father of an inferior race. . . . Millions of souls have come into this world cursed with a black skin and have been denied the privilege of Priesthood and the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel. These are the descendants of Cain.37

In one of Joseph Fielding Smith’s popular books, Doctrines of Salvation, he wrote:

NO NEUTRALS IN HEAVEN. There were no neutrals in the war in heaven. All took sides either with Christ or with Satan. Every man had his agency there, and men receive rewards there based upon their actions there, just as they will receive rewards hereafter for deeds done in the body. The Negro, evidently, is receiving the reward he merits.38

At the October 1947 LDS Conference, Apostle George F. Richards proclaimed:

The Negro race have been forbidden the priesthood, and the higher temple blessings, presumably because of their not having been valiant while in the spirit. It does not pay to be anything but valiant.39

LDS Apostle Bruce R. McConkie, son-in-law of President Joseph Fielding Smith, wrote:

Those who were less valiant in pre-existence and who thereby had certain spiritual restrictions imposed upon them during mortality are known to us as the Negroes. Such spirits are sent to earth through the lineage of Cain, the mark put upon him for his rebellion against God and his murder of Abel being a black skin.40

On March 18, 1961, Alvin R. Dyer, of the First Presidency, speaking at the missionary conference in Oslo, Norway, stated:

Why is it that you are white and not colored? Have you ever asked yourself that question? Who had anything to do with your being born into the Church and not born a Chinese or a Hindu, or a Negro? . . . I suppose, and you often may have heard missionaries say it, or have asked the question, why is a negro a negro? And you have heard this answer: Well, they must have been neutral in the pre-existence or they must have straddled the issue. That is the most common saying, they were neither hot nor cold so the Lord made them Negroes. This is, of course, not true. The reason that spirits are born into Negro bodies is because those spirits rejected the priesthood of God in the Pre-existence. This is the reason why you have Negroes on the earth. . . . All of this is according to a well-worked-out plan, that these millions and billions of spirits awaiting birth in the pre-existence would be born through a channel or race of people. Consequently, the cursed were to be born through Ham. . . . This is why you have colored people, why you have dark people and why you have white people.41

LDS Apostle Mark E. Petersen, speaking in 1954 at the Convention of Teachers of Religion on the College Level, Brigham Young University, gave this overview of the church’s teaching on race:

The discussion of civil rights, especially over the last 20 years, has drawn some very sharp lines. It has blinded the thinking of some of our own people, I believe. . . . We who teach in the Church certainly must have our feet on the ground and not be led astray by the philosophies of men on this subject any more than on any other subject. . . . He [the Negro] is not just seeking the opportunity of sitting down in a cafe where white people eat. . . . It appears that the negro seeks absorption with the white race. He will not be satisfied until he achieves it by intermarriage. . . . What should be our attitude as Latter-day Saints toward negro and other dark races? Does the Lord give us any guidance? Is there any Church policy on this matter? Is segregation in and of itself a wrong principle? . . .

Is there any reason to think that the same principles of rewards and punishments did not apply to us and our deeds in the pre-existent world as will apply hereafter? Is there reason then why the type of birth we receive in this life is not a reflection of our worthiness or lack of it in the pre-existent life? We must accept the justice of God He is fair to all. His is not a respecter of persons. He will mete to us according to what we deserve. . . . We cannot escape the conclusion that because of performance in our pre-existence some of us are born as Chinese, some as Japanese, some as Indians, some as Negroes, some as Americans, some as Latter-day Saints. These are rewards and punishments, fully in harmony with His established policy in dealing with sinners and saints, rewarding all according to their deeds. . . .

The Lord segregated the people both as to blood and place of residence. At least in the cases of the Lamanites and the Negroes we have the definite word of the Lord Himself that He placed a dark skin upon them as a curse—as a punishment and as a sign to all others. He forbade intermarriage with them under 39 George F. Richards, LDS Conference Report (October 1947); p. 57.

In 1969 the LDS First Presidency issued another statement on race:

December 15, 1969

To General Authorities, Regional Representatives of the Twelve, Stake Presidents, Mission Presidents, and Bishops.

Dear Brethren:

In view of confusion that has arisen, it was decided at a meeting of the First Presidency and the Quorum of the Twelve to restate the position of the Church with regard to the Negro both in society and in the Church.

We believe that the Constitution of the United States was divinely inspired.

It follows, therefore, that we believe the Negro, as well as those of other races, should have his full Constitutional privileges as a member of society.

However, matters of faith, conscience, and theology are not within the purview of the civil law.

From the beginning of this dispensation, Joseph Smith and all succeeding presidents of the Church have taught that Negroes, while spirit children of a common Father, and the progeny of our earthly parents Adam and Eve, were not yet to receive the priesthood, for reasons which we believe are known to God but which He has not made fully known to man.

Our living prophet, President David O. McKay, has said, “The seeming discrimination by the Church toward the Negro is not something which originated with man; but goes back into the beginning with God.”

“Revelation assures us that this plan antedates man’s mortal existence, extending back to man’s pre-existent state.”

From these quotes we see how the LDS teachings on premortal performance, race, and the supposed curse of Cain are intertwined. With so many of the LDS prophets and apostles teaching that blacks have been cursed with a black skin due to their misdeeds in the premortal existence, one wonders how the LDS Church can dismiss these as simply comments by “individuals” or “folklore”?

Lifting the Ban

During the 1960’s and early 1970’s the LDS Church received extensive social pressure to change their racial stance in the form of demonstrations, and newspaper and magazine articles.

For over a hundred years LDS leaders had taught that blacks could not be given the priesthood until all the rest of Adam’s posterity had been given the opportunity. Preaching in 1866, Brigham Young declared:

Why are so many of the inhabitants of the earth cursed with a skin of blackness? It comes in consequence of their fathers rejecting the power of the Holy Priesthood, and the law of God. They will go down to death. And when all the rest of the children have received their blessings in the Holy Priesthood, then that curse will be removed from the seed of Cain, and they will then come up and possess the priesthood, and receive all the blessings which we now are entitled to.

Yet on June 9, 1978, the LDS Church’s Deseret News carried a startling announcement by the First Presidency of the LDS Church that stated a new revelation had been given:

We have pleaded long and earnestly in behalf of these, our faithful brethren, spending many hours in the upper room of the Temple supplicating the Lord for divine guidance.

He has heard our prayers, and by revelation has confirmed that the long-promised day has come when every faithful, worthy man in the church may receive the holy priesthood, with power to exercise its divine authority, and enjoy with his loved ones every blessing that flows therefrom, including the blessings of the temple. Accordingly, all worthy male members of the church may be ordained to the priesthood without regard for race or color.46

One should note, however, that the actual “revelation” was not printed, only an announcement of a revelation, which has now been added to the back of their Doctrine and Covenants as Declaration 2. This is similar to the situation in 1890 when the church issued the “Manifesto” announcing the end of polygamous marriages, printed as Declaration 1 in the D&C.47

Twenty-five years before the LDS Church gave up the practice of polygamy they were declaring that no such change could be made. In 1865 the church announced:

We have shown that in requiring the relinquishment of polygamy, they ask the renunciation of the entire faith of this people. . . .

There is no half way house. The childish babble about another revelation is only an evidence how half informed men can talk.48

However, as the U.S. government persisted in prosecuting LDS polygamists,49 LDS President Wilford Woodruff issued the 1890 Manifesto which suspended its practice. The lifting of the priesthood ban on blacks seems to be another instance of political pressure forcing the church to announce a new revelation. Writing in the New York Times, June 11, 1978, Professor Mario S. DePillis observed: “For Mormonism’s anti-black policy a revelation was the only way out, and many students of Mormonism were puzzled only at the lateness of the hour.”

Both Declaration 1 and 2 at the back of the Doctrine and Covenants were supposedly the result of “revelation” ending a long criticized practice of the LDS Church. Yet neither was accompanied by an official explanation of the doctrinal implications. Doctrine and Covenants, Section 132, which teaches plural marriage, and the Pearl of Great Price, with its statements about Cain and black skin, are still considered scripture.

