flesh to the will of the Father, being the Father and the Son . . . And thus the flesh becoming subject to the Spirit, or the Son to the Father, being one God, suffereth temptation, and yieldeth not to the temptation . . . (Book of Mormon, Mosiah 15:1, 2, 5)

The Book of Mormon tells of a visitation of the Father and the Son to the “brother of Jared,” but the account is not speaking of two separate personages. Only one personage appears, and this personage says:

Behold, I am he who was prepared from the foundation of the world to redeem my people. Behold I am Jesus Christ. I am the Father and the Son. In me shall all mankind have light . . . they shall become my sons and my daughters. (Ether 3:14)
Mormon scholar Melodie Moench Charles acknowledges that it is difficult to reconcile the teachings regarding God found in the Book of Mormon with the present teachings of the church. She argues, in fact, that at least some of the teachings of the Book of Mormon regarding God go even beyond the orthodox Trinitarian doctrine in emphasizing the oneness of God:

Recently when I was teaching the Book of Mormon in an adult Sunday school class we discussed Mosiah 15. . . . I said that I saw no good way to reconcile Abinadai's [sic] words with the current Mormon belief that God and his son Jesus Christ are separate and distinct beings. I suggested that perhaps Abinadai's understanding was incomplete.

The class response included defenses of revelation and prophets . . . and accusations that I was crossing the line of propriety and wisdom to suggest that a prophet could teach incorrect doctrines about God. Some people appreciated a public acknowledgment of an obvious difference between Book of Mormon doctrine and current church doctrine. A few friends said things like, "I don't care what they say about you. I've wondered about that passage for a long time, and I'm glad somebody pointed out that it's not what we teach today." But many class members thought the lesson inappropriate and upsetting, and soon I was demoted to teaching nursery. . . .

When we explore what the Book of Mormon says, its christology or doctrines concerning Christ differ from the christology of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints since at least the 1840s. . . .

Book of Mormon people asserted that the Father and Christ (and the Holy Ghost) were one God. When Zeezrom asks Amulek, "Is there more than one God?" Amulek, who learned his information from an angel, answers, "No" (Alma 11:28-29). At least five times in 3 Nephi, Jesus says that he and the Father are one. Emphasizing that oneness with a singular verb, Nephi, Amulek, and Mormon refer to "the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, which is one God" (2 Ne. 31:21; Alma 11:44; Morm. 7:7, emphasis added).

This is common trinitarian formula. . . .

In isolation the Book of Mormon's "which is one God" statements sound like orthodox trinitarianism, but in context they resemble a theology rejected by orthodoxy since at least 215 C.E., the heresy of modalism (also known as Sabellianism). Modalists believed that for God to have three separate identities or personalities compromised the oneness of God. Therefore, as Sabellius taught, "there is only one undivided Spirit; the Father is not one thing and the Son another, but . . . both are one and the same" (Lonergan 1976, 38). Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are three labels for the different functions which the one God performed. . . . The Book of Mormon often makes no distinction between Christ and God the Father. For example, Jesus in 3 Nephi talked about covenants which his father made with the Israelites, and yet beyond anything he claimed in the New Testament he also claimed that he was the God of Israel who gave them the law and covenanted with them . . .

The Book of Mormon melds together the identity and function of Christ and God. Because Book of Mormon authors saw Christ and his Father as one God who manifested himself in different ways, it made no difference whether they called their god the Father or the Son. They taught that Jesus Christ was not only the one who atoned for their sins but was also the god they were to worship. He was the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the God of Israel and the Book of Mormon people. . . .

Like the Book of Mormon, Mormonism before 1835 was largely modalistic, making no explicit distinction between the identities of the Father and the Son. Yet Mormonism gradually began to distinguish among different beings in the Godhead. This means the christology of the Book of Mormon differs significantly from the christology of the Mormon church after the 1840s. . . .

The current theology that most Mormons read back into the Book of Mormon is tritheism: belief in three Gods. Joseph Smith and the church only gradually came to understand the Godhead in this way. When he translated the Book of Mormon, Smith apparently envisioned God as modalists did: he accepted Christ and Christ's father as one God. In his first written account of his "first vision" in 1832 Smith told of seeing "the Lord"—one being. . . .

Later, in 1844, Smith said, "I have always declared God to be a distinct personage—Jesus Christ a separate and distinct personage from God the Father, the Holy Ghost was a distinct personage and or Spirit, and these three constitute three distinct personages and three Gods". . . . Mormon history does not support Smith's claim about what he taught earlier. Documents from early Mormonism reflect that Smith went from belief in one god to belief in two and later three gods forming one godhead. . . .

Book of Mormon theology is generally modalistic. In the Book of Mormon, God and Jesus Christ are not distinct beings. (New Approaches to the Book of Mormon, 1993, pages 82, 96-99, 103-104, 110)

When all the evidence is carefully examined it becomes obvious that Joseph Smith interpolated his later view regarding God the Father into his story of the First Vision. Consequently, Mormons who are not acquainted with the evidence still rely on the later account to prove that God the Father is an exalted man.

There are other serious problems with the official account of the First Vision. For example, Smith's reworked version stated that the vision followed a revival which had taken place in his neighborhood in 1820. Wesley P. Walters, however, conclusively established that no such revival took place in Palmyra in 1820. The revival actually began in the fall of 1824 and continued into 1825 (see Inventing Mormonism, by H. Michael Marquardt and Wesley P. Walters, pages 15-41). The 1832 account, of course, did not even mention such a revival.

In addition, Joseph Smith's 1835-36 diary contains other accounts of his First Vision which tend to add to the confusion. For instance, in one account Joseph Smith told Erastus Holmes regarding his "juvenile years, say from 6 years old up to the time I received the first visitation of Angels which was when I was about 14 years old” (An American Prophet’s Record: The Diaries and Journals of Joseph Smith, page 59).

Mormon leaders were apparently embarrassed that Smith spoke of angels but neglected to mention either the Father or the Son in this account! Therefore, in the published History of the Church, vol. 2, page 312, the statement has been changed to read: “... I received my first vision, which was when I was about fourteen years old...” Another account in the same diary (page 51) has Joseph Smith saying that he “saw many angels in this vision.” (For a thorough examination of the many conflicting statements in Joseph Smith’s accounts of the First Vision see our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 143-153.)

Marvin S. Hill, professor of American history at the church’s Brigham Young University, tried to defend the idea that Joseph Smith had an important religious experience in the grove, but he had to admit that Joseph Smith’s official 1838 account has some real problems. He, in fact, suggested that the 1832 account of the vision was probably more accurate than the official account and that Joseph Smith may have changed his theological views concerning God:

It seems to me that everybody has approached the issue from the wrong end, by starting with the 1838 official version when the account they should be considering is that of 1832. Merely on the face of it, the 1832 version stands a better chance of being more accurate and unembellished than the 1838 account. . . I am inclined to agree that the religious turmoil that Joseph described which led to some family members joining the Presbyterians and to much sectarian bitterness does not fit well into the 1820 context detailed by Backman. For one thing, it does not seem likely that there could have been heavy sectarian strife in 1820 and then a joint revival where all was harmony in 1824. In addition, as Walters notes, Lucy Mack Smith [Joseph Smith’s mother] said the revival where she became interested in a particular sect came after Alvin’s death, thus almost certainly in early 1824. . . . An 1824 revival creates problems for the 1838 account, not that of 1832. . . .

At any rate, if Joseph Smith in 1838 read back into 1820 some details of a revival that occurred in 1824, there is no reason to conclude that he invented his religious experiences. . . .

Giving priority to the 1832 account also makes it more understandable why Oliver Cowdery got his story tangled. . . . If initially Joseph said one personage came to him in 1820, it became easier for Oliver Cowdery to confuse this visit with the coming of Moroni than it would have been a few years later when Joseph taught emphatically that there were three separate personages in the Godhead.

The Tanners make much of the argument that Joseph Smith changed his view of the Godhead. There is a good deal of evidence that his understanding grew on many points of theology . . . If, as the Tanners argue, Joseph grew in his understanding of the nature of the Godhead, this does not provide evidence of his disingenuousness . . .

It seems to me that if the Latter-day Saints can accept the idea that Joseph gained his full understanding of the nature of God only after a period of time, instead of its emerging fullblown in 1820, then most of the difficulties with chronology can be resolved. . . . As James Allen shows, Joseph never cited his vision with respect to the nature of the Godhead. This use of the vision came long afterward. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1982, pages 39-41)

Since the Mormon Church canonized the 1838 account of the First Vision in the Pearl of Great Price (one of the four standard works of the church), it seems very doubtful that the church will follow Professor Hill’s suggestion about giving “priority to the 1832 account” of the vision. In any case, Thomas G. Alexander, who is also a professor of American history at BYU, agrees that a theological shift in Joseph Smith’s view concerning the Godhead caused him to change his story from one to two personages:

One of the barriers to understanding Mormon theology is the underlying assumption by most Latter-day Saints that doctrine develops consistently, that ideas build cumulatively on each other. As a result, older revelations are usually interpreted by referring to current doctrinal positions. This type of interpretation may produce systematic theology and may satisfy those trying to understand and internalize the current doctrine, but it is bad history since it leaves an unwarranted impression of continuity and consistency. . . .

The Book of Mormon tended to define God as an absolute personage of spirit who, clothed in flesh, revealed himself in Jesus Christ (see Abinadi’s sermon to King Noah in Mos. 13-14). . . . there is little evidence that early church doctrine specifically differentiated between Christ and God. Indeed, this distinction was probably considered unnecessary since the early discussion also seems to have supported trinitarian doctrine. Joseph Smith’s 1832 account of his first vision spoke only of one personage and did not make the explicit separation of God and Christ found in the 1838 version. The Book of Mormon declared that Mary “is the mother of God, after the manner of the flesh,” which was changed in 1837 to “mother of the Son of God.” Abinadi’s sermon in the Book of Mormon explored the relationship between God and Christ . . .

The “Lectures on Faith” differentiated between the Father and Son more explicitly, but even they did not define a materialistic, tritheistic godhead. In announcing the publication of the Doctrine and Covenants, which included the lectures, the Messenger and Advocate commented that it trusted the volume would give “the churches abroad . . . a perfect understanding of the doctrine believed by this society.” The lectures declared that “there are two personages who constitute the great matchless, governing and supreme power over all things —by whom all things were created and made.” They are “the Father being a personage of spirit” and “the Son, who was in the bosom of the Father, a personage of tabernacle, made, or fashioned like unto man, or being in the form and likeness of man, or, rather man was formed after his likeness, and in his image.” The “Articles and Covenants” called the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost “one God” rather than “Godhead,” a term Mormons use today to separate themselves from trinitarians.

The doctrine of the Holy Ghost in these early sources is even more striking compared to our point of view today. The “Lectures on Faith” defined the Holy Ghost as the mind of the Father and the Son, a member of the Godhead but not a personage, who binds the Father and Son together (D&C [i.e., Doctrine and Covenants], 1835 ed., 53-54). This view of the Holy Ghost likely reinforced trinitarian doctrine by explaining how personal beings like the Father and Son become one god through the noncorporeal presence of a shared mind. (Line Upon Line, edited by Gary James Bergera, 1989, pages 53-55)

TRILLIONS OF GODS?

The Bible teaches the oneness of God. In the book of Isaiah 44:8 we read: “Is there a God beside me? Yea, there is no God; I know not any.” In addition, the Bible reveals that “God is a Spirit” (John 4:24). The Book of Mormon also says that God is a Spirit. In Alma 18:26-28, the following is found:

And then Ammon said: Believeth thou that there is a Great Spirit? And he said, Yea, And Ammon said: This is God.

By the year 1844, however, Joseph Smith had completely abandoned the teachings regarding God which he had incorporated into the Book of Mormon. In the Mormon publication, Times and Seasons, he boldly proclaimed that God was just an exalted man and that men could become Gods:

First, God himself, who sits enthroned in yonder heavens, is a man like unto one of yourselves, that is the great secret. . . . I am going to tell you how God came to be God. We have imagined that God was God from all eternity. . . . God himself; the Father of us all dwelt on an earth the same as Jesus Christ himself did . . . You have got to learn how to be Gods yourselves . . . No man can learn you more than what I have told you. (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, pages 613-614)

Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt, who received his teachings regarding the nature of God from Joseph Smith, made this statement regarding the plurality of Gods:

If we should take a million of worlds like this and number their particles, we should find that there are more Gods than there are particles of matter in those worlds.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, page 345)

Apostle Pratt’s comments make it very clear that there are at least trillions of Gods.

The Mormon Church teaches that God the Father had a Father, and that God’s Father also had a Father, and so on. Brigham Young, the second prophet of the church, declared:

He [God] is our Father—he Father of our spirits, and was once a man in mortal flesh as we are, and is now an exalted being . . . there never was a time when there were not Gods . . . It appears ridiculous to the world, under their darkened and erroneous traditions, that God has once been a finite being . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, page 333)

Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt made it clear that God was once in a fallen state, died and was redeemed from the grave:

The Gods who dwell in the Heaven have been redeemed from the grave in a world which existed before the foundations of this earth were laid. They and the Heavenly body which they now inhabit were once in a fallen state . . . they were exalted also, from fallen men to Celestial Gods to inhabit their Heaven forever and ever. (The Seer, January 1853, page 23)

We were begotten by our Father in Heaven; the person of our Father in Heaven was begotten on a previous heavenly world by His Father; and again, He was begotten by a still more ancient Father; and so on, from generation to generation, from one heavenly world to another still more ancient, until our minds are wearied and lost in the multiplicity of generations and successive worlds, and as a last resort, we wonder in our minds, how far back the genealogy extends, and how the first world was formed, and the first Father was begotten. But why does man seek for a first . . . why then, do you seek for a first personal Father in an endless genealogy? (Ibid., September 1853, page 132)

In a speech published in the Mormon Church’s publication, The Ensign, November 1975, page 80, Spencer W. Kimball, the twelfth president of the church, made some revealing comments which were broadcast to those serving in the priesthood:

Brethren, 225,000 of you are here tonight. I suppose 225,000 of you may become gods. There seems to be plenty of space out there in the universe. And the Lord has proved that he knows how to do it. I think he could make, or probably have us help make, worlds for all of us, for every one of us 225,000.

The Mormon Apostle LeGrand Richards commented as follows in a letter written in 1966: “There is a statement often repeated in the Church, and while it is not in one of the Mormon leaders teach that both men and women can attain godhood. Apostle McConkie said that godhood “is not for men only, it is for men and women together” (Mormon Doctrine, page 844). While at first glance it appears that this would make men and women equal, a careful examination of the doctrine reveals just the opposite.

According to Mormon theology, church members follow the same plan of eternal progression as God the Father. Now, if the “Eternal Mother” had really gained equality with her husband, we would expect Latter-day Saints to pray to her. Although there are a small number of Mormons who actually do pray to the Eternal Mother, the vast majority of the church look with disdain at such a practice. Furthermore, church leaders have strongly rebuked those who engage in such a practice.

Apostle Orson Pratt made it plain that the Eternal Mother’s godhood is rather insignificant when compared to her husband’s power. She, in fact, is to be in “the most perfect obedience” to her “great head”—her husband:

But if we have a heavenly Mother as well as a heavenly Father, is it not right that we should worship the Mother of our spirits as well as the Father? No; for the Father of our spirits is at the head of His household, and his wives and children are required to yield the most perfect obedience to their great Head. It is lawful for the children to worship the King of Heaven, but not the “Queen of heaven.” . . . we are nowhere taught that Jesus prayed to His heavenly Mother . . . (The Seer, page 159)

It would appear, then, that in Mormon theology the claim that a woman can obtain “godhood” amounts to very little. Like the present “Heavenly Mother,” she will be required to “yield the most perfect obedience” to her “great Head.”

Mormon theology seems to teach that women who enter into “godhood” will find themselves serving their own husband in eternity rather than the God of the Bible. The more one studies the church’s teaching concerning the Mother God, the more obvious it becomes that women are considered to be spiritually inferior in Mormon theology.

Joseph Smith taught that heaven is divided into three different kingdoms—the celestial, terrestrial and telestial. The celestial is the most glorious of the three, and it, in turn, is divided into “three heavens or degrees” (Doctrine and Covenants 131:1). Only those who marry in the Mormon temple and live a worthy life can enter into the highest degree of the celestial kingdom. In the resurrection these faithful Mormons become Gods and Goddesses.

All those who do not make it into this highest level are not allowed to marry or engage in sex. They “remain separately and singly, without exaltation, in their saved condition, to all eternity; and henceforth are not gods, but are angels of God forever and ever” (Doctrine and Covenants 132:17).

On the other hand, those who are accounted worthy of the highest glory remain married and are allowed to procreate children forever. These Gods and Goddesses give birth to spirit children throughout all eternity, and these spirits eventually take physical bodies on other worlds.

Milton R. Hunter, who was a General Authority in the church, wrote the following: “... Joseph explained ... that the Gods were to be parents of spirit children just as our Heavenly Father and Mother were the parents of the people of this earth” (The Gospel Through the Ages, 1958, page 120).

Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt set forth some important details and problems concerning the birth of spirit children to celestial beings:

> In the Heaven where our spirits were born there are many Gods, each one of whom has his own wife or wives, raises up a numerous family of sons and daughters . . . each father and mother will be in a condition to multiply forever and ever. As soon as each God has begotten many millions of male and female spirits, and his Heavenly inheritance becomes too small, to comfortably accommodate his great family, he, in connection with his sons, organizes a new world, after a similar order to the one which we now inhabit, where he sends both the male and female spirits to inhabit tabernacles of flesh and bones. . . . The inhabitants of each world are required to reverence, adore, and worship their own personal father who dwells in the Heaven which they formerly inhabited. . . . The number of the sons and daughters of God, born in Heaven before this earth was formed, is not known by us. They must have been exceedingly numerous . . . The amount of population now on the globe, is estimated in round numbers at one thousand million. If we take this estimation for the average number per century, during the seven thousand years of its temporal existence it will amount to seventy thousand millions [i.e., 70 billion] . . . It will be seen, from this estimation, that about seventy thousand million sons and daughters were born in Heaven, and kept their first estate . . . If we admit that one personage was the Father of all this great family, and that they were all born of the same Mother, the period of time intervening between the birth of the oldest and the youngest spirit must have been immense. If we suppose, as an average, that only one year intervened between each birth then it would have required, over one hundred thousand millions of years for the same Mother to have given birth to this vast family. . . . Should the period between each birth, be one hundred times shorter than what is required in this world, (which is very improbable,) it would still require over one thousand million of years to raise up such a numerous progeny. . . . But . . . it is altogether probable that the period required for the formation of the infant spirit, is of the same length as that required in this world . . . If the Father of these spirits, prior to his redemption, had secured to himself, through the everlasting covenant of marriage, many wives . . . the period required to people a world would be shorter . . . if it required one hundred thousand million of years to people a world like this . . . it is evident that, with a hundred wives, this period would be reduced to only one thousand million years. (The Seer, March 1853, pages 37-39)

Apostle Pratt’s description of the function of a Mormon woman who advances to godhood reminds one of the role played by a queen bee. The queen bee, of course, produces swarms of offspring—as many as 2,500 a day! Her main purpose appears to be to produce more bees.

Brigham Young University scholar Eugene England is repelled by the concept concerning spirit children taught by Apostle Pratt and other “influential Mormons and teachers of religion.” He maintains that God must have a better way “to produce spirit children than by turning celestial partners into mere birth machines. To anticipate such a limited, unequal role for women in eternity insults and devalues them” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1987, page 148).

While many Mormon women would agree with England, the teaching seems too deeply embedded in Mormon theology to be torn out without endangering the entire doctrine of “eternal progression.”

Many Mormon women have serious reservations about the idea of having billions of spirit children every time their husbands decide to people another world. They believe that this teaching smacks of confusion and mass production. Mormon scholar Melodie Moench Charles has publicly expressed her opposition to the teaching:

> Nineteenth-century Mormon theology shows a pre-occupation with attaining power and status in the millennium and in heaven. . . . I find this heavenly structure neither reasonable nor appealing. . . . Creating includes not only making a world, but peopling it with one’s spouse. . . . From Joseph Smith he [Parley P. Pratt] “learned the true dignity and destiny of a son of God . . . It was from him that I learned that the highest dignity of womanhood was, to stand as queen and priestess to her husband, and to reign for ever and ever as the queen mother of her numerous and still increasing offspring” . . .

Our theology currently gives women no hope that their participation in priesthood will ever be great enough to allow them to create anything but children. Some women might be excited by the possibility of providing the womb through which a never-ending stream of children would be born, but I am not. . . . England rightly called this limited, unequal role for women in eternity ‘absurd’ “humiliating” and “degrading” . . .

Our temple ceremony has some further limiting, unequal, and degrading implications for women’s heavenly existence. . . . people being married [in the temple] are symbolically brought into heaven by a male playing the role of God. A man is brought into heaven by an anonymous male temple worker playing that role. But a woman is brought into heaven by her husband playing the role of God to her. So not only does the temple ceremony suggest that women reach God through their husbands, but that husbands, on some level, act as god to their wives. . . .

An essential part of this theology of marriage in heaven is polygamy. While it is unlikely that the Church will again promote polygamy in mortality, it is still a vital part of Mormon heaven. . . . As long as Doctrine and Covenants 132 remains in our scriptural canon, heavenly polygamy is a part of Mormon theology.

Heavenly polygamy, more than anything else in our theology, reduces people to things. . . . The greater the number of wives and children a man has in heaven, the greater his power, kingdom, and eternal glory. In the worst materialistic sense rather than in the best metaphorical sense, wives and children were a man’s riches. Benjamin F. Johnson remembered that “the Prophet taught us that Dominion & power in the great Future would be Commensurate with the no[,] of ‘Wives, Children & Friends’ that we inherit here” . . .

Rather than seeing any compelling reason to think that we must populate heavenly kingdoms into existence so that these kingdoms can be our eternal reward, I see a compelling reason not to believe that God authored this system. It again reduces people to things. . . . Each spirit child is one more being for its parents to be sovereign Lords over . . .

Heavenly Mother is not an equal partner with Heavenly Father in any sense. . . . Since she has no sphere of operations, she has no power. . . . I can’t see any reason now to let such a degrading concept of the female deity continue to exist without protest. . . . She has no self apart from her husband. . . .

I can’t change the reality of what heaven is. My wishing, hoping, and needing won’t make it what I want it to be. But neither does Brigham Young’s or Joseph Smith’s. I believe that they and other Mormon males projected their own needs and desires into heaven, and that their heaven probably does not resemble actual heaven any more than my ideal heaven does. . . .

I have said all of this not to complain, but rather to encourage Church members and leaders to rethink our theology of heaven. The nineteenth-century Mormon men who fleshed out the theological skeleton provided by scriptures and revelation fleshed it out according to their own cultural prejudices. . . . their prejudices and their needs should no longer be misread as representing heavenly reality: they are time-bound, not eternal. It is time to reject those aspects of Mormon heaven that are uninspired, unreasonable, unfair, damaging, and serve no virtuous end. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1988, pages 76, 78-82, 84-86)

While some Mormons are disturbed with the idea that women who reach the highest exaltation in the hereafter become “mere birth machines,” it seems evident that church leaders are not interested in changing the doctrine. In the Mormon Church’s publication, Doctrines of the Gospel Student Manual, Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth prophet of the church, was quoted as saying:

“Parents will have eternal claim upon their posterity and will have the gift of eternal increase, if they obtain exaltation. . . . a man and his wife when glorified will have spirit children who eventually will go to an earth like this one. . . . There is no end to this development; it will go on forever. We will become gods and have jurisdiction over worlds, and these worlds will be peopled by our own offspring. (Doctrines of the Gospel Student Manual, Church Educational System, 1986)

GOD AND CHRIST POLYGAMISTS?

On July 12, 1843, the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith claimed that the Lord gave him a revelation stating that polygamy should be practiced in the church:

Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you my servant Joseph, that inasmuch as you have inquired of my hand to know and understand wherein I, the Lord justified my servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as also Moses, David and Solomon, my servants, as touching the principle and doctrine of their having many wives and concubines—

Behold, and lo, I am the Lord thy God, and will answer thee as touching this matter.

Therefore, prepare thy heart to receive and obey the instructions . . .

For behold, I reveal unto you a new and everlasting covenant; and if ye abide not that covenant, then are ye damned; for no one can reject this covenant and be permitted to enter into my glory. . . .

And let mine handmaid, Emma Smith [Joseph Smith’s wife] receive all those that have been given unto my servant Joseph, and are virtuous and pure before me; and those who are not pure, and have said they were pure, shall be destroyed, saith the Lord God. . . .

And again, as pertaining to the law of the priesthood —if any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another . . . he is justified; he cannot commit adultery with that that belongeth unto him and to no one else.

And if he have ten virgins given unto him by this law, he cannot commit adultery, for they belong to him, and they are given unto him; therefore is he justified. (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 132, verses 1-3, 52, 61-62)

Although the revelation only specifically mentions that a man can have “ten” wives, the favorable reference to the wives of king Solomon (a noted polygamist mentioned in the Bible who had a vast number of wives) leads to the conclusion that a man can have more than ten wives. Joseph Smith certainly did not limit himself to ten wives. In fact, in 1887, Assistant Church Historian Andrew Jenson made a list of 27 women who were sealed to Joseph Smith. (Historical Record, vol. 6, page 233). More recent research, however, demonstrated that the number 27 was too small. Mormon author John J. Stewart disclosed: “. . . he married Louisa Beaman at Nauvoo . . . he married many other women, perhaps three to four dozen or more . . .” (Brigham Young and His Wives, 1961, pages 30-31). On page 96 of the same book, Stewart noted that Joseph Smith also had “150 dead women . . . sealed to him; also a few women who were sealed to him after his death."

Since the leading authorities of the Mormon Church believed that polygamy was commanded by God, it became easy for them to believe that both God and Christ were polygamists. Jedediah M. Grant, Second Counselor to Brigham Young, asserted: “A belief in the doctrine of a plurality of wives caused the perseverance of Jesus and his followers” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, page 346).

In 1961, Mormon writer John J. Stewart affirmed that “plural marriage is the patriarchal order of Marriage lived by God and others who reign in the Celestial Kingdom” (Brigham Young and His Wives, page 41).

Even though the current Mormon leaders are very quiet about the matter, a belief in the doctrine of Celestial Marriage almost compels a person to also believe that God is a polygamist. While church leaders no longer allow the practice of polygamy here on the earth, they maintain that it will be lived in heaven. President Joseph Fielding Smith remarried after the death of his first wife, and in his book, Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, page 67, he remarked: “... my wives will be mine in eternity.” Harold B. Lee, the eleventh president of the church, also remarried after his wife’s death and was looking forward to a polygamous relationship in heaven.

My lovely Joan was sent to me:
So Joan joins Fern
That three might be, more fitted for eternity.
“O Heavenly Father, my thanks to thee”
(Deseret News 1974 Church Almanac, page 17)

The reader will remember that Apostle Pratt proclaimed that a God who had a hundred wives would far outdistance a God with just one wife. In The Seer he made mathematical calculations to prove his point:

Therefore, a Father . . . could increase his kingdoms with his own children, in a hundred fold ratio above that of another who had only secured to himself one wife. As yet, we have only spoken of the hundred fold ratio as applied to his own children; but now let us endeavor to form some faint idea of the multiplied increase of worlds peopled by his grandchildren, over which he, of course, would hold authority and dominion as the Grand Patriarch of the endless generations of his posterity. If . . . only one million of sons were redeemed to the fulness . . . they, in their turn, would now be prepared to multiply and people worlds the same as their Father . . . While their Father, therefore, was peopling the second world, these millions of redeemed sons would people one million of worlds, . . . the number in the third generation amounts to one billion three million and three worlds. The fourth generation would people over a trillion, and the fifth over a quadrillion of worlds; while the one-hundredth generation would people more worlds than could be expressed by raising one million to the ninety-ninth power. Any mathematician who is able to enumerate a series of 595 figures will be able to give a very close approximation to the number of worlds peopled by the descendants of one Father in one hundred thousand million of years, according to the average ratio given above. Now this is the period in which only one world could be peopled with one wife. While the Patriarch with his hundred wives, would multiply worlds on worlds, systems on systems, more numerous than the dust of all the visible bodies of the universe, and people them with his descendants to the hundredth generation of worlds; the other, who had only secured to himself one wife, would in the same period, just barely have peopled one world.

(The Seer, March 1853, page 39)

Using Apostle Pratt’s reasoning and the fact that Mormonism teaches that those who go through the temple ceremony can become Gods, it is clear that if God the Father is a monogamist, Presidents Joseph Fielding Smith and Harold B. Lee, with their two wives will eventually have more spirit children and more kingdoms than the God of Israel! Since Joseph Smith and Brigham Young had hundreds of women sealed to them, their power would increase much more rapidly. According to the “Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” April 5, 1894, President Wilford Woodruff, the fourth president of the church, said he had himself sealed to “about four hundred of my female kindred.” Apostle Cannon also noted in his journal that a man could have up to “999” wives sealed to him for eternity. If anyone actually did take that many wives, he would by-pass them all!

Some Mormons who believe that God is married seem to be shocked when they find out that the early church leaders taught that He was a polygamist. The fact that they are embarrassed by the matter seems to show that they do not really believe that polygamy is a righteous practice.

In spite of unrelenting pressure from the Federal Government, the Mormons continued practicing polygamy into the first decade of the twentieth century. (The Manifesto of 1890 was supposed to end the practice, but church leaders continued to secretly perform plural marriage ceremonies until 1904.)

Before yielding the practice Mormon leaders had uncompromisingly proclaimed that the church would never cease the practice of polygamy on earth. For example, Apostle Orson Pratt argued that “if plurality of marriage is not true or in other words, if a man has no divine right to marry two wives or more in this world, then marriage for eternity is not true, and your faith is in vain, and all the sealing ordinances and powers pertaining to marriages for eternity are vain, worthless, good for nothing; for as sure as one is true the other also must be true” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 21, page 296). (For more on this subject see our book Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 202-244F)

Although Mormon Church leaders no longer sanction the practice of polygamy on earth, it remains an important part of their doctrinal view regarding the hereafter. In Mormon doctrine all women who marry for eternity in the temple have to face the possibility that they could end up living in polygamy in heaven without their consent. If the wife should die before her husband, he is allowed to be sealed to another woman for eternity. The woman, however, is not allowed to be sealed to two husbands for eternity. Joseph Fielding Smith, who served as the tenth prophet, explained how the rules of the temple discriminate against women: “When a man and a woman are married in the temple for time and all eternity, and then the man dies and the woman marries another man, she can be married to him for time only” (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, page 78).

NO VIRGIN BIRTH?

The idea that God is merely an exalted man has led Mormon leaders to proclaim a doctrine about the birth of Christ which is very shocking to orthodox Christians. Since Christians believe that God is a Spirit, they view the conception of Christ as a miraculous event having nothing to do with sex or any physical act. Mormon theology, on the other hand, teaches that God is an exalted man and that Christ was conceived through a sexual act between Mary and God the Father. In other words, the birth of Christ is considered a natural, rather than a miraculous occurrence.

Joseph Fielding Smith, Jr., made this plain in his book, Religious Truths Defined, page 44: “The birth of the Savior was a natural occurrence unattended with any degree of mysticism, and the Father God was the literal parent of Jesus in the flesh as well as in the spirit.”

President Joseph Fielding Smith declared: “Christ was begotten of God. He was not born without the aid of Man, and that Man was God” (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, page 18).

Apostle Bruce R. McConkie did not hesitate to make this matter crystal clear:

These name-titles all signify that our Lord is the only Son of the Father in the flesh. Each of the words is to be understood literally. Only means only; Begotten means begotten; and Son means son. Christ was begotten by an Immortal Father in the same way that mortal men are begotten by mortal fathers. (Mormon Doctrine, 1979, pages 546-547)

And Christ was born into the world as the literal Son of this Holy Being; he was born in the same personal, real, and literal sense that any mortal son is born to a mortal father. There is nothing figurative about his paternity; he was begotten, conceived and born in the normal and natural course of events . . . Christ is the Son of Man, meaning that his Father (the Eternal God!) is a Holy Man. (Ibid., page 742)

It would be extremely difficult to side-step the serious implications of Apostle McConkie’s statement. When he states that Christ was “begotten, conceived and born in the normal and natural course of events,” this could only mean that he was conceived by a sexual act with Mary, not through a miraculous operation of God.

Mormon writer Carlfred B. Broderick discussed the sexual element regarding the birth of Jesus:

There are two basic elements in the Gospel view of sexuality as I interpret it from the scriptures. The first is that sex is good—sexuality, far from being the antithesis of spirituality, is actually an attribute of God . . .

In the light of their understanding that God is a procreating personage of flesh and bone, latter-day prophets have made it clear that despite what it says in Matthew 1:20, the Holy Ghost was not the father of Jesus. . . . The Savior was fathered by a personage of flesh and bone, and was literally what Nephi said he was, “Son of the Eternal Father.” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn, 1967, pages 100-101)

President Brigham Young implied that Mary was actually the wife of God: “The man Joseph, the husband of Mary, did not, that we know of, have more than one wife, but Mary the wife of Joseph had another husband” (Deseret News, October 10, 1866). Apostle Orson Pratt confirmed that Mary was, in fact, the “wife of God” and also went on to try to justify what would seem to be an immoral act:

The fleshly body of Jesus required a Mother as well as a Father. Therefore, the Father and Mother of Jesus, according to the flesh, must have been associated together in the capacity of Husband and Wife; hence the Virgin Mary must have been, for the time being, the lawful wife of God the Father: we use the term lawful Wife, because it would be blasphemous in the highest degree to say that He overshadowed her or begat the Saviour unlawfully. It would have been unlawful for any man to have interfered with Mary, who was already espoused to Joseph; for such a heinous crime would have subjected both the guilty parties to death, according to the law of Moses. But God having created all men and women, had the most perfect right to do with his own creation, according to His holy will and pleasure: He had a lawful right to overshadow the Virgin Mary in the capacity of a husband, and beget a Son, although she was espoused to another; for the law which He gave to govern men and women was not intended to govern Himself, or to prescribe rules for his own conduct. It was also lawful in Him, after having dealt with Mary, to give her to Joseph her espoused husband. Whether God the Father gave Mary to Joseph for time only, or for time and eternity, we are not informed. Inasmuch as God was the first husband to her, it may be that He only gave her to be the wife of Joseph while in this mortal state, and that He intended after the resurrection to again take her as one of his own wives to raise up immortal spirits in eternity. (The Seer, October 1853, page 158)

Brigham Young maintained that “The birth of the Saviour was as natural as are the births of our children; it was the result of natural action. He partook of flesh and blood—was begotten of his Father, as we were of our fathers” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, page 115).

Some Mormons, who are either not well informed on church doctrine or are so ashamed of the church’s doctrine on the birth of Jesus that they try to deny its existence. Unfortunately for these apologists, President Ezra Taft Benson, the thirteenth prophet of the church, came down firmly on the side of Brigham Young and the other prophets and apostles. In The Teachings of Ezra Taft Benson, a book published in 1988, Benson steadfastly maintained that God was the father of Christ “in the most literal sense”:

A fundamental doctrine of true Christianity is the divine birth of the child Jesus. This doctrine is not generally comprehended by the world. The paternity of Jesus Christ is one of the “mysteries of godliness” comprehended only by the spiritually minded.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints proclaims that Jesus Christ is the Son of God in the most literal sense. The body in which he performed His mission in the flesh was sired by that same Holy Being we worship as God, our Eternal Father. Jesus was not the son of Joseph, nor was He Begotten by the Holy Ghost. He is the Son of the Eternal Father. (The Teachings of Ezra Taft Benson, 1988, pages 6-7)

The LDS doctrine concerning the birth of Christ certainly raises more questions than it answers. For instance, in Mormon theology we learn that prior to coming to earth both Jesus and Mary were born to God the Father and His wife in a pre-existent state. From this it is clear that Jesus was the spirit brother of Mary. It has been suggested that since Mary was the spirit daughter of the Father, it would be an act of incest for God the Father to have had a sexual relationship with her.

While Apostle Orson Pratt probably would have argued that God’s laws were “not intended to govern Himself,” the idea of God having relations with his own spirit daughter, who was at that time betrothed to Joseph, seems to be out of step with the teachings of the Bible and morally repugnant. A careful examination of the Mormon teaching concerning the conception of Christ reveals that it is far closer to paganism than it is to Christianity!

SWITCHING GODS

The Adam-God doctrine was a natural outgrowth of the teaching that God is merely an exalted man and that there are a vast number of Gods. Although the doctrine was not publicly proclaimed until 1852, Adam was held in high esteem at the very beginning of the Mormon Church. Joseph Fielding Smith said that he did not “accuse Adam of a sin. . . . it is not always a sin to transgress a law” (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, page 114). Sterling W. Sill, who served as an Assistant to the Council of the Twelve, made this defense of Adam’s transgression: “Under Christ Adam yet stands at our head. . . . Adam fell, but he fell in the right direction. He fell toward the goal. . . . Adam fell, but he fell upward” (Deseret News, Church Section, July 31, 1965).

It was on April 9, 1852, that Brigham Young, the second prophet of the Mormon Church, startled the Christian world by publicly proclaiming that God had revealed to him that the Mormons were to switch Gods. According to President Young, Adam was “the only God with whom we have to do”:

Now hear it, O inhabitants of the earth, Jew and Gentile, Saint and sinner! When our father Adam came into the garden of Eden, he came into it with a celestial body, and brought Eve, one of his wives, with him. He is MICHAEL, the Arch-angel, the ANCIENT OF DAYS! about whom holy men have written and spoken—He is our FATHER and our God, and the only God with whom we have to do. Every man upon the earth, professing Christians or non-professing, must hear it, and will know it sooner or later. . . . the earth was organized by three distinct characters, namely, Eloheim, Yahovah, and Michael, these three forming a quorum . . . perfectly represented in the Deity, as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, pages 50-51)

Although some members of the Mormon Church had a hard time accepting Brigham Young’s revelation concerning Adam, the church’s publication Latter-Day Saints’ Millennial Star, vol. 16, page 534, made it very clear that it was indeed a doctrine which had to be accepted:

Concerning the item of doctrine alluded to by Elder Caffall and others, viz., that Adam is our Father and God, I say do not trouble yourselves . . . If, as Elder Caffall remarked, there are those who are waiting at the door of the Church for this objection to be removed, tell such, the prophet and Apostle Brigham Young has declared it, and that it is the word of the Lord.

Brigham Young continued to teach the Adam-God doctrine until his death in 1877. In 1873, he publicly declared that the doctrine had been revealed to him by God Himself:

How much unbelief exists in the minds of the Latter-day Saints in regard to one particular doctrine which I revealed to them, and which God revealed to me—namely that Adam is our Father and God . . . Our Father Adam helped to make this earth . . . He brought one of his wives with him . . . Then he said, “I want my children who are in the spirit world to come and live here. . . . I once dwelt upon an earth something like this, in a mortal state. . . . I want my children that were born to me in the spirit world to come here and take tabernacles of flesh that their spirits may have a house, a tabernacle, or a dwelling place as mine has,” and where is the mystery? (Deseret Evening News, June 14, 1873)

Brigham Young’s declaration that the inhabitants of earth were in reality Adam’s spirit children demonstrates beyond all doubt that he intended to strip God the Father (Elohim) from his rightful place and put Adam in charge of the world. Young seems to have believed that Elohim was the Grandfather God. Consequently, he felt that Mormons should direct their prayers to Adam.

President Brigham Young not only taught that Adam was the God whom Mormons should worship, but he also claimed that Jesus Christ was his son. In his notorious address delivered on April 9, 1852, Young asserted:

“When the Virgin Mary conceived the child Jesus, the Father had begotten him in his own likeness. He was not begotten by the Holy Ghost. And who is the Father? He is the first of the human family. . . . Jesus, our elder brother, was begotten in the flesh by the same character that was in the garden of Eden, and who is our Father in Heaven. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 1, pages 50-51)

Wilford Woodruff, who became the fourth prophet of the church, recorded these interesting statements in his journal:

He [Brigham Young] said that our GOD was Father Adam. He was the Father of the Savior Jesus Christ—Our God was no more or less than ADAM. (“Wilford Woodruff Journal,” February 19, 1854)

. . . [Orson Pratt] could not believe that Adam was our God or the Father of Jesus Christ—President Young said that he was . . . (Ibid., September 17, 1854)

. . . President Brigham Young . . . said Adam was Michael the Archangel & he was the Father of Jesus Christ & was our God & that Joseph [Smith] taught the Father of Jesus Christ & was our God or the Father of Jesus—President Young said that he was . . . (Ibid., December 16, 1869)

Just before his death, Brigham Young reaffirmed his teaching that Adam was God the Father and that Jesus was his son. On February 7, 1877, L. John Nuttall recorded the following in his journal:

Wed 7 . . . Prest Young was filled with the spirit of God & revelation & said . . . Father Adam’s oldest son (Jesus the Savior) who is the heir of the family is Father Adam’s first begotten in the spirit world, who according to the flesh is the only begotten as it is written. (In his divinity he having gone back into the spirit world, and come in the spirit to Mary and she conceived . . . . (“Journal of L. John Nuttall,” vol. 1, pages 18, 21; a photograph from the original journal is found in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 178-D)

Mormon leaders continued to believe in the Adam-God doctrine after Brigham Young’s death. As late as June 23, 1889, George Q. Cannon, a member of the First Presidency, was still teaching that “Jesus Christ is Jehovah” and that “Adam is His Father and our God” (“Daily Journal of Abraham H. Cannon,” vol. 11, page 39). Fortunately, the doctrine fell into disrepute, and members of the church who continued to believe it were actually excommunicated. In a speech given on June 1, 1980, Mormon Apostle Bruce R. McConkie declared that “The devil keeps this heresy alive . . . anyone who has received the temple endowment and who yet believes the Adam-God theory does not deserve to be saved.”

Church leaders became very embarrassed by the Adam-God doctrine and tried to cover up the fact that it had been taught for many years. While the General Authorities of the Mormon Church emphatically denied that earlier leaders taught the Adam-God doctrine, we marshaled a great deal of evidence in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? which was absolutely irrefutable. A number of other scholars gathered even more material. Finally, Apostle Bruce R. McConkie caved in under the weight of the evidence and admitted almost everything we had written in our book. In a letter to Eugene England, written in 1981, McConkie conceded that Brigham Young taught the Adam-God doctrine and also acknowledged that it was a false doctrine:

This may be the most important letter you have or will receive. . . . I want you to know that I am extending to you the hand of fellowship though I hold over you at the same time, the scepter of judgment . . . . On Sunday, June 1, 1980, I spoke at one of the multi-stake firesides. . . . I, of course, indicated the utter absurdity of this [Adam-God] doctrine and said it was totally false. . . . I have received violent reactions from . . . cultists in which they have expounded upon the views of Brigham Young and others . . . They have plain and clear quotations saying all of the things about Adam which I say are false. The quotations are in our literature and form the basis of a worship system followed by many of the cultists who have been excommunicated . . . As it happens, I am a great admirer of Brigham Young . . . He was called of God. . . . He completed his work and has gone on to eternal exaltation. . . .

Yes, President Young did teach that Adam was the father of our spirits, and all the related things that the cultists ascribe to him. . . . He expressed views that are out of harmony with the gospel. But, be it known, Brigham Young also taught accurately and correctly, the status and position of Adam in the eternal scheme of things. What I am saying is, that Brigham Young, contradicted Brigham Young, and the issue becomes one of which Brigham Young we will believe. . . . As for me and my house, we will have the good sense to choose between the divergent teachings of the same man. . . . If we believe false doctrine, we will be condemned. If that belief is on basic and fundamental things, it will lead us astray and we will lose our souls. . . . people who teach false doctrine in the fundamental and basic things will lose their souls. The nature and kind of being that God is, is one of these fundamentals. I repeat: Brigham Young erred in some of his statements on the nature and kind of being that God is and as to the position of Adam in the plan of salvation, but Brigham Young also taught the truth in these fields on other occasions. . . . he was a great prophet and has gone on to eternal reward. What he did is not a pattern for any of us. If we choose to believe and teach the false portions of his doctrines, we are making an election that will damn us. . . . it is my province to teach to the Church what the doctrine is. It is your province to echo what I say or to remain silent. . . . If I err, that is my problem; but in your case if you single out some of these things and make them the center of your philosophy, and end up being wrong, you will lose your soul. . . .

Now I hope you will ponder and pray and come to a basic understanding of fundamental things and that unless and until you can on all points, you will remain silent on those where differences exist between you and the Brethren. (Letter from Apostle Bruce R. McConkie to Eugene England, dated February 19, 1981; photographically reproduced in our book LDS Apostle Confesses Brigham Young Taught Adam-God Doctrine)

It seems strange that Apostle McConkie would write such a threatening letter to Eugene England. As far as we know, England never taught the Adam-God doctrine. He merely had a disagreement with McConkie over the issue of whether God continues to progress in knowledge. McConkie apparently digressed onto the subject of the Adam-God doctrine because he was deeply disturbed about that matter. In any case, now that Apostle McConkie has admitted that “President Young did teach” the Adam-God doctrine, Mormons should seriously consider the grave implications of the matter.

According to Mormon prophet Brigham Young, his teaching that Adam was “the only God with whom we have to do,” was a “doctrine” which God Himself revealed to him. The reader will remember that he first publicly proclaimed the doctrine in 1852. Twenty-one years later he emphatically declared that the Adam-God doctrine was revealed to him by the God of heaven. As we have shown above, the Mormon Church’s own newspaper reported that President Brigham Young spoke of “one particular doctrine which I revealed to them [the Latter-day Saints], and which God revealed to me—namely that Adam is our Father and God . . ..” (Deseret Evening News, June 14, 1873).

To admit that Brigham Young, the Prophet, Seer and Revelator of the church, could attribute a false revelation to God and cling to it so tenaciously for a period of 25 years undermines the church’s claim that the living prophet cannot lead the Saints astray.

The teaching of the Adam-God doctrine is clearly a violation of the commandment, “Thou shalt have no other gods before me” (Exodus 20:3). In his book, Mormon Doctrine, 1979, page 270, Apostle McConkie said: “There is no salvation in the worship of false gods. For such false worship the Lord imposed the death penalty in ancient Israel (Deut. 13:6-11).” Since McConkie himself admitted that Brigham Young taught the Adam-God doctrine and said that those who have been through the temple ceremony and believe that doctrine do “not deserve to be saved,” we do not see how he can still maintain that Brigham Young was “a mighty prophet.” It is obvious that an unbiased person can only reach one conclusion—i.e., that Brigham Young was a false prophet who tried to lead his people into serving another god.

CONCLUSION: In Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 163-178D, we show that although the Mormon leaders claim to have all the answers concerning the Godhead, a careful examination of their teachings reveals that they themselves are in a serious state of confusion. The honest investigator soon finds that the answers they give do not solve the real problems and that many of the answers are built upon the sandy foundation of change or falsification. The evidence clearly shows that the Mormon concept of God changed from a belief in one God to a plurality of Gods and finally culminated in the Adam-God doctrine—a doctrine that was later abandoned because it was considered blasphemous.

IN THE MAIL

Below are extracts from some of the hundreds of letters we have received during 1994:

This letter is sent to you as a voice of warning, to inform you that God will not permit you or your household to continue spreading wholesale destruction to the inhabitants of our society, through your militant aggression, by being in the same situation as Korihor placed himself in. Your fate will be just as dreadful. [Korihor was a Book of Mormon character who was so evil that he was “struck dumb” and was eventually “trodden down” by the Zoramites until “he was dead.”]

In the sight of God, your sins are worse than Benito Mussolini or Adolf Hitler, and your discipline will be much more severe, for you will be turned over to the buffeting of Satan both here and in the hereafter, where you will receive drastic punishment to where you will feel it’s greater than you can stand.

Hitler or Mussolini did not interfere with a person’s endeavor to learn the genuine truth about the Gospel of Jesus Christ as you do. Their punishment will be much lighter than yours. . . . I am now a personal witness of your causing innocent living beings of being deceived. . . .

At this time, I being authorized by God, spiritually wash my hands and stamp the dust off my feet as a living testimony against you, because of your illiterate way of diverting souls from the truth. . . . you are turned over to the buffeting of Satan to suffer, in his power, and to receive your just due as God deems suitable for your situation. . . .

These things I now say and declare to you and your household by the authorization of God’s Holy Priesthood, and in the Holy Name of Jesus, Amen.” (Letter from Utah, unsigned, but probably written by a Mormon Fundamentalist—i.e., a polygamist)
Rejoice! With your help & God’s power, another person is out of the LDS Church & he is raring to go to win other Mormons to Christ. As he told me, every time there was a dilemma, I was able to provide answers & that was only due to the literature you provided to me. You are truly a God send! (Letter from Washington)

We appreciate your ministry tremendously. You helped us & our two sons & families leave the Mormon Church. We were fifth generation members . . . (Letter from Mormon Church)

You are in my prayers daily and I want to thank you for all the help your books etc have been for me. My 4 teenage boys have also left the church and my husband has stopped attending.” (Letter from Texas)

Thank you more than I can express for your unswerving diligence in your ministry. Your book “Major Problems of Mormonism” was a real eye opener (mind opener) for me. I’ll be blunt—the mormon church would have all mormons believe that you are evil people sent from hell . . . an acquaintance of mine lent me the aforementioned book . . . Its not an easy book for a mormon to read. I believe most of the claims you make in your book and no longer intend to be a mormon. . . . I know that there is life beyond mormonism. (Letter from Canada)

I am a former mormon who was saved from darkness because people like you care enough to print the truth. (Letter from Washington D.C.)

Thank you so much for your book Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? (And at such a good price!) That has got to be the best book of its kind on the market. (Letter from California)

It was your materials that enabled me to reject Joseph Smith as prophet and to leave Mormonism. The Brand I was a member of was the R.L.D.S. . . . I have since become a Christian . . . (Letter from Missouri)

. . . I am profoundly moved by your work. I . . . listen to your tapes over & over for it brings joy to my heart to know the truth. My wife & I sent three boys on missions . . . (Letter from Indiana)

I feel you people are a wonderful “support group.” I have become very solid in my unshakable commitment to follow Christ . . . (Letter from Utah)

My wife, _____, has spent the last two years removing herself from the Mormon church and she has found your work very helpful during her studies. We both particularly like the balanced approach you bring to your research, as opposed to the vindictive style of some of the church’s critics. (Letter from Australia)

Please pray for our outreach to the Mormon people and for other ministries and individuals who are laboring to bring Mormons to the Lord.

LEGACY: A DISTORTED VIEW OF MORMON HISTORY

The Mormon Church’s official magazine, The Ensign, printed the following in 1993:

Imagine that you have just completed a tour of Temple Square in the heart of Salt Lake City, Utah. The guide suggests that you walk across the street and view Legacy, a new motion picture shown exclusively at the Joseph Smith Memorial Building. . . .

You decide to visit the building and view the film. As you walk into the 500-seat theater, sit down, and see the 31-foot by 62-foot screen before you, you suspect that Legacy will be no ordinary motion picture. And you are right.

Lights dim, and Legacy, produced under the direction of the First Presidency, begins. Original music . . . performed by the Tabernacle Choir and the Utah Symphony, fills the theater on six-channel surround sound. The images on the huge screen before you are sharper and brighter than you have ever seen—the result of being filmed on 70-millimeter film at an accelerated frame rate. At the same time you are viewing the film in English, foreign visitors wearing headsets are listening to the film in any one of four languages . . . via an infrared transmitter system built into the theater.

Soon you realize that the story and spirit of Legacy are as powerful and different as its technical advances. . . . Through Legacy we can be totally swept away in time and space as we meet early members of the Church—trek with them across the prairies, cry with them as they bury their dead, and rejoice with them as they marry and have children. . . . Most of the dialogue spoken by the main characters came from pioneer journals or letters. Everything the Prophet Joseph Smith says in the film is quoted from something that he actually said or wrote.

As the lights in the theater come back on, you realize that Legacy is more than a review of historical facts—it is a journey of the human heart back through time, an opportunity to figuratively walk alongside the early Saints and, with them, discover our own legacy of faith. (The Ensign, July, 1993, pages 32, 34)

IT MAKES YOU CRY!

The authors of this newsletter, Jerald and Sandra Tanner, were told that Legacy is such a powerful film that it brings many people to tears. Since we write about Mormon history, we felt that we should take the time to see this film. In addition, we thought it would be especially interesting to us because it purports to tell the “legacy” of our own ancestors—Sandra is the great-great-granddaughter of the Mormon prophet Brigham Young, who brought the Mormons to Utah, and Jerald is a descendant of John Tanner, who helped the prophet Joseph Smith in the early days of Mormonism.

To say that this is a “powerful” film seems to be an understatement. The film vividly shows scenes after scene of Mormons being persecuted or murdered. We were, in fact, deeply moved by Legacy and found it very difficult to hold the tears back. The acting in the movie is excellent and the scenery is beautiful.

Unfortunately, however, there is a down side to this impressive movie. The film does not accurately portray Mormon history because it only shows one side of the story. It entirely omits the reasons why the early Mormons were driven from place to place. For example, the film shows the mob destroying the Mormon printing press in Independence, Missouri, and the people being driven out. What the film fails to show, however, is that before the trouble occurred Joseph Smith gave revelations indicating that the Mormons would possess the land owned by the old settlers.

In one of his revelations Joseph Smith revealed that Independence was the “center place” of Zion: “Wherefore, this is the land of promise, and the place for the city of Zion. And thus saith the Lord your God... Behold, the place which is now called Independence is the center place; and a spot for the temple is lying westward, upon a lot which is not far from the courthouse” (Doctrine and Covenants 57:2-3).

In another revelation Joseph Smith quoted the Lord as saying: “And thus, even as I have said, if ye are faithful ye shall assemble yourselves together to rejoice upon the land of Missouri, which is the land of your inheritance, which is now the land of your enemies” (Doctrine and Covenants 52:42).

In still another revelation we find that those who opposed Mormonism would be “plucked out”: “And the rebellious shall be cut out of the land of Zion, and shall be sent away, and shall not inherit the land. For, verily I say that the rebellious are not of the blood of Ephraim, wherefore they shall be plucked out” (Doctrine and Covenants 64:35-36).

While we feel the mob’s actions cannot be justified, it is certainly understandable that the old settlers would be upset with the influx of Mormons who claimed they were sent by God to take over the land. For example, if a large flood of immigrants were to suddenly come into a city like Logan, Utah, proclaiming that God had given them the city because it was the land of their inheritance, it is likely that the Mormons who lived there would be very concerned about the matter. Although the Mormons are a peaceful people, it is likely that under these circumstances serious problems might develop.

David Whitmer, who was one of the Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon, wrote the following:

The main reason why the printing press was destroyed, was because they published the Book of Commandments. It fell into the hands of the world, and the people of Jackson county, Missouri, saw from the revelations that they were considered by the church as intruders upon the land of Zion, as enemies to the church, and that they should be cut off out of the land of Zion and sent away. The people seeing these things in the Book of Commandments became the more enraged, tore down the printing press, and drove the church out of Jackson county. (An Address to All Believers in Christ, by David Whitmer, Richmond, Missouri, 1887, page 54)

Since Joseph Smith had put his prophetic reputation on the line by claiming that the Lord had told him that Independence would be the “center place” of Zion, he was unable to admit defeat. Consequently, he decided to try to reinstate the Mormons in Jackson County by making war on the wicked “Gentiles” (i.e., non-Mormons) who had thwarted his plans. Smith even claimed that on December 16, 1833, he received a revelation from God to attack his enemies:

And now, I will show unto you a parable, that you may know my will concerning the redemption of Zion. A certain nobleman had a spot of land, very choice

And the enemy came by night, and broke down the hedge; and the servants were affrighted, and fled; and the enemy destroyed their works...

And the lord of the vineyard said unto one of his servants: Go and gather together the residue of my servants, and take all the strength of mine house, which are my warriors...

And go ye straightway unto the land of my vineyard; for it is mine; I have bought it with money.

Therefore, get ye straightway unto my land, break down the walls of mine enemies; throw down their tower, and scatter their watchmen.

And inasmuch as they gather together against you, avenge me of mine enemies, that by and by I may come with the residue of mine house and possess the land. (Doctrine and Covenants 101:43-44, 51, 55-58)

Another revelation given by Joseph Smith stated that “the redemption of Zion must needs come by power; Therefore I will raise up unto my people a man [later identified as Joseph Smith], who shall lead them like as Moses led the children of Israel... . Therefore let my servant Joseph Smith, Jun., say... . Gather yourselves together unto the land of Zion... . And inasmuch as mine enemies come against you... . ye shall curse them... . And my presence will be with you even in avenging me of mine enemies... .” (Doctrine and Covenants 103:15-16, 22, 24, 26).

Joseph Smith was able to raise the army as he was commanded. It was referred to as “Zion’s Camp.” Significantly, however, his attempt to “break down the walls of mine enemies; throw down their tower, and scatter their watchmen” completely failed. Reed Peck commented as follows in a manuscript written in 1839:

In accordance with the interpretation of this parable Joseph Smith called for volunteers collected about 210 “Warriors” and marched to Clay County under arms, but the cholera on the second day after their arrival dispersed them and all hopes were destroyed of “redeem[ing] Zion” for the present, but to console the Mormons under this disappointment, Joseph Smith, before he returned from the campaign prophesied publicly to them, that “within three years they should march to Jackson County and there should not be a dog to open his mouth against them”... (The Reed Peck Manuscript, page 3)
Mormon writer Max Parkin observed: “The Camp, however, failed to accomplish its objective of reinstating the distressed Saints and it further aided in festering the sore of unpopular public opinion the Mormons already had in Ohio” (Conflict at Kirtland, 1966, page 129).

None of Joseph Smith’s prophecies regarding the redemption of Zion came to pass and there seems to be little hope that the Mormons will ever possess the land.

Unfortunately, the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith never seemed to learn how to get along with those he called “Gentiles.” Consequently, there was conflict everywhere he led the Saints. After the affair at Independence, Smith tried very hard to make Kirtland, Ohio, an important center for Mormonism. The church’s publication, Messenger and Advocate, April 1837, vol. 3, page 488, stated that Joseph Smith gave “a prophesy saying this place must be built up, and would be built up, and that every brother that would take hold and help secure and discharge those contracts that had been made, should be rich.”

John Whitmer, one of the eight witnesses to the Book of Mormon, wrote the following in his history of the church: “In the fall of 1836, Joseph Smith, Jun., S. Rigdon and others of the leaders of the Church at Kirtland, Ohio, established a bank for the purpose of speculation, and the whole church partook of the same spirit . . . .” (John Whitmer’s History, chapter 20, pages 21-22). Although Joseph Smith encouraged his followers to support this bank, the Mormon writer John J. Stewart had to admit that the Kirtland Safety Society, “became bankrupt” (Joseph Smith the Mormon Prophet, 1966, page 110). Mormon historian B.H. Roberts commented: “The “Kirtland Safety Society” enterprise ended disastrously” (Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, pages 401-402).

Joseph Smith’s prophecy that Kirtland would be built up by the Mormons completely failed, and instead of the people becoming rich, many of them became destitute. According to the History of the Church, vol. 3, page 1, Joseph Smith was “obliged to flee . . . . on horseback, to escape mob violence . . . .” Smith left Ohio owing thousands of dollars to his creditors. Mormon writers Marvin S. Hill, C. Keith Rooker, and Larry T. Wimmer acknowledge that Joseph Smith’s big financial mistake was setting up an “unchartered bank”:

In the past it has been suggested by most Mormon authors that the reason for the lack of a charter was religious persecution. Joseph Smith himself declared “Because we were ‘Mormons,’ the legislature raised some frivolous excuses on which they refused to grant us those banking privileges they so freely granted to others.” There is little evidence that the Church in this instance was subject to religious persecution . . . . In 1835, all requests for additional charters were refused, while in 1836 only one of seventeen requests was granted. . . . just over a month after the restructuring of the Society and its commencement of business, law suits were commenced against Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, and others seeking a forfeiture judgment in the sum of $1,000 against each defendant for alleged violations of the 1816 Ohio statute prohibiting unauthorized banking . . . . The Smith and Rigdon cases were tried by a jury in October 1837, resulting in a judgment of $1,000 plus small costs against each. . . .

Examination of the court records establishes that Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon were properly charged, tried by jury, and found to have violated the statute. This finding, of course, implicitly held the entire Society activity wholly unlawful, and made it impossible for it to survive, even had survival been otherwise possible. . . . The inability of the bank to meet his expectations and its eventual failure cost him (Joseph Smith) dearly in terms of credibility and personal resources. . . . While he may have been encouraged in his decision by various groups, and by bad professional advice from lawyers, ultimately the responsibility for the decision to proceed with the bank was his. . . . In the face of numerous lawsuits and threats upon his life, Joseph Smith chose the alternative of fleeing Kirtland—a personal defeat since he fled not only creditors, but also had to leave behind the temple and the community he had gathered. (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1977, pages 437-38, 458)

The fact that Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon were both fined $1,000 for engaging in this “unlawful” activity may not seem too serious until a person considers the fact that a thousand dollars was a great deal of money in the 1830’s.

Not surprisingly, Legacy, totally ignores all evidence that Joseph Smith and the early Mormons made serious mistakes and contributed to some of the situations that culminated in violence. Those who created this film seem to have been bent on giving a one-sided depiction proving that the early Mormons were always in the right and were only persecuted because they believed the Book of Mormon and followed righteous principles. While it is undoubtedly true that most of the Mormons were peaceful people who took their religion seriously, some of the leaders of the church and also some in lower positions were greedy for power and misused public trust.

QUINN’S NEW BOOK

Recently an important new book by D. Michael Quinn was published by Signature Books. It is entitled, The Mormon Hierarchy: Origins of Power. Although the first printing of 3,000 copies sold out shortly after it appeared, the second printing is now available from Utah Lighthouse Ministry (see special offer on page 1 of this newsletter). This is a monumental work on the early history of Mormonism that throws a great deal of light on why the early Mormons seemed to draw persecution to themselves. Dr. Quinn obtained a Ph.D. in history at Yale University and was formerly Professor of American social history at the church’s Brigham Young University. He wrote at least six articles for the church’s official publication, The Ensign, and about the same number for Brigham Young University Studies. In addition, he has published some important books. He was considered one of the church’s top scholars until he dug too deeply into Mormon history.

Dr. Quinn knows a great deal about the true history of the church because he had an inside track at the Historical Department under Dr. Leonard Arrington, who was formerly Church Historian. In a speech Quinn gave in 1981, he noted that he had “spent a decade probing thousands of manuscript diaries and records of Church history” that he “never dreamed” he would see.
On January 20, 1995, Associated Press writer Vern Anderson reported the following regarding Quinn’s work:

SALT LAKE CITY (AP)—Mormons today may not recognize the contradictory, sometimes violent early church of their ancestors depicted in a new book based in part on documents the church now keeps locked up.

“Nineteenth century Mormonism was not polite,” unlike the congenial 20th century faith, says author D. Michael Quinn.

Indeed, the rough-and-ready frontier Mormonism described in Quinn’s 660-page “The Mormon Hierarchy: Origins of Power,” bears about as much resemblance to the modern church as a prickly pear to a hothouse orchid.

The contrast helps explain the discomfiture of later generations of Mormon leaders with aspects of the early church founded in 1830 by Joseph Smith. Quinn details how that unease led to official doctoring of the historical record after Smith’s death in 1844. . . .

Quinn’s book . . . is based on 30 years of research in Mormon history. And for 15 of those years, Quinn enjoyed free access to the vast archives of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Since 1986, however, church leaders, unhappy with the secular bent of the so-called New Mormon History, have sharply restricted access.

“My experience in the early 1970s was like a kid in a candy store. Every day was Christmas,” Quinn recalled in an interview. “I had no idea at the time I would be the only outside researcher who ever saw these documents. Years later, I saw that was the case.”

What he found there, and in many other archives, was the ingredients for a “warts and all” revisionist history that startlingly supplements the sanitized official accounts—designed to be faith-promoting—that are familiar to most Mormons.

For example: . . . In attempting to establish his kingdom of God, Smith embraced a set of what Quinn calls “theocratic ethics” that placed Mormon priesthood authority above civil law. At times, primarily after Smith’s death, those ethics sanctioned public denials of actual events, counterfeiting and stealing from non-Mormons, threats and physical attacks against dissenters, killing and castration of sex offenders, murdering of anti-Mormons and bribery of government officials. (Herald and News, Klamath Falls, Oregon, January 20, 1995)

D. Michael Quinn’s desire to tell the truth about Mormon history eventually cost him his membership in the Mormon Church. Mormon scholar Allen Roberts wrote:

Leaders repeatedly make it clear that they alone are authoritative in matters of church policy and belief. Even in the area of history, leaders attempt to control depictions of the Mormon past, advocating “faithful history” and condemning historical findings, however true, revealing information contrary to the sanitized, apologetic, church-approved histories. Quinn, for one, was not excommunicated because his history writing was inaccurate. He was cut off because his findings did not reinforce pictures the church has painted of its past. (Private Eye Weekly, October 20, 1993, page 12)

A FIGHTING PROPHET

In his book, The Mormon Hierarchy, Quinn points out that as time went on Joseph Smith became progressively concerned about having a large army and sought for military power:

Zion’s Camp did not redeem Zion, but it transformed Mormon leadership and culture. In February 1834, the Kirtland high council elected Joseph Smith as “commander-in-chief of the armies of Israel.” This was one of the first acts of the newly organized high council which thus acknowledged Smith’s religious right to give God’s command to “go out unto battle against any nation, kindred, tongue, or people.” Zion’s Camp was the first organization established for the external security of Mormonism. A year later, the military experience of Zion’s Camp (rather than any ecclesiastical service) was the basis upon which Smith said he was selecting men for the newly organized Quorum of the Twelve Apostles and the Seventy. Unlike other American denominations, “the church militant” was a literal fact in Mormonism, not just a symbolic slogan. (The Mormon Hierarchy, page 85)

Unlike the gentle and soft spoken man shown in Legacy, Joseph Smith was without question a fighting prophet. He not only liked to wrestle and prove his strength, but he sometimes kicked people and struck them very hard. D. Michael Quinn observed that Smith was a “church president who physically assaulted both Mormons and non-Mormons for insulting him . . .” (The Mormon Hierarchy, pages 261-262).

Under the date of March 11, 1843, we find this entry in Joseph Smith’s History: “In the evening, when pulling sticks, I pulled up Justus A. Morse, the strongest man in Ramus, with one hand” (History of the Church, vol. 5, page 302). Two days later the following was recorded: “Monday, 13.—I wrestled with William Wall, the most expert wrestler in Ramus, and threw him” (Ibid., 302). Under the date of June 30, 1843, we find this: “I feel as strong as a giant. I pulled sticks with the men coming along, and I pulled up with one hand the strongest man that could be found. Then two men tried, but they could not pull me up . . .” (Ibid., page 466).

Mrs. Mary Ettie V. Smith claimed that “the Prophet Joseph Smith had one day broken the leg of my brother Howard, while wrestling . . .” (Mormonism: Its Rise, Progress, And Present Condition, page 52).

John D. Lee related that one day Joseph Smith and some of his men were wrestling. Because it was “the Sabbath day” Sidney Rigdon tried to break it up. Joseph Smith, however, “dragged him from the ring, bareheaded, and tore Rigdon’s fine pulpit coat from the collar to the waist; then he turned to the men and said: ‘Go in, boys, and have your fun’ ” (Confessions of John D. Lee, pages 76-78).

Jedediah M. Grant, a member of the First Presidency under Brigham Young, told of “the Baptist priest who came to see Joseph Smith. . . . the Baptist stood before him, and folding his arms said, ‘Is it possible that I now flash my optics upon a man who has conversed with my Savior?’ ‘Yes,’ says the Prophet, ‘I don’t know but you do; would not you like to wrestle with me?’ That, you see, brought the priest right on to the thrashing floor, and he turned a Somerset right straight. After he had whirled round a few times, like a duck shot in the head, he concluded that his piety had been awfully shocked. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, pages 66-67).

While this may have seemed funny to President Grant, Joseph Smith had a violent temper which could lead to physical violence. His close friend Benjamin F. Johnson made this observation after Smith’s death:

And yet, although so social and even convivial at times, he would allow no arrogance or undue liberties. Criticisms, even by his associates, were rarely acceptable. Contradictions would arouse in him the lion at once. By no one of his fellows would he be superseded. . . one or another of his associates were more than once, for their impudence, helped from the congregation by his foot.

. . . He soundly thrashed his brother William . . . While with him in such fraternal, social and sometimes convivial moods, we could not then so fully realize the greatness and majesty of his calling. (Letter by Benjamin F. Johnson to Elder George S. Gibbs, 1903, as printed in The Testimony of Joseph Smith’s Best Friend, pages 4-5)

Mormon writer Max Parkin refers to a court case against Joseph Smith in which Calvin Stoddard, Joseph Smith’s brother-in-law, testified that, “Smith then came up and knocked him in the forehead with his flat hand—the blow knocked him down, when Smith repeated the blow four or five times, very hard—made him blind—that Smith afterwards came to him and asked his forgiveness . . .” (Conflict at Kirtland, citing from the Painesville Telegraph, June 26, 1835).

Parkin also quotes Luke S. Johnson, who served as an apostle in the early Mormon Church, as saying that when a minister insulted Joseph Smith at Kirtland, Ohio, Smith, “boxed his ears with both hands, and turning his face towards the door, kicked him into the street,” for the man’s lack of charity” (Ibid., page 268).

In the History of the Church for the year 1843, we read of two fights Joseph Smith had in Nauvoo:

Josiah Butterfield came to my house and insulted me so outrageously that I kicked him out of the house, across the yard, and into the street. (History of the Church, vol. 5, page 316)

Bagby called me a liar, and picked up a stone to throw at me, which so enraged me that I followed him a few steps, and struck him two or three times. Esquire Daniel H. Wells stepped between us and succeeded in separating us. . . I rode down to Alderman Whitney . . . he imposed a fine which I paid, and then returned to the political meeting. (Ibid., page 524)

On August 13, 1843, Joseph Smith admitted that he had tried to choke Walter Bagby: “I met him, and he gave me some abusive language, taking up a stone to throw at me: I seized him by the throat to choke him off” (Ibid., page 531).

After he became president of the Mormon Church, Brigham Young commented, “if you had the Prophet Joseph to deal with, you would think that I am quite mild. . . He would not bear the usage I have borne, and would appear as though he would tear down all the houses in the city, and tear up trees by the roots, if men conducted to him in the way they have to me” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, pages 317-318).

While Mormon writer John J. Stewart claimed that Joseph Smith was “perhaps the most Christ-like man to live upon the earth since Jesus himself,” this conclusion is not supported by Joseph Smith’s History: “I am not so much a ‘Christian’ as many suppose I am. When a man undertakes to ride me for a horse, I feel disposed to kick up and throw him off, and ride him” (History of the Church, vol. 5, page 335).

In addition to choking, kicking people out of houses and churches, knocking them in the head, boxing their ears, and tearing their clothing, the evidence indicates that he threatened people’s lives. Dr. Quinn reported the following:

In an incident about which Smith’s personal diary and official history are completely silent, he was acquitted in June 1837 of conspiring to murder anti-Mormon Grandson Newell. The silence may be due to the fact that two of Smith’s supporting witnesses in the case, both apostles, acknowledged that the prophet discussed with them the possibility of killing Newell. Apostle Orson Hyde testified that “Smith seemed much excited and declared that Newell should be put out of the way, or where the crows could not find him; he said destroying Newell would be justifiable in the sight of God, that it was the will of God, &c.” Hyde tried to be helpful by adding that he had “never heard Smith use similar language before,”. . . Apostle Luke S. Johnson acknowledged to the court that Smith had said “if Newell or any other man should head a mob against him, they ought to be put out of the way, and it would be our duty to do so.” However, Johnson also affirmed: “I believe Smith to be a tender-hearted, humane man.” Whether or not the court agreed with that assessment, the judge acquitted Smith because there was insufficient evidence to support the charge of conspiracy to commit murder. (The Mormon Hierarchy, pages 91-92)

One of the biggest problems that confronted Joseph Smith was disension within the ranks of his own church. Mormon historical records demonstrate that Smith not only felt that he was superior in physical strength to most men, but he also believed he had the inside track with God. He even went so far as to boast that he had been more successful than Jesus Himself in setting up a church:

If they want a beardless boy to whip all the world, I will get on the top of a mountain and crow like a rooster: I shall always beat them. . . I have more to boast of than ever any man had. I am the only man that has ever been able to keep a whole church together since the days of Adam. A large majority of the whole have stood by me. Neither Paul, John, Peter, nor Jesus ever did it. I boast that no man ever did such a work as I. The followers of Jesus ran away from Him, but the Latter-day Saints never ran away from me yet. (History of the Church, vol. 6, pages 408-409)

With an exalted attitude like that it is easy to believe that Joseph Smith would have trouble with many people. As his friend Benjamin F. Johnson pointed out, “Contradictions would arouse in him the lion at once.” Instead of handling things in a calm and orderly way, he would often resort to violence, name calling, and slander. This, of course, made many enemies within and without the church.
This is far different than the way the Mormon leaders operate today. For example, since October, 1993, the church has been purging prominent scholars and feminists who have written things that embarrass the church. The leaders, in fact, have taken an uncompromising stand against those who wish to tell the unvarnished truth about church history and other issues. Many scholars were questioned, and some were either excommunicated or disfellowshipped from the church. The purge has continued, and in December, 1994, Brent Metcalfe, editor of New Approaches to the Book of Mormon, was excommunicated for questioning the authenticity of Joseph Smith’s Book of Mormon.

While it is true that some church scholars connected with Brigham Young University and FARMS have belittled the scholars who have been reprimanded or excommunicated, the top leaders of the church have been rather careful not to further antagonize those who have been disciplined.

Joseph Smith, on the other hand, did everything he could to blacken the character of those he perceived as enemies. Even the publications of the church were often used to make slanderous and insulting accusations against those who objected to the way Smith handled things. Joseph Smith even went so far as to attack the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon in a letter he wrote “to the Church” on December 16, 1838: “Such characters as McLellin, John Whitmer, David Whitmer, Oliver Cowdery, and Martin Harris are too mean to mention; and we had liked to have forgotten them” (History of the Church, vol. 3, page 232). David Whitmer, Oliver Cowdery, and Martin Harris, of course, were the three special witnesses to the Book of Mormon, and John Whitmer was one of the set of eight additional witnesses who bore witness to the existence of the gold plates from which the Book of Mormon was “translated.”

In the same letter Joseph Smith called David Whitmer a “dumb ass”: I would remember William E. McLellin, who . . . professes to be much of a prophet, has no other dumb ass to ride but David Whitmer . . . he brays out cursings instead of blessings. Poor ass! Whoever lives to see it, will see him and his rider perish like those who perished in the gainsaying of Korah, or after the same condemnation” (Ibid., page 228).

While the early Mormon people bitterly complained when the “Gentiles” drove them out, they did exactly the same thing to some of their own people when they opposed Joseph Smith’s plans. In June, 1838, three of the Book of Mormon witnesses, former apostle Lyman E. Johnson, and William W. Phelps were sent a very threatening letter which accused them of serious crimes and ordered them to leave Far West, Missouri, at once. D. Michael Quinn shows that this letter was authorized by some of the highest leaders in the Mormon Church:

> On 17 June 1838, first counselor Sidney Rigdon preached his “Salt Sermon” as a warning that Mormon dissenters would “be cast out and trodden under foot of men.” . . . Rigdon was restating what a revelation of February 1834 had authorized the First Presidency to do to Mormons who “hearken not to observe all my words” (D&C 103:8-10). The next day second counselor Hyrum Smith and his Uncle John Smith (assistant counselor in First Presidency) joined with Danite leader Sampson Avard (as first signer) and eighty other Danites in a threatening letter to Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, John Whitmer, Lyman E. Johnson, and William W. Phelps . . .

Regarding this Danite expulsion of prominent Mormon dissenters, Counselor Rigdon told Apostle Orson Hyde at Far West that “it was the imperative duty of the Church to obey the word of Joseph Smith, or the presidency, without question or inquiry, and that if there were any that would not, they should have their throats cut from ear to ear.” (The Mormon Hierarchy, page 94)

The reader will notice the Quinn claims over eighty “Danites” signed the letter. The noted Mormon writer William E. Berrett explained:

> Such a band as the “Danites” did exist, as historians affirm; but that Joseph Smith had nothing to do with it and exposed the participants when he became aware of it, is equally well-confirmed. History further affirms that Dr. Avard himself was the author of the organization . . . The organization had been for the purpose of plundering and murdering the enemies of the Saints. (The Restored Church, 1958, pages 197-198)

Although there has always been a great deal of evidence that the Danite Band existed and that Joseph Smith was involved in it, many Mormon scholars were unable to face the serious implications of admitting the prophet was involved in this nefarious organization. The Joseph Smith journals, which contained important information regarding the Danites, were suppressed by the church leaders for about 140 years. Fortunately, however, we obtained access to a microfilmed copy of these diaries in 1976, and H. Michael Marquardt began to transcribe them. Eventually, with Marquardt’s careful work of transcription, we were able to print the extant diaries from 1832 to 1839.

When Mr. Marquardt was transcribing the 1838 diary, he made a very significant discovery concerning Joseph Smith’s involvement with the Danites. He found a portion of the diary which had been crossed out in a deliberate attempt to hide the fact that the Danites were a church organization which Joseph Smith supported. Although it was difficult work, Marquardt was able to transcribe a good portion of the material which someone had tried to obliterate. Since Mr. Marquardt did not have access to the original Joseph Smith diary, he was unable to transcribe all of the words.

Fortunately, in 1988 Mormon scholars Dean C. Jessee and David J. Whittaker published the important entry in Joseph Smith’s journal. Since Jessee and Whittaker were able to transcribe portions of the entry which Marquardt could not read, it seems obvious that they worked from the original journal. We do know, in fact, that for many years Jessee has been allowed access to the original Joseph Smith diaries. In any case, the two Mormon scholars quote Joseph Smith’s journal as saying:

> Some time past the brethren or Saints have come up day after day to consecrate, and to bring their offerings into the store house of the lord, to prove him now herewith and see[e] if he will not pour us out a blessing that there will not be room enough to contain it. They have come up hither. Thus far, according to the order <Rev?> of the Danites, we have a company of Danites in these times, to put right physically that which is not right, and to cleanse the Church of very great evils which hitherto existed among us insomuch as they cannot be put to right by teachings & persuasions. This company or a part of them exhibited on the fourth day of July [illegible word] They come up to consecrate by companies of tens, commanded by their captain over ten. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1988, page 14)

The threatening letter the Danites sent to the dissenters contained the following:

To Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, John Whitmer, William W. Phelps, and Lyman E. Johnson, greeting:

Whereas the citizens of Caldwell county have borne with the abuse received from you at different times . . . until it is no longer to be endured . . . out of the county you shall go, and no power shall save you. . . . there is but one decree for you, which is depart, depart, or a more fatal calamity shall befall you . . . we will put you from the county of Caldwell: so help us God. (Letter quoted in Senate Document 189, February 15, 1841, pages 6-9)

Book of Mormon witness John Whitmer, who was threatened by the Danites in the letter cited above, wrote the following in his history of the church:

Joseph Smith, Jr., S. Rigdon, and Hyrum Smith moved their families to this place, Far West, in the spring of 1838. As soon as they came here, they began to enforce their new organized plan, which caused dissensions and difficulties, threatenings and even murders. Smith called a council of the leaders together, in which council he stated that any person who said a word against the heads of the Church, should be driven over these prairies as a chased deer by a pack of hounds, having an illusion to the Gideonites, as they were termed, to justify themselves in their wicked designs. Thus on the 19th of June, 1838, they preached a sermon called the salt sermon, in which these Gideonites understood that they should drive the dissenters, as they termed those who believed not in their secret bands, in fornication, adultery or midnight machinations. . . . They had threatened us, to kill us, if we did not make restitutions to them, by upholding them in their wicked purposes and designs. . . . to our great astonishment, when we were on the way home from Liberty, Clay County, we met the families of Oliver Cowdery and L. E. Johnson, whom they had driven from their homes, and robbed them of all their goods, save clothing, bedding, etc.

While we were gone Jo. and Rigdon and their band of Gadolions kept up a guard, and watched our houses, and abused our families, and threatened them, if they were not gone by morning, they would be drove out, and threatened our lives, if they ever saw us in Far West. (John Whitmer’s History, page 22)

Book of Mormon witness David Whitmer, who was also threatened in the letter from the Danites, gave this information about the troubles in Far West:

If you believe my testimony to the Book of Mormon; if you believe that God spake to us three witnesses by his own voice, then I tell you that in June, 1838, God spake to me again by his own voice from the heavens, and told me to “separate myself from among the Latter Day Saints, for as they sought to do unto me, so should it be done unto them.” In the spring of 1838, the heads of the church and many of the members had gone deep into error and blindness. I had been striving with them for a long time to show them the errors into which they were drifting, and for my labors I received only persecutions. In June, 1838, at Far West, Mo., a secret organization was formed. Doctor Avard being put in as the leader of the band; a certain oath was to be administered to all the brethren to bind them to support the heads of the church in everything they should teach. All who refused to take this oath were considered dissenters from the church, and certain things were to be done concerning these dissenters, by Dr. Avard’s secret band. I make no farther statements now; but suffice it to say that my persecutions, for trying to show them their errors, became of such a nature that I had to leave the Latter Day Saints; and, as I rode on horseback out of Far West, in June, 1838, the voice of God from heaven spake to me as I have stated above[.] (An Address to All Believers in Christ, by David Whitmer, pages 27-28)

This statement by one of the Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon poses a real problem for Mormon apologists. Those who reject Whitmer’s statement that, “God spake to me again by his own voice from the heavens, and told me to ‘separate myself from among the Latter Day Saints,’” are forced to conclude that one of the most important witnesses to the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon printed a false account of God telling him to “separate” himself from the Mormons. Significantly, although Whitmer still believed in the Book of Mormon, he was convinced that Joseph Smith was a false prophet and never returned to the Mormon Church.

However this may be, the fact that the Mormon leaders violated the civil rights of their own people by driving out dissenters from their midst caused many non-Mormons to conclude that they were dealing with a very dangerous group. As they heard reports by those who were driven out, they became increasingly fearful of the Mormons.

Legacy completely skirted around this important issue which contributed to the conflict. Furthermore, absolutely nothing was said about the secret band of Danites and the fear they created among those who lived near the Mormons.

In addition, the film has a scene showing Lilburn W. Boggs, who was governor of Missouri, issuing an “extermination order” on October 27, 1838. Governor Boggs wrote: “The Mormons must be treated as enemies, and must be exterminated or driven from the State if necessary, for the public peace” (The Mormon Experience: A History of the Latter-day Saints, by Leonard J. Arrington and Davis Bitton, 1979, page 44).

While it is true that Governor Boggs did issue such a deplorable order, there is much more to the story. Actually,
President Sidney Rigdon, who was “set apart March 18, 1833, as first counselor in the First Presidency by Joseph Smith” (see Essentials in Church History, 1942, page 660) suggested that there could be “a war of extermination” three months prior to the time Boggs issued his order. On July 4, 1838, President Rigdon delivered a very inflammatory speech. Mormon historian B.H. Roberts commented: “This oration by Sidney Rigdon has always been severely criticized as containing passages that were ill-advised and vehemently bitter. Especially those passages which threatened a war of extermination upon mobs should they again arise to plague the saints” (History of the Church, vol. 3, page 42, footnote).

An extract from Rigdon’s speech is published in Roberts’ Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, page 441. After speaking of the persecution that church members had suffered, President Rigdon went on to say:

“But from this day and this hour we will suffer it no more. We take God and all the holy angels to witness, this day, that we warn all men, in the name of Jesus Christ to come on us no more for ever, from this hour we will bear it no more; our rights shall no more be trampled on with impunity; the man, or the set of men who attempt it, do it at the expense of their lives. And that mob that comes on us to disturb us, it shall be between us and them a war of extermination; for we will follow them until the last drop of their blood is spilled; or else they will have to exterminate us, for we will carry the seat of war to their own houses and their own families, and one party or the other shall be utterly destroyed. . . . We this day, then, proclaim ourselves free with a purpose and determination that never can be broken, No, never! No, Never! No, never!”

One page 443, of the same volume, B. H. Roberts acknowledged that Joseph Smith himself approved of the speech:

The unwisdom of the utterance has been quite generally recognized by our writers, and by them responsibility for it has been placed upon the rather fervid imagination of Sidney Rigdon, who delivered the speech, and who quite generally is supposed to have been mainly or wholly responsible for it. This is not true. The speech was carefully prepared . . . and read by other presiding elders of the church before its delivery. It immediately appeared in The Far West, a weekly newspaper . . . and was also published . . . on the press of the Elders’ Journal. Joseph Smith in his journal speaks of it approvingly; and in the Elders’ Journal, of which he was the editor, and in the editorial columns under his name, the speech is approvingly recommended to the saints. In view of these facts, if the “declaration” was of doubtful propriety, and unwise and impolitic, responsibility for it rests not alone on Sidney Rigdon, but upon the authorities of the church who approved it, and the people who accepted it by their acclamation.

When Sidney Rigdon later fell into a state of apostasy, the other Mormon leaders tried to blame him for their troubles in Missouri. President Brigham Young went so far as to state: “Elder Rigdon was the prime cause of our troubles in Missouri, by his fourth of July oration” (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, page 667).

There can be no doubt that Joseph Smith and other Mormon leaders made a serious mistake when they approved Rigdon’s speech. This speech undoubtedly helped trigger the violence that erupted in Missouri.

During the conflict that ensued Joseph Smith’s Danites were engaged in plundering and burning houses. Smith, however, denied the plundering and asserted that the anti-Mormons “fired” their own houses “and then reported to the authorities of the state that the ‘Mormons’ were burning and destroying all before them” (History of the Church, vol. 3, pages 163-164). His brother Hyrum also charged that the anti-Mormons, “not being able to incense the ‘Mormons’ to commit crimes, they had recourse to this stratagem to set their houses on fire . . . the ‘Mormons’ did not set them on fire . . .” (Ibid., pages 408-409).

Unfortunately, neither Joseph nor Hyrum were telling the truth about this matter. The evidence concerning the burning of houses and plundering by the Mormons is irrefutable. Statements made by faithful members of the church provide devastating evidence against the statements made by Joseph and Hyrum Smith. For example, Benjamin F. Johnson, a Danite, who later served on Joseph Smith’s highly secret Council of Fifty, commented:

I started . . . and fell into rank with a company of near twenty mounted men . . . I soon learned our destination was to Taylor’s on Grand River, about nine miles above, where it was said arms and ammunition were held for the use of the mob. . . . There were two men with a number of women and children, and all affirmed that there was nothing of the kind there. . . . Our captain ordered a search in the cornfields . . . which soon resulted in the discovery of arms and ammunition and of their falsehoods. The females hastily took from the houses what they could carry, and here I might say there was almost a trial of my faith in my pity for our enemies . . . Among the women was one, young married and apparently near her confinement, and another with small children and not a wagon, and many miles away from any of their friends, and snow had begun already . . . to fall. My sympathies were drawn toward the women and children, but I would in no degree let them deter me from duty. So while others were pillaging for something to carry away, I was doing my best to protect . . . the lives and comfort of the families who were dependent on getting away upon horseback. . . . While others were doing the burning and plunder, my mission was of mercy . . . Before noon we had set all on fire and left upon a circuitous route towards home. (My Life’s Review, 1947, pages 38-39)

Oliver Boardman Huntington, another faithful church member, who was only fourteen years old at the time he was initiated into the Danite order, wrote the following:

Open hostilities had previously commenced on both sides, by the mobs burning one or two houses. . . . it was my natural turn to glory in excitement . . . I wished and desired to be in the midst of the scene; and often in vain spent tears, implored my father to let me go with the scouting parties. . . . At the time that Galeton was to be burned, I pleaded with father to let me go; but to no effect. On the appointed day I went to the top of the hill . . . and cast my eyes in the direction of Galeton . . . and saw the smoke rising towards Heaven, which filled me with ambition, the love of excitement, tumult and something new. . . . The next day I went to Bishop
Knights and saw the plunder, and O what lots, I . . . heard them tell, in what order they took the place . . . The store they burned, but the goods were preserved. (“Oliver Boardman Huntington Journal,” pages 31-32, typed copy, Utah State Historical Society)

Speaking of the Danites, D. Michael Quinn noted that, “As of 4 September 1838, Danite John N. Sapp estimated their number at 800-1,000” (The Mormon Hierarchy, page 479). Through his meticulous research Quinn has identified about 230 of these Danites by name (Ibid., pages 479-485). Quinn’s book has some important new information about the Danite band.

In our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 428-450, we have a great deal of material regarding the Danites and their nefarious activities.

The film Legacy shows an attack on the Mormons by the Missourians at Haun’s Mill. According to Joseph Fielding Smith, who later became president of the church, seventeen people were killed (Essentials in Church History, page 235). Two of the victims were boys under ten years of age. Joseph Fielding Smith cited the History of Caldwell County which said that an old man was wounded in the attack and then “frightfully mangled.” It was reported that he was mutilated with “a rude sword, or corn knife” (Essentials in Church History, page 235). On the same page, Smith spoke of “the diabolical deeds” of the members of the militia. He did, however, acknowledge on page 234 that “the executioners were principally seeking for the men, and let most of the women escape.”

There is, of course, no way that a person can justify this bloody deed. Dr. Quinn was very disturbed by the “brutality of the anti-Mormon” militia that “attacked the LDS settlement at Haun’s Mill,” but he put the matter into perspective by showing that the action of the Danites at the Battle of Crooked River led to the slaughter at Haun’s Mill:

In the skirmishes that both sides called “battles,” Mormons used deadly force without reluctance. Benjamin F. Johnson wrote that Danite leader (and future apostle) Lyman Wight told his men to pray concerning their Missouri enemies: “That God would Damn them & give us pow[er] to Kill them.” Likewise, at the beginning of the Battle of Crooked River . . . Apostle David W. Patten (a Danite captain with the code-name “Fear Not”) told his men: “Go ahead, boys; rake them down.” The highest ranking Mormon charged with murder for obeying this order was Apostle Parley P. Pratt who allegedly took the careful aim of a sniper in killing one Missourian and then severely wounding militiaman Samuel Tarwater. This was after Apostle Patten received a fatal stomach wound. In their fury at the sight of their fallen leader, some of the Danites mutilated the unconscious Tarwater “with their swords striking him lengthwise in the mouth, cutting off his under teeth, and breaking his lower jaw; cutting off his cheeks . . . and leaving him [for] dead.” He survived to press charges against Pratt for attempted murder. . . .

A generally unacknowledged dimension of both the extermination order and the Haun’s Mill massacre, however, is that they resulted from Mormon actions in the Battle of Crooked River. Knowingly or not, Mormons had attacked state troops, and this had a cascade effect. Local residents feared annihilation: “We know not the hour or minute we will be laid in ashes,” a local minister and county clerk wrote the day after the battle. “For God’s sake give us assistance as quick as possible.” Correspondingly, the attack on state troops weakened the position of Mormon friends in Missouri’s militia and government. Finally, upon receiving news of the injuries and death of state troops at Crooked River, Governor Boggs immediately drafted his extermination order on 27 October 1838 because the Mormons “have made war upon the people of this state.” Worse, the killing of one Missourian and mutilation of another while he was defenseless at Crooked River led to the mad-dog revenge by Missourians in the slaughter at Haun’s Mill. (The Mormon Hierarchy, pages 99-100)

From the above it seems obvious that the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith made a very serious mistake when he approved Sidney Rigdon’s speech which threatened that if the Mormons were attacked, there would be “a war of extermination; for we will follow them until the last drop of their blood is spilled; or else they will have to exterminate us . . .”. Although Bogg’s order to the troops was similar to the Rigdon speech in that he incorporated the word “exterminated,” when it came right down to it, the Mormons were offered a flag of truce.

John Taylor, the third president of the Mormon Church, said that when Joseph Smith was finally pinned down by the militia (he used the word “mob”), Smith acted like he did not want the conflict to end:

Some 25 years ago, in Far West . . . there were not more than about 200 of us in the place. . . Joseph . . . then led us out to the prairie facing the mob and placed us in position; and the first thing we knew a flag of truce was seen coming towards us. . . Joseph Smith, our leader, then sent word back . . said he, “Tell your General to withdraw his troops or I will send them to hell.” I thought that was a pretty bold stand to take, as we only numbered about 200 to their 3,500 . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 23, page 37)

Joseph Smith’s bold attitude was undoubtedly just for show, for John Corrill related that, “Smith appeared to be much alarmed, and told me to beg like a dog for peace . . .” (A Brief History of the Church of Christ of Latter Day Saints, by John Corrill, 1839, page 41). Reed Peck confirmed Corrill’s statement (see our book, The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 1, page 75). This book contains a great deal of information regarding the war in Missouri and other confrontations the early Mormons had with their neighbors.

Although some Mormons were massacred at Haun’s Mill in Missouri, members of the church got their revenge in 1857 when some people from Missouri passed through Utah. In the book, The Mormon Experience, written by former Mormon Church Historian Leonard J. Arrington and Davis Bitton, we read the following about the Mountain Meadows Massacre:

The one exception was the Francher train, a company of overland immigrants from Arkansas and Missouri that passed through Utah in August 1857 just when Mormon tempers and fears were at a fever pitch. In a remote, grassy valley in the south of Utah this company was virtually annihilated by a combined force of Mormon militia and Indians. (The Mormon Experience, page 167)
The authors go on to point out that the Francher train had “a few hangers-on known as Missouri wildcats, who . . . made profane, provocative boasts that they had participated in the Haun’s Mill Massacre . . . Some 120 persons were killed by Mormon militiamen and Indians working together” (Ibid., pages 167-168).

Like the early Mormons in Missouri, the people in the Francher train were offered a flag of truce. Unfortunately, however, these early Mormons were far more treacherous than the Missourians who allowed the Mormons to leave the state. In this case the flag was only used as a means to get the people to surrender their arms so they could be slaughtered. Joseph Fielding Smith admitted:

“It was determined by those making the attack that no emigrant should live who could tell the tale. . . . [John D.] Lee induced the emigrants to surrender under the promise of protection and conveyance to a place of safety. They were led to a place where the Indians were in ambush, and at a given signal a volley of shots rang out, both Indians and white men participating in the outrage. (Essentials in Church History, page 516)

In her book, The Mountain Meadows Massacre, the noted Mormon scholar Juanita Brooks stated that although the Mormon prophet Brigham Young did not order the massacre, he “was accessory after the fact, in that he knew what had happened, and how and why it happened. Evidence of this is abundant and unmistakable, and from the most impeccable Mormon sources” (The Mountain Meadows Massacre, 1970, page 219). Brooks also reveals that Brigham Young protected the perpetrators from the law.

The journal of Wilford Woodruff, who later became the 4th president of the Mormon Church, makes it clear that while President Brigham Young publicly condemned the massacre, he actually believed that God approved of the diabolical deed:

We visited the Mountain Meadow Monument put up at the burial place of 120 persons . . . The pile of stone was about 12 feet high . . . A wooden Cross was placed on top with the following words: Vengeance is mine and I will repay that with the Lord. President Young said it should be vengeance is mine and I have taken a little. (Wilford Woodruff’s Journal, 1833-1898, vol. 5, page 577)

TROUBLE IN NAUVOO

After the Mormons left Missouri they founded a city in Illinois which Joseph Smith called Nauvoo. Unfortunately, the people that moved to Nauvoo began to have serious trouble with their neighbors. One of the practices that really offended outsiders was the practice of polygamy. On July 12, 1843, Joseph Smith set forth a revelation which made it clear that he and other church members should enter into plural marriage and that the doctrine was very important for their salvation. Although Mormons no longer practice plural marriage, the current edition of the Doctrine and Covenants still has the revelation on polygamy. Section 132, verses 61-62, contains the following:

And again, as pertaining to the law of the priesthood—if any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another, and the first give her consent, and if he espouses the second . . . he cannot commit adultery . . . And if he have ten virgins given unto him by this law, he cannot commit adultery, for they belong to him, and they are given unto him; therefore he is justified.

Mormon scholar Allen Roberts pointed out that in Legacy there has been an attempt to sanitize the history of the church:

The recent church movie, Legacy, shown in the Joseph Smith Memorial Building . . . is an example of the church approach. It portrays the life of a real historical figure, Mary Elizabeth Rawlins Lightner, and uses quotes from her actual journal. She befriended the prophet, converts to Mormonism and eventually marries a young Mormon man. What the movie doesn’t tell is that in 1842, after repeated propositions, she became one of Joseph Smith’s polygamist wives. (Private Eye Weekly, October 20, 1993, page 12)

Richard S. Van Wagoner, a Mormon who is an authority on polygamy, gives this information:

Mary Elizabeth Rollins, married to non-Mormon Adam Lightner since 11 August 1835, was one of the first women to accept the ‘cestial marriage’ teachings of the prophet. “He was commanded to take me for a wife,” she declared . . . “I was his, before I came here,” she added . . . Brigham Young secretly sealed the two in February 1842 when Mary was eight months pregnant with her son, George Algernon Lightner. She lived with Adam Lightner until his death in Utah many years later. In her 1880 letter to Emmeline B. Wells, Mary explained: “I could tell you why I stayed with Mr. Lightner. . . . I did just as Joseph told me to do, as he knew what troubles I would have to contend with.” (Mormon Polygamy: A History, 1989, page 43)

It seems clear that there was more than just polygamy involved here; Joseph Smith had obviously taken another man’s wife. D. Michael Quinn made it clear that Mary was not the only married woman Joseph Smith took: “These entries refer to Zina D. Huntington (Jacobs) and Mary Elizabeth Rollins (Lightner). Both were plural wives of Joseph Smith despite their continued marriages to other men” (The Mormon Hierarchy, page 401).

Later in Utah, Jedediah M. Grant, second counselor to President Brigham Young, gave a sermon in the Tabernacle in which he confirmed that Joseph Smith asked for other men’s wives:

When the family organization was revealed from heaven—the patriarchal order of God, and Joseph began, on the right and on the left, to add to his family, what a quaking there was in Israel. Says one brother to another, “Joseph says all covenants are done away, and none are binding but the new covenants; now suppose Joseph should come and say he wanted your wife, what would you say to that?” “I would tell him to go to hell.” This was the spirit of many in the early days of this Church. . . .

What would a man of God say, who felt aghast, when Joseph asked him for his money? He would say, “Yes, and I wish I had more to help to build up the kingdom of God.” Or if he came and said, “I want your wife?” “O yes,” he would say, “here she is, there are plenty more.” . . . Did the Prophet Joseph want every man’s wife he asked for? He did not . . . If such a man of God should come to me and say, “I want your gold and silver, or your wives,” I should say, “Here they are, I wish I had more to give you, take all I have got.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, pages 13-14)

Since most people who lived in Illinois in the 1840’s were very opposed to polygamy and adultery, Joseph Smith’s new teaching regarding “the patriarchal order of God” was bound to cause a great deal of conflict. Despite the fact that Smith attempted to hide these strange practices and even publicly denied them, leaks occurred and the secret became known. Just about a month before his death Joseph Smith was charged with adultery. The following appears in Smith’s History:

A. A. Lathrop came to my clerk, Dr. Richards, and told him an officer was on his way with an attachment for him, and that the grand jury had found a bill against me for adultery, on the testimony of William Law; he had come from Carthage in two hours and thirty minutes to bring the news. (History of the Church, vol. 6, page 403)

Not surprisingly, the film Legacy completely glossed over the reason Joseph Smith was murdered and the Mormons were forced to leave Illinois. As noted above, the film did show the wicked anti-Mormon mob destroying the Mormon printing press in Independence, Missouri. What the film failed to show was the fact that Joseph Smith ordered the destruction of a printing press in Nauvoo in a futile attempt to cover up his own questionable behavior.

In addition to the problems regarding polygamy and adultery, Joseph Smith built up a large militia which terrified the non-Mormons in Illinois. D. Michael Quinn stated:

the Nauvoo Legion was no ordinary militia. By 1842 the legion had 2,000 troops, by far the largest single militia in Illinois. Within two years, the Nauvoo Legion had nearly 3,000 soldiers. By comparison the U.S. army had less than 8,500 soldiers that year. (The Mormon Hierarchy, page 106)

A careful look at Joseph Smith’s actions in Nauvoo certainly raises a question of whether he was becoming more concerned about gaining political and military power than he was about spiritual matters. For example, in 1844 the secret Council of Fifty decided to run Joseph Smith for the presidency of the United States. Just a short time before this, Joseph Smith had stated that he did not want to participate in politics:

. . . but as my feelings revolve at the idea of having anything to do with politics, I have declined, in every instance, having anything to do on the subject. . . . I wish to be let alone, that I may attend strictly to the spiritual welfare of the Church. (History of the Church, vol. 5, page 259)

Even though Joseph Smith made this statement in 1843, in 1844 he announced that he was a candidate for the presidency of the United States. The elders of the church were actually called to electioneer for Smith. Brigham Young stated: “It is now time to have a President of the United States. Elders will be sent to preach the Gospel and electioneer” (History of the Church, vol. 6, page 322).

Joseph Smith seems to have desired to lead a large army, for he prepared a “Petition to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, dated 26th March, asking the privilege of raising 100,000 men to extend protection to persons wishing to settle Oregon and other portions of the territory of the United States . . .” (History of the Church, vol. 6, page 282). In this document we find the following:

Section 1. Be it ordain . . . that Joseph Smith . . . is hereby authorized and empowered to raise a company of one hundred thousand armed volunteers . . .

Sec. 2. And be it further ordained that if any person or persons shall hinder or attempt to hinder or molest the said Joseph Smith from executing his designs in raising said volunteers . . . [he] shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars . . . or by hard labor on some public work not exceeding two years, or both . . . (History of the Church, vol. 6, page 277)

D. Michael Quinn pointed out that the “Council of Fifty” sanctioned this “extraordinary proposal.” Obviously, this bizarre petition was rejected by Congress. In any case, this request would lead one to wonder just why Joseph Smith would want such a large army. The fact that his secret Council of Fifty was involved in the matter certainly raises some interesting questions. Why would he want an army almost twelve times larger than the U.S. Army?

A non-Mormon newspaper, The Warsaw Signal, printed the following: “How military these people are becoming! Every thing they say or do seems to breathe the spirit of military tactics. Their prophet appears, on all great occasions, in his splendid dress[,] signs his name Lieut. General, and more titles are to be found in the Nauvoo Legion, than any one book on military tactics can produce . . . Truly fighting must, be a part of the creed of these Saints” (Warsaw Signal, July 21, 1841).

To make the situation even worse, Joseph Smith went so far as to have himself ordained “King.” The noted Mormon scholar Kenneth W. Godfrey stated:

Antagonism toward the Mormon Prophet was further incited when it was correctly rumored, that he had been ordained “King over the Immediate House of Israel” by the Council of Fifty. This action was wrongly interpreted by non-Mormons to mean that he was going to attempt to overthrow the United States government by force . . . his kingly ordination only incensed the populace, and his untimely death became even more inevitable. (Brigham Young University Studies, Winter 1968, pages 212-213)

Dr. Quinn’s book contains some revealing information concerning this matter:

Two days after this general conference Smith became Mormonism’s theocratic king. The kingdom’s clerk William Clayton wrote that during the 11 April 1844 meeting “was prest. Joseph chosen as our Prophet, Priest and King by Hosannas.” Clayton did not describe what happened immediately after this secret sustaining vote by the Council of Fifty a later revelation to the Council of Fifty affirmed that God called Smith “to be a Prophet, Seer and Revelator to my Church and Kingdom; and to be a King and Ruler over Israel.” . . .
As one researcher notes, admitting only three gentiles to the Council of Fifty was certainly “a poor representation” on Smith’s part “if he expected the Council soon to be in control of the world.” . . . However, in functional terms this non-Mormon participation was an unparalleled development, because they became privy to Mormonism’s greatest secret. . . . the three non-Mormons voted for and witnessed Smith’s ordination as “King, Priest and Ruler over Israel on the Earth.” Smith believed that no one, not even non-Mormons, would disclose this event because he had administered a secrecy oath to each.

The oath of secrecy began at the preliminary meeting on 10 March when Smith’s diary stated: “Joseph required perfect secrecy of them.” By June disaffected members disclosed that: “For the time being, this was to remain a perfect secret until God should reveal to the contrary,” and they claimed that Smith “swore them all to present secrecy, under the penalty of death!” . . .

Official minutes described the Council of Fifty’s initiation ceremony as “the Charge, the name, & Key word, and the Constitution, and Penalty.” George Q. Cannon, the council’s later recorder, “read the minutes of the 1st organization which did sanction the ‘penalty.’” . . . Mention of a “Penalty” in the Council’s official minutes corroborates the 1844 claim of dissenters that the Fifty had an obligation of “secrecy, under the penalty of death.”

The Daughters of Zion (Danites) of Missouri also had passwords and a penal oath of secrecy, and former Danites accounted for one-third of the men Smith admitted into the Council of Fifty. (The Mormon Hierarchy, pages 124, 128-129)

Unfortunately for Joseph Smith, William Law, who had served in the First Presidency of the church, turned against him.

D. Michael Quinn reported:

On 10 May 1844 Smith’s former counselor William Law and his fellow religious dissenters distributed a prospectus for their newspaper, the Nauvoo Expositor. It advocated repeal of Nauvoo’s charter and proposed to reveal “gross moral imperfections” in Nauvoo. This was nothing new. . . .

However, there was a disturbing reference in the prospectus about Nauvoo’s “SELF-CONSTITUTED MONARCH.” If Smith doubted that this vague statement hinted at betrayal by one of the Fifty, he did not want to risk even the possibility of disclosure. . . . he took no action to forcibly suppress the pre-announced publication of the Expositor’s first issue the next month. Smith no longer seemed greatly concerned that the dissident publication would reveal secrets about his polygamy and would advocate repeal of Nauvoo’s charter. Such publicity did not justify his taking the risk of attacking freedom of the press.

However, he got a shock when the first issue of Nauvoo Expositor appeared on 7 June. Law and associates proclaimed: “We will not acknowledge any man as king or lawgiver.” The first issue promised that details of all its allegations would appear in the next edition. . . .

Smith realized that Council of Fifty members had betrayed him. He could not allow the Expositor to publish the secret international negotiations masterminded by Mormonism’s earthly king. . . . The Nauvoo Expositor demonstrated that one or more members had violated their “charge” and oath of secrecy, and Smith no longer trusted the Council of Fifty as an institution. Without that trust his grand designs for the Kingdom of God collapsed.

On 22 June 1844 Smith told the Clerk of the Kingdom that he could burn all the records of the Council of Fifty. The council’s King, Priest, and Ruler over Israel on Earth did not care what William Clayton did with the Fifty’s minutes, as long as they did not fall into the hands of the church’s enemies. (The Mormon Hierarchy, pages 138-140)

Joseph Smith finally concluded that the Nauvoo Expositor must be destroyed. While Smith was very worried that the Expositor would disclose the secrets of the Council of Fifty, he was also concerned about the newspaper revealing more information regarding his secret practice of polygamy. Although Joseph Smith and other Mormon leaders emphatically proclaimed that the charges concerning plural marriage were a lie, eight years after Smith’s death the church published the revelation on polygamy. The publication of this revelation proved beyond all doubt that the statements in the Expositor were true. Thus it is clear that the Expositor was condemned on the basis of false testimony given by Joseph and Hyrum Smith. A photographic reprint of the Nauvoo Expositor is available from Utah Lighthouse Ministry (see book list on page 15 of this newsletter).

In a synopsis of the proceedings of the Nauvoo City Council we find the following:

Mayor [Joseph Smith] said, if he had a City Council who felt as he did, the establishment (referring to the Nauvoo Expositor) would be declared a nuisance before night . . .

Councilor Hyrum Smith [Joseph’s brother] believed the best way was to smash the press and pi the type. (History of the Church, vol. 6, pages 441-445)

The Nauvoo City Council blindly followed Joseph Smith’s wishes and ordered the press destroyed. The following is recorded in Joseph Smith’s History under the date of June 10, 1844:

The Council passed an ordinance declaring the Nauvoo Expositor a nuisance, and also issued an order to me to abate the said nuisance. I immediately ordered the Marshal to destroy it without delay . . .

About 8 p.m., the Marshal returned and reported that he had removed the press, type, printed paper, and fixtures into the street, and destroyed them. (History of the Church, vol. 6, page 432)

Charles A. Foster, one of the publishers of the Expositor, wrote the following in a letter dated June 11, 1844:

Mr. Sharp: —I hasten to inform you of the unparalleled outrage, perpetrated upon our rights . . . a company consisting of some 200 men, armed and equipped, with muskets, swords, pistols, bowie knives, sledgehammers, &c, assisted by a crowd of several hundred minions . . . marched to the building, and breaking open the doors with a sledge-hammer, commenced the work of destruction and desperation.
They tumbled the press and materials into the street, and set fire to them, and demolished the machinery with a sledge hammer, and injured the building very materially. We made no resistance; but looked on and felt revenge, but leave it for the public to avenge this climax of insult and injury. (Warsaw Signal, June 12, 1844)

Mormon writer William E. Berrett declared:

The destruction of the Nauvoo Expositor . . . proved to be the spark which ignited all the smoldering fires of opposition into one great flame. . . . It offered . . . a legal excuse to get the Prophet and other leaders into their hands. The cry that the “freedom of the press” was being violated, united the factions seeking the overthrow of the Saints as perhaps nothing else would have done. (The Restored Church, page 255)

The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts seemed willing to concede that Joseph Smith was acting outside the law when he ordered the Expositor destroyed:

The legality of the action of the Mayor and City Council was, of course, questionable, though some sought to defend it on legal grounds; but it must be conceded that neither proof nor argument of legality are convincing. On the grounds of expediency or necessity the action is more defensible. (History of the Church, Introduction to vol. 6, page XXXVIII)

D. Michael Quinn told what happened in the days which followed:

At midnight on 22 June, Smith, his brother Hyrum, Willard Richards, and bodyguard Porter Rockwell slipped quietly out of Nauvoo and crossed the river . . . The prophet’s departure appalled the faithful Mormons he left behind. . . . Even the secret elite of Mormonism felt deserted. Reynolds Cahoon and Lorenzo D. Wasson, both members of the Council of Fifty, accused Smith of cowardice for leaving Nauvoo. He responded, “If my life is of no value to my friends it is of none to myself,” and he returned to Nauvoo to stand trial in Carthage, Illinois.

Smith was broken in spirit when he entered Carthage Jail charged with treason. . . .

To Smith, the kingdom was dead . . . a trusted Mormon gave him final verification of treachery in the Council of Fifty. The man reported that disdissant Wilson Law was saying that “the kingdom referred to [in Daniel] was already set up and that he [Joseph Smith] was the king over it.”

The morning of 27 July [sic], Smith sent an order . . . to Major-General Jonathan Dunham to lead the Nauvoo Legion in a military attack on Carthage . . . Dunham realized that such an assault by the Nauvoo Legion would result in two blood baths—one in Carthage and another when anti-Mormons (and probably the Illinois militia) retaliated by laying siege to Nauvoo for insurrection. To avoid civil war and the destruction of Nauvoo’s population, Dunham refused to obey the order and did not notify Smith of his decision. . . .

About 5 p.m. on Thursday, 27 June 1844, more than 250 men approached the Carthage Jail . . . Within moments three prisoners were desperately trying to secure the upper room’s door with bare hands and wooden canes against a cursing mob shooting randomly inside. Joseph Smith fired back with a six-shooter pistol at the attackers in the doorway, wounding three of them. . . . The man the murderous vigilantes knew as a church president, mayor, militia commander, U.S. presidential candidate, and Master Mason leaped out the second-floor window shouting, “O Lord my God!”

Mormonism’s king was dead. (The Mormon Hierarchy, pages 140-141)

As noted above, Legacy fails to deal with any of the problems that led to the conflict in Nauvoo. While Legacy is a very exciting film, it is a distortion of the true history of early Mormonism. It is, in fact, nothing but a propaganda film created specifically to bring the uninformed into the Mormon Church and to strengthen the testimonies of those who are already in the church.

FLEETING PROPHETS?

In April, 1995, Gordon B. Hinckley was sustained as the 15th prophet of the Mormon Church. President Hinckley was eighty-four years old at the time he became the “living Prophet” of the church. While he appears to be in good health and of sound mind, it seems unlikely that he will be effective in his position for very many years.

In our book, The Changing World of Mormonism, published by Moody Press in 1980, we pointed out that the church has an extremely serious problem. While church leaders maintain that it is absolutely necessary to have a “living Prophet” to guide the Saints and receive revelation for the church, it is obvious that some of these prophets were so old that they became only figureheads before their deaths:

During the past few years Mormon leaders have been faced with some serious problems. Their response to these problems plainly shows that they are not led by revelation. Several of these problems appear to be complicated by the fact that some of the Mormon leaders are very old. David O. McKay, the ninth president of the church, lived to be ninety-six years old. But he was in very poor health toward the end of his life and was hardly in any condition to function as prophet, seer and revelator for the church. Instead of appointing a younger man after McKay’s death, church leaders chose Joseph Fielding Smith who was ninety-three years old. Smith lived to be ninety-five, and the leadership passed to Harold B. Lee who was seventy-three years old. Lee lived for less than two years and Spencer W. Kimball became president. . . .

The way the Mormon hierarchy is structured there seems to be little hope of a younger leader, and apparently less hope for any new revelation. The claim of being led by a “living Prophet” has for a long time appeared to be just an idle boast. (The Changing World of Mormonism, page 439)

As we had suggested, the seriousness of the situation became more and more apparent as time went on. The problem is that the Mormon leaders have set up a tradition which has become almost like the “law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not” (Daniel 6:8). Church leaders believe that the man who has seniority in the Council of the Twelve Apostles is the one who should become the “living Prophet” of the church. This often means that those who take on the mantle of the prophet do so at a time in their lives when they are least competent to adequately perform their duties. They are often impaired both physically and mentally when they reach the highest office in the church.

Spencer W. Kimball, the 12th president of the church, whom we mentioned above, was in bad shape toward the end of his life. Nevertheless, he continued as a figurehead president until he died at the age of ninety. Ezra Taft Benson became the 13th president of the church in 1985. As Benson became older it became obvious that he was not really leading the church. On July 10, Vern Anderson of the Associated Press reported that President Benson’s grandson, Steve Benson, was deeply concerned regarding his grandfather’s growing problem of senility:

As Mormon Church President Ezra Taft Benson approaches his 94th birthday, the years have stilled his voice, clouded his mind and raised questions about the faith’s rigid order of succession.

Attired in a sweatsuit and fed by others, Benson spends his days in supervised seclusion in an apartment . . . He is an infirm retiree in a church that doesn’t officially retire its “prophet, seer and revelator.”

The incongruity struck a 13-year-old Benson great-grandson the other day as he poured his breakfast cereal: “Dad, why do they call him prophet when he can’t do anything?”

His son’s question is one reason [Steve] Benson decided to speak openly for the first time about his grandfather’s decline . . .

A more compelling motivator, however, is what he believes are misleading efforts by the church’s hierarchy to preserve an image of a more vibrant Ezra Taft Benson, an image less problematic for the core Mormon belief in a literal prophet of God.

“I believe the church strives mightily to perpetuate the myth, the fable, the fantasy that President Benson, if not operating on all cylinders, at least is functioning effectively, even with just a nod of the head, to be regarded by the saints as a living, functioning prophet,” he said.

That is not the grandfather Benson saw . . . in March . . . whom he has seen struggle with encroaching senility during much of his 7-year administration.

“The last time I saw him he said virtually nothing to me,” said Benson . . . “He looked at me almost quizzically, as if he were examining me.”

Benson, who has not spoken in public for more than three years, was already suffering memory loss when he assumed the presidency in 1985 at age 86. His grandson said facing church audiences became a frightening experience for a man who once had relished the pulpit . . . Steve Benson, 39, said it has been some time since his grandfather has been capable of participating in any way in the administration of the church’s affairs, although that is “an image that people absorb clouded by the years.”

In the same interview, Steve Benson observed: “I don’t think God would expect us to be bound legalistically or structurally to a system that obviously isn’t working. . . .” Steve Benson’s words seem to be almost prophetic. On May 30, 1994, his grandfather died. Instead of changing this unusual system, church leaders choose Howard W. Hunter, who was 86 years old and in poor health, to be the 14th prophet. Hunter was so weak at the time that he became the “living Prophet” that he had a difficult time speaking, and within nine months he was dead.

Historian D. Michael Quinn pointed out that the Mormon Church faced a succession crisis after Joseph Smith’s death because Smith had not made it clear how his successor should be appointed. Church officials went so far as to falsify some documents to slant opinion to their point of view. Dr. Quinn commented:

A scholarly advocate of Brigham Young acknowledges that only “approximately half of those who were members of the Church at the death of Joseph Smith did follow the Twelve through all the difficulties of the succession-exodus period [of 1844-52].” A church which loses 50 percent of its previous members within eight years is in a severe crisis. (The Mormon Hierarchy, page 242)

Quinn believes that this great apostasy in Brigham Young’s time caused church leaders to be fearful that there could be another split. Consequently, to prevent this the General Authorities decided to go with a system of seniority. This system makes it very difficult for a power struggle over who should be the “living Prophet” to develop.

The Bible relates that the prophet Moses was extremely old at the time of his death. Nevertheless, it also reports that at the time of his death, “his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated” (Deuteronomy 34: 7). In the case of the Mormon prophets, however, it is very obvious that as they grow older they become infirm and senile like other men. There seems to be no special protection for these “living prophets.” Joseph Smith became the prophet of the Mormon Church when he was only about twenty-five years old. Today, it is very difficult for a man to achieve that high position until he is somewhere between seventy to ninety years old. Things have certainly changed!

As the Bible says, it is dangerous to put our trust in man: “Thus saith the Lord; Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord” (Jeremiah 17:5). Instead of putting all their trust in men being called to head the church. He also demonstrates that there has been some opposition to the policy within the highest ranks of the church.
OCCULTIC RITUAL ABUSE

In 1991, we published a secret memo written by Glenn L. Pace, Second Counselor in the Presiding Bishopric of the Mormon Church. Pace claimed that he personally interviewed “sixty victims” of ritualistic child abuse who “are members of the Church.” He went on to state that “Forty-five victims allege witnessing and/or participating in human sacrifice. The majority were abused by relatives, often their parents.” Mr. Pace then related that these victims were subjected to horrific torture and brainwashing. Surprisingly, the victims told Pace that the perpetrators were “Young Women leaders, Young Men leaders, bishops, a patriarch, a stake president, temple workers, and members of the Tabernacle Choir.” These accusations are not coming from individuals who think they recognized someone, but from those who have been abused by people they know, in many cases their own family members.

Interestingly, the Mormon Church did not try to deny that there was a problem but instead maintained that it was only a very small percentage of church members who had been subjected to this abuse.

In 1994, two and a half years after we published the Pace Memo, the Salt Lake Tribune reported that allegations of Satanic ritual abuse were reported in a Mormon Church in Oklahoma. In a letter to Gordon B. Hinckley, signed by Merradyth and Jack McCallister, we find the following:

In June of 1963, my husband Jack, had been sexually molested by his bishop (Samuel H. Gardener) [a bishop of the Oklahoma First Ward who died in 1967] for two years between 15-17. . . . In June of 1993, our son, Scott, was 23 years old and recently returned from an honorable mission. He told my husband about being sexually molested between the age of 15-17 by his bishop . . . . (Letter dated March 23, 1994)

The McCallisters’ son also accused his former bishop of ritually abusing him. Interestingly, on February 26, 1994, the Oklahoma newspaper, The Yukon Review, reported that the former bishop had been “charged with soliciting another person to commit an act of lewdness after a December incident at a University of Oklahoma men’s restroom.”

The McCallisters could not be silenced by the local Mormon Church leaders, and Merradyth was excommunicated from the church. Her husband, Jack, who was himself a former bishop, left the church over the matter. Another member of the church, Mary Plourde, who accused the former bishop and other church leaders of ritually and sexually abusing her children, was also excommunicated because she would not keep silent about the problem. Still another woman, Cinda Rhoton, reported she and her children were victims of ritual abuse. Both the former bishop and her ex-husband allegedly took part in the abuse.

We have obtained important information about this matter and have published it in our new book, Occultic Ritual Abuse: Fact or Fantasy? In addition, this book contains a great deal of information on the subject of sexual abuse, the effect of incest and ritual abuse on victims, people who develop multiple personalities and other serious mental problems because of abuse, repressed and restored memories, and the attempt by the False Memory Syndrome Foundation and others to undermine the credibility of those who are trying to help survivors. See our special offer on Occultic Ritual Abuse: Fact or Fantasy? on the first page of this newsletter.

THE NEW LIGHTHOUSE

We are very happy to report that the new Utah Lighthouse building is almost finished. Although it has been a long and bumpy drive, we are now very close to the end of the road. We want to extend our thanks to all those who have helped us reach this point. While the ministry had to borrow over $60,000, it does not have to pay interest on this amount. Nevertheless, we would like to get this loan paid off as soon as possible. Those who are interested in helping with this or the general work of the ministry should be aware that Utah Lighthouse is a non-profit organization. In addition to our work with Mormons, we provide support for 44 children through World Vision.

While we deeply appreciate the financial contributions that we receive, we strongly believe that PRAYER is the most important thing. As Apostle Paul admonished: “Continue earnestly in prayer, being vigilant in it with thanksgiving” (Colossians 4:2).

JOSEPH SMITH’S USE OF THE APOCRYPHA

In 1968, we did a study of the relationship between the Book of Mormon and the Apocrypha. Our research led us to believe that Joseph Smith borrowed material from the Apocrypha in creating his Book of Mormon. Recently, we took a closer look at the Apocrypha and discovered additional evidence which provides even stronger support for the theory that Smith used it. Mormon Apostle Bruce R. McConkie gave this information regarding the Apocrypha:

Scholars and Biblical students have grouped certain apparently scriptural Old Testament writings, which they deem to be of doubtful authenticity or of a spurious nature, under the title of the Apocrypha. There has not always been agreement as to the specific writings which should be designated as apocryphal . . .

These apocryphal writings were never included in the Hebrew Bible, but they were in the Greek Septuagint . . . and in the Latin Vulgate. . . .

The Apocrypha was included in the King James Version of 1611, but by 1629 some English Bibles began to appear without it, and since the early part of the 19th century it has been excluded from almost all protestant Bibles . . . it is apparent that controversy was still raging as to the value of the Apocrypha at the time the Prophet began his ministry. (Mormon Doctrine, 1979, page 41)

On March 3, 1826, the following appeared in the Wayne Sentinel, the newspaper Joseph Smith’s family subscribed to: “. . . it appears . . . that the unhappy controversy about the expediency of publishing the Apocryphal books with those of the Old and New Testament, has at length ended; and that the General Committee of the Bible Society, in London, have determined henceforward, wholly to exclude the Apocrypha from their editions of the Sacred Scriptures.” On June 2, 1826, the same newspaper noted that the “apocryphal books are so called from the Greek word, which signifies ‘hid,’ or ‘concealed;’ because their origin, their real authors, times, and places are unknown. They are undoubtedly of great antiquity . . . But they do not claim to be, and have no title to be considered inspired.”

Although Protestants were questioning the worth of the Apocrypha, Joseph Smith showed a good deal of interest in it. In fact, when he purchased a Bible in the late 1820’s he picked one which contained the Apocrypha. Mormon scholar Reed Durham mentioned this purchase in his dissertation: “The Bible used for Joseph Smith’s Revision was purchased in E. B. Grandin’s Bookstore in Palmyra, New York; on October 8, 1828; it was a large family Bible . . . It was an edition of the Authorized Version ‘together with the Apocrypha,’ which was located between the two testaments, and was an 1828 edition, printed in Cooperstown, New York, by H. and E. Phinney Compan.” (“A History of Joseph Smith’s Revision of the Bible,” by Reed C. Durham, Jr., Ph.D. dissertation, Brigham Young University, 1965, page 25). Wesley P. Walters, however, claimed that the actual date of purchase was October 8, 1829, not October 8, 1828.

THE SEARCH FOR NEPHI

It is important to note that although the name “Nephi” is not found in either the Old or New Testaments of the Bible, it is one of the most important names in the Book of Mormon. Those who followed Nephi when his brothers rebelled against him were called Nephites. Mormon writers have spent a great deal of research on the subject of Nephi and his people. In this issue, we will be featuring some special offers and information on the changing world of Mormonism.
First, consider a few Egyptian names, setting off the Book of Mormon names (BM) against their Old World equivalents (OW). . . Nephi (BM), founder of the Nephite Nation.

Nehi, Nehri (ow), famous Egyptian noblemen.

Nfy was the name of an Egyptian captain. Since BM insists on “ph” Nephi is closer to Nihpi, original name of the god Pa-Nephi, which may even have been Nephi. (Lehi in the Desert and The World of the Jaredites, by Hugh Nibley, 1952, pages 27, 29)

Dr. Wells Jakeman, a noted Brigham Young University scholar, did not seem to agree with Hugh Nibley’s statement that Nephi may have derived his name from the Egyptian “god Pa-nepi.” He felt that it was unlikely that Lehi would have named his son after this Egyptian animal god Panepi, the ‘Apis-bull’ (a ‘Nile-god of fertility and the animal representative of Ptah, a god of the dead.”

Dr. Jakeman argued that the name Nephi “is Lehi’s rendering of the Egyptian name of the personification or ‘god of grain in Egyptian belief . . .’” For more information about this matter see Wells Jakeman publication, Stela 5, Izapa, Chiapas, Mexico, University Archaeological Society, Special publications No. 2, 1958, pages 38-42)

While Mormon scholars were diligently seeking to find evidence that Nephi is an Egyptian name, we discovered the actual name in the King James version of the Apocrypha.

The word “Nephi” is found hundreds of times in the Book of Mormon. In fact, it first appears as the second word in the Book of Mormon: “I Nephi having been born of goodly parents . . .” (1 Nephi 1:1). At least four men in the Book of Mormon are named Nephi. It is also the name of four books in the Book of Mormon, a city, a land, and a people.

While most Mormon writers tended to ignore our discovery for many years, in 1994 the Mormon scholar John Gee wrote:

Even if the word “Nephi” appears once in the King James Version of the apocrypha, it still does not prevent it from deriving from the proper milieu. (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 6, no. 1, page 105, note 177)

The FARMS publication, Insights, November 1992, contained an article which acknowledged that “the name

Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?  NOW ON CD-ROM ***

Research Application International has recently put the text of our Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? on a CD-ROM disk entitled LDS Classics. It also contains the text of the 1830 Book of Mormon, the 1833 Book of Commandments, the 1835 Doctrine and Covenants, the original 1851 Pearl of Great Price, The Seer; View of the Hebrews, and four other books. This disk should be exceptionally helpful for those who wish to search for words and subjects found in Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? and the other books.

LDS Classics normally sells for $50.00, but if it is ordered from Utah Lighthouse Ministry before February 29, 1996, the price will be only $40.00. Mail orders please include 10% postage and handling.

Nephi is also found in the Apocrypha in 2 Maccabees. . . it is possible that Joseph Smith was acquainted with the name from that source.”

Since there is no way to prove the conjectures set forth by Mormon scholars concerning the origin of the name Nephi, and since we have found the actual name in the Apocrypha, this should settle the issue of its origin.

It is important to note that according to the Book of Mormon, Nephi came to the New World not long after 600 B.C., which, of course, is many centuries before the word Nephi was written in the Apocrypha. The edition of the Apocrypha which we are using in this article was published in 1812 in The Holy Bible: Containing the Old and New Testaments: Together With the Apocrypha, by Merrifield and Cochran. This Bible gives a date “Before Christ 144” for the book of 2 Maccabees. Modern biblical scholars Norman L. Geisler and William E. Nix think that it was written c. 110-70 B.C. Another Bible commentary suggests that it may have been written around 50 B.C.

The Mormon Church has included a Bible Dictionary in its publication of the King James Version of the Bible. On page 611 of that dictionary we read that 2 Maccabees “is inferior to that book [i.e., 1 Maccabees] both in simplicity and in accuracy because legends are introduced with great freedom.”

In the Apocrypha the word “Nephi” appears at the end of a legend regarding a mysterious “thick water” that miraculously produced fire. According to the story, when the Jews were “led into Persia” the priests “took the fire of the altar privily, and hid it in an hollow place of a pit without water . . .” Many years later Neemias sent men “of the posterity of those that had hid it to the fire: but when they told us they found no fire, but thick water; Then commanded he them to draw it up, and to bring it; and when the sacrifices were laid on, Neemias commanded the priests to sprinkle the wood, and the things laid thereupon, with the water. When this was done, and the time came that the sun shone, which afore was hid in the cloud, there was a great fire kindled, so that every man marvelled” (2 Maccabees 1:19-22).

The Apocrypha goes on to reveal that “when the sacrifice was consumed, Neemias commanded the water that was left to be poured on the great stones. When this was done there was kindled a flame: but it was consumed by the light that shined from the altar” (verses 31-32).

At the conclusion of this story we find the following:

Then the king, inclosing the place, made it holy, after he had tried the matter.

And the king took many gifts, and bestowed thereof on those whom he would gratify.

And Neemias called this thing Naphthar, which is as much as to say, A cleansing: but many men call it Nephi.

(2 Maccabees 1:34-36)

With regard to the statement that a fire was kindled on some stones, it is interesting to note that in the very first chapter of the Book of Mormon, verse 6, we read that Nephi’s father, Lehi, had a revelation in which fire appeared on a rock:

. . . as he prayed unto the Lord, there came a pillar of fire and dwelt upon a rock . . .

Notice how similar this is to a statement in 2 Maccabees 2:10:

. . . as when Moses prayed unto the Lord the fire came down. . .
Our computer research of the Bible does not reveal any wording that is as close to this portion of the Book of Mormon as the Apocrypha. In addition, as we have shown above, in one case where Neemias was present, the sacred water kindled a fire upon “stones” (2 Maccabees 1: 31-32). Interestingly, the fire Nephi’s father saw was “upon a rock” (1 Nephi 1:6). It should also be noted that in the next chapter (1 Nephi 2:7) we read that Lehi “built an altar of stones, and made an offering unto the Lord . . .” The evidence clearly points toward plagiarism from the Apocrypha.

WRITTEN IN EGYPTIAN?

The first few chapters of the Apocrypha, 2 Maccabees, seem to have provided some important structural material for Joseph Smith’s Book of Mormon. For example, in the very first chapter of the Book of Mormon, verse 2, Nephi makes the startling announcement that although he and his family were Jews, he was not going to make his record in the Hebrew language, but rather in “the language of the Egyptians.” Moreover, Nephi also claimed that a man named Laban, who lived in Jerusalem, had already made a copy of the Old Testament written in Egyptian on Plates of Brass. Since the Bible makes it clear that the Jews had once lived in Egypt and had been made slaves while they were there, they despised the Egyptians. Consequently, faithful Jews certainly would not want their sacred scriptures to be written in that language.

Even J. N. Washburn, a dedicated defender of the Book of Mormon, acknowledged that the claim that the Egyptian language was used presented a real problem:

The point at issue is not that Father Lehi, the Jew, could read and understand Egyptian, though that is surprising enough . . .

No, the big question is how the scripture of the Jews (official or otherwise) came to be written in Egyptian. It is hardly enough to say that the Jews had a long and intimate association with Egypt. That was long before the days of most Hebrew scriptures. Nor does it help very much to remind ourselves that probably the Egyptian characters require less space than the Hebrew, since we have little knowledge of other Hebrew sacred writings preserved in that language . . .

If I were to suggest what I think to be the most insistent problem for Book-of-Mormon scholarship, I should unquestionably name this one: account for the Egyptian language on the Plates of Brass, and the Brass Plates themselves! (The Contents, Structure and Authorship of the Book of Mormon, page 81)

Joseph Smith was apparently oblivious to the problem he created when he spoke of the sacred records being written in the Egyptian language. We believe that it is likely that the Apocrypha played a role in bringing Smith to the decision that the Book of Mormon should be written in Egyptian. It seems significant that the very first verse found in 2 Maccabees mentions the Jews in Egypt, and that the second verse in the Book of Mormon speaks “of the learning of the Jews and the language of the Egyptians.”

In the text of 2 Maccabees we find this statement: “The brethren, the Jews that be at Jerusalem, and in the land of Judea, wish unto the brethren the Jews that are throughout Egypt, health and peace” (2 Maccabees 1:1). In verse 10 of the same chapter we read: “. . . the people that were at Jerusalem . . . sent greeting . . . to the Jews that were in Egypt.”

In a “word for word reprint” of the original 1611 King James printing of the Apocrypha, and in the 1812 edition we are using, there is an introduction to the first chapter of 2 Maccabees which contains this statement: “A letter from the Jews at Jerusalem to them of Egypt . . .” (In the original King James Version the word “Jews” is spelled “Iewes.”) The introductory statement is interesting because the four-word phrase “the Jews at Jerusalem” is found later in the Book of Mormon, 4 Nephi 1:31. Although this phrase is found once in the New Testament, it never appears in the Old Testament.

These statements concerning correspondence between the Jews in Jerusalem and the Jews in Egypt could have caused Joseph Smith to think about the Egyptian language. Smith may have reasoned that since there were Jews living in Egypt, they may have learned the Egyptian language. This, in turn, could have led him to believe that these Jews actually wrote the sacred scriptures in that language.

Other factors, which we will not take the time to discuss here, could also have played a part in Smith’s claim that the Book of Mormon was written in Egyptian. In any case, since the Jews already spoke the Hebrew language, to have them write the Book of Mormon in the Egyptian language would be about as unparalleled as for the present prophet of the Mormon Church to order that future printings of the Book of Mormon should be in the Chinese language.

Even the prophet Moroni lamented that “if we could have written in Hebrew, behold ye would have had no imperfection in our record” (Mormon 9:33).

Mormon scholar Dr. Hugh Nibley maintained that the writing found in the Book of Mormon was derived from the Egyptian script known as demotic. He acknowledged, however, that demotic is “the most awkward, difficult, and impractical system of writing ever devised by man!” (Lehi in the Desert and the World of the Jaredites, 1952, page 16).

RECORDS & ABRIDGMENTS

In the very first verse in the Book of Mormon, the prophet Nephi claimed that he was going to “make a record of my proceedings in my days.” This is interesting because in the first verse in the second chapter of 2 Maccabees, we read: “It is also found in the records, that Jeremy the prophet commanded them that were carried away to take of the fire . . .”

In 1 Nephi 13:40 we find the words “in the records.” A parallel is found to this in 2 Maccabees 2:1, where we find the words: “in the records.” This three-word parallel is never found in the Old or New Testament of the King James Bible.

In the second chapter of 2 Maccabees we read concerning the abridgment or condensation of five books into one:

All these things, I say being declared by Jason of Cyrene in five books, we will assay to abridge in one volume... to us that have taken upon us this painful labour of abridging, it was not easy... Leaving to the author the exact handling of every particular, and labouring to follow the rules of an abridgment... But to use brevity, and avoid much labouring of the work, is to be granted to him that will make an abridgment. (2 Maccabees 2:23, 26, 28, 31)

This idea of making an abridgment seems to have had a strong influence on Joseph Smith. In the very first chapter of the Book of Mormon, 1 Nephi 1:17, Nephi wrote: "Behold I make an abridgment of the record of my father... after I have abridged the record of my father then will I make an account of mine own life."

The reader will notice that both the Apocrypha and the Book of Mormon contain the words "make an abridgment."

Joseph Smith’s title page for the Book of Mormon proclaims that it is “an account written by the hand of Mormon upon plates taken from the plates of Nephi[,] Wherefore, it is an abridgment taken from the Book of Ether also, which is a record of the people of Jared . . ." (The Words of Mormon 1:3). In The Words of Mormon 1:3, we read that Mormon “made an abridgment from the plates of Nephi . . . " In Mormon 5:9, we find these words: "... I write a small abridgment, daring not to give a full account of the things which I have seen . . ." Moroni, his son also wrote an abridgment: “Now I, Moroni, after having made an end of abridging the account of the people of Jared, I had supposed not to have written more . . ." (The Book of Moroni 1:1).

It would seem, then, that the Apocrypha created a real interest in abridgments in the mind of Joseph Smith and that he became rather obsessed with the idea of making abridgments. Significantly, the Bible never uses the words abridge, abridged, abridging nor abridgment.

We noted above that the Book of Mormon speaks of the Hebrew scriptures being translated into the Egyptian language and engraved on plates of brass. This is mentioned in 1 Nephi 3:3: “For behold, Laban hath the record of the Jews and also a genealogy of my forefathers upon plates of brass.” It is likely that this idea also came from the Apocrypha. In the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus 50:3, we read of “plates of brass.” Although those particular plates may not have had writing upon them, in 1 Maccabees 8:22 the following appears: “And this is the copy of the epistle which the senate wrote back again in tables of brass, and sent to Jerusalem . . .” (verses 18-19, 27)

Chapter 14 of 1 Maccabees we find the following:

They wrote unto him, in tables of brass, to renew the friendship and league which they had made with Judas and Jonathan his brethren: Which writings were read before the congregation at Jerusalem. . . So then they wrote it in tables of brass, which they set upon pillars in mount Sion. . .” (verses 18-19, 27)

THE TREASURY OF LABAN

In 1 Nephi 3:2-5, we are told that after Lehi left Jerusalem he “dreamed a dream,” in which the Lord told him that Nephi and his brethren must return and obtain the “plates of brass” from an evil man named Laban. Unfortunately, Laban thwarted the plan and would not allow Nephi and his brethren to take the plates which were stored in “the treasury of Laban” (1 Nephi 4:20). Since these plates contained the sacred scriptures and important genealogical information, they were a very valuable treasure. As it turned out Nephi had to kill Laban and kidnap one of Laban’s servants so that he could take the plates from his treasury (1 Nephi 4:18, 31).

Interestingly, 2 Maccabees, chapter 3, contains a story about a treasury and an attempt to plunder its contents. A man named Apollonius was told “that the treasury in Jerusalem was full of infinite sums of money . . .” (verse 6). Apollonius, in turn, told a certain king, who did not respect the wishes of the Jewish people, about the money. This “king chose out Heliodorus his treasurer, and sent him with a commandment to bring him the foresaid money” (verse 7). The people of Jerusalem were very opposed to the plundering of the treasury and “called upon the Almighty Lord, to keep the things of trust safe and sure . . .” (verse 22).

In spite of the pleas, Heliodorus executed that which was decreed. Now, as he was there present himself with his guard about the treasury, the Lord of spirits, and the Prince of all power, caused a great apparition, so that all that presumed to come in with him were astonished at the power of God, and fainted, and were sore afraid. . . And Heliodorus fell suddenly unto the ground, and was compassed with great darkness . . . Thus him that lately came with a great train, and with all his guard, into the said treasury, they carried out . . . Then straightforward certain of Heliodorus’ friends prayed Onias that he would call upon the most High to grant him his life, who lay ready to give up the ghost. (2 Maccabees, 3:23-24, 27-28, 31)

The story of Heliodorus trying to plunder the treasury begins in the third chapter of 2 Maccabees and the account of Nephi getting the plates of brass out of Laban’s treasury also begins in the third chapter of the current edition of the Book of Mormon (the chapters in the 1830 edition of the Book of Mormon were much larger). In any case, both stories are approximately the same distance into the text.

There are enough similarities between the two stories to make one believe that Joseph Smith was borrowing from the Apocrypha. Those who take a careful look at the two narratives will notice that in both cases it is the followers of the God of Israel who finally prevail.

Nephi and his brothers made two unsuccessful attempts to obtain the plates but both times Laban threatened them with death and drove them away. On the second attempt Laban took their gold and silver and precious things (1 Nephi 3:24-26).

In spite of these problems, one night Nephi “crept into the city and went forth towards the house of Laban.” As he came near the house of Laban he “beheld a man, and he had fallen to the earth before me . . .” (1 Nephi 4:7). This, of course, resembles 2 Maccabees 3:27, where we were told that “Heliodorus fell suddenly unto the ground . . .” In both cases God was responsible for their fall. While Heliodorus saw “a great apparition,” Laban fell because he “was drunken with wine.” According to 1 Nephi 4:10-11, God had planned that Laban would fall so that Nephi could kill him: “And it came to pass that I was constrained by the Spirit that I should kill Laban . . . And the Spirit said unto me again: Behold the Lord hath delivered him into thy hands.”

Consequently, Nephi claimed that he “took Laban by the hair of the head, and I smote off his head with his own sword” (verse 18). Even though this would seem to have created a rather bloody mess, Nephi said that “after I had smitten off his head . . . I took the garments of Laban and put them upon mine own body; yea, even every whit; and I did gird on his armor about my loins” (verse 19).

Nephi then proceeded “unto the treasury of Laban.” On the way he “saw the servant of Laban who had the keys of the treasury. And I commanded him in the voice of Laban that he should go with me into the treasury. And he supposed me to be his master, Laban, for he beheld the garments and also the sword girded about my loins. . . . And I spake unto him as if it had been Laban. And I also spake unto him that I should carry the engravings, which were upon the plates of brass, to my elder brethren, who were without the walls. . . . And it came to pass that when the servant of Laban beheld my brethren he began to tremble . . . And now I, Nephi, being a man large in stature . . . therefore I did seize upon the servant of Laban, and held him, that he should not flee. And it came to pass that I spake with him . . . that if he would hearken unto our words, we would spare his life. . . . And it came to pass that we took the plates of brass and the servant of Laban, and departed into the wilderness, and journeyed unto the tent of our father” (1 Nephi 4:21, 23-24, 30-32, 38).

The reader will notice that in the quotation given above Nephi used the words “of the treasury.” While this three-word phrase is never found in the King James Bible, it does appear in 2 Maccabees 3:40:

A person might wonder what caused Joseph Smith to link the plates of brass with a treasury. The answer may be found in 1 Maccabees 14:48-49:

So they commanded that this writing should be put in tables of brass, and that they should be set up within the compass of the sanctuary in a conspicuous place; Also that the copies thereof should be laid up in the treasury, to the end that Simon and his sons might have them.