On the official LDS web site is a statement titled “Priesthood Ordination before 1978.”50 There the priesthood ban on blacks is defended as being similar to the Old Testament priesthood restrictions: “Among the tribes of Israel, for example, only men of the tribe of Levi were given the priesthood and allowed to officiate in certain ordinances.”51 Notice, the comparison was made to something God announced to Israel. This implies that the ban on blacks was also God-ordained, not “folklore” or a practice of unknown origin. The tribe of Levi was chosen but the rest of Israel was not declared to be under a “curse” as blacks were said to be prior to the 1978 change.

Attending the Temple

After the First Presidency made their 1978 announcement, many people became confused over the church’s position on interracial marriage and temple attendance. It soon became apparent, however, that the church’s ban on blacks participating in the temple ordinances and the ban on mixed marriages had been lifted.

Joseph Freeman, the first black man ordained to the priesthood after the 1978 change, indicated that he wanted to be sealed in the temple to his wife who was not of African descent. Church spokesman Don LeFevre said that such a marriage would be possible and that although the church did not encourage interracial marriage, there was no longer a policy against whites marrying blacks:

That is entirely possible, said Mr. LeFevre. . . . “So there is no ban on interracial marriage. If a black partner contemplating marriage is worthy of going to the Temple, nobody’s going to stop him—if he’s marrying a white, an Oriental . . . if he’s ready to go to the Temple, obviously he may go with the blessings of the church.”52

On June 24, 1978, the Salt Lake Tribune announced:

Joseph Freeman, 26, the first black man to gain the priesthood in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Friday went in the Salt Lake Temple with his wife and sons for sacred ordinances . . . Thomas S. Monson, member of the church’s Quorum of Twelve Apostles, conducted the marriage and sealing ceremonies.

One hundred years earlier Elijah Abel had requested the same privilege of attending the temple, but was denied. LDS author Armand Mauss commented:

The restrictive policy on priesthood, . . . lingered on. It was periodically reconsidered after Brigham Young’s death in 1877, usually in response to a petition from a black member or sympathizer. The first of these reconsiderations occurred as early as 1879, when Young’s successor, John Taylor, responded to a petition from Elijah Abel (the sole surviving black member to have received the priesthood) that he be admitted to the sacred temple rites of the church. Taylor’s consultations turned up a claim by two prominent local church leaders that in the mid-1830s they had heard Joseph Smith declare that Negroes could not be given the priesthood and that Abel was supposed to have been stripped of it before Smith died.

Taylor himself, though a contemporary of these witnesses and a close associate of Smith, could recall no such instruction. . . . The young apostle Joseph F. Smith, nephew of the prophet, disagreed with their recollections on the basis of an 1841 certificate he had seen verifying Abel’s ordination as a seventy, and Abel himself had similar documentation . . . . To Abel’s chagrin, church policy was “resolved” not by granting his petition [to attend the temple] but by sending him on a mission. 53

Abel’s requests for temple ordinances were repeatedly denied. He died in 1884 and was buried in the Salt Lake City Cemetery, never having been admitted to the temple. His son and grandson were also ordained to the priesthood but we have no evidence that they were ever allowed to attend the temple. 54

Another early black convert to Mormonism was Jane Manning James. Her family joined Mormonism in the 1840’s and she lived for a time in the Joseph Smith home as a domestic. After migrating to Utah she was a domestic in the Brigham Young home and married another black convert, Isaac James. Isaac left the family in 1869 but Jane remained faithful to the LDS Church. Mormon historian Jessie I. Embry tells some of Jane’s story:

Jane Manning James was a member of the female Relief Society and donated to the St. George, Manti, and Logan temple funds. She repeatedly petitioned the First Presidency to be endowed and to have her children sealed to her. During the time that Isaac was gone, Jane asked to be sealed to Walker Lewis who, like Elijah Abel, had been ordained during Joseph Smith’s lifetime.

After Isaac died, Jane asked that they be given the ordination of adoption so that they would be together in the next life. She explained in correspondence to church leaders that Emma Smith had offered to have her sealed to the Smith family as a child. She reconsidered that decision and asked to be sealed to the Smiths. Permission for all of these requests was denied.

Instead the First Presidency “decided she might be adopted into the family of Joseph Smith as a servant, which was done, a special ceremony having been prepared for the purpose.” The minutes of the Council of Twelve Apostles continued, “But Aunt Jane was not satisfied with this, and as a mark of dissatisfaction she applied again after this for sealing blessings, but of course in vain.” 55

Jane Manning James died in 1908 and President Joseph F. Smith spoke at her funeral. LDS Apostle Mathias F. Cowley reported:

In after years when President Joseph F. Smith preached the funeral sermon of this same faithful woman he declared that she would in the resurrection attain the longings of her soul and become a white and beautiful person. 56

Today there is no restriction on ethnic identity for faithful Mormons to participate in their temple ordinances.

Could the Ban on Women in the Priesthood be Changed as Well?

Speaking at the LDS Conference in October of 1967, Apostle Ezra Taft Benson, who would later become the thirteenth president of the LDS Church, related the priesthood prohibition on blacks with the same policy for women:

Increasingly the Latter-day Saints must choose between the reasoning of men and the revelations of God. This is a crucial choice, for we have those within the Church today who, with their worldly wisdom, are leading some of our members astray. . . . The Lord does not always give reasons for each commandment. Sometimes faithful members, like Adam of old, are called upon to obey an injunction of the Lord even though they do not know the reason why it was given. Those who trust in God will obey him, knowing full well that time will provide the reasons and vindicate their obedience.

The arm of flesh may not approve nor understand why God has not bestowed the priesthood on women or the seed of Cain, but God’s ways are not man’s ways. 57

However, thirty years later Gordon B. Hinckley seemed to suggest that the restriction on women in the priesthood could be changed at some future time. In 1997 Hinckley was interviewed by the Australian Broadcasting Corporation regarding the 1978 revelation giving priesthood to blacks:

RB: Now up until 1978 I understand Blacks were not allowed to be priests in your Church?

GBH [G. B. Hinckley]: That is correct. Although we have Black members of the Church. . . .

55 Embry, Black Saints in a White Church, pp. 40-41.
RB: So in retrospect was the Church wrong in that?

GBH: No I don’t think it was wrong. It things, [sic] various things happened in different periods. There’s a reason for them.

RB: What was the reason for that?

GBH: I don’t know what the reason was. But I know that we’ve rectified whatever may have appeared to be wrong at the time.

RB: Is it a problem for the Church that it still has a tag of being racist?

GBH: No I don’t think so. I don’t see that anywhere.

RB: At present women are not allowed to be priests in your Church. Why is that?

GBH: That’s right, because the Lord has put it that way. Now women have a very prominent place in this Church. They have their own organization. . . . And the women of that organization sit on Boards. . . . They counsel with us. . . . and if you ask them they’ll say we’re happy and we’re satisfied.

RB: They all say that?

GBH: Yes. All except a oh you’ll find a little handful one or two here and there, . . .

RB: You say the Lord has put it that way. What do you mean by that?

GBH: I mean that’s a part of His programme. Of course it is, yes.

RB: Is it possible that the rules could change in the future as the rules are on Blacks?

GBH: He could change them yes. If He were to change them that’s the only way it would happen.

RB: So you’d have to get a revelation?

GBH: Yes, But there’s no agitation for that. We don’t find it. Our women are happy. They’re satisfied.58

Hinckley’s interview certainly raises some interesting questions. If enough women campaigned for priesthood and enough public pressure were mounted against the LDS priesthood ban on women, would the LDS Church change its policy as it did on plural marriage and blacks?

Do the LDS Prophets Speak for God?

How does one reconcile over one hundred and eighty years of racial statements by LDS prophets and apostles with their claim of prophetic leadership? By insisting that past statements by their prophets were simply “speculation or opinions” they have clouded the issue of when their prophets speak for God. In the March 2012 Ensign, Dieter F. Uchtdorf, Second Counselor in the LDS First Presidency, instructed that they speak “throughout all time”:

Prophets are inspired teachers and are always special witnesses of Jesus Christ (see D&C 107:23). Prophets speak not only to the people of their time, but they also speak to people throughout all time. Their voices echo through the centuries as a testament of God’s will to His children.59

In the LDS Church manual Gospel Principles we read:

In addition to these four books of scripture [Bible, Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants and Pearl of Great Price], the inspired words of our living prophets become scripture to us. Their words come to us through conferences, the Liahona or Ensign magazine, and instructions to local priesthood leaders.60

One would naturally assume that an official statement issued by the First Presidency would constitute church doctrine that would be for “all time.” However, the current LDS position on blacks seems to be at odds with the 1949 statement of the First Presidency, where the ban on blacks was declared to be a “direct commandment from the Lord”:

The attitude of the church with reference to the Negroes remains as it has always stood. It is not a matter of the declaration of a policy but of direct commandment from the Lord on which is founded the doctrine of the Church from the days of its organization, to the effect that Negroes may become members of the Church but that they are not entitled to the priesthood at the present time. . . .