While this reference does not specifically state what the “copies” were written on, the original was written on brass plates, and this certainly could have led Joseph Smith to write a story concerning plates of brass in the treasury of Laban. Interestingly, this reference (1 Maccabees 14:48-49) is found only about two pages before the book of 2 Maccabees, which contains the story of Heliodorus’s attempt to plunder the treasury in Jerusalem.

It would appear, then, that Joseph Smith borrowed from both First Maccabees and Second Maccabees in creating this tale. The reader will notice, however, that Smith has turned the story around somewhat. While the Apocrypha has an ungodly man failing in his attempt to plunder the treasury at Jerusalem, the Book of Mormon states that it was a servant of God who tricked Laban’s servant into allowing him to take the “plates of brass” from the treasury. Significantly, in both stories it is the ungodly who are brought to the ground—one is beheaded and the other “lay ready to give up the ghost.” It really comes as no surprise that in both cases the godly prevailed against the wicked.

BORROWING FROM JUDITH?

It is hard to escape the conclusion that Joseph Smith borrowed from the books of First and Second Maccabees in creating his story about Laban. In addition, it appears that he also took material from the book of Judith—the fourth book in the Apocrypha. In the Illustrated Davis Dictionary of the Bible, page 44, we find this comment about the book of Judith:

The narrative contains misstatements, anachronisms, and geographical absurdities. It is doubtful if there is any truth in the story . . . it may have existed as early as 175 to 100 B.C., say four or six hundred years after the event it professed to record. By that time to say that Nabuchodonosor, apparently Nebuchadnezzar, reigned in Nineveh, instead of Babylon (Judith i. 1), would not look so erroneous as it would to a contemporary of the great king.

In this tale a woman by the name of Judith is a heroine who saves Israel from Holofernes the chief captain of king Nabuchodonosor’s army.

As we have shown in our book, Covering up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, pages 14-15, Joseph Smith downplayed the role of women in his Book of Mormon. Although the Book of Mormon sometimes refers to women mentioned in the Bible, it contains the names of only three Nephit, Lamanite or Jaredite women. While Smith had very little to say about women in the Book of Mormon, it appears that he was very interested in the story of Judith. Since he did not want the hero of the tale to be a woman, he apparently decided to attribute material written about Judith to Nephi.

As we indicated above, Laban was a very wicked man. While the name Laban is found in the Bible, it is interesting to note that right in an important part of the story of Judith she mentions the name “Laban” (see Judith 9:26). This, of course, could have suggested the name to Joseph Smith.

In any case, there are a number of other important parallels between Judith and the story of Nephi.

A LIST OF PARALLELS

In view of the evidence it seems obvious that Joseph Smith read at least portions of the Apocrypha before writing the book of First Nephi. He was apparently familiar with the book of Judith and both First and Second Maccabees. From these three books he absorbed portions that he combined into one story in the Book of Mormon. Below are thirty-two interesting parallels between material found in the three books of the Apocrypha and the Book of Mormon. While these parallels contain a good deal of material not mentioned above, there is also some repetition. Those who really want to understand how strong the case of plagiarism is should take the time to carefully read all thirty-two of the parallels below.

The reader will notice that in the study that follows we refer to the Book of Mormon by the three letters BOM, and the word Apocrypha is abbreviated to APO.
1. As noted above, both the book of Nephi and the book of 2 Maccabees use the word “Nephi” in their opening chapter.

   BOM: Nephi (1 Nephi 1:1)
   APO: Nephi (2 Maccabees 1:36)

2. There is, in fact, a significant parallel in wording between 2 Maccabees and the Book of Mormon in that both books use the words “the place” and “call it Nephi.”

   BOM: And my people would that we should call the name of the place Nephi; wherefore, we did call it Nephi. (2 Nephi 5:8)
   APO: Then the king, inclosing the place, made it holy . . . many men call it Nephi. (2 Maccabees 1:34, 36)

3. As pointed out above, the name “Laban” occurs in both Judith and the Book of Mormon.

   BOM: Laban hath the record (1 Nephi 3:3)
   APO: Laban his mother’s brother (Judith 8:26)

4. Both Nephi and Judith were very devout servants of the Lord.

   BOM: Nephi . . . was favored of the Lord (Mosiah 10:13)
   APO: she feared God greatly (Judith 8:8)

5. Both stories speak of a wicked man who wanted to destroy God’s people.

   BOM: Laban . . . sent his servants to slay us (1 Nephi 3:25)
   APO: The next day Holôfernes commanded all his army . . . to make war against the children of Israel. (Judith 7:1)

6. In both cases the people were in great fear.

   BOM: Laban . . . is a mighty man, and he can command fifty, yea, even he can slay fifty; then why not us? (1 Nephi 3:31)
   APO: God hath sold us into their hands, that we should be thrown down before them with thirst, and great destruction. (Judith 7:25)

7. Both Nephi and Judith counseled their associates to be strong.

   BOM: Therefore let us go up; let us be strong like unto Moses (1 Nephi 4:2)
   APO: Now, therefore, O brethren, let us shew an example to our brethren (Judith 8:24)

8. Both claimed that God’s strength did not depend upon numbers.

   BOM: the Lord . . . is mightier than all the earth, then why not mightier than Laban and his fifty (1 Nephi 4:1)
   APO: For thy power standeth not in multitude, nor thy might in strong men . . . a saviour of them that are without hope. (Judith 9:11)

9. Both Nephi and his brethren and Judith and her maid went on a secret mission for the Lord.

   BOM: we came without the walls of Jerusalem. And it was by night; and I caused that they should hide themselves without the walls . . . I Nephi, crept into the city and went forth towards the house of Laban. (1 Nephi 4:4-5)
   APO: Thus they went forth to the gate of the city of Bethulia . . . the men of the city looked after her, until she was gone down the mountain, and till she had passed the valley, and could see her no more. (Judith 10:6, 10)

10. In both cases the wicked man was delivered into the hands of the servant of the Lord.

    BOM: I beheld a man, and he had fallen to the earth before me (1 Nephi 4:7)
    APO: And Judith was left alone in the tent, and Holôfernes lying along upon his bed (Judith 13:2)

11. In both cases the wicked man was drunk.

    BOM: he was drunken with wine (1 Nephi 4:7)
    APO: he was filled with wine (Judith 13:2)

12. In both cases the servant of the Lord took hold of the wicked man’s weapon.

    BOM: took Laban by the hair of the head (1 Nephi 4:18)
    APO: took hold of the hair of his head (Judith 13:7)

13. In both cases the servant of the Lord took hold of the wicked man’s hair.

    BOM: and I smote off his head with his own sword (1 Nephi 4:18)
    APO: she . . . took down his fauchion from thence (Judith 13:6)

14. In both cases the wicked man’s head was cut off with his own weapon.

    BOM: and I smote off his head with his own sword (1 Nephi 4:18)
    APO: And she smote twice upon his neck . . . and she took away his head from him (Judith 13:8)

15. In both cases the servant of the Lord returned to those who were waiting without being caught.

    BOM: I went forth unto my brethren, who were without the walls (1 Nephi 4:27)
    APO: Now, when the men of her city heard her voice, they made haste to go down to the gate of their city (Judith 13:12)

16. Both Nephi and Judith made off with some of the wicked man’s possessions.

    BOM: I took the garments of Laban and put them upon mine own body; yea, even every whit; and I did gird on my armor about my loins. . . . we took the plates of brass and the servant of Laban, and departed into the wilderness (1 Nephi 4:19, 38)
    APO: they gave unto Judith Holôfernes’ tent, and all his plate, and beds, and vessels, and all his stuff (Judith 15:11)

17. When the people learned of the success of the mission they rejoiced.

    BOM: they did rejoice exceedingly (1 Nephi 5:9)
    APO: the people shouted with a loud voice, and made a joyful noise in their city (Judith 14:9)
18. In both cases the people offered burnt offerings to the Lord.

BOM: they did . . . offer sacrifice and burnt offerings
(1 Nephi 5:9)

APO: they offered their burnt-offerings (Judith 16:18)

19. Both Nephi and Judith use a similar expression.

BOM: his tens of thousands (1 Nephi 4:1)

APO: he came with ten thousand (Judith 16:4)

20. Nephi was raised in a house in Jerusalem, but before he killed Laban, his father took the family into the wilderness and they lived in tents. Judith also lived in a house. After her husband’s death, however, she made a tent which she put on top of her house. Later she cut off Holofernes’ head in his own tent.

BOM: he [Nephi’s father] departed into the wilderness. And he left his house . . . and took nothing with him, save it were his family, and provisions, and tents . . . my father dwelt in a tent . . . (1 Nephi 4:5)

APO: So Judith was a widow in her house three years and four months. And she made her a tent upon the top of her house . . . And she fasted (Judith 8:4-6)

21. In both 1 Nephi and Judith we find the words “three days,” “valley,” and “to the tent of.”

BOM: when he had traveled three days in the wilderness, he pitched his tent in a valley . . . I, Nephi, returned . . . to the tent of my father (1 Nephi 2:6; 3:1)

APO: Thus they went straight forth in the valley; and the first watch of the Assyrians met her . . . and they brought her to the tent of Holofernes . . . she abode in the camp three days, and went out in the night into the valley (Judith 10:11, 17; 12:7)

22. In both accounts the servant of the Lord changes apparel.

BOM: I took the garments of Laban and put them upon mine own body; yea, even every whit (1 Nephi 4:20)

APO: She . . . pulled off the sackcloth which she had on, and put off the garments of her widowhood . . . her countenance was altered, and her apparel was changed (Judith 10:2-3, 7)

23. Both Nephi and Judith used trickery to obtain the desired result.

BOM: I took the garments of Laban and put them on . . . I went forth unto the treasury of Laban . . . I saw the servant of Laban who had the keys of the treasury. And I commanded him in the voice of Laban that he should go with me into the treasury. And he supposed me to be his master, Laban . . . I spake unto him as if it had been Laban. And I also spake unto him that I should carry the engravings, which were upon the plates of brass, to my elder brethren . . . And he, supposing that I spake of the brethren of the church, and that I was truly that Laban whom I had slain, wherefore he did follow me (1 Nephi 4:19-24)

APO: Then said Holofernes unto her, woman, be of good comfort . . . Judith said unto him, Receive the words of thy servant . . . and I will declare no lie to my lord this night. And if thou wilt follow the words of thine handmaid, God will bring the thing perfectly to pass by thee; and my Lord shall not fail of his purposes . . . And I will lead thee through the midst of Judea, until thou come before Jerusalem; and I will set thy throne in the midst thereof (Judith 11:1, 5-6, 19)

24. Both Laban and Holofernes were slain while others were sleeping.

BOM: And it was by night . . . I, Nephi, crept into the city and went forth towards the house of Laban (1 Nephi 4:5)

APO: Now when the evening was come, his servants made haste to depart, and Bagoas shut his tent without, and dismissed the waiters from the presence of his lord; and they went to their beds: for they were all weary, because the feast had been long. And Judith was left alone in the tent, and Holofernes lying along his bed (Judith 13:1-2)

25. Both 1 Nephi and the book of Judith contain a similar expression.

BOM: left gold and silver, and (1 Nephi 3:16)

APO: left her gold and silver, and (Judith 8:7)

26. As we mentioned above, the very first verse found in 2 Maccabees mentions the Jews in Egypt. The second verse in the Book of Mormon contains Nephi’s incredible statement that the book would be written in the Egyptian language. The letter mentioned in the Apocrypha may have led Joseph Smith to conclude that it would be acceptable to claim his book of sacred scriptures was written in Egyptian.

BOM: I make a record in the language of my father, which consists of the learning of the Jews and the language of the Egyptians (1 Nephi 1:2)

APO: The brethren, the Jews that be at Jerusalem, and in the land of Judea, wish unto the brethren the Jews that are throughout Egypt, health and peace. (2 Maccabees 1:1)

27. We have also mentioned that the introduction to the first chapter of 2 Maccabees contains a four-word phrase which is also found in the Book of Mormon.

BOM: the Jews at Jerusalem (4 Nephi 1:31)

APO: the Jews at Jerusalem (Introductory statement at the start of 2 Maccabees)

28. In the second verse of the Book of Mormon Nephi says that he is going to make a “record.” 2 Maccabees 2:1 speaks of some “records” which told of a commandment given by Jeremy the prophet. A three-word parallel is found later in 1 Nephi.

BOM: in the records (1 Nephi 13:40)

APO: in the records (2 Maccabees 2:1)

29. In the very first chapter of the Book of Mormon, Nephi says he is going to make an abridgment of his record. This is suspiciously like a portion of 2 Maccabees. There is an interesting three-word parallel in the two accounts.

BOM: make an abridgment. (1 Nephi 1:17)

APO: make an abridgment. (2 Maccabees 2:31)
30. Both 1 Nephi and 1 Maccabees refer to a “treasury,” plates or tables “of brass,” and use the word “commanded.”

BOM: I went forth unto the treasury of Laban... I saw the servant of Laban... And I commanded him... that he should go with me into the treasury. I also spake unto him that I should carry the engravings which were upon the plates of brass, to my elder brethren (1 Nephi 1:20, 24)

APO: So they commanded that this writing should be put in tables of brass, and that they should be set... in a conspicuous place. Also that the copies thereof should be laid up in the treasury, to the end that Simon and his sons might have them. (1 Maccabees 14:48-49)

31. The reader will remember that 2 Maccabees, chapter 3, contains a story about the “treasury in Jerusalem” and Heliodorus’ attempt to plunder its contents. Laban’s treasury was also in Jerusalem. Both Nephi and Heliodorus had to travel to Jerusalem in their attempt to obtain access to the treasury.

BOM: I spake unto my brethren, saying: Let us go up again unto Jerusalem... I Nephi, crept into the city and went forth towards the house of Laban (1 Nephi 4:1, 5)

APO: the king chose out Heliodorus... and sent him with a commandment to bring him the foresaid money. So forthwith Heliodorus took his journey... And when he was come to Jerusalem, and had been courteously received of the high priest... he declared wherefore he came (2 Maccabees 3:7-9)

32. Both Laban and Heliodorus were brought to the ground so they could not thwart the work of the Lord.

BOM: as I came near unto the house of Laban I beheld a man, and he had fallen to the earth before me... And when I came to him I found that it was Laban (1 Nephi 4:7-8)

APO: And Heliodorus fell suddenly unto the ground, and was compassed with great darkness (2 Maccabees 3:27)

LIKE SALAMANDER LETTER

Interestingly, twenty-eight of the thirty-two parallels to the Apocrypha are found in the first five chapters of the Book of Mormon. It will be very difficult for Mormon scholars to explain this extraordinary cluster of similarities. It seems obvious that the only answer to these remarkable parallels is that Joseph Smith borrowed from the Apocrypha in creating his Book of Mormon.

The way that Joseph Smith plagiarized portions of the Apocrypha and incorporated them into the Book of Mormon bears a remarkable resemblance to the work of the notorious Mormon forger Mark Hofmann (see our book, Tracking the White Salamander). Hofmann fooled the Mormon officials to his Book of Mormon. In this letter Harris was supposed to have written that when Joseph Smith went to get the gold plates for the Book of Mormon, a “white salamander” in the bottom of the hole “transfigured himself” into a “spirit” and “struck me 3 times.” This was in stark contrast with Joseph Smith’s story that an angel from heaven revealed the plates to him.

Mormon scholars accepted this letter as authentic. The Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies (FARMS), an organization that is allowed to use “office space” and “campus facilities” at the church’s Brigham Young University, strongly supported the authenticity of the Salamander letter.

We found the Salamander letter to be a very perplexing document. When we were first told about the contents of the letter in November, 1983, we realized that it could deal a devastating blow to the Mormon Church. We had previously written a book entitled, Mormonism, Magic and Masonry, in which we presented strong evidence that Joseph Smith was involved in money-digging and magic. Martin Harris’s letter seemed to provide new and important evidence supporting our thesis.

Fortunately, we were able to obtain some revealing extracts from the letter and were preparing to print them in the March 1984 issue of the Messenger. We were very excited that we at Utah Lighthouse Ministry would be the first to break this important story to the world. While in the midst of marshaling evidence to support the authenticity of the Salamander letter, we made a discovery that shook us to the very core. We discovered that the account of the transformation of the white salamander into the spirit was remarkably similar to a statement E. D. Howe published in the book, Mormonism Unvailed. This book, written four years after the date which appears in the Harris letter, told of a toad “which immediately transformed itself into a spirit” and struck Joseph Smith. Even more disconcerting, however, was the fact that other remarkable parallels to the Salamander letter were found two or three pages from the account of the transformation of the toad into a spirit in Howe’s book (see Mormonism Unvailed, pages 273, 275-276).

While our original plan was to use the Salamander letter as evidence against Joseph Smith’s work, the evidence of plagiarism was so clear that we felt it was important to publish the material we had discovered. We pointed out some of the serious problems with the letter in the March, 1984, issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger and then made this statement: “While we would really like to believe that the letter attributed to Harris is authentic, we do not feel that we can endorse it until further evidence comes forth.”

After that we published a number of newsletters questioning Hofmann’s documents. The Mormon Church’s newspaper, Deseret News, for September 1, 1984, reported that “outspoken Mormon Church critics Jerald and Sandra Tanner suspect the document is a forgery, they told the Deseret News. Jerald Tanner... says similarities between it and other documents make its veracity doubtful.”

In an article published in the New York Times, Robert Lindsey wrote the following after he learned that investigators suspected the Hofmann documents were forgeries: “In a newsletter that he publishes with his wife, Sandra, Mr. Tanner began raising questions about their authenticity, in some cases comparing the texts with known Mormon writings. But issue 89 Salt Lake City Messenger

If senior Mormon officials were aware of his warnings, they apparently paid little attention. Several of the church's highest officials have acknowledged negotiating to acquire documents from Mr. Hofmann until the day of the first two bombings. (New York Times, Feb. 16, 1986)

When Mark Hofmann finally confessed that the Salamander letter was a forgery, he admitted that we were right in saying that he plagiarized from E. D. Howe's book in creating the document. The following is taken from Hofmann's confession:

Q: Now the white salamander, you were going to explain that?
A: I was going to say that the idea for the White Salamander derived from the toad in A. [sic] D. Howe's book. Salamander, from my reading of folk magic, seemed more appropriate than a toad. (Hofmann's Confession, 1987, page 440)

While the FBI's examination of the Salamander letter revealed nothing wrong with the document, two document experts were eventually able to produce convincing evidence that it was forged.

A member of the Salt Lake County attorney's office asked one of the editors of this newsletter (Jerald) if he would testify for the prosecution regarding documents at Hofmann's trial. As it turned out, however, after the preliminary hearing Mark Hofmann plead guilty to murder and forgery and the case never came to trial.

As noted above, the method Mark Hofmann used to create his Salamander letter is strikingly like Joseph Smith's use of material from the Apocrypha in his Book of Mormon. In both cases, material was taken from another book that was readily accessible to the plagiarist, and in both cases the author was careful to change the sources extracted just enough so that it would be difficult for the reader to discern the origin of the information.

In both cases the most revealing evidence is the clustering of similarities. In Hofmann's case we find that he borrowed important information from pages 273 and 276 of E. D. Howe's Mormonism Unveiled. He also plagiarized from a number of other pages in the same book (see our book, Tracking the White Salamander, page 7, for other sources he used in creating his forgery). Material drawn from a number of different pages of Howe's book (as well as other books) all comes together in the Salamander letter.

Joseph Smith also plagiarized from a number of pages in the Apocrypha. As noted above, a very significant cluster of structural material appears to have been taken from 1 Maccabees chapter 14 and 2 Maccabees, chapters 1 through 3. This material was incorporated into the first few chapters of the Book of Mormon. Like Hofmann, Joseph Smith also borrowed other material from the source he was using—i.e., the Apocrypha.

Interestingly, the Apocrypha contained in Protestant Bibles is not a very large collection of material when compared with the Old and New Testaments. While the old Bible we are using contains approximately 950 pages, the Apocrypha takes up less than 150 of those pages.

Although we have not had the time to make a thorough study of the relationship between the Apocrypha and the Book of Mormon, we feel that it is possible that other material or phrases from that collection of material may have been used by Joseph Smith. We did find what appears to be a significant number of parallels in wording between the early chapters of the book of Mosiah and the Apocrypha. This, however, was only a cursory examination. The book of Alma also had a number of interesting similarities.

WAS IT A COINCIDENCE?

There is another intriguing similarity between the Apocrypha and the Book of Mormon which could be significant. In the very first book of the Apocrypha, 1 Esdras, we find a date printed at the side of the first page which indicates that the narrative related began "Before Christ 623."

Surprisingly, this places the account within the very period when Lehi lived at Jerusalem, which was not long before the destruction of that city. Since Joseph Smith used a good deal of material from the Apocrypha in the first few chapters of the Book of Mormon, one might ask the question as to whether 1 Esdras influenced his decision regarding the time frame he utilized to bring Lehi's people to the New World. We do know that 1 Esdras 8:2 speaks of a man named Ezias, and as we will show below, the same name appears in the Book of Mormon.

The heading for the first chapter of 1 Esdras, speaks of king Zedechias (spelled Zedekiah in the Old Testament). It refers to Josias and "his successors unto Zedechias, when Jerusalem &c. was destroyed." On the very first page of the Book of Mormon, 1 Nephi 1:4, Nephi relates that "in the commencement of the first year of the reign of Zedekiah . . . there came many prophets, prophesying unto the people that they must repent, or the great city Jerusalem must be destroyed."

Although Lehi's group left Jerusalem just before the destruction of the city, Lehi claimed he had a vision in which he learned that "Jerusalem is destroyed" (2 Nephi 1:4). Later on in the Book of Mormon there is another statement regarding the destruction of Jerusalem: "... and now we know that Jerusalem was destroyed . . . . " (Helaman 8:20). The reader will notice how close this wording is to that found in the heading to the first chapter of the apocryphal book of 1 Esdras: "Jerusalem &c. was destroyed."

It certainly seems possible that the book of 1 Esdras may have given Joseph Smith some historical background which he could use for his story concerning Lehi's flight from the Old World. Nevertheless, if the Apocrypha provided the original spark for this idea, the Mormon prophet undoubtedly went to the Old Testament to get the King James spelling for the names he used. Furthermore, it is likely that he may have read somewhat concerning Jeremiah in the Old Testament. In his Book of Mormon Smith used the phrase "of the reign of Zedekiah, king of Judah," and this same wording is found in the book of Jeremiah 28:1.

We have already mentioned the spelling difference between Zedechias and Zedekiah. It should also be mentioned that Jeremiah is spelled Jeremy in the Apocrypha. The reader may remember that 2 Maccabees also spoke of the prophet Jeremy. While this spelling is not used in the Old Testament, the prophet Jeremiah is referred to twice as Jeremy in the New Testament (see Matthew 2:17, 27:9).
It is interesting to note that while Joseph Smith did not use the name “Jeremy” in the Book of Mormon itself, in September, 1832, he gave a revelation in which he incorporated that name into a revelation concerning priesthood: “. . . And Elihu [received the priesthood] under the hand of Jeremy; And Jeremy under the hand of Gad . . .” (Doctrine and Covenants 84:9-10). The Mormon Church’s Bible Dictionary contains this notation: “There was another Jeremy who lived near to the time of Abraham, and who held the Melchizedek Priesthood. Nothing more is known of him today.” Joseph Smith may have extracted this name from the Apocrypha or from the book of Matthew. In any case, we have been unable to find anything regarding a “Jeremy” who lived close to the time of Abraham.

However this may be, in the Apocrypha we find both Zedechias (Zedekiah) and Jeremy (Jeremiah) mentioned in the first two chapters of 1 Esdras:

So after a year Nabuchodonosor . . . made Zedechias king of Judea and Jerusalem . . . And he did evil . . . and cared not for the words that were spoken unto him by the prophet Jeremy from the mouth of the Lord . . . And after that king Nabuchodonosor had made him to swear by the name of the Lord he forswore himself, and rebelled . . . he transgressed the laws of the Lord God of Israel . . .

Nevertheless the God of their fathers sent by his messengers to call them back . . . But they had his messengers in derision . . . they made a sport of his prophets; So far forth, that he, being wroth with his people for their great ungodliness, commanded the kings of the Chaldees to come up against them; Who slew their young men . . . and spared neither young man nor maid . . .

As for the house of the Lord, they burnt it, brake down the walls of Jerusalem . . . and the people that were not slain with the sword he carried into Babylon; Who became servants to him and his children, till the Persians reigned, to fulfill the word of the Lord spoken by the mouth of Jeremy . . .

In the first year of Cyrus king of the Persians, that the word of the Lord might be accomplished, that he had promised by the mouth of Jeremy, The Lord raised up the spirit of Cyrus the king of the Persians, and he made proclamation . . . Saying, Thus saith Cyrus . . . The Lord of Israel, the most high Lord, hath made me king of the whole world, And commanded me to build him an house at Jerusalem . . . If therefore there be any of you that are of his people . . . let him go up to Jerusalem . . . and build the house of the Lord of Israel . . .” (1 Esdras 1:45-48, 50-53, 55-57; 2:1-5)

We have already noted that the name Ezias, comes from the Apocrypha, 1 Esdras 8:2. While at first glance this may not seem too significant, it is, in fact, extremely important because the name appears in a verse in the Book of Mormon which mentions both the prophet Jeremiah and the fact that “Jerusalem was destroyed”:

And behold, also Zenock, and also Ezias, and also Isaiah, and Jeremiah, (Jeremiah being that same prophet who testified of the destruction of Jerusalem) and now we know that Jerusalem was destroyed according to the words of Jeremiah. O then why not the Son of God come, according to his prophecy? (Helaman 8:20)

Since the name Ezias is only found one time in the entire Book of Mormon, it seems remarkable that it appears in a section of the Book of Mormon which contains information about Jeremiah and the fall of Jerusalem. The most reasonable explanation seems to be that as Joseph Smith was reading from the Apocrypha (1 Esdras) concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, he continued to read or browse until he encountered the name Ezias in the second verse of chapter eight. For some reason he liked the name and decided to include it in his own book. While the Apocrypha gives no information about Ezias, Joseph Smith elevated him to the position of an important prophet who spoke in Old Testament times. Interestingly, this name does not appear anywhere in the Old or New Testament!

It is also possible that Joseph Smith’s curiosity concerning the Apocrypha led him to make a theological mistake regarding Jesus Christ. While many of the ancient Israelis believed that the Messiah would come, neither the name “Jesus” nor the title “Christ” can be found anywhere in the Old Testament. It was not until just before the birth of Christ that the angel announced that Mary’s baby would be called Jesus (Matthew 1:21).

Joseph Smith, however, came to believe that the Savior was referred to as “Jesus Christ” even during the time when Adam was on the earth. In Smith’s Book of Moses we read: “And he [God] called upon our father Adam by his own voice, saying: I am God . . . he also said unto him: If thou wilt turn unto me . . . and repent of all thy transgressions, and be baptized, even in water, in the name of mine Only Begotten Son, who is full of grace and truth, which is Jesus Christ . . . ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost . . .” (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Moses 6:51-52).

Joseph Smith’s mistaken idea may have come from reading in the Apocrypha, 2 Esdras 7:28-29:

For my son Jesus shall be revealed with those that be with him, and they that remain shall rejoice within four hundred years. After these years shall my Son Christ die, and all men that have life.

In the Book of Mormon the prophet Nephi wrote the following:

For according to the words of the prophets, the Messiah cometh in six hundred years from the time that my father left Jerusalem . . . his name shall be Jesus Christ, the Son of God. (2 Nephi 25:19)

It seems likely that when Joseph Smith wrote the Book of Mormon he blindly followed the idea set forth in the Apocrypha of revealing Jesus’s name before it was actually made known to the world. Since the story in 2 Esdras purports to take place about 400 years before the time of Christ, Joseph Smith apparently assumed that this dating was accurate. This, of course, was a very serious mistake which apparently led Smith into the mistaken notion that centuries before Christ people were accustomed to hearing the words “Jesus Christ” used by followers of the Lord. In reality, however, this was not the case.

The evidence seems to suggest that 2 Esdras was actually written after the time of Christ. In the Illustrated Davis Dictionary of the Bible, page 43, we read: “2 ES’DRAS. This is in quite a different style from 1 Esdras. . . a date from about A.D. 88 to about A.D. 117, is generally accepted.” This, of course, would be well after the death and resurrection of Jesus.

Although, the Mormon Church’s own Bible Dictionary does not attempt to give a date, it does say that “Many scholars feel that book was composed in the first century A.D.” (page 610). Even if it could be established that the book was written earlier, Bible scholars have noted that it has interpolations taken from New Testament scriptures. Consequently, 2 Esdras is a very poor book to rely upon to try to prove that people in Old Testament times used the words “Jesus Christ.”

ROBERTS AND ESDRAS

Surprisingly, B. H. Roberts, the noted Mormon historian and defender of the church, came to have serious doubts about the Book of Mormon. Roberts was one of the greatest scholars the church has ever known. He not only prepared the “Introduction And Notes” for Joseph Smith’s History of the Church (seven volumes), but he also wrote the six-volume work, A Comprehensive History of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. He is also noted for his many works supporting the Book of Mormon.

When B. H. Roberts read the book View of the Hebrews, a book written by Ethan Smith in 1825, he was shocked by the parallels he found to the Book of Mormon:

One other subject remains to be considered in this division . . . viz.—was Joseph Smith possessed of a sufficiently vivid and creative imagination as to produce such a work as the Book of Mormon from such materials as have been indicated in the preceding chapters . . . That such power of imagination would have to be of a high order is conceded; that Joseph Smith possessed such a gift of mind there can be no question . . .

In the light of this evidence, there can be no doubt as to the possession of a vividly strong, creative imagination by Joseph Smith, the Prophet, an imagination, it could with reason be urged, which, given the suggestions that are found in the “common knowledge” of accepted American antiquities of the times, supplemented by such a work as Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews, would make it possible for him to create a book such as the Book of Mormon is. (Studies of the Book of Mormon, Edited by Brigham D. Madsen, 1985, pp. 243, 250)

While reading the book, View of the Hebrews, B. H. Roberts encountered quotations taken from 2 Esdras. (This, of course, is the same apocryphal book we have been discussing.) Roberts felt that he had discovered some significant parallels between 2 Esdras, chapter 13, and the book of Ether—a work found near the end of the Book of Mormon. B. H. Roberts wrote the following about the similarities:

Both the Book of Mormon and Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews bring their people to the New World by migrations from the old. . . . Ethan Smith, accepting the general idea extant in his day that America was peopled via Bering Strait, thought it possible that “the lost tribes” of Israel might as well have come that way as any other people from Asia . . . The Book of Mormon peoples, both Jaredites and Nephites, are brought by way of the sea. In one respect, however, the migrations of the Jaredites and of Ethan Smith’s ‘lost tribes’ are strikingly similar, and the fact is mentioned in both cases in language nearly identical—both people are brought into a land “where never man dwelt.” . . . Ethan Smith, in working out his theory that the American Indians are the “ten lost tribes” of Israel, takes his account of the migration of that people from the Apocryphal book of Esdras (II Esdras 13). . . .

Let us now turn to the Book of Mormon account of the Jaredite migration to the New World. . . .

It is to be noted first of all that a consultation is had among those to whom the journey is proposed, in both cases. . . . in both cases the motive of removal was a religious one . . .

The journey in both cases was to the north. . . . In each case the journey of the two people was to be a long one. In the case of Ethan Smith’s Israelites it was “of a year and a half’s” duration. In the case of the Jaredites, it required 344 days to cross the great sea. . . . let us here be reminded that what is sought in this study is not absolute identity of incidents, and absolute parallel of conditions and circumstances all down the line; but one thing here and another there, that may suggest another but similar thing in such a way as to make one a product of the other, as in the above parallel between the journey of the Jaredites and Ethan Smith’s Israelites. Such as the motive for their journey being the same; the direction of the journey in both cases being northward; both people entering a valley at the commencement of their journey; both of them encountering many bodies of water in their journey; the journey in both cases being an immense one; and to a land, in the one case, “where never man dwelt”. . . . and in the other case, “into a quarter where there never had man been” (Ether 2:5). Where such striking parallels as these obtain, it is not unreasonable to hold that where one account precedes the other, and if the one constructing the later account has had opportunity of contact with the first account, then it is not impossible that the first account could have suggested the second; and if the points of resemblance and possible suggestion are frequent and striking, then it would have to be conceded that the first might even have supplied the ground plan of the second.

Also let it be borne in mind, that the facts and the arguments employed here are cumulative and progressive, and that we have not yet reached the end of the story. (Studies of the Book of Mormon, pages 183-186)

We believe that B. H. Roberts made an important find with regard to the relationship between the apocryphal book of 2 Esdras and the Book of Mormon. His parallel “where never mankind dwelt” (2 Esdras 13:41) with the book of Ether’s “where there never had man been” (Ether 2:5) is a remarkable discovery which is supported by addition evidence which Roberts brought forth.

A paper-back edition of Roberts’s Studies of the Book of Mormon is available from Utah Lighthouse Ministry for only $14.95 (plus shipping charge).

Our cursory examination of 2 Esdras, 13:42-56, revealed a number of interesting parallels. For example, verse 43 contains the words “by the narrow passages.” In the book of Mormon, Alma 50:34, we find the words “by the narrow pass;” and in Mormon 2:29 we read about “the narrow passage.” No parallel wording is found in the King James Bible.
A four-word parallel “and now when they” appears in 2 Esdras, 13:46, and the Book of Mormon, 1 Nephi 16:32. This phrase is not found in the Bible.

The words “sawest thou” are found in both 2 Esdras, 13:47, and the Book of Mormon, Ether 3:9. This phrase only appears in the Bible twice.

The phrase “are they that are” is not found in the Bible, but it is found in both 2 Esdras, 13:48, and the Book of Mormon, Alma 14:7.

The words “defend his people” appear in both 2 Esdras, 13:49, and the Book of Mormon, Alma 48:13, but are lacking in the Bible.

The book of 2 Esdras, 13:52, contains the words “are in the deep of the sea,” and we find the following in the Book of Mormon, Alma 3:3, “are in the depths of the sea.” There is no strong parallel to this in the Bible.

The words “diligence unto” are not in the Bible, but they are found in both 2 Esdras, 13:54, and the Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 29:4.

Verse 56 of 2 Esdras, 13, uses the phrase “thee mighty,” and these identical words are found in the Book of Mormon, Helaman 10:5. They are, however, lacking in the Bible.

It is difficult for us to believe that all of these parallels to the Book of Mormon could have occurred by accident when the same wording falls within just 14 verses of the apocryphal book of 2 Esdras.

THE BROTHER OF JARED

B. H. Roberts’s research with regard to the apocryphal book of 2 Esdras led us to seek other parallels to the book of Ether. This book was named after Ether, a Book of Mormon prophet who lived to see the destruction of the Jaredites. The main character in the book, however, was a man who brought the Jaredites from the Tower of Babel to the New World. Surprisingly, when Joseph Smith wrote the Book of Mormon, he did not give this important man a name; he was referred to simply as “the brother of Jared.” Later, however, Joseph Smith supposedly said his name was “Mahonri Moriancumer.”

In any case, both Esdras and the brother of Jared were mighty prophets who diligently prayed and received visits from the Lord. Esdras related the following: “And it came to pass . . . there came a voice out of a bush . . . and said, Esdras, Esdras! And I said, Here am I, Lord” (2 Esdras 14:1-2). In the Book of Mormon, Ether 2:4, we read: “. . . the Lord came down and talked with the brother of Jared; and he was in a cloud, and the brother of Jared saw him not.”

Both Esdras and the brother of Jared go up upon a mount. In 2 Esdras 3:23 we read: “I Esdras received a charge of the Lord upon the mount Oreb, that I should go unto Israel; but when I came unto them, they set me at nought, and despised the commandment of the Lord.”

The brother of Jared, likewise, went up upon a mount, spoke with the Lord, and was told to go back down: “And it came to pass that the brother of Jared . . . went forth unto the mount, which they called the mount Shelem . . . And the Lord commanded the brother of Jared, to go down out of the mount from the presence of the Lord . . . ” (Ether 3:1; 4:1)

Both Esdras and the brother of Jared were shown innumerable people and things that would happen in the last times. In 2 Esdras 2:42 we read: “I Esdras saw upon the mount Sion a great people, whom I could not number . . . ” In 2 Esdras 8:63 we find: “Behold, O Lord, now hast thou shewed me the multitude of the wonders, which thou wilt begin to do in the last times . . . ”

The Lord showed the brother of Jared “all the inhabitants of the earth which had been, and also all that would be; and he withheld them not from his sight, even unto the ends of the earth . . . Behold, I [Moroni] have written upon these plates the very things which the brother of Jared saw; and there never were greater things made manifest than those which were made manifest unto the brother of Jared” (Ether 3:25; 4:4).

Both Esdras and the brother of Jared supposedly saw Jesus Christ long before he came into the world. As we mentioned above, 2 Esdras 7:28-29 mentions “my son Jesus” and “my Son Christ.” In 2 Esdras 2:43, 47, we read: “And in the midst of them there was a young man of a high stature, taller than all the rest, and upon every one of their heads he set crowns, and was more exalted; which I marvelled at greatly. . . . So he answered and said unto me, It is the Son of God, whom they have confessed in the world.” In 2 Esdras 13:32 we find: “and then shall my son be declared, whom thou sawest as a man ascending.”

In the Book of Mormon we find the following regarding the brother of Jared’s encounter with Jesus Christ:

And the veil was taken from off the eyes of the brother of Jared, and he saw the finger of the Lord . . . And the Lord said unto him: Because of thy faith thou hast seen that I shall take upon me flesh and blood; and never has man come before me with such exceeding faith as thou hast; for were it not so ye could not have seen my finger. Sawest thou more than this? And he answered: Nay; Lord, show thyself unto me. . . . And when he had said these words, behold, the Lord showed himself unto him, and said . . . Behold, I am Jesus Christ. I am the Father and the Son . . . Wherefore, having this perfect knowledge of God, he could not be kept from within the veil; therefore he saw Jesus; and he did minister unto him.” (Ether 3:6, 9-10, 13-14, 20)

Both Esdras and the brother of Jared are commanded to write the revelations they received. The phrase “shall write” is found only twice in the Bible. Interestingly, however, it is used in both 2 Esdras and the book of Ether. Esdras wrote: “But if I have found grace before thee, send the Holy Ghost into me, and I shall write all that hath been done in the world since the beginning . . . ” (2 Esdras 14:22). In the Book of Mormon we read that “the Lord said unto the brother of Jared . . . And behold, when ye shall come unto me, ye shall write them . . . ” (Ether 3:21).

Similar wording, which is not present in the Bible, is found in 2 Esdras and the book of Ether. In Ether 4:16 we find the words “caused to be written.” 2 Esdras 15:2 contains the words “cause them to be written.”

As indicated above, the revelations received by Esdras and the brother of Jared were extremely important. In both cases the Lord warned these prophets that they were not to reveal certain things they had written. The Lord told the brother of Jared that he should “not suffer these things . . . to go forth unto the world, until the time cometh that I shall glorify my name in the flesh . . . ye shall write them and shall seal them up, that no one can interpret them; for ye shall write them in a language that they cannot be read” (Ether 3:21-22).
In 2 Esdras 12:37 the prophet Esdras is instructed to "write all these things that thou hast seen in a book, and hide them: And teach them to the wise of the people, whose hearts thou knowest may comprehend and keep these secrets." In chapter 14 of the same book, the Lord instructed Esdras to take five men which are ready to write swiftly; And come hither, and I shall light a candle of understanding in thine heart, which shall not be put out, till the things be performed which thou shalt begin to write. And when thou hast done, some things shalt thou publish, and some things shalt thou shew secretly to the wise . . .

So I took the five men, as he commanded me, and we went into the field, and remained there . . . The Highest gave understanding unto the five men, and they wrote the wonderful visions . . . As for me, I spake in the day, and I held not my tongue by night. In forty days they wrote two hundred and four books. And it came to pass, when the forty days were fulfilled, that the Highest spake, saying, The first that thou has written publish openly, that the worthy and unworthy may read it: But keep the seventy last, that thou mayest deliver them only to such as be wise . . . For in them is the spring of understanding, the fountain of wisdom, and the stream of knowledge. (2 Esdras 24-26, 37, 42-47)

We have already explained that Ether was the last Jaredite prophet. The Book of Mormon says that the prophet Ether told the people “all things, from the beginning of man . . .” (Ether 13:2). Esdras, likewise, said that he wanted to write “all that hath been done in the world since the beginning . . .” (2 Esdras 14:22).

THE TREE OF LIFE

The apocryphal book of 2 Esdras may have furnished some material for Lehi’s vision of “the tree of life” which is found in the very first book of the Book of Mormon, 1 Nephi, chapter 8. In chapters 11 and 12 of the same book Nephhi related that he also saw a similar vision.

In making the suggestion that material may have been borrowed from the apocrypha, we do not want to give the reader the impression that this was Joseph Smith’s only source. In fact, in our book Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, we have presented irresistible evidence that Smith plagiarized a great deal of material from the New Testament book of Revelation in the pages of 1 Nephi (see pages 87, 91, 94, 95-98, 100-101, 103, 105, 107-108 of our book). The damaging thing about this plagiarism from the book of Revelation is that Joseph Smith has Lehi and Nephi quoting this New Testament book almost seven centuries before it was written! This in itself tends to discredit the Book of Mormon.

Although it is obvious that the book of Revelation was the main source for Joseph Smith’s story regarding the “tree of life,” Esdras certainly could have supplied supplementary material. Like the Nephite prophets, Esdras wrote concerning the tree of life. In 2 Esdras 2:12 we read that “They shall have the tree of life for an ointment of sweet savour; they shall neither labour, nor be weary.” In 7:53 we read that “there should be shewed a paradise, whose fruit endureth for ever . . .” In the next chapter we find: “For unto you is paradise opened, the tree of life is planted . . .” (2 Esdras 8:52).

In the Book of Mormon, 1 Nephi 8:10-11, Lehi reported: “And it came to pass that I beheld a tree, whose fruit was desirable to make one happy . . . the fruit thereof . . . was most sweet, above all that I ever before tasted.” After seeing the same vision, Nephi wrote: “. . . I beheld that the rod of iron . . . was the word of God, which led to the fountain of living waters, or to the tree of life . . .” (1 Nephi 11:25).

Both Esdras and Lehi had inspired revelations and dreams. Like Joseph of the Old Testament, Esdras wrote: “And it came to pass . . . I dreamed a dream by night . . .” (2 Esdras 13:1). Nephi used similar wording when he wrote the following about his father’s vision of the “tree of life”: “And it came to pass . . . he spake unto us, saying: Behold, I have dreamed a dream; or, in other words, I have seen a vision” (1 Nephi 8:2).

While the book of Revelation provided a great deal of the information Joseph Smith needed for his vision of the tree of life, it does not contain the word “field.” Lehi claimed that in the vision he saw a “field.” The word “field” is mentioned a number of times in 2 Esdras. For example, at one time when Esdras was receiving revelations, he was commanded to “go into a field of flowers, where no house is builded, and eat only the flowers of the field . . .” (9:24). In verse 26, he said that he “did eat of the herbs of the field, and the meat of the same satisfied me.” Later, Esdras wrote: “But I remained still in the field seven days, as the angel commanded me . . .” (12:51). Lehi maintained that the field he saw in his vision was “a large and spacious field” (1 Nephi 8:9). In 2 Esdras 7:6 we read that a “city is builded, and set upon a broad field . . .”

In his vision the prophet Lehi saw “a great and spacious building” standing “as it were in the air . . .” (1 Nephi 8:26). The prophet Esdras was commanded “to go into the field, where no foundation of any building was” (2 Esdras 10:53). The account goes on to say that he was shown a very large and beautiful building and instructed to go in “and see the beauty and greatness of the building, as much as thine eyes be able to see . . .” (2 Esdras 10:55). The reader will notice a parallel here; the Book of Mormon uses the word “great” in referring to the building, and the Apocrypha speaks of the “greatness” of the building.

As Lehi watched the vision of “the tree of life,” he saw that two of his sons did not partake of “the fruit.” Consequently, “he exceedingly feared for Laman and Lemuel; yea, he feared lest they should be cast off from the presence of the Lord” (1 Nephi 8:35-36). Lehi also noted that many others “fell away into forbidden paths and were lost” (1 Nephi 8:28). Esdras, likewise, was deeply concerned about the people who were lost. In one of his visions Esdras was told to not be “curious how the ungodly shall be punished . . .” To this Esdras replied, “that there be many more of them which perish, than of them which shall be saved . . .” (2 Esdras 9:13, 15). At one point Esdras was told that he was to ask “no more questions concerning the multitude of them that perish” (2 Esdras 8:55).

There is one short portion of 2 Esdras which could have provided a number of words found in the “tree of life” vision:

And I said, Speak on my God. Then said he unto me, The sea is set in a wide place, that it may be deep and great. But put the case the entrance were narrow, and like a river, Who then could go into the sea to look upon it . . . if he went not through the narrow, how could he come into the broad? A city is builded, and set upon a broad field, and is full of all made this comment to Esdras: “because in the Book of Mormon we read: “And it came to pass the possibility one could “fall” is mentioned. This is significant which was hazardous to those passing over the path. In fact, what desirest thou order, “What water, path, broad, field, and the phrase to look upon. The reader will remember also that we have previously mentioned that a great “building” and “the tree of life” are also found in 2 Esdras.

One thing that is especially interesting about Esdras’ vision is the material found in two of the verses in 2 Esdras 7:7-8 which we have cited above: “The entrance thereof is narrow, and is set in a dangerous place to fall, like as if there were a fire on the right hand, and on the left a deep water: And one only path between them both, even between the fire and the water, so small that there could but one man go there at once. . . .”

Lehi’s account of “the tree of life” reveals that there was a strait and narrow path and that many “were pressing forward, that they might obtain the path which led unto the tree by which I stood” (1 Nephi 8:20-21). The Apocrypha indicates that only one man at a time can follow the “path through the “dangerous place.” The Book of Mormon also seems to imply that those who walk on the “narrow path” must go single file. It says that there was “a rod of iron” which “extended along the bank of the river, and led to the tree” and that those who wished to be saved had to cling “to the rod of iron, even until they did come forth and partake of the fruit of the tree” (1 Nephi 8:19, 24).

In the account in 2 Esdras we are told that “on the left” of the path there was “like as if there were” some “deep water” which was hazardous to those passing over the path. In fact, the possibility one could “fall” is mentioned. This is significant because in the Book of Mormon we read: “And it came to pass that many were drowned in the depths of the fountain . . .” (1 Nephi 8:32).

There are other parallels between the wording in 1 Nephi, chapters 8, 11 and 12, and 2 Esdras. For example an “angel” made this comment to Esdras: “It is the Son of God . . .” (2 Esdras 2:4). In 1 Nephi 11:7 we also find the words, “It is the Son of God.”

The words “what thou desirest” are found in 2 Esdras 4:43. In 1 Nephi 11:2, 10, we find the same words in a different order, “What desirest thou.”

In 2 Esdras 5:2 the phrase “thou seest” appears. The same words are found in 1 Nephi 11:18.

The words “multitudes of peoples” are found in both 2 Esdras 5:27 and 1 Nephi 11:31.

The term “these words said he unto me” appear in 2 Esdras 6:30. In 1 Nephi 11:24 we read, “These words, he said unto me.”

In 2 Esdras 9:38 the phrase “with a loud voice” is used. The same words appear in 1 Nephi 11:6

The words “the meaning of the. . .” appear in 2 Esdras 10:40. They are also found in 1 Nephi 11:21.

In 2 Esdras 10:44 we find the words “whom thou seest.” The same words are found in 1 Nephi 11:18.

The words “And I saw, and” appear in 2 Esdras 11:2. The same words appear in 1 Nephi 11:32.

In 2 Esdras 11:36-37 we find the words “said unto me, Look . . . And I beheld.” The same words appear in 1 Nephi 11:24.

In 2 Esdras 12:10 the following wording appears: “And he said unto me, This is the interpretation . . .” In 1 Nephi 11:10-11 we find similar wording: “And he said unto me: What desirest thou? And I said unto him: To know the interpretation . . .” The reader will notice that in the parallel above the two books contain seven words that are identical.

The words “gathered together to” are found in 2 Esdras 13:8. The same words appear in 1 Nephi 11:28.

We suspect that there are many other parallels between the Book of Mormon and the Apocrypha which would require a sophisticated computer program to ferret out. What we really need is a careful computer examination of two, three or more word parallels between the Book of Mormon and the Apocrypha. In the meantime we feel that we have demonstrated important connections between Joseph Smith’s Book of Mormon and the Apocrypha. We, of course, have already noted that when Smith bought a Bible it contained the Apocrypha.

Edward Stevenson, one of Joseph Smith’s followers, made this statement concerning Smith’s view of the Apocrypha:

Opening the Bible to the Apocrypha, he [Joseph Smith] said, “There are many precious truths in these books,—just as true as any of the Bible—but it requires much of the Spirit of God to divine the truths from the errors which have crept into them.” (The Juvenile Instructor, September 15, 1894, page 570)

At the time Joseph Smith was revising the Bible he even claimed to have a revelation from the Lord concerning the Apocrypha. In the Doctrine and Covenants Smith wrote:

Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you concerning the Apocrypha—There are many things contained therein that are true, and it is mostly translated correctly; There are many things contained therein that are not true, which are interpolations by the hands of men. . . . Therefore, whoso readeth it, let him understand, for the Spirit manifesteth truth; And whoso is enlightened by the Spirit shall obtain benefit therefrom; And whoso receiveth not by the Spirit, cannot be benefited. Therefore it is not needful that it should be translated. Amen. (Doctrine and Covenants, section 91)

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS

“I can’t thank you enough for what has happened to my son who went on a mission last AUG. He left the mission last week and left the church too. Someone had left a copy of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality in the apt. that they moved into. He read it and two weeks later left all behind. I had tried to talk him out of the Mormon bit and especially the mission but he wouldn’t listen. Your book accomplished everything INSTANTLY. I can’t imagine how that book got to be in that apt. at that time but I expect its nothing short of a miracle. God bless you both.” (Letter from Oregon)

“I am a prior Mormon myself and your work was instrumental in my leaving ‘the church.’ You do the tedious research and investigation that most Christians don’t have the time to do full-time. Your materials have helped me in my witnessing and church classes.” (Letter from Alabama)

“I appreciate the work you’re doing. Your ministry helped me to leave Mormonism and become a true Christian.” (Letter from Hawaii)

“. . . I’ve read your book The Changing World of Mormonism and got a lot out of it. I just recently left the Mormon Church and became a Born Again Christian . . . I was a member for 24 years . . . I’m really interested in starting a ministry in my new church in the area of helping Mormons find Christ . . .” (Letter from Ohio)

“I have been wavering about the church after reading some of your literature passed to me by a friend. This has finally clinched it for me & after being active for 50 years I will never go back . . . I am so grateful to you both for the hard work & effort . . . I have made my decision & I thank my Heavenly Father & you people for being there to help me . . . I finally feel so much better about myself . . . but I am sorry that I . . . wasted so much time.” (Letter from Alberta, Canada)

“I want to thank you so much for your precious work . . . I am 24 years old, 5th generation Mormon. In the past couple of years I’ve had so many doubts about the church, and all my questions went unanswered! My bishops told me not to worry about such things . . . After reading ‘A Gathering of Saints’ and ‘The Changing World of Mormonism’ I am positive it is very wrong. My fiancé was taking the [missionary] lessons & you’ve helped us both get out!! Now I’ve given material to my friend . . . who has been doubting since she was married in the L.V. Temple three years ago. She’s ready to leave now too . . . I am so scared of the reaction I will have . . . But I feel so free now I can find the true Christ!!” (Letter from Nevada)

“I can’t say all the words of thanks on this little paper. But please know that your hard work has been an instrument through which God was finally able to reach me . . . Thank you Sandra for giving my now husband a tape & words of encouragement. I’m so glad he didn’t give up on me!” (Letter from Utah)

“I myself am a former Mormon Missionary who left my mission . . . I’ve accepted Jesus Christ as my Lord and Personal Savior and been born Again.” (Letter from Pennsylvania)

IN THE LIGHTHOUSE AT LAST!

We are very happy to report that we have finally moved into the new Utah Lighthouse building at 1358 South West Temple—just one door south of the house we used for over thirty years to carry on our ministry to Mormons. We want to extend our thanks to all those who have helped us reach the end of this long and dusty road. We were so crowded in our former location that it was hard to function effectively.

Those who are interested in helping us reach the Mormon people should be aware that Utah Lighthouse is a non-profit organization. In addition to our work with Mormons, we provide support for 44 children through World Vision. Those who are concerned about helping this ministry can send their tax-deductible contributions to UTAH LIGHTHOUSE MINISTRY, PO Box 1884, Salt Lake City, UT 84110. Both contributions and orders can be made over the phone (801-485-0312) with Visa, MasterCard, or Discover Card.

We deeply appreciate the financial contributions that we receive. Nevertheless, we strongly believe that PRAYER is the most important thing and that it will bring thousands of Mormons to the truth. As Apostle Paul admonished: “Continue earnestly in prayer, being vigilant in it with thanksgiving” (Colossians 4:2).

MANY MORE BOOKS!!!

We have many other books which are not listed in this issue of the Messenger. A complete book list will be sent free upon request by writing to us at Utah Lighthouse Ministry, PO Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110.
Many of our readers may be puzzled by the title of this article. When speaking of FARMS we are not referring to places where people cultivate the soil or milk cows, but rather to an organization known as the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies. This Foundation goes by the acronym FARMS. It is a non-profit organization that claims to be independent of the Mormon Church yet vigorously defends its teachings. The term “antimormonoid” will be explained below.

“SHADOWS OF REALITY”

It is obvious that many of those who write for FARMS view us and others who question Mormon doctrine with contempt. Professor Louis Midgley, of Brigham Young University, refers to us as, “the Tanners (those shadows of reality who operate the anti-Mormon Utah Lighthouse Ministry).” (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 5, page 152)

In a footnote on page 139 of the same book, Professor Midgley refers to Mormon critics as “antimormonoids”: “This is typical of the exaggerations of the extremist faction of antimormonoids . . . The more moderate faction of antimormonoids is best illustrated by the late Reverend Wesley P. Walters, who generally tended to be more circumspect on such matters.” On the following page, Midgley admits that the term “antimormonoids” is “a somewhat contemptuous label formulated by BYU Professor Daniel C. Peterson.” Interestingly, Peterson serves as editor of the FARMS publication, Review of Books on the Book of Mormon.

Professor Midgley says he is amused by the actions of “antimormonoids” and is “hooked” on the practice of observing their odd behavior:

... The dreadful formulaic and pedestrian character of anti-Mormon literature, the prosaic business of incompetents endlessly quoting each other and hence erecting an ever more rickety house of cards, the constant repetition of borrowed bromides ... is all entertaining, at least to me. ... One might even say I am hooked on the stuff. I have even corresponded with some of those “antimormonoids.” My wife warns me about the utter futility of such behavior. She is not mollified by my descriptions of the amusing side of anti-Mormon literature. ... I occasionally resolve to leave the stuff alone. But ... like one who cannot pass the swinging doors of a bar, I am back into it again. (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, pp. 139-140)

For the most part Mormon leaders have quietly tried to avoid dealing with those who have raised questions regarding such things as the practice of polygamy in early Mormonism, the authenticity of the Book of Mormon, and other problems.

While two Mormon apostles sent letters stating that they would sue us, both of them backed off when they found that we would not acquiesce to their threats to cease publishing certain information they did not want their people to know about (see photographs of their letters in our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 12-13). A student at the church’s Brigham Young University did file a lawsuit against us, and even though he was supported in his endeavor by the university’s Religious Studies Center the suit was unsuccessful.

Notwithstanding the intimidation that was used to keep us from revealing the truth, Mormon leaders have never put forth... any official rebuttal. While we have waited in vain for some type of response, they have maintained a conspiracy of silence for thirty-seven years.

In 1982, Apostle Marvin J. Ashton pleaded with his people to simply ignore those who find fault with the church:

Whether accusations, innuendoes, aspersions, or falsehoods are whispered or bluntly shouted, the gospel of Jesus Christ reminds us that we are not to retaliate nor contend. . . . we declare there is no time for contention. . . . Probably we will never be free of those who are openly anti-Mormon. Therefore, we encourage all our members to refuse to become anti-anti-Mormon. (The Ensign, November 1982, page 63)

FARMS TO THE RESCUE

Some Mormons could not go along with the silent treatment that the church was using against us and other critics. They were disturbed about the failure of the Mormon leaders to openly discuss the issues. In the September-October 1981 issue of The Sunstone Review the following advertisement appeared:

FOR SOME time there has been concern about the impact of Sandra and Jerald Tanner’s Mormonism—Shadow or Reality (and its recent Moody Press version, The Changing World of Mormonism). No thorough, formal, direct response has been published, though a number of articles have been written dealing with specific aspects of their criticism. A project is now being organized to formulate an answer to the Tanners and to other prominent critics of Mormonism . . . Anyone interested in contributing to this effort should outline his or her specialty and send the information to: The Tanner Project, P.O. Box 191, Calabasas, Cal. 91302-0191.

The reader will notice that only a number for a post office box was given for “The Tanner Project.” This clandestine move to destroy our work was carried on with great secrecy. At first we could not learn from the Post Office who had rented the box, but we were told that a “pen name” was apparently being used. Later, however, we were informed that a man by the name of Scott S. Smith was involved, and that he was using the alias “Steven Scott” to carry on his activities.

When we told a man who had previously corresponded with Scott Smith that we believed Smith was using an alias, the alias “Steven Scott” to carry on his activities. Later, however, we were informed that a man by the name of Scott S. Smith was involved, and that he was using the alias “Steven Scott” to carry on his activities.

When we told a man who had previously corresponded with Scott Smith that we believed Smith was using an alias, he decided to do some investigating on his own. Surprisingly, Mr. Smith did not try to deny the charge, and the man who interviewed him sent us a report on the matter:

This night (Aug. 1, 1982) I personally talked to Scott Smith on the telephone about the Tanner project . . . He says he was part of the first working group of people who started the project and opened the P.O. Box.

Smith told me he did not want to say who was the main coordinator of the project . . . Smith says there are about three dozen people who have access to the P.O. Box . . .

When asked if he used the name Steven Scott, he said: “I used the name, but so did others.” . . . He says there is a lot of switching and barrowing [sic] of names, and admits to using other peoples’ names. He says others have used his name. The reason for all this? To confuse the Tanners! He says they want to make the Tanners go off on wild goose chases [sic] trying to figure out who is who and who is doing what . . . I hope this helps. (Letter dated August 1, 1982)

On August 19, 1982, we had a very interesting conversation with Scott Smith concerning “The Tanner Project.” Mr. Smith confirmed the admissions he had made on August 1, 1982. Later, in a letter to us Scott Smith wrote:

Your March SLCM just arrived. Its account of The Tanner Project is essentially accurate for what it covers . . . pseudonyms were used for the logical reasons you cited and a few of the participants were people you would know and respect. . . . inevitably a “definitive response” to your work will be published. . . . In any event, while I heartily disagree with your conclusions I do appreciate the generally civil way you go about your work, which distinguishes it from some of your allies. (Letter from Scott S. Smith, dated April 22, 1983)

Like the people involved in “The Tanner Project,” John L. Sorenson, who is an emeritus professor of anthropology at the church’s Brigham Young University, was also convinced that something had to be done to counter our work. Dr. Sorenson has served as a director at FARMS, and is probably the most well-known defender of “Book of Mormon Archeology.” Sorenson seemed deeply concerned with the effect our work was having upon members of the church. In a handwritten note made before “The Tanner Project” was exposed, Professor Sorenson boasted:

Some of us here are talking about holding a conference with enough experts taking on the Tanners’ garbage to blow them out of the water.

In the Salt Lake City Messenger for March, 1983, we wrote:

Now that we have exposed the dubious foundation of “The Tanner Project,” we doubt that any respectable Mormon scholars will want to associate their names with it. The Tanner Project seems doomed to failure. The Mormon leaders, of course, are trying to prevent a confrontation because they know a discussion of the issues will hurt the Church.

For some time after this debacle Mormon scholars backed away from dealing with the issues. In fact, almost a decade passed before FARMS entered into the fray. Prior to the publication of our book, Covering Up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon, church scholars at Brigham Young University and FARMS carefully followed the church leaders’ advice and studiously avoided dealing with our publications.

With the appearance of our work on the “black hole,” however, they decided that something had to be done. After remaining virtually silent for over thirty years, Mormon scholars came out like an army to attack us. The plan was like that envisioned by Professor Sorenson—i.e., to have a number of scholars simultaneously tear into our work. Between 1991 and 1996 there were ten critical reviews directed against our work in FARMS publications!

Fortunately, our work was carefully done and we easily survived the torpedoes directed against our ship. Professor Sorenson’s belief that we could be blown “out of the water” certainly has not come to pass. In fact, Utah Lighthouse Ministry has expanded its operations. Those who are interested in our response to FARMS should read our books, Answering Mormon Scholars, Volumes 1 and 2. We just finished the second volume and are now working on the third (see special offer on the front page). Actually, the additional research we did in our rebuttal to the charges directed against us has led us to uncover many other problems in the Book of Mormon and Joseph Smith’s other works which we had not been aware of when FARMS launched its attack.

Brigham Young University professor Daniel C. Peterson, editor of the publication, Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, made it clear that as far as ministries to Mormons are concerned we are the primary target of FARMS. In a review of a book written by John Ankerberg and John Weldon, Peterson made this caustic comment: “But among all the apostates and scandal-mongers and professional enemies of the Latter-day Saints who are their sources, one name looms far above the rest. That name is ‘Tanner’. ” (Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 5, page 20).

Speaking of his decision to accept an article written against us, Dr. Peterson wrote: “I accepted it because I thought it made a number of important points, and because most contemporary anti-Mormon writers depend heavily upon the Tanners. Attending to the roots seemed an efficient way of dealing with the branches” (Review of Books, vol. 4, page lxxiv, footnote 186).

In this statement Peterson is obviously suggesting that it is necessary to try to destroy our work (“the roots”) so that it will not be spread abroad by other “anti-Mormon writers,” whom he refers to as “the branches.”

Although FARMS is very concerned about our work, it is even more worried about a movement that is developing within the Mormon Church itself. Professor Daniel Peterson has admitted that there is a significant problem in the church itself. Peterson is exceptionally worried about the publications being distributed by Signature Books:

We have seen that George D. Smith and Signature Books reject the title “anti-Mormons.”

In the past, anti-Mormon attacks almost invariably came from outside the Church; for the most part, they still do. For the first time since the Godbeite movement, however, we may today be dealing with a more-or-less organized “anti-Mormon movement within the Church.” With “anti-Mormon Mormons,” as Robert McKay puts it. . . . (Review of Books, vol. 4, pp. liv-liv)

In 1993, Signature Books came out with a book which caused great consternation among Mormon Church leaders and defenders of the faith. It is entitled, New Approaches to the Book of Mormon, Explorations in Critical Methodology. It was edited by Brent Lee Metcalfe who was eventually excommunicated for questioning the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. In addition, David P. Wright, one of ten authors who wrote articles in New Approaches to the Book of Mormon, was also excommunicated from the church. Wright holds a Ph.D. in Near Eastern Studies and was on the faculty at Brigham Young University. Dr. Wright is now a professor of Biblical Studies and Hebrew at Brandeis University. Interestingly, before he was fired from Brigham Young University, Wright wrote a review of a book for FARMS (see Review of Books, vol. 1, pages 10-17).

After New Approaches was published, FARMS produced a 566-page book in an attempt to refute the book (see Review of Books, vol. 6, number 1). In vol. 6, number 2, Daniel C. Peterson acknowledged that the previous issue was “wholly dedicated to commenting upon New Approaches to the Book of Mormon.” Moreover, since that time writers for FARMS have continued to attack Brent Metcalfe and others who had a part in writing the book. The assault has continued right up to the 1996 publication of Review of Books, vol. 8, number 1.

In our newsletter, The Salt Lake City Messenger, June 1994, we reported that one noted writer for FARMS, Professor William Hamblin, was so angry with Metcalfe that he created an acrostic reading “METCALFE IS BUTTHEAD.” The encrypted message was to appear in the massive attack on New Approaches to the Book of Mormon. Fortunately for FARMS, someone discovered what was about to appear and cooler heads prevailed. According to an article in the March 9, 1994, issue of the Provo paper, The Daily Herald, “Metcalfe said that according to the, er, scuttlebutt, FARMS learned about the encryption just as the volume was going into print, quickly halted the press run and rewrote and reprinted the offending pages.”

FARMS is obviously deeply concerned that there may be a significant erosion of faith among Mormon scholars. Brigham Young University professor Louis Midgley, who previously expressed that he was “hooked” on observing “antimormonoids,” was very displeased with both Brent Metcalfe and New Approaches to the Book of Mormon. Nevertheless, he made a revealing comment about the book:

The most imposing attack on the historical authenticity of the Book of Mormon has been assembled by Brent Lee Metcalfe. . . . the publication of New Approaches is an important event. It marks the most sophisticated attack on the truth of the Book of Mormon currently available either from standard sectarian or more secularized anti-Mormon sources, or from the fringes of Mormon culture and intellectual life. (Review of Books, vol. 6, no. 1, pages 211-214)

Associated Press writer Vern Anderson described the situation very plainly in an article he wrote:

But if the so-called “apologists” and “revisionists” are merely at odds on the field of Mormon history, they are locked in a relative death grip over what most church members see as the cornerstones of Mormon doctrine. . . . (Salt Lake Tribune, July 22, 1991)

There can be no doubt that FARMS is intent on undermining the expanding influence of Signature Books. In addition, FARMS wishes to destroy the work of Utah Lighthouse Ministry and that of other ministries working with Mormon people. Furthermore, as we will show below, they are willing to spend a great deal of money to accomplish their goals.

Utah Lighthouse Ministry is actually a small organization that has only four people who work full time. Most of our time is spent on such things as waiting on customers, receiving phone calls from throughout the world, printing and collating books, processing mail orders, answering letters and many other mundane operations. This, of course, leaves us with little time to do original research. Nevertheless, we are confident that our work will stand the test of time. We stand on the promise of Apostle Paul:

What shall we say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us? (Romans 8:31)

While FARMS has a great deal of money and many professors who give their time and support to the Foundation we do not fear its power. We believe that truth will eventually prevail.

SEVEN MILLION DOLLARS!

According to a catalog published by FARMS for the years 1988-89, the organization was incorporated in the state of California in 1979. It is “an independent, non-profit, tax-exempt organization.” FARMS claims that it “does not speak on behalf of any other organization. The opinions expressed in the articles and books it distributes are not necessarily the opinions of anyone except the authors.” The Foundation’s publication, Insights: An Ancient Window, May 1991, indicates that for a donation of “$500 to $100,000 per year” a person can become a member of the organization’s “Liahona Club.”

FARMS undoubtedly receives a great deal of support from affluent members of the church. For example, on page 6 of the FARMS publication Insights, June 1995, we find the following:

Karen and Alan Ashton of Orem, Utah, have established a significant FARMS endowment to support the timely implementation of new projects. Their generous gift will ensure that important new research opportunities are not missed while waiting for funding to become available . . .

This new funding and the increased amount of research it will support both necessitate and make possible the creation of new projects and the supervision of ongoing projects . . .

Brother Ashton is president of the BYU 14th Stake and is recently retired as chairman of the board of WordPerfect Corporation . . .

Brother and Sister Ashton have long been enthusiastic supporters of scholarly research on the Book of Mormon. This new gift combined with gifts from other FARMS donors raises support for such efforts in the LDS community to an exciting new level.

While the foundation claims that it is not in any way controlled by the Mormon Church, it acknowledges that it has offices at the church’s Brigham Young University: “The Foundation’s funds come from private donations, with the exception of the use of five offices in the Amanda Knight Hall kindly provided by Brigham Young University.” In addition, FARMS has worked closely with the church’s Deseret Book Company: “The Foundation is co-publisher with Deseret Book Company of a series of scholarly studies on the Book of Mormon, including the Collected Works of Hugh Nibley.”

FARMS also worked with the church’s Deseret Book Company in producing John L. Sorenson’s book, An Ancient American Setting for the Book of Mormon.

The publication, Insights, August 1995, had an article entitled, “Upgrading the FARMS-BYU Connection.” This article indicated that the bond between FARMS and BYU is growing even stronger:

The unique and productive relationship that Brigham Young University and the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies have enjoyed for nearly fifteen years has recently been elevated to a new level of cooperation. . . . the BYU Board of Trustees has now endorsed a protocol between BYU and FARMS that expands the range of opportunities for cooperation on scholarly work on the Book of Mormon and related topics.

The active involvement of almost a hundred BYU scholars in a wide range of FARMS projects demonstrated the need for a university policy regarding these kinds of faculty activities . . .

This new agreement extends to FARMS an invitation to use a full range of campus facilities . . . And it indicates that BYU will cooperate with the Foundation in its efforts to obtain better space to house the rapidly expanding FARMS activities, perhaps even allowing FARMS to build a new building on campus: “BYU and FARMS will work together in locating—and possibly building suitable space on or near the campus.” . . . The enhanced level of cooperation between BYU and FARMS mean that more faculty members from more departments will likely be involved in scriptural research in the future.

It is interesting to note that “the BYU Board of Trustees” was agreeable to helping out FARMS. According to the Encyclopedia of Mormonism, vol. 1, pages 220-221, “BYU functions under the direction of the Church through a board of trustees that includes the First Presidency, the general presidents of the women’s auxiliary organizations and selected General Authorities.” Obviously, then, the link between FARMS and BYU could never be approved without the consent of the highest leaders of the church.

On November 20, 1995, F.A.R.M.S sent out a letter informing its supporters that they needed a great deal of money to build a research center. The following is taken from that letter:
In the last newsletter we announced the campaign to raise the funds to build the Book of Mormon Research Center. . . . Your help is needed. Many of you have already responded with generous contributions for which we are grateful, but more is needed. Local building costs are escalating rapidly. Presently the architects estimate the project will cost some seven million dollars. . . . We invite those of you who have abundant means to be very generous. . . . Please don’t delay.

A very impressive brochure was sent with the letter soliciting donations:

The Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies is pleased to announce the construction of its new Book of Mormon Research Center. . . . FARMS scholars approach their research with a firm conviction of the truthfulness of the Book of Mormon and of the gospel of Jesus Christ as restored through the Prophet Joseph Smith. . . . They publicize their findings for the benefit of serious students of the scriptures, as well as those who are investigating the Book of Mormon or who may be questioning its authenticity. . . . The library will be a resource center containing computers, books, and help for students working on papers and projects about the Book of Mormon. . . . The lecture hall . . . will be used for lectures on the Book of Mormon and other scriptural topics . . . The area will also be designed as a studio for filming lectures and presentations for broadcast and video production. . . . FARMS also maintains a site on the Internet, where users worldwide can go for answers. . . . Located on the southern periphery of Brigham Young University, the building will be a house “set on a hill” . . . the Book of Mormon Research Center is intended to be a landmark that draws attention to our rich scriptural heritage and invites all to come unto Christ. (FARMS. brochure)

One portion of the brochure that is especially interesting to us acknowledges that the Foundation is actively involved in countering critics of the church:

A significant portion of FARMS’s work is devoted to setting the record straight with regard to anti-Mormon literature.

It appears that FARMS has vast resources that will be used to criticize our work and the work of other critics of the church. We, of course, do not have millions of dollars to fight off such an attack. Nevertheless, we will do our best to counter their assault.

As we pointed out above, for a long period of time Mormon Church leaders tried to discourage their people from attempting to answer our work or the work of other critics of the church. A magazine article written by David Merrill pointed out that the Mormon leaders tried to restrain the church’s scholars from dealing with our publications: “The official attitude of the Mormon hierarchy towards the Tanners has been one of silence and apparent unconcern. They have, however, actively discouraged LDS scholars and intellectuals from jousting with the Tanners. . . .” (Utah Holiday, February 1978, page 7). A spokesman from the church’s Deseret Book Store wrote: “We do not have a specific response to the Tanner book. Perhaps it does not deserve the dignity of a response” (Letter written Jan. 19, 1977).

A man who talked to a leading Mormon authority, Apostle LeGrand Richards, claimed that Richards, “told me to quit studying materials put out by the Tanner’s . . . I told him ‘surely some day there will be an answer to these questions,’ He told me there never would be an answer and I should stop my inquiries” (Letter dated August 13, 1978).

Interestingly, while Apostle Richards said there never would be a rebuttal, and a spokesman for the church’s Deseret Book Store maintained that, “Perhaps it does not deserve the dignity of a response,” when the scholars for FARMS first attacked our work it became clear that things had changed. FARMS writer Matthew Roper showed deep concern over the matter when he reviewed a small portion of our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? In fact, Roper frankly acknowledged that the book did merit review:

There are several reasons why this book merits review. First, the Tanners are considered by their fellow critics to be among the foremost authorities on Mormonism and the Book of Mormon. Their arguments are central to most anti-Mormon attacks on the Book of Mormon today. One recent critic describes Mormonism: Shadow or Reality? as “the heavyweight of all books on Mormonism.” (Review of Books, vol. 4, pages 169-170).

It appears, then, that Mormon Church leaders have finally come to see the utter futility of a conspiracy of silence. Unfortunately, however, instead of coming forth to directly deal with the issues and publishing a rebuttal under the church’s own name they seem to have dropped the ball into the hands of FARMS. This was a very clever move indeed.

Since the church owns Brigham Young University, it could have easily stopped the “anti-anti-Mormon” work of FARMS which is taking place on the BYU campus. The church leaders, then, must be in agreement with what FARMS is attempting to do. The fact that there is a plan to build a seven million dollar building on the campus certainly points to a close alliance with FARMS.

In addition to the support given by BYU, there are many faithful members of the church who would be willing to give money to FARMS if they thought it would silence the antimormonoids.

The Mormon Church is apparently very happy with the work done by FARMS. The church seems to be in a no-lose situation. If, on the one hand, the Foundation should make serious mistakes, the church would not be held responsible. On the other hand, if Mormon scholars present material that convinces people of the truthfulness of the Book of Mormon, the church will benefit from the work.

In any case, the scholars involved with FARMS take great pride in their Foundation. They strongly believe that no other organization on earth can compete with their knowledge of the Book of Mormon. They are convinced that as far as human wisdom is concerned they are the ultimate experts on the subject. Consequently, they are very offended if anyone ignores or is ignorant of the research emanating from FARMS.
ROPERS UNFAIR ATTACK

In their attempt to discredit our work the FARMS-BYU scholars have used statements made by Dr. Lawrence Foster, a non-Mormon scholar who is very upset with us. As we will demonstrate below, the use of Foster as a witness against us is very unfair.

FARMS writer Matthew Roper seems to take a great deal of pleasure in quoting Foster’s negative comments regarding our work. Foster’s work is also cited against us by FARMS writers Professor William J. Hamblin and L. Ara Norwood. Dr. Gilbert Scharffs, who has served as director of an LDS Institute of Religion, and Richard I. Winwood, a former Mission President, also use Foster’s work against us. In a letter from FARMS, dated November 20, 1995, we find that Richard Winwood is now the Chairman of the Building Committee.

Lawrence Foster cannot believe that our work is motivated by our desire to please God and help Mormons find the truth. Instead, he speaks of “the intensity and bitterness of the Tanners’ feelings.” The following are some samples of the expressions he uses in the two articles and the Mormon History Association speech when speaking of us: “Jerald’s . . . deep bitterness;” “Jerald’s disillusionment and bitterness;” “harsh rhetoric of their attacks;” “long quotations interspersed with purple prose;” “the Tanners clearly are a party to unethical activity themselves;” “The Tanners seem to be playing a skillful shell game;” “abrasive and offensive methods;” “the Tanners . . . own confusion and thin skin;” “the Tanners’ naive view;” “their abrasive writing style;” “their hostility;” and “Their own bitterness and sense of outrage.”

It is clear from the language that Lawrence Foster uses when speaking of us that he believes that we are driven by a very deep sense of anger. He seems to see animosity in almost everything we do. In our opinion, however, Foster is projecting his own anger upon us.

In any case, in an article published by FARMS, Matthew Roper seemed to be elated that Foster attacked us:

Reading their rebuttal, I was reminded of several observations made by non-LDS historian Lawrence Foster a few years ago. With the Tanners, “Every bit of evidence, even if it could be most plausibly presented in a positive way, is represented as yet another nail in the coffin being prepared for the Mormon Church. . . . Even when they backhandedly praise objective Mormon historical scholarship, they do so primarily as a means of twisting that scholarship for use as yet another debater’s ploy to attack the remaining—and in their eyes insurmountable—Mormon deficiencies.” Speaking of the Tanners’ reaction to an earlier critique of their work by an anonymous historian, Foster reflects, “One is amused at the exaggerated sense of self importance that the Tanners’ rejoinder reveals. . . . The Tanners’ own response would seem to be the best possible vindication of the argument . . . that they lack a sense of balance and perspective.”

Concerning the Tanners’ allegation that there has been a conspiracy of silence, “what accounts for this reluctance [among both conservative and liberal scholars] to discuss the Tanners,” asks Foster in his most recent evaluation of the Tanners’ work.

“The Tanners’ answer is simple: The Mormon church is afraid of them. In their view, it has been engaged in a “conspiracy of silence” because it cannot answer their objections. The Tanners argue that if the church were to try systematically to answer their objections, it would realize the error of its ways and collapse. By failing to deal with them directly, the church, in the Tanners’ opinion, is providing yet another proof of its underlying fraudulence and repressive mind control. This interpretation fails to deal with many complex factors that have contributed to Mormon reticence about discussing the Tanners in print. The most obvious point is that neither conservative nor liberal Mormons think that the Tanners are really serious about wanting a truly open discussion or considering approaches that differ from their own chip-on-shoulder, anti-Mormon mindset. On the other hand, the Tanners have repeatedly demanded that Mormonism live up to standards of rectitude impossible for any human organization to achieve or else give up its truth claims. On the other hand, the Tanners simultaneously tell the Mormon church that even if it were somehow able to live up to its impossibly high standards, it would still be false because it is not normative Christianity as they understand it. . . . Faced with such resolute unwillingness to consider anything Mormonism does in a positive light or to engage in a constructive dialogue about differing approaches, the Mormon Church, as an organization, has understandably chosen to ignore the Tanners as much as possible. . . . The Church sees no advantage in engaging in vitriolic polemic with virtual unknowns and thereby giving them publicity.”

While we find many objectionable things in Professor Foster’s comments cited above, there is only item thing we will mention here. Foster states: “The Tanners argue that if the church were to try systematically to answer their objections, it would realize the error of its ways and collapse.” Those who take the time to read Foster’s statements will notice that he gives no reference for his statement. We do not know where Foster obtained this idea. We certainly do not believe that our arguments could cause the “collapse” of the Mormon Church. The church is far too large to crumble. We do believe, however, that the material we have printed could have a significant affect on many Mormons.

Matthew Roper’s article in Review of Books is a shortened version of his original paper. FARMS, however, printed it in its entirety in a 71-page report. We will refer to it, therefore, as the Longer Review. Roper quoted the following statement by Foster in that review:

“The Tanners have reacted to serious scholarly efforts to analyze their work in much the same way that they criticize the Mormon church for reacting to them—by trying to ignore criticisms that they cannot answer effectively. For instance, in 1982 the Tanners did not respond at all to my request for an interview with them as background for a scholarly paper I was writing on them. After more than a month of waiting—and
This statement came as a total surprise to us. We had never heard one word concerning such a "press release" before we were informed of Foster’s article published in Differing Visions. In his article in Dialogue, published ten years earlier, Foster did not refer to threatening us with an unfavorable press release if we did not meet with him. As we will demonstrate below, the idea that Foster forced us into agreeing to an interview is absolutely false.

In the first place, we had no reason to fear his work. In fact, his letter to us seemed to be very positive and led us to believe that he would be fair with us:

I am writing to ask for your help and suggestions on a project that may be of considerable interest...I plan to propose a paper for the 1983 session of the Mormon History Association which would deal with your life and work. To date I have not seen any objective scholarly assessments of your research and writing which appear fully satisfying. Yet your writings, reprints, and other activities certainly have been of the utmost importance to the development of new approaches to Mormon history during the past two decades. As neither a Mormon nor an anti-Mormon, I believe that I am in an unusually good position to provide an independent assessment of your work and its significance.

Everything in this letter led us to believe that Foster was going to make a fair assessment of our work and that it would be to our advantage to meet with him. Furthermore, we received a telephone call from a member of the Mormon History Association indicating that such a presentation would help promote our work.

While it would not be accurate to say that we have responded to everyone who has sought an interview, in this case we were excited about the offer. The Mormon History Association had studiously disregarded our work since its inception. In his article published later in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Foster acknowledged that this was the case:

Despite the Tanners’ extensive publication record...to date virtually no serious public analyses of their work have appeared. When the Tanners’ arguments have been attacked in Mormon publications, as has occurred on many occasions, their names and the titles of their writings have almost never been cited. Indeed, until very recently even independent Mormon scholarly journals such as Dialogue and Sunstone, which discuss all manner of controversial issues, have largely avoided mentioning the Tanners by name, much less analyzing their work explicitly. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1984, page 48.)

We were certainly pleased to learn that the Mormon History Association was finally going to discuss the research we had spent years compiling. Therefore, one of the authors of this newsletter (Sandra) wrote to Foster and told him that we were agreeable to the interview.

Unfortunately, however, the letter Foster sent to us contained two addresses—one for the Georgia Institute of Technology and another for Yellow Springs, Ohio, where he would apparently be spending most of his time. The Yellow Springs address was on the backside of the letter, and Sandra most likely used the address found on the letterhead on the first page.

Foster later explained that he had used the Georgia Institute of Technology letterhead to convince us that he was a responsible scholar. Sandra seems to recall that the post office was unable to deliver the letter and that it was eventually returned to us. In any case, the date for the interview was agreed upon and we were looking forward to Foster’s visit.

When Foster finally came for the interview in May, 1982, one of the first things he asked was why we had not answered his letter. Sandra explained what had happened, and we both remember that at that time Mr. Foster seemed completely satisfied with the explanation.

What we did not know at the time we received Foster’s letter was that he had been deeply involved with a number of prominent Mormon historians and was very sympathetic to the problems these historians were facing. Some of the Mormon leaders had become extremely upset with Church Historian Leonard J. Arrington because he and other members of the Church Historical Department were attempting to tell the truth about Mormon history.

Dr. Arrington was eventually removed from his position and sent to Brigham Young University. Assistant Church Historian Davis Bitton later discussed “the series of experiences that led to the demise of the History Division,” and indicated that our work helped to contribute to “the demise”:

It did not help that the decade of our existence was a time when Jerald and Sandra Tanner were publishing a variety of works...We did not sympathize with the Tanners. But in a very vague and general way one can imagine how “the troubles of our Church history” could be seen in terms of both fronts. I was dismayed when an honor’s thesis...lumped the work of the historians of the History Division...together with the publications of the Tanners. For him, it was all “the New Mormon History.” Guilt by association is a devastating thing, as we discovered. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1983, pages 16-17)
It is doubtful that the liberal historians who had gained a foothold in the Church Historical Department could have survived even if we had not been publishing at that time. Nevertheless, because of these problems some of the Mormon historians became very antagonistic toward us and wanted to blame us for their troubles.

In 1977, the Church Historical Department made one serious attempt to destroy our credibility when it secretly published a booklet entitled, Jerald and Sandra Tanner's Distorted View of Mormonism: A Response to Mormonism —Shadow or Reality? Interestingly, D. Michael Quinn was designated to write the response. Quinn was a promising young Mormon historian at that time.

The publication of the pamphlet turned out to be a real disaster because those involved did not dare reveal that the Church Historical Department was responsible for its publication. Consequently, neither the name of the author nor the publisher was mentioned anywhere in the book. As we have explained in a rebuttal to the pamphlet, the publication was distributed in a clandestine fashion. Wilfrid Clark, who was working for Zion Bookstore, told us he received an anonymous letter containing a key to a room in a self storage company. He went to that location and picked up 1,800 free copies of the booklet!

Our response to this work appeared in a publication entitled, Answering Dr. Clandestine: A Response to the Anonymous LDS Historian. In this booklet we identified Quinn as the author. Even Lawrence Foster had to admit that “The Tanners convincingly link the anonymous critique to D. Michael Quinn and the LDS Church Historical Department . . .” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1984, p. 51).

As it turned out, Dr. Quinn later became a powerful spokesman for those advocating truthful Mormon history. His willingness to stand up against the highest church leaders who wanted to suppress church history eventually led those in authority to put so much pressure upon him that he felt that he had to leave his position at Brigham Young University. Finally, Dr. Quinn suffered the ultimate disgrace: he was excommunicated from the church!

Some of the FARMS-BYU scholars turned on Quinn and viciously attacked him and his work. Strange as it may seem, however, Mormon writers like Matthew Roper continue to use Quinn’s anonymous rebuttal in an attempt to refute us. They are careful, of course, not to reveal that Quinn is the author of that pamphlet.

At any rate, our rebuttal to the pamphlet obviously caused both Michael Quinn and Leonard Arrington a great deal of embarrassment. Although we felt we did a good job in handling the issue, Lawrence Foster thought that we had been too hard on Dr. Quinn and was very angry about the matter.

Significantly, in 1981, long before D. Michael Quinn was excommunicated, he gave a speech entitled, On Being a Mormon Historian. In his lecture he courageously criticized the Mormon leaders for suppressing the true history of the church, and was planning on publishing the speech in Sunstone magazine. Church officials, however, warned him against printing the address. When we learned that the church was trying to suppress publication of the speech, we decided to publish it ourselves. The Seventh East Press had already printed some of the most damaging portions of the speech. The only reason we published the speech was that we felt that it was extremely important and should be made available to members of the church.

Unfortunately, Foster was convinced that our publication of the document was an act of hostility and that we were actually seeking to get Quinn excommunicated or in serious trouble. Nothing could be further from the truth. While Foster is correct in saying that we were originally upset with Quinn when we learned that he had written the rebuttal, about four years had passed.

By that time the anonymous rebuttal had turned out to be a complete fiasco, and we were much more disturbed by the suppressive policies of the Mormon Church, than we were with D. Michael Quinn. In fact, we were elated that he had the courage to speak out. His work on the anonymous rebuttal proved to be of little value to devout Mormons, since it was published anonymously and since he had to concede that there were many problems in Mormon history.

Unfortunately, when Foster arrived at our house we soon learned that he had a deep animosity towards us because he felt we had mistreated Dr. Quinn. Although we were kind to Foster during the interview, he was rather hostile towards us and there was nothing that we could say to him that would change his opinion.

After reading Foster’s inaccurate comments concerning us in Differing Visions, we asked him if he would consent to a tape-recorded telephone interview. Foster agreed and the interview took place on March 21, 1995.

When we asked him why he had never mentioned the so-called “press release” when his article was published in Dialogue, he responded: “I was really trying to avoid polemizing the issue . . . I didn’t bring up the issue because I didn’t think it was terribly germane at that point . . .”

If it was irrelevant in 1984, one would wonder why it became so important in 1994. We felt that it was an ad hominem attack on us influenced by his own anger towards us and doubted that it would serve any useful purpose to answer his attack. We felt that we had more than enough arguments with Mormons and that it would be foolish to get side-tracked into a argument with a non-Mormon who professes to be neutral. If he had claimed that we made serious textual errors in our work, we certainly would have responded at the time.

In any case, the fact that we did not give Foster any publicity must have festered in his mind for a long time. In the 1994 version of his article he wrote: “Subsequent to the publication of my article . . . the Tanners have never directly alluded to it in print, nor have they ever written to me to express approval or disapproval of any aspect of it” (Differing Visions, page 362, n. 20).

Actually, we did tell Foster we were displeased with his article when he asked us about it, and he, in turn, sent us a number of demeaning letters. Foster’s long-suppressed anger over the fact that he had not received the attention he had expected seems to have finally surfaced.

The reader will remember that in his printed statement, Foster claimed that it was “After more than a month of waiting” that he began to be concerned that we might not meet with him. However, in a letter to us, dated Feb. 15, 1995, Foster acknowledged that it may have been even less than a month: “I . . . waited, if my memory is correct, for three to four weeks.”

Foster admitted that he had not found his original correspondence: “I still don’t have . . . the direct correspondence located but there is no question that it is somewhere . . . it probably will surface before I die . . .” In another conversation with Foster, however, he indicated that he may not have saved any of his correspondence with us. We, in fact, had to provide him with a photocopy of his first letter to us which was written in 1982.

Since so much time had elapsed, it was hard for us to remember all the details about what had happened in 1982, and Foster’s mind seemed to be just as fuzzy. He asked Jerald some questions about how the interview was eventually set up:

> Do you have any indication of when you actually responded to me? . . . we made some sort of contact. Did you call me? I don’t think you did. I thought you must have sent me something, but I don’t remember.

We discussed the possibility that Sandra’s letter to Foster may have been delivered to Georgia Tech instead of Yellow Springs, Ohio: Lawrence Foster: “You think you could have sent something off to Georgia Tech and not gotten to me?” Jerald Tanner: “Oh, yeah, I think we sent it to Georgia Tech . . . and I think the letter was returned.” Lawrence Foster: “Oh, really. Well that’s too bad. . . . I apologize if . . . I’ve made more of this than it was.”

Foster acknowledged that he “was back and forth between Georgia Tech and . . . southern Ohio” and that he “came back a couple of times briefly” to Georgia Tech. This whole situation regarding the two addresses, may have led to the letter being returned to us.

However this may be, Mr. Foster could have corrected the whole situation by simply making a phone call to us. Within just a few minutes we could have told him exactly when we could meet with him. Instead of doing this, he resorted to a very bizarre way of dealing with the problem—he began to call other individuals. For instance, he first called H. Michael Marquardt in Sandy, Utah. In his letter to us Foster said, “I called Michael Marquardt . . . and asked him if he knew why I was getting no response from you.”

In his article in Differing Visions Foster claims that Mr. Marquardt told him that we were afraid to meet with him: “I learned through a mutual acquaintance [identified in Foster’s letter as Michael Marquardt] that the Tanners were uneasy about meeting with me and had not decided whether they would agree to an interview.”

We were certain that Mr. Marquardt would not tell Foster such a thing because we had never indicated that we were “uneasy” about meeting with him. Significantly, Marquardt claims that he did not make such a statement to Mr. Foster. He had absolutely no reason to believe that we were running from Foster. Mr. Marquardt, however, did call us and inform us that Foster had called him, and he indicated that he thought it was very strange that Foster would call him about the interview instead of us.

Lawrence Foster then made another unusual move; instead of calling us, he called George D. Smith, who later presided over the session of the Mormon History Association in which Foster read his paper regarding our work. According to Smith, Foster spoke very rapidly and displayed a good deal of hostility toward us. He claimed that he was having a great deal of difficulty getting us to consent to have an interview with him. Smith then asked Foster why he didn’t do “the obvious thing”—i.e., pick up the telephone and call us about the matter.

In our taped-recorded interview with Lawrence Foster, Jerald asked him this question: “If the answer was delayed in the mail—you didn’t get it—did you ever attempt . . . to call us on the phone?” Foster answered:

> Well, I was . . . in a residence in . . . southern Ohio, doing research . . . I did not have as good access as I would have liked to that. . . . I probably should have called you, but I guess quite frankly I believed in putting everything in writing so that I could . . . verify it because of your propensity for making capital issues out of very minor things. . . . Perhaps in retrospect I should have called you earlier . . .

Significantly, in his letter to us in 1982, Dr. Foster did not indicate that he was in any rush to receive an answer to his letter. He, in fact, wrote that he would not be in Salt Lake City until “May 9 through . . . May 14.” Since his letter was dated Feb. 15, there was well over two months to set up the exact date of the interview. In the tape-recorded interview, however, Foster indicated that he thought he was coming to Salt Lake City in April. After we pointed out that he had made a mistake, he commented as follows:

> . . . maybe . . . I was jumping the gun there, but, anyhow you’re right that I should have called you on the phone. . . . I’ve always been a little bit shy on the phone myself, and I prefer—especially if I have something that is controversial—to do it by correspondence. . . . almost anything that is connected with you is controversial by either you make it controversial or other people make it controversial.

It is obvious that he had a great deal of fear that we would not consent to an interview. His concern was not justified. Even if we had known he was hostile, we would have met with him to find out why a non-Mormon scholar, who professes to be neutral, would hold so much resentment against us.

In his tape-recorded interview with us, Lawrence Foster stated:

> Well, I would have called you eventually, but it did seem to me that I was used to working with correspondence . . . especially on . . . potentially sensitive topics . . . I really did not feel that I wanted to get into a premature exchange with you at that point.

THE ABORTED PRESS RELEASE

On February 15, 1995, Mr. Foster finally sent us the copy of the press release which he says he wrote himself:

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

The controversial anti-Mormon writers, Jerald and Sandra Tanner, have repeatedly attacked the Mormon Church for its alleged secrecy and refusal to answer their letters. Recently, however, the Tanners themselves refused to be interviewed by the noted non-Mormon scholar, Lawrence Foster, of the Georgia Institute of Technology in Atlanta. Foster is currently working on a major study analyzing the Tanners’ life and work.
He requested that they meet with him during his week-long visit to Utah, May 6-14, but they refused.

“The situation is really ironical,” Foster comments. “For years the Tanners have been constantly attacking the Mormon Church for its supposed secrecy. Now when they have the opportunity of presenting their case to a recognized scholar who is preparing a thorough treatment of their life and work, they won’t even agree to be interviewed. I can only conclude that if one uses the Tanners’ own standards of judgment, they must be afraid that they have something to hide or else that in a candid interview they would be unable to state their case persuasively. I still hope, of course, that the Tanners will change their minds and agree to be interviewed. But their actions so far don’t speak very highly for their confidence in the correctness of their own cause.”

Foster is the author of the highly acclaimed recent book, Religion and Sexuality, published by Oxford University Press. In that book, he provides the first detailed study of the origin and development of Mormon polygamy that has been written by a non-Mormon who had full access to the LDS archival holdings on polygamy in Salt Lake City. Praise for the study has come from LDS, non-Mormon, and RLDS scholars alike, who have described it as the first truly objective treatment of this controversial subject. Foster hopes to do a similarly objective treatment of the Tanners. “It is hard, though,” he concludes, “when they won’t even agree to meet with me or cooperate in any way. I just can’t see how they can hope to maintain any credibility when they are so secretive about themselves and what they are doing.”

In our opinion it seems highly unlikely that people in the news media would have paid any attention to this self-serving “press release.” They certainly were not very interested in our work in 1982. However this may be, in our telephone interview with Foster he related the following:

I don’t believe that I ever gave him [George Smith] a copy of it [i.e. the press release], no . . . this was sort of an exercise. I figured, look, if the Tanners are not going to meet with me, if they’re not even going to respond to me, and they’ve been complaining all these years about other people not responding to them, well, I’m going to hit them back and give them a little taste of their own medicine. And if I have to do that . . . I’ll get quite a bit of . . . publicity out of it, if I have to do that, but . . . my goal all along was to get an interview with you.

We were absolutely stunned when we learned that Lawrence Foster was claiming that he had only agreed to meet with him after he had threatened to release a statement to the news media attacking our credibility. Neither one of us had ever heard about such a “press release.” Foster made it very clear in the tape-recorded interview that he never told us about the press release.

Michael Marquardt was also disturbed by the statement and claimed he did not know anything about the matter until he looked at the book, Differing Visions. We asked Foster about this and he responded that although he had called Marquardt on the phone, “I certainly didn’t tell him that I was thinking of . . . drafting a press release . . .”

In his letter of Feb. 15, 1995, Foster mentioned that George Smith was the one who could have conveyed the message concerning the press release to us. When we checked with Mr. Smith, he remembered Foster was very angry with us, but had no recollection of the press release. Furthermore, and even more important, Smith does not remember informing us about the so-called press release. It is obvious that unless someone informed us about the press release it could not possibly have anything to do with our agreement to meet with Foster.

In any case, in the interview with us Foster admitted that he probably didn’t give Smith a copy of the press release and was not even certain that he had mentioned it to him:

. . . I don’t think I sent him a press release. I think I talked with him about it, and I think I asked him if he . . . knew . . . if there was some reason why you wouldn’t want to meet with me, or something. But . . . again . . . I can’t document [it]—look, peoples’ memories are often fallible after a matter of months or a year . . . and I can’t—I was . . . in a very different environment doing research, in a very different location, and as you can see I have trouble even locating . . . the original written correspondence, which I am sure I have, but I’m still trying to track it down.”

Mr. Foster also stated: “I did mention that I was thinking of doing that, as I recall, and then again I don’t know for sure. It’s been, again, a long time, but my recollection is that . . . I at least floated the idea of a press release to . . . George Smith.”

To Lawrence Foster’s credit, after we thoroughly explained the situation, he was willing to concede that he could have been mistaken about the matter:

I apologize then for that particular thing which would be an error then . . . it gives the wrong impression on that . . . I wish we could get the actual dates straight on . . . when these different things happen[ed], but it may be hard to reconstruct that unless I’ve got some notes in my files somewhere.

Mr. Foster, in fact, went so far as to acknowledge that there may have been inaccuracy in his charge against us:

Well, again, I made a supposition then that was incorrect . . . in my note 20. I may not have mentioned the press release. I think I talked with him about the idea of doing it, but I certainly didn’t send him the actual item . . . Well, I’m sorry if . . . there’s been any inaccuracy in that note.

When Foster speaks of note 20 in the book, Differing Visions, he is referring to the very note that Matthew Roper uses in an attempt to undermine our work.

While we are relieved that Foster acknowledged the error, we do hope that he will ask the publishers of Differing Visions to remove this spurious note from the book.

As noted above, a simple phone call from Lawrence Foster would have saved him a great deal of embarrassment. At any rate, we do not accuse Foster of lying. He seems, however, to have allowed his anger to dominate his thinking. Before we discussed the matter with him, he probably really believed that he had to force us to submit to an interview with him.
WHY USE FOSTER?

While we can understand why some Mormons might enjoy reading Lawrence Foster’s attack on us, it seems absolutely incredible that the FARMS-BYU scholars would use Foster as a witness against us. Don’t they realize that Foster is as opposed to some of the most important beliefs of the Mormon Church as he is to our work? In the tape-recorded interview with Foster he said: “. . . If you follow . . . my article correctly, you’ll see that I’m criticizing both you and the Mormons in various ways.”

In the same interview Foster frankly stated: “My interest in Mormonism is . . . in what really happened with Joseph Smith or with these various things, and I [it?] doesn’t matter to me whether the official line is right or wrong . . . the official line is almost always wrong if you get down to specifics.”

Interestingly, Lawrence Foster acknowledged that he found our work on Mormon polygamy to be “very useful” when he was writing his book, Religion and Sexuality: The Shakers, the Mormons, and the Oneida Community:

By compiling most of the major published sources bearing on controversial topics in Mormonism, the Tanners have highlighted issues which need to be resolved. For example, I found their study of Mormon polygamy very useful as a compilation of primary evidence on that topic when I was preparing my study, Religion and Sexuality. . . . their prior search of the literature saved me much time and alerted me to issues I would need to resolve. The impact of the Tanners’ publication of primary Mormon printed documents also must not be underestimated. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1984, page 47)

On page 338 of his book, Religion and Sexuality, note 20, Foster wrote: “The assiduous anti-Mormon writers Jerald and Sandra Tanner have collected a few examples of slayings in Utah that were carried out in the classic blood atonement style . . . Jerald and Sandra Tanner, The Mormon Kingdom, 2 vols.”

Professor Foster mentioned our book, Joseph Smith and Polygamy, a number of times in his work. He also referred to other books we had printed.

In his book, Religion and Sexuality, page 296, note 15, Foster said he had come “to the conclusion that the Book of Mormon is probably best understood, at least in part, as a trance-related production.” He also said that in his opinion Joseph Smith was “acting as an unusually gifted trance figure . . .” (Ibid.)

In our tape-recorded interview with Foster he made it clear that he believed the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith became involved in polygamy because he, “had some sort of sex drive . . . it is probably not too hard to figure out that he had a sex problem, too . . . anybody who takes, let’s say, arguably twenty to thirty to [or?] more women as plural wives presumably has an ample sex drive.”

In his book, Religion and Sexuality, page 126, Foster commented: “To be sure, no serious scholar would deny that sex drives influenced the introduction of polygamy.”

Lawrence Foster also believes that the evidence shows that Joseph Smith was an adulterer:

Finally, what accounts for the apparent discrepancies between theory and practice in the early development of polygamy, particularly the evidence that Joseph took a number of plural wives who already had living husbands? . . . According to Mormon and non-Mormon accounts, Emma [Joseph Smith’s wife] attempted to keep track of Joseph Smith’s possible liaisons and head them off. . . .

Although admissions of unorthodox marital relations are obviously a highly personal matter, many of Joseph Smith’s plural wives testified explicitly that they had full sexual relations with him. Emily D. P. Partridge said she “roomed” with Smith . . . she also admitted that she had “carnal intercourse” with him. . . .

Apparent discrepancies between belief and practice were numerous during the chaotic early days of the development of polygamous practice. Perhaps the most severe conceptual difficulties are raised by the strong evidence that Joseph Smith took as plural wives a number of women who had living husbands and that he asked some of his closest followers to give him their wives as well. . . . If one accepts Latter-day Saint sources, it seems clear that Smith had full sexual relations with some women who were at the same time legally the wives of other men. Based on such evidence, it is also clear that Smith did ask some of his followers to give him their wives, whatever his motives in such cases may have been. (Religion and Sexuality, pages 151, 155-156)

JOSEPH MENTALLY ILL?

A number of years ago we read in a newsletter published by people interested in Mormon history that Lawrence Foster was at a hotel in Salt Lake City arguing with Mormon scholars about whether Joseph Smith was mentally ill. Later, Foster called us and wanted to know if we had any information to support his hypothesis. Surprisingly, in 1993, Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, published an article by Foster which set forth his belief that Joseph Smith might have been mentally ill. On page 15, Foster emphasized “that the analysis presented here about Joseph Smith’s possible tendencies toward manic-depressive mental states is not intended as anything but an hypothesis.”

In his article Foster suggests that Joseph Smith’s involvement in polygamy may, in fact, have been the result of his having manic-depression:

To place this issue into a larger context, let us return to the perspectives of William James . . . and realize that religious prophets, including Joseph Smith, are in some sense, at least initially, “sick,” “disturbed,” or “abnormal.”. . . Why did Joseph Smith feel so preoccupied with introducing plural marriage among his followers . . . Was there some hidden psychological key that could help make sense of this seemingly obsessive drive? . . . A variety of factors including . . . Joseph Smith’s own strong sex drive all made plural marriage an idea with considerable power for the Mormon prophet . . . Was Smith, as some of his previously most loyal followers at the time asserted, losing touch with reality during his final months in Nauvoo?

A compelling psychological approach to explaining this and other puzzling features of the Mormon prophet’s behavior during this period was suggested to me by a Mormon psychiatrist, Dr. Jess Groesbeck . . . gradually the
We seriously doubt that Foster was trying to offend the Mormons. In fact, he probably felt that his work would help Mormon intellectuals to replace the official story of the church with something more believable.

If the First Vision is viewed as an hallucination, and the revelation to establish polygamy as a natural result of manic-depression, then one can be more sympathetic with Joseph Smith’s strange behavior. Under this hypothesis many things about Joseph Smith can be explained. For example, in our interview with Foster he stated that it could account for, “Joseph Smith’s ferocious anger in . . . the last couple of years of his life.” It could also help explain why Smith became the “head of his own private army, became ‘king’ of his secret Kingdom of God . . . [and] ran for president of the United States . . .”

The idea that Joseph Smith was mentally ill has been around for a long time. In discussing theories about the origin of the Book of Mormon, Francis W. Kirkham, a Mormon writer, mentioned one of the anti-Mormon theories: “The Book of Mormon was written by Joseph Smith, a person subject to epileptic fits in early life and later to other pathological mental conditions” (A New Witness For Christ in America, 1951, vol. 1, page 350). Dr. Kirkham then cited the following from the book, The Founder of Mormonism, written by Isaac Woodbridge Riley in 1902:

Thurlow Weed, when first Joseph submitted to him the Book of Mormon, said that he was either crazy or a very shallow impostor. There is no call for so harsh a judgment . . . There is a truer and, at the same time, more charitable explanation—it is, in a word, that Joseph Smith, Junior, was an epileptic.

While we have always been somewhat cautious about promoting the idea that Joseph Smith had mental problems, we must admit that Foster’s work is impressive and certainly merits serious discussion. Although we do not feel competent to say that Joseph Smith was afflicted with manic-depression, it does seem that there was something seriously amiss in his life.

It is interesting to note that Joseph Smith’s grandfather, Solomon Mack, seemed to suffer from fits. He even wrote a book detailing some of his fits, “severe accidents,” and unusual visions he received. In his book, A Narraïte [sic] of the Life of Solomon Mack, Joseph Smith’s grandfather wrote:

I afterwards was taken with a fit, when traveling with an axe under my arm . . . I was senseless from one until five p.m. When I came to myself . . . I was all covered with blood and much cut and bruised. When I came to my senses I could not tell where I had been nor where I was going. But by good luck I went right and arrived at the first house . . . (As cited in Joseph Smith’s New England Heritage, by Richard L. Anderson, 1971, page 43)

Although Dr. Anderson mentions that, “There were also ‘some fits’ among his later disorders,” he rejects the idea that he was “afflicted with hereditary epilepsy, which too neatly explains his grandson’s visions as epileptic seizures, with flashing lights and lapses into unconsciousness. But the case of neither grandfather nor grandson fits such speculation” (Ibid., page 13).

According to Harold I. Kaplan and Benjamin J. Sadock’s Comprehensive Textbook of Psychiatry/IV, . . . “The increased activity often takes the form of sexual promiscuity, political involvement, and religious concern. . . . Delusions and hallucinations are not unusual. . . . It is quite common for the person to communicate with God and to have it revealed that he or she has a special purpose or mission. Patients frequently describe themselves as an ‘organ’ of God through whom God speaks to the world.”

In the various forms of manic-depressive illness, the manic highs alternate in bipolar fashion with periods of depression. . . .

How do descriptions of psychological mania square with Joseph Smith’s actions during the last three years of his life . . . To anyone who has worked closely with the records of the Mormon prophet’s life during those final years, the parallels are striking . . .

Most obvious is the Mormon prophet’s extraordinary expansiveness and grandiosity throughout this period. During the last year of his life . . . Smith served as mayor of Nauvoo and head of his own private army, became ‘king’ of his secret Kingdom of God . . . ran for president of the United States . . . and was the “husband” in some sense of dozens of wives . . .

In no area were Joseph Smith’s manic qualities more evident than in his efforts to introduce and practice polygamy during the last three years of his life. The point at which Joseph Smith began systematically to introduce polygamy to his closest associates has strong suggestions of mania . . . his subsequent surge of activity [sic] with the sixteen or more women with whom he appears to have sustained sexual relations as plural wives (the full number may have been much greater) is even more suggestive of the hypersexuality that often accompanies manic periods. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter, 1993, pages 4, 7, 9-13)

Lawrence Foster’s hypothesis that Joseph Smith may have been mentally ill would be a very hard pill for the FARMS-BYU scholars to swallow. To many Mormons the idea that Joseph Smith was not mentally competent is far more offensive than calling him a fraud. Most people prefer to believe that they are too intelligent to be misled by someone who is mentally ill. Consequently, some Mormons would consider this to be the ultimate insult to their intelligence.
In a footnote on page 166, Anderson says that “It is even possible that Solomon used ‘fit’ in the early sense of ‘a mortal crisis, a bodily state (whether painful or not) that betokens death.’”

Nevertheless, Solomon Mack described so many accidents in his book that it would make one wonder if there was something seriously wrong with the man.

In any case, in the official account of Joseph Smith’s First Vision he wrote:

> . . . I was seized upon by some power which entirely overcame me, and had such an astonishing influence over me as to bind my tongue so that I could not speak. Thick darkness gathered around me, and it seemed to me for a time as if I were doomed to sudden destruction. (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History, verse 15)

Joseph Smith described the remarkable vision he saw and then went on to say:

> When I came to myself again, I found myself lying on my back, looking up to heaven. When the light had departed, I had no strength; but soon recovering in some degree, I went home. ( Ibid., verse 20)

While Joseph Smith claimed that he saw an actual vision, there is a similarity to his grandfather’s experience in that both of them were overpowered and passed out. Interestingly, both Joseph and his grandfather used the expression, “When I came to myself” (compare verse 20 with Solomon Mack’s account cited above).

Another account of the vision appears in Joseph Smith’s 1835 dairy. This account contains some eerie material about a strange noise Joseph heard that was not published in the official version:

> My tongue seemed to be swollen in my mouth, so that I could not utter. I heard a noise behind me like some person walking towards me. I strove again to pray but could not. The noise seemed to draw nearer. I sprung up on my feet and looked around, but saw no person or thing that was calculated to produce the noise of walking. (An American Prophet’s Record: The Diaries and Journals of Joseph Smith, edited by Scott H. Faulring, 1987, page 51)

It is interesting to note that some of those who suffer from epilepsy claim they hear “peculiar sounds” just prior to an attack (see The American Medical Association Family Medical Guide, 1987, page 289). Whatever the case may be, the fact that Joseph Smith claimed he heard the sound of “some person walking towards” him whom he was unable to see is certainly weird.

Some critics of the LDS Church claim that the spooky elements of the vision, such as Joseph Smith being “seized upon by some power which entirely overcame” him, the “thick darkness,” and the attempt to “bind” his tongue prove that the vision was demonic. Mormons, on the other hand, maintain that God thwarted an attack by Satan and gave Joseph a wonderful vision. Foster’s hypothesis gives another alternative: Joseph Smith may have suffered from an hallucination.

Joseph’s First Vision experience was not the only time that he passed out. Later, Joseph Smith claimed he was visited in the night three times by an angel who told him about the gold plates. Joseph wrote:

> I shortly after arose from my bed, and, as usual, went to the necessary labors of that day; but, in attempting to work as at other times, I found my strength so exhausted as to render me entirely unable. My father, who was laboring along with me, discovered something to be wrong with me, and told me to go home. I started with the intention of going to the house; but, in attempting to cross the fence out of the field where we were, my strength entirely failed me, and I fell helpless on the ground, and for a long time was quite unconscious of anything.

The first thing that I can recollect was a voice speaking unto me, calling me by name. I looked up, and beheld the same messenger . . . (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History, verses 48-49)

It is also interesting to note that both Solomon Mack and Joseph Smith claimed they prayed for God’s forgiveness. Both maintained that they had a spiritual experience in which they saw a bright light in their house on more than one occasion. Mack wrote:

> I was distressed to think how I had abused the Sabbath and had not taken warning from my wife. About midnight I saw a light about a foot from my face as bright as fire; the doors were all shut and no one stirring in the house. I thought by this that I had but a few moments to live, and oh what distress I was in. I prayed that the Lord would have mercy on my soul and deliver me from this horrible pit of sin. . . . I was in distress.

Another night soon after, I saw another light as bright as the first, at a small distance from my face, and I thought I had but a few moments to live. (As cited in Joseph Smith’s New England Heritage, page 54)

Joseph Smith wrote that after he had his First Vision, he was severely tempted:

> . . . I was left to all kinds of temptations; and mingled with all kinds of society, I frequently fell into many foolish errors, and displayed the weakness of youth, and the foibles of human nature; which, I am sorry to say, led me into divers temptations, offensive in the sight of God. . . . on the evening of the above-mentioned twenty-first of September, after I had retired to my bed for the night, I betook myself to prayer and supplication to Almighty God for forgiveness of all my sins and follies . . .

While I was thus in the act of calling upon God, I discovered a light appearing in my room, which continued to increase until the room was lighter than at noonday, when immediately a personage appeared at my bedside . . . The room was exceedingly light . . . He called me by name . . . He said there was a book deposited, written upon gold plates . . .

> After this communication, I saw the light in the room begin to gather immediately around . . . the room was left as it had been before the heavenly light had made its appearance. I lay musing on the singularity of the scene . . . when in the midst of my meditation, suddenly discovered that my room was again beginning to get lighted, as it were, the same heavenly messenger was again by my bedside. (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History, verses 28-30, 32-34, 43-44)

Joseph Smith, of course, also asserted that when he had his first vision he “saw a pillar of light exactly over my head, above the brightness of the sun . . . " (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History, verse 17) While it is only a matter of speculation, if Foster is correct in his hypothesis regarding manic depression, the fact that Joseph Smith wrote, “When I came to myself again, I found myself lying on my back, looking up into heaven” (verse 20) could be significant. As he was lying there on the ground the rays of the sun may have seemed like a blinding light shining in his eyes. Since Smith claimed the vision occurred in the woods early in the spring, and that he was “looking up into heaven,” it is certainly possible that the sun shining down through the branches could have given him the impression he was having a vision.

In addition to these parallels, both Smith and his grandfather had an experience in which they believed they were addressed by God or Christ. Solomon Mack wrote: “. . . I was called by my Christian name . . .” (pages 54-55). Smith also stated: “One of them spake unto me, calling me by name . . .” (verse 17).

If Joseph Smith experienced hallucinations, as Foster seems to believe, it would go a long way towards explaining why his story of the First Vision contains so many glaring contradictions. In the first account, which he wrote in 1832, he said there was only one personage present in the vision: the Lord Jesus Christ (see An American Prophet’s Record: The Diaries and Journals of Joseph Smith, pages 5-6).

In the version written in 1835, Smith maintained that there were two persons whom he did not identify. In addition, however, he also said that he “saw many angels in this vision . . .” (Ibid., page 51). Finally, in the official account published in 1842, Smith claimed that he saw both God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ! This account omits the presence of angels in the vision.

Besides a number of other contradictions, Smith claimed that the vision occurred at the time of a revival in the Palmyra-Manchester area. In his official account he claimed that the First Vision took place “early in the spring of eighteen hundred and twenty.” Wesley P. Walters, however, demonstrated conclusively that there was no such revival in the Palmyra-Manchester area. In fact, Walters found hard evidence that the revival did not occur until the fall of 1824! For a great deal more about problems in the First Vision see our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 143-162-D, or Inventing Mormonism, by H. Michael Marquardt and Wesley P. Walters.

If Joseph Smith suffered from seizures and hallucinations, it would make it easier to understand why he could not tell a consistent story about the First Vision. As we have shown above, in Joseph’s official account of the vision he said he felt that he was “doomed to destruction.” He also revealed that he “was ready to sink into despair and abandon myself to destruction . . .”

In his book, Hearts Made Glad: The Charges of Intemperance Against Joseph Smith the Mormon Prophet, LaMar Petersen wrote the following:

Joseph’s associates sometimes spoke of his paleness when “in vision” or when receiving a revelation. A daughter of Adaline Knight Belnap recorded her mother’s impression of the Prophet in an instance of spiritual (spirituous?) passivity. “How well she remembers one day before her father died (Vinson Knight) of a little excitement in school. The children were busy when the school room door was carefully opened and two gentlemen entered, carrying the limp form of Joseph Smith. The children all sprang to their feet, for Brother Joseph lay helpless in their arms, his head resting on his brother’s shoulder, his face pale as death, but his eyes were open, though he seemed not to see things earthly. The teacher quieted them by telling them that Brother Joseph was in a revelation, and they were carrying him to his office above the schoolroom. (Hearts Made Glad, 1975, page 206)

While there is no question that Joseph Smith and other early Mormon leaders did use alcoholic beverages (see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 405-413), this strange incident could be viewed as evidence supporting Foster’s hypothesis of manic depression.

While one can only speculate on whether Joseph Smith inherited mental problems, it is certainly possible that traumatic events he experienced could have had a serious effect upon him. For example, when he was just a young boy, he had an extremely bad infection in his leg. According to his mother, it finally came to the point that the doctors were convinced that “amputation is absolutely necessary in order to save his life.” His mother, however, requested the doctors make “one more effort” to save the leg.

Joseph’s mother went on to state that he refused to take any brandy or wine before the operation. Consequently, he had nothing to kill the pain. According to Mrs. Smith, the operation was horrific:

The surgeons commenced operating boring into the bone of his leg, first on one side of the bone where it was affected, and then on the other side, after which they broke it off with a pair of forceps or pincers. They thus took away large pieces of the bone. When they broke off the first piece, Joseph screamed out so loudly, that I could not forbear running to him . . .

When the third piece was taken away, I burst into the room again—and oh, my God! what a spectacle for a mother’s eye! The wound torn open, the blood still gushing from it, and the bed literally covered with blood. Joseph was as pale as a corpse . . . (Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith The Prophet, and his Progenitors for Many Generations, by Lucy Smith, 1853, pages 63-65)

Although Joseph Smith dictated his recollection of the operation for his History of the Church, it was never included in the published History. While we noticed this story in a microfilm of the History in the 1960s, it was not available to the public until 1970. Mormon scholar Reed Durham finally published it in Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1970, pages 481-482.

Joseph Smith claimed that the illness came upon him when he “was five years old or thereabouts” and said that he “endured the most acute suffering for a long time . . .” When amputation was suggested he responded: “. . . as young as I was, I utterly refused to give my assent to the operation, but consented to the Trying an experiment by removing a large portion of the bone . . .”

Smith went on to claim that he suffered persecution at this early period of his life, which, of course, was years before he had his First Vision:

. . . I was reduced so very low that my mother could carry me with ease.

After I began to get about I went on crutches till I started for the State of New York where my father had gone for the purpose of preparing a place for the removal of his family, which he affected by sending a man after us by the name of Caleb Howard . . . We fell in with a family by the name of Gates who were travelling west, and Howard drove me from the waggon and made me travel in my weak state through the snow 40 miles per day for several days, during which time I suffered the most excruciating weariness and pain, and all this that Mr. Howard might enjoy the society of two of Mr. Gates' daughters which he took on the wagon where I should hive [sic] Rode, and thus he continued to do day after day [sic] after day through the Journey and when my brothers remonstrated with Mr. Howard for his treatment to me, he would knock them down with the butt of his whipp [sic].—When we arrived at Utica, N. York Howard threw the goods out of the waggon into the street and attempted to run away with the Horses and waggon, but my mother seized the horses by the reigns. On the way from Utica, I was left to ride on the last sleigh . . . I was knocked down by the driver, one of Gate's Sons, and left to wollow [sic] in my blood until a stranger came along, picked me up, and carried me to the Town of Palmyra. (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer, 1970, pages 481-482)

Dr. Reed Durham noted that this document is found in Joseph Smith, 'History,' Book A-1, pp. 131-132, located in the LDS Church Historian's Office . . . (Ibid., page 480)

In her book, Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith, page 69, Mrs. Smith did mention the trouble she had with Mr. Howard and also stated that he mistreated "my children, especially Joseph. He would compel him to travel miles at a time on foot, notwithstanding he was still lame."

Interestingly, however, she says nothing about her son's incredible claim that he walked in his "weak state through the snow 40 miles per day for several days . . ." Moreover, Mrs. Smith is silent with regard to the fact that Joseph claimed he was "knocked down by the driver . . . and left to wollow [sic] in my blood until a stranger came along, picked me up, and carried me to the Town of Palmyra."

The question might be raised as to whether Joseph Smith was exaggerating or hallucinating. On the other hand, although it is difficult to believe, his mother may have forgotten the incident.

It does not seem possible that Joseph Smith, who was "still lame" from the operation, could have walked "40 miles per day for several days" in the condition he was in after his operation. Mormon writers state that the operation was so severe that Joseph Smith walked with a slight limp for the rest of his life.

Joseph Smith's statement that he "was five years old or thereabouts" when he had the operation is incorrect; he was actually just over seven years old at the time. Mormon writer LeRoy S. Wirthlin shows that Joseph's mother places the date "of two of Mr. Gates' daughters which he took on the wagon . . ." Moreover, Mrs. Smith is silent with regard to the fact that Joseph claimed he was "knocked down by the driver . . . and left to wollow [sic] in my blood until a stranger came along, picked me up, and carried me to the Town of Palmyra."

The next morning I went to see Elder Rigdon, and found him crazy . . . they had dragged him by his heels . . . so high from the ground that he could not raise his head from the rough, frozen surface, which lacerated it exceedingly; and when he saw me he called to his wife to bring a razor . . . to kill me. Sister Rigdon left the room, and he asked me to bring his razor . . . he wanted to kill his wife; and he continued delirious some days.

A few years later, Sidney Rigdon was still threatening peoples lives. In the Mormon Church's newspaper, The Nauvoo Neighbor, December 4, 1844, Apostle Orson Hyde reported:

Elder Rigdon has been associated with Joseph and Hyrum Smith as a counselor to the Church, and he told me in Far West that it was imperative of the Church to obey the word of Joseph Smith, or the presidency, without question or inquiry, and that if there were any that would not, they should have their throats cut from ear [to] ear.
After Smith’s death, Rigdon was finally excommunicated from the church. In his book, Sidney Rigdon: A Portrait of Religious Excess, Richard S. Van Wagoner, presents rather convincing evidence that Rigdon was suffering from severe manic depression—the same affliction Lawrence Foster would like to link to Joseph Smith.

If the FARMS-BYU scholars are going to use Lawrence Foster as an authority against us, they should also inform their readers that Professor Foster believes that Joseph Smith was an adulterer and suggests that he may have been mentally ill.

FOSTER DISDAINS OUR BELIEFS

Mormon defenders who use Foster to criticize us should also make it clear that one of the main problems Foster has with us is that he simply does not like our religious beliefs. This is very important to note because some of the very things Foster objects to are found in Mormonism.

In his article in Dialogue, Summer 1984, page 36, Foster makes this very clear: “. . . I am equally critical of the narrowminded Protestant fundamentalism which the Tanners have substituted for the Mormonism that they decry.” Speaking of us, Foster also says he feels a “deep sadness that they are still largely unable to pass beyond that narrow, pharisaical Mormon literalism with which they grew up and which sees only the external shell of religion and not its deeper internal spirit” (Paper by Lawrence Foster, read at the Mormon History Association, May 6, 1983, typed copy, page 25).

Foster is not disturbed with us because we belong to some strange cult. Instead, we are criticized because we believe in traditional Christianity—the same religion that is embraced by many millions of people throughout the world. Because we do not go along with Foster’s views on religion, he feels that our research on Mormonism is of little value.

On the last page of his article in Differing Visions Foster wrote: “Until the Tanners are prepared to use consistent standards of judgment for their own faith as well as that of others, their stance cannot be taken seriously by scholars or by the general public” (page 365). Professor Foster is very dogmatic about this matter. Foster clearly desires to pressure us into changing our beliefs about Christianity.

Professor Foster is extremely dogmatic about this matter. While he does not openly attack Christianity, he is obviously trying to get us to conform to his disbelief in some of the principal doctrines of Christianity.

Foster likes to use the phrase “narrowminded Protestant fundamentalism” when referring to our religion. This, of course, is an attempt to discredit us. While he would probably like to be referred to as a liberal Christian, he does not seem very liberal in his stance towards those who believe in orthodox Christianity. He is, in fact, more like a fundamentalist who simply cannot tolerate dissenting opinions.

Although some liberal Christians can sometimes be a little condescending to us, we generally get along well with them. In Foster’s case, however, there is no middle ground. If we do not accept his conclusions regarding religion, he resorts to ridicule.

While we disagree strongly with some of Foster’s opinions, we feel that he has every right to publicly express his views. In fact, we believe that both liberal Christians and non-Christians often have important things to say. For example, in the past many orthodox Christians as well as Mormons opposed equal rights for blacks. It is obvious now that this was a serious mistake. They should have listened carefully to what non-Christians and liberals were saying about that important matter.

However this may be, Dr. Foster is convinced that he has far more mature views regarding religion than we do. He, in fact, believes that he has developed a “distinctive sense of mission” to make people “become better Methodists, Catholics, Jews, Buddhists, Mormons, or whatever” (Dialogue, Autumn 1983, page 90).

Consequently, although he believes that “narrowminded” Protestants like us should be silent about Mormonism, he apparently feels that it is his prerogative to criticize the Mormons and to help set the church on the right course. For example, in an article printed in Dialogue Foster wrote:

My perspective corresponds neither to that of most Mormons nor of most anti-Mormons . . . I shall deal briefly with one topic which constitutes the crux of my personal difference with conventional Mormonism—the Latter-day Saint concept of true religious authority . . . . Joseph Smith made the mistake of trying to set up a new religious system which would be free of all the flaws of the old imperfect systems. In my opinion, he inevitably failed . . .

Following the death of Joseph Smith . . . Mormonism gradually moved away from its prophet’s powerful, albeit incomplete, vision . . . The message has been watered down until for many it is like eating a poor pabulum—a pabulum characterized by the belief that simply by following Church leadership unquestioningly one will have achieved true faith. At times Mormonism appears to be a public relations shell without substance. Like the biblical Pharisees whom Jesus so sharply criticized, Mormons increasingly define themselves in terms of external behavior—not smoking, not drinking, and paying tithe—rather than seeking to understand the inner spirit which alone gives such actions meaning.

Perhaps the ultimate irony is that Joseph Smith, who introduced the temple ceremonies so important to Mormonism, would today be unable to participate in those ceremonies himself because of his own behavior. For Smith was no teetotaler; on numerous occasions throughout his life, he drank beer and wine. Indeed, he once planned to set up a bar in his Mansion House in Nauvoo. Only Emma’s refusal to countenance the action forced him to back down. Yet today, how many Saints are piously judgmental of anyone who deviates even an iota from official Church policy. So often Mormons do all the right things for all the wrong reasons. They strain out gnats and swallow camels.

Today I see in Mormonism a growing fear, a loss of true confidence in the Mormon message . . . Many Mormons, even at the highest levels of the Church, have recently begun to argue that there is simply “no middle ground”—one is either 100 percent Mormon or 100 percent anti-Mormon. While such statements are palpably and demonstrably false, they are nevertheless dangerous, especially for naive Saints . . . Commitment and challenge are vital to any faith, but let us not carry commitment to such pathological extremes that we retreat permanently into foxholes and accuse anyone who doesn’t share our curious preference of being an enemy. Such an approach makes not only for bad religion, but for bad history as well. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1983, pages 92, 96, 97)
In a letter to us, dated August 24, 1989, Mr. Foster wrote: “I read with interest your most recent discussion of the alleged ‘black hole’ in the Book of Mormon . . . I wonder if orthodox Christianity of the sort that I assume you espouse does not have a ‘black hole’ as great as or greater than anything in Mormonism in its story of the Resurrection.”

When the noted scholar Wesley P. Walters read Foster’s letter to us, he wrote the following in response:

The impression I carried away is that only if one rejects orthodox Christianity he allowed to point out falsehood in another religion. You surely did not intend to imply that anyone, except orthodox Christians, can fault Jim Jones as a false religious leader . . . . The Tanners have made their own independent study of Christianity and concluded that the position of orthodox Christianity does stand up intellectually and historically. It seems to me very arbitrary on your part for you to insist that only if they accept the conclusion of Mr. Fuller . . . conclusions that you find pleasing to your frame of mind, then alone would they be entitled to study, know or speak about material in the field of Mormonism. I hope, therefore, that in the future you can find it in your heart to deal with more charitableness in speaking of their work.

Lawrence Foster apparently thinks that we have not spent much time researching the claims of Christianity. Actually we have spent thousands of hours researching and writing about important issues like evolution, textual criticism, seeming contradictions in the Bible, and other controversial subjects. While we certainly do not claim that we have all the answers, we feel that there is sufficient evidence to place our faith in Christianity. Those who are interested in our views on the subject should read our book, A Look at Christianity.

Lawrence Foster wrote that his mother did not agree with the conservative views held by the Methodists, and that he “received both a thorough grounding in Mother’s literary and religious approach to the Bible and full biblical refutations for the arguments of fundamentalist Christianity. As a teenager, I participated regularly in church services, choir, and youth groups, yet my propensity for raising uncomfortable questions continually embroiled me in controversy. For example, I was such a disruptive influence for my conservative eighth-grade teacher that by mutual agreement I opted out of the class and spent my time in the church library reading The Interpreter’s Bible on the Book of Job . . . . It became increasingly clear to me that no specific beliefs and practices are necessarily important in themselves; what really matters is the meaning that they hold for the worshiper . . . . Though I might intellectually reject a literalistic interpretation of the Christmas story, for example, I would always feel deeply the joy of the Christmas spirit, with its message that God can work through even the most lowly and unpromising circumstances” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Autumn 1983, pages 89-90).

We do not know exactly what Foster believes about Jesus. In our interview with him he stated his “faith does not rest on the Virgin Birth” and also commented: “What I’m saying is if you’re going to criticize somebody else you should apply it to yourself. . . . in my paper on Joseph Smith and possible manic depression, I . . . bring in several religious figures including George Fox . . . and Jesus Christ as possible parallels.”

Although Foster admitted that there was very little historical evidence to go on, he wrote that, “one cannot help speculating that the most influential of all religious founding figures, Jesus of Nazareth, called the Christ by his followers, may have been subject to manic-depressive tendencies. . . . Jesus’ actions riding into Jerusalem on a donkey . . . or scourging the money changers from the temple, when juxtaposed with Jesus’ profound depression shortly before his final arrest . . . could raise the question of whether something more than normal mood swings may have been present during Jesus’ experience” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1993, page 20).

We feel that the hypothesis that Jesus may have suffered from manic-depressive tendencies is very flimsy indeed. If it is true that Jesus knew that he was going to be betrayed by Judas, take upon himself the sins of the world, suffer and be crucified in a very cruel manner, as the Bible asserts, then it is no wonder that he would have “profound depression” just before his death. If Foster had evidence that Jesus often suffered from deep depression, his argument would be more convincing.

Although it is true that Jesus drove the moneychangers out of the temple, there is no evidence that he hurt anyone. Jesus, in fact, is portrayed in the Bible as being against violence and revenge. In Matthew 5:44, we read: “But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which dispitefully use you . . .”

Joseph Smith the Mormon prophet, on the other hand, was prone to violence. While Mormon writer John J. Stewart claimed that Joseph Smith was “perhaps the most Christ-like man to live upon the earth since Jesus himself,” this conclusion is not supported by Joseph Smith’s History: “I am not so much a ‘Christian’ as many suppose I am. When a man undertakes to ride me for a horse, I feel disposed to kick up and throw him off, and ride him” (History of the Church, vol. 5, page 335).

Unlike the gentle and soft spoken man portrayed in the Mormon film, Legacy, Joseph Smith was without question a fighting prophet. He not only liked to wrestle and prove his strength, but he sometimes kicked people and struck them very hard. Historian D. Michael Quinn observed that Smith was a “church president who physically assaulted both Mormons and non-Mormons for insulting him . . .” (The Mormon Hierarchy: Origins of Power, 1994, pages 261-262).

Jedediah M. Grant, a member of the First Presidency under Brigham Young, told of the Baptist priest who came to see Joseph Smith. . . . the Baptist stood before him, and folding his arms said, “Is it possible that I now flash my optics upon a man who has conversed with my Savior?” “Yes,” says the Prophet, “I don’t know but you do; would not you like to wrestle with me?” That, you see, brought the priest right on to the thrashing floor, and he turned a somerset right straight. After he had whirled round a few times, like a duck shot in the head, he concluded that his piety had been awfully shocked . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, pp. 66-67)

Joseph Smith’s close friend, Benjamin F. Johnson, made this observation after Smith’s death:

And yet, although so social and even convivial at times, he would allow no arrogance or undue liberties.
Mormon writer Max Parkin refers to a court case against Joseph Smith in which Calvin Stoddard, Joseph Smith's brother-in-law, testified that, “Smith then came up and knocked him in the forehead with his flat hand—the blow knocked him down, when Smith repeated the blow four or five times, very hard—made him blind—that Smith afterwards came to him and asked his forgiveness ...” (Conflict at Kirtland, citing from the Painesville Telegraph, June 26, 1835).

Parkin also quotes Luke S. Johnson, who served as an apostle in the early Mormon Church, as saying that when a minister insulted Joseph Smith at Kirtland, Ohio, Smith, “boxed his ears with both hands, and turning his face towards the door, kicked him into the street,” for the man’s lack of charity” (Ibid., page 268).

In the History of the Church for the year 1843, we read of two fights Joseph Smith had in Nauvoo:

Josiah Butterfield came to my house and insulted me so outrageously that I kicked him out of the house, across the yard, and into the street. (History of the Church, vol. 5, page 316)

Bagby called me a liar, and picked up a stone to throw at me, which so enraged me that I followed him a few steps, and struck him two or three times. Esquire Daniel H. Wells stepped between us and succeeded in separating us. . . . I rode down to Alderman Whitney . . . he imposed a fine which I paid, and then returned to the political meeting. (Ibid., page 524)

On August 13, 1843, Joseph Smith admitted that he had tried to choke Walter Bagby: “I met him, and he gave me some abusive language, taking up a stone to throw at me: I seized him by the throat to choke him off” (Ibid., page 531).

After he became president of the Mormon Church, Brigham Young commented, “if you had the Prophet Joseph to deal with, you would think that I am quite mild. . . . He would not bear the usage I have borne, and would appear as though he would tear down all the houses in the city, and tear up trees by the roots, if men conducted to him in the way they have to me” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 8, pp. 317-318).

In addition to choking, kicking people out of houses and churches, knocking them in the head, boxing their ears, and tearing their clothing, the evidence indicates that he threatened people’s lives. For documentation see The Mormon Hierarchy, Origins of Power, pages 91-92.

The Testimony of Joseph Smith’s Best Friend, pages 4-5)

Criticisms, even by his associates, were rarely acceptable. Contradictions would arouse in him the lion at once. By no one of his fellows would he be superseded. . . . one or another of his associates were more than once, for their impudence, helped from the congregation by his foot. . . . He soundly thrashed his brother William . . . While with him in such fraternal, social and sometimes convivial moods, we could not then so fully realize the greatness and majesty of his calling. (Letter by Benjamin F. Johnson to Elder George S. Gibbs, 1903, as printed in The Testimony of Joseph Smith’s Best Friend, pages 4-5)

While it is true that Lawrence Foster has slapped us down a number of times in his articles and letters, we should probably point out that he has also made some good statements about us and indicated that our work has had a significant effect on Mormonism. Below are a few examples:

By contrast to the often-harsh rhetoric of their attacks on Mormonism, in person they can be kind, even gentle individuals. Disciplined, hard-working, and committed, they might seem to be almost an ideal model for Mormon missionaries . . . (Differing Visions: Dissenters in Mormon History, page 349)

Yet if the Tanners’ own work falls short as history, it nevertheless has helped stimulate historical studies. Jerald is a brilliant analyst of detail, with an almost uncanny ability to spot textual inconsistencies that demand explanation. His analysis showing that a pamphlet denunciation of Mormonism attributed to Oliver Cowdery was, in fact, a clever forgery, is only one example of research and analysis that would do credit to any professional historian. More recently and significantly, Jerald stood almost alone among those studying Mormon history in publicly raising doubts about the authenticity of the ‘Salamander letter,’ purportedly describing Joseph Smith’s early experiences that led to the production of the Book of Mormon. The vast majority of Mormon scholars had accepted as genuine this and other documents that subsequently have been shown to be forged by Mark W. Hofmann. Jerald, despite his desire to find evidence discrediting the conventional Mormon story, felt that something did not ring true about the letter, and he was prepared to voice his doubts publicly. The letter seemed to him too close to expectation to be correct.

The impact of the Tanners’ publication of primary printed documents also must not be underestimated. (Ibid., pages 351-352)

Yet the Tanners have been more than simply gadflies; in curious and often indirect ways, their work has also been a factor helping to stimulate serious Mormon Historical writing . . . their criticisms have highlighted issues that professional Mormon historians, operating from a very different perspective, have also sought to address. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1984, page 35)

Jerald and Sandra Tanner are without doubt among the most complex and multi-faceted of all the figures whom I have encountered in Mormon history, past or present . . .

From the very beginning the Tanners’ concerns were not simply doctrinal but also social. Jerald’s fierce opposition to Mormon racism, for example, has been a recurrent motif throughout his career . . . Although much of the motivation behind such publication appears to have been the polemical one of embarrassing present-day Mormons by showing the inconsistencies and changes in Mormonism since its earliest years, the larger impact of such efforts, as some Mormon historians have observed, has been to give Mormons back their heritage and to encourage serious scholarly attention to the fascinating early days of the Mormon movement . . . .

Among the most critical of the Tanners and their methods have profited, at least indirectly, because the Tanners’ allegations have spurred them to begin their own investigations into vital and still incompletely understood topics . . .

A number of those scholars who are most critical of the Tanners and their methods have profited, at least indirectly, because the Tanners’ allegations have spurred them to begin their own investigations into vital and still incompletely understood topics . . . of reasons lie behind the Mormon church’s decision to try to publicly ignore the Tanners. Basically the Tanners have adopted a brilliant, two-pronged debaters ploy which is exceedingly difficult to handle without greater knowledge and sophistication than most church leaders appear to possess. . . .

Every organization, especially if it is highly authoritarian, is dependent for its ongoing health and vitality on its critics . . . Ralph Nader has made inestimable contributions to the health and vitality of American Business even though most businessmen cannot stand him personally. By repeatedly, effectively and with incontrovertible evidence alerting the public to illegal, shoddy and dangerous business practices, Nader has spurred many different enterprises to improve their products, making them safer and more competitive. . . .

Jerald and Sandra Tanner have functioned with regard to Mormonism in much the same way that Ralph Nader has functioned with regard to American business. The Tanners have challenged the Mormon church. If it really believes in its own history, to find out what that history really was. They have challenged the Mormon church . . . to correct its sectarian provincialisms, such as the former policy of excluding Blacks from full church membership. Such challenges have obviously not been popular, yet through them the Tanners have prodded the church to begin, however haltingly and imperfectly to develop a more realistic sense of itself. I would imagine, for example, that much of the flowering of Mormon historical studies in the 1970s, which has helped to give at least some Mormons a richer and more vital knowledge of their own heritage, has been more than tangentially related to the desire of Latter Day Saint historians to prove the Tanners wrong by showing that a full and honest history of the Latter Day Saints can indeed be written. Much like the irritating grain of sand in the oyster, the result has been a pearl. . . .

My opinion is that the long-term interests of the Church . . . would best be served by moving as expeditiously and fearlessly as possible to admit frankly the truth of those factual points on which Jerald and Sandra Tanner are indisputably correct. . . .

My basic advice to Mormons who would refute the Tanners is simply this: Take the log out of your own eye and then you will be able to see clearly to take out the speck that is in your brother’s eye. . . .

Jerald and Sandra Tanner are real people. Not devils with horns, cloven hooves and tails. They have suffered much in devoting their lives to what has in so many ways often been a difficult and thankless crusade. . . . the Tanners probably care far more for the Mormon church and [than?] do the great majority of those Saints who have never rebelled or thought seriously about their faith. . . . would not the most constructive response be not to treat them as a tabooed and difficult subject, but rather to try to involve them and their considerable talents and dedication in constructively discovering and telling the true story of Mormonism, with both its failings and its achievements. (Paper by Lawrence Foster, read at the Mormon History Association, May 6, 1983, typed copy, pages 6, 10-11, 14-15, 20-21, 25, 28-30)

Lawrence Foster’s articles concerning us fluctuate back and forth between praise and condemnation. It is almost as if they were written by two different people. If the FARMS-BYU scholars wish to use him as a witness against us, they should at least tell the whole story about how he really feels about Joseph Smith and Mormonism.

We plan to give Dr. Lawrence Foster a chance to respond to our criticism in the next issue of the Messenger.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS

“Just the fact that ‘Mormons’ don’t go around raising ‘hell’ and trying to stir up problems with other religions like I have seen your organization do—repeatedly leads me more than ever to believe that the LDS Church is the only true Church . . . Why don’t you just admit that you worship Satan and NOT GOD. . . . Please take my name off your mailing list.” (Letter from Sandy, Utah)

“I joined the Mormon Church in 1978. I am now going through the process of mentally getting myself away from the church. It is very hard on me. I really, really thought the church was true until I read Mormon Enigma & your book that you’ve put together. . . . I really don’t consider your literature for the most part to be anti-Mormon because I find most of it just to be quotations of the church leaders themselves. That is what is so sad, & it is the most damning.” (Letter from Louisiana)

“Thanks (in part) to your research, I have realized that I have been deceived for the first 27 years of my life. As a BYU graduate and returned missionary, I’m glad that I won’t have to live the rest of my life under a veil of deception. Keep up the good work.” (Letter from California)

“Just want to say thanks for your ministry. You helped me find the truth about Mormonism. . . . May God’s great love continue to lift you up as it does me! Your sister in Christ.” (Letter from Idaho)

“I’ve written to you twice many years ago . . . your research work and specially Mormonism, Shadow or Reality? have been instrumental in my leaving the L.D.S. Church — You have been kind enough to send, for many years the Salt Lake City Messenger which I read . . . from cover to cover as soon as I get it out of the mail box. It has blessed me many times and ‘amazed me’ many times at your relentless research of Mormon history and your pursuit of historical truth — who knows how many people have seen the light through your work.” (Letter from California)

“I can’t begin to tell you how amazed I was, after writing to you just for information on a book I was interested in, (Mormonism Shadow or Reality?) . . . I didn’t realize that I would hit a gold mine on information on Mormonism. . . . I was studying with missionaries, then got baptized, and then left the church all within about 6 months. . . . I welcome any suggestions for material to help me learn. I am a seeker of truth.” (Letter from Washington)
Those who would like to help us reach the Mormon people should be aware of the fact that Utah Lighthouse Ministry is a non-profit organization. In addition to our work with Mormons, we provide support for 44 children through World Vision, and furnish some help to a local Rescue Mission. Those who are concerned about helping this ministry can send their tax-deductible contributions to UTAH LIGHTHOUSE MINISTRY, P. O. Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110. Both contributions and orders can be made over the phone (801-485-8894 or 801-485-0312) with Visa, MasterCard or Discover Card.