The position of the Church regarding the Negro may be understood when another doctrine of the Church is kept in mind, namely, that the conduct of spirits in the premortal existence has some determining effect upon the conditions and circumstances under which these spirits take on mortality and that while the details of this principle have not been made known, the mortality is a privilege that is given to those who maintain their first estate; and that the worth of the privilege is so great that spirits are willing to come to earth and take on bodies no matter what the handicap may be as to the kind of bodies they are to secure; and that among the handicaps, failure of the right to enjoy in mortality the blessings of the priesthood is a handicap which spirits are willing to assume in order that they might come to earth. . . .

Well, what about the removal of the curse? We know what the Lord has said in the Book of Mormon in regard to the Lamanites—they shall become a White and a delightsome people. I know of no scripture having to do with the removal of the curse from the Negro.63

But how is one to reconcile this 1949 statement by the LDS First Presidency with the recent church press release denouncing past leaders teachings on race as “speculation and opinion”? Are press releases now to be considered more “official” than a statement by the LDS First Presidency?

The LDS Church emphasizes that the members are to follow the “living prophets” as opposed to their dead prophets. However, they continually quote past prophets when it suits their purpose. In 2010 two General Authorities of the LDS Church62 reminded Mormons of President Ezra Taft Benson’s 1980 speech, “Fourteen Fundamentals in Following the Prophet,” where he stated that “The prophet will never lead the Church astray.”63

In an Opinion piece for the Salt Lake Tribune, Matthew L. Harris, associate professor and director of graduate studies in history at Colorado State University-Pueblo in Pueblo, Colorado, commented:

Brigham Young University religion professor Randy Bott had a bad day last week. His church rebuked him for teaching false doctrine, his colleagues scorned him, and dozens of pious Mormon bloggers called for his resignation. . . .

But did Bott teach false doctrine? Were his views incompatible with Mormon theology? If so, how did a man who gets paid to teach students at an LDS university about Mormon theology not understand this crucial theological point? . . .

Today’s church leaders say “we do not know why God denied blacks the priesthood,” but earlier leaders never made that claim. In fact, they made it very clear why blacks couldn’t hold the priesthood: God cursed them with the mark of Cain because they lacked moral purity in a pre-Earth life.

If such words make us wince, they didn’t have that effect on early church leaders. In the 19th and 20th centuries, the church was thoroughly awash in such teachings. . . .

Church officials now deny that they ever taught the divine-curse doctrine. “This folklore is not part of and never was taught as doctrine by the church,” LDS spokesman Mark Tuttle boldly declared in 2008 . . . The church reaffirmed this position in a recent press release, claiming that a few misguided leaders gave “some explanations” about the “origins of priesthood availability” that “do not represent church doctrine.”

And yet, the new official line cannot be reconciled with the hundreds, maybe thousands, of authoritative statements the church has made on the subject throughout its 182-year history. . . . LDS leaders would be well served to acknowledge this doctrine, apologize for it and move on. Until they have the courage to do that, more people like Bott will get their knuckles rapped, and more people will ask why the church sweeps its racial history under a rug.64

Sweeping past LDS leaders’ sermons on blacks “under a rug” is indeed the best that the LDS leadership has been able to do. Apostle Bruce R. McConkie’s speech of 1978 illustrates this very point:

I would like to say something about the new revelation relative to the priesthood going to those of all nations and races. . . . The gospel goes to various peoples and nations on a priority basis. . . . Not only is the gospel to go, on a priority basis and harmonious to a divine timetable, to one nation after another, but the whole history of God’s dealings with men on earth indicates that such has been the case in the past; it has been restricted and limited where many people are concerned. . . . With some minor exceptions, the gospel in [Christ’s] day went exclusively to Israel. The Lord had to give Peter the vision and revelation of the sheet coming down from heaven with the unclean meat on it, following which Cornelius sent the messenger to Peter to learn what he, Cornelius, and his gentle associates should do. . . . There have been these problems, and the Lord has permitted them to arise. There isn’t any question about that. We do not envision the whole reason and purpose behind all of it; we can only suppose and reason that it is on the basis of our premortal devotion and faith. . . . There are statements in our literature by the early Brethren which we have interpreted to mean that the Negroses would not receive the priesthood in mortality. I have said the same things, and people write me letters and say, “You said such and such, and how is it now that we do such and such?” And all I can say to that is that it is time disbelieving people repented and got in line and believed in a living, modern prophet.

Forget everything that I have said, or what President Brigham Young or President George Q. Cannon or whomsoever has said in days past that is contrary to the present revelation. We spoke with a limited understanding and without the light and knowledge that now has come into the world. . . .

It doesn’t make a particle of difference what anybody ever said about the Negro matter before the first day of June of this year, 1978. It is a new day and a new arrangement, and the Lord has now given the revelation that sheds light out into the world on this subject.65

A close reading of McConkie’s statement shows that he still believed the ban was appropriate until 1978 and that it was based on “our premortal devotion and faith.” In other words, the church was right about the curse on Cain and to restrict priesthood to blacks until they got the 1978 revelation. So the new revelation only ended the ban, it didn’t address the issue of the curse and black skin. In a 1998 interview for the Salt Lake Tribune, David Jackson, a black member of the LDS Church, explained:

“What [the 1978 revelation] doesn’t say is we’re no longer of the lineage of Cain, that we no longer did these things in pre-existence. It does not say we are not cursed with black skin.”66

BYU professor Eugene England was troubled in 1998 by the lingering racial teachings being passed on to future generations:

This is a good time to remind ourselves that most Mormons are still in denial about the ban, unwilling to talk in Church settings about it, and that some Mormons still believe that Blacks were cursed by descent from Cain through Ham. Even more believe that Blacks, as well as other non-white people, come color-coded into the world, their lineage and even their class a direct indication of failures in a previous life. . . . The majority of Mormons were clearly still racists in the 1960s . . . Sadly, some of that baggage is still with us. I check occasionally in classes at BYU and find that still, twenty years after the revelation, a majority of bright, well-educated Mormon students say they believe that Blacks are descendants of Cain and Ham and thereby cursed and that skin color is an indication of righteousness in the pre-mortial life. They tell me these ideas came from their parents or Seminary and Sunday School teachers, and they have never questioned them.67

William Lobdell, of the Los Angeles Times, observed:

In the not-too-distant past, the Mormon faithful were routinely taught that blacks were an inferior race, the color of their skin linked to curses from God recounted in Hebrew and Mormon scriptures. Besides being barred from the priesthood, black males couldn’t serve on missions or be married in the temple—though they could become church members and be baptized.

The Mormons’ historic position on race wasn’t much different from that of many other U.S. denominations; it just lasted longer. It took until 1978—14 years after the Civil Rights Act—before the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints lifted the ban following what leaders said was a revelation from God to make the priesthood available to “every faithful, worthy man.”

The new doctrine came without an apology or repudiation of the church’s past practice. . . .68

Until the LDS Church officially clarifies its doctrine of pre-existence and assignment to race, its old teachings will continue to haunt them and be handed down through the generations to come.

In contrast to these teachings, the first century Christians placed no restrictions on those of various races. In Acts 8:36-40, Philip baptized the Ethiopian man and placed no racial restrictions on him. Later in Acts we read that “God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him” (Acts. 10:34-35). Also, Paul wrote to the Christians in Galatia that “there is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus” (Galatians 3:28).

I often come across this scenario on Mormon Facebook Pages and other sites as I browse the internet: Self-proclaimed Mormon “apologists” using material from FAIR (Foundation for Apologetic Information and Research) to “prove” that critics of Mormonism are dead wrong about issues that the critics claim prove the LDS Church has manipulated or lied about its history. Case in point—Joseph Smith’s “prophecy” recorded in the History of the Church:

“I prophesied that the Saints would continue to suffer much affliction and would be driven to the Rocky Mountains, many would apostatize, others would be put to death by our persecutors or lose their lives in consequence of exposure or disease, and some of you will live to go and assist in making settlements and build cities and see the Saints become a mighty people in the midst of the Rocky Mountains.”