While we deeply appreciate the financial support that we receive, we strongly desire your prayers. We believe they will bring thousands of Mormons to the truth. As Apostle Paul admonished: “Continue earnestly in prayer, being vigilant in it with thanksgiving” (Colossians 4:2).

Stan Larson, who was a scriptural exegete for Translation Services of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (the Mormons), has recently published a book entitled, Quest for the Gold Plates: Thomas Stuart Ferguson’s Archaeological Search for the Book of Mormon.

In this book Dr. Larson dealt with the vexing question of whether Thomas Stuart Ferguson, who organized the New World Archaeological Foundation and devoted himself to proving the authenticity of the Book of Mormon, had eventually lost faith in that book and in Joseph Smith, the Mormon prophet. As many of our readers may know, Ferguson wrote the well-known book, One Fold and One Shepherd.

FERGUSON AND ARCHEOLOGY

In the introduction to his book, pages XIII-XIV, Larson noted:

In the fall of 1977 I first heard from a fellow church employee in the LDS Translation Services Department in Salt Lake City that Ferguson no longer believed in the historicity of the Book of Mormon. To me this unfounded rumor — for so I considered it — seemed absolutely unbelievable, for I had over the years faithfully followed Ferguson’s writings on the Book of Mormon. . . . I decided to verify or falsify this assertion by contacting Ferguson himself. . . . I first talked about my having read Cumorah — Where?, Ancient America and the Book of Mormon and One Fold and One Shepherd — and then I hesitantly mentioned that I had heard that he had reached some very critical conclusions concerning the Book of Mormon. With no bitterness but with a touch of disappointment, Ferguson agreed with this statement and openly discussed with me his present skepticism about the historicity of the Book of Mormon, the lack of any Book of Mormon geography that relates to the real world, and the absence of the long-hoped-for archaeological confirmation of the Book of Mormon.

After Ferguson’s death in 1983, a controversy developed with regard to whether he really lost faith in Joseph Smith’s work. His son, Larry Ferguson, insisted that his father maintained a testimony to the Book of Mormon up until the time of his death. On page 4 of his book, Stan Larson reported:

On the other side, Jerald and Sandra Tanner . . . presented a completely different image of Ferguson. First of all, the Tanners reproduced Ferguson’s study of problems in Book of Mormon geography and archaeology that he had prepared for a written symposium on the subject. The Tanners entitled this 1988 publication Ferguson’s Manuscript Unveiled. At the same time the Tanners published an article . . . in the September 1988 issue of their Salt Lake City Messenger. . . . the principal interest of the Tanners is in documenting his purported disillusionment and loss of faith by recounting his visit to their home in December 1970 and by quoting from seven letters which Ferguson allegedly wrote from 1968 to 1979.

Like Stan Larson, we were very surprised when we learned that Thomas Stuart Ferguson had doubts about Mormonism. We also had a copy of his book, One Fold and One Shepherd. A believer in the Book of Mormon had recommended it as containing the ultimate case for the authenticity of the Book of Mormon. The first indication we had that Mr. Ferguson was losing faith occurred almost a decade before Stan Larson questioned Ferguson about his skepticism regarding the Book of Mormon.

This was just after Joseph Smith’s Egyptian Papyri were rediscovered. As we mentioned in the 1972 edition of our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? in 1968 Ferguson wrote us a letter saying that we were “doing a great thing — getting out some truth on the Book of Abraham.” This, of course, was a significant statement since we were presenting strong evidence that Joseph Smith’s Book of Abraham was not a correct translation of the papyri.

Later we heard a rumor that Ferguson had given up the Book of Abraham. This, however, hardly prepared us for his visit to our home on December 2, 1970. At that time, Mr. Ferguson told us frankly that he had not only given up the Book of Abraham, but that he had come to the conclusion that Joseph Smith was not a prophet and that Mormonism was not true! Ferguson told us that our work was important and that it should be subsidized. He also told us that he had spent twenty-five years trying to prove Mormonism, but had finally come to the conclusion that all his work in this regard had been in vain.

He said that his training in law taught him how to weigh evidence and that the case against Joseph Smith was absolutely devastating and could not be explained away. Speaking of Joseph Smith’s First Vision, Ferguson commented that when Cheesman and Brigham Young University Studies made available the strange accounts of the vision (accounts coming from the lips of Joseph Smith that had been suppressed by the church for about 130 years) they completely destroyed his faith in Mormonism. He felt that instead of helping the cause, these contradictory accounts caused serious confusion. He stated that the Mormon scholars had shot the bird, plucked out its feathers and left it “dead and naked on the ground.”

Ferguson referred to Dr. Hugh Nibley’s defense of the Book of Abraham as “nonsense,” and told us that just before coming to visit us he had discussed the Book of Abraham with Hugh B. Brown (Brown served as a member of the First Presidency under church president David O. McKay). According to Mr. Ferguson, Brown had also come to the conclusion that the Book of Abraham was false and was in favor of the church giving it up. A few years later Hugh B. Brown said he could “not recall” making the statements Ferguson attributed to him. Ferguson, however, was apparently referring to the same incident in a letter dated March 13, 1971, when he stated:

I must conclude that Joseph Smith had not the remotest skill in things Egyptian-hieroglyphics. To my surprise one of the highest officials in the Mormon Church agreed with that conclusion . . . privately in one-to-one [c]onversation.

About thirteen years after Thomas Stuart Ferguson informed us that Hugh B. Brown did not believe in the authenticity of the Book of Abraham, he told the same story to Ronald O. Barney who worked at the LDS Historical Department:

Ferguson said that the thing that first led him to seriously question the church was the papyri purported to be the source of the Book of Abraham. He said he took a photograph of the papyri to a couple of friends of his that were scholars at Cal., Berkeley. They described the documents as funeral texts. This bothered Ferguson in a serious way! Later he said that he took the evidence to Hugh B. Brown. . . . After reviewing the evidence with Brother Brown he [Ferguson] said that Brother Brown agreed with him that it was not scripture. He did not say or infer [imply] that it was his evidence that convinced Brother Brown of this conclusion. But nevertheless, he did say that Hugh B. Brown did not believe the Book of Abraham was what the church said it was. (Quest for the Gold Plates, page 138)

On page 165, footnote 13, Stan Larson gave additional information regarding this matter:

Barney, interview with Ferguson, typed on 19 April 1984. Barney then recorded his own reaction to Ferguson’s recounting of this episode with Brown: “I felt as Ferguson was telling me this that he was not making up the story. It appeared that he really believed what he was telling me.”

When Ferguson visited us he was adamant in his claim that President Brown did not believe in the Book of Abraham. He was very stirred up over this matter, and we felt that the conversation he had with Brown probably disturbed him to the point that he decided to visit us.

From what we know from other sources, Hugh B. Brown had a very difficult time accepting the Mormon teaching that blacks could not hold the priesthood nor be married in Mormon temples. Since this doctrine was chiefly derived from Joseph Smith’s Book of Abraham, it seems likely that Brown acquired serious doubts about the book even before the papyri were rediscovered and translated. It was not until 1978 that President Spencer W. Kimball claimed to receive a revelation which removed the curse from the blacks.

One matter which we discussed with Mr. Ferguson was the possibility that he might write something about his loss of faith in the Book of Mormon. He was deeply grieved by the fact that he had wasted twenty-five years of his life trying to prove the Book of Mormon. He informed us that he had, in fact, been thinking of writing a book about the matter.

Stan Larson wrote the following concerning this matter:

After going through all this internal turmoil, Ferguson decided to publish his new ideas concerning the origin of the Book of Mormon in a final book. A tantalizing string of evidence exists, showing that Ferguson had indeed researched and written another book-length manuscript and had decided to move ahead with publishing it. He had told Jerald and Sandra in December 1970 that “he had been thinking of writing a book about the matter and that it would be a real ‘bombshell.’” Throughout the 1970s and the early 1980s Ferguson spent an immense amount of his spare time working on this new project. His basic assumption during this period was that the Book of Mormon was not an ancient document, but a product of the nineteenth century. . . .

In February 1983 Ferguson . . . told Pierre Agrinier Bach, a longtime friend and archaeologist, that ‘he was working on a project, a manuscript which would (according to him) expose Joseph Smith as a fraud’ and that his manuscript was almost completed. It would be a bombshell on the Book of Mormon, showing both positive and negative evidence from Mesoamerican archaeology, but concluding that the Book of Mormon was produced through Joseph Smith’s own creative genius and through his use of contemporary sources, including Ethan Smith’s View of the Hebrews and Sidney Rigdon.

Ferguson’s unexpected death in 1983 stopped his efforts, and, inexplicably, his final manuscript has to date never surfaced. . . . Wishful thinking and fond memories do not change the way things had changed in Ferguson’s thinking. The anecdotal theory of Ferguson’s having faith, losing it, and regaining it is just not supported by any available evidence from Ferguson himself. . . . Two short sentences in Ferguson’s last known letter illustrate his persisting inquisitiveness: “I am continuing my research. It is fun and stimulating.”

These final two letters, together with Barney’s two journal entries, confirm Ferguson’s critical views just two months before his death in 1983. . . . several of his friends — who were aware of his change of attitude — counseled him not to publish his “Bombshell” manuscript which was strongly critical of the Book of Mormon. (Quest for the Gold Plates, pages 157-158, 160, 162-163)

It is certainly a shame that the manuscript Ferguson was working on is not available to the Mormon people. Unfortunately, however, there were individuals who did not want it to come to light.

Dr. Larson also wrote the following regarding Ferguson:

Ferguson admitted that the problem that first made him “seriously question the Church was the papyri purported to be the source of the Book of Abraham.” Like falling dominoes, his belief in the prophetic status of Joseph Smith and the historicity of the Book of Mormon also collapsed. At first Ferguson still believed that Joseph Smith had been a true prophet of God in 1829 when he translated the Book of Mormon, but he decided that Joseph Smith had become a fallen prophet by 1835 when the Egyptian scrolls and mummies arrived in Kirtland. However, Ferguson, the logical lawyer, continued thinking: since the English text of the Book of Abraham cannot be considered a translation of the Egyptian papyri, maybe the Book of Mormon is not a real translation of an ancient document. Ferguson’s conviction concerning the Book of Mormon was devastated as the chain reaction continued. (Ibid., page 134)

Ferguson’s skepticism first became public . . . when the Tanners published an account of his visit with them in a revised edition of their Mormonism—Shadow or Reality: . . . Though this passage by the Tanners was pointed out to Ferguson many times, he never denied their account of his loss of faith. (Ibid., pages 139-140)

He [Ferguson] then recommended to them [Mr. and Mrs. Harold W. Lawrence] a short reading list: an article about “Joseph Smith’s First Vision,” Mormonism—Shadow or Reality, The True Believer, and No Man Knows My History. Since these works significantly affected Ferguson, he evidently felt that they would be valuable for them to read. (Ibid., page 153)

Likewise, Ferguson responded to Sorenson’s earlier geographical study — which was titled with the question “Where in the World?” — by answering that Book of Mormon geography exists nowhere in the real world. Describing his own 1975 study, Ferguson divulged that “the real implications of the paper is that you can’t set Book of Mormon geography down anywhere — because it is fictional and will never meet the requirements of the dirt-archaeology.” In his view the Book of Mormon is not a translated account of historical peoples, but a fictional story concocted by Joseph Smith, perhaps with the assistance of one or two others. . . . Ferguson found that the known archaeology of Mesoamerica does not fit the requirements of the Book of Mormon. This raised for him serious questions about the antiquity of the volume. From his youth he had assumed that the Book of Mormon was historical — and had believed in it intensely — but during the last thirteen years of his life Ferguson maintained that that assumption was wrong and the best explanation was found in Joseph Smith and his nineteenth century environment. (Ibid., pages 214-215)

On pages 251-52 of The Messiah in Ancient America, published in 1987, we read that “Tom Ferguson first approached the President of Brigham Young University, Howard S. McDonald, about establishing a Department of Archaeology. . . . Tom Ferguson was able to convince officials of BYU of the benefit to the University of having such a department.”

Ferguson also worked very hard to get the Mormon Church interested in helping him with the organization he envisioned — i.e., the New World Archaeological Foundation. At first church leaders were not excited about the project.

Although Ferguson apparently received no financial help from the church to begin with, he “scraped together $3,000, a painfully small sum but sufficient to fund the year’s short field expedition” (Ibid., page 260). Later, however, the church began supporting the Foundation. On one occasion Ferguson asked President David O. McKay for “$250,000” and received it (Ibid., page 264-265).

When Ferguson came to our house in 1970, he indicated that he had been faced with a dilemma; he had just received a large grant from the church ($100,000 or more) to carry on the research of the New World Archaeological Foundation. Although he no longer believed in the Book of Mormon, he felt that the Foundation was doing legitimate archeological work. Consequently, he decided to accept the money and continue the work. He, of course, realized that the organization he had founded to confirm the authenticity of the Book of Mormon was now beginning to cast serious doubt upon the Book of Mormon because archeologists were unable to turn up anything relating to a Hebrew or Christian culture existing in Mesoamerica prior to the time of Columbus.

Eventually, the Mormon Church’s Brigham Young University took over the New World Archaeological Foundation and Ferguson “became secretary of the board of directors and held that position until his death in 1983” (The Messiah in Ancient America, page 277).

Dr. Stan Larson has certainly written an interesting book regarding Thomas Stuart Ferguson’s struggle to know the truth about Mormonism. In addition to this, however, he analyzes the current problems in Book of Mormon archaeology and geography. Moreover, Larson gives some very good information regarding the Egyptian papyrus Joseph Smith claimed to translate as the “Book of Abraham.” He clearly shows that it is a spurious book and demonstrates Smith’s inability to correctly translate the writing which appeared on the scrolls.

Stan Larson is a very careful scholar who is not intimidated by the FARMS-BYU scholars. He, in fact, deals with a number of their arguments and shows the weakness of their position. The reader will find that we are offering Quest for the Gold Plates: Thomas Stuart Ferguson's Archaeological Search for the Book of Mormon for a limited time at a special price (see the first page of this newsletter).

MORMONISM’S PROBLEM WITH CHILD SEXUAL ABUSE

Mormonism is to be commended for strongly stressing chastity and encouraging its members to avoid any type of sexual sin. When we were members of the church we were taught these wise principles. Nevertheless, Mormon officials today seem to be having some serious problems regarding how to handle the sexual abuse of children.

The following appeared in the Salt Lake Tribune on August 28, 1996:

BECKLEY, W. VA. — A lawsuit accusing the Mormon Church of failing to intervene when it knew a member was abusing his daughter should be heard in federal court, a judge has ruled.

U.S. District Judge Elizabeth Hallanan said Monday the $750 million lawsuit deals with a crucial constitutional issue.

The lawsuit, filed by a woman . . . of Alaska, alleges church leaders knew of sexual abuse her ex-husband inflicted on her daughter but did nothing about it until his arrest in 1994.

James Adams Jr. of Crab Orchard was sentenced to up to 185 years in prison in February for molesting the girl and her brother between 1989 and 1994. His son was 8 and his daughter was 5 when the abuse began.

The lawsuit names the church and church officials along with Raleigh General Hospital in Beckley, Adams’ employer. Kenneth Holt, the former head of Raleigh General, was a church member. . . .

The lawsuit said national leaders failed to instruct West Virginia church officials in dealing with the abuse once they learned of it. The victim’s attorneys have said they plan to delve into church teachings and the church’s handling of sexual-abuse allegations.

The lawsuit originally was filed in Raleigh County Circuit Court, but church lawyers argued questions about the separation of church and state should be heard in federal court.

On September 12, 1996, The Idaho Statesman published an unusual story under the title, “Allegation Against Bishop Investigated.” It was alleged that a Mormon doctor had sexually abused many of his patients and that a cover-up had taken place in Rexburg, Idaho, the home of the Mormon Church’s Ricks College. The newspaper reported the following:

Bonneville County officials are investigating a report that a Mormon Church official tried to discourage a girl from testifying that then-Rexburg physician LaVar Withers sexually abused her.

No charge has been filed, and the LDS official, Ucon-area Bishop Dean Andrus, denies the allegation. For two years, Andrus has served as the lay leader of the Milo Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints Ward near Idaho Falls.

“I absolutely am not (guilty),” Andrus said. “This is not accurate.”

Andrus declined to answer further questions. He was set to meet Wednesday with investigators . . . . Special Prosecutor Dan Hawkley, whose handling of the case led to Withers’ plea-bargained agreement to plead guilty to a single battery charge, said Andrus may have violated Idaho’s anti-witness intimidation law. That statute carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison.

“It was serious misconduct,” Hawkley said.

Withers is to begin serving a 30-day sentence today at the Madison County jail. After more than a year of denying allegations that he sexually abused female patients, Withers pleaded guilty to a single battery count, which referred to numerous victims . . . during the period from 1965 through 1995, when he retired under pressure from the State Board of Medicine.

Hawkley had charged him with a series of felony charges before agreeing to accept a guilty plea to the misdemeanor Monday . . . . Withers will serve a 30-day period in confinement, pay $15,000 in fines and spend two months on probation — in lieu of a suspended four-month jail term.

Throughout the case, some victims have alleged that Mormon Church officials ignored their pleas for help or actually discouraged them from pursuing charges against the doctor.

Hawkley said he learned of the allegation against Andrus last week. His client said the church official expressed concern that her testimony would cause harm to Withers. The session occurred Aug. 11 at Andrus’ church offices, he said . . . .

Meanwhile, some of the women who accused Withers of molesting them filed a class-action lawsuit against him. The suit, filed Wednesday in Blackfoot, could cost Withers millions of dollars if the number of plaintiff’s expands. For now, five women are listed as plaintiffs.

More than 117 women have told the Rape Response and Crime Victim Center of Idaho Falls that Withers abused them.

Because the conviction covered a 30-year period, women with allegations too old to prosecute under the statute of limitation were able to testify at Withers’ sentencing hearing. . . .

The lawsuit seeks at least $25,000 for each woman named in the suit to cover “mental anguish and emotional harm.”

About nine months before Dr. Withers pled guilty to the abuse, The Idaho Statesman brought forth a mountain of evidence pointing to his guilt. The paper was very disturbed that there was a cover-up and wanted to know why no charges had been filed. In the issue for December 10, 1995, we find the following:

Embarrassed by the intimate nature of the assaults and afraid of being ostracized by those who won’t believe them, most of the women didn’t tell anyone who could have put Withers out of business. The few who did found what the others feared: Their complaints were met with almost universal denial.
by doctors, Mormon Church officials, regulators, local law enforcement and the Idaho attorney general’s office.

It’s a story eerily similar to a case in Lovell, Wyo., where a family doctor was accused — and eventually convicted — of raping Mormon women in the privacy of his office, and with the initial complicity of a community, church and law enforcement officials.

Another article in the same issue explained why many Mormon women were reluctant to come forward:

The LaVar Withers story is unfolding in a predominantly Mormon community where church values of deference to men and respect for authority are as much a part of the culture as the religion.

Deep down within Mormon theology lies a fundamental difference that separates the sexes: Most men are members of the church’s priesthood, agents of God on Earth; no woman ever can be.

It’s a sharp distinction that spills into everyday life for many Mormon women and creates a respect for men and a willingness, in some cases, to let men control.

“Since leaders in the priesthood have more authority and since no woman ever has the priesthood, no woman ever has as much authority as most men in her life,” said Lavina Fielding Anderson, an excommunicated Mormon who still attends her ward in Salt Lake City and sings in the choir.

“She is still down on the totem pole and, in some cases, at the bottom of the totem pole.”

That fundamental difference could make it almost impossible for some Mormon women to step forward to acknowledge they’d been sexually abused by another church member.

“You wouldn’t have been believed in the past,” said Marybeth Raynes, a Mormon and licensed marriage and family therapist in Salt Lake City. “Or, if you were believed, you would be told it would embarrass the church or that your job is to forgive.”

Push too hard, and there’s the risk of being chastised for not supporting the church, putting church membership in jeopardy and even risking eternal salvation. (Ibid., page 10A)

At least two of Dr. Withers’ victims were only thirteen years old when he molested them (see page 8A).

On the same page we read that “Dr. LaVar Withers and the state’s medical board struck a secret deal in July 1995. Give up your medical license, the board told the Rexburg doctor, and no one will ever hear what went on behind closed doors. But word of the deal leaked.”

On Page 7A of the same paper the following appears:

Religion, more than history or agriculture, is the common bond among Rexburg residents, 90 percent of whom are members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

The mayor, City Council members and many law enforcement officials are Mormons. So is Withers. And so are most of his alleged victims.

Knowing that their church leaders work closely together to solve problems in the community, Mormon women felt they could turn to church leaders.

Joan filed a complaint with the chief regulatory agency for doctors . . . A devout Mormon, she took another step in January. She contacted Withers’ stake president, Rexburg dentist G. Farrell Young. . . .

“He told me not to go to the police until he had a chance to deal with it,” Joan said.

Joan waited one month before turning to Rexburg police. Months passed without a response from Young . . .

Young will not discuss Withers. But he defends his counsel to Joan. “I may have said do not go to the police immediately. Let me take care of it here. I was hoping to find out more about it.”

It seems disgraceful that a doctor who abused so many women and even children over a period of about thirty years could get off with just a slap on the hand.

JOSEPH SMITH AND WOMEN

Unfortunately, Joseph Smith, the first Mormon prophet, seems to have had a sexual problem that significantly affected the lives of many of those who converted to his church. All of the evidence points to the inescapable conclusion that Smith was unsatisfied living with just one wife. Consequently, he declared that God gave him a revelation that he was to enter into plural marriage.

The revelation regarding polygamy is still published in the Doctrine and Covenants, one of the four standard works of the church. The following is taken from that revelation:

Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you my servant Joseph . . . if any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another, and the first give her consent, and if he espouse the second, and they are virgins, and have vowed to no other man, then is he justified; he cannot commit adultery . . . And if he have ten virgins given unto him by this law, he cannot commit adultery . . . therefore is he justified. (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 132, verses 1, 61-62)

Joseph Smith, of course, was obedient to the “revelation” which he dictated and proceeded to marry dozens of plural wives before he was murdered in 1844. The prophet also instructed many other Mormon men to enter into polygamy. Since the laws did not allow such a practice, there was a great deal of deceit practiced by Smith and his followers.

Today, the Mormon Church does not allow its members to practice polygamy. However, since church leaders never repudiated the doctrine itself, teach that it will be lived in heaven, and still retain the revelation on polygamy in the Doctrine and Covenants, many Mormons have secretly entered into the practice. These people are known as Mormon Fundamentalists because they cling tenaciously to some of the fundamental doctrines taught by Joseph Smith and Brigham Young — doctrines that the church now wishes to disregard.

Today, Mormons who are caught practicing polygamy are excommunicated. There are a large number of Mormon Fundamentalists who have severed all connections with the Mormon Church and have their own leaders. On the other hand, we believe that there probably are still many within the Mormon Church who, like Joseph Smith, are secretly practicing polygamy and playing a dual role so that they will not be excommunicated.

The revelation regarding polygamy is still published in the Doctrine and Covenants, one of the four standard works of the church. The following is taken from that revelation:

Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you my servant Joseph . . . if any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another, and the first give her consent, and if he espouse the second, and they are virgins, and have vowed to no other man, then is he justified; he cannot commit adultery . . . And if he have ten virgins given unto him by this law, he cannot commit adultery . . . therefore is he justified. (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 132, verses 1, 61-62)

Joseph Smith, of course, was obedient to the “revelation” which he dictated and proceeded to marry dozens of plural wives before he was murdered in 1844. The prophet also instructed many other Mormon men to enter into polygamy. Since the laws did not allow such a practice, there was a great deal of deceit practiced by Smith and his followers.

Today, the Mormon Church does not allow its members to practice polygamy. However, since church leaders never repudiated the doctrine itself, teach that it will be lived in heaven, and still retain the revelation on polygamy in the Doctrine and Covenants, many Mormons have secretly entered into the practice. These people are known as Mormon Fundamentalists because they cling tenaciously to some of the fundamental doctrines taught by Joseph Smith and Brigham Young — doctrines that the church now wishes to disregard.
Unfortunately, although there are many polygamists who treat their families well, the practice of polygamy opens the door for other sexual practices which are extremely harmful to children and young women.

While the present leaders of the Mormon Church condemn fornication, adultery, and incestuous relationships, during the time of Joseph Smith and Brigham Young some strange things were taught concerning this matter. Joseph Smith, for instance, “married five pairs of sisters” and even a “mother” and her own “daughter” (No Man Knows My History, page 336). In her book, Intimate Disciple, page 317, Mormon writer Clair Noall verified that Smith did marry a mother and her daughter: “Sylvia Lyon, Patty’s daughter and the wife of Windsor J. Lyon, was already sealed to Joseph. This afternoon she was to put her mother’s hand in the Prophet’s.”

Unfortunately, Joseph Smith’s desire to obtain many wives led him to take other men’s wives. George D. Smith wrote:

Beginning in 1841, Joseph Smith took as plural wives several married women, as if exercising a variant of the feudal droit du seigneur: a king’s right to the brides in his domain. This option was presented to the married woman as a favor to her. A woman who wanted higher status in the celestial kingdom could choose to leave a husband with lower status in the church, even if she had been sealed to him, and become sealed to a man higher in authority.

On October 27, 1841, Smith was married for eternity to Zina D. Huntington, Henry B. Jacob’s wife . . . On December 11, 1841, the prophet married Zina’s sister, Prescindai Huntingdon, who had been married to Norman Buell for fourteen years and remained married to Buell until 1846. Prescindia then left Buell and married Heber C. Kimball ‘for time,’ that is until the end of her life. In the afterlife, ‘for eternity,’ she would revert to Joseph Smith.

Smith married Mary Elizabeth Rollins Lightner in February 1842, when she was already married . . . Apparently, Smith had planned to marry her long before her marriage to Adam Lightner . . . After her celestial marriage to Joseph, Mary lived with Adam Lightner until his death in Utah . . . In April 1842, two months after the Lightner ceremony, Nancy Marinda Johnson married Joseph Smith while her husband, Orson Hyde, was on a mission to Jerusalem. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Spring 1994, pages 10-11)

On February 19, 1854, Jedediah M. Grant, second counselor to President Brigham Young delivered a sermon that made it very plain that Joseph Smith did ask for other men’s wives:

What would a man of God say, who felt aright, when Joseph asked him for his money? He would say, “Yes, and I wish I had more to help to build up the kingdom of God.” Or if he came and said, “I want your wife?” “O yes,” he would say, “here she is, there are plenty more.” . . . Did the Prophet Joseph want every man’s wife he asked for? He did not . . . If such a man of God should come to me and say, “I want your gold and silver, or your wives,” I should say, “Here they are, I wish I had more to give you, take all I have got.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, page 14)

While non-Mormons would tend to consider Joseph Smith’s marriages to other men’s wives as adultery, many faithful Mormons try to justify Smith’s actions in various ways. It is apparent, however, that the system of polygamy he set up was very detrimental to young women and children. Smith, in fact, even married a fourteen-year-old girl, Helen Mar Kimball, when he was thirty-seven years old! Most people would consider this child abuse.

Moreover, Joseph Smith went so far as to take two young women into his house, become their personal guardian, and then lure them into becoming his wives. Mormon scholars Linda King Newell and Valeen Tippetts Avery wrote:

The Lawrence sisters had come to Nauvoo from Canada without their parents in 1840 when Maria was about eighteen and Sarah fifteen. Emma and Joseph offered them a home. According to William Law’s account, the girls had inherited about eight thousand dollars in “English gold.” Law said, “Joseph got to be appointed their guardian,” . . . Joseph’s history dated May 30, 1843, reads, “I superintended the preparation of papers to settle the Lawrence estate,” and four days later the “accounts of the Lawrence estate were presented to the probate judge, to which he made objection.” (Mormon Enigma: Emma Hale Smith, 1984, page 144)

In 1981, Andrew F. Ehat, a Mormon scholar who is very knowledgeable about early Mormon history, wrote his Master of Arts thesis at Brigham Young University. It is entitled, “Joseph Smith’s Introduction of Temple Ordinances and the 1844 Mormon Succession Question.” Speaking of Joseph Smith, Ehat wrote:

In particular, he knew his responsibility as guardian to the Lawrence Estate could be misunderstood given the fact that he was sealed to Maria Lawrence — a fact that made him particularly vulnerable to William Law.

In June 1841, Joseph Smith, Hyrum Smith and William Law had assumed the responsibility of the deceased Edward Law’s estate valued at $7,750.06. Joseph was named as guardian of the Lawrence children. Somehow during his period of indecision, William Law found out that Maria Lawrence was sealed as a wife to Joseph; in fact, Law, he later stated, found Joseph in a compromising situation with Maria on 12 October 1843. Two weeks later, 26 October 1843, Joseph ostensibly sealed Maria for time to John M. Bernhisel . . . But in January 1844, Joseph apparently felt this would no longer calm the angered William Law. The day after Joseph and William’s final confrontation, Joseph began arrangements to relinquish the estate affairs entirely. . . . Undoubtedly, if William Law, one of the appointed trustees of the estate, “claimed” that Joseph had not only extorted the funds of the estate, but had also committed adultery with the eldest child of whom he was personal guardian, that would make an explosive expose. . . . What was said and done in public was guarded and carefully worded in order to protect both the Church and his faithful colleagues as they entered practices illegal in the sight of man yet covenants they were assured were commanded by God. . . . Law appeared before the first sitting of the Grand Jury of the Hancock County circuit court to swear out charges against Joseph. Law filed charges and presented such evidence that the Grand Jury
George D. Smith did a great deal of research on polygamy in the early years of Mormonism. He discovered that Joseph Smith was not only sealed to a fourteen-year-old girl, but also to a fifteen-year-old girl and to two girls who were sixteen years old. All of these sealings to young girls occurred when Joseph Smith was between thirty-seven and thirty-eight years of age. In his article George Smith included a list of 153 men who took plural wives in the early years of the Mormon Church. When we examined this list, we noted that two of the young girls were only thirteen years old when they were lured into polygamy. Thirteen girls were only fourteen years old. Twenty-one were fifteen years old, and fifty-three were sixteen years old when they were secretly enticed into this degrading lifestyle.

Fanny Stenhouse, who at one time had been a firm believer in Mormonism and had even allowed her husband to take another wife, wrote the following:

It would be quite impossible, with any regard to propriety, to relate all the horrible results of this disgraceful system. . . . Marriages have been contracted between the nearest of relatives; and old men tottering on the brink of the grave have been united to little girls scarcely in their teens; while unnatural alliances of every description, which in any other community would be regarded with disgust and abhorrence, are here entered into in the name of God . . .

It is quite a common thing in Utah for a man to marry two or even three sisters. . . . I know also another man who married a widow with several children; and when one of the girls had grown into her teens he insisted on marrying her also . . . and to this very day the daughter bears children to her step-father, living as wife in the same house with her mother! (Tell It All, 1874, pages 468-469)

Because of the practice of polygamy there was a shortage of women in Utah. The competition for those who were not married became intense, and many men were marrying girls who were very young. On page 607 of her book, Stenhouse commented about the matter: “That same year [1872], a bill was brought into the Territorial Legislature, providing that boys of fifteen years of age and girls of twelve might legally contract marriage, with the consent of their parents or guardians! In stating this disgraceful fact, I feel certain that the reader who never lived among the Saints and is not versed in Utah affairs will think that I must be mistaken in what I say. It is, however, I am sorry to say, only too true, and the records of the Legislature will bear me witness. The fact was stated in the New York Herald of January 27, 1872” (Ibid., page 607).

An entry added to Joseph Smith’s private dairy after his death confirms that Smith believed a man could be married for eternity to his own sister. It appears under the date of October 26, 1843, and reads as follows:

The following named deceased persons were sealed to me (John M. Bernhisel) on Oct[ober] 26th 1843, by President Joseph Smith: Maria Bernhisel, sister; Brother Samuel’s wife, Catherine Kremer; Mary Shatto (Aunt) . . . [eight other names follow]
The fact that Apostle Cannon received this information about brothers and sisters marrying from Lorenzo Snow is very significant because Snow later became the fifth president of the Mormon Church.

The illegal practice of polygamy with all the deception that it entailed certainly took its toll on Mormon women and also made its mark on Mormon men. The betrayal and abuse that some of the women suffered is almost beyond belief. The early marriages and the strange idea that brothers and sisters might some day marry, certainly was a blight upon the early Mormon Church. Some who deal with sexual abuse in the church today wonder if the teachings of the early church may have trickled down to the present time.

THE MORMON ALLIANCE

On July 4, 1992, an organization known as The Mormon Alliance was formed for the purpose of countering “spiritual and ecclesiastical abuse in the Church and to protect the Church against defamatory actions.” This organization is composed of both Mormons and former Mormons who have been excommunicated from the church for disagreeing with some of the opinions promulgated by the leaders of the church.

At first members of the Mormon Alliance were mainly concerned about reporting incidents of spiritual and ecclesiastical abuse. As it turned out, however, they were deluged with accounts of sexual abuse and information indicating that this abuse was sometimes swept under the rug. Because of this development, the Mormon Alliance decided to compile a book containing over 300 pages of material relating to sexual abuse in the Mormon Church. It was published under the title, Case Reports of the Mormon Alliance, vol. 1, 1995.

One thing that has alarmed many people is the accounts of Mormon bishops who have either engaged in sexual abuse or have failed to properly deal with the matter when it was brought to their attention. One woman recently reported to us that her husband was a bishop who sexually abused their children. She had to leave him to protect the children.

We, of course, do not mean to imply that most Mormon bishops are involved in sexual abuse or cover it up. The great majority of the bishops are sincere people who would never want to be involved in this type of abuse or in any type of a cover-up. Nevertheless, the word has gotten out that there is a problem in the Mormon Church. In fact, NBC has contacted us about this matter and we have turned over some information to those who are investigating the situation.

One disturbing thing that has been reported to us on a number of occasions is that when some bishops have conducted worthiness interviews with members of their ward they have asked questions regarding sexual matters that go far beyond the bounds of propriety. For example, one man reported to us that when he was young, both he and the girl he was going with felt they were becoming too intimate and went to the bishop for help. Instead of just giving the counsel they needed, the bishop questioned them at great lengths, asking all kinds of questions regarding what went on. The man described the questioning as “pornographic,” and said he felt that the bishop was actually enjoying the interrogation.

Another woman reported to us that when she went to the bishop for a temple recommend she was questioned extensively regarding her sexual relations with her own husband. The questioning became very explicit. Finally, she informed the bishop that she felt the interrogation was highly improper and said that she would not answer any more questions without her husband being present. When she later discussed the matter with her husband, he stated that the bishop had not asked him about details of their sexual life. Instead, he had willingly given him a temple recommend! She, of course, felt that the bishop was grilling her to satisfy his own interest in sexual matters.

The Mormon Alliance mentioned “a bishop [that lived in Oklahoma who] had been ‘legendary’ among the youth for asking sexually explicit questions during worthiness interviews. One young woman refused to be interviewed unless her father was present. The youth sarcastically nicknamed him ‘Bishop Triple-X’ because of the types of questions he asked, and his motto was, ‘You’re not worthy until I say you’re worthy.’ “ (Case Reports of the Mormon Alliance, vol. 1, page 271, footnote 1)

Bishops begin interviewing children when they are young. Mormon children are supposed to be interviewed by the bishop when they are eight years old to see if they are ready for baptism. When a boy reaches the age of twelve, he is interviewed by a bishop to see if he is worthy to receive the Aaronic Priesthood. This interview is conducted behind closed doors.

These interviews continue as the boy advances in the priesthood. Unfortunately, some Mormon bishops have been accused of using these interviews as an opportunity to sexually abuse young men. Since the bishop is supposed to have special authority from God, sexual advances by the bishop tend to greatly confuse young men. Furthermore, it is very difficult for those who are abused to accuse the bishop of wrongdoing. Consequently, they tend to bottle up their feelings.

Jack McCallister, who was formerly a bishop in the Mormon Church, felt that it was very improper for one individual to be alone with a young man and ask all kinds of questions related to sexual matters:

Standard Church policy is that two priesthood officers must be present to handle Church funds, a check and balance system to prevent financial error and inhibit the temptation to steal. And the Church conducts regular financial audits. How many priesthood officers are required to conduct a personal worthiness interview with a youth? One. And there are no procedures for auditing the actions of these leaders for inappropriate behavior. (Case Reports, page 205)

Jack McCallister was especially concerned about these “worthiness interviews” because he himself was abused by his bishop in his office. He related the following:

We were the only ones in the meetinghouse. We shook hands and he put his arms around me. He told me how much the Lord loved me. He felt directly inspired tonight to call me down to his office. . . . He asked if we could pray together before we talked. He said a lot of really nice things about me to God . . . I felt very special and very humble. It was one of the most beautiful, heartfelt, eloquent prayers that I’ve ever heard on my behalf, asking the Lord to bless me, watch over me, care for me, and assuring the Lord of what a fine wonderful young man I was. . . . Then we sat down in two chairs in front of his desk. He pulled his chair up really close to mine, looked me straight in the eyes through his pink-tinted bifocal lenses. I could see he still had tears in his eyes from the prayer. “What sincerity!” I thought. “Maybe some day I can learn how to talk to God with such powerful impressive prayer language.” (Ibid., pages 167-168)

After some conversation about temporal matters, the bishop proceeded to discuss sexual matters with him and eventually molested him. This abuse caused severe trauma to Jack. He wrote:

“I couldn’t figure out what was going on. He was the bishop. I was the obedient but unworthy servant. He was God’s chosen leader on earth. Whatever he did was directly authorized by God. My thoughts raced around. (Ibid.)

Jack McCallister decided to keep the matter secret. Even though he eventually became a bishop, his suffering did not end. To add to his own pain, he learned that his own son was also victimized by another Mormon bishop. In a letter to Gordon B. Hinckley, the current president of the Mormon Church, Jack and his wife Merradith, expressed their dismay that things were being swept under the rug:

In June of 1963, my husband Jack, had been sexually molested by his bishop (Samuel H. Gardener) [a bishop of the Oklahoma First Ward who died in 1967] for two years between 15-17. He was afraid to tell me because I wouldn’t love or respect him. After we had been married about four months, he told me what had happened and how ashamed he felt. . . . I believed him.

In June of 1993, our son, Scott, was 23 years old and recently returned from an honorable mission. He told my husband about being sexually molested between the age of 15-17 by his bishop (Ronald W. Phelps). Scott was ashamed to talk about it prior because he feared the negative reaction of others . . . I believed him.

In September of 1993, the three of us talked to our Stake President, Gary James NEWMAN. Scott both told and graphically demonstrated the sexual abuse he suffered . . . The details and manner of the molestation were discounted and minimized by Pres. NEWMAN. He told us he couldn’t believe such a thing was true. . . . we also wrote you a letter explaining the details of the situation and asking for direct intervention and investigation into the matter from Church Headquarters. We heard nothing. . . . only silence. Our pain increased. We talked with other members and parents to see if they were aware of anything that had happened to their family members. We formed an emotional support group for survivors of sexual abuse. . . . We felt only contempt for us by Pres. NEWMAN. He threatened us to “either stop talking to the Church members about this or I’ll draw up the papers to have you excommunicated for failure to sustain your leaders and apostasy.” He told us . . . they couldn’t accept Scott’s word over a priesthood leader held in high esteem . . .

Because Pres. NEWMAN was not willing to hear our cries for help and told us to “do what you have to do . . . but stop talking to the members of the Church about this or I’ll excommunicate you,” we went to the police and filed felony charges against Ron Phelps . . . The police informed us until there was more evidence developed, it would be difficult to prosecute the case. They believed Scott and recognized the deception used by typical pedophiles with multiple victims. . . .

A criminal background check revealed Ron Phelps had been arrested for indecent exposure prior to being called as Bishop in 1980 [the charges were later dropped]. He was recently arrested in an Oklahoma University restroom in Norman Oklahoma on December 3, 1993. He did “unlawfully, willfully and wrongfully solicit, induce and entice one John Bishop, an undercover police officer, to commit an act of lewdness contrary to the form of the Statutes in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the State of Oklahoma.” (Copy enclosed) We thought it was important to notify others with this public information to protect their children . . . (Letter dated March 23, 1994)

Neither President Hinckley nor other church leaders in Salt Lake City were anxious to go to bat for the McCallisters.

Significantly, according to a statement made on television, the McCallisters filed felony charges against Ronald Phelps on September 13, 1993, over two months before he was arrested at the University of Oklahoma on December 2, 1993!

On April 20, 1994, The Yukon Review reported that Phelps “pleaded guilty to two misdemeanors for outraging public decency. . . .” Local church leaders, however, seem to have been oblivious to the importance of these charges being made against Phelps prior to his arrest. In his zeal to hush up the whole matter Stake President Gary J. Newman sent a letter to Merradith McCallister threatening her with excommunication:

This letter is to inform you that the Stake Presidency is considering formal disciplinary action against you, including the possibility of disfellowship or excommunication . . . (Letter dated July 29, 1994)

On August 2, 1994, Bishop Larry A. Morgan sent a letter to Mrs. McCallister informing her that she had been excommunicated: “It was the decision of the Council that you, Merradith McCallister, are hereby excommunicated from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints for conduct contrary to the laws and order of the Church.”

Jack McCallister beat church leaders to the punch and withdrew his membership. In a letter to Bishop Morgan, dated July 24, 1994, he wrote: “I refuse to bow down before this false image. I refuse to be intimidated into silent consent. I refuse to place the reputation of the church ahead of the safety of our children. I refuse to protect child sexual molesters in high places.”

Mary Plourde, who also was a member of the church when Phelps was bishop, was very disturbed regarding the charges of sexual abuse and refused to be silent about the matter even though she was threatened with excommunication. On August 9, 1994, bishop Larry A. Morgan sent her a letter that contained the following: “It was the decision of the Council that you, Mary Snow Plourde, are hereby excommunicated . . . .”

Since Jack McCallister’s son did not have an eyewitness to testify that Ronald Phelps was guilty of sexually abusing him, we can understand why Mormon Church officials in Oklahoma would have a very difficult time trying to determine who was telling the truth. The fact that Phelps was arrested for his sexual behavior and pled guilty makes us very suspicious that Scott McCallister was indeed telling the truth.

It is evident that church leaders made a very serious mistake when they decided to excommunicate church members who were unable to keep silent. These people sincerely believed they were doing their Christian duty. Before the excommunications took place an attorney, Floyd W. Taylor, warned Stake President Gary J. Newman that it would be foolish to cut people off from the church to silence them:

This firm has been counseling with Jack and Merradyth McCallister . . . There is more than enough here to put reasonable minds on inquiry. It is regrettable that you and the Church council appeared to be bent on a course of silencing the allegations of parents and victims of possibly abusive conduct perpetrated by persons affiliated with your Church, instead of listening with open minds and trying to find solutions.

I am Roman Catholic. As you know, my church has experienced multiple charges of sexual abuse by clergy against minors. My church’s initial reaction was cover-up. The result was a plethora of lawsuits and astronomical liability losses. One Archdiocese is teetering on the edge of bankruptcy. Please do not interpret this as a threat of litigation. I am trying to make a plea to common sense and ask that you look upon the experience of the Catholic Church and not follow the same path. The Catholic Church today has reversed its initial course and is openly acknowledging the problem and is trying to do something about it. Your Church should at least be open to the possibility that these allegations may have some substance and that investigating the allegations is a more appropriate way of handling them than trying to silence the accusers through threats of disfellowshipped and excommunication.

If the McCallisters and others who are accusing LDS officials of unspeakable acts are right, your Church will profit from listening and taking action to protect your most valuable asset, your children. . . . It is not my desire to be perceived as a legal threat to the LDS Church. The McCallisters love their religion and wish the Church no harm. Since they truly believe what they have alleged; and, if what they are saying is true, the worst thing they could do to your Church would be to become part of a cover-up which would jeopardize the safety of countless Mormon youngsters and open your Church up to the kind of legal quagmire the Catholic Church faces today. We urge you to reconsider your approach to this matter. (Letter written by Floyd W. Taylor, Attorney At Law, dated March 14, 1994)

In Case Reports, pages 23-24, we find this information:

Estimates about child sexual abuse vary, but figures from the Boy Scouts of America and the National Committee for the Prevention of Child Abuse indicate that one in four girls and one in six boys will be sexually abused before age eighteen. “Women from highly religious homes are just as likely to be abused as nonreligious women.” According to one study of eighty-nine married Mormon women from “very religious” homes, 26 percent had been sexually abused as children. . . . Rather than dealing straightforwardly and helpfully with the topic, it [the church] has rather taken the position of deploiring the behavior but leaving survivors and their families in the hands of local leaders who may or may not be equipped and motivated to deal with the problem.

The same book informs us that four sociologists studied the experiences “of seventy-one Mormon women when they disclosed their abuse, or considered disclosing their abuse, to ecclesiastical leaders.” The research made it clear that most of the women were not satisfied with the response they received:

The researchers found that only twelve (17 percent) of the women had positive interactions with their Church leaders when they disclosed their abuse. Forty-nine (69 percent) had negative experiences, and ten (14 percent) had not talked to church leaders, because they “had no confidence in their leaders’ ability to help them.” . . . This study therefore raises serious doubts about the accuracy of President Hinckley’s statement that unsupportive priesthood leaders are “a blip here, and a blip there.” Obviously more research needs to be done with random samples and generalizable results. But in this group alone, 69 percent of Mormon women sexually abused as children had negative experiences (including disfellowshipping and excommunication when they disclosed their abuse to their bishops as adults while another 14 percent (a total of 83 percent) feared to do so lest they be punished. (Ibid., pages 48-49)

Case Reports cites other important material from the report by the four sociologists mentioned above. The article which they published was entitled, “Adult Survivors of Childhood Sexual Abuse: The Case of Mormon Women.” It was printed in Affilia: Journal of Women and Social Work 11, Spring 1996, pages 39-60. All four of the researchers taught at Brigham Young University.

According to the article as cited in Case Reports, the women described their leaders as “judgmental,” “unbelieving,” “protective of perpetrators who held the priesthood,” “intrusive,” “nosy,” or “impatient.” . . .

1. The leaders did not want to talk about the abuse or refused to believe that the alleged perpetrators ‘would ever do anything like that.’

2. The leaders offered simple ‘solutions’ (such as, ‘Stop thinking about it’ or ‘read your scriptures and pray more’).

3. Several leaders implied that the victims just needed to ‘forgive and forget’ and get on with their lives.

4. Some leaders implied that the abuse or related problems were the women’s fault.

. . . Ten women felt ‘threatened’ because they believed they would be punished or silenced if they came forward with allegations of abuse. One woman went to her bishop in an effort to gain control over life choices that she felt were destructive. She explained that she had been sexually abused as a child and believed that the abuse was a primary factor in her compulsive behavior. As a result of her revelations to the bishop, she was excommunicated, which, she said, “emphasized that I was no good and not worthy of anything.”

“Five of the women who spoke to Church leaders were . . . disfellowshipped . . . or excommunicated for behaviors (such as sexual behavior) related to their abuse. Of the 80 Mormon perpetrators, only 3 were disciplined in any way. Thus sexual “impurity” by these adult survivors of abuse, all of whom confessed their behavior voluntarily, was punished more harshly than was the sexual abuse of children by male priesthood holders.

“Some of the perpetrators remained priesthood holders in good standing after they were legally convicted of molesting children. In the case of one perpetrator who admitted his guilt but was not legally tried, a bishop said that he had made sufficient recompense because he offered to pay the victim $30 a month for six months; the total cost of this survivor’s psychotherapy was about $16,000.” (Ibid., pages 107-108)

On page 109 of Case Reports we read:

A final finding was that sixty-five (92 percent) of the abuse survivors felt that Mormon culture did not aid in their recovery because it forced them to maintain a public identity at odds with their private selves. It maintained a heavy-handed “code of silence.” Abuse was “a taboo topic,” said one woman.

Marion B. Smith, the first director of the Intermountain Specialized Abuse Treatment Center, reported a number of cases of sexual abuse committed by Mormon bishops. In a letter published in Sunstone magazine, December 1991, pages 4-6, she reported: “Six of my clients in cases of incest were daughters of former bishops.”

Case Reports, pages 124-125, tells of some cases Marion Smith dealt with:

A professional woman in her forties sought Marion’s help in therapy after being abused by both her father and her grandfather for years when she was a child. Her father, the bishop, was widely respected in the ward during the same time period. . . .

A Provo woman incested as a child by her father went to the stake president with whom her father had served on a regional council. He responded that he “had to assume that her father was ‘an honorable man’ because he held a high Church office. She must be wrong.” . . .

A Salt Lake City woman and her sisters, between ages seven and nine, were “repeatedly abused” by a ward member and entered therapy as adults to deal with the trauma. One sister was “horrified to see their abuser serving as a temple worker.” He was also volunteering with children at a local hospital. She reported him to the hospital, who discontinued his volunteer services. . . .

Kristie Morton, raised in an active LDS family with pioneer roots, was sexually abused during childhood by various relatives. One was her great-uncle, a branch president, who said he was “helping her” and doing her “a favor.” She tried to defend herself, but her confusion was as paralyzing as her great-uncle’s greater power: “In Church they told us young women to be morally pure; they warned us about young men our own age trying to take sexual advantage of us, but they didn’t warn us about our priesthood leaders or family members trying to do the same thing. They told us to honor male priesthood holders because they act for God on earth. They told us to follow our leaders and do what we were told and everything will be all right. Well, it wasn’t all right.” Kristie entered therapy in her mid-thirties, after her great-uncle had died, and confronted her aunt with the fact of the abuse. The aunt said that the uncle “was only human” and had given “devoted service for so many years the Lord had forgiven him his sins.” She blamed Morton for bringing the abuse upon herself, and she accused her of trying to tear apart the family.

Among the numerous accounts of child sexual abuse noted by the Mormon Alliance we find the following:

Ellen (a pseudonym) had been molested twice by the time she was fourteen. . . . Confused and distraught, she and her family turned to bishops Arlo Atkinson and James Stapely, who also is a Mesa city council member. Atkinson took her into his home in Mesa. She would live with his family, and he would shepherd her through the court proceedings that followed.

Two months later, he began “a sexual relationship” with her. It did not stop, even after she tried to commit suicide. When ward members became “suspicious” about the amount of time Ellen was spending with Atkinson, she moved back home but the sexual relationship continued. When she became pregnant, she “concocted a story” about date rape and was placed in a state foster home. The foster mother intercepted “sexually explicit” letters from Atkinson to Ellen and contacted the police. Atkinson was excommunicated from the Church, served 132 days in jail for “sexual misconduct with a minor, and was sentenced to three years” probation. When he was out of jail, he moved to California but continued to telephone and visit Ellen. During the visits he continued to have sexual relations with her. (Case Reports, pages 89-90)

THE FALL OF GEORGE P. LEE

While some Mormons would like to believe that their leaders are almost infallible, the case of George P. Lee clearly demonstrates that even a highly respected leader can fall into sin. The Mormon Church is led by a group of men known as the General Authorities. Since Lee served in the First Quorum of the Seventy, he was a member of this elite group that directs the affairs of the church.

On September 2, 1989, the Salt Lake Tribune made this startling announcement:

George P. Lee, a member of the First Quorum of the Seventy since 1975, was stripped of his membership by the First Presidency and the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles for “apostasy” and “other conduct unbecoming a member of the church.” . . .

Dr. Lee has been considered a rising star in the church hierarchy, but his questioning of church leadership landed him in trouble two years ago, he said. Since then, he claims church officials have accused him of polygamy and immorality,” both of which he denies. When those charges didn’t stick, they charged him with apostasy, he said.

After George Lee’s excommunication, he wrote two letters “To the First Presidency and the Twelve” in which he severely castigated the leaders of the church. In the first letter he asked: “Who wrote a letter to George P. Lee and falsely accused him of things which were not true such as polygamy and teaching false doctrine?” His letters were turned over to the news media and caused a good deal of dissension in Salt Lake City.
George Lee’s many supporters discounted the comments regarding polygamy and immorality, believing that the church was out to get him. Unfortunately, however, in 1993, the statements about polygamy and immorality became very important. On July 30, 1993, the Mormon Church’s newspaper, the Deseret News, reported the following:

George P. Lee, former LDS Church general authority, is expected to surrender to authorities next week on charges that he sexually abused a 12-year-old girl in 1989.

Investigators say he fondled the girl at his home and during official trips made as a member of the church’s First Quorum of Seventy.

Lee, 50, was charged Thursday with aggravated sexual abuse of a child, a first-degree felony that carries a maximum penalty of five years to life in prison. The single charge accuses him of fondling the girl at his West Jordan home while talking to her about polygamy.

The girl would sometimes accompany Lee’s daughter when they traveled to conferences in other states while he served as a general authority for the church. Lee is accused of fondling her during trips to Arizona, Canada and Lake Powell, according to a sheriff’s report.

Prosecutors filed the charge as a first-degree felony because Lee ‘occupied a position of special trust to the victim’ as a religious leader and because the incidents are said to have occurred more than five times, the charges state.

On August 13, 1993, the Salt Lake Tribune reported:

Former Mormon general authority George P. Lee said God will bring “calamities and judgments” upon those who have accused him of child sex abuse. . . . Mr. Lee compared his plight with the persecution of Jesus Christ. “We all have peaks and valleys,” he said. “This is my valley, my Garden of Gethsemane.”

Finally, on October 12, 1994, the Salt Lake Tribune reported that Lee acknowledged his guilt:

A year ago, former Mormon general authority George P. Lee proclaimed he was “innocent before God” of sexually molesting a 12-year-old neighbor girl.

But Tuesday before a 3rd District judge, Lee humbly hung his head and admitted to touching the girl’s breasts for sexual gratification . . . .

Lee, 51, pleaded guilty to attempted sexual abuse of a child, a third-degree felony . . . .

Lee admitted only to fondling the girl’s breasts. But the victim, now 17 years old, said Lee fondled her breasts, buttocks and genitals for three years, beginning in 1986 when she was 9 years old . . . .

The last time Lee abused her was after a camping trip in June 1989 at Lee’s home.

George Lee, like the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith, mentioned the practice of “polygamy” to the young girl after they had returned from a camping trip:

During that trip, she went camping with the Lee family. Lee disappeared for a day and a night, then returned and brought her . . . back to their West Jordan home. That night, he called Karen [a pseudonym used to protect the identity of the victim] into his bedroom and had her sit on his bed. He told her that he had hiked to the top of a nearby mountain where he spoke “to the Lord and he told the Lord he’d fallen in love with me. . . . I was confused and taken aback about him speaking to the Lord and the Lord saying it was OK.” Lee then began talking to her about polygamy, “He said that it was going to be brought back to the Earth and we’d be asked to live it.” . . . Still later that night, Lee woke her up and said “he was sorry he’d ever started touching me and that he’d never do it again.”

However, “almost every day” for the month, he continued the fondling: in her friend’s bedroom, in the family room, in the pool at the Deseret Gym, on a Heber Creeper train ride, and in hotels when they traveled to Canada. She testified later that there were “more than 20 touching incidents” that month. (Case Reports, page 73)

The Mormon Alliance raises the question of whether church leaders knew about Lee’s sexual problem before he was excommunicated. In his first letter to the First Presidency and the Twelve George Lee made it clear that the church had put him on probation:

Who is acting as judge, jury and executioner at the same time and delights in putting George P. Lee on probation without fair hearing. . . . Who put George P. Lee on probation after he faithfully and honestly opened up to you in his attempts to answer your questions and false accusations with a presentation on the chalkboard?

The Mormon Alliance reported that there was a possibility that Lee may have abused other individuals:

In 1993 when criminal charges were filed against Lee, a Church spokesman said “they were unaware at the time [of the excommunication] of the sexual-abuse allegations.” Despite the Church’s silence and Lee’s denial, however, it is not impossible that allegations of sexual misconduct were known among the other General Authorities, for simultaneously with the period of probation and the pattern of intensifying ostracism, Lee was turning to children for sexual gratification and had been doing so since at least 1986, three years before his excommunication.

According to newspaper accounts spanning the time period between the filing of charges and Lee’s plea bargain, there may have been additional victims. A story published two days after he was charged states: “Other possible victims are alluded to in the report, but officials say that for now, only incidents involving the 12-year-old will be prosecuted.” A second newspaper story quoted sheriff’s officials as saying “others allegedly have made similar allegations against Lee.” A third news story, published in May 1994, reported that Lee’s attorney had filed a motion “asking the judge to exclude ‘any evidence of other misconduct or bad acts concerning defendant’s sisters-in-law . . . for the reason that said incidents, even if true, are irrelevant.’ The motion did not elaborate on the ‘misconduct or bad acts.’” . . .

Many questions remain unanswered: Did Lee abuse other children besides Karen, including the sisters of his wife Kitty? Were there abuse victims earlier than Karen? What was the influence of his abusive activities on his “apostasy” and vice versa? What did other General Authorities suspect or know? What kinds of interventions did they attempt during his “probation” and why was he placed on “probation”? (Case Reports, pages 72, 76)
On April 19, 1992, the Salt Lake Tribune published an article containing the following:

The social structure of the Mormon Church and its emphasis on family protect child sex abusers, according to two women who have written a book about sexual abuse in two Mormon neighborhoods.

Paperdolls: Healing from Sexual Abuse in Mormon Neighborhoods, was written by two Salt Lake Valley women using the pseudonyms April Daniels and Carol Scott. . . . While the women tell their stories of sex abuse separately, they share more than authorship: One of the teenage boys who abused Ms. Daniels in the 1970s married Ms. Scott’s daughter and later abused his own children. . . .

“I wrote it out of a need to empower myself, just some deep need to have the truth spoken,” said Ms. Scott, who relates how her grandchildren were abused at “touching parties” staged by the daughter and son-in-law of a Mormon Church apostle. . . .

In the book’s foreword, Salt Lake County psychiatrist Dr. Paul L. Whitehead reports he treated three of the children described in the book and “can verify the accuracy of their horrific experiences.”

On page 52 of Paperdolls Carol stated that when she thinks of the kids from one of the neighborhoods, “it makes me physically ill. Six kids dead. Three of them suicides. Three in and out of institutions. Five with eating disorders or drug abuse.”

Carol claimed that the apostle’s daughter was very generous about tending children, but felt there was an evil motive:

This mother . . . is a daughter of a general authority in the Mormon church, a daughter of one of the Twelve Apostles. Her husband is in the bishopric . . . Our children told about the “touching parties” at her house. About what the dad did to his two little girls and ours while the mom gave out Popsicles and cookies and took videos. About how she used some of the Junior Sunday School visual aids for backgrounds in the videos. . . . The detail from each matches what the others have said. (Paperdolls, page 55)

On page 108, Carol related that pornographic videos were shown and then the children all took part in various sexual acts: “The whole ‘party’ took less than an hour. Usually about seven children, a couple of teenagers, and three or four adults were there. Sometimes there were costumes and props, and sometimes the children were given injections, ‘especially if it was going to hurt.” On the same page we find that the children were threatened:

Cynthia said the apostle’s daughter told them, “I’ll run over your Mommy and Daddy with my truck if you tell,” and “I’ll drop Claire in the road going to pre-school, and she’ll get lost or run over.” Cynthia and Claire watched as the apostle’s son-in-law strangled a baby kitten. They made the children help bury it. “We can do this to Claire,” they told Cynthia. “We’ll bury her right here by the kitty if you ever tell.”

According to Carol, the church did not take any action against this man: “. . . the stake president . . . talked with one of the children’s therapists. The stake president told us he believed it. There has never been an excommunication trial . . . the ones who had the ‘touching parties,’ are the daughter and son-in-law of an apostle in the Mormon church. . . . What Utah police official, what church authority is going to deal with that?” On page 145, she stated: “The apostle’s son-in-law would continue to sit next to the bishop on the stand in church, looking down on all the faces of the children he had molested.”

In a letter to Sunstone, Marion B. Smith indicated that she felt there was a cover up with regard to the daughter and son-in-law of a Mormon Church apostle:

A little over five years ago . . . I, along with five or six other therapists, interviewed approximately twenty children from a Bountiful ward. In this same ward other children had made allegations about Bret Bullock and other adults in what appeared to be a group sex ring. Bullock was subsequently convicted. . . . In this same neighborhood, totally different adults were named by totally different children . . . the children who reported the second, non-Bullock sex ring did not know what the children in the Bullock case had said and were too young to come up with the consistent, spontaneous, explicit detail and congruent emotional affect that they manifested. These two Bountiful sex rings were never linked by any children as far as I know. Both groups involved ritualized sex acts but to my knowledge, not satanic rites. . . .

One aspect of the second alleged sex ring was that a daughter and son-in-law of a general authority were named as the main abusers by at least seven children. Explicit detail was given about this couple’s activities by all of these children. When the couple’s names surfaced, the Bountiful police, for all practical purposes, dropped the case. . . . At the time, the stake president and others in the Church system said they believed the children, but no Church action was ever taken against any of the alleged perpetrators . . . much of the sex ring activity being reported allegedly has taken place within LDS congregations and is perpetrated by active LDS members. . . . Within the Salt Lake Valley alone, sex abuse rings have been reported in Midvale, West Valley, Salt Lake, and Bountiful. . . . The patriarchal system where the priesthood holder’s authority is not questioned allows pedophiles a unique opportunity. Bishops often support the perpetrator because he is a priesthood holder . . . The Church needs to change its implied message that its leaders are morally infallible. . . . LDS denial of anything being wrong within family or Church systems is exceedingly strong. I believe that a Church cover-up occurred in the case of the general authority’s children . . . If there has been a cover-up, obviously it is intolerable to Mormons and non-Mormons alike. . . . (Sunstone, December 1991, pages 4-6)

In the story published in Paperdolls the apostle’s son-in-law is referred to only as “Hank.” The Mormon Alliance Case Reports gives additional information with regard to this matter:

The story continued after the publication of Paperdolls. In the summer of 1992, Carol’s two youngest daughters and one of their husbands met with Hank’s current bishop and his stake president. They sought this meeting with these ecclesiastical leaders as part of their own healing. They pled with Hank’s priesthood leaders to take action to right the wrong that had been done and to protect the children to whom Hank still had access. Carol reports: “These authorities told us they were worried Hank might kill himself if they took action against him, but they said... they believed us. They said they would have to check with their legal department and get back to us. We heard no further response from them.” Carol’s son-in-law wrote to the stake president later:

We met with you, as spiritual leaders, with the hope that something could be done to protect against more abuse, to better facilitate the long and difficult healing process . . . President, I cannot begin to tell you how crushed I felt to look you, a fellow priesthood holder, in the eye and tell you that a diagnosed pedophile, who had returned from a mission and who had married in the temple, raped and sodomized my wife and many others when they were but small and innocent children, only to have you tell me that you would have to check with your legal department and get back to me, which you have not bothered to do. . . . Because we cannot get any support from our Church, we are forced to resort to a civil court of law. . . . I pray for you, as well as the children.

A copy went to Elder Loren C. Dunn, then area president. Two of the women initiated a civil suit against Hank for damages from his abuse when they were children. Criminal action was not possible because the statute of limitation had run out. Even though Hank was an attorney and a member of the Utah Bar, he did not contest the suit, and the women were awarded a default judgment for $5 million. Their “damages” consisted of a token $100 a month, as Hank had sought protection from previous creditors by declaring bankruptcy. He had never paid any child support for his four children.

In 1992, an adult woman who had read Paperdolls called Carol and said, “I know who Hank is. . . . He abused me for four years when I was a child, right up until he left on his mission.” She had gone to Hank’s current bishop and stake president and told her own story . . . hoping they might warn families in his present ward. But nothing ever happened.

In fall 1993, Hank was fired from his position with the State Tax Commission, allegedly for sexually harassing a teenage female employee. Carol and her daughters were amazed to be told later that Hank’s mortgage was paid from ward welfare funds for many months, a payment authorized by Hank’s bishop, who apparently felt that Hank’s financial needs took precedence over his victims’ claims. . . . Carol, reported to me in the spring of 1996 the ending of this story for Hank . . . She had learned these details when Hank’s second wife, Elaine, called her. A year before in the spring of 1995, Hank and Elaine separated . . . When Elaine told her two daughters by her first marriage and the son she had borne to Hank that she planned to divorce him, the three children told their mother of their years of sexual and physical abuse at his hands . . . Elaine called Hank, told him that the children were in therapy, and that she was going to see him “rot in jail for what he’d done.”

Hank disappeared from his job. Elaine later learned that he had returned to his mother’s home in Salt Lake City. The morning after his return, his mother found him dead from an overdose of prescription drugs. A suicide note addressed to his stepdaughters said . . . he knew God would forgive and understand his death because he could not continue the destruction of more lives . . .

Carol summarizes bleakly, “I know of at least thirty people Hank molested when they were children . . . Hank was never called to a disciplinary council, and we have never been given an explanation for this lack of Church action against him. We believe that Church officers shielded Hank from ecclesiastical action and even paid his bills because of his connection to an apostle’s family.” (Case Reports, pages 118-120)

RITUAL ABUSE CONFIRMED

While the sexual abuse reported above is certainly very distressing to read about, there is another form of abuse that is far worse because it includes extreme torture along with all types of sexual abuse. This is the ritual abuse of children. Although it is often referred to as satanic ritual abuse, those who participate in it do not always worship Satan. They may, in fact, be occultists who worship other gods. In addition, many of those involved in this evil practice may not even believe in the existence of any god. They simply use occultic or satanic trappings to terrify their victims.

Although we knew there was a group that broke off from the Mormon Church and committed many murders (the LeBarons), and two dissident brothers (the Laffertys) who ritually sacrificed a baby by cutting its throat, we were not aware that anything like this was going on within the Mormon Church.

In July 1991, however, we were presented with a copy of a very sensational memo written by a General Authority of the Mormon Church. It was a highly secret document authored by Glenn L. Pace, Second Counselor in the Presiding Bishopric of the church. It was dated July 19, 1990, and was directed to the “Strengthening Church Members Committee” of the Mormon Church. In the memo Pace states that he met with many victims of “ritualistic child abuse,” and that “All sixty individuals are members of the Church.”

Since we felt that this information should be available to members of the Mormon Church so that the children could be protected, we published the Pace memo in the November 1991, issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger (copies of this newsletter are still available free to those who write us at: Utah Lighthouse Ministry, Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110).

In addition to the large number of copies we distributed from our bookstore, we also sent copies of it to the news media. All three of the major television stations in Salt Lake City ran the story. On October 24, 1991, it became the lead story on the Channel 4 evening news. Channel 2 also ran the story on its evening news, and even the Mormon Church’s own station KSL (Channel 5), ran the story on its 10 o’clock newscast. To our surprise, KSL actually presented a frank and accurate account of the contents of the memo and of the serious implications for the church. Other stories concerning ritual abuse and the Mormon Church were presented on all three of the major stations in the days that followed and a number of the victims gave their stories. The story also became national news.

Although we thought Mormon leaders would deny the accusations of ritualistic abuse in the church, we are happy to report that they acknowledged that Pace wrote the memo and that there was indeed a problem in the church. The church’s own newspaper reported:

> Officials from The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints said Friday they are evaluating reports that satanic cults dedicated to sexually abusing children are operating within the church. . . .

“Satanic worship and ritualistic abuse are problems that have been around for centuries and are international in scope,” said a statement issued Friday by the church public affairs department. “While they are, numerically, not a problem of major proportions among members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, for those who may be involved they are serious.”

The Church has strived to help local ecclesiastical leaders understand and deal with the issue, the statement said, citing a Sept. 18 message from the First Presidency “reaffirming their concern about such distasteful practices and encouraging vigilance in detecting and treating situations that may arise.” . . . Bishop Pace said satanic abusers in Utah “represent a cross-section of the Mormon culture.” (Deseret News, October 25, 1991)

While some Mormons have tried to skirt around the official statement made by the church itself, the Mormon Alliance acknowledges that the document which we published is authentic:

On 2 July 1991, Jerald and Sandra Tanner received a copy of the Pace memo from an unidentified source. Linda Walker, an investigator and writer from San Francisco then doing research on incest and satanic abuse within Mormonism, says that she received a copy of the memo from them. Walker interviewed Bishop Pace and he confirmed that he had “interviewed about one hundred victims of ritualistic abuse.” The Tanners also gave a second copy to a second researcher, who was suspicious about the authenticity of the memo and about the existence of the Strengthening Church Members Committee. He confirmed the existence of both the memo and the committee with a secretary in Pace’s office. . . .

The authenticity of the memo has been challenged by those who feel that Jerald and Sandra Tanner . . . would not scruple to forge a document. Those who are familiar with the Tanners’ work, while they may not agree with their methods or conclusions, believe that they adhere to scrupulous standards of accuracy. Since the Church acknowledged the existence of the memo without any qualifications about its accuracy, attempts to deny the existence or seriousness of ritual abuse by casting doubts on the authorship of the memo cannot be taken seriously. (Case Reports, page 138)

In the highly secret report Pace noted that he had met with sixty victims. Later, however, he interviewed forty more people, thus making a total of one hundred victims. The following is taken from Pace’s memo to the Strengthening Church Membership Committee of the Mormon Church:

Pursuant to the Committee’s request, I am writing this memorandum to pass along what I have learned about ritualistic child abuse. Hopefully, it will be of some value to you as you continue to monitor the problem. You have already received the LDS Social Services report on satanism dated May 24, 1989 . . . I have met with sixty victims. That number could be twice or three times as many if I did not discipline myself to only one meeting per week. . . . All sixty individuals are members of the Church. Forty-five victims allege witnessing and/or participating in human sacrifice. The majority were abused by relatives, often their parents. All have developed psychological problems and most have been diagnosed as having multiple personality disorder or some other form of dissociative disorder.

Ritualistic child abuse is the most hideous of all child abuse. The basic objective is premeditated — to systematically and methodically torture and terrorize children until they are forced to dissociate. . . .

Many individuals with whom I have spoken have served missions . . . One individual has memories of participating in rituals while serving as a full-time missionary. . . . when sixty witnesses testify to the same type of torture and murder, it becomes impossible for me, personally, not to believe them. . . .

Children are put in a situation where they believe they are going to die — such as being buried alive or being placed in a plastic bag and immersed in water. Prior to doing so, the abuser tells the child to pray to Jesus to see if He will save her. Imagine a seven year old girl, having been told she is going to die, praying to Jesus to save her and nothing happens — then at the last moment she is rescued, but the person saving her is a representative of Satan. He uses this experience to convince her that the only person who really cares about her is Satan, she is Satan’s child and she might as well become loyal to him.

Just before or shortly after their baptism into the Church, children are baptized by blood into the satanic order which is meant to cancel out their baptism into the Church. . . . Most victims are suicidal. They have been brainwashed with drugs, hypnosis, and other means to become suicidal as soon as they start to tell the secrets. They have been threatened all of their lives that if they don’t do what they are told their brother or sister will be burned, or they themselves will be killed. . . . They believe they might as well kill themselves instead of wait for the occult to do it. . . . Our priesthood leaders, when faced with such cases, are understandably at a loss of how to respond. . . .

I’m sorry to say that many of the victims have had their first flashbacks while attending the temple for the first time. The occult along the Wasatch Front use the doctrine of the Church to their advantage. For example, the verbiage and gestures are used in a ritualistic ceremony in a very debased and often bloody manner. When the victim goes to the temple and hears the exact words, horrible memories are triggered. . . . The perpetrators are also living a dual life. Many are temple recommend holders. This leads to another reason why the Church needs to consider the seriousness of these problems. In affect, the Church is being used.