I. LDS CHALLENGING "ANTI-MORMONS"

On a Facebook Page titled “Challenging Anti-Mormon Apologetics,” I came across the following post:

LDS Honesty: Lying for the Lord … also says the following:

4. The famous Rocky Mountain Prophecy was a later addition to the official church history and not uttered by Joseph Smith as a prediction that the Mormons would inhabit the Salt Lake Valley. Despite the fact it is not authentic; the church presented it as such for more than a century. The “Rocky Mountain Prophecy” was added after the Mormons arrived in Utah. (The Changing World of Mormonism, p. 406) The church had no intentions of giving this information to members, in order to make their history appear more faith promoting.

Contemporary documentation says otherwise.

What is this “contemporary documentation” they speak of? If one pursues the FAIR link that the Facebook Page references, one comes upon the Mormon apologist response to the allegation that Smith’s famous Rocky Mountain “prophecy” was inserted into the Manuscript History of the Church at a later date. But has FAIR proved their point? Let’s start with their conclusion and work our way back. FAIR states,

To accept a “forgery” theory, we must accept that all of the people listed above who remembered Joseph speaking about the Rocky Mountains were lying or fabricating their experience. Furthermore, we must also accept that Joseph was sending explorers to the west with no real expectation of moving, and the discussion of heading west by both members and enemies was all idle talk.

This is a classic case of diverting the issue. Jerald and Sandra Tanner actually state in The Changing World of Mormonism,

In our book Falsification of Joseph Smith’s History, page 10, we stated concerning this prophecy:

There is some evidence that Joseph Smith considered going west to build his kingdom, but since we now know that the Mormon Historians actually compiled Joseph Smith’s History after his death and that they drew from many sources, we cannot help being suspicious of the authorship of this prophecy.

We see that the Tanners did indeed admit that “there is some evidence that Joseph Smith considered going west”, so why does FAIR state,

But, to claim that the account of him discussing and even prophesying a move to the west rests on nothing but “forgery” is to distort and ignore too many sources, from too broad a time period, over what is essentially a peripheral issue.

Notice how FAIR is trying to tie this specific “prophecy” to any discussion about the Rocky Mountains, and that any discussion of moving west by Smith must also be classed as spurious. Then, if they can show that Smith discussed it, this makes the Tanners deceptive. FAIR is trying to set their own criteria here, but this is not what the Tanners claim at all, as I have shown above.

The Tanner’s claim was not that Smith never discussed the Rocky Mountains, or moving the church west; it was that a prophecy was fabricated by Mormon Historians (most likely based on exaggerations by contemporary Mormons well after the fact) and placed in the official History of the Church as an actual specific statement (prophecy) made by Joseph Smith. The specific charge made by the Tanners was this,

Important evidence concerning Joseph Smith’s prophecy that the Mormons would come to the Rocky Mountains has recently come to light. This prophecy was reported to have been given in 1842 in Illinois. Joseph Smith himself was supposed to have said:

While the Deputy Grand-Master was engaged in giving the requisite instructions to the Master-elect, I had a conversation with a number of brethren . . . I prophesied that the Saints would continue to suffer much affliction and would be driven to the Rocky Mountains, many would apostatize, others would be put to death by our persecutors or lose their lives in consequence of exposure or disease, and some of you will live to go and assist in making settlements and build cities and see the Saints become a mighty people in the midst of the Rocky Mountains. (History of the Church, vol. 5, p. 85)\(^6\)

The Tanners go on to explain how they acquired a photograph of the very manuscript page of the History containing the prophecy. However, the prophecy has obviously been added to the manuscript at a later date. The Tanners continue,

... The situation, then, boils down to the following: we have two handwritten [history] manuscripts, books D-1 and D-2. Neither of these books were even started until after Joseph Smith's death [in 1844]. In both cases the prophecy concerning the Mormons coming to the Rocky Mountains was interpolated in a smaller handwriting. From this evidence we can reach only one conclusion: the famous "Rocky Mountain Prophecy" is not authentic.\(^7\)

FAIR singles out both One Nation Under Gods, by Richard Abanes, and Jerald and Sandra Tanner's book The Changing World of Mormonism, (and since they imply that Richard Abanes probably got his information from the Tanners I will focus on the argument made in Changing World). FAIR makes these points of criticism:

Jerald and Sandra Tanner claim that a prophecy from Joseph about the Saints' move to the Rocky Mountains was forged after the fact and inserted into the History of the Church. They provide the following sources for this claim:

- History of the Church 5:85.
- Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, p.469
- Davis Bitton, “Joseph Smith in the Mormon Folk Memory,” The John Whitmer address, delivered at the Second Annual Meeting of the John Whitmer Historical Association, Lamoni, Iowa, September 28, 1974, unpublished manuscript, p.16 [This article is now available in “Joseph Smith in the Mormon Folk Memory,” in Restoration Studies, ed. Maurice L. Draper, vol. 1, (Independence, Missouri, 1980).]\(^8\)

FAIR concludes, “This use of sources is dishonest and misleading.”

II. UN -FAIR?

FAIR maintains that the Tanner’s use of these sources are “dishonest” and “misleading.” Let’s take this point by point and see if that is the case. FAIR states,

None of these sources support the argument:

The BYU Studies article from 1971 is Dean Jessee’s account of the authorship of the History of the Church. It says nothing about adding a “Rocky Mountain Prophecy,” and the Tanners neglect to provide the perspective on authorship practices in 19th century history that Jessee provides. They thus hide the material that answers their objection. Readers can fortunately access these ideas on the wiki.\(^9\)

Can we point out that FAIR doesn’t explain that the History of the Church still retains Joseph Smith’s name as author and it doesn’t explain how the history was compiled from other people’s diaries? And they must have missed the Tanners when they explained, “... we now know that the Mormon Historians actually compiled Joseph Smith’s History after his death and that they drew from many sources . . .” Do all the Mormon “Authorities” who quote this “prophecy” from the History bother to explain the background behind it, or that in using it this way they tout Smith’s prophetic powers as though he had actually penned those lines? But the real question that FAIR doesn’t address about the quote from Jessee is why the Tanners used it. Not only does FAIR not explain this, they don’t even offer a link or internet address to the book! They don’t even bother to quote what the Tanners said! Here is the Tanner’s explanation:

We are now happy to announce that a photograph of the portion of the original handwritten manuscript containing this ‘prophecy’ has been located at the Visitor Center in Nauvoo, Illinois. Wesley P. Walters of Marissa, Illinois, has sent us a photograph of this page. . . . This photograph is taken from “Joseph Smith’s Manuscript History,” Book D-1, page 1362.

An examination of the photograph revealed that the part concerning the Mormons becoming “a mighty people in the midst of the Rocky Mountains” was cramped between the lines of the text in a much smaller handwriting. This indicated that the famous prophecy had been added to the manuscript sometime after this page had originally been written. When we published an enlarged edition of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? we stated that “Dean C. Jessee’s study proves that this prophecy could not have been written in “Joseph Smith’s Manuscript History” until at least a year after Joseph Smith’s death. He shows that page 1362 of the Manuscript History—the page containing the prophecy—was not even written until July 4, 1845!

We reasoned that if the page was not written until July 4, 1845, then it was likely that the interpolation containing the prophecy was not added until after the Mormons came to Utah. We have recently found new evidence which further undermines the authenticity of this prophecy. Fortunately, in 1845 Brigham Young had ordered the scribes to make a “duplicate handwritten copy of the History” (Brigham Young University Studies, Summer 1971, p. 469). We examined this second manuscript, Book D-2, p. 2, and found that the “Rocky Mountain Prophecy” was written in very small handwriting between the lines. In other words, it was obviously added at a later time to this manuscript. 10

So the reason that the Tanners quoted Jessee from his 1971 article, was to prove that the Manuscript History and the duplicate weren’t written until 1845, a year after Smith died, and that the prophecy was added even later than that. The Tanners then quote an address by assistant LDS historian Davis Bitton where he discusses the absence of a contemporary source for the prophecy. 11 They also included a photo (in their on-line version of the book) of the page in question from the Manuscript History [see photo on the following page of this newsletter]. This photo absolutely supports the argument and FAIR doesn’t deal with the Manuscript History addition.

FAIR is not playing fair because they are not telling you why the Tanners used the BYU Studies source. And they do not discuss Bitton’s acknowledgment that “no such prophecy in the handwriting of Joseph Smith or published during the Prophet’s lifetime” exists. How many Mormons are going to go to the trouble of reading why the Tanners used the BYU Studies source? Especially when FAIR doesn’t quote them. FAIR then goes to the Davis Bitton source and states,

Davis Bitton’s article specifically rejects the Tanners’ claim:

Two errors have been made regarding this Rocky Mountains prophecy. The first is to reject it out of hand as a later invention of the Utah Mormons. There is enough discussion of possible westward moves during the later Nauvoo period to think that Joseph Smith, in one of his prophetic moods, might well have said something of the sort. The second error, even more serious, is to seize upon these fragments as the basis for concluding that Joseph knew exactly what the future held in store for the Saints down to every last detail. Like the constitution-by-a-thread prophecy, the Rocky Mountains prophecy probably had a basis in an actual statement. The two prophecies are alike, too, in the fact that they were extremely popular later on when they served the needs of the Saints for encouragement. 12

First, the Tanners did not “reject it out of hand as a later invention,” they show credible evidence that it was indeed added later. Second, a statement that one is thinking about moving west someday, or sending out exploration parties, is far different from prophesying that one will, with specific details about what happens before and after. Thirdly, (and most important) it is the Mormons that are “seizing upon these fragments as the basis for concluding that Joseph knew exactly what the future held in store for the Saints down to every last detail,” and that is why this is not a “peripheral issue.” Here is a little more of the Tanner’s use of Davis Bitton’s article that FAIR doesn’t quote,

“The situation, then, boils down to the following: we have two handwritten manuscripts, books D-1 and D-2. Neither of these books were even started until after Joseph Smith’s death. In both cases the prophecy concerning the Mormons going to the Rocky Mountains was interpolated in a smaller handwriting. From this evidence we can reach only one conclusion: the famous “Rocky Mountain Prophecy” is not authentic. The church historical department has Joseph Smith’s diary for 1842-43, but the first entry does not appear until December 21—some four months after the prophecy was supposed to have been given. Mormon scholars have been unable to come up with anything to support the authenticity of this prophecy.

The Tanner’s argument continues,

Davis Bitton, an assistant church historian, has written almost five pages concerning this matter. He frankly states that “there is no such prophecy in the handwriting of Joseph Smith or published during the Prophet’s lifetime, but it was referred to in general terms in 1846 during the trek west. After the arrival in the Salt Lake Valley the prophecy was frequently cited and became more specific as time went on” (“Joseph Smith in the Mormon Folk Memory,” The John Whitmer Address, delivered at the Second Annual Meeting of the John Whitmer Historical Association, Lamoni, Iowa, September 28, 1974, unpublished manuscript, p. 16).

Davis Bitton goes on to state that “The manuscript history covering this period was written in 1845....” This is, of course, a year after Joseph Smith’s death. Mr. Bitton then admits that the prophecy is an “insertion” which was added into the manuscript as “an afterthought” (p. 18). Although Davis Bitton cannot find any real evidence that Joseph Smith made the famous “Rocky Mountain Prophecy,” he does feel that there was “a time when something like this might have been said by Joseph Smith with considerable plausibility. Anytime during the last four years of his life,.... the Prophet had good reason to consider possibilities for relocation. It can be demonstrated that he considered the possibility of settling in Oregon (or on Vancouver Island). He was attempting to negotiate some kind of colonization venture in Texas ...” (p. 17).

10 Changing World, pp. 405-406.
This portion of the manuscript history was compiled in 1845. The Rocky Mountain Prophecy, the smaller handwriting at the bottom of the page, was added after 1845.
Mr. Bitton admits that other changes were made in Joseph Smith’s documents to support the idea that he knew the Mormons would come to the Rocky Mountains:

And in February 1844 the Prophet was organizing an exploring expedition to go to the West. There are some interesting changes in the way the description of this expedition was written by Willard Richards, secretary of Joseph Smith at the time, and the later revisions. The original, handwritten version reads: “Met with the Twelve in the assembly room concerning the Oregon Expedition.” This has been modified to read “the Oregon and California Exploring Expedition.” Continuing, the Richards manuscript reads, “I told them I wanted an exposition of all that country,”—which has been changed to “exploration of all that mountain country.” There are other such changes that make one suspect that the later compilers of the history, notably George A. Smith and his assistants in the 1850s, were determined to have Joseph Smith contemplating the precise location where the Saints had by then settled. Oregon would not do; Oregon and California as then defined at least included the Rocky Mountains. If the Prophet could be made to say “mountain country” instead of just “country,” it would appear that he clearly had in mind the future history of his followers (pp. 17-18).13

If we go by what FAIR states, we have Bitton refuting himself! They have to perpetuate an outright lie to make their point (that Bitton’s article specifically rejects the Tanner’s argument). Bitton’s article in no way rejects the Tanner’s claim that the specific prophecy, recorded in the History of the Church was an insertion after the fact. It was, and Bitton agrees that it was, stating that “there is no such prophecy in the handwriting of Joseph Smith or published during the Prophet’s lifetime.” The Tanners also reveal Bitton’s speculation that the prophecy might be based on something Smith might have said. But the bottom line is Smith didn’t say those specific words, and there is no proof that he did. Is FAIR’s claim that the Tanner’s use of Bitton is “dishonest”? We see that it is not, and that the Tanners are more than fair, admitting that Smith “considered going west to build his kingdom.”

III. FAIR’S EVIDENCE IS NO EVIDENCE

FAIR also attacks the Tanners and Richard Abanes for the use of the History of the Church source. FAIR quotes a footnote by B. H. Roberts, where he supports the authenticity of the “prophecy” with a quote by Anson Call. But is the Anson Call reference used by Roberts and FAIR credible?

As “evidence” FAIR writes,

The prophecy source is the biography of Anson Call, in August 1842. The relevant section reads as follows:

“A block schoolhouse had been prepared with shade in front, under which was a barrel of ice water. Judge Adams, the highest Masonic authority in the State of Illinois, had been sent there to organize this lodge. He, Hyrum Smith and J. C. Bennett, being high Masons, went into the house to perform some ceremonies which the others were not entitled to witness. These, including Joseph Smith, remained under the bowery. Joseph as he was tasting the cold water, warned the brethren not to be too free with it. With the tumbler still in his hand, he prophesied that the Saints would yet go to the Rocky Mountains, and said he, ‘This water tastes much like that of the crystal streams that are running from the snow-capped mountains. I had before seen him in a vision, and now saw, while he was talking, his countenance change to white, not the deadly white of a bloodless face, but a living, brilliant white. He seemed absorbed in gazing upon something at a great distance and said, ‘I am gazing upon the valleys of those mountains.’

...This was followed by a vivid description of the scenery of these mountains, as I have since become acquainted with it. Pointing to Shadrach Roundy and others, he said: ‘There are some men here who shall do a great work in that land.’ Pointing to me, he said, ‘There is Anson, he shall go and shall assist in building up cities from one end of the country to the other, and you, rather extending the idea to all those he had spoken of, shall perform as great a work as has been done by man, so that the nations of the earth shall be astonished, and many of them will be gathered in that land and assist in building cities and temples, and Israel shall be made to rejoice.’... (Tullidge’s Histories, Vol. I. History of Northern Utah, and Southern Idaho.—Biographical Supplement, p. 271)

Thus, the accusation must be not only that the Church decided to “forge” a prophecy by Joseph, but that Anson Call did as well. Can we assess how likely these claims are?14

We certainly can assess them, because FAIR is not being fair here either. The first thing they want you to believe is that the Anson Call source is from “August 1842.” There are all kinds of problems with this, which B. H. Roberts mentions in that History of the Church footnote that FAIR quotes. Here are some of the problems that Roberts encountered,

It is thought important that the following statement from a biography of Anson Call, by Edward Tullidge, should be made part of the history of this prophetic incident, as doubtless the testimony of Brother Cali relates to the same incident as that described in the Prophet’s text of the History, notwithstanding some confusion of dates that exists in the Call testimony. It will be seen that the Prophet fixes the date of his prophecy on Saturday, the 6th of August, 1842. In Whitney’s History of Utah, Vol. IV.—(Biographical section of the history, p. 143), the date on which Call heard the prophecy, is given as the 8th of August, 1842. While in Tullidge’s biography of Call the date is given as the 14th of July, 1843, evidently an error. There is no entry in the Prophet’s journal for the 8th of August, 1842, and the entries for the 8th of August, 1843, and the 14th of

14 FAIR, Criticism—One Nation.
July, 1843, relate to matters of quite a different character. Tullidge, in relating Anson Call’s recollection of the incident also says that J. C. Bennett was present on the occasion, which must also be an error, as the rupture between Bennett and the Church and its authorities occurred and he had left Nauvoo previous to the 6th of August, 1842. In the Call statement as published by Tullidge, the name of Mr. Adams, the Deputy Grand Master Mason in charge of the ceremonies, is given as George, it should be James.