I go out of my way to not let the victims give me the names of the perpetrators. I have told them that my responsibility is to help them with spiritual healing and that the names of perpetrators should be given to therapists and law enforcement officers. However, they have told me the positions in the Church of members who are perpetrators. Among others, there are Young Women leaders, Young Men leaders, bishops, a patriarch, a stake president, temple workers, and members of the Tabernacle Choir. These accusations are not coming from individuals who think they recognized someone, but from those who have been abused by people they know, in many cases their own family members. . . . Not only do some of the perpetrators represent a cross section of the Mormon culture, but sometimes the abuse has taken place in our own meetinghouses. . . . I have met with 60 victims. Assuming each one comes from a coven of 13, we are talking about the involvement of 800 or so right here on the Wasatch Front. Obviously, I have only seen those coming forth to get help. (Memorandum written by Bishop Glenn L. Pace to the Strengthening Church Membership Committee, July 19, 1990, pages 1-5)

In a television interview Noemi Mattis, who holds a doctorate in psychology from Columbia University and treats victims of ritual abuse, reported that at “a meeting of therapists” in this area she “circulated a questionnaire asking how many cases have you seen, have you treated in therapy who have reported ritual abuse. And there was a total of 32 therapists who were in the room. There was a total of 360 cases reported.”

As noted above, after we published the Pace memo it received a great deal of attention from the news media. The subject of both sexual abuse and ritual abuse was widely discussed in Utah. In fact, on January 18, 1992, KSL TV reported the results of a poll about ritual abuse:

Utahns overwhelmingly believe that satanic and/or ritualistic child abuse exists. A recent KSL-DN [Deseret News] poll showed that 90% of those surveyed say it exists. Some say it’s widespread, while others see it happening only occasionally or seldom. Only 2% do not think it exists at all.

On November 24, 1991, the Salt Lake Tribune supported a plan by Governor Bangerter to appoint investigators to look into the charges of ritual abuse in Utah. The measure was passed by the Utah Legislature and two investigators, Lt. Michael R. King and Lt. Matt Jacobson, were selected to investigate the allegations.

King had previously served as the “lead investigator” in the prosecution of the Shreeve group. This cult used passages from Joseph Smith’s Book of Mormon as they sexually abused children. This, of course, is a bizarre use of the Book of Mormon, since there is nothing in the book that could possibly be used to justify sexual abuse. In any case, twelve adults were charged with sexually abusing children, and all of them were convicted. Arvin Shreeve, the leader of the group, and Sharon Kapp “are respectively serving 20 years and 10 years to life sentences in the Utah State Prison.”

When we were interviewed by Lt. Matt Jacobson, we informed him of allegations of ritual abuse in a Mormon Church in Oklahoma which could throw some light on cases in Utah. Jacobson, in turn, told us that the investigation had led him to believe that ritual abuse was taking place in Utah.

On April 25, 1995, the Utah Attorney General’s Office released the report on ritual abuse. It is entitled, Ritual Crime in the State of Utah: Investigation, Analysis & A Look Forward. While the investigators were unable to find enough hard evidence to prosecute any of the perpetrators, they did bring forth very convincing proof that ritual abuse is indeed a reality! In their report they noted:

In another case, three adult female children recalled memories of satanic sexual abuse that occurred while they were very young. The victims, in separate interviews discussed robed ceremonies, alters [sic], candles, animal sacrifices and extreme physical and sexual abuse. Since their recollections appeared to show some consistency, an in-depth investigation was launched. At the conclusion of the investigation, the suspects were interviewed. Both the mother and the father admitted to serious sexual and physical crimes against the children and named several other individuals who were also involved. The case, however could not be prosecuted because the statute of limitation had run. The crimes occurred over 25 years ago, but this case does indicate that serious sexual and physical abuse can happen and that it is perpetrated by those who cloak their crimes in ritualistic activity. (Ritual Crime in the State of Utah, page 3)

Significantly, when the report by the ritual abuse investigators was released, the Mormon Church’s newspaper, Deseret News, revealed a great deal about one of the three victims whose parents confessed to the practice of satanic ritual abuse. Deseret News staff writer Jerry Spangler wrote the following about this important case:

From the time she was 3 years old until she became a young adult, Rachel Hopkins was ritualistically tortured, raped, bathed in blood and threatened that she would be killed if she ever told anyone.

It’s a story so bizarre and so terrifying that some people refuse to believe that it really happened. Hopkins (not her real name) was a victim of what is commonly called satanic ritual abuse — a phenomenon that many psychological experts say doesn’t exist.

Rather, they argue, memories of ritualistic abuse are fantasies or false memories planted by unscrupulous therapists. “I am sure there are cases where bogus therapists have suggested things. Of course, there are false memories,” Hopkins said. “But that is not what happened to me.”

Like most victims of satanic ritual abuse, Hopkins remembered the abuse many years later. But her case is significantly different from others.

She has the signed confessions of her parents — both of whom admitted abusing her during satanic rituals — that corroborate every memory she has of the abuse. The confessions offer much greater detail of events Rachel could not have known.

Hopkins’ parents also confessed in detail to two investigators from the Utah attorney general’s office and to leaders of the church they attended.

Hopkins was also able to recover a photograph of herself as a child that shows bruises inflicted during the ritual abuse. Her siblings have also corroborated the events surrounding the ritual abuse.

“The biggest weapon they (occultists) have is secrecy,” she said. “By our society not acknowledging that it exists, we aid in that secrecy and we refuse to allow the healing to begin.” . . .

Hopkins . . . has met repeatedly with investigators Matt Jacobson and Mike King from the attorney general’s office, who said her case was “absolutely, concrete evidence” of satanic ritual abuse. They even requested her permission to cite her case specifically in the report and asked her to talk to the media about her experience.

“The truth is they (occultists) do wear black robes, they do abuse children, they do kill animals,” she said. “It exists, and to say otherwise is to deny the facts in front of them. Our society used to deny the existence of incest, too, because we didn’t want to believe it.”

Today, Hopkins . . . is a mother of two children, she has been happily married for 20 years, she has just returned to college to complete her undergraduate degree and she is devoted to the LDS Church.

Hopkins recalls how her parents and others, some of them relatives, would dress in black robes for sporadic rituals that involved terror and torture. “I was sexually abused in every way you can conceive. I was tortured and had the bottoms of my feet cut, I was made to believe I was killing a baby, and they forced me to kill dogs and cats,” she said.

“I was bathed in a tub of blood and forced to look at myself in a mirror. I was tied up and hung upside down and spun. I was suffocated and electrocuted to the point of being bowed and paralyzed. Sometimes they forced me and my siblings to hurt one another. They would tell me, ‘now you’re one of us. If you tell anybody, they won’t believe you and they’ll put you in a mental hospital.’ And they threatened to torture me until I was dead.”

Hopkins and her siblings believe Rachel was singled out for more intensive abuse because of her blond hair and eyes and because she refused to submit willingly to the rituals. . . .

Two years and eight months ago the memories started coming back. At first, she couldn’t believe it either. She had heard of satanic ritual abuse before but had never associated her memories with that behavior.

“The first time I called my parents up and told them I had been sexually abused and I knew they did it, they told me I was hallucinating,” she said. “Since that time, they have written letters to each of the children confirming everything in explicit detail.”

For Hopkins, the healing began when people started to believe her — her husband, her therapist, church leaders and even the attorney general’s investigators.

“It was my faith in Jesus Christ that got me through it all,” she said. “I am at peace with this now.” . . . “But I want those out there who may have been victimized by this kind of abuse to know that there are those who believe them.
With a good therapist, they can start the healing process, too. They can break free of this and have a new life,” she said. (Deseret News, April 25, 1995)

On April 25, 1995, the television station KTVX (Channel 4) gave additional information regarding the same victim (referred to as Jenny in the newscasts). Paul Murphy reported:

One woman who came forward to tell about ritual abuse brought something no one else has — a confession from the perpetrators. . . . The way the abuse occurred sounds like scenes out of Rosemary’s Baby.

Paul Murphy said that “most people would be skeptical of Jenny’s story of satanic ritual abuse, except for one thing — her parents confessed. In these letters [which were shown to the television audience] the parents ask for forgiveness and describe the abuse in detail. Her mother wrote: ‘He cut off your night clothes and panties. A dog was hung by the back feet, throat cut and disemboweled, and hind legs cut off. You were hung by your feet after being bound.’ ”

Mr. Murphy also quoted the woman’s father as writing the following: “I performed the same sexual acts on you at home.
The sexual abuse in our home was a repeat of the ritual.” Murphy went on to reveal that, “The confessions come after Jenny and siblings interfered with the parents’ plans to go on a [Mormon] Church mission.”

According to the woman, when her parents were confronted about the ritual abuse, “They denied it vehemently, but the bishop and the stake president said . . . ‘why would all of your children say this . . . Why would they all say this about you, if it isn’t true.’ And so finally they did confess.”

Murphy reported that, “The parents settled out of court to pay Jenny’s therapy bills along with a note that says, ‘We are so happy to send this check. We pray for your healing. Love
Mom and Dad.’ ”

Paul Murphy revealed the following: “This is what her father wrote about the rituals: ‘You were threatened that if you ever told this, that you would really be cut apart.’ ”

When one of the newscasters asked Murphy if anything could be done to the parents, he replied: “Well, they admitted to things that didn’t fall within the statute of limitations. The girl still hopes that her parents may be prosecuted on other things that have happened. They were also excommunicated from the church, which I understand has no statute of limitations.”

Newscaster Randall Carlisle summed up the whole matter regarding ritual abuse by saying: “Boy, if no one’s seen proof up till now, they certainly see the proof now.”

It would be very difficult to set this woman’s report aside as fantasy. While some might ignore the statements of three children, when all five members of a family testify to the same thing, it becomes very difficult to deny the charges. That both the children’s mother and father would write letters confirming the satanic ritual abuse is very important. Moreover, the fact that the parents confirmed the abuse to investigators and even allowed themselves to be subjected to excommunication from the Mormon Church is highly significant.

It is very difficult to gloss over the serious implications of this information. Those who doubt the reality of ritual abuse usually point out that the so-called “Satan scare” was triggered by “Christian fundamentalism” and the publication of the book,
Michelle Remembers, in 1980.

The case investigated by the Utah Attorney General’s Office throws important light on the subject of satanic ritual abuse because it clearly shows that this type of sexual abuse and torture was actually taking place long before the book Michelle Remembers was published.

In the secret memo written by Glenn Pace regarding ritual abuse he explains that in many cases the abuse is too horrible to cope with. Consequently, the victims often block it out of their minds for many years. Pace commented: “The victims lead relatively normal lives, but the memories are locked up in a compartment in their minds and surface in various ways . . .
As they become adults and move into another environment, something triggers the memories and . . . flashbacks and/or nightmares occur. One day they will have been living a normal life and the next they will be in a mental hospital in a fetal position.”

The case reported above gives strong support to the claim that a child who is severely abused can repress the ugly memories for many years, only to have them break forth into their conscious mind after they have grown up. As noted above, the Deseret News article reported that the woman repressed memories of the abuse for “many years.” In fact, according to the article, written on April 25, 1995, it was only “Two years and eight months ago, the memories started coming back.”

This demonstrates that traumatic memories can be stored in the mind and later retrieved by the victim. While it must be acknowledged that this does not prove that all recovered memories are true, in this case it shows the victim’s long-suppressed recollections were dependable. This is demonstrated in the fact that her parents’ signed confessions “corroborate every memory she has of the abuse.” (Deseret News, April 25, 1995)

Interestingly, a recent civil case tried in Salt Lake City, which involved a claim of repressed memories was won by the victim:

Cherese Franklin told a Salt Lake City jury that she completely repressed memories of being sexually abused as a child — and then recovered those memories 33 years later.

And the jury believed her.

After an 11-day trial in 3rd District Court, jurors Thursday awarded Franklin $750,000 in physical and emotional damages for lifelong illnesses and mental symptoms she claimed resulted from abuse inflicted upon her by an older cousin. . . . Franklin began her journal in November 1992 . . . By the end of the year, she had detailed 15 horrific incidents of abuse that involved death threats accompanied by the mutilation of animals. (Salt Lake Tribune, August 16, 1996)

Mormonism stresses morals and the importance of the family. These things, of course, are admirable and should be continued. On the other hand, however, the many reports of sexual and ritualistic abuse are very disturbing. The church certainly needs to take a tougher stand against child sexual abuse.

Because of the significance of the information contained in the book, Case Reports of the Mormon Alliance, vol. 1, we have decided to make it available to the reader at a special price. In addition, our book, Occultic Ritual Abuse: Fact or Fantasy? which usually sells for $6.95 can be obtained for free with every order of $25.00 or more. This book contains a great deal of material on both child sexual abuse and ritualistic abuse in the Mormon Church. See the special prices on the first page of this newsletter.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS

“To the Salt Lake City Messenger: Actually the clowns known as the Tanners. I am a missionary for the LDS church . . . This is the ONLY church set up like Christ set it up. Not some joke thing out of Salt Lake like you clowns. . . . Satan is on your side . . . He’s got a whole section rooting for you clowns. Your ex[ac]tly that. Clowns! . . . Satan is your pimp. . . .” (Letter from Idaho)

“I have found your newsletters to be very interesting, in particular the articles concerning FARMS. . . . Your ministry was instrumental as far back as 20 years ago in helping us to see the truth. Thank You!” (Letter from Oklahoma)

“We, as a family [of five], officially resigned from the Mormon church as of June 23, 1996. Thank you so much for your words of encouragement . . . We discussed all that we had found with our children, with the Holy Bible in hand and much prayer for guidance, and the change in their perspective about the Mormon church was quite dramatic. We know that the Holy Spirit played a great part in the transformation. For us it constitutes a miracle.” (Letter from Arkansas)

“We want to thank you so much for the honesty and integrity that you both display . . . more than all your willingness to stand up to the Mormon Church. . . . Thank you so much for your helping us to see the truth about the Mormon Church, we have been very faithful Mormons for 35 years . . . You folks have made it possible to finally know the truth about Mormonism, and we have since left the Mormon Church and we are very glad we have done so. We have found out who Jesus Christ really is and what part he plays in all of our lives, no more nonsense, or deceit, or lies. We finally are free thanks to you fine people and others. We now understand what life really is about. Many Mormons are leaving the church and many are questioning the truthfulness of the church . . .” (Letter from Utah)

Those who would like to help us reach the Mormon people should be aware of the fact that Utah Lighthouse Ministry is a non-profit organization. In addition to our work with Mormons, we provide support for 44 children through World Vision, and furnish some help to a local Rescue Mission. Those who are concerned about helping this ministry can send their tax-deductible contributions to UTAH LIGHTHOUSE MINISTRY, P. O. Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110. Both contributions and orders can be made over the phone (801-485-8894 or 801-485-0312) with Visa, MasterCard or Discover Card.

While we deeply appreciate the financial support that we receive, we strongly desire your prayers. We believe they will bring thousands of Mormons to the truth. As Apostle Paul admonished: “Continue earnestly in prayer, being vigilant in it with thanksgiving” (Colossians 4:2).
LAWRENCE FOSTER’S
RESPONSE TO OUR LAST NEWSLETTER

September 17, 1996

Dear Jerald Tanner,

Thank you for allowing me to respond to your comments in the most recent issue of the Messenger. Since it is difficult in a single page to address more than a dozen pages of comments, including some serious distortions of my Mormon history scholarship over more than two decades, let me ask those interested in an accurate statement of my complex views to read my two articles on your work in Dialogue (Summer 1984) and Differing Visions (1994); the relevant sections of my two books, Religion and Sexuality and Women, Family, and Utopia; and the personal statement of my approach to Mormon history in Dialogue (Fall 1983).

On the question of why I would have drafted a press release critical of what I took to be your unwillingness to meet with me when I was attempting to prepare a serious scholarly analysis of your work, I have only this to add. I came up with that idea immediately after talking with Michael Marquardt more than a month after not receiving an answer to my two written requests for an interview (I wrote rather than called you because I did not want to open the possibility that anything I might say on the phone could subsequently be reported in a distorted form in your newsletter). Michael told me, though he does not remember his specific statement more than a decade later, that you were uneasy about meeting with me and had not yet decided whether or not you would agree to an interview. Immediately after Marquardt’s comments, I drafted the statement you have reproduced. I was quite frankly fed up that after all the times you had berated Mormon leaders for not responding to you, you were apparently not willing to meet with a non-Mormon scholar interested in trying to write a serious analysis of your work. If I was in error on this point, I apologize for the error.

The larger issue here is relevant to my fundamental critique of your work, however. You and Sandra are accomplished debaters, but your analysis is ultimately unconvincing because you refuse to apply consistent standards to assessing both Mormonism and your own faith. I have repeatedly pressed you on this point to no avail. Despite the importance of your research in various areas of Mormon history, my fundamental assessment thus still stands: “Until the Tanners are prepared to use consistent standards of judgment for their own faith as well as for that of others, their stance cannot be taken seriously by scholars or by the general public.” This weakness is one that both you and many Mormon apologists associated with FARMS both share.

I am similarly concerned that your discussion of my work in the Messenger seriously misrepresents some of my most important conclusions. For example, the key point of my assessment of the origins of Mormon plural marriage was that the motivation for introducing the practice was enormously complex and could not simply be reduced to the argument that Joseph Smith had an excessive sex drive. Similarly, my analysis of the complex sources of Joseph Smith’s genius (Dialogue, Winter 1993) never refers to him as “mentally ill” but instead stresses the complex psychological dynamics that may have contributed to his exceptional creativity. Whatever the sources of that genius may have been, the ultimate issue is, in Jesus’ words: “By their fruits shall ye know them.”

Sincerely yours,

Lawrence Foster

In the late 1950’s we began publishing materials relating to The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, commonly known as the Mormon Church. We were absolutely astounded at some of the material that came through our own research and the work of other people. Three and a half decades later new and important information regarding Mormonism is still coming to light. In fact, it is pouring forth so rapidly that we are unable to keep up with the flood of material that has become available.

As each chapter unfolds it becomes more and more evident that Mormonism has changed a great deal since Joseph Smith published the Book of Mormon in 1830. Unfortunately, the Mormon Church suppresses a great deal of important material that reflects badly on the church. Much of this material is kept hidden away in the Church Historical Department and in the First Presidency’s vault. This suppressive attitude has been criticized by many of the church’s historians.

QUINN’S REBELLION

Dr. D. Michael Quinn, who was excommunicated from the Mormon Church in 1993, was at one time considered to be one of the church’s top scholars. He published articles for the church’s official publication, The Ensign and also wrote for Brigham Young University Studies.

Quinn obtained a Ph.D. in history at Yale University and was formerly professor of American social history at the church’s Brigham Young University. Unfortunately for Quinn, he dug too deeply into the secret documents in the Church Historical Department. Quinn was able to see these documents because he had an inside track at the Historical Department under Dr. Leonard Arrington, who was formerly Church Historian.

The Mormon Hierarchy:
Extensions of Power, vol. 2
By D. Michael Quinn

Dr. Quinn is a noted historian who has had a great deal of access to many secret records stored in the Church Historical Department. Despite the fact that Mormon officials wanted Quinn to cease publishing materials that were embarrassing to the church, he has continued his work. In his latest book Quinn gives important information regarding “blood atonement murders” and violence in early Utah and many other topics. The regular price in bookstores is $45.00. Our special price is only $39.00.

ANOTHER FREE BOOK!

With every order of $25.00 or more we will send a free copy of the book, The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 2, by Jerald and Sandra Tanner. This book provides important information regarding the murders and violence spoken of in Quinn’s new book. Regular price: $4.95.

In a speech Quinn gave in 1981, he noted that he had “spent a decade probing thousands of manuscript diaries and records of Church history” that he “never dreamed” he would view. (On Being a Mormon Historian, a lecture given by D. Michael Quinn, Brigham Young University, Fall 1981)

When Dr. Quinn began publishing some of his more critical research—especially that regarding how the church secretly sanctioned the practice of polygamy after the Manifesto—some church leaders were incensed. In the book, Faithful History, edited by George D. Smith, page 109, Quinn wrote the following:

In June 1986 the staff of the church historical department announced it was necessary to sign a form which Elder Packer declared gave the right of pre-publication censorship for any archival research completed before signing the form. I and several others refused to sign the form and have not returned to do research at LDS church archives since 1986.

Dean C. Jessee is a scholar who is well known to students of Mormon history. He is currently serving as a research historian in the Joseph Fielding Smith Institute for Church History at Brigham Young University. For many years, however, Jessee worked at the Church Historical Department and had access to a vast number of sensitive documents.

When Michael Quinn’s first volume was published, Jessee expressed concern that Quinn had given too much attention to the “messy” matters researchers encounter when studying early Mormon history. He also wrote “that the story he tells is not as free from speculation and faulty interpretation as his bold writing style and abundant source notes would imply” (Journal of Mormon History, Fall 1996, pages 164-165).

Nevertheless, Dean Jessee acknowledged that Quinn did, in fact, have access to important church documents and that he did “painsstaking research.” Jessee wrote the following in his review:

Few historians have been in a better position to study the Mormon past than D. Michael Quinn. With degrees in English and history, including a doctorate at Yale, employment in the LDS Church Historical Department and wide-ranging access to its holdings, a dozen years of teaching history at BYU, and painstaking research in seventy-five repositories (he lists them), Quinn has spent a substantial part of his life studying Mormon history. This book and a second volume to follow are the outgrowth of research that led to a master’s thesis, continued through a doctoral program, and is the crowning accomplishment of thirty years work. . . .

The Mormon Hierarchy is a valuable contribution in terms of identifying sources and understanding the groundwork of the organizational structure. . . . While Hierarchy has laid important groundwork, the definitive study remains to be written. (Ibid., pages 162, 168)

Over the years Dr. Quinn has often found himself faced with serious problems with church leaders and officials at Brigham Young University. Around the time of his excommunication he was informed of a threat against his life. While Quinn did not link this threat with the Mormon Church itself, he believed that the rhetoric regarding his work had encouraged someone to threaten his life.

QUINN AND CONTROVERSY

As far as we know, Dr. Quinn had no problems with church officials in his early years as a historian. Ironically, however, he did find himself in a controversy with us in 1977, when he became involved in plot to undermine our work. The Church Historical Department had been receiving many letters and inquiries regarding the truthfulness of our research, and it had become clear that something had to be done to refute our credibility—especially the material found in our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? It was secretly decided that the Historical Department would distribute a booklet attacking our work. Interestingly, D. Michael Quinn was designated to write the pamphlet. The booklet was published under the title, Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s Distorted View of Mormonism: A Response to Mormonism —Shadow or Reality?

The publication of the pamphlet turned out to be a real disaster because those involved did not dare reveal that the Church Historical Department was responsible for its publication. Consequently, neither the name of the author nor the publisher was mentioned anywhere in the book. In addition, the publication was distributed in a clandestine fashion. Wilfrid Clark, who worked at Zion Bookstore, told us he received an anonymous letter containing a key to a room at a self storage company. He went to that location and picked up 1,800 free copies of the booklet!

Our response to this work appeared in a publication entitled, Answering Dr. Clandestine: A Response to the Anonymous LDS Historian. In this booklet we identified Quinn as the author. Even Lawrence Foster [a non Mormon who is very critical of our work] had to admit that, “The Tanners convincingly link the anonymous critique to D. Michael Quinn and the LDS Historical Department . . . ” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Summer 1984, page 510)

While a number of Mormon scholars affiliated with Brigham Young University and FARMS eventually came to detest Michael Quinn’s writings, they still continued to cite Quinn’s attack on us in their publications. We feel that they must have known that Quinn was the author. Interestingly, however, the long-kept silence regarding this matter was finally broken by Brigham Young University Professor Louis Midgley. Midgley identified “D. Michael Quinn” as the author in the FARMS publication, Review of Books on the Book of Mormon, vol. 7, no. 1, 1995, page 236.

Although we strongly disagreed with many of Quinn’s conclusions regarding our work, in our response we wrote: “We feel that he is probably one of the best historians in the Mormon Church. His dissertation written for Yale University is a masterpiece” (see Answering Dr. Clandestine, page 5).

Dr. Quinn is a real enigma to many people. Although he has been excommunicated from the church, he believes in the Book of Mormon and Joseph Smith’s First Vision. He, in fact, seems to feel that he has a calling to tell the truth about Mormonism no matter where it leads. In an interview with a newspaper reporter Quinn emphasized that he is still a believer: “When Michael Quinn was asked about his relationship to the LDS Church, he still describes himself as a ‘true believer’” (The Herald Journal, February 10, 1997).

A REAL HORNET’S NEST

Michael Quinn stirred up a great deal of animosity when he published an article in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought entitled, “Male-Male Intimacy among Nineteenth-century Mormons: A Case Study.” The Herald Journal for February 10, 1997, reported: “Quinn’s views drew such fierce criticism in Cache Valley that the former Brigham Young University historian was uncertain whether his Friday visit would draw a hostile crowd.” Fortunately for Quinn, there were no problems.

Although Dr. Quinn has published a great deal of important information regarding early Mormonism, we have a real problem with this particular article. Quinn wrote the following about Joseph Smith:

And as taught by their martyred prophet himself, it was acceptable for LDS “friends to lie down together, locked in the arms of love to sleep and wake in each other’s embrace.” (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1995, page 110)

In a footnote at the bottom of the same page, Michael Quinn spoke of “the tenderness involved in same-sex bedmates as advocated by the Mormon prophet.”

When we first read these comments we were very surprised. We had never encountered anything like that before in our research regarding Mormon Church history. We did notice, however, that Quinn gave a reference to Joseph Smith’s History of the Church. A careful examination of the context revealed that the quote was not referring to “same-sex bedmates,” but instead to death, burial and the resurrection! It was a speech given by Joseph Smith on April 16, 1843, at the funeral of Lorenzo D. Barns. We take the following from Joseph Smith’s History:

It has always been considered a great calamity not to obtain an honorable burial . . . If tomorrow I shall be called to lie in yonder tomb, in the morning of the resurrection let me strike hands with my father, and cry, “My father,” . . . When we lie down we contemplate how we may rise in the morning; and it is pleasing for friends to lie down together, locked in the arms of love, to sleep and wake in each other’s embrace. . . . when the voice calls for the dead to arise, suppose I am laid by the side of my father, what would be the first joy of my heart? To meet my father, my mother, my brother, my sister; and when they are by my side, I embrace them and they me. . . . (History of the Church, vol. 5, page 361)

A year after Michael Quinn published his article, George L. Mitton wrote a letter to the editor of Dialogue. His conclusions regarding Quinn’s article were similar to ours. Mitton, however, went even further:

The language Quinn cites is from a funeral sermon on the resurrection, where Joseph advocated that family and friends should be buried near each other if possible, lying down in nearby graves, so that they may wake at the resurrection to rejoice together and embrace in celebration of God’s goodness and love. He is referring to family members who are our dearest friends, and describing a scene of intense family joy. The arms of love is a scriptural allusion—the imagery of godly love as the Lord extends it at the resurrection and otherwise. . . .

Those who wish to know more about this issue should read George L. Mitton’s letter to the editor in Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter 1996, pages v-ix.

Mitton demonstrates that similar terms are found in the Book of Mormon and the Doctrine and Covenants. For example, in one of Joseph Smith’s early revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants we read that “God” told Oliver Cowdery to be “diligent in keeping the commandments . . . and I will encircle thee in the arms of my love” (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 6, verse 20).

In the Book of Mormon we find a similar expression: “But behold the Lord hath redeemed my soul . . . and I am encircled in the arms of his love” (2 Nephi 1:15). It seems clear then that the use of the words “in the arms of love” have nothing to do with “same-sex bedmates.” While Quinn made a serious error, we find it hard to believe that he deliberately set out to deceive. It seems more likely that he merely misunderstood the context.

Quinn also suggested that Evan Stephens, “director of the Mormon Tabernacle Choir at the turn of the twentieth century, provides a case study in the use of social history sources, as well as being a prime example of the early Mormon celebration of male-male intimacy.” While Quinn implies that Evan Stephens may have been a homosexual, there is no way to know for certain at this late date. We feel that it is unwise to speculate about the matter.

SEALING MEN TO MEN

As most people who are familiar with Mormonism know, dedicated Mormons believe in sealing women to men and children to their parents for all eternity. Few people, however, are aware of the fact that the early Mormons sealed living men to other men in an unusual ceremony known as “the law of adoption.” Thus a man could have any number of men adopted to himself as his sons for eternity. For example, in June, 1896, Wilford Woodruff, the fourth president of the church, gave a synopsis of his work in the ministry since 1834. He wrote the following in his journal: “I officiated in Adopting 96 Men to Men” (Wilford Woodruff’s Journal, 1833-1898, typescript, edited by Scott G. Kenney, 1985, vol. 9, page 408). In another synopsis for the years 1834-1885, he revealed: “I had 45 Persons Adopted to me” (Ibid., vol. 8, page 352).

While we cannot agree with Michael Quinn’s interpretation of Joseph Smith’s speech given at the funeral of Lorenzo D. Barns, it is interesting to note that even before the Mormons left Nauvoo to come to Utah, they were sealing men to men. An article concerning the law of adoption appeared in the Mormon Church’s publication The Latter-Day Saints’ Millennial Star, June, 1843, vol. 4, pages 17-19. This was a year before Joseph Smith was murdered. Gordon Irving, who worked for the historical department of the church, wrote: “No consensus exists with regard to the date when the first adoptions were performed . . . It is certainly possible, perhaps probable, that Joseph Smith did initiate certain trusted leaders into the adoptionary order as early as 1842” (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1974, page 295).

Although we have not found any evidence that immoral activities were involved in the sealing of men to men, the practice certainly could have opened a door for those predisposed to homosexual temptations. It seems obvious that the men who were sealed to one another were likely to have closer contact with one another than those who did not enter into the practice. (We do know that in recent times some missionaries who were constantly in close contact with their companions yielded to homosexual activities and were sent home from their missions.) In any case, the historian Hubert Howe Bancroft gave this information about the law of adoption:

> The father may be either younger or older than the son, but in any case assumes the character of guardian, with full control of the labor and estate of the adopted son. Many young men give themselves over to the leaders as “eternal sons,” in the hope of sharing the honor of their adopted parents. (History of Utah, page 361)

Gordon Irving tells of a case where two men could not agree on a sealing ceremony because they both wanted to be the father:

> In his short autobiography, Albert K. Thurber recalled that in 1850 Benjamin F. Johnson approached him and “in a round about way proposed for me to be adopted to him.” Thurber put him off by telling him, “I thought it would be as well for him to be adopted by me.” (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1974, page 304)

The noted Mormon historian Juanita Brooks discussed the law of adoption in a book written in 1962. Mrs. Brooks revealed that when a man was adopted to another man it was not considered improper for him to take his surname:

> At this time another ceremony was instituted, which . . . was significant and important while it lasted. This was the adoption of young men and their wives to one of the leaders. The idea behind it was that in establishing the Kingdom of God upon the earth there should be also a celestial relationship. If the Prophet Joseph were to become a God over a minor planet, he must not only have a large posterity but able assistants of practical skills. Brigham Young had been “sealed” to Joseph under this law; now he in turn had some thirty-eight young men sealed to him.

> Of this number, John D. Lee was second. . . . All of the men thus joined in the covenant seemed brothers in one sense, and for some of them Lee developed a genuine affection. Among others, jealousies grew up as they competed for favor.

> In the same way, Lee had eighteen or nineteen young men with their wives adopted to him. . . . He often spoke of them as George Laub Lee, W. B. Owens Lee, Miles Anderson Lee, James Pace Lee, Allen Weeks Lee, William Swap Lee. (John D. Lee: Zealot, Pioneer, Builder, Scapegoat, page 73)

George Laub, who was sealed to John D. Lee, wrote: “. . . I and my wife Mary Jane with many others was adopted into John D. Lee’s family, this I took upon myself the name of Lee in this manner, George Laub Lee and my wife’s name Mary Jane Laub Lee in such a way that it cannot be seaparated [sic] . . . by covenanted before God . . . this was done in the hous[e] of the Lord across the alter as was prepared for this Purpose of ordinances” (Ibid., page 74).

In his new book, The Mormon Hierarchy: Extensions of Power, vol. 2, page 492, footnote 39, D. Michael Quinn indicated that the idea of a man taking another man’s surname did not last too long: “When he was adopted to Apostle Willard Richards, Thomas Bullock recorded that he changed his ‘name to Thomas Bullock Richards. . . . However, within two years this name-adoption practice ended, and men such as Lee and Bullock stopped referring to themselves by their adopted surnames.

Early Mormon documents clearly reveal that the law of adoption led to a great deal of jealousy, and confusion among the men. Gordon Irving acknowledged that the sealing of men to men led to contention:

Difficulties began when it became apparent that adoption gave one a special status and that not all the adopted enjoyed the same status. . . .

Adoption as a system of social organization was troubled not only by fathers who demanded too much of their sons, but also by some of the children who in turn expected too much from their fathers. . . . In theory the importance of adoption lay in the validation of one’s sonship in the family of God. But some were more interested in being fathers and exercising authority over others than they were in being sons of God. Kingdom-building, or the gathering together of a large number of people over whom one could rule in eternity, enjoyed a good deal of popularity.

Brigham Young complained: were I to say to the elders you now have the liberty to build up your kingdoms, one half of them would lie, swear, steal and fight like the devil to get men and women sealed to them. They would even try to pass right by me and go to Jos[eph]. . . .

Adoption might have worked among the strong willed men who had joined the Church had they submitted to the “quiet spirit of Jesus.” However, the decision of the saints to assert their “selfish independence” destroyed any possibility that an authoritarian, hierarchical system such as adoption could function successfully among them. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1974, pages 299-303)

On April 6, 1862, President Brigham Young claimed that the practice of sealing men to men was “a great and glorious doctrine.” Nevertheless, he acknowledged that it could be very dangerous and may even send some “to hell”:

By this power men will be sealed to men back to Adam, completing and making perfect the chain of the Priesthood from this day to the winding up scene. I have known men that I positively think would fellowship the Devil, if he would agree to be sealed to them. “Oh, be sealed to me, brother; I care not what you do. You may lie and steal, or anything else, I can put up with all your meanness, if you will only be sealed to me.” Now this is not so much weakness as it is selfishness. It is a great and glorious doctrine, but the reason I have not preached it in the midst of this people, is, I could not do it without turning so many of them to the Devil. Some would go to hell for the sake of getting the Devil sealed to them. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 9, page 269)

Brigham Young’s grandson, Kimball Young, had a Ph.D. from the University of Chicago and served as chairman of the Department of Sociology at Northwestern University. Dr. Young made some interesting comments regarding the rolls of men and women in Brigham Young’s time:

To understand the role and status and the accompanying self-images of men and women in polygamy, we must recall that Mormondom was a male-dominated society. The priesthood—which only men could hold—was in complete control and celestial marriage, either monogamous or polygamous, exemplified the higher status of men. Women were viewed as of lesser worth, to be saved through men holding the priesthood.

The self-image of the woman reflected her inferior status. Alice Johnson Read, after hearing a sermon by Brigham Young, put the matter in her journal thus: “The Principle is that a woman, be she ever so smart, cannot know more than her husband if he magnifies his priesthood . . . God never in any age of the world endowed woman with knowledge above the man.” And Daisy Barclay, herself brought up in a plural family, remarks: “Polygamy is predicated on the assumption that a man is superior to a woman . . . [The] Mormon tradition follows that of the early Hebrews. It teaches [a] woman to honor and obey her husband and look upon him as her lord and master.” As a daughter of the second wife of Isaac Lambert once complained, “Mother figures you are supposed to spend your life taking care of a man, and he is God.”

That this masculine principle went deep, and far more fantastically than the Saints could comprehend, is shown in a sermon by Brigham Young, reported by John Read. In a letter to one of his wives Read said that Brigham referred to some future time “when men would be sealed to men in the priesthood in a more solemn ordinance than that by which women were sealed to men, and in a room over that in which women were sealed to man in the temple of the Lord.”

Here is evidence of deep, psychological Brüderschaft. There are obviously latent homosexual features in this idea and its cultural aspect has many familiar parallels in other religions. Most Saints, including Brigham Young himself, would have been much shocked by such an interpretation. Yet the Mormon system, with all its ecclesiastical trappings and military controls, like other organizations of this sort, had strong homosexual components. This is true of armies; it is true of priestly orders in all religions; and certainly in many aspects of the occupational guides of the Middle Ages. (Isn’t One Wife Enough? The Story of Mormon Polygamy, 1954, pages 278-280)

In a discourse President Brigham Young gave on September 4, 1873, he remarked that, “we can seal women to men but not men to men, without a Temple (Journal of Discourses, vol. 16, page 186).

As Juanita Brooks noted above, Brigham Young himself was sealed to Joseph Smith and in turn had some thirty-eight young men sealed to him. While we have no idea how many men President Young was eventually sealed to, it must have been a significant number.

Ironically, although Brigham Young, the second president of the Mormon Church, was married to dozens of wives he made this revealing comment about his relationship with women:

There are probably but few men in the world who care about the private society of women less than I do. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 5, page 99)
President Young and other early Mormon leaders were convinced that women were inferior. Consequently, they often had a difficult time getting along with them. Apostle Wilford Woodruff recorded in his journal the following comment made by Brigham Young:

> The man is the head & God of the woman, but let him act like a God in virtuous [sic] principles & God like conversation . . . (Wilford Woodruff’s Journal, vol. 3, page 131)

On a number of occasions Brigham Young frankly admitted that he was a dictator. For example, he once commented: “I sometimes say to my brethren, ‘I have been your dictator for twenty-seven years—over a quarter of a century I have dictated this people; that ought to be some evidence that my course is onward and upward’” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 14, page 205).

On another occasion Young declared: “Now ask the Father in the name of Jesus whether I am telling you the truth about temporal things or not . . . the man whom God calls to dictate affairs in the building of his Zion has the right to dictate about everything connected with the building up of Zion, yes even to the ribbons the women wear, and any person who denies it is ignorant” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, page 298).

At one time relations became so strained in Brigham Young’s own family that he publicly threatened to set all his wives free if they did not submit to his authority:

> Now for my proposition; it is more particularly for my sisters, as it is frequently happening that women say they are unhappy. Men will say, “My wife, though a most excellent woman, has not seen a happy day since I took my second wife;” “No, not a happy day for a year,” says one; and another has not seen a happy day in five years . . .

> I wish my own women to understand that what I am going to say is for them as well as others . . . I am going to give you from this time to the 6th day of October next . . . then I am going to set every woman at liberty and say to them, Now go your way, my women with the rest, go your way. And my wives have got to do one of two things; either round up their shoulders to endure the afflictions of this world, and live their religion, or they may leave, for I will not have them about me. I will go into heaven alone, rather than have scratching and fighting around me. I will set all at liberty. “What, first wife too?” Yes, I will liberate you all . . . I want to go somewhere and do something to get rid of the whiners . . .

> I wish my women, and brother Kimball’s and brother Grant’s to leave, and every woman in this Territory, or else say in their hearts that they will embrace the Gospel . . . Tell the Gentiles that I will free every woman in this Territory at our next Conference. “What, the first wife too?” Yes . . . And then let the father be the head of the family, the master of his own household . . . let the wives and the children say amen to what he says, and be subject to his dictates . . .

> Let every man . . . say to your wives . . . if you stay with me you shall comply with the law of God, and that too without any murmuring and whining. You must . . . round up your shoulders to walk up to the mark with out any grunting.

Now recollect that two weeks from tomorrow I am going to set you at liberty. But the first wife will say, “It is hard, for I have lived with my husband twenty years, or thirty and have raised a family of children for him, and it is a great trial to me for him to have more women;” then I say it is time that you gave him up to other women who will bear children. If my wife had borne me all the children that she ever would bare, the celestial law would teach me to take young women that would have children . . . Sisters, I am not joking. I do not throw out my proposition to banter your feelings . . . But I know that there is no cessation to the everlasting whining of many of the women in this Territory . . . if the women will turn from the commandments of God and continue to despise the order of heaven, I will pray that the curse of the Almighty may be close to their heels, and that it may be following them all the day long . . .

Prepare yourselves for two weeks from tomorrow; and I will tell you now, that if you will marry with your husbands, after I have set you free, you must bow down to it, and submit yourselves to the celestial law . . . remember, that I will not hear any more of this whining. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pages 55-57; also printed in the church’s newspaper, Deseret News, vol. 6, pages 235-236)

The reader will notice that Brigham Young spoke of the possibility that “brother Kimball’s” wives might leave him. Heber C. Kimball served as first counselor to President Brigham Young. Interestingly, Stanley B. Kimball, Heber C. Kimball’s great-great-grandson, stated that Heber, “had or was sealed to forty-three wives,” but he had to admit that “Sixteen wives separated from him during his lifetime for various reasons . . .” (Heber C. Kimball: Mormon Patriarch and Pioneer, page 307).

This, of course, is a real indictment against Joseph Smith’s doctrine regarding polygamy, a doctrine which was perpetuated by Brigham Young and his successors. It was secretly practiced until the early part of the twentieth century, which was many years after the so-called Manifesto.

Brigham Young claimed that after Joseph Smith’s death he “went to see Joseph” in a dream. Young said that he spoke with Joseph about the law of adoption (see “Manuscript History of Brigham Young,” February 23, 1847).

Hosea Stout heard Brigham Young tell of his experience and recorded the following in his diary:

> “I want you all to remember my dream for I [sic] it is a vision of God and was revealed through the spirit of Joseph.” (On the Mormon Frontier; The Diary of Hosea Stout, edited by Juanita Brooks, vol. 1, pages 237-238)

John D. Lee, who was a member of the secret Council of Fifty, noted in his journal that in a speech Brigham Young made it clear that obedience to the law of adoption was essential for those who would obtain salvation:

> I have gathered a number of families around me through the law of adoption and seal of the covenant according to the order of the priesthood and others have done likewise, it being the means of salvation to bring us back to God. (Journals of John D. Lee, 1846-47 and 1859, edited by Charles Kelley, pages 80-81)
A very shocking concept which was related to the law of adoption is found in Wilford Woodruff’s journal. Woodruff later became the fourth president of the church. Woodruff was at a meeting where Brigham Young and Apostle Orson Pratt addressed the people. Fortunately, he made a report of the proceedings. The following is recorded in his journal with the original spelling retained:

Many other interesting & important items were presented by President Young much to our edification. Meeting was dismissed & met again at 2 oclok & was addressed in a very edifying manner by O Pratt & treated upon the same principles spoken off by Br Young. Among his remarks He said that as all the ordinances of the gospel Administered by the world since the Aposticy of the Church was illegal, in like manner was the marriage Cerimony illegal and all the world who had been begotten through the illegal marriage were Bastards not sons & Hence they had to enter into the law of adoption & be adopted into the Priesthood in order to become sons & legal heirs of salvation. (Wilford Woodruff’s Journal, vol. 3, August 15, 1847, page 260)

By teaching that civil marriages were invalid the early Mormon Church leaders were opening up a door that would entice many of their people into adultery and polygamy. John D. Lee, who was the second man sealed to Brigham Young, gave more information on this subject:

About the same time the doctrine of “sealing” for an eternal state was introduced, and the Saints were given to understand that their marriage relations with each other were not valid. That those who had solemnized the rites of matrimony had no authority of God to do so. That the true priesthood was taken from the earth with the death of the Apostles and inspired men of God. That they were married to each other only by their own covenants, and that if their marriage relations had not been productive of blessings and peace, and they felt it oppressive to remain together, they were at liberty to make their own choice, as much as if they had not been married. That it was a sin for people to live together, and raise and beget children, in alienation from each other. (Confessions of John D. Lee, photomechanical reprint of the original 1877 edition, page 146)

On page 165 of the same book, Lee gave more information regarding this important issue:

In the Winter of 1845 meetings were held all over the city of Nauvoo, and the spirit of Elijah was taught in the different families as a foundation to the order of celestial marriage, as well as the law of adoption. Many families entered into covenants with each other—the man to stand by his wife and the woman to cleave unto her husband, and the children to be adopted to the parents. I was one of those who entered into covenants to stand by my family . . . to cleave to them through time and eternity. I am proud to say I have kept my obligations sacred and inviolate to this day. Others refused to enter into these obligations, but agreed to separate from each other, dividing their substance, and mutually dissolving their former relations on friendly terms. Some have mutually agreed to exchange wives and have been sealed to each other as husband and wife by virtue and authority of the holy priesthood. One of Brigham’s brothers, Lorenzo Young, now a bishop, made an exchange of wives with Mr. Decker . . . They both seemed happy in the exchange of wives. All are considered aliens to the commonwealth of Israel until adopted into the kingdom by baptism . . . This doctrine extends much further. All persons are required to be adopted to some of the leading men of the Church.

Although there were undoubtedly many Mormon men who truly felt they were doing God’s work when they were sealed to one or more of the brethren, the evidence clearly shows that the law of adoption was a very selfish doctrine. It was used by many as an opportunity to gain glory and power over others. According to Mormon doctrine, those who obtained many men would have greater kingdoms in the hereafter. They would not only have the men they were sealed to for all eternity, but they would also obtain the women and children of these men to rule over.

The following statements by the Mormon leaders are found in John D. Lee’s journal under the date of February 17, 1847:

. . . Dr. Richards (the Historian) addressed the collection. Said . . . One item that caught my attention was this thing of jealousy, fearing that some man is rising or gaining power and influence faster than what I am. Therefore jealousy will arise which causes an envious feelings in our bosom and we imagine that man is [electioneering] and using unlawful measures to gain an influence. . . . Elder G. A. Smith said he and Bro. Amasa Lyman have just returned from a mission . . . but he durst [not] say as Bro. Pratt and Woodruff has, that he had not lexierered, for I have with all my might . . . But there is one thing that I don’t like to see and that is this thing called jealousy stirring up family disturbances and broils because we are afraid that some man is gaining favor and I am not advancing as fast as they are. And in order to keep back or stop their influence we go to those that have been sealed and discourage them saying why diden’t [you] come with me where none but the respected are? Was you not as capable of holding the keys of presidency yourself as Bro. Lee . . . suppose I was to jump every man and be sealed to the great God and have 3 only sealed to me. I don’t think my kingdom would be very large or my glory very great. . . . I could get no more. I should be dependent on the exertion of those who were sealed to me. But was I sealed to the most obscure individual in this church and I had 10s of 10,000 sealed to me, would not my glory be greater than it would be was I sealed to headquarters with my 3 only? Certainly it would. . . . let jealousy stop and be united that we may speedily build up the kingdom of God on the earth, &c. (Journals of John D. Lee, February 17, 1847, pages 91-94)

Mormon historian Gordon Irving observed that the sealing of men to men did not work out very well:

Mormon leaders must have hoped that family life in adoption would bring their people together and enhance the Church’s efforts to make a new life for the Mormon community in the West. . . . it could clearly be seen by the spring of 1848 that it had failed to produce the anticipated benefits.

Adoption might be good doctrine, but it had failed to work as a principle of social organization. With confusion at home and abroad, Church leaders saw fit to discontinue the effort to make the ties of adoption the basis of organization for the Mormon community. . . . Once Mormon leaders abandoned adoption as experiment, their publicly expressed interest both in the doctrine and the practice appears to have fallen off sharply for some time. Even so there are indications that adoption was not altogether forgotten by the general membership of the Church. Between 1849 and 1854 the ‘waiting list’ of those desiring to join Brigham Young’s family increased by 175 names. . . .

As time went on, Mormon leaders began again to preach adoption from the pulpit. Adoption into the family of God that one might be a legal heir to exaltation was still very much a part of Mormon doctrine. As unpleasant memories of the experiences of the 1840s faded, Brigham Young and others increasingly stressed the importance of adoption in Mormon theology. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1974, pages 303-305)

DEATH OF THE DOCTRINE

Although the sealing of men to men who were not of their own lineage seemed to revive for a season, it eventually suffered a death blow. Charles Kelly, who edited the Journals of John D. Lee, wrote: “Like many other Mormon doctrines, it was but a passing fad, and is now ignored and forgotten” (see page 88, note 87). In 1894, Wilford Woodruff, the fourth president of the Mormon Church, publicly repudiated the doctrine of adoption and claimed that a man should be sealed to his own father. Woodruff stated that in the past some of his male friends had been sealed to him. He acknowledged, however, that he felt uneasy about the matter:

I have not felt satisfied, neither did President Taylor, neither has any man since the Prophet Joseph who has attended to the ordinance of adoption in the temples of our God. We have felt that there was more to be revealed. . . . Revelations were given to us in the St. George Temple, which President Young presented to the Church of God. Changes were made there, and we still have more changes to make . . . . We have felt, as President Taylor said, that we have got to have more revelation concerning sealing under the law of adoption. Well, what are these changes? One of them is the principle of adoption. In the commencement of adopting men and women in the temple at Nauvoo, a great many persons were adopted to different men who were not of the lineage of their fathers, and there was a spirit manifested by some in that work that was not of God. Men would go out and electioneer and labor with all their power to get men adopted to them. One instance I will name here: A man went around Nauvoo asking every man he could, “You come and be adopted to me, and I shall stand at the head of the kingdom, and you will be there with me.” . . .

Men are in danger sometimes in being adopted to others, until they know who they are and what they will be. . . . President Young was not satisfied in his mind with regard to the extent of this matter; President Taylor was not. When I went before the Lord to know who I should be adopted to . . . the Spirit of God said to me, “have you not a father, who begot you?” “Yes, I have.” “Then why not honor him?” “Yes,” says I, “that is right.” I was adopted to my father . . . I want every man who presides over a temple to see performed from this day henceforth and forever, unless the Lord Almighty commands otherwise, is, let every man be adopted to his father. When a man receives the endowments, adopt him to his father; not to Wilford Woodruff, nor to any other man outside the lineage of his people. . . . I have had friends adopted to me. We all have, more or less. But I have had peculiar feelings about it, especially lately. There are men in this congregation who wish to be adopted to me. I say to them to-day, if they can hear me, Go and be adopted to your fathers, and save your fathers . . . A man may say, “I am an Apostle . . . and if I am adopted to my father, will it take any honor from me?” I would say not. . . . You will lose nothing by honoring your fathers and redeeming your dead. (Millennial Star, vol. 56, pages 337-341)

On April 8, 1894, George Q. Cannon, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, also repudiated the law of adoption:

. . . in the minds of many there has been a feeling of doubt in regard to the principle of adoption as has been practiced among us. . . . I well remember . . . the spirit that was manifested by many at the dedication of the temple at Nauvoo when the ordinances were administered there. Some men thought to build up kingdoms to themselves; they appeared to think that by inducing men and women to be adopted into their families they were adding to their own glory. From that day until the present, I have never thought of this subject of adoption without having a certain amount of fear concerning it. . . . There is no true principle of the Gospel that will produce division. . . . And this revelation that God has given to His servant, the President of our Church, removes all the danger which seemed to threaten us through an imperfect understanding of the manner in which the law of adoption should be carried out. . . .

Why should a man come to one of the Apostles and be sealed to him and then trace his genealogy through him and his ancestors, and neglect his own? (Millennial Star, vol. 56, pages 354-358)

It is apparent, then, that the law of adoption, which Brigham Young called “a great and glorious doctrine” and “the means of salvation left to bring us back to God,” was repudiated by later Mormon leaders. As noted above, President Wilford Woodruff publicly revealed that he had “peculiar feelings about it, especially lately.” George Q. Cannon proclaimed he had “a certain amount of fear concerning it.” He also used the phrases, “endless confusion” and “great confusion” when speaking of what could happen under this strange doctrine.

A comparison of Brigham Young’s teaching with that of Wilford Woodruff plainly shows that the early Mormon leaders women were sealed to men were not led by revelation. The Mormon prophet Brigham Young said:

... I will answer a question that has been repeatedly asked me... should I have a father dead that has never heard this gospel, would it be required of me to redeem him and then have him adopted into some man’s family and I be adopted to my father? (I ans. no.)... were we to wait to redeem our dead relatives before we could link the chains of the P.H. [i.e., the priesthood] we would never accomplish it. (Journals of John D. Lee, page 89)

Wilford Woodruff, the fourth president of the church, contradicted Brigham Young:

... let every man be adopted to his father. When a man receives the endowments, adopt him to his father; not to Wilford Woodruff, not to any other man outside the lineage of his fathers. That is the will of God to this people... I say let every man be adopted to his father... (Milennial Star, vol. 56, pages 337-341)

President Brigham Young claimed to have a revelation concerning the doctrine of sealing men to men. Wilford Woodruff, on the other hand, had a revelation to do away with the practice. Under the date of April 6, 1894, President Woodruff wrote that God had given him, “a Revelation which was received by my Councillors...” (Wilford Woodruff’s Journal, vol. 9, page 296).

The opening of that conference led to the demise of Brigham Young’s teachings concerning the sealing of men to men who were not of the same lineage. D. Michael Quinn wrote: “... Wilford Woodruff announces revelation which ends the practice of adopting men to LDS leaders... His published sermon is only available text of the revelation” (The Mormon Hierarchy: Extensions of Power, vol. 2, page 795).

The reader will remember that John Read wrote an interesting letter regarding President Brigham Young’s vision of some future time “when men would be sealed to men in the priesthood in a more solemn ordinance than that by which women were sealed to men, and in a room over that in which women were sealed to man in the temple of the Lord.”

Young’s dream for the church was shattered when President Woodruff received his revelation abolishing the sealing of men to men.

Gordon Irving made this observation regarding the doctrinal change:

President Woodruff was declaring publicly that not only should the Saints be sealed to their own parents but that henceforth they had to be sealed to them if they were to be sealed at all... The immediate response of the general Church membership appears to have been strongly favorable. The only real problem was what to do about the more than 13,000 souls, most of them dead, who had already been adopted to persons other than their natural parents. After some consideration the First Presidency and the Twelve ruled that these people should be sealed to their own parents but that the old records should be left standing. Any possible problems would be straitened out in the hereafter. (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1974, pages 312-313)

As we will show below, the practice of sealing men to men and of acquiring many families to rule over is not compatible with the teachings of Jesus. Unfortunately, the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith taught his people that men could become Gods and have their own worlds which they would rule over. In the Mormon publication, Times and Seasons, vol. 5, pages 613-614, Smith’s teachings are set forth:

First, God himself, who sits enthroned in yonder heavens, is a man like unto one of yourselves, that is the great secret... I am going to tell you how God came to be God. We have imagined that God was God from all eternity... God himself; the Father of us all dwelt on an earth the same as Jesus Christ himself did... You have got to learn how to be Gods yourselves... No man can learn you more than what I have told you.

Smith’s teachings regarding the plurality of Gods greatly excited many of the Mormon men. They could picture themselves as Gods having their own world which they could rule over. Moreover, Smith also declared that faithful Mormons could have many wives (see the church’s Doctrine and Covenants, Section 132, verses 1-4, 19-20, 34-35, 37-38, 39, 52, 60-62). In addition to all this, while the Mormons were still in Nauvoo they were informed of the sealing of men to men. It did not take long for a man to realize that through adoption he could obtain a large number of men, women and children who would become part of his kingdom and add to his eternal glory.

The doctrines which we have mentioned above obviously led to selfishness and pride. They are, in fact, diametrically opposed to the teachings of the Bible. For example, in Matthew 20:24-28 we read:

But Jesus called them unto him, and said, Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you: but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; And whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant: Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.

In Matthew 23:10-12 we find this important admonition:

Neither be ye called masters: for one is your Master, even Christ. But he that is greatest among you shall be your servant. And whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased; and he that shall humble himself shall be exalted.

It is clear from the Bible that Jesus taught humility rather than trying to build a kingdom for oneself. In Matthew 18:3-4 Jesus stated:
Salt Lake City Messenger

MORMON BLOOD ATONEMENT Fact or Fantasy?

It is a well-known fact that the early Mormons suffered a good deal of persecution at the hands of the Gentiles—i.e., non-Mormons. The prophet Joseph Smith and his brother were murdered by a cowardly mob that took the law into their own hands. A number of Mormons lost their lives during these early years. Unfortunately, however, many Mormon historians have overlooked the other side of the story.

During the early years of Mormonism it was frequently alleged that the leaders of the church sanctioned the practice of putting both Gentiles and Mormon apostates to death. In 1969-70, we made a detailed study of the charges and published our conclusions in a book entitled, The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 2. The evidence that we marshalled convinced us that many of the claims were genuine. Since doing this research we found even more evidence to verify that there was a conspiracy to destroy dissenters and other people that the Mormon leaders hated.

While many Mormon scholars would like to scoff at those who have seriously studied this matter, there is incontrovertible proof that Brigham Young, the second prophet of the Mormon Church, publicly preached a doctrine called “blood atonement.” Although one might think that the name of this doctrine came from the atonement of Jesus on the cross, the truth of the matter is that it relates to people being put to death. Brigham Young explained this in a sermon given on September 21, 1856:

> There are sins that men commit for which they cannot receive forgiveness in this world, or in that which is to come, and if they had their eyes open to see their true condition, they would be perfectly willing to have their blood spilt upon the ground, that the smoke thereof might ascend to heaven as an offering for their sins; and the smoking incense would atone for their sins, whereas, if such is not the case, they will stick to them and remain upon them in the spirit world.

Now take a person in this congregation who has knowledge with regard to being saved . . . and suppose that he is overtaken in a gross fault, that he has committed a sin that he knows will deprive him of that exaltation which he desires, and that he cannot attain to it without the shedding his blood, and also knows that by having his blood shed he will atone for that sin, and be saved and exalted with the Gods, is there a man or woman in this house but what would say, “shed my blood that I may be saved and exalted with the Gods?”

All mankind love themselves, and let these principles be known by an individual, and he would be glad to have his blood shed. That would be loving themselves, even unto an eternal exaltation. Will you love your brothers and sisters likewise, when they have committed a sin that cannot be atoned for without the shedding of their blood? Will you love that man or woman well enough to shed their blood? That is what Jesus Christ meant . . .

I could refer you to plenty of instances where men have been righteously slain, in order to atone for their sins. I have seen scores and hundreds of people for whom there would have been a chance . . . if their lives had been taken and their blood spilled on the ground as a smoking incense to the Almighty, but who are now angels to the Devil . . . I have known a great many men who have left this Church for whom there is no chance whatever for exaltation, but if their blood had been spilled, it would have been better for them . . .

This is loving our neighbor as ourselves; if he needs help, help him; and if he wants salvation and it is necessary to spill his blood on the earth in order that he may be saved, spill it . . . if you have sinned a sin requiring the shedding of blood, except the sin unto death, would not be satisfied nor rest until your blood should be spilled, that you might gain that salvation you desire. That is the way to love mankind. (Sermon by President Brigham Young, delivered in the Mormon Tabernacle, February 8, 1857; printed in the Deseret News, February 18, 1857; also reprinted in the Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, pages 219-220)

These are only two of many “blood atonement” sermons preached by Mormon leaders. Sandra Tanner, one of the authors of this newsletter who is also the great-great-granddaughter of Brigham Young, was greatly shocked when she read Young’s sermons. This, in fact, was an important factor in her decision to leave the Mormon Church.

In 1958, Gustive O. Larson, Professor of Church History at the church’s Brigham Young University, acknowledged that blood atonement was actually practiced. He related the following:
To whatever extent the preaching on blood atonement may have influenced action, it would have been in relation to Mormon disciplinary action among its own members. In point would be a verbally reported case of a Mr. Johnson in Cedar City who was found guilty of adultery with his stepdaughter by a bishop’s court and sentenced to death for atonement of his sin. According to the report of reputable eyewitnesses, judgment was executed with consent of the offender who went to his unconfsecrated grave in full confidence of salvation through the shedding of his blood. Such a case, however primitive, is understandable within the meaning of the doctrine and the emotional extremes of the [Mormon] Reformation. (Utah Historical Quarterly, January, 1958, page 62, note 39)

This may be the same case spoken of by John D. Lee, who was sealed to Brigham Young and was a member of Young’s secret Council of Fifty:

The most deadly sin among the people was adultery, and many men were killed in Utah for the crime.

Rasmus Anderson was a Danish man who came to Utah . . . He had married a widow lady somewhat older than himself . . . At one of the meetings during the reformation Anderson and his step-daughter confessed that they had committed adultery . . . they were rebaptized and received into full membership. They were then placed under covenant that if they again committed adultery, Anderson should suffer death. Soon after this a charge was laid against Anderson before the Council, accusing him of adultery with his step-daughter. This Council was composed of Klingensmith and his two counselors; it was the Bishop’s Council. Without giving Anderson any chance to defend himself or make a statement, the Council voted that Anderson must die for violating his covenants. Klingensmith went to Anderson and notified him that the orders were that he must die by having his throat cut, so that the running of his blood would atone for his sins. Anderson, being a firm believer in the doctrines and teachings of the Mormon Church, made no objections . . . His wife was ordered to prepare a suit of clean clothing, in which to have her husband buried . . . she being directed to tell those who should inquire after her husband that he had gone to California.

Klingensmith, James Haslem, Daniel McFarland and John M. Higbee dug a grave in the field near Cedar City, and that night, about 12 o’clock, went to Anderson’s house and ordered him to make ready to obey Council. Anderson got up . . . and without a word of remonstrance accompanied those that he believed were carrying out the will of the “Almighty God.” They went to the place where the grave was prepared; Anderson knelt upon the side of the grave and prayed. Klingensmith and his company then cut Anderson’s throat from ear to ear and held him so that his blood ran into the grave.

As soon as he was dead they dressed him in his clean clothes, threw him into the grave and buried him. They then carried his bloody clothing back to his family, and gave them to his wife to wash . . . She obeyed their orders . . . Anderson was killed just before the Mountain Meadows massacre. The killing of Anderson was then considered a religious duty and a just act. It was justified by all the people, for they were bound by the same covenants, and the least word of objection to thus treating the man who had broken his covenant would have brought the same fate upon the person who was so foolish as to raise his voice against any act committed by order of the Church authorities. (Confessions of John D. Lee, Photo-reprint of 1877 edition, pages 282-283)

In the same book John D. Lee made this startling statement: “I knew of many men being killed in Nauvoo . . . and I know of many a man who was quietly put out of the way by the orders of Joseph and his Apostles while the Church was there” (Ibid., page 284). Lee also revealed another very cruel practice which took place both in Nauvoo, Illinois, and in early Utah:

In Utah it has been the custom with the Priesthood to make eunuchs of such men as were obnoxious to the leaders. This was done for a double purpose: first, it gave a perfect revenge, and next, it left the poor victim a living example to others of the dangers of disobeying counsel and not living as ordered by the Priesthood.

In Nauvoo it was the orders from Joseph Smith and his apostles to beat, wound and castrate all Gentiles that the police could take in the act of entering or leaving a Mormon household under circumstances that led to the belief that they had been there for immoral purposes. . . . In Utah it was the favorite revenge of old, worn-out members of the Priesthood, who wanted young women sealed to them, and found that the girl preferred some handsome young man. The old priests generally got the girls, and many a young man was unsexed for refusing to give up his sweetheart at the request of an old and failing, but still sensual apostle or member of the Priesthood. As an illustration . . . Warren Snow was Bishop of the Church at Manti, San Pete County, Utah. He had several wives, but there was a fair, buxom young woman in the town that Snow wanted for a wife. . . . She thanked him for the honor offered, but told him she was then engaged to a young man, a member of the Church, and consequently could not marry the old priest. . . . He told her it was the will of God that she should marry him, and she must do so; that the young man could be got rid of, sent on a mission or dealt with in some way . . . that, in fact, a promise made to the young man was not binding, when she was informed that it was contrary to the wishes of the authorities.

The girl continued obstinate. . . . the authorities called on the young man and directed him to give up the young woman. This he steadfastly refused to do . . . He remained true to his intended, and said he would die before he would surrender his intended wife to the embraces of another. . . . The young man was ordered to go on a mission to some distant locality . . . But the mission was refused . . .

It was then determined that the rebellious young man must be forced by harsh treatment to respect the advice and orders of the Priesthood. His fate was left to Bishop Snow for his decision. He decided that the young man should be castrated; Snow saying, “When that is done, he will not be liable to want the girl badly, and she will listen to reason when she knows that her lover is no longer a man.”
It was then decided to call a meeting of the people who lived true to counsel, which was held in the schoolhouse in Manti . . . The young man was there, and was again requested, ordered and threatened, to get him to surrender the young woman to Snow, but true to his pledged troth, he refused to consent to give up the girl. The lights were then put out. An attack was made on the young man. He was severely beaten, and then tied with his back down on a bench, when Bishop Snow took a bowie-knife, and performed the operation in a most brutal manner, and then took the portion severed from his victim and hung it up in the school-house on a nail, so that it could be seen by all who visited the house afterwards.

The party then left the young man weltering in his blood, and in a lifeless condition. During the night he succeeded in releasing himself from his confinement, and dragged himself to some hay-stacks, where he lay until the next day, when he was discovered by his friends. The young man regained his health, but has been an idiot or quite lunatic ever since. . . .

After this outrage old Bishop Snow took occasion to get up a meeting . . . When all had assembled, the old man talked to the people about their duty to the Church, and their duty to obey counsel, and the dangers of refusal, and then publicly called attention to the mangled parts of the young man, that had been severed from his person, and stated that the deed had been done to teach the people that the counsel of the Priesthood must be obeyed. To make a long story short, I will say, the young woman was soon after forced into being sealed to Bishop Snow.

Brigham Young . . . did nothing against Snow. He left him in charge as Bishop at Manti, and ordered the matter to be hushed up. (Ibid., pages 284-286)

Mormons today would be appalled if such a dastardly deed was committed and would demand that the persons responsible be severely punished. Brigham Young, however, approved of many violent acts perpetrated by those he put in authority. Interestingly, D. Michael Quinn found documented evidence showing that President Young supported Bishop Warren S. Snow’s cruel mistreatment of the young man:

In the midsummer of 1857 Brigham Young also expressed approval for an LDS bishop who had castrated a man. In May 1857 Bishop Warren S. Snow’s counselor wrote that twenty-four-year-old Thomas Lewis “has now gone crazy” after being castrated by Bishop Snow for an undisclosed sex crime. When informed of Snow’s action, Young said: “I feel to sustain him . . .” In July Brigham Young wrote a reassuring letter to the bishop about this castration: “Just let the matter drop, and say no more about it,” the LDS president advised, “and it will soon die away among the people.” (The Mormon Hierarchy: Extensions of Power, vol. 2, pages 250-251)

On November 30, 1871, T. B. H. Stenhouse received a letter by an individual who was present at a meeting in Provo, Utah. The letter indicated that Bishop Blackburn was also strongly pushing for the emasculation of men who were disobedient to their leaders:

> “Dear Stenhouse: I have read carefully the accompanying statement about the ‘Reformation.’ . . . If you want to travel wider and show the effect in the country of the inflammatory speeches delivered in Salt Lake City at that time, you can mention the Potter and Parrish murders at Springville, the barbarous castration of a young man in San Pete, and, to cap the climax, the Mountain-Meadows massacre . . . Threats of personal violence or death were common in the settlements against all who dared to speak against the priesthood, or in any way protest against this ‘reign of terror.’

> “I was at a Sunday meeting in the spring of 1857, in Provo, when the news of the San Pete castration was referred to by the presiding bishop—Blackburn. Some men in Provo had rebelled against authority in some trivial matter, and Blackburn shouted in his Sunday meeting—a mixed congregation of all ages and both sexes—‘I want the people of Provo to understand that the boys in Provo can use the knife as well as the boys in San Pete. Boys, get your knives ready, there is work for you! We must not be behind San Pete in good works.’ The result of this was that two citizens, named Hooper and Beavere, both having families at Provo, left the following night . . . Their only offence was rebellion against the priesthood.

> “This man, Blackburn, was continued in office at least a year after this . . .

> “The qualifications for a bishop were a blind submission and obedience to Brigham and the authorities, and a firm, unrelented government of his subjects.” (Rocky Mountain Saints, by T. B. H. Stenhouse, 1873, pages 301-302)

This is a very important letter because it throws additional light upon President Brigham Young’s knowledge regarding emasculation in early Utah. According to Wilford Woodruff’s journal, not long after Warren S. Snow’s cowardly attack on Thomas Lewis, President Young discussed the matter of castration being used to save people:

I then went into the president office & spent the evening. Bishop Blackburn was present. The subject came up of some persons leaving Provo who had apostatized. Some thought that Bishop Blackburn & President Snow was to blame. Brother Joseph Young presented the thing to President Young. But when the circumstances were told President Brigham Young sustained the Brethren who presided at Provo. . . .

> The subjects of Eunuchs came up . . . Brigham Said the day would come when thousands would be made Eunuchs in order for them to be saved in the kingdom of God. (Wilford Woodruff’s Diary, June 2, 1857, vol. 5, pages 54-55)

> In 1861, Apostle Orson Hyde met with Wilford Woodruff and indicated that he believed Warren Snow was guilty of stealing. Wilford Woodruff wrote the following in his journal:

> He spoke of his mission in Sanpete and the unwise course of Bishop Warren Snow, & George Pecock his first councillor. They have squandered a large amount of tithing funds, County taxes &c & Brother Hyde thinks from Testimony guilty of stealing many cattle. (Ibid., vol. 5, page 554)
It is astounding to think that the prophet of the Mormon Church would allow such a man as Warren Snow to function as a bishop in the church. Unfortunately, however, President Young went so far as to give him a special blessing. Wilford Woodruff recorded the following in his journal under the date of April 1, 1861: “Warren Stone Snow was Blessed By President Young who gave him a very good Blessing” (Ibid., page 571). Moreover, in 1867, he was given the opportunity to preach in the Mormon Tabernacle (see vol. 6, page 319).

In a public discourse President Young acknowledged that the church had use for some very mean devils who resided in early Utah:

And if the Gentiles wish to see a few tricks, we have “Mormons” that can perform them. We have the meanest devils on the earth in our midst, and we intend to keep them, for we have use for them; and if the Devil does not look sharp, we will cheat him out of them at the last, for they will reform and go to heaven with us. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, page 176)

Orrin Porter Rockwell was certainly one of Brigham Young’s “meanest devils.” Rockwell, who had served as a bodyguard for Joseph Smith, did not hesitate to shed blood. The reader will find a photograph of Rockwell on the first page of this newsletter. Bill Hickman was another ruthless man who killed many people. In his book Brigham’s Destroying Angel, Hickman confessed that he had committed murders for the church.

In 1858, an extremely grotesque double murder was committed. Henry Jones and his mother were both put to death. These murders were obviously the direct result of Brigham Young’s doctrine of “blood atonement.”