Tullidge’s biography of Call was written in 1889. So when did Call actually first write down the prophecy he claimed that Smith made? Certainly not when it is claimed to have happened (August 1842), since he is wrong about so many details. Notice that even in his notes, Roberts tries to make it seem as if Smith wrote the prophecy and put it in his history himself.

It seems that Anson Call kept a journal, but the prophecy is not found there. He wrote an autobiography taken from his journals that ended at the year 1839. He later wrote what he called a “Life Sketch” which included his recollection of Smith’s prophecy. However, his account is obviously written well after the fact, because of the problems with the historical data that B. H. Roberts notes in his History of the Church footnote. Also, his journal ends when Smith escaped from Liberty Jail in 1839! The “prophecy” was obviously written later, and appears to be unfinished in the copy that Alice Burton had in her possession because it breaks off mid sentence near the end.

FAIR’s sarcastic comment that Call “forged” his “prophecy,” is the most realistic conclusion, because the historical details don’t line up with the facts.

Since FAIR has no evidence that there was a specific Rocky Mountain prophecy uttered by Smith that was recorded in his lifetime, they choose to befuddle the issue with a series of quotes that they claim bolster the premise that there was probably a prophecy. Most of these are remembrances of Mormon authorities long after the fact—which prove nothing at all.

One interesting quote they use is from Wilford Woodruff’s Journal. On November 24, 1878, Woodruff wrote on the “Inside Front Cover Fly Sheet” of one of his Journals some “true sayings” of the “Prophet Joseph” that he says he copied from Philo Dibble’s “record.” These “true sayings” are supposedly Dibble’s recollection of Smith’s last address before the Nauvoo Legion. It is obvious from a quick reading that these are not journal entries from the period, or even written on those dates or shortly after the events because, like Call’s account, they are so full of inaccuracies.

Dibble first gives the date of the 22 of June, 1844, and says that Smith “called us [The Nauvoo Legion] out in order and to my astonishment Counselled us to give up our arms” and then prophesied to them that they would “gather many people into the fastness of the Rocky Mountains as a centre for the Gathering of the people.” He then thanked them, dismissed them and told them to “take care of your wives, children and homes.” But the speech was actually given on June 18, and the Legion did not give up their arms until June 24.

Dibble then writes that “on the 23d day of June 1844” Smith, dressed in his General’s uniform, gave his last speech to the Nauvoo Legion. If he had dismissed them the day before, (as Dibble attests) and said his obvious farewell (“take care of your wives, children and homes”) why would he give them a “last speech” the next day? Also, Dibble’s date of June 23, 1844, for the “last speech” of Smith before the Nauvoo Legion is incorrect. Dibble uses parts of Smith’s speech as recorded by those who were there and later published in the History of the Church, and then has Smith saying, . . . for you will yet be called upon to go forth and Call upon the freeman from Main to gather themselves to gather to the Rocky Mountains and the red man from the west, and all people from the North and from the South, and from the East to go to the west to establish themselves in there strong holds in their gathering places, and there you will gather the red Man to their center from their scattered and dispersed situation to become the strong arm of Jehovah who will be a strong Bulwark of Protection from your foes . . .

With the confusion as to dates it is obviously Dibble’s later recollections.

After quoting numerous people’s recollections of Smith mentioning a move to the Rocky Mountains, FAIR concludes with,

To accept a “forgery” theory, we must accept that all of the people listed above who remembered Joseph speaking about the Rocky Mountains were lying or fabricating their experience. . . . It could be, of course, that Anson Call forged his account, and all the Church leaders and members lied about remembering Joseph speak about the matter. But why then appeal to “many of you” remembering Joseph speaking about it? Why not claim it was a private, secret teaching given to the apostles—for, they certainly also reported these. If the claim was fraudulent, why risk exposure?

Or, the story could have started after the Saints reached the valley, and simply grown in the telling with members “remembering” the story as it was retold to them. But, the contemporary evidence would seem to argue against this, and witnesses often mentioned how struck they were by Joseph’s remarks. They also described him discussing this idea in a variety of setting, which argues against an accumulated “folklore.”

20 FAIR, Criticism—One Nation.
FAIR thinks it “strange to see critics argue that Joseph would not prophesy about this,” because they claim that critics say he “was always larding his ideas with prophetic pronouncement,” and I agree. He did. I will also show that the accumulated “folklore” argument fits the evidence perfectly.

Again we see FAIR combining two different issues and tying them together; implying if the prophecy itself was fraudulent that Smith’s discussing the matter must also be based on something “fraudulent.” The Tanners do not say that Smith never spoke about it, they admit that he did. The Tanner’s “evidence” for the invention of the specific prophecy is legitimate though, while FAIR’s evidence doesn’t appear to be any evidence at all.

Also, Call’s appeal to “many of you” was made because Smith did in fact make vague statements about the west. This obviously grew into a full blown “folklore” prophecy as did the story about Brigham Young transforming into Joseph Smith while he was making the case for claiming leadership of the Church.

I do agree with one point that FAIR makes: that Smith “discussed moving to the west several times, and likely prophesied about it.” Given the Mormons’ history of being driven out of every place they settled in, it sure wouldn’t be bad odds to do so and get that right. But it wasn’t this particular “prophecy” given in those words on that date; the details are completely different, and he made other “prophecies” about the west and Nauvoo that were completely false. This makes Smith a good guesser, but a bad prophet.

IV. THE REAL ISSUE

What is the real issue that the Tanners and Richard Abanes and others are getting at here? It is this: there were changes made in Joseph Smith’s History after the fact and written in as his actual words, without any contemporary documents to authenticate them. As B. H. Roberts writes in New Witnesses for God,

At that date, August 6th, 1842, the Rocky Mountains seemed like a country afar off to the people of Illinois. The Missouri River was the extreme frontiers of the United States. All beyond that was well nigh an unexplored wilderness filled with savages. The church was fairly settled at Nauvoo, the state authorities were apparently very friendly, the future of the Saints in Illinois seemed propitious. Yet in the midst of all these favorable circumstances the Prophet predicted much affliction for some of the Saints, death from persecution for others, apostasy for many, and for the great body of the church an exodus to the Rocky Mountains, where some of those present who were listening to the prediction, should live to assist in making settlements and building cities in the Rocky Mountains where they would see the Saints become a mighty people.

There can be no question as to the reality of these two predictions, the one of March, 1831, and the other of August, 1842, or of their being of a character to test the divine inspiration of him who uttered them. That they were proclaimed some years before the events predicted in them began to be fulfilled, or even there was any thought or prospect of such events taking place, is well known; that the latter prophecy has been fulfilled to the uttermost, the whole history of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints from August, 1842, until now witnesses. The Saints suffered many afflictions in Illinois. Their homes, fields, stacks of grain, stock and other property were destroyed; their prophets and a number of others were killed outright by mob violence; many more perished from exposure and disease occasioned by being driven from their homes at an inclement season of the year. In those trying times, following the martyrdom of the Prophet and the expulsion from Nauvoo, many turned away from the faith, and it is too generally known to need comment, that the great body of the church made its way to the Rocky Mountains, where cities, towns and villages have been founded, the wilderness subdued, and the Saints are fast becoming a mighty people.

Even knowing the problems with Call’s recollection of Smith’s “prophecy,” Roberts still insists that “the latter prophecy has been fulfilled to the uttermost,” and touts it as a test of “the divine inspiration of him who uttered them.” In 1891 Assistant Church Historian Andrew Jenson repeats the “prophecy” to a group of students,

“I need spend no time to prove the fulfilment of this remarkable prophecy. All of you who are present in this hall tonight can testify to its literal fulfilment. The Latter-day Saints have indeed become a mighty people in these mountains, numbering as they do now about two hundred thousand souls, organized into thirty-two stakes of Zion, or nearly five hundred wards and branches; and this does not include the Saints in Mexico and Canada. It is also a matter of history that the Saints, for years after the prediction was uttered, continued to suffer persecution and affliction from their enemies; that many apostatized, while others, who proved faithful and true to their covenants, were put to death for conscience’ sake, and the remainder were driven by a ruthless mob from the beautiful city of Nauvoo into the western wilderness in the year 1846.

Apostle Erastus Snow would add to the folklore in 1916:

“Joseph Smith, when he uttered this prophecy, when he beheld this vision, was standing upon the banks of the Mississippi River, fifteen hundred miles from where we now are. Yet he saw the Rocky Mountains, and the crystal streams flowing from yonder canyons, and I doubt not that if he had led his people to this land, as he once purposed doing, he would have recognized it as a familiar scene, having beheld it in vision, by the seeric gift, before he saw it with the natural eye. But the Prophet was not destined to fulfill his own prediction; his martyrdom prevented; and the Lord raised up another mighty man to carry out the project, to become the founder of Utah, and the redeemer of the Great American Desert.”

On the Church’s official site, under “Teachings of the Presidents of the Church: Joseph Smith” they are still peddling the folklore,

“The Prophet was well aware that he and all of the Saints living in Nauvoo were in an increasingly dangerous situation. As Nauvoo grew larger, some of the people who lived in the area began to fear the growing political and economic power of the Saints, and mobs began again to harass them. The Prophet was in particular danger, for authorities from Missouri made repeated efforts to capture him, and apostates from the Church became increasingly hostile in their efforts to destroy him. On August 6, 1842, the Prophet declared that the time would come when Church members would be forced to leave Nauvoo:

“I prophesied that the Saints would continue to suffer much affliction and would be driven to the Rocky Mountains, many would apostatize, others would be put to death by our persecutors or lose their lives in consequence of exposure or disease, and some of you will live to go and assist in making settlements and build cities and see the Saints become a mighty people in the midst of the Rocky Mountains.”

The footnotes they give for the quote references the same interpolated manuscript that the Tanners expose as having been added after the fact:

“History of the Church, 5:85; from “History of the Church” (manuscript), book D-1, p. 1362, Church Archives, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Salt Lake City, Utah.”

In July of 1997, LDS Apostle M. Russell Ballard once again references the same spurious prophecy in a New Era article,

“The pioneer exodus from Nauvoo, Illinois, began on February 4, 1846. Nearly four years earlier, in August of 1842, the Prophet Joseph Smith shared his foreknowledge of the trek west: ‘I prophesied that the Saints would continue to suffer much affliction and would be driven to the Rocky Mountains, many would apostatize, others would be put to death by our persecutors or lose their lives in consequence of exposure or disease, and some [would live to] build cities and see the Saints become a mighty people in the midst of the Rocky Mountains’.”

The impression the Church today gives is not that this “prophecy” is a conglomeration of various and sundry statements by Smith, or even an amalgamation of them crafted into a coherent “prophecy,” but a valid, specific statement uttered by Smith on a particular day and inserted by Smith himself into his own history. What the evidence shows is that this is not only an interpolation, but it is an insertion of something that there is no evidence that Smith ever said in those precise words, on that particular day. The Tanners are absolutely correct in their use of sources to prove this, and their conclusion that this “prophecy” is “not authentic.”

CONCLUSION

FAIR boasts on their site:

“FAIR has been defending The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints online since 1997. Our mission is to provide well-researched answers to challenging questions within a faithful context.”

However, as we have seen, their methods are shoddy and deceptive. If one were to systematically go through each of their reviews, one can come to the same conclusion for the majority of their efforts. Their vilification of the Tanners as “dishonest” is especially disturbing, for as we see by the evidence from this one instance, the Tanners are vindicated by the facts, and it is FAIR who is shown to be dishonest and misleading.

You should know that you among other brave souls have been instrumental in my transition out of mormonism. A convert of 2 yrs, I ALWAYS had reservations but shelved them. . . . Talk about buyer’s remorse! . . . Know that you helped me keep my sanity and also my faith in GOD after the devastation and mostly disappointment at having been taken down the wrong road. Still I feel these past 2 years were not wasted and feel a new found sense of purpose in being able to share THE GOOD NEWS.

Oct. 2011: I was a mormon for 42 years, served a mission, married in the temple, and was active and held multiple callings, it wasn’t until 6 or 7 years ago when I started questioning things in the history that got me investigating the facts.

Your books I would find in the Library’s in southeast Idaho and Northern Utah and i would read and re-read them check the references to see if they had any validity and sure enough you guys were not lying. To make a long story short I left the church in 2008 and found the Lord in 2009 and am now a Christian!

Oct. 2011: I was raised a Mormon and left the LDS church many years ago . . . I have not taken my name off of the LDS church membership but with the help of your web site I will attempt to do so soon.
Oct. 2011: My nephew (19) has just been baptized into the Mormon church. I came across your interview with John Ankerberg on You Tube. Wow! You are amazing! . . . Again, thank you for your courage, thoroughness, and kindness in your approach.

Oct. 2011: I support the cause for truth you are in. For a church that purports the truth and expects honesty from it’s members, you would think you could expect honesty and the truth from it. Not so easy!! I have been a member for almost 50 yrs. It is only in the last few yrs. that I have found out much of the real history.

Nov. 2011: Several years ago, as an active Bishop, your website was one of the key sources of truth, which led us to research more deeply our own beliefs. . . . Thank you so much for your faithful witness.

Nov. 2011: I just wanted to thank dear Mrs. Sandra Tanner again for visiting with me and my husband this weekend. . . . My husband and I have had such a long journey out of Mormonism. We were both oldest children of old Mormon families. Sandra has helped us to discard the heresies of Mormonism.

Dec. 2011: It is interesting that you people condemn the LDS Church and call them a false cult. . . . I am going to vacate the evangelical sphere of Christianity and become LDS. . . . I have forgiven all those . . . who have caused me hurt and prayer that they too will receive a testimony of the validity of the [LDS] gospel.

Dec. 2011: Thank you for helping me come out of Mormonism at age 55 in 2005. I am so much happier and now I have the grace that Joseph Smith took out of the supposedly “restored” gospel.

Dec. 2011: We discovered you when our daughter started dating a Mormon . . . [They] have broken up their relationship because she would not convert. She actually made it through missionary lesson 3 and stopped. [She] said that Bible verses kept coming to her mind and felt they were from God.

Dec. 2011: I admire you intensely and respect the work you’ve done. I left the church 3 weeks ago and am joyful beyond words. It took way too long to admit what I had known all along, but now that I have that courage my life is better in every way.

Dec. 2011: I have spent six years investigating the LDS Church comparing their material with yours and other ministries and have found that many of the facts presented by evangelicals are filled with erroneous lies and mis-quotes concerning LDS doctrines and what their apostles really meant.

Jan. 2012: Listened to your interview w/Doris Hanson [“Polygamy: What Love is This?” TV show] last night and really enjoyed it, especially your calm, cool and collected answers to the callers. You’re awesome! I want to meet you in person my next trek to SLC as I’ve “righteousy” avoided you my whole life as a lifelong [LDS] church member! lol

Jan. 2012: Sandra, someone posted on Craig’s’s list that he wanted to talk to a believing inactive mormon as himself. I wrote and told him that i was an ex mormon and he started preaching to me. I told him to check out UTLM.ORG. He said that he did not believe anything those Tanners said. I gave up on him; but about 6 months later he wrote to me and said that he got curious about UTLM and started reading. Now he has left the mormon church for Biblical christianity. All praise be to God who works through us for his divine purposes.

Jan. 2012: Thank you for this website I’m a Christian . . . I have a friend who is a Mormon, after listening to some things she talked about and doing my own research to include finding some youtubes by Sandra Tanner, I was blown away . . . this process has me looking deeper into my faith and reconnecting with Jesus Christ my Lord Savior. I am praying and reading my Bible with such thirst I pray it will never end. Thanks again for all your research I pray that my friend will find the love of Jesus Christ.