Two months before Henry Jones was actually murdered, he was viciously attacked. Hosea Stout, a very dedicated Mormon defender, wrote the following regarding the first attack on Jones:

Saturday 27 Feb 1858. This evening several persons disguised as Indians entered Henry Jones’ house and dragged him out of bed with a whore and castrated him by a square & close amputation. (On the Mormon Frontier; The Diary of Hosea Stout, vol. 2, page 653)

One would think that this would have ended the vendetta against Jones. Unfortunately, this was not the case. On April 19, 1859, the newspaper Valley Tan printed an affidavit by Nathaniel Case which contained a statement implicating a bishop and other Mormons who lived in Payson:

Nathaniel Case being sworn, says: that he has resided in the Territory of Utah since the year 1850; lived with Bishop Hancock (Charles Hancock) in the town of Payson, at the time Henry Jones and his mother were murdered . . . . The night prior to the murder a secret council meeting was held in the upper room of Bishop Hancock’s house; saw Charles Hancock, George W. Hancock, Daniel Rawson, James Bracken, George Patten and Price Nelson go into that meeting that night. . . . About 8 o’clock in the evening of the murder the company gathered at Bishop Hancock’s . . . . They said they were going to guard a corral where Henry Jones was going to come that night and steal horses; they had guns.

I had a good mini rifle and Bishop Hancock wanted to borrow it; I refused to lend it to him. The above persons all went away together . . . . Next morning I heard that Henry Jones and his mother had been killed. I went [sic] down to the dig-out where they lived . . . . The old woman was laying on the ground in the dug-out on a little straw, in the clothes in which she was killed. She had a bullet hole through her head . . . . In about 15 or 20 minutes Henry Jones was brought there and laid by her side; they then threw some old bed clothes over them and an old feather bed and then pulled the dig-out on top of them. . . . The next Sunday after the murder, in a church meeting in Payson, Charles Hancock, the bishop, said, as to the killing of Jones and his mother he cared nothing about it, and it would have been done in daylight if circumstances would have permitted it.—This was said from the stand; there were 150 or 200 persons present. He gave no reason for killing them. And further saith not. Nathaniel Case.

Sworn to and signed before me this 9th day of April, 1859.

John Cradlebaugh,
Judge 2nd Judicial District.

Those who murdered Henry Jones and his mother may have remembered President Brigham Young’s sermon which was delivered just two years prior to these murders: “Suppose you found your brother in bed with your wife, and put a javelin through both of them, you would be justified, and they would atone for their sins, and be received into the kingdom of God. I would at once do so in such a case; under such circumstances, I have no wife whom I love so well that I would not put a javelin through her heart, and I would do it with clean hands” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 3, page 247).

In his book, The Mormon Hierarchy: Extensions of Power, vol. 2, pages 241-261, Dr. Quinn presented compelling evidence showing that “blood atonement” was endorsed by church leaders and actually practiced by the Mormon people. Quinn gave the names of a number of violent men who served as “enforcers” for Brigham Young. In addition Quinn wrote:

During this period Brigham Young and other Mormon leaders also repeatedly preached about specific sins for which it was necessary to shed the blood of men and women. Blood-atonement sins included adultery, apostasy, “covenant breaking,” counterfeiting, “many men who left this Church,” murder, not being “heartily on the Lord’s side,” profaning “the name of the Lord,” sexual intercourse between a “white” person and an African-American, stealing, and telling lies. . . . Some LDS historians have claimed that blood-atonement sermons were simply Brigham Young’s use of ‘rhetorical devices designed to frighten wayward individuals into conformity with Latter-day Saint principles’ and to bluff anti-Mormons. Writers often describe these sermons as limited to the religious enthusiasm and frenzy of the Utah Reformation up to 1857. The first problem with such explanations is that official LDS sources show that as early as 1843 Joseph Smith and his counselor Sidney Rigdon advocated decapitation or throat-cutting as punishment for various crimes and sins.
Moreover, a decade before Utah’s reformation, Brigham Young’s private instructions show that he fully expected his trusted associates to kill various persons for violating religious obligations. The LDS church’s official history still quotes Young’s words to “the brethren” in February 1846: “I should be perfectly willing to see thieves have their throats cut.” The following December he instructed bishops, “when a man is found to be a thief, he will be a thief no longer, cut his throat, & thro’ him in the River,” and Young did not instruct them to ask his permission. A week later the church president explained to a Winter Quarters meeting that cutting off the heads of repeated sinners “is the law of God & it shall be executed . . .” A rephrase of Young’s words later appeared in Hosea Stout’s reference to a specific sinner, “to cut him off—behind the ears—according to the law of God in such cases.” . . .

When informed that a black Mormon in Massachusetts had married a white woman, Brigham Young told the apostles in December 1847 that he would have both of them killed “if they were far away from the Gentiles.” (The Mormon Hierarchy: Extensions of Power, vol. 2, pages 246-247)

While we do not have room for extensively quotations from Quinn’s book, the following are some extracts:

In September 1857 Apostle George A. Smith told a Salt Lake City congregation that Mormons at Parowan in southern Utah “wish that their enemies might come and give them a chance to fight and take vengeance for the cruelties that had been inflicted upon us in the States.” Smith had just returned from southern Utah where he had encouraged such feelings by preaching fiery sermons about resisting the U.S. army and taking vengeance on anti-Mormons. Just days before his talk in Salt Lake City, members of Parowan’s Mormon militia participated in killing 120 men, women, and children in the Mountain Meadows Massacre . . .

Although most accounts claimed that the militia killed only the adult males and let their Indian allies kill the women and children, perpetrator Nephi Johnson later told an LDS apostle that “white men did most of the killing.” Perpetrator George W. Adair also told another apostle that “John Higbee gave the order to kill the women and children,” and Adair “saw the women’s and children’s throats cut.” . . .

As late as 1868 the Deseret News encouraged rank-and-file Mormons to kill anyone who engaged in sexual relations outside marriage . . .

Under such circumstances the Mormon hierarchy bore full responsibility for the violent acts of zealous Mormon[s] who accepted their instructions literally and carried out various forms of blood atonement. “Obviously there were those who could not easily make a distinction between rhetoric and reality,” a BYU religion professor has written. . . . It is unrealistic to assume that faithful Mormons all declined to act on such repeated instructions in pioneer Utah . . . . Neither is it reasonable to assume that the known cases of blood atonement even approximated the total number that occurred in the first twenty years after Mormon settlement in Utah . . . . LDS leaders publicly and privately encouraged Mormons to consider it their religious right to kill antagonistic outsiders, common criminals, LDS apostates, and even faithful Mormons who committed sins “worthy of death.” (The Mormon Hierarchy: Extensions of Power, vol. 2, pages 251-53, 56-57, 60)

On pages 804-805, of the same book, Quinn reported concerning a murder committed in 1902:

5 Apr., “Clyde Felt has confessed to cutting the throat of old man Collins, at his request. The old man was a moral degenerate. The boy is a son of David P. Felt.” Grandson of former general authority, Clyde Felt is fourteen. Despite this blood atonement murder, LDS leaders allow [the] young man to be endowed and married in temple eight years later.

Although we cannot be certain, this may be the last known case of “blood atonement” committed by Mormons. It should be noted, however, that at least two groups (the LeBarons and the Laffertys) broke off from the Mormon Church and still hold to Brigham Young’s teaching of “blood atonement.” Consequently, they committed a significant number of “blood atonement” murders between 1972 and 1988.

While Dr. Quinn’s book, The Mormon Hierarchy: Extensions of Power, vol. 2, presents plenty of evidence to establish the fact that “blood atonement” murders were committed by the early Mormons, Quinn did not have the space to deal at great length with this important issue. To compliment Quinn’s excellent work we highly recommend our book, The Mormon Kingdom, vol. 2. In this book we have actual photographs from the church’s Deseret News confirming that church leaders strongly supported the doctrine of “blood atonement.” While the regular price for this book is $4.95, a free copy will be sent with every order of $25.00 or more (see first page of this newsletter).

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS

“You have given me so much help in leaving Mormonism behind in my life & the lives of my two children. Thank you so much for your work.” (Letter from Louisiana)

“It’s been about fifteen years since we found your book, [Mormonism:] Shadow or Reality, and began the journey to come to grips with what Mormonism actually is. But even more importantly we came also to grips, by the grace of God, with the truth of His Word in scripture and in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ . . . . Keep up the good work Sandra, and thank Jerald for us and for countless others like ourselves who see you both as keys in the hand of God to the opening of a doorway of truth and understanding that otherwise might never have been as available as your efforts have made it.” (Letter from Arizona)

“The work you and your husband have done on Shadow [Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?] is amazing. My . . . Mormon husband has read parts and is busy figuring out ways to share information with Mormons in our vicinity. I owe you and Jerald a debt of gratitude. I never thought my husband would see the obvious things that I saw. However, the meticulous researching and presentation of this book leaves no option but to study the contents. Your cross referencing and use of source documents, together with photocopies of original material has made this invaluable. My husband is going to share the section on polygamy with his Mother. Thank-you once again—your book is truly a Marvelous Work and a Wonder.” (Letter from Australia)

A RESPONSE TO FOSTER

In our last newsletter we included a statement by Dr. Lawrence Foster criticizing our work. Foster claimed that we were deliberately trying to avoid an interview with him. Nothing could be further from the truth. We were actually looking forward to meeting with him. Unfortunately, in his response to us in the last newsletter, Foster continued to state that we were afraid to meet with him. He went so far as to claim that H. Michael Marquardt told him that “you were uneasy about meeting with me and had not yet decided whether or not you would agree to an interview.”

When we asked Mr. Marquardt about this matter, he replied that this assertion was not true and authorized us to print the following: “I never told Foster that the Tanners were uneasy about meeting with him.”

In the May 1996 issue of the Messenger we spoke of Foster’s hypothesis that Joseph Smith may have been mentally ill. While we certainly have no strong objections to Foster’s idea, we know that it is very offensive to Mormons. Unfortunately, it now appears that Foster wants to sugarcoat his statements about Joseph Smith’s mental state. In his rebuttal to us he states: “Similarly my analysis of the complex sources of Joseph Smith’s genius (Dialogue, Winter 1993) never refers to him as ‘mentally ill’ but instead stresses the complex psychological dynamics that may have contributed to his exceptional creativity.” This statement gives the impression that we misrepresented Foster’s position. While it may be true that Foster did not use the specific words “mentally ill” in his article, he very strongly implied that Joseph Smith had a serious mental problem. Foster’s hypothesis is that Smith suffered from manic-depression, which is certainly a form of mental illness. In his article in Dialogue Foster wrote:

In no area were Joseph Smith’s manic qualities more evident than in his efforts to introduce and practice polygamy during the last three years of his life. The point at which Joseph Smith began systematically to introduce polygamy to his closest associates has strong suggestions of mania. . . . his subsequent surge of activity [sic] with the sixteen or more women with whom he appears to have sustained sexual relations as plural wives . . . is even more suggestive of the hypersexuality that often accompanies manic periods. (Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, Winter, 1993, pages 4, 7,9-13)

Foster’s statement that, “In no area were Joseph Smith’s manic qualities more evident than in his efforts to introduce and practice polygamy” does not fit well with his watered-down statement in his rebuttal to us.

SEXUAL ABUSE UPDATE

In the November 1996 issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger we reported that Cherese Franklin was awarded $750,000 in damages in a sexual abuse case involving repressed memories. On appeal this case was overturned by a judge in Salt Lake City.

In our last newsletter we discussed the problem of child sexual abuse committed by bishops and other important leaders in the Mormon Church. Recently we received another letter from a woman reporting that she was abused by her father: “Some of your research is being sent to a related attorney regarding the Beckly W. VA. [case] Sad! My bishop father sexually abused me. I know about the damage.”

Significantly, two other cases of sexual abuse involving prominent Mormons have recently come to light.

1 — Lloyd Gerald Pond, 51, was originally charged with two counts of forcible sodomy on a 14-year-old girl he met at a Mormon ward. Pond was employed by the Mormon Church’s public-relations department and “hosted a weekly nationwide radio program that promoted Mormon values . . .” (Salt Lake Tribune, Feb. 4, 1997). Many people were publicly complaining that Pond would only get a slap on the wrist because he was a well-known Mormon. Fortunately, this turned out not to be the case. The Tribune reported: “Ignoring recommendations for probation, a 3rd District judge sent confessed child sex abuser Lloyd Gerald Pond to prison for up to 15 years.” Ironically, Pond’s radio work for the church included warnings “about the evils of child abuse and pornography . . .” (Ibid., Nov. 16, 1996).

2 — The Idaho Falls Post Register reported the following on November 13, 1996:

A former state senator [Rex Furness] will be spending the next two months in jail for sexually battering his teenage granddaughter. . . . Furness will serve 60 days in the county jail, starting next week, and seven years probation. . . .

He was also very active in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, holding various titles, including bishop until he confessed the acts to his church and surrendered his temple recommend.

What he did not say in court was that the charge against him forced him to resign from the state senate.

Utah Lighthouse Ministry is a non-profit organization. In addition to our work with Mormons, we provide support for 44 children through World Vision, and furnish some help to a local Rescue Mission. Those who are concerned about helping this ministry can send their tax-deductible contributions to Utah Lighthouse Ministry, PO Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110. Both contributions and order can be made over the phone (801-485-8894 or 801-485-0312) with Visa, MasterCard or Discover Card.

While we deeply appreciate the financial support that we receive, we strongly desire your prayers. We believe they will bring thousands of Mormons to the truth. As Apostle Paul admonished: “Continue earnestly in prayer, being vigilant in it with thanksgiving” (Colossians 4:2).

THE MORMON PUZZLE
A New Video About Mormonism

We are very happy to announce that a new video regarding Mormonism is now available from Utah Lighthouse Ministry. This video was prepared by the Southern Baptist Church, an organization that has over 15 million members.

Although those involved in the production of this video do not agree with Mormonism, they have been very tactful in their approach to the subject. Moreover, Brigham Young University professors and other members of the Mormon Church were given an opportunity to give their side of the story.

Southern Baptists are taking this matter very seriously. We have recently learned that 40,000 copies of the video will be distributed to their pastors. This video will also be distributed to many different parts of the world. We have been informed that it will be translated into six or eight different languages. While the video was produced by the Interfaith Witness Division of the Southern Baptist Convention’s North American Mission Board, it does not stress the Southern Baptist faith. It is, in fact, a video that can be profitably used by almost all evangelical Christians who wish to know the truth about Mormonism.

A FIRST CLASS PRODUCTION

Although she is not a Southern Baptist, Sandra Tanner, one of the editors of this newsletter, was asked to help with the project. Sandra spent a great deal of time assisting those involved in the production. Some of the scenes, in fact, were filmed at Utah Lighthouse Ministry.

Interestingly, Peter Scarlet, a reporter for the Salt Lake Tribune, made a thorough review of the video. We quote the following from his articles:

Are Mormons Christians? That is the central question of a 70-minute video prepared for the Southern Baptist Convention, which will hold its 1998 annual meeting in Salt Lake City.

The question is answered, although not neatly. It could do no more. Any answer depends on how “Christian” is defined.

Southern Baptists and evangelical Christians conclude that Mormons are not because their theology about God, Jesus Christ and salvation differs from that of historical, biblical Christianity with its monotheistic deity.

An Excellent Video About Mormonism
Regular Price – $20.00
OUR SPECIAL PRICE – ONLY $18.00

With every order of $25.00 or more we will send a free copy of the book, Flaws in the Pearl of Great Price, by Jerald and Sandra Tanner. This is a study of changes and plagiarism in Joseph Smith’s work known as the Pearl of Great Price (one of the four standard works of the Mormon Church). The regular price is $6.00.

NOTICE: You must tell us if you want the free book.
Conversely, members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints portrayed in the video conclude that they are Christians because they believe that Jesus Christ is the head of the church that bears his name. . . .

Some recent videos about The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints . . . have used sensationalism to paint a vituperative picture of the church.

“The Mormon Puzzle” is quite different . . . Southern Baptists and evangelical Christians explain how Mormon views differ from historical Christianity. . . . The video message is that Mormons, like the unchurched or others need to hear the gospel and gain the personal relationship with Jesus Christ that most evangelical Christians believe is necessary for salvation.

The LDS Church clearly cooperated in the making of the video. Southern Baptist film crews were given access to Temple Square, where they shot footage of the Mormon Tabernacle Choir . . . they interviewed Brigham Young University faculty, missionaries and the mission president in the church’s Georgia Atlanta Mission. . . .

LDS Church spokesman Don LeFevre declined to comment about the church’s role in the video. But others were less reticent. (Salt Lake Tribune, July 5, 1997)

Some members of the Mormon Church have become concerned that so many Southern Baptists will be coming to Utah in 1998. In a recent call-in show on the Mormon Church’s radio station (KSL) a devout Mormon, who previously lived in the South was very concerned that some members of the Mormon Church would be unable to cope with the arguments used by the Baptists.

In the same issue of the Tribune cited above, Peter Scarlet reported:

When it comes to witnessing one’s faith to others, turnabout is fair play. . . .

For generations The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has sent proselytizing missionaries throughout the world to win converts to the faith.

The Rev. Mike Gray, pastor of Salt Lake City’s 1,200-member Southeast Baptist Church, is quick to point out the distinction between proselytizing and evangelism.

“Our objective is not to take people from one church and into another, but to share Jesus and urge people to enter into a personal relationship with Jesus Christ,” he said. “You don’t have to be Southern Baptist to come into Jesus.” . . .

From Gray’s perspective, it was LDS Church founder Joseph Smith who spurned the Christian label during his account of what Mormons call the First Vision.

In it, God and Jesus Christ are said to have appeared to the 14-year-old Smith and told him not to join any church because they all were wrong; that their creeds were an abomination; and that their people were corrupt.

“What the LDS doctrine system has done is criticize all other evangelical churches and put us on the outside,” Gray said. “His first vision was a personal attack on all of the Christians of his day. It’s an affront to all of us who are Christian.”

Nonetheless, he said next year’s convention will not be a forum for Mormon bashing.

“The whole spirit of what we’re trying to do will be very positive,” Gray said. “This is not a Mormon thing, but Southern Baptists coming in for a meeting and to share Jesus with the people while we’re here.” (Salt Lake Tribune, July 5, 1997)

TIME LOOKS AT MORMONS

The August 4, 1997, issue of Time magazine devoted 10 pages to an examination of the Mormon Church. The outside cover of the magazine shows a beautiful picture of the Salt Lake City Temple and carries this intriguing headline: MORMONS, INC. The Secrets of America’s Most Prosperous Religion.

Because of the interest that many had in the subject, copies of Time were very hard to obtain in Salt Lake City. Some Mormons who were fortunate enough to find copies were distressed with some of the observations found in the magazine. On the other hand, however, many Mormons were happy that the church received so much publicity.

The portion of the magazine relating to financial matters was upsetting to many Mormons. The following appeared in Time:

The church’s material triumphs rival even its evangelical advances. With unusual cooperation from the Latter-day Saints hierarchy (which provided some financial figures and a rare look at church businesses), Time has been able to quantify the church’s extraordinary financial vibrancy. Its current assets total a minimum of $30 billion. If it were a corporation, its estimated $5.9 billion in annual gross income would place it midway through the FORTUNE 500, a little below Union Carbide and the Paine Webber Group but bigger than Nike and the Gap. And as long as corporate rankings are being bandied about, the church would make any list of the most admired: for straight dealing, company spirit, contributions to charity (even the non-Mormon kind) and a fiscal probity among its powerful leaders that would satisfy any shareholder group, if there were one.

Yet the Latter-day Saints remain sensitive about their “otherness”—more so, in fact, than most outsiders can imagine. . . .

THE TOP BEEF RANCH IN THE WORLD IS NOT the King Ranch in Texas. It is the Deseret Cattle & Citrus Ranch outside Ireland, Fla. It covers 312,000 acres; its value as real estate alone is estimated at $858 million. It is owned entirely by the Mormons. The largest producer of nuts in America, AgReserves, Inc., in Salt Lake City, is Mormon-owned. So are the Bonneville International Corp., the country’s 14th largest radio chain, and the Beneficial Life Insurance Co., with assets of $1.6 billion. There are richer churches than the one based in Salt Lake City:
Roman Catholic holdings dwarf Mormon wealth. But the Catholic Church has 45 times as many members. There is no major church in the U.S. as active as the Latter-day Saints in economic life, nor, per capita, as successful at it. . . . Last year 5.2 billion in tithes flowed into Salt Lake City, $4.9 billion of which came from American Mormons. . . .

The Mormons are stewards of a different stripe. Their charitable spending and temple buildings are prodigious. But where other churches spend most of what they receive in a given year, the Latter-day Saints employ vast amounts of money in investments that Time estimates to be at least $6 billion strong. Even more unusual, most of this money is not in bonds or stock in other peoples’ companies but is invested directly in church-owned, for-profit concerns, the largest of which are agribusiness, media, insurance, travel and real estate. Deseret Management Corp., the company through which the church holds almost all its commercial assets, is one of the largest owners of farm- and ranchland in the country, including 49 for-profit parcels in addition to the Deseret Ranch. Besides the Bonneville International chain and Beneficial Life, the church owns a 52% holding in ZCMI, Utah’s largest department-store chain. . . . All told, Time estimates that the Latter-day Saints farmland and financial investments total some $11 billion, and that the church’s non-tithe income from its investments exceeds $600 million. (Time, pages 52-53)

On page 54 of the Time article, we find the following: “The Hotel Temple Square Co. owns much of the real estate around the headquarters in downtown Salt Lake City. Their Polynesian Cultural Center is Hawaii’s No. 1 paid visitor attraction, with annual revenues of at least $40 million. Other holdings include 11,571 meetinghouses and 50 temples around the world.”

The article also notes that the church has colleges: “B.Y.U. in Provo, Hawaii and Jerusalem, L.D.S. Business and Ricks in Idaho.”

The Mormon Church claimed that Time magazine exaggerated its financial worth. Not surprisingly, however, the church did not divulge what its assets really amount to. Unlike many other churches, the LDS Church refuses to give a financial statement to its members.

MORMON DOCTRINE ALTERED

Unfortunately, most members of the Mormon Church are completely oblivious to the serious changes that have been made by church leaders since the days of the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith.

Dr. Hugh Nibley is proclaimed by many to be one of the greatest defenders the Mormon Church has ever known. Nibley once made this fantastic claim regarding Mormonism: “Yet of all churches in the world only this one has not found it necessary to readjust any part of its doctrine in the last hundred years” (No, Ma’am, That’s Not History, page 46). Nibley originally printed this statement in 1946, and as far as we know, he has never repudiated this false assertion.

A careful examination of the evidence reveals that Nibley was absolutely incorrect. For example, in the last issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger (April 1997) we demonstrated that church leaders changed the law of adoption in 1894. Prior to that time the Mormons sealed living men as adopted sons to other men in an unusual ceremony known as “the law of adoption.” In this way a man could greatly increase his family and kingdom, making himself a more powerful God in the hereafter.

Both the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith and his successor, Brigham Young, gave strong support to this strange doctrine. Both of them had many men adopted to them in a sacred ceremony. They were, in fact, absolutely convinced that they would have these men in their own kingdoms on other planets. Some of the men who entered into this covenant even added the last names of those who adopted them onto the end of their own surnames.

UTAH LIGHTHOUSE ON THE INTERNET

For some time we have wanted to have our own web site so that we can send our message throughout the world. Fortunately, we have recently received a great deal of help and it appears that the dream will soon become a reality. Our readers can visit our web site at:

www.utlm.org

We hope that many people will take advantage of this opportunity and will others about our new site. Although Moody Press originally held the copyright on our book, The Changing World of Mormonism, they have been kind enough to allow us to make it available on our own web site. We hope to be able to present a great deal of material in the months that follow.

LDS CLAIMS

Under the Search Light
Recorded Message (801) 485-4262
(Message is three to five minutes)
As we noted in our last newsletter, Wilford Woodruff, who became the fourth president of the church, was deeply involved in this practice. He wrote the following in his journal: “I officiated in Adopting 96 Men to Men.” (Wilford Woodruff’s Journal, 1833-1898, typescript, 1985, vol. 9, page 408)

Unfortunately for those like Nibley who believe that Mormonism has never changed its doctrines, the evidence clearly shows that the law of adoption was repudiated by the leaders of the church. Ironically, it was President Wilford Woodruff, who had been deeply involved in sealing men to men, who finally squelched the practice of adoption.

Although President Brigham Young called the law of adoption “a great and glorious doctrine” and “the means of salvation left to bring us back to God,” President Woodruff repudiated the practice! He taught instead that men should be sealed to their own fathers.

Speaking in the Mormon Tabernacle in 1894, President Woodruff acknowledged: “I have had friends adopted to me. We all have, more or less. But I have had peculiar feelings about it, especially lately.”

On April 8, 1894, George Q. Cannon, a member of the First Presidency of the Mormon Church publicly stated: “I have never thought of this subject of adoption without having a certain amount of fear concerning it . . . this revelation [to stop the practice] that God has given to His servant, the President of our Church, removes all the danger which seemed to threaten us . . .”

For more information concerning “the law of adoption” see our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pages 480-483, and The Case Against Mormonism, vol. 1, pages 17-26)

GIVING UP POLYGAMY

In addition to giving up “the law of adoption,” the Mormon Church abandoned the practice of polygamy, a doctrine which Joseph Smith claimed he received by revelation from God. John Taylor, who became the third prophet of the Mormon Church, once declared, “. . . we are firm, conscientious believers in polygamy . . . it is part and parcel of our religious creed” (Life of John Taylor, page 255). Brigham Young, the second prophet of the church, once stated: “The only men who become Gods, even the Sons of God, are those who enter into polygamy” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, page 269). On another occasion Brigham Young emphatically declared: “Now if any of you will deny the plurality of wives and continue to do so, I promise you will be damned . . . take this revelation, or any other revelation that the Lord has given, and deny it in your feelings, and I promise that you will be damned” (Deseret News, November 14, 1855).

Although the Mormon leaders adamantly maintained they would never give up polygamy, they finally yielded to the civil law and the practice was discontinued.

Strange as it may seem, however, Joseph Smith’s revelation regarding the importance of practicing polygamy still remains in the Doctrine and Covenants—one of the four standard works of the Mormon Church. We extract the following from the revelation:

Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you my servant Joseph, that inasmuch as you have inquired of my hand to know and understand wherein I, the Lord Justified my servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as also Moses, David and Solomon, my servants, as touching the principle and doctrine of their having many wives and concubines . . .

Therefore, prepare thy heart to receive and obey the instructions which I am about to give unto you; for all those who have this law revealed unto them must obey the same.

For behold, I reveal unto you a new and an everlasting covenant; and if ye abide not that covenant, then are ye damned; for no one can reject this covenant and be permitted to enter into my glory . . .

And again, verily I say unto you, if a man marry a wife . . . by the new and everlasting covenant . . . they shall pass by the angels, and the gods . . . to their exaltation . . .

Then they shall be gods, because they have no end . . .

Abraham received concubines, and they bore him children; and it was accounted unto him for righteousness . . .

David also received many wives and concubines, and also Solomon and Moses . . . and in nothing did they sin save in those things which they received not of me.

David’s wives and concubines were given unto him of me . . .

And let mine handmaid, Emma Smith, receive all those that have been given unto my servant Joseph, and who are virtuous and pure before me; and those who are not pure, and have said they were pure, shall be destroyed, saith the Lord God . . .

And again, as pertaining to the law of the priesthood — if any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another, and the first give her consent, and if he espouse the second, and they are virgins, and have vowed to no other man, then is he justified; he cannot commit adultery with that that belongeth unto him and to no one else.

And if he have ten virgins given unto him by the law, he cannot commit adultery, for they belong to him, and they are given unto him: therefore is he justified.” (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 132, verses 1, 3-4, 19-20, 37-38, 52, 61-62)

It is difficult to imagine the trauma that the Mormons experienced when they were forced to give up the practice of polygamy. In light of this major doctrinal change made by Mormon leaders, it seems incredible that Dr. Hugh Nibley would boast: “Yet of all churches in the world only this one has not found it necessary to readjust any part of its doctrine in the last hundred years.”
CHANGING THE ANTI-BLACK DOCTRINE

Prior to 1978, Mormon Church leaders taught that blacks were cursed by God and inferior to whites. Because of this they could not hold the priesthood, participate in the sacred temple ceremonies, or be married for eternity in a Mormon Temple. Since a temple marriage is required for anyone to live in God’s presence, it was very difficult for LDS blacks to understand why they would be banned from the temple.

In 1966, Wallace Turner, a correspondent for the New York Times, explained what it meant to be denied the priesthood:

The Negro Mormon can hold no office whatsoever in a church which offers some office to every one of its male members at some time in his life. A gray-haired Negro Mormon who may have spent his adult life in careful practice of all the complicated and demanding rules set down by the LDS church stands disenfranchised before the altar where a youth whose beard is just beginning to fuzz may preside. A twelve-year-old boy may become a member of the Aaronic priesthood, more than this Negro man has been able to achieve through a lifetime of devotion. To hold any church office, a Mormon must be a member of the priesthood. (The Mormon Establishment, pages 243-244)

The doctrine which Mormon leaders used to teach concerning blacks was clearly set forth in a letter written by the First Presidency of the church in 1947:

From the days of the Prophet Joseph even until now, it has been the doctrine of the Church, never questioned by any of the Church leaders, that the Negroes are not entitled to the full blessings of the Gospel. (Letter from the First Presidency of the Mormon Church, July 17, 1947, as cited in Mormonism and the Negro, by John J. Stewart, 1960, pages 46-47)

Bruce R. McConkie, who later served as an apostle in the LDS Church, made this statement in 1958:

Negroes in this life are denied the priesthood; under no circumstances can they hold this delegation of authority from the Almighty. . . . The gospel message of salvation is not carried affirmatively to them . . .

The negroes are not equal with other races where the receipt of certain spiritual blessings are concerned, particularly the priesthood and the temple blessings that flow therefrom, but this inequality is not of man’s origin. It is the lord’s doing. . . . (Mormon Doctrine, 1958, page 477)

Mormon theology has always taught that a black skin is a sign of God’s displeasure. This teaching came directly from Joseph Smith’s Book of Mormon. Smith taught that a group of Jewish people came to the New World in about 600 B.C. The good people were called Nephites and those who were evil were referred to as Lamanites.

In the Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 5:21 we read about the Lamanites being cursed with a black skin: “And he had caused the cursing to come upon them, yea, even a sore cursing, because of their iniquity . . . wherefore, as they were white, and exceeding fair and delightful, that they might not be enticing unto my people the Lord God did cause a skin of blackness to come upon them.”

In the Book of Mormon, Alma 3:6 we read: “And the skins of the Lamanites were dark, according to the mark which was set upon their fathers, which was a curse upon them because of their transgression . . .”

The prophet Joseph Smith taught that the Lamanites eventually destroyed the white skinned people (Nephites) and that the American Indians are the descendants of the ancient Lamanites. In his Book of Moses, Joseph Smith wrote about a group of people in the Old World who were cursed with a black skin: “For behold the Lord shall curse the land with much heat . . . and there was a blackness came upon all the children of Canaan, that they were despised among all people” (Pearl of Great Price, Book of Moses 7:8).

Joseph Smith himself taught that “Negroes” are the “sons of Cain” (History of the Church, vol. 4, page 501). Mormon leaders also taught that “As a result of his rebellion, Cain was cursed with a dark skin; he became the father of the Negroes, and those spirits who are not worthy to receive the priesthood are born through his lineage” (Mormon Doctrine, 1958, page 102).

Brigham Young, the second prophet of the church, asserted: “Cain slew his brother. . . . and the Lord put a mark upon him, which is a flat nose and black skin” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, page 290).

Joseph Fielding Smith, who became the tenth prophet of the church in 1970, made it clear that Mormons should consider blacks as inferior: “Not only was Cain called upon to suffer, but because of his wickedness he became the father of an inferior race” (The Way to Perfection, page 101). On the following page Smith asserted that the “negro brethren” have a “black covering emblematical of eternal darkness.” Those who are familiar with Mormon doctrine know that the Latter-day Saints believe that all people who are born on earth had a previous existence in heaven. Mark E. Petersen, who served as an apostle in the church for many years, gave the following information concerning the doctrine of pre-existence and the effect it had on blacks and other races:

Let us consider the great mercy of God for a moment. A Chinese, born in China with a dark skin, and with all the handicaps of that race seems to have little opportunity. But think of the mercy of God to Chinese people who are willing to accept the gospel. In spite of whatever they might have done in the pre-existence to justify being born over there as Chinamen, if they now, in this life, accept the gospel and live it the rest of their lives they can have the Priesthood, go to the temple and receive endowments.
and sealings, and that means they can have exaltation. Isn’t the mercy of God marvelous?

Think of the Negro, cursed as to the Priesthood. . . . This negro, who, in the pre-existence lived the type of life which justified the Lord in sending him to the earth in the lineage of Cain with a black skin, and possibly being born in darkest Africa—if that negro is willing when he hears the gospel to accept it, he may have many of the blessings of the gospel. In spite of all he did in the pre-existent life, the Lord is willing, if the Negro accepts the gospel with real, sincere faith, and is really converted, to give him the blessings of baptism and the gift of the Holy Ghost. If that Negro is faithful all his days, he can and will enter the celestial kingdom. He will go there as a servant, but he will get celestial glory. . . .

Now let’s talk segregation again for a few moments. . . . When the Lord chose the nations to which the spirits were to come, determining that some would be Japanese and some would be Chinese and some Negroes and some Americans, He engaged in an act of segregation. . . .

Who placed the Negroes originally in darkest Africa? Was it some man, or was it God? And when He placed them there, He segregated them. . . . At least in the cases of the Lamanites and the Negroes we have the definite word of the Lord Himself that He placed a dark skin upon them as a curse . . . He forbade intermarriage . . . He certainly segregated the descendants of Cain when He cursed the Negro as to the Priesthood, and drew an absolute line. You may even say He dropped an Iron curtain there. . . .

We must not intermarry with the Negro, Why? If I were to marry a Negro woman and have children by her, my children would all be cursed as to the Priesthood. Do I want my children cursed as to the priesthood? If there is one drop of Negro blood in my children, as I have read to you, they receive the curse. There isn’t any argument, therefore, as to inter-marriage with the Negro, is there? There are 50 million Negroes in the United States. If they were to achieve complete absorption with the white race, think what that would do. With 50 million Negroes inter-married with us, where would the Priesthood be? Who could hold it, in all America? Think what that would do to the work of the Church!

Now we are generous with the negro [sic]. . . . I would be willing to let every Negro drive a cadillac if they could afford it. I would be willing that they have all the advantages they can get out of life in the world. But let them enjoy these things among themselves. I think the Lord segregated the Negro and who is man to change that segregation? . . . what God hath separated, let not man bring together again.” (Race Problems — As They Affect The Church, Address by Apostle Mark E. Petersen at the Convention of Teachers of Religion on the College Level, Brigham Young University, Provo, Utah, August 27, 1954)

While Apostle Mark E. Petersen was very concerned about the need for segregation, Brigham Young, the second prophet of the church, was even more adamant about the matter. Young gave this chilling warning:

Shall I tell you the law of God in regard to the African race? If the white man who belongs to the chosen seed mixes his blood with the seed of Cain, the penalty, under the law of God, is death on the spot. This will always be so. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, page 110)
Speaking out regarding the discrimination was certainly not a popular cause to espouse in Salt Lake City in those days. Those of us who criticized the church for its racial teachings were ridiculed for attempting to change the doctrine. In fact, one irate Mormon man threatened to punch Sandra in the nose because of this issue.

In any case, after the revelation was made public, a number of Mormons became very concerned that church leaders had betrayed their trust. They knew that former LDS prophets taught that blacks could not have the priesthood until after the coming of Christ.

President Brigham Young went so far as to proclaim that if the church gave “all the blessings of God” to the blacks prematurely, the priesthood would be taken away and the Mormon Church would go to destruction. We extract the following from a typed copy of Brigham Young's speech which retains the spelling errors of the original:

... the Lord told Cain that he should not receive the blessings of the priesthood nor his seed, until the last of the posterity of Abel had received the priesthood, until the redemption of the earth. ... Let this Church which is called the kingdom of God on the earth; [say] we will summon the first presidency, the twelve, the high counsel, the Bishopric, and all the elders of Israel, suppose we summon them to appear here, and here declare that it is right to mingle our seed with the black race of Cain, that they shall come in with us and be partakers with us of all the blessings God has given us. On that very day, and hour we should do so, the priesthood is taken from this Church and kingdom and God leaves us to our fate. The moment we consent to mingle with the seed of Cain the Church must go to destruction, — we should receive the curse which was placed upon the seed of Cain, and never more be numbered with the children of Adam who are heirs to the priesthood until that curse be removed. (Brigham Young Addresses, Ms d 1234, Box 48, folder 3, dated Feb. 5, 1852, located in the LDS Church Historical Department)

President Brigham Young’s address presents a serious dilemma for Mormon Church leaders. If they really believe Young was a prophet, then it follows that the church has lost the priesthood, been put under “the curse” and is going to destruction! In spite of Brigham Young’s emphatic warning against giving blacks “all the blessings God has given us,” the present leaders have announced that blacks will now receive “all of the privileges and blessings which the gospel affords” (Deseret News, June 9, 1978).

Although the Mormon Church has always maintained that it is led by revelation, it appears that the word “revelation” is greatly misused. The revelations given to Joseph Smith contained the words “Thus saith the Lord” or similar wording indicating that the message had come directly from God. The expression, “Thus saith the Lord” is found over fifty times in the Doctrine and Covenants.

In recent times, however, it is evident that church leaders use the word “revelation” merely to indicate that they have agreed that a matter should be handled in a certain way.

Historian D. Michael Quinn reported that Wilford Woodruff’s “published sermon is [the] only available text of the revelation” changing the doctrine of adoption. Both the Manifesto to stop the practice of polygamy and the revelation allowing blacks to hold the priesthood have been declared to be revelations from God. Unfortunately for those who believe in Mormonism, neither of these “revelations” are set forth with the statement, “thus sayeth the Lord.” There is, in fact, no written message coming directly from the Lord to abandon these practices.

Both the practice of polygamy and the anti-Black doctrine were very offensive to American citizens. In both cases the church was under a great deal of pressure to abandon the unusual doctrines. The leaders apparently felt that the word “revelation” had to be used in these particular cases to get the people to conform to their decisions. They knew that if they claimed that they made the decisions on their own to abandon these doctrines it could cause a significant schism in the church.

In his recent publication, The Mormon Hierarchy: Extensions of Power, D. Michael Quinn gives some important information regarding the church’s decision to allow blacks to hold the priesthood. Quinn shows that Mormon leaders made an aborted attempt to abandon the practice in 1969:

On 12 November 1969 Stanford University refused to participate in athletic competitions with BYU because of the church’s refusal to ordain blacks. First Counselor Hugh B. Brown had been on record for six years as favoring an end to this ban. . . .

In November 1969 Brown told the university’s vice-president that he expected the church to drop this restriction. Shortly after Stanford’s decision Brown “was able to get a proposal allowing full priesthood for blacks approved by the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles.” With church president David O. McKay unable to function, the way was now open for the two counselors and the Quorum of Twelve to issue a joint declaration granting priesthood to those of black ancestry. Second counselor N. Eldon Tanner confided to BYU’s president Ernest Wilkinson on 3 December 1969 that “a special committee was to report on the Negro situation.” Wilkinson labeled his memorandum of the conversation as “ULTRA CONFIDENTIAL.” Apostle Harold B. Lee, an increasingly powerful member of the Twelve, was absent during his quorum’s decision and rejected it upon his return. Lee not only opposed giving priesthood to blacks, he also held “the traditional belief as revealed in the Old Testament that the races ought to be kept together.”

Lee persuaded the Quorum of Twelve to rescind its vote. Then he pressured the first counselor to sign a statement which reaffirmed the priesthood restriction on blacks “in view of confusion that has arisen.”

Five years after Lee’s death, church president Spencer W. Kimball in June 1978 extended priesthood ordination to all Mormon men of black African ancestry. For decades he had been troubled about this racial restriction, and was among the apostles who unsuccessfully voted for this proposal eight-and-a-half years earlier. (The Mormon Hierarchy: Extensions of Power, pages 13-15)

Mormon Apostle Bruce R. McConkie, who was present during the discussions regarding giving blacks the priesthood, claimed that the General Authorities of the church had a powerful and miraculous experience of “complete harmony, between the Presidency and the Twelve on the issue involved.” Nevertheless, McConkie acknowledged that there was no vision or voice from heaven:

“The Lord could have sent messengers from the other side to deliver it, but he did not. He gave the revelation by the power of the Holy Ghost. Latter-day Saints have a complex: many of them desire to magnify and build upon what has occurred, and they delight to think of miraculous things. And maybe some of them would like to believe that the Lord himself was there, or that the Prophet Joseph Smith came to deliver the revelation . . . which was one of the possibilities. Well, these things did not happen. The stories that go around to the contrary are not factual or realistic or true . . . (“All Are Alike Unto God,” by Apostle Bruce R. McConkie, as published in Following The Brethren, Part 2, page 2)

In his new book, D. Michael Quinn quoted the following from Gordon B. Hinckley, who is now president of the Mormon Church: “No voice audible to our physical ears was heard. But the voice of the spirit whispered into our minds and our very souls” (The Mormon Hierarchy: Extensions of Power, page 16).

The fact that the Brethren were finally in agreement with one another regarding a doctrine that could have caused a serious split in the church undoubtedly brought a feeling of peace to those who were present. The thing that is distressing about this matter, however, is that instead of church leaders admitting that they made a grave error when they stubbornly denied blacks equality, they turned right around and claimed that they had a “revelation” from God about the matter.

It is obvious from President Spencer W. Kimball’s statement printed in the church’s own newspaper that he did not receive any word from God concerning the matter:

“I asked the Twelve not to go home when the time came. I said, ‘Now would you be willing to remain in the temple with us?’ And they were. I offered the final prayer and I told the Lord if it wasn’t right, if He didn’t want this change to come in the Church that I would be true to it all the rest of my life, and I’d fight the world against it if that’s what He wanted.

“We had this special prayer circle, then I knew that the time had come. I had a great deal to fight, of course, myself largely, because I had grown up with this thought that Negroes should not have the priesthood and I was prepared to go all the rest of my life till my death and fight for it and defend it as it was. But this revelation and assurance came to me so clearly that there was no question about it.” (Deseret News, Church Section, January 6, 1979, page 4)

It would appear, then, that when President Kimball asked the Lord if He had any objections to his changing the doctrine, he received no answer from heaven. Since God did not seem to contest the idea, Kimball felt he had the “assurance” that it must be the Lord’s will. This, of course, seems like a very unusual way to obtain a “revelation.”

We feel that it was wrong for the leaders of the church to fail to accept any blame for their treatment of blacks before 1978. Instead of pretending to have a “revelation” to get them out of their dilemma, they should have publicly apologized to the blacks. By their actions, however, church leaders made it appear that God Himself was a racist who stubbornly refused to allow blacks to hold the priesthood.

Church leaders gave the impression that by “pleading long and earnestly in behalf of these, our faithful brethren, spending many hours in the upper room of the Temple,” they finally persuaded God to give blacks the priesthood.

The truth of the matter, however, is that God is no respecter of persons: But in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him” (Acts 10:34-35). It was the Mormon leaders who kept blacks under a curse. They continually and stubbornly opposed the advancement of black people, threatening and excommunicating those who differed with them on the matter. Finally, when their backs were to the wall, the Mormon leaders were forced to change their position.

Interestingly, the three doctrines which were reversed — sealing men to men, polygamy, and refusing to allow blacks to have the priesthood — were all attempts to abandon past teachings made by the early founders of the Mormon Church. As someone once observed, “Today’s truth may become tomorrow’s heresy.”

Besides the revelation regarding blacks and a vision given to Joseph Smith in 1836, the only other revelation added to the Doctrine and Covenants during this century was a vision that church President Joseph F. Smith had less than two months before his death. He was eighty years old and “was very ill” at the time.

Church officials did not include this revelation in the Doctrine and Covenants after it was given in 1918. In fact, they did not add it until many decades after Joseph F. Smith’s death. Michael Quinn wrote: “14 Nov., First Presidency and Twelve vote to accept Joseph F. Smith’s revelation on spirit world, even though several apostles have misgivings about it” (The Mormon Hierarchy: Extensions of Power, page 816).
As early as 1972, we were pointing out that although the church claimed to have “living prophets,” the leaders were failing to canonize any new revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants. We stated: “The Manifesto of 1890 is the last revelation, if it can be termed a revelation, that has been added to the Doctrine and Covenants.” (Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 184)

While we will never know for certain whether our statements had any impact on church officials, the leaders were apparently concerned about the matter and eventually added the two revelations mentioned above to the Doctrine and Covenants. In any case, this hardly solved the problem since both revelations were anything but new revelations. As noted above, the first revelation was given in 1836 and the other in 1918.

Surprisingly, church leaders made a mistake when they finally printed the two old revelations as scriptures of the church. Instead of printing them in the Doctrine and Covenants, they added them to the Pearl of Great Price in 1976. In our book, The Changing World of Mormonism, page 435, we pointed out that this was the wrong place to publish them. We noted that President Joseph F. Smith clearly stated that, “if the Lord should reveal His mind to His people and it should be accepted by His people in the way that He has appointed, it would then become a matter to be added to the Book of Doctrine and Covenants.”

Mormon leaders later realized they made a mistake when they added the two revelations to the Pearl of Great Price. Consequently, in 1981, they removed the two revelations from that book and added them into the Doctrine and Covenants as sections 137 and 138. While we do not have access to the original text of Joseph F. Smith’s revelation (section 138), a comparison of the prophet Joseph Smith’s vision (section 137) with his diary reveals falsification has occurred to protect Smith’s reputation as a prophet. Over 200 words which appear in Joseph Smith’s diary have been omitted. If these words had been included in the Doctrine and Covenants it would show that Joseph Smith had given a false prophecy (see Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? page 31-B).

This fumbling with the revelations only tends to emphasize that the Mormon Church is led by fallible men rather than by direct revelation from God.

Interestingly, President Gordon B. Hinckley, the current “living prophet” of the Mormon Church, has recently revealed in a newspaper interview that “revelation” does not come in the way most of us were brought up to believe:

“Revelation no longer comes by vision,” Mr. Hinckley said, “but in the ‘still, small voice,’ like that heard by Elijah.

“We wrestle with a problem, we discuss it, we think about it, we pray about it,” he said of the First Presidency, made up of Mr. Hinckley and his two counselors. “And the answer comes in a remarkable and wonderful way.” (Washington Times, December 3, 1996, page A8)

Don Lattin, a reporter for the San Francisco Chronicle also interviewed President Hinckley and asked him about divine revelation:

Q: And this belief in contemporary revelation and prophecy? As the prophet, tell us how that works. How do you receive divine revelation? What does it feel like?

A: Let me say first that we have a great body of revelation, the vast majority of which came from the prophet Joseph Smith. We don’t need much revelation. We need to pay more attention to the revelation we’ve already received. Now, if a problem should arise on which we don’t have an answer, we pray about it, we may fast about it, and it comes. Quietly. Usually no voice of any kind, but just a perception in the mind.” (Interview with President Gordon B. Hinckley, as published on the Web site of the San Francisco Chronicle, April 13, 1997)

In the same interview the current prophet of the Mormon Church seemed to be downplaying one of the most important doctrines of the church — i.e., that God Himself was once a man:

Q: There are some significant differences in your beliefs. For instance, don’t Mormons believe that God was once a man?

A: I wouldn’t say that. There was a little couplet coined, “As man is, God once was. As God is, man may become.” Now that’s more of a couplet than anything else. That gets into some pretty deep theology that we don’t know very much about.

Q: So you’re saying the church is still struggling to understand this?

A: Well, as God is, man may become. We believe in eternal progression.”

Significantly, President Gordon B. Hinckley also waivered concerning the Mormon doctrine that God was once a man when he was questioned by TIME magazine:

In an interview with TIME, President Hinckley seemed intent on downplaying his faith’s distinctiveness. . . . At first Hinckley seemed to qualify the idea that men could become gods, suggesting that “it’s of course an idea. It’s a hope for a wishful thing,” but later affirmed that “yes, of course they can.” (He added that women could too, “as companions to their husbands. They can’t conceive a king without a queen.”) On whether his church still holds that God the Father was once a man, he sounded uncertain, “don’t know that we teach it. I don’t know that we emphasize it . . . I understand the philosophical background behind it, but I don’t know a lot about it, and I don’t think others know a lot about it.” (Time, August 4, 1997 page 56)
Unlike the first Mormon prophet, Joseph Smith, President Hinckley gives the impression that he is ashamed of the teaching that God was once a man. In the Mormon Church publication, Times and Seasons, Smith boldly proclaimed that God was once a mortal man and that men can become Gods:

First, God himself, who sits enthroned in yonder heavens, is a man like unto one of yourselves, that is the great secret. . . . I am going to tell you how God came to be God. We have imagined that God was God from all eternity. . . . God himself; the Father of us all dwelt on an earth the same as Jesus Christ himself did . . . You have got to learn how to be Gods yourselves . . . No man can learn you more than what I have told you. (Times and Seasons, vol. 5, pages 613-614)

Since the days of Joseph Smith, the Mormon church has always taught that God the Father had a Father, and that God’s Father also had a Father, and so on. Smith’s successor, Brigham Young declared:

He [God] is our Father — the Father of our spirits, and was once a man in mortal flesh as we are, and is now an exalted being. . . . there never was a time when there were not Gods . . .

It appears ridiculous to the world . . . that God has once been a finite being . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 7, page 333)

President Young’s statement was restated in the 1985 Melchizedek Priesthood manual (see page 153).

Mormon Apostle Orson Pratt made it very clear that God was once in a “fallen state,” “died” and was “redeemed from the grave” (The Seer, Jan. 1853, page 23).

That President Hinckley would downplay this important doctrine of the church in at least two major interviews seems almost incredible. It has, in fact, shocked some members of the church. There seems to be only two reasons why Hinckley would be reticent about discussing a doctrine which is so ingrained in the minds of the Mormon people and taught in some of their current manuals.

1. He may fear that orthodox Christians would be shocked to hear about this doctrine and declare it to be blasphemous.

2. On the other hand, however, it is possible that Hinckley himself doubts the authenticity of Joseph Smith’s strange doctrine about God and is trying to curtail the dissemination of information about it.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS

The letter which follows was written by a Mormon attorney who is very displeased with our work on Mormonism. A photocopy of it was forwarded to us by the individual who received the letter:

I apologize for not returning the document entitled “Major Problems of Mormonism” by Jerald and Sandra Tanner sooner. . . .

I had originally intended to read the entire 256 pages, but after 20-something pages I was so disappointed by the Tanners’ poor writing skills and lack of scholarship that I saw no purpose in going any further. I have read much better anti-Mormon literature. . . . I was offended by the inarticulate meander of the authors. . . . The Tanners constantly quote from sources not available to the reader, including numerous unnamed sources and out-of-print sources (or make their own quotes up. . . .) their work reads like right-wing militia propaganda concerning conspiracies within the federal government or claims of alien abductions. The Tanners’ diatribe is so salacious and “out there,” that they probably support the videotape “Alien Autopsy” occasionally shown on tabloid T.V. shows.

I am concerned that you place so much stock in the ramblings of a not-so-bright former “machinist” . . . The Tanners do this solely for the notoriety that their crying and wailing brings them. They probably started with the object of getting rich, but obviously have been so ineffective that they can hardly raise enough funds to prolong their miserable work. . . . You should be aware that the Tanners’ “Salt Lake City Messenger” is a tiny gossip rag read by few, even though free of charge. Even the crummiest of tabloids do better. . . .

Initially, I began making notes of the numerous lies, inaccuracies, and half truths of the Tanners, but found it to be such an extensive list that would have covered hundreds of pages, that I quit. . . . All the Tanners have done is write an Enquire-type article on the LDS Church. I would encourage you to pursue true scholarship of the things that apparently fascinate you, and not rely on this feeble machinist’s deranged thoughts. . . . I found Tanners’ work and your suggestion that it was “overwhelmingly convincing” to be offensive and worthy only of a brief, blunt, clear response. (Letter from Texas)

Take my name off your mailing list. I do not want any more “SATINISTIC GARBAG” [sic]. I dare you to print this letter in your next issue. (Letter from Utah)

---

Dear Tanners, I want to thank you for all the intricate research you have compiled over the years. I was able to check out “. . . Shadow . . .” [Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?] from the university library and have enjoyed reading each page with wide eyes. I appreciate the documentation and honesty in your book that was lacking as I grew up in the church. You answered many questions that were never properly answered by my parents and leaders. Don’t give up on people — I wouldn’t have been ready for things like this a year ago — there are times when things make sense and you allow yourself to listen. (Letter from Arizona)

You have given me so much help in leaving Mormonism behind in my life & in the lives of my two children. (Letter from Louisiana)

The young [Mormon] missionary girls started coming here in December 96. They made their usual pitch . . . they started talking baptism. I still couldn’t believe several things. But I went ahead and was baptized in Feb of 1996. By Nov 1997 I had had all I could take. So much was false I couldn’t wait to get out. When I received your brochures etc. that topped it off. I sent in a letter of resignation. (Letter from West Virginia)

Thanks to you guys and especially Jerald and Sandra Tanner I canceled my baptism with the Mormon Church . . . there was so much so hard to believe that it seemed like heresy. I could not in clear conscience go to church any more . . . there was something missing in the Mormon version of Joseph Smith’s story. (Letter from Illinois)

I want to thank you two for your help. I finished reading A Gathering of Saints today and coincidentally dug out your news letter — Mormon Leaders Suppress Key Item in Murder Case — I need no more proof. If I still think they [the Mormon leaders] talk to God after this fiasco then there’s no help for me. The Hoffman episode proves to me that its all a hoax . . . . I think your work is very important. You look for the truth and I admire you for that. (Letter from Oklahoma)

Just a note to say thanks for the info that you produce. You are shaking up the Mormon empire enough to merit your own special publication within their church. The following is a cover sheet from a long ‘letter’ about you and your publications given to me by some Mormon missionaries that I have had discussions with. They bristle at the Tanner name. (Letter from Hawaii)

I just wanted to drop you a quick note saying thank you for all the work you have done. Your research and work has been greatly appreciated by me and others trying to get out of Mormonism. . . . I didn’t even know so much of this evidence existed . . . . You have helped me and countless others by showing us that there is not only one or two problems with the church, but books upon books of them. There is no way the church can avoid this other than pretending you don’t exist to their true believers. . . . I am impressed, also, with the tone you have taken in dealing with the problems. This tone seems to say to me, “Here is the evidence, look for yourself if you want.” (Letter from Arizona)

Reading . . . has completely destroyed any remaining idea I had of the authenticity of Joseph Smith’s “prophetic” mission and the Book of Mormon. Thank You. I requested excommunication and left the Mormon Church . . . in spite of having . . . served a mission, taught at the Missionary Training Center, attended BYU, and married in the Salt Lake Temple. At age 32, after 13 years of living as an active Mormon, I left the Church having realized I spent years engaged in double-think and self-deception . . . . While [I] was a Church member I never read your books or articles, having been warned away from you . . . . As you know, Mormonism is hard to leave emotionally and psychologically even after one has left physically. Thank you for loosening its remaining holds on me. (E-mail, dated May 27, 1997)

I can’t begin to thank you for the freedom you have given me. I am 45 years old, I spent at least 35 years of my life trying to make Mormonism work. I am free now . . . . Your book, “Mormonism, Shadow or Reality?” freed me completely. Before your book I could not completely rid myself of the programming of that cult, and give my life to Jesus. I have to thank [you] from the bottom of my heart for your work and for leading me to our savior. (E-mail, dated March 27, 1997)

The material is extremely good! We needed . . . documentation for our book about Mormonism and for all the conversations with Mormons as well (they always say: I don’t believe what you say, show me the documents!).

So we just want to say thank you for your thoughtfulness and generosity. May the Lord bless you and give you His love and power in the ministry you do for the Kingdom of God! (Letter from Hungary)

Utah Lighthouse Ministry is a non-profit organization. In addition to our work with Mormons, we provide support for 44 children through World Vision, and furnish some help to a local Rescue Mission. Those who are interested in helping this ministry can send their tax-deductible contributions to Utah Lighthouse Ministry, PO Box 1884, Salt Lake City, Utah 84110. Both contributions and orders can be made over the phone (801-485-8894 or 801-485-0312) with Visa, MasterCard or Discover Card.

While we deeply appreciate the financial support we receive, we strongly desire your prayers. We believe they will bring thousands of Mormons to the truth. As Apostle Paul admonished: “Continue earnestly in prayer, being vigilant in it with thanksgiving” (Colossians 4:2).

Since we began publishing material regarding the Mormon Church in 1959, church leaders have carefully avoided making any mention of our work. David Merrill wrote: “The official attitude of the Mormon hierarchy towards the Tanners has been one of silence and apparent unconcern. They have, however, actively discouraged LDS scholars and intellectuals from jousting with the Tanners . . .” (Utah Holiday, February 1978, page 7).

To our surprise, however, when the Associated Press writer Kristen Moulton wrote an article about our work the Deseret News picked up the story. In addition, the church’s newspaper even included a photograph of Jerald and Sandra Tanner standing outside the Utah Lighthouse Ministry Bookstore. We were astonished that an article that seems rather favorable to our work would be featured in the church’s own newspaper.

The article appeared in the Deseret News on May 16, 1998, under the title, TANNERS ARE WELLSPRING OF DOCUMENTS. We have no way of knowing how many other newspapers picked up the story.

Before giving our readers a chance to examine the article we should point out that there is an error in the Deseret News printing which should be corrected. It is erroneously stated that “the Tanners created a video, The Mormon Puzzle.” While it is true that Sandra Tanner was often consulted and interviewed a number of times in the video, the Southern Baptists actually financed the project and had total control of its contents.

One other thing should be mentioned regarding the Associated Press story. Mormon professor Daniel C. Peterson of Brigham Young University complained that one of his comments concerning our work was misunderstood. In a letter he wrote to the Deseret News he stated:

I was dismayed to see myself, in the recent Associated Press article on them, praising Jerald and Sandra as unexcelled researchers (“Tanners are wellspring of documents,” May 16). “As far as LDS history goes,” I remarked, “there’s no one out there who has the documents mastered as they do.” Perhaps I was not clear. I meant that there is nobody among professional critics of the LDS Church who knows the historical documents as well as the Tanners do . . . there are certainly plenty of serious historians whose factual knowledge is equal to or better than theirs . . .

Tanners are wellspring of documents
Critics say pair’s agenda colors interpretation
By Kristen Moulton
Associated Press writer

Sandra and Jerald Tanner’s quest fit the times: They were fumbling into adulthood in the early ’60s, brash and full of big ideas.

They weren’t war protesters or hippies, though; the Tanners’ rebellion was more personal.

Pioneer descendants, Sandra and Jerald — 18 and 20 when they met in 1959 — believed that the church’s 19th century founder, Joseph Smith Jr., was a fraud and the religion he created a sham.

And the firebrands began broadcasting their convictions, first in mimeographed handouts to dismayed family members and eventually around the world through a newsletter, pamphlets and more than 40 books.

At the same time, they began ferreting out and publishing early church documents, newspapers, diaries and books they believed proved their case.

More than 30 years later, the evangelical Christian Tanners are recognized for their trove of documents. They’re loved by those trafficking in anti-Mormon literature and grudgingly respected by many Latter-day Saint scholars for their painstaking and accurate research, if not for their interpretations.

Their Utah Lighthouse Ministry and its bookstore have become a chief resource for members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints who are interested in early church history as well as members who are disillusioned and looking to get out.

“The Tanners, pound for pound, year after year, have been the most successful opponents of the church,” said Daniel C. Peterson, professor of Islamic studies and Arabic at Brigham Young University. “I don’t mean it as a compliment.”

Source for ‘The Mormon Puzzle’
Sandra Tanner, the spokesperson of the duo, was one of the experts the Southern Baptists turned to last year to explain The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. To help them do this, the Tanners created a video, “The Mormon Puzzle.”

She also will present a workshop about the church for Southern Baptists when some 10,000 come here next month for their annual meeting.

“As far as LDS history goes, there’s no one out there who has the documents mastered as they do,” said Peterson, chairman of the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies at BYU. “They occasionally have forced us (LDS Church defenders) to sharpen a line of reasoning or come up with a line of reasoning.”

“The Tanners have caused a lot of Mormon historians to do better homework,” said Elbert Peck, editor of the periodical Sunstone.

Yet, Peck notes, the Tanners’ evangelical agenda colors their interpretation of history.

“They’re one-sided in their approach. They believe the Mormon Church is wrong, and they are doing research to prove it’s wrong.”

Sandra puts it this way: “Historians see us as self-righteous simpletons.”

She and Jerald, however, see it quite differently.

“It was like God had given us a burden to share with them that they had been misled and betrayed,” says Sandra, a great-great granddaughter of Brigham Young, the second prophet of the LDS Church. “The church isn’t worthy of their devotion.”

The Tanners came to that conclusion fairly young.

Early questions
The Tanners met in the spring of 1959, when Sandra, raised in Southern California, was visiting her grandmother in Salt Lake City. She’d already strained her reputation by asking cheeky questions in religion classes, and found Tanner—obsessed with his growing knowledge of early church history—fascinating.

He had been on a loner’s pilgrimage to Independence, Mo., where he talked to members of offshoot religions and became convinced that Joseph Smith and later prophets were corrupt.

The two married in June of that year and were excommunicated within a couple of years of asking that their names be stricken from LDS Church membership rolls.

The young Tanners tangled with church apostles over matters of history, by letter and once in person.

“Hardly anyone challenged the brethren on anything,” recalls Sandra. “To have two young whippersnappers do it was the height of impudence.”

When the couple printed up copies of their reasons for disbeliefing, family members, including those who harbored their own doubts, were angry. “There was a feeling we had gone too far,” Sandra says.

Jerald was surprised by the rejection.

“I thought it would be easy. I had very good evidence. I soon realized how hard it would be.”

When the couple shed their last tie to the church in 1962—a belief in the veracity of the Book of Mormon—it was a turning point. They turned to the Christian Missionary Alliance, where they remain active today.

They also launched their own ministry—to put on microfilm and later into print obscure historical documents. Within two years, Jerald gave up his full-time machinist’s job.

“We had three little babies. They were meager years,” recalls Sandra.

They bought a home in 1964 in a down-and-out Salt Lake neighborhood, and operated the bookstore from their front parlor until expanding next door three years ago.

Collecting documents
Historian Michael Quinn says the Tanners’ contribution of early documents is often overlooked.

While academics could study such materials through universities and church archives, others had no way to read them. “For people who are just curious about Mormon history, that has been a tremendous contribution,” Quinn said.

Reaching the common LDS Church member, Jerald says, has been his goal all along. He brushes off criticism from researchers, who find his underlining and use of word capitalization annoying and even comical.

“I wasn’t trying to write for scholars. I’ve tried not to use big words that confuse people,” says Jerald, who volunteers several hours each day at the Rescue Mission downtown.

Wayne Jensen of Ogden, a former LDS stake mission president, said he left the church “kicking and screaming” after his wife, Carol Jensen, concluded it was not the “one true church.” It was the Tanners’ research that pointed the Jensens to hundreds of church documents from which they drew their own conclusions, Carol Jensen said.

“I expected them to be these great big, eat-you-alive people,” she says of the Tanners. “You couldn’t meet two kinder, gentler people in the world.”

One episode in the mid-1980s, more than any other, changed how the Tanners were perceived by intellectuals in the church.

Salamander letter’ labeled forged
Jerald concluded that the so-called “white salamander letter” was a forgery while other historians, including some employed by the church, considered it an authentic historical document.

After Mark Hofmann killed two people with pipe bombs in 1985 in a failed attempt to cover that and others of his forgeries, Jerald and Sandra helped investigators and reporters piece together the case.

The fact that the Tanners debunked a document that could have hurt the church showed their integrity, said Peterson.

“There are some anti-Mormons out there that I hold in contempt. They’re demagogic. They spread hatred and strife and disharmony. I don’t see the Tanners in that way,” he said.

Yet Peterson doubts the Tanners have pulled as many Latter-day Saints from the fold as they’d like.

In the years since the couple began their ministry, the church has grown from 2 million to 10 million members.

Sandra Tanner says their impact can’t be quantified. But she estimates thousands have left the church, including the Tanners’ parents and most of their siblings.

The Tanners themselves have divided their work over the years. Jerald, an almost painfully shy introvert, does the research. Sandra runs the bookstore and is the public speaker.

“Either one of us would have had a hard time doing this,” says Sandra. “We’re two halves of one whole.”

COVERING UP MORMON POLYGAMY

On April 5, 1998, the Associated Press reporter Vern Anderson reported that the leaders of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (the Mormons) were attempting to hide the fact that polygamy was once an important part of Mormonism. Joseph Smith, the first Mormon prophet, actually claimed that God gave him a revelation that polygamy was to be practiced by the Mormons!

A STRANGE REVELATION

The revelation, dated July 12, 1843, contained the following:

Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you my servant Joseph, that inasmuch as you have inquired of my hand to know and understand wherein I, the Lord Justified my servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as also Moses, David and Solomon, my servants, as touching the principle and doctrine of their having many wives and concubines—

Behold, and lo, I am the Lord thy God, and will answer thee as touching this matter.

Therefore, prepare thy heart to receive and obey the instructions . . .

For behold, I reveal unto you a new and everlasting covenant; and if ye abide not that covenant, then are ye damned; for no one can reject this covenant and be permitted to enter into my glory. . . .

And let mine handmaid, Emma Smith [Joseph Smith’s wife] receive all those that have been given unto my servant Joseph, and are virtuous and pure before me; and those who are not pure, and have said they were pure, shall be destroyed, saith the Lord God. . . .

And again, as pertaining to the law of the priesthood—if any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another . . . he is justified; he cannot commit adultery with that that belongeth unto him and to no one else.

And if he have ten virgins given unto him by this law, he cannot commit adultery, for they belong to him and they are given unto him; therefore is he justified. (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 132, verses 1-3, 52, 61-62)

Smith secretly entered into plural marriage taking many wives for himself. In addition, he encouraged the brethren to do the same. In 1887, Assistant Church Historian Andrew Jenson made a list of 27 women who were sealed to Joseph Smith (Historical Record, vol. 6, p. 233). More recent research, however, demonstrated that the number 27 was too small. Mormon writer John J. Stewart believed that Smith married “three to four dozen or more” (Brigham Young and His Wives, 1961, pp. 30-31).

IN SACRED LONELINESS

While the leaders of the Mormon Church have tried to down play the fact that the early leaders of the church were polygamists, Mormon writer Todd Compton has compiled an astounding amount of material regarding the suffering Joseph Smith’s plural wives endured.

Compton’s 788-page book is entitled: In Sacred Loneliness – The Plural Wives of Joseph Smith. Unlike some of the leaders of the church, Dr. Compton is willing to tell what really happened in the early years of Mormonism. In the preface of his book Compton wrote:

All historians are subject to the limitations of the evidence available, and this book is no exception. But it is surprising that these key women have been comparatively forgotten, especially considering the reverence Mormons hold for their founding prophet, and considering how important polygamy was to Smith. In fact, one occasionally meets Mormons who have no idea that Joseph Smith had plural wives at all: twentieth-century
Mormons are undoubtedly uncomfortable with the details of nineteenth century polygamy. (page xi)

Further on Compton observed:

Often plural wives who experienced loneliness also reported feelings of depression, despair, anxiety, helplessness, abandonment, anger, psychosomatic symptoms, and low self-esteem. Certainly polygamous marriage was accepted by nineteenth-century Mormons as thoroughly sacred—it almost defined what was most holy to them—but its practical result, for the woman, was solitude. (pp. xiv-xv)

Many scholars have sought to ascertain exactly how many wives Joseph Smith had during his lifetime. Compton addressed this issue on the first page of his book:

I have identified thirty-three well-documented wives of Joseph Smith, which some may regard as an overly conservative numbering . . . Historians Fawn Brodie, D. Michael Quinn, and George D. Smith list forty-eight, forty-six, and forty-three, respectfully. Yet in problematic areas it may be advisable to err on the side of caution.

Compton made it clear that Joseph Smith wanted to marry even more women. He noted that Joseph "proposed to at least five more women who turned him down." Compton also reported that Smith "apparently experimented with plural marriage in the 1830s in Ohio and Missouri . . . In 1841 Smith cautiously added three wives in the first eight months of the year . . . during the first half of 1843, Joseph Smith married fourteen more wives, including five in May" (pp. 2-3).

Since most people who lived in Illinois in the 1840’s were very opposed to polygamy and adultery, Joseph Smith’s secret teaching caused a great deal of conflict. Despite the fact the Smith attempted to hide these strange practices and even publicly denied them, leaks occurred and the practice became known to his enemies. Just about a month before his death Joseph Smith was charged with adultery (see History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 403).

When Joseph Smith learned that some of his own followers had become disenchanted with his leadership and were planning to publish the fact that he was deeply involved in polygamy he panicked. Instead of handling manners in a peaceful way, he ordered the destruction of the opposition’s newspaper, the Nauvoo Expositor. This incident was very disturbing to non-Mormons who lived in or near Nauvoo. They were convinced that Smith had violated freedom of the press and that something had to be done. The noted Mormon historian B. H. Roberts wrote: “The legality of the action . . . was of course, questionable, though some sought to defend it on legal grounds; but it must be conceded that neither proof nor argument of legality are convincing” (History of the Church, Introduction to vol. 6, p. xxxviii).

Unfortunately for Joseph Smith, this incident eventually led to his death. While Joseph and his brother Hyrum were being held in the Carthage Jail a mob attacked the jail. Both Joseph and Hyrum were murdered by their assailants. This, of course, was a very cowardly act and even anti-Mormon writers refer to it as “cold-blooded murder.”

ASHAMED OF POLYGAMY?

Joseph Smith’s revelation regarding polygamy caused serious difficulties for faithful Mormons who followed him. After Smith’s death Brigham Young, the second prophet of the church, continued to stress the importance of plural marriage. On June 3, 1866, Brigham Young declared:

We are told that if we would give up polygamy—which we know to be a doctrine revealed from heaven, and it is of God and the world for it—but suppose this Church should give up this holy order of marriage, then would the devil, and all who are in league with him against the cause of God, rejoice that they had prevailed upon the Saints to refuse to obey one of the revelations and commandments of God to them . . . Will the Latter-day Saints do this? No; they will not to please anybody. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 239)

On August 19th, 1866, Brigham Young strongly admonished his people to continue the practice of plural marriage:

The only men who become Gods, even the sons of God, are those who enter into polygamy . . . I heard the revelation on polygamy, and I believed it with all my heart . . . “Do you think that we shall ever be admitted as a State into the Union without denying the principle of polygamy?” If we are not admitted until then, we shall never be admitted. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, p. 269)

On another occasion President Brigham Young warned: “Now if any of you will deny the plurality of wives and continue to do so, I promise that you will be damned . . .” (Deseret News, November 14, 1855).

President Young, like Joseph Smith, was very emphatic about the need for his people to practice polygamy. In 1873, he gave this stern warning:

Now, where a man in this church says, “I don’t want but one wife, I will live my religion with one,” he will perhaps be saved in the Celestial kingdom; but when he gets there he will not find himself in possession of any wife at all. He has had a talent that he has hid up. He will come forward and say, “Here is that which thou gavest me, I have not wasted it, and here is the one talent,” and he will not enjoy it but it will be taken and given to those who have improved the talents they received, and he will find himself without any wife, and he will remain single forever and ever. (Deseret News, September 17, 1873)

The reader will note that the quotations above were taken from the church’s own publications, Deseret News and Journal of Discourses.

After Brigham Young’s death the Mormon Church continued to practice plural marriage. The government, however, was determined to stop polygamy. Consequently, many Mormons were imprisoned.

Lorenzo Snow, who became president of the church in 1898, strongly argued that the church would never cease plural marriage. When Snow was on trial for the practice of polygamy, Mr. Bierbower, the prosecuting attorney, predicted that if he were convicted, “a new revelation would soon follow, changing the divine law of celestial marriage.” To this Lorenzo Snow responded:

Whatever fame Mr. Bierbower may have secured as a lawyer, he certainly will fail as a prophet. The severest prosecutions have never been followed by revelations changing a divine law, obedience to which brought imprisonment or martyrdom.

Though I go to prison, God will not change his law of celestial marriage. But the man, the people, the nation that oppose and fight against this doctrine and the Church of God, will be overthrown. (Historical Record, p. 144)

Although Lorenzo Snow said that the “severest prosecutions have never been followed by revelations changing a divine law,” Wilford Woodruff, the 4th president of the church, issued the Manifesto in 1890. This document proclaimed the church would not continue to allow the practice of plural marriage.

Although the highest leaders of the Mormon Church promised to obey the law of the land, many of them broke their promises. Few people, however, realized to what extent until they were called to testify in the “Proceedings Before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate in the Matter of the Protests Against the Right of Hon. Reed Smoot, a Senator From the State of Utah, to Hold His Seat.” It is commonly referred to as the Reed Smoot Case.

Joseph F. Smith, the sixth president of the church, testified as follows in the Reed Smoot Case:

The CHAIRMAN. Do you obey the law in having five wives at this time, and having them bear to you eleven children since the manifesto of 1890?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I have not claimed that in that case I have obeyed the law of the land.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all.

Mr. SMITH. I do not claim so, and I have said before that I prefer to stand my chances against the law. (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 1, p. 197)

Mr. TAYLER. You say there is a State law forbidding unlawful cohabitation?

Mr. SMITH. That is my understanding.

Mr. TAYLER. And ever since that law was passed you have been violating it?

Mr. SMITH. I think likely I have been practicing the same thing even before the law was passed. (Ibid., p. 130)

The CHAIRMAN. . . . you are violating the law?

Mr. SMITH. The law of my State?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there not a revelation published in the Book of Covenants [i.e., the Doctrine and Covenants] here that you shall abide by the law of the State?

Mr. SMITH. It includes both unlawful cohabitation and polygamy.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there not a revelation that you should abide by the laws of the State and of the land?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. If that is a revelation, are you not violating the laws of God?

Mr. SMITH. I have admitted that, Mr. Senator, a great many times here. (Ibid., pp. 334-335)

It seems incredible that President Joseph F. Smith could admit that he violated both “the laws of the State” and “the laws of God” and still remain the “Prophet, Seer, and Revelator” of the Mormon Church.

After making a long and careful study of the church’s cover-up of polygamy, the Committee on Privileges and Elections submitted a report showing that the Manifesto was a deception:
A sufficient number of specific instances of the taking of plural wives since the manifesto of 1890, so called, have been shown by the testimony as having taken place among officials of the Mormon Church . . . the leaders in this church, the first presidency and the twelve apostles, connive at the practice of taking plural wives, and have done so ever since the manifesto was issued which purported to put an end to the practice . . . As late as 1884 one Lillian Hamlin became the plural wife of Abraham H. Cannon, who was then an apostle . . . The prominence of Abraham H. Cannon in the church, the publicity given to the fact of his taking Lillian Hamlin as a plural wife, render it practically impossible that this should have been done without the knowledge, the consent, and the connivance of the headship of that church.

George Teasdale, another apostle of the Mormon Church, contracted a plural marriage with Marion Scholes since the manifesto . . . Charles E. Merrill, a bishop of the Mormon Church, took a plural wife in 1891 . . . The ceremony . . . was performed by his father, who was then and until the time of his death an apostle in the Mormon Church. It is also shown that John W. Taylor, another apostle of the Mormon Church, has been married to two plural wives since the issuing of the so-called manifesto.

Matthias F. Cowley, another of the twelve apostles, has also taken one or more plural wives since the manifesto . . . Apostles Taylor and Cowley, instead of appearing before the committee and denying the allegation, evade service of process issued by the committee for their appearance and refuse to appear after being requested to do so . . .

It is also proved that about the year 1896 James Francis Johnson was married to a plural wife . . . the ceremony in this instance being performed by an apostle of the Mormon Church. To these cases must be added that of Marriner W. Merrill, another apostle; J. M. Tanner, superintendent of church schools; Benjamin Cluff, Jr., president of Brigham Young University; Thomas Chamberlain, counselor to the president of a stake; Bishop Rathall, John Silver, Winslow Farr, Heber Benion, Samuel S. Newton . . .

It is morally impossible that all these violations of the laws of the State of Utah by the contracting of plural marriages could have been committed without the knowledge of the first presidency and the twelve apostles of the Mormon Church . . . the authorities of said church have endeavored to suppress, and have succeeded in suppressing, a great deal of testimony . . . it was well known in Salt Lake City that it was expected to show . . . that Apostles George Teasdale, John W. Taylor, and M.F. Cowley, and also Prof. J. M. Tanner, Samuel Newton and others who were all high officials of the Mormon Church had recently taken plural wives . . . All, or nearly all, of these persons . . . were then within reach of service of process from the committee. But shortly before the investigation began all these witnesses went out of the country . . .

It would be nothing short of self-stultification for one to believe that all these important witnesses chanced to leave the United States at about the same time and without reference to the investigation. All the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction point to the conclusion that every one of the witnesses named left the country at the instance of the rulers of the Mormon Church and to avoid testifying before the committee.” (Reed Smoot Case, vol. 4, pp. 476-482)

Although Mormon leaders promised the government in 1890 that they would not sanction any more plural marriages, they secretly continued the practice until 1904! This, of course, casts serious doubt on their integrity. Unfortunately, these authorities followed the path of Joseph Smith, who always denied the practice of polygamy even though he actually had many plural wives.

An example of Joseph Smith’s deception is found in the official History of the Church. On May 3, 1844, Joseph Smith responded to the accusation that he “kept six or seven young females as wives”:

What a thing it is for a man to be accused of committing adultery, and having seven wives, when I can only find one.

I am the same man, and as innocent as I was fourteen years ago; and I can prove them all perjurers. (History of the Church, vol. 6, p. 411)

REVELATION REMAINS

While the Mormon Church leaders no longer allow their members to practice polygamy, they will not remove Joseph Smith’s revelation concerning plural marriage from the Doctrine and Covenants. Although this book is canonized as one of the four standard works of the Mormon Church, it is not usually given to outsiders. Many non-Mormons who live outside of Utah have told us that they could not obtain this book from the Mormon missionaries. The church is apparently embarrassed by the polygamy revelation which appears in that book.

The church’s reluctance to remove the revelation from the Doctrine and Covenants led to a great deal of confusion. Unfortunately, the double standard of the Mormon leaders after the Manifesto left such a credibility gap that many Mormons continued to hold to polygamy even after the church withdrew its official support of the practice. Like Joseph Smith, they secretly entered into polygamy, and even though the Mormon Church excommunicated a large number of them, the movement did not die out. Consequently, almost a century after Wilford Woodruff issued the Manifesto; there are thousands of people who are still practicing polygamy in Utah. On December 27, 1965, the New York Times reported that as “many as 30,000 men, women and children live in families in which polygamy is practiced.” Ben Merson reported:

“Today in Utah,” declares William M. Rogers, former special assistant to the State Attorney, “there are more polygamous families than in the days of Brigham Young. At least 30,000 men, women and children in this state are now living in plural households—and the number is rapidly increasing.” Thousands now live in the adjoining states of Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico and Arizona—plus sizable portions in Oregon, California, Canada and Mexico. (Ladies' Home Journal, June 1967, p. 78)

The number of polygamists has of course grown since Ben Merson wrote his article. On June 7, 1998, Maxine Hanks wrote an article in the Salt Lake Tribune pointing out that polygamy is a serious problem:

Utah usually ignores polygamy, hoping it will go away. But its scope and problems have grown and “festered like cancer,” according to an ex-wife . . . Polygamy is a relic of 19th-century Mormon fundamentalism, still thriving. Today, there are a dozen major clans consisting of hundreds of families. And there are small independent groups. Often the clans are eccentric and insular, while other polygamists blend unnoticed into contemporary American society. Estimates vary widely, but insiders claim that Mormon fundamentalism may involve 60,000 people scattered from Canada to Mexico across seven Western states. Most of them are practicing some form of polygamy.

Because they claim to go back to the original teachings of Joseph Smith and Brigham Young concerning polygamy and the Adam God Doctrine, they are usually referred to as Mormon “Fundamentalists.” The Mormon leaders now find themselves in a very strange situation. On the one hand, they have to uphold polygamy as a righteous principle, but on the other, they have to discourage members of the church from actually entering into its practice. If they completely repudiated the doctrine of polygamy, they would be admitting that Joseph Smith was a deceiver, and that the church was founded on fraud. If, however, they vigorously defended the doctrine, many people would probably enter into the practice and bring disgrace upon the church. Their position is about the same as a person saying, “My church believes in water baptism, but we are not allowed to practice it.” Because of this peculiar dilemma, church officials discourage discussion of plural marriage.

As long as the Mormon leaders continue to publish Joseph Smith’s revelation on polygamy (Doctrine and Covenants, Section 132), there will no doubt be many people who will enter into the practice. Church leaders of course cannot repudiate this revelation without destroying their doctrine concerning temple marriage. The two doctrines were revealed in the very same revelation. (Temple marriage is the marriage of a man and woman for time and all eternity in a secret ritual performed only in a Mormon temple.)

The fact that polygamy and temple marriage stand or fall together was made very clear by Charles Penrose, who was later sustained as first counselor in the First Presidency, at a conference in Centerville, Utah: “Elder Charles W. Penrose . . . showed that the revelation . . . was [the] only one published on Celestial Marriage, and if the doctrine of plural marriage was repudiated so must the glorious principle of marriage for eternity, the two being indissolubly interwoven with each other” (Millennial Star, vol. 45, p. 454).

Apostle Orson Pratt argued that “if plurality of marriage is not true or in other words, if a man has no divine right to marry two wives or more in this world, then marriage for eternity is not true, and your faith is in vain, and all the sealing ordinances and powers pertaining to marriages for eternity are vain, worthless, good for nothing; for as sure as one is true the other also must be true” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 21, p. 296).

DAMAGE CONTROL

In 1997, the First Presidency of the Mormon Church and the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles decided to publish a manual entitled: Teachings of Presidents of the Church: Brigham Young. This manual has generated a good deal of controversy. As noted above, Vern Anderson wrote an interesting article that demonstrated the church’s attempt to suppress information regarding Brigham Young’s plural wives.

Anderson reported that a young woman who had recently married a Mormon came to the home of Valeen Tippett’s Avery, a noted Mormon writer, seeking to know why the new manual overlooked Brigham Young’s practice of polygamy. Vern Anderson wrote: “She was confused now, and someone had suggested she talk to Avery.
“Dr. Avery,” she said, “I just got the new Relief Society manual, which is about Brigham Young, and he only has one wife.”

Avery, a Mormon who knew the pioneer leader had 55 wives, couldn’t explain why the lesson manual being used since January by male and female church members in 22 languages paints America’s most famous polygamist as a monogamist.

But she had some advice.

“The Mormon church is trying to say to the new people coming into the church, as well as to the larger American society, that there was nothing questionable in the Mormon past,” Avery told the woman. “And if you want answers to these kinds of sticky questions, you’re not going to find them inside accepted Mormon manuals and doctrines.”

The absence of any mention of polygamy is just one of the criticisms being leveled at the manual . . .

“Whoever compiled the manual is extraordinarily embarrassed by the church’s second president,” says Ron Pridis of Signature Books.

“It’s a religious tract, not history,” scoffs historian Nancy J. Taniguchi . . .

Within months of assuming the church presidency in March 1995, Gordon B. Hinckley told the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles to begin updating the curriculum of the adult male priesthood quorums and the Relief Society, both of which had always been separate . . . Soon, a writing committee was formed, using Discourses of Brigham Young, a 1954 compilation of Young’s teachings by Apostle John A. Widtsoe, as the primary source for a new priesthood manual . . .

Widtsoe’s work, narrowly windowed from the hundreds of Young speeches contained in the multivolume Journal of Discourses, had served to spruce up and sanitize the rough-and-ready frontier prophet for modern audiences. Widtsoe eliminated many of the cantankerous, contradictory, hyperbolic rantings for which Young was known . . .

Polygamy, which church founder Joseph Smith secretly practiced . . . and which Young publicly championed, was dropped 13 years after his death . . . and appears nowhere in the Widtsoe index or the new manual.

Also missing from the manual are Young’s theories that Adam was God the Father and that Eve was just one of God’s wives, the rest having been left on other worlds. Blood atonement was another casualty.

Worse than a glaring lack of context, though, say critics who have closely compared statements in the manual of Young’s sermons, are the resulting misrepresentations of his ideas.

“I’d say that about 10 percent of the quotes are overtly lifted out of context, with about another 10 percent that are more subtly altered. In addition, about 5 percent have been abbreviated to avoid offense regarding race, nationality, gender and so on,” Pridis said. (Vern Anderson. The Associated Press, April, 1998)

HIDING YOUNG’S WIVES

As noted above, the manual authorized by the church’s highest leaders carefully plows around the question of polygamy. The manual does contain a “Historical Summary” that mentions Young’s first wife, Miriam Smith, and tells of her death. It then states that he married Mary Ann Angell in 1834 (see page vii). On page 4, the manual notes that “six children were born into their family.” Unfortunately, the fact that Young actually had 55 wives and 56 children during his lifetime is entirely omitted from the record!

Sandra Tanner, who is the great-great-granddaughter of Brigham Young and one of the editors of this newsletter, finds it ironic that the church would try to hide the truth about Brigham Young’s polygamous practices when there must be hundreds of his descendants in the church.

The attempt to conceal Brigham Young’s numerous wives is evident. Interestingly, the Deseret News 1997-98 Church Almanac misprinted the first seven presidents of the church because they were all polygamists. The names of these leaders of the church are as follows: Joseph Smith, Jr., Brigham Young, John Taylor, Wilford Woodruff, Lorenzo Snow, Joseph Fielding Smith, and Heber Jeddy Grant.

The interesting thing about this matter is that after mentioning the death of the seventh president of the church in 1945 (Heber Jeddy Grant) the 1997-98 Church Almanac switches its emphasis. From that point on it lists the names of the women that were married to the presidents of the church. Furthermore, it tells the number of children that they had. For example, George Albert Smith, the eighth president, was not a polygamist. Consequently, those who compiled the Almanac were able to provide information regarding his wife and the number of children they had. It was noted that George Albert Smith, “Married Lucy Emily Woodruff May 25, 1892 (she died Nov. 5, 1937); they had three children.”
David Oman McKay, the ninth president of the church, lived to the age of 96. His marriage and his children are mentioned in the Almanac. It was noted that he was, “Married to Emma Ray Riggs Jan. 2, 1901 (she died Nov. 14, 1970): they had seven children.”

The next six presidents of the church: Joseph Fielding Smith, Harold Bingham Lee, Spencer Woolley Kimball, Ezra Taft Benson, Howard William Hunter and the current leader of the church, President Gordon B. Hinckley, all had the names of their wives mentioned in the current Almanac as well as the number of children they fathered. The attempt to conceal the fact that the early Mormon leaders were all polygamists is evident to anyone who takes a serious look at the matter (see the Deseret News 1997-98 Church Almanac, pp. 14, 40-42).

Some interesting examples of suppression are found on page 165 of the church manual. In the first example we find this admonition by Brigham Young: “... Set that example before your wives and your children...” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 15, p. 229).

In his book published in 1946, Apostle John A. Widtsoe rendered the quote as it appeared in the original Journal of Discourses. Unfortunately, however, those who were in charge of preparing the new manual decided that the word wives should not be used. Consequently, they fixed the text so it read: “... Set that example before your [wife] and your children...” The reader will notice that the word wife is set in brackets. This was clearly an attempt to remove material about plural marriage from the text.

On the same page of the manual we find another attempt to cover up the past. Young is quoted as saying: “Let the husband and father learn to bend his will to the will of his God, and then instruct his [wife] and children...” The reader will note that “wives” has been replaced with the word “wife.” Neither the Journal of Discourses nor Apostle Widtsoe’s book agrees with the new manual.

Although we have not had the time to make a thorough search of the material found in the manual, we did find additional evidence of tampering with the text. For example, Brigham Young stated:

It is obvious that those in authority did not want Brigham Young’s comments concerning men being sealed to men to appear in the manual. Another example of the same type of cover-up is found on page 334 of the manual. Brigham Young stated:

Then man will be sealed to man until the chain is made perfect... (Journal of Discourses, vol. 15, p. 139)

The manual, however, has been changed to read as follows:

Then [children] will be sealed to [parents] until the chain is made perfect... (Teachings of Presidents of the Church, Brigham Young, p. 334)

Most people who are familiar with present-day Mormonism know that dedicated Mormons have a wedding ceremony in the temple in which they seal women to men for time and all eternity. Their children are also sealed to them for eternity. Most Mormons, however, are not aware of the fact that the early leaders of the church had a very unusual ceremony known as the “the law of adoption.” Thus a man could have any number of men adopted to him as sons for eternity. Interestingly, the adopted sons were sometimes older than the men who adopted them! Wilford Woodruff, the fourth president of the church, wrote in his journal that he “officiated in Adopting 96 Men to Men” (Wilford Woodruff’s Journal, edited by Scott G. Kenney, 1985, vol. 9, p. 408).

The noted Mormon historian Juanita Brooks reported that when a man was sealed to another man it was not considered improper for him to take the surname of that man. Mrs. Brooks also wrote:

If the prophet Joseph were to become a God over a minor planet, he must not only have a large posterity but able assistants of practical skills. Brigham Young had been “sealed” to Joseph under this law; now he in turn had some thirty-eight young men sealed to him.” (John D. Lee: Zealot-Pioneer-Builder-Scapegoat, p. 73)

Those who censored the church manual concerning Brigham Young obviously did not want their people to know about this strange doctrine of sealing men to men. This attempt to disguise the truth about what was going on in the early years of Mormonism is deplorable. For more information about this matter see our book, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? pp. 480-483.
MARRYING A CHILD

The Mormon prophet Joseph Smith married a number of young women before his death in 1844. One of his victims was Helen Mar Kimball. Todd Compton wrote: “Having married Joseph Smith at the age of fourteen, victims was Helen Mar Kimball. Todd Compton wrote: ‘Sacred Loneliness’ (p. 487).

Even before Joseph Smith’s marriage to Helen Kimball, Smith had upset the Kimball family when he asked for Heber C. Kimball’s wife, Vilate Kimball. Todd Compton wrote:

The first chapter in the story of Smith, the Kimballs, and polygamy is that of Vilate’s offering, which Orson Whitney, Helen’s own son, recounted in his biography of Heber. In early 1842, apparently, Joseph approached Heber and made a stunning demand: “It was no less than a requirement for him to surrender his wife, his beloved Vilate, and give her to Joseph in marriage!” wrote Orson. Heber, naturally was ‘paralyzed’ and initially unbelieving. “Yet Joseph was solemnly in earnest.”

For three days Heber endured agonies. Finally asked to choose between his loyalty to Mormonism and his intimacy with his wife, Mormonism and Smith won out. “Then, with a broken and bleeding heart, but with soul-mastered for the sacrifice, he led his darling wife to the Prophet’s house and presented her to Joseph.”

“He was wept at this proof of devotion, and embracing Heber, told him that was all that the Lord required.” It had been a test, said Joseph, to see if Heber would give up everything he possessed . . .

This prefigured the next test for the couple, which was nearly as difficult as the first: Smith now taught Heber the principle of polygamy and required him to take a plural wife . . . Smith had already selected Heber’s first plural wife . . . to add to the trial, Joseph commanded Heber to keep the plural marriage secret even from Vilate “for fear that she would not receive the principle.” Helen wrote, “This was the greatest test of his [Heber’s] faith he had ever experienced . . . the thought of deceiving the kind and faithful wife of his youth, whom he loved with all his heart, and who with him had borne so patiently their separations and all the trials and sacrifices they had been called to endure, was more than he felt able to bear.”

According to Orson, “Heber was told by Joseph Smith that if he did not do this he would lose his apostleship and be damned.” As so often, Joseph Smith taught polygamy as a requirement, and to reject it was to lose one’s eternal soul. Once one had accepted him as a prophet, one had to comply or accept damnation . . .

Heber and Vilate had passed through the fiery ordeal of two polygamic tests. One more, this one involving Helen, still awaited them . . . Polygamy was inching closer and closer to the unsuspecting teenager . . . Orson Whitney wrote, “soon after the revelation [to Vilate] was given, a golden link was formed whereby the houses of Heber and Joseph were indissoluble and forever joined. Helen Mar, the eldest Daughter of Heber Chase and Vilate Murray Kimball, was given to the Prophet in the holy bonds of celestial marriage.” . . . As Helen told the story, polygamy entered her life when her father approached her one day . . . in the early summer of 1843. “Without any preliminaries [my father] asked me if I would believe him if he told me that it was right for married men to take other wives.” Helen’s response was instinctual Victorian: “The first impulse was anger . . . My sensibilities were painfully touched. I felt such a sense of personal injury and displeasure; for to mention such a thing to me I thought altogether unworthy of my father, and as quick as he spoke, I replied to him short and emphatically, No I wouldn’t! . . . This was the first time that I ever openly manifested anger towards him.” . . .

Helen listened in disbelief and complete dismay. She wrote that, for her, this first interview “had a similar effect to a sudden shock of a small earthquake. When he found (after the first outburst of displeasure for supposed injury) that I received it meekly, he took the first opportunity to introduce Sarah Ann to me as Joseph’s wife. This astonished me beyond measure.” However, before introducing Helen to the subject of her possible marriage to Smith, Heber had apparently already offered her to the Prophet. In her 1881 reminiscence Helen wrote, “Having a great desire to be connected with the Prophet, Joseph, he offered me to him; this I afterwards learned from the Prophet’s own mouth. My father had but one Ewe Lamb, but willingly laid her upon the altar: how cruel this seemed to the mother whose heartstrings were already stretched until they were ready to snap asunder, for he had taken Sarah Noon to wife & she thought she had made sufficient sacrifice [sic] but the Lord Required more.” Heber thus ended his first interview with Helen by asking her if she would become Joseph Smith’s wife. If possible, Helen was even more astounded than before. She wrote, “I will pass over the temptations which I had during the twenty four hours after my father introduced to me this principle & asked me if I would be sealed to Joseph.” Undoubtedly, unbelief and rebelliousness were part of these temptations.

In a published account Helen described her indecision during this twenty-four-hour period, but her trust in her father turned the scales toward accepting polygamy: “[He] left me to reflect upon it for the next twenty-four hours . . . I was skeptical—one minute believed, then doubted. I thought of the love and tenderness that he felt for his only daughter . . . I knew that he loved me too well.
Evidence, however, is irrefutable. Todd Compton wrote: “If you will take this step, it will ensure your eternal salvation & exaltation and that of your father’s household & all of your kindred.” This promise was so great that I willingly gave myself to purchase so glorious a reward.” This is far from a glowing positive. Despite Vilate’s obvious reluctance to see her daughter enter plurality, the ceremony took place. In May 1843 . . . she was married to Joseph . . . it appears that Helen, when she married Smith, understood that the marriage would be “for eternity alone,” and that it would leave her free to marry someone else for time. But apparently this was not the case, as is shown by a number of factors. First, there is no evidence elsewhere that Smith ever married for eternity, not only for her own salvation but for that of her whole family. Thus Helen’s acceptance of a union that was not intrinsically attractive to her was an act of youthful sacrifice and heroism.

The only person still reluctant to see the marriage performed, after Helen had accepted the proposal, was Vilate. Helen wrote, “None but God & his angels could see my mother’s bleeding heart—when Joseph asked her if she was willing, she replied, ‘If Helen is willing I have nothing more to say.’” This is far from a glowing positive. For instance, in the marriage ceremony used for Smith and Sarah Ann Whitney . . . they both agreed “to be each other’s companion so long as you both shall live” as well as for eternity . . . So apparently Helen had expected her marriage to Joseph Smith to be for eternity only, then discovered that it included time also. (In Sacred Loneliness, pp. 495-500)

TAKING OTHER MEN’S WIVES

Many members of the Mormon Church find it very difficult to believe that the prophet Joseph Smith would be involved in anything unseemly. Some of them, in fact, cannot believe that he had sex with his wives. The evidence, however, is irrefutable. Todd Compton wrote:

Emily Partridge Young said she “roomed” with Joseph the night following her marriage to him, and said that she had “carnal intercourse” with him.

Other early witnesses also affirmed this. Benjamin Johnson wrote: “On the 15th of May . . . the Prophet again Came and at my house [house] occupied [sic] the Same Room & Bed with my sister that the month previous he had occupied with the Daughter of the Later [late?] Bishop Partridge as his wife.” According to Joseph Bates Noble, Smith told him he had spent a night with Louisa Beaman . . . many of Joseph’s wives affirmed that they were married to him for eternity and time, with sexuality included. Eliza Snow . . . wrote that “I was sealed to the Prophet Joseph Smith for time and eternity, in accordance with the Celestial Law of Marriage which God has revealed.” (In Sacred Loneliness, pp. 12-14)

Todd Compton frankly discussed the issue of Joseph Smith marrying women who already had husbands. This strange type of marriage is known as polyandry (i.e., the practice of a woman having more than one husband at the same time.)

On pages 15-16 of his book, Compton wrote:

Polyandry is one of the major problems found in Smith’s polygamy and many questions surround it. Why did he at first primarily prefer polyandrous marriages? In the past, polyandry has often been ignored or glossed over, but if these women merit serious attention, the topic cannot be overlooked . . . A common misconception concerning Joseph Smith’s polyandry is that he participated in only one or two such unusual unions. In fact, fully one-third of his plural wives, eleven of them, were married civilly to other men when he married them. If one superimposes a chronological perspective, one sees that of Smith’s first twelve wives, nine were polyandrous. So in this early period polyandry was the norm, not the anomaly . . . Polyandry might be easier to understand if one viewed these marriages to Smith as a sort of de facto divorce with the first husband. However, none of these women divorced their “first husbands” while Smith was alive and all of them continued to live with their civil spouses while married to Smith . . . In the eleven certain polyandrous marriages, only three of the husbands were non-Mormon (Lightner, Sayers, and Cleveland) and only one was disaffected (Buell). All other husbands were in good standing in the church at the time Joseph married their wives. Many were prominent church leaders and close friends of Smith. George W. Harris was a high councilor . . . a position equivalent to that of a twentieth-century general authority. Henry Jacobs was a devoted friend of Joseph and a faithful missionary. Orson Hyde was an apostle on his mission to Palestine when Smith married his wife. Jonathan Holmes was one of Smith’s bodyguards . . . Windsor Lyon was a member in good standing when Smith united with Sylvia Lyon, and he loaned the prophet money after the marriage. David Sessions was a devout Latter-day Saint.

These data suggest that Joseph may have married these women, often, not because they were married to non-members but because they were married to faithful Latter-day Saints who were his devoted friends. This again suggests that the men knew about the marriages and permitted them.

Another theory is that Joseph married polyandrously when the marriage was unhappy. If this were true, it would have been easy for the woman to divorce her husband, then marry Smith. But none of these women did so; some of them stayed with their “first husbands” until death. In the case of Zina Huntington Jacobs and Henry Jacobs—often used as an example of Smith marrying a woman whose marriage was unhappy—the Mormon leader married her just seven months after she married Jacobs, and then she stayed with Jacobs for years after Smith’s death. Then the separation was forced when Brigham Young (who had married Zina polyandrously in the Nauvoo temple) sent Jacobs on a mission to England and began living with Zina himself. (In Sacred Loneliness, pages 15-16)

In the fourth chapter of his book Todd Compton gives a great deal of information regarding Joseph Smith’s polyandrous relationship with Zina Diantha Huntington:

On February 2, 1846, in an inner room in the Nauvoo temple, Zina Huntington Jacobs stood by the side of Brigham Young, presiding apostle and de facto president of the Mormon church . . . Somewhat apart stood Henry B. Jacobs, whom Zina had married in a civil ceremony in March 1841. She was now seven months pregnant with their second child . . . That Henry Bailey was inside the temple shows that he was considered a faithful, worthy Latter-day Saint.

Zina and Brigham turned toward each other and Kimball sealed (married) Zina to Joseph Smith for eternity; Brigham stood proxy for the dead prophet, answering in his stead when the ceremony required a response . . . as was customary in temple proxy marriages, Zina and Brigham turned to each other and were sealed to each other for time. Once again Henry stood as witness. One suspects that none of the four participants in these ceremonies understood their full significance. Henry and Zina probably felt that they would continue living together as husband and wife, as they had during Joseph Smith’s life. Young had married some women by proxy with whom he never lived . . . But Brigham Young would eventually decide that Zina must become his wife fully, and the story of Zina Huntington would run its enigmatic course.

Zina . . . was a polyandrous plural wife of both Joseph Smith and Brigham Young. It is well documented that she married Henry Jacobs in March 1841 and continued to live with him until May 1846, bearing him two children . . . It is also well documented that Zina married Joseph Smith in October 1841 and Brigham Young in February 1846. While “official” Mormon biographies have Zina marrying Smith and Young after she left Henry, her marriages are so well documented that one is forced to reject this sequence and confront the issue of Nauvoo polyandry . . . as was the case with many of Joseph Smith’s plural wives, Zina lived in his house before her marriage to him . . . Apparently in the midst of Henry Jacobs’s suit, Joseph Smith taught Zina the principle of plural marriage and then proposed to her. One can only imagine the shock this must have caused her. The “cult of true womanhood” in nineteenth-century America required that a woman live by the ideals of purity, piety, domesticity, and submissiveness; and Smith’s new doctrine offended against domesticity (the sanctity of the home), piety (typical American religious mores), and purity (the belief that sexuality should be reserved for monogamous Christian marriage). So it is not surprising that despite her religious reverence for the Mormon leader, she either flatly rejected his proposals or put him off. Furthermore, she was probably in love with Jacobs, and may have revered Joseph’s wife Emma, whom she probably realized would be unsympathetic to an extramongamous union . . . Smith was always persistent in his marriage proposals, and rejections usually moved him to further effort, so he continued to press his suit with Zina at the same time that she was courting Henry. And Smith usually expressed his polygamous proposals in terms of prophetic commandments. In addition to the religious dilemmas she faced, Zina was also choosing between two men, both of whom she cared for in different ways. In early 1841 Zina made here choice: she would marry Henry Jacobs, her romantic soulmate. The engagement was announced. By making this decision, she probably felt that she had put an end to Smith’s suit and to the specter of polygamy in her life. It is not known whether Henry knew that Smith had also proposed to Zina, but it is known that he was a close friend and disciple of Smith. According to family tradition, as the day of marriage approached, Henry and/or Zina asked Smith to perform the marriage, and he agreed . . . but Smith did not appear, so they turned to John C. Bennett . . . to officiate. Zina must have felt a sense of relief and finality as she and Henry exchanged vows and began their married life in Nauvoo.

However, Zina learned soon afterwards, undoubtedly to her complete astonishment, that Smith had not given up. Again according to family tradition, she and Henry saw Smith soon after the marriage and “asked why he had not come . . . he told them the Lord had made it known to him she was to be his celestial wife.” Once again Zina was plunged into a quandary. Smith told them that God had commanded him to marry her. However, he apparently also told them they could continue to live together as husband and wife. According to family tradition, Henry accepted this, but Zina continued to struggle. If polygyny offended against the American cult of true womanhood, polyandry offended even more. Nevertheless . . . submissiveness required her to obey. Disobeying Smith would also be an offense against Mormon piety. So polygamy divided the cult of true womanhood against itself. If a woman interpreted Smith’s polygyny and polyandry as sacred, she would become entirely devoted to the new system . . . Zina remained conflicted until a day in October, apparently, when Joseph sent Dimick to her with a message: an angel with a drawn sword had stood over Smith and told him that if he did not establish polygamy, he would lose “his position and his life.” Zina, faced with the responsibility for his position as prophet, and even perhaps his life, finally acquiesced . . . Apparently, Henry knew of the marriage and accepted it. He believed that whatever the prophet did was right, without making the wisdom of God’s authorities bend to the reasoning of any man” . . . Zina and Henry stayed married, cohabiting, throughout Smith’s life. Thus Zina’s explanation for her marriage to Smith may be a “revision” of history to gloss over her simultaneous marriage to both men. It is certain that the marriage was not enough to cause the couple to stop living together during Smith’s lifetime, or for years after his death . . . for reasons that are not completely clear, Brigham Young pressed his suit with Zina. According to family traditions, “President Young told Zina D. if she would marry him she would be in a higher glory.” . . . Brigham approached her after Smith’s death and she apparently married him for time in September 1844. Nevertheless, she remained married and cohabiting with Jacobs, which was consistent with Smith’s practice of polyandry . . . At Winter Quarters the next development in Zina’s marriage history took place: she began to live openly as Brigham Young’s wife. She later wrote, “Those days of trial and grief [at Mt. Pisgah] were succeeded by my journey to Winter quarters, where in due time I arrived, and was welcomed by President Young into his family.” This method of practicing polyandry contrasted sharply with Joseph Smith’s. Smith had never required any of his polyandrous wives to leave their first husbands and never lived openly with any of his polyandrous wives. Another problematic aspect of Zina’s relationship to Young was that they apparently did not write Henry and tell him of the development. (In Sacred Loneliness, pp. 71-72, 78-81, 84, 90)

Many years ago we searched through the Mormon Church’s publication Journal of Discourses and found a sermon delivered in the Tabernacle by Jedediah M. Grant, second counselor to Brigham Young. In this sermon, delivered February 19, 1854, Jedediah Grant made these weird comments:

There were quite a majority, I believe, in the days of Joseph, who believed he had no right to dictate in temporal matters, in farms, houses, merchandize, gold, silver, &c.; and they were tried on various points.

When the family organization was revealed from heaven—the patriarchal order of God, and Joseph began, on the right and on the left, to add to his family, what a quaking there was in Israel. Says one brother to another, “Joseph says all covenants are done away, and none are binding but the new covenants; now suppose Joseph should come and say he wanted your wife, what would you say to that?” “I would tell him to go to hell.” This was the spirit of many in the early days of this Church . . . If Joseph had a right to dictate me in relation to salvation, in relation to a hereafter, he had a right to dictate me in relation to all my earthly affairs, in relation to the treasures of the earth, and in relation to the earth itself . . . What would a man of God say, who felt aright, when Joseph asked him for his money? He would say, “Yes, and I wish I had more to help to build up the kingdom of God.” Or if he came and said, “I want your wife?” “O yes,” he would say, “here she is, there are plenty more.” . . . Did the Prophet Joseph want every man’s wife he asked for? He did not, but in that thing was the grand thread of the Priesthood developed. The grand object in view was to try the people of God, to see what was in them. If such a man of God should come to me and say, “I want your gold and silver, or your wives,” I should say, “Here they are, I wish I had more to give you, take all I have got.” (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, pp. 13-14)
Todd Compton made this observation regarding Jedediah Grant’s sermon:

Grant disapproves of those who were asked to give up their wives and refused . . . He states that Smith did not want every wife he asked for, which implies that he wanted some of them . . . the fact that at least eleven women were married to Joseph polyandrously, including the wife of prominent apostle Orson Hyde, shows that in many cases Joseph was not simply asking for wives as a test of loyalty; sometimes the test included giving up the wife. (In Sacred Loneliness, pp. 18-19)

FALSE PROPHETS?

Mormon apostle John A. Widtsoe boldly asserted that Joseph Smith and the other early leaders were completely honest. The evidence with regard to polygamy, however, reveals exactly the opposite. The first seven presidents of the church who were supposed to be “prophets, seers, and revelators to the church,” were involved in a doctrine that led them into breaking the law, adultery, polyandry, deception, perjury, bribery and a massive cover-up. The reader will find a great deal of evidence concerning these matters in our book Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?, pp. 202-249.

As we have noted above, the evidence clearly reveals that Joseph Smith’s practice of polygamy is an evil that continues to draw thousands of people into its web. Since Jesus Himself warned us to beware of “false prophets,” and instructed us that we will “know them by their fruits” (Matthew 7:15-16), it seems imperative that we face the truth about Mormonism. There is no way around the problem; the deceptive practices used by Joseph Smith and the other early leaders of the Mormon Church must be recognized for what they are—the “evil fruit” which Jesus attributed to “false prophets.” While we do not agree with much of the material written by President Joseph Fielding Smith, the sixth president of the church, he did make one statement that really gets to the heart of the matter:

Mormonism as it is called, must stand or fall on the story of Joseph Smith. He was either a prophet of God, divinely called, properly appointed and commissioned, or he was one of the biggest frauds this world has ever seen. There is no middle ground.

If Joseph Smith was a deceiver, who willfully attempted to mislead the people, then he should be exposed; his claims should be refuted, and his doctrines shown to be false . . . (Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 1, pp. 188-189)

We sincerely hope that Mormons who read this newsletter will see the futility of trusting in leaders who have used so much deceit and cover-up in establishing their work. We pray that they will awaken to the true message of Christ, realizing that in Him alone we have eternal life.

Temple Marriage?

One of the most important tenants of the LDS Church is the necessity of temple ordinances. They teach that marriage in one of their temples is a requirement for Eternal Life. Past President Spencer W. Kimball said:

Only through celestial [temple] marriage can one find the strait way, the narrow path. Eternal Life cannot be had in any other way. (Deseret News, Church Section, November 12, 1977)

Yet there is no mention of temple marriage in either the Bible or the Book of Mormon. The Jewish temple ceremonies are clearly explained in the Old Testament (Exodus, chapters 26-30) and have no relationship to the LDS temple ceremony.

In the New Testament the only eternal marriage is the spiritual marriage of the believer to Christ (see 2 Corinthians11:2 and Romans 7:4). This is a spiritual union, not an actual marriage. Christ never mentions that a temple marriage is necessary for eternal life. In fact, he taught just the opposite.

The children of this world marry, and are given in marriage: but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God. (Luke 20:34-36)

(spelling and grammar corrected)

You call yourselves Christian and are out there serving a purpose to try to convert members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Yet you purposely tear down their beliefs. You say that you’re helping them. But do you realize what you are doing? Families are being torn apart. Good relationships are now bad. People in the church have now left it because of the garbage you guys put out.... All the anti you publish just goes to show you that it is of the devil. (Letter from Georgia)
Dearest friends in Christ, just wanted to tell you that I have left the mormon church. I am a 8th generation mormon. I left a few years ago and there was a book that I once read called Mormonism- Shadow or Reality? I have been looking for this book to give to my girlfriend’s family. If you know where I could find one please let me know... I also challenge anyone to dispute the book Mormonism- Shadow or Reality? When I was a mormon I tried my best to prove it wrong and to show that it was bunk and the Tanner’s book really made me think and I asked my bishop what’s going on here and he instructed me to shut up about it. So I looked up each and every one of their quotes and found that they are NOT taken out of context. (email from William)

Just dropping you a note to let you know that through the information given to me by your efforts and the folks on the Ex-mormon email list, my wife has sent in her letter to have the names of my children and hers removed from the LDS rolls. (email from James)

I was raised Mormon and one of the first books that I read about the Mormon church was The Changing World of Mormonism. I even gave it to my mother to read. Soon after I was saved thanks to your book making me question the Mormon church, prayers and my husband’s teaching of the Bible. I have been saved five years and am now learning some things that I didn’t know that the Mormon church believed. (email from Melinda)

I want to extend my sincere gratitude for the work that you have done, which has glorified our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. The various materials from the Utah Lighthouse Ministry have been a blessing in my life.

I came out of Mormonism two years ago and was able to put to rest some of the reservations I had about leaving the Latter-day Saints. Mrs. Tanner, it was your book “The Bible and Mormon Doctrine” that had the most spiritual effect on me. The Holy Ghost has blessed me by making God’s word come to life. I no longer feel the hindering burden of Mormon doctrine shutting up the Kingdom of Heaven against me. (Letter from North Carolina)

Was Joseph Smith a Magician?

How did Joseph Smith translate the supposed ancient record he found in the hill? The eye-witnesses to the translation process of the Book of Mormon seem to be describing a magical event. Joseph Smith would put a stone in his hat and then the “translation” of the plates would appear on the stone. Smith’s wife, Emma related:

“In writing for your father, I frequently wrote day after day, often sitting at the table close to him, he sitting with his face buried in his hat, with the stone in it, and dictating [the Book of Mormon] hour after hour with nothing between us.” (as quoted in Creation of the Book of Mormon, by LaMar Petersen, p. 25)

The Smith family’s involvement with the occult goes back a number of years before the Book of Mormon was “translated” and printed in 1830. Michael Marquardt and Wesley Walters relate the beginnings of the Smith’s magical practices:

As early as 1822 Joseph Smith was connected with the magic “seer stone” he found while digging a well for a Mr. Chase. Joseph and his father later joined with a group of men to search for buried treasures, aided by Smith’s stone. In 1825, after hearing of Smith’s powers, Josiah Stowell came to Palmyra to hire the Smiths to help him look for a silver mine in Pennsylvania.

Smith’s mother relates that Mr. Stowell specifically sought out Joseph Smith due to his special powers. Lucy Smith wrote:

A short time before the house was completed [1825], a man by the name of Josiah Stowell came from Chenango county, New York, with the view of getting Joseph to assist him in digging for a silver mine. He came for Joseph on account of having heard that he possessed certain means by which he could discern things invisible to the natural eye. (Biographical Sketches, Lucy Smith, pp. 91-92, as quoted in Early Mormon Documents, vol. 1, p. 309)

Joseph Smith’s seer stone from Early Mormonism and the Magic World View, Figure 8

When Joseph Smith recalled his money-digging activities for his official history, he wrote only about searching for a lost mine in 1825 for Josiah Stowell. But contemporary records suggest that this had been one of the Smith family occupations in the Palmyra/Manchester area since the early 1820s. For example, Joshua Stafford of Manchester recalled that he “became acquainted with the family of Joseph Smith, Sen. about the year 1819 or 20. They then were laboring people, in low circumstances. A short time after this, they commenced digging for hidden treasures, . . . and told marvellous stories about ghosts, hob-goblins, caverns, and various other mysterious matters.” Willard Chase, another friend of the family, similarly recalled, “I became acquainted with the Smith family . . . in the year 1820. At that time they were engaged in the money digging business.” (Inventing Mormonism, Marquardt and Walters, p. 64)
This subject is further explored in LaMar Petersen’s new book, The Creation of the Book of Mormon:

Lucy [Joseph Smith’s mother] provided an even more revealing glimpse into the Smith family’s involvement in magical abracadabra and other aspects of folk magic:

Let not the reader suppose that because I shall pursue another topic for a season that we stopt our labor and went at trying to win the faculty of Abrac [,] drawing Magic circles or sooth saying [sic] to the neglect of all kinds of buisness [,W]e never during our lives suffered one important interest to swallow up every other obligation but whilst we worked with our hands we endeavored to remmember [sic] the service of & the welfare of our souls.

As a young man Joseph Smith not only labored on his family’s farm, but he also worked “in blessing crops, finding lost articles, predicting future events or prophesying, and using divine rods and seer stones.”

One of the most detailed accounts of Joseph’s use of a seer stone for purposes other than translation is recorded in a pre-trial examination by justice Albert Neely at Bainbridge, New York, in March 1826, where Joseph was charged with being a disorderly person and an imposter. … LDS Church writers were extremely reluctant to recognize its authenticity, as it seems that such examinations before a justice of the peace were not usually recorded. Also, the fact that it was published through the instrumentality of Episcopal Bishop Daniel S. Tuttle did not enhance its value. In 1961 Hugh W. Nibley, professor of history and religion at Brigham Young University, explained the seriousness of the alleged trial:

People of State of New York vs. Joseph Smith. Warrant issued upon oath of Peter G. Bridgman, who informed that one Joseph Smith of Bainbridge was a disorderly person and an imposter. … Prisoner examined. Says that he came from town of Palmyra, and had been at the house of Josiah Stowell in Bainbridge most of time since; had small part of time been employed in looking for mines, but the major part had been employed by said Stowell on his farm, and going to school; that he had a certain stone, which he had occasionally looked at to

You knew its immense value as a weapon against Joseph Smith if its authenticity could be established. . . . If this court record is authentic, it is the most damning evidence in existence against Joseph Smith.

Another LDS researcher, Francis W. Kirkham, recognizing the disturbing implications of the report, said:

If any evidence had been in existence that Joseph Smith had used a seer stone for fraud and deception, and especially had he made this confession in a court of law as early as 1826, or four years before the Book of Mormon was printed, and this confession was in a court record, it would have been impossible for him to have organized the restored Church. . . .

The first part and conclusion of the alleged court record published by Bishop Tuttle is here reproduced, which indicates that young Joseph admitted to using his seer stone to search for lost property, buried coins, hidden treasures, and gold mines:

People of State of New York vs. Joseph Smith. Warrant issued upon oath of Peter G. Bridgman, who informed that one Joseph Smith of Bainbridge was a disorderly person and an imposter. Prisoner brought into court March 20 (1826). Prisoner examined. Says that he came from town of Palmyra, and had been at the house of Josiah Stowell in Bainbridge most of time since; had small part of time been employed in looking for mines, but the major part had been employed by said Stowell on his farm, and going to school; that he had a certain stone, which he had occasionally looked at to

We Were Wrong!

About forty years ago we (Jerald and Sandra Tanner) became acquainted with LaMar Petersen. Mr. Petersen, raised in a devout LDS home, had been studying Mormonism for many years before we came on the scene, and had written a very important pamphlet entitled, Problems in Mormon Text. In addition, Mr. Petersen was working on another manuscript and allowed us to read it. At that time we were thoroughly convinced that the Book of Mormon was divinely inspired and came from ancient gold plates that Joseph Smith translated.

Although we respected LaMar Petersen’s diligent research and kindness towards us, we could not agree with the material we found in his manuscript. It obviously was an attempt to connect Smith with the occult and to undermine belief in the Book of Mormon. Consequently, we tried to disprove the allegations.

As it turned out, we continued to believe in the authenticity of the Book of Mormon until near the end of 1962. We then concluded that Mr. Petersen was correct after all. We were the ones who had not adequately done our homework.

Mr. Petersen paid a high price for delving into the mysteries of Mormonism. He was, in fact, excommunicated from the Mormon Church because of his stand for the truth. We highly recommend LaMar Petersen’s new book, The Creation of the Book of Mormon: A Historical Inquiry.
determine where hidden treasures in the bowels of the earth were; that he professed to tell in this manner where gold-mines were a distance under ground, and had looked for Mr. Stowell several times, and informed him where he could find those treasures, and Mr. Stowell had been engaged in digging for them; that at Palmyra he pretended to tell, by looking at this stone, where coined money was buried in Pennsylvania, and while at Palmyra he had frequently ascertained in that way where lost property was, of various kinds; that he has occasionally been in the habit of looking through this stone to find lost property for three years, but of late had pretty much given it up on account its injuring his health, especially his eyes—made them sore; that he did not solicit business of this kind, and had always rather declined having anything to do with this business. . . .

And thereupon the Court finds the defendant guilty.

Recent discoveries have confirmed the reality of the 1826 pre-trial examination of “Joseph Smith The Glass looker” before Albert Neely, a justice of the peace. (The Creation of the Book of Mormon, LaMar Petersen, Freethinker Press, 1998, pp. 29-32)

In 1971 Wesley P. Walters, a Presbyterian minister and researcher of Mormon history, went to New York to look for documentation of Smith’s 1826 hearing. In the damp, musty basement of the jail in Norwich, New York, Mr. Walters found the Chenango county documents for 1826. In these bundles of papers were two documents that related to Smith’s 1826 hearing. Mr. Walters explains:

The discovery among the 1826 Chenango County bills of two bills from the officials who participated in the arrest and trial of Joseph Smith at South Bainbridge in 1826 now confirms this story beyond question. The bill of Justice Albert Neely carries this entry:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>same [i.e. The People]</th>
<th>Misdemeanor</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Joseph Smith</td>
<td>To my fees in examination</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Glass Looker</td>
<td>of the above cause 2.68</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>March 20, 1826</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The phrase “Glass looker” appearing on Mr. Neely’s bill is the precise terminology preferred by Joseph Smith himself to describe his crystal gazing occupation and is the same that Mr. Benton adopted five years later to speak of Smith’s use of a peep-stone or glass placed in a hat, which he employed when hired to hunt for hidden treasures. The bill of Constable Philip De Zeng gives further historical evidence and details concerning this trial, by listing:

Serving Warrant on Joseph Smith & travel............... 1.25
Subpoening 12 Witnesses & travel...................... 2.50 (3.50?)
Attendance with Prisoner two days & 1 night.......... 1.75
Notifying two Justices..................................... 1. — 10 miles travel with Mittimus to take him............. 1. —

This new evidence corroborates and throws fresh light on two accounts of this 1826 trial published almost a hundred years ago but vigorously disputed by the Mormons since they first came into prominence. The first is an account of the trial by Dr. William D. Purple, an eye-witness to the proceedings and a personal friend of Justice Neely. The second is the official trial record itself, torn from the Docket Book of Justice Neely and published in three independent printings. Not only do the newly-discovered bills substantiate these two accounts as authentic, they now make it impossible for Mormon scholars to dismiss the numerous affidavits testifying that young Smith prior to founding the Mormon faith had earned part of his livelihood using a peep-stone to hunt for buried treasures. The peep-stone story can no longer be set aside as a vicious story circulated by those who wished to persecute the budding Prophet, for this new evidence, dating four years before he founded his church, witnesses incontrovertibly to Joseph’s early “glass-looking” activities. (Joseph Smith’s Bainbridge, N.Y. Court Trials, by Wesley P. Walters, pp. 129-131)

The evidence shows that Joseph Smith appeared before Justice Neely for what was known as an “examination” (see A New Conductor Generalis: Being a Summary of the Law Relative to the Duty and Office of Justices of the Peace, Sheriffs, Coroners, Constables, Jurymen, Overseers of the Poor, &c, &c, Albany, New York, 1819, pages 141-143).

This seems to be like the “preliminary hearing” we have today where the accused is bound over for trial at a later date. It would appear from page 109 of the same publication that since Justice Neely found Joseph Smith “guilty” of being a “disorderly person” he could have immediately sentenced him to “sixty days” in the “bridewell or house of correction, at hard labor,” but instead he bound him over to be tried by three justices at a later date. These justices could have ordered “him to be detained at hard labor, for any future time not exceeding six months, and during his confinement to be corrected by whipping, according to the nature of the offense, as they shall think fit” (A New Conductor Generalis).

Since we do not have the rest of Justice Neely’s docket book nor any other extant record concerning the matter, it is difficult to determine what finally happened in this case. It is possible that Joseph Smith could have admitted his guilt and struck an agreement with the county. Many times officials who wanted to cut expenses would be willing to let prisoners go if they would agree to leave the county where the crime took place.

On March 8, 1842, Justice Joel K. Noble, who acquitted Joseph Smith of some charges brought against him in 1830, wrote a letter in which he spoke of Joseph Smith’s “first trial” — i.e., the case before Justice Neely. According to Justice Noble, Smith “was condemned” at that time. Wesley P. Walters wrote:

Mr. Noble succinctly states that the “whisper came to Jo., ‘Off, Off!’ ” and so Joseph “took Leg Bail,” an early slang expression meaning “to escape from custody.” What is obviously happening is that the justices are privately suggesting to this first offender to “get out of town and don’t come back,” and in exchange they will not impose sentence . . . Judge Noble’s statement agrees precisely with an early account of this 1826 trial published just five years after the trial had taken place. It was written by Dr. Abram Willard Benton, a young medical doctor who lived in South Bainbridge at the time. Dr. Benton, like Justice Noble, mentions that Joseph had been involved in glass looking, and that he had been “tried and condemned.” Dr. Benton adds that because Joseph was a minor at the time, being 20 years old, “and thinking he might reform his conduct, he was designedly allowed to escape.” Therefore, the court, though it found him guilty of being in violation of the law, had intentionally not imposed sentence as a way of showing mercy on this youthful offender. (“From Occult to Cult With Joseph Smith, Jr.,” Joseph Smith’s Bainbridge, N.Y. Court Trials, p. 123)

Mormon historians are now conceding the reality of the Smith family’s involvement with magic. In D. Michael Quinn’s new edition of his book, Early Mormonism and the Magic World View he observes:

Friendly sources corroborate hostile non-Mormon accounts. As historian Richard L. Bushman has written: “There had always been evidence of it (‘money-digging in the Smith family’) in the hostile affidavits from the Smith’s neighbors, evidence which Mormons dismissed as hopelessly biased. But when I got into the sources, I found evidence from friendly contemporaries as well, Martin Harris, Joseph Knight, Oliver Cowdery, and Lucy Mack Smith. All of these witnesses persuaded me treasure-seeking and vernacular magic were part of the Smith family tradition, and that the hostile witnesses, including the 1826 trial record, had to be taken seriously.” BYU historian Marvin S. Hill has likewise observed: “Now, most historians, Mormon or not, who work with the sources, accept as fact Joseph Smith’s career as village magician.” (Early Mormonism and the Magic World View, 2nd ed. 1998, p. 59)

THE IMPLICATIONS

Now that the authenticity of the Neely record has been established beyond all doubt, Mormon Church leaders are faced with a serious dilemma. Most people would allow Joseph Smith the right to make a few youthful mistakes without maintaining that it would seriously affect his later role as a prophet. The issue, however, is much more serious than just the transgression of an early New York law. What is involved here is the question of whether Joseph Smith was a true prophet of God or merely a man entangled in occultic practices. The implications of this matter are very serious indeed.

Once we accept the validity of the documents concerning Joseph Smith’s trouble with the law, we are forced to admit that he was engaging in witchcraft and magical practices at the very time he claimed he was being tutored by the deceased Moroni, now an angel, to receive the sacred records. These facts undermine the whole story of the divine origin of the Book of Mormon.

FAMILIAR SPIRITS

Mormonism claims that Isaiah 29:1-4 is a prophecy of the coming forth of the Book of Mormon. Past president Joseph Fielding Smith wrote:

ISAIAH PROPHESIES OF BOOK OF MORMON. One of the most important predictions regarding the Book of Mormon is that found in the 29th chapter of Isaiah. The prophet here speaks of a people who should be like Ariel, the city where David dwelt. They should have heaviness and sorrow and should be brought down to speak out of the ground, and their speech was to be low out of the dust, and their voice was to be as of one that had a familiar spirit. (Joseph Fielding Smith Jr., Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 3, p. 213)

However, Isaiah 29:1-4 is a prediction of God’s punishment on Jerusalem. The Bible always condemns familiar spirits. If the Book of Mormon is supposed to be the word of God why would God associate it with demonic forces? The following verses demonstrate God’s condemnation of familiar spirits.

- Lev. 19:31 Regard not . . . familiar spirits neither seek after wizards.
- Lev. 19:26 Neither use enchantment nor observe times.
- Lev. 20:6 Familiar spirits, wizards . . . I will set my face against.
- Lev. 20:27 Hath familiar spirit or wizard – put to death.
- Deut. 18:10-12 Divination, enchanter, witch, charmer, consulter with familiar spirits, wizard, necromancer – abomination to Lord.
- Isa. 8:19 When they say – seek familiar spirits or wizards that peep – should not a people seek their God?
- Isa. 19:3 I will destroy counsel thereof and they shall seek idols, charmers, familiar spirits and wizards.
- Isa. 29:1-4 Woe to Ariel . . . one that hath a familiar spirit.
- Isa. 44:24-26 Thus saith the Lord, thy redeemer, and he that formed thee from the womb, I am the Lord that maketh all things; that stretcheth forth the heavens alone; that spreadeth abroad the earth by myself; That frustrateth the tokens of the liars, and maketh diviners mad; that turneth wise men backward, and maketh their knowledge foolish; that confirmeth the word of his servant, and performeth the counsel of his messengers.

ANIMAL SACRIFICES

Animal sacrifices were often a part of the magic rituals that accompanied money-digging. In the first edition of his book, Early Mormonism and the Magic World View, page 144, Dr. D. Michael Quinn gives this information: “A cousin of Smith’s wife Emma reported that Smith ‘translated the book of Mormon by means of the same peep stone, and under the same inspiration that directed his enchantments and dog sacrifices; it was all by the same spirit’ (H. Lewis 1879).”

In a magic book known as The Greater Key of Solomon, page 122, we read that “In many operations it is necessary to make some sort of sacrifice unto the demons, and in various ways . . . Such sacrifices consist of the blood and sometimes of the flesh.”

The evidence seems to show that Joseph Smith did make sacrifices to the demons. In an affidavit published in 1834, William Stafford, one of the neighbors of the Smith family, reported the following:

Joseph Smith, Sen., came to me one night, and told me that Joseph Smith Jr. had been looking in his glass, and had seen, not many rods from his house, two or three kegs of gold and silver . . . Joseph, Sen. first made a circle, twelve or fourteen feet in diameter. This circle, said he, contains the treasure. He then stuck in the ground a row of witch hazel sticks, around the said circle, for the purpose of keeping off the evil spirits. Within this circle he made another, of about eight or ten feet in diameter. He walked around three times on the periphery of this last circle, muttering to himself something which I could not understand. He next stuck a steel rod in the centre of the circles, and then enjoined profound silence upon us, lest we should arouse the evil spirit who had the charge of these treasures. After we had dug a trench about five feet in depth around the rod, the old man . . . went to the house to inquire of young Joseph the cause of our disappointment. He soon returned and said, that Joseph had remained all this time in the house, looking in his stone and watching the motions of the evil spirit – that he saw the spirit come up to the ring and as soon as it beheld the cone which we had formed around the rod, it caused the money to sink . . . another time, they devised a scheme, by which they might satiate their hunger, with the mutton of one of my sheep. They had seen in my flock a sheep, a large, fat, black weather. Old Joseph and one of the boys came to me one day, and said that Joseph Jr. had discovered some very remarkable and valuable treasures, which could be procured only in one way. That way, was as follows: – That a black sheep should be taken to the ground where the treasures were concealed – that after cutting its throat, it should be led around in a circle while bleeding. This being done, the wrath of the evil spirit would be appeased: the treasures could then be obtained, and my share of them was to be four fold. To gratify my curiosity, I let them have a large fat sheep. They afterwards informed me, that the sheep was killed pursuant to commandment; but as there was some mistake in the process, it did not have the desired effect. This, I believe, is the only time they ever made money-digging a profitable business. (Mormonism Unvailed, 1834, pp. 238-239; also reproduced in Early Mormon Documents, vol. 2, pp. 59-61)

The reader will notice that it was a “black” sheep that was supposed to have been sacrificed. This is interesting because The Greater Key of Solomon, page 122, says that, “Sometimes white animals are sacrificed to the good Spirits and black to the evil.”

In any case, the Mormon apologist Richard L. Anderson says that, “If there was such an event of a borrowed sheep, it had nothing to do with dishonesty” (Brigham Young University Studies, Spring 1970, page 295). On page 249 of the same article, Professor Anderson quotes the following from BYU Professor M. Wilford Poulson’s notes of a conversation with Wallace Miner: “I once asked Stafford if Smith did steal a sheep from him. He said no, not exactly. He said, he did miss a black sheep, but soon Joseph came and admitted he took it for sacrifice but he was willing to work for it. He made wooden sap buckets to fully pay for it.”

C. R. Stafford testified concerning the same incident: “Jo Smith, the prophet, told my uncle, William Stafford, he wanted a fat, black sheep. He said he wanted to cut its throat and make it walk in a circle three times around and it would prevent a pot of money from leaving” (Naked Truths About Mormonism, January 1888, p. 3; also reproduced in Early Mormon Documents, vol. 2, p. 197).

The current leaders of the Mormon Church have turned away from many of the occultic practices, which played such an important role in the church Joseph Smith founded. In fact, the church hierarchy has publicly condemned magic. Most Mormons are not aware of Joseph Smith’s involvement in the occult because their leaders have systematically covered up the more embarrassing parts of Smith’s history.

SMITH AND THE METHODISTS

It is interesting to note that as early as 1828 members of the Methodist Church were forced to make a decision with regard to Joseph Smith. Smith had taken steps to join their church, but they felt his dealings in witchcraft made him unfit to be a member.

In the book Inventing Mormonism we read:

In 1879 Joseph and Hiel Lewis, cousins to Joseph’s first wife, Emma Hale, stated that Joseph joined the Methodist Episcopal Church or class in Harmony, Pennsylvania, in the summer of 1828. There was disagreement about how long Joseph’s name remained on class rolls. See the articles in the Amboy [Illinois] Journal . . . It is possible that Joseph attended class with his wife Emma because of the death of their first son on 15 June 1828. That Joseph was a member of the class was not questioned, only the length of time his name remained on the class record. (Inventing Mormonism, Marquardt and Walters, p. 61, n. 49)

Part of the statement by Joseph and Hiel Lewis reads:

He presented himself in a very serious and humble manner, and the minister, not suspecting evil, put his name on the class book, in the absence of some of the official members. (The Amboy Journal, April 30, 1879, p. 1)

When Joseph Lewis learned of this act, he felt that Smith was not truly repentant of his magic involvement and felt him to be unfit for membership. Mr. Lewis further details the incident:

I with Joshua McKune . . . thought it was a disgrace to the church to have a practicing necromancer, a dealer in enchantments and bleeding ghosts in it. So on Sunday we went . . . and talked to him some time . . . Told him that his occupation, habits and moral character were at variance with the discipline . . . that there should have been recantation, confession and at least promised reformation — That he could that day publicly ask his name be stricken from the class book, or stand investigation. He chose the former, and did that very day make request that his name be taken off the class book. (The Amboy Journal, June 11, 1879, pg. 1)

It is certainly strange that Joseph Smith would try to join the Methodist Church. His attempt to unite with the Methodists, in fact, flies in the face of his claim that he had his First Vision when he was, “an obscure boy, only between fourteen and fifteen years of age.” In this vision God the Father and His Son Jesus Christ supposedly appeared to him. Those who have read his story will remember that Joseph emphatically stated that the two personages warned him that he should not join any church. Joseph Smith’s own statement about the matter reads as follows: “I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt; that: “they draw near to me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me, they teach for doctrines the commandments of men, having a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof” (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith — History 1:19).

With the mounting evidence of Joseph Smith’s involvement in witchcraft, members of the Mormon Church are faced with a very weighty decision — i.e., can they accept as a prophet a man who was involved in occultic practices at the very time he was supposed to have been receiving revelations from God?

HOW WERE THE PLATES TRANSLATED?

Most Mormons believe that Joseph Smith translated the gold plates with what was known as the Urim and Thummim. Mormon Apostle Bruce R. McConkie wrote:

From time to time, as his purposes require, the Lord personally, or through the ministry of appointed angels, delivers to chosen prophets a Urim and Thummim to be used in receiving revelations and in translating ancient records from unknown tongues. With the approval of the Lord these prophets are permitted to pass these instruments on to their mortal successors . . . Because of the sacred nature of these holy instruments, they have not been viewed by most men, and even the times and circumstances under which they have been held by mortals are not clearly set forth . . . Joseph Smith received the same Urim and Thummim had by the Brother of Jared for it was the one expressly provided for the translation of the Jaredite and Nephite records. (Mormon Doctrine, 1979, by Bruce R. McConkie, p. 818)

Joseph Smith’s mother wrote the following concerning the Urim and Thummim:

That of which I spoke, which Joseph termed a key, was indeed, nothing more nor less than the Urim and Thummim, and it was by this that the angel showed him many things which he saw in vision; by which he could ascertain, at any time, the approach of danger, either to himself or the Record, and on account of which he always kept the Urim and Thummim about his person. (Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith the Prophet and his Progenitors for Many Generations, p. 106; also reproduced in Early Mormon Documents, vol. 1)

On page 101 of the same book, Lucy Smith claimed that Joseph actually allowed her to examine the Urim and Thummim:
I knew not what he meant, but took the article of which he spoke into my hands, and, upon examination, found that it consisted of two smooth three-cornered diamonds set in glass, and the glasses were set in silver bows, which were connected with each other in much the same way as old fashioned spectacles. He took them again and left me, but said nothing respecting the Record. (Biographical Sketches, p. 101)

Although Joseph Smith was supposed to have the Urim and Thummim, the evidence shows that he preferred to use the seer stone found in a well to translate the Book of Mormon. The Mormon historian B. H. Roberts acknowledged the use of one of Joseph Smith’s seer stones. He made the following statement in the Comprehensive History of the Church, vol. 1, page 129:

The Seer Stone referred to here was a chocolate-colored, somewhat egg-shaped stone which the Prophet found while digging a well in the company of his brother Hyrum, for a Mr. Clark Chase, near Palmyra, N.Y. It possessed the qualities of Urim and Thummim, since by means of it — as described above — as well as by means of the Interpreters found with the Nephite record, Joseph was able to translate the characters engraved on the plates.

Joseph Smith’s father-in-law, Isaac Hale, noticed a definite relationship between the method Joseph Smith used to translate the Book of Mormon and the way he searched for buried treasures. In an affidavit that Isaac Hale provided we find some very interesting information:

I first became acquainted with Joseph Smith, Jr. in November, 1825. He was at that time in the employ of a set of men who were called “money-diggers;” and his occupation was that of seeing, or pretending to see by means of a stone placed in his hat, and his hat closed over his face. In this way he pretended to discover minerals and hidden treasure . . . Smith, and his father with several other “money-diggers” boarded at my house while they were employed in digging for a mine that they supposed had been opened and worked by the Spaniards, many years since. Young Smith gave the “money-diggers” great encouragement, at first, but when they had arrived in digging, to near the place where he had stated an immense treasure would be found — he said the enchantment was so powerful that he could not see . . .

After these occurrences, young Smith made several visits at my house, and at length asked my consent to his marrying my daughter Emma. This I refused, and gave him my reasons for so doing; some of which were, that he was a stranger, and followed a business that I could not approve: he then left the place. Not long after this, he returned, and while I was absent from home, carried off my daughter, into the state of New York, where they were married without my approbation or consent . . . In a short time they returned . . .

Smith stated to me, that he had given up what he called “glass-looking,” and that he expected to work hard for a living, and was willing to do so . . . Soon after this, I was informed they had brought a wonderful book of Plates down with them . . . The manner in which he pretended to read and interpret, was the same as when he looked for the money-diggers, with the stone in his hat, and his hat over his face, while the Book of Plates were at the same time hid in the woods! (The Susquehanna Register, May 1, 1834)

David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, described how Joseph Smith placed the “seer stone” into a hat to translate the Book of Mormon:

I will now give you a description of the manner in which the Book of Mormon was translated. Joseph would put the seer stone into a hat, and put his face in the hat, drawing it closely around his face to exclude the light. A piece of something resembling parchment would appear, and on that appeared the writing. (An Address to All Believers in Christ, by David Whitmer, 1887, p. 12)

In a letter written March 27, 1876, Emma Smith acknowledged that the entire Book of Mormon, that we have today, was translated by the use of the seer stone. James E. Lancaster wrote:
How can the testimonies of Emma Smith and David Whitmer, describing the translation of the Book of Mormon with a seer stone, be reconciled with the traditional account of the church that the Book of Mormon was translated by the “interpreters” found in the stone box with the plates? It is the extreme good fortune of the church that we have testimony by Sister Emma Smith Bidamon on this important issue . . . a woman . . . wrote to Emma Bidamon, requesting information as to the translation of the Book of Mormon. Emma Bidamon replied . . . March 27, 1876. Sister Bidamon’s letter states in part:

Now the first that my husband translated, was translated by the use of the Urim and Thummim, and that was the part that Martin Harris lost, after that he used a small stone, not exactly black, but was rather a dark color . . .

Sister Bidamon’s letter indicated that at first the Book of Mormon was translated by the Urim and Thummim. She refers to the instrument found with the plates. However, this first method was used only for the portion written on the 116 pages of foolscap, which Martin Harris later lost. After that time the translation was done with the seer stone. (Saints’ Herald, November 15, 1962, p. 15; Emma’s letter is also reproduced in Early Mormon Documents, vol. 1, p. 532)

David Whitmer frankly admitted that he never did see Joseph Smith use what was later known as the Urim and Thummim (the two stones set in silver bows). This information is found in an article in the Saints’ Herald:

According to the testimony of Emma Smith and David Whitmer, the angel took the Urim and Thummim from Joseph Smith at the time of the loss of the 116 pages. This was in June 1828, one year before David became involved with the work of translation. David Whitmer could never have been present when the Urim and Thummim were used. All of this he clearly states in his testimony to Brother Traughber:

With the sanction of David Whitmer, and by his authority, I now state he does not say that Joseph Smith ever translated in his presence by aid of Urim and Thummim, but by means of one dark colored, opaque stone called a “Seer Stone,” which was placed in the crown of a hat, into which Joseph put his face, so as to exclude the external light. Then, a spiritual light would appear before Joseph, upon which was a line of characters from the plates, and under it, the translation in English; at least, so Joseph said.

(Saints’ Herald, November 15, 1962, p. 16)

Many years ago M. T. Lamb made some important observations regarding Joseph Smith’s strange habit of using his seer stone instead of the Urim and Thummim:

Finally, according to the testimony of Martin Harris, Mr. Smith often used the “seer stone” in place of the Urim and Thummim, even while the later remained in his possession — using it as a mere matter of convenience.

It seems almost too bad that he should thus inadvertently give the whole thing away. You must understand that the Urim and Thummim spoken of, and called throughout the Book of Mormon “the Interpreters,” had been provided with great care over 2500 years ago by God himself, for the express purpose of translating these plates. They are often mentioned in the Book of Mormon as exceedingly important. They were preserved with the greatest care, handed down from one generation to another with the plates, and buried with them in the hill Cumorah over 1400 years ago; as sacred as the plates themselves. So sacred that only one man was allowed to handle or use them, the highly favored prophet, Joseph Smith himself. But now, alas! After all this trouble and pains and care on the part of God, and on the part of so many holy men of old, this “Urim and Thummim” is found at last to be altogether superfluous; not needed at all. This “peep stone” found in a neighbor’s well will do the work just as well — and is even more convenient, “for convenience he used the seer stone.” So we are left to infer that when he used the Urim and Thummim at all, it was at some inconvenience. And probably he only did it out of regard to the feelings of his God, who had spent so much time and anxiety in preparing it so long ago, and preserving it to the present day for his special use! (The Golden Bible, 1887, pp. 250-251)

Although Joseph Smith spent a lot of time staring at his seer stone, it did not seem to help him find the buried treasures he desired. Since Joseph Smith’s failed treasure seeking and translation method for the Book of Mormon were both accomplished through the use of the same magic stone it appears that both efforts were lacking in divine approval. As one former follower of Joseph Smith expressed it, a person must “come out from the company of Joseph the sorcerer.”