Jan. 2012: Awesome website information thanks. I’ve been meeting with Mormon Missionaries over the last 4 weeks (3 times a week) and I’m due to get baptized soon in the Mormon Church. I have had serious doubts about the teaching from the Missionaries as I have felt like something isn’t right. So I’ve been googling ‘ex mormon’ websites and came across yours. The articles are really helpful thanks. I was raised in a Christian home and the [LDS] Missionaries said that the Book of Mormon and their faith does not contradict the bible. However, through reading your material, I have found that there are huge contradictions. I would never have known about all this strange teaching, if there wasn’t great website information like yours available. I feel like the Mormons deceived me and were dishonest in their dealings with me by failing to disclose the contradictions of their faith with the Bible. But I am grateful that I have learned now before I encountered huge disappointment and hurt. Thanks.

Jan. 2012: Hi, I’m a convert to the LDS church and I know there are many things written and said about Mormons that are taken out of context, distorted, and just plain untrue. I read all this stuff over 30 years ago when I was first investigating the Church! . . . Well I read all this anti-Mormon stuff, that I found in Christian bookstores, of all places! I just knew it wasn’t right. I finally found some correct information on the Church, studied, pondered and prayed for a year, went to church to see what it was like, then asked the missionaries over and I asked them more questions. I knew I couldn’t be a member of any other church. It has the fulness of the gospel and will bring you closer to Jesus Christ and the Bible than any other church!

Jan. 2012: I had a friend who was a Mormon for many years, who visited you at your bookstore while she was searching for the truth. She was impressed with your kindness, if not at the time with the truth that you stood for. I was witnessing with another Christian friend, to her, for the last 11 or so years. She got saved recently, and is now attending a Christian church . . . . Thank you for your part in being a Christian witness to her during her search for the truth.
Jan. 2012: [LDS man] It is always interesting to read the material that you and your minions dig up on these topics to try to discredit the LDS church and I admire your zeal and commitment to your faith. . . . As LDS, we love Christ as much as you do and we walk in His ways and have his image engraven upon our countenances. . . . On the matter of slavery and bond people, that is a matter well documented right in the Holy Bible and supported by it. . . . The LDS church is not the church of the devil so save your breath.

Jan. 2012: I was a mormon for 27 years, sealed in the church. . . . I am now divorced. I asked my husband what if I didn’t go to church anymore, he said we would have to part ways. . . . My sister told me about you and I watch you on YouTube. I understood everything you where talking about, I tell people how I felt about living that life and they don’t get it. Thank you for caring and making me feel okay and that I’m not crazy.

Jan 2012: Thanks so much for your years of work exposing Mormonism. You played a big part in my exit 9 years ago. All the best to you!!

Jan. 2012: Oh come on—no matter what I say, you will disagree with it and you know it. You twist and distort things and try to make Mormons look all wrong, etc. And it’s because you aren’t in the church and you don’t have a testimony. . . . I’ve been on enough anti-Mormon and ex-Mormon videos and message boards to know how this works. Just remember, you don’t have a testimony so you are purposely twisting and distorting things. It doesn’t not mean the church isn’t true!

Feb. 2012: I just read your article on [Joseph Smith’s] White Horse Prophecy. Your slant on the story is that it would be a bad thing for an LDS leader to save our US Constitution. I don’t know what you think today (2012), but it seems pretty clear to me that most, if not all of the statements that you cite from previous LDS leaders are coming true.

Feb. 2012: Praises to the Lord for [the John Ankerberg TV] shows with Brigham Young’s granddaughter & former BYU professors! I’ve prayed for 12 years that the Lord would work on my son’s heart & he’d see the conflicts between the Bible and the Mormon church. As a result of watching your shows my son has left the Mormon church after being conflicted about their teachings for over 2 years.

Feb. 2012: I tried to be a Mormon for about 9 months when I was much younger. It just didn’t work out (for obvious reasons!) and I contacted you folks for info on getting my name out of their rolls. I was able to achieve my goal with y’alls help, thank you so much!

March 2012: I absolutely love your newsletters. They are wonderfully reaffirming to an exmo like me. There are no words to describe my gratitude to you for your efforts at exposing the truth about the whole mormon mess.

Did Brigham Young Teach False Doctrine?

One of the founding principles of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints [the Mormon Church] is that there must be a living prophet at the head of the true church. Joseph Smith was designated as God’s “prophet, seer and revelator,” as have all the succeeding presidents of the LDS Church.¹

When Joseph Smith was killed by a mob while under arrest at Carthage, Illinois, in 1844, it left the Mormons with a leadership vacuum. While several men, mainly Sidney Rigdon and Brigham Young, vied for leadership, Smith had not left instructions on who was to be his successor. LDS historian Richard S. Van Wagoner explained:

Despite frequent kidnapping and assassination attempts, Joseph Smith established no firm policies regarding presidential succession in the event of his death. The resulting confusion threw the prophetic transition into turmoil. He simply had not expected to die at thirty-eight. Never given to full disclosure to any man or woman, the prophet’s public and private statements between 1834–44 suggested at least eight different methods for succession, each pointing to different successors with some claims to validity.²

After much debate, Brigham Young was able to convince the majority of the leaders to turn the control of the church over to the twelve apostles, of which he was head. Later he was formally installed as the president of the LDS Church in 1847.³

John Turner, in his new book, Brigham Young: Pioneer Prophet, gave this overview of Young’s leadership:

After the founding prophet’s murder Brigham Young gathered the largest portion of Smith’s followers under his leadership, held them together amid persecution and exile, and planted the Mormon kingdom in what became Utah. Young was no less controversial than his predecessor, and non-Mormons routinely accused him of ecclesiastical tyranny, licentiousness, and even murder.⁴

Further on Turner observes:

Within a Protestant America dedicated to monogamy, monotheism, and Jacksonian democracy, Young advocated the plurality of wives, a plurality of gods, and a unity of power. Given the scope of his vision and the novelty of his beliefs, it is not surprising that he generated intense controversy and opposition. Young’s siege mentality, forged in the crucible of anti-Mormon persecution, led him to demonize his enemies, employ violent rhetoric, and condone murders. A leader who understood himself as following in the footsteps of the ancient biblical patriarchs could not readily function within the U.S. territorial system. Convinced that Young—Utah’s [territorial] governor as of 1857—was leading a rebellion against the U.S. government, President James Buchanan sent an army to Utah with Young’s gubernatorial replacement. Young eventually learned to live with the presence of U.S. soldiers and officials, but in other ways he defended his kingdom with ever-greater desperation until the end of his life. In the end, Young’s ambitions for his church and himself were so great that he could at best bring them only partly to fruition.5

Young’s Sermons

Approximately 500 of Brigham Young’s sermons were recorded by a stenographer, more than 350 of which were printed in the Journal of Discourses, a 26-volume set published by the LDS Church.6 Many of his sermons were also published in the church-owned Deseret News. Young’s sermons were published during his lifetime, and he never issued any statement that they had been printed incorrectly. In fact, Brigham Young even went so far as to compare his published sermons with scripture. Preaching incorrectly. In fact, Brigham Young even went so far as to

I know just as well what to teach this people and just what to say to them and what to do in order to bring them into the celestial kingdom. . . . I have never yet preached a sermon and sent it out to the children of men, that they may not call Scripture. Let me have the privilege of correcting a sermon, and it is as good Scripture as they deserve. The people have the oracles of God continually.7

Later that same year Young stated:

Brother Orson Hyde referred to a few who complained about not getting revelations . . . I say now, when they [Young’s sermons] are copied and approved by me they are as good Scripture as is couched in this Bible . . . .8

On another occasion Brigham Young preached:

“If there is an Elder here, or any member of this Church, called the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, who can bring up the first idea, the first sentence that I have delivered to the people as counsel that is wrong, I really wish they would do it; but they cannot do it, for the simple reason that I have never given counsel that is wrong; this is the reason.”9

Yet it is common to have a Mormon dismiss doctrinal statements by Brigham Young and other past prophets. Today the church leaders send a mixed message when they admonish the Mormons to follow the living prophet (as opposed to past prophets) and then quote past prophets to make their point. For example, speaking at the October 2010 LDS Conference, Claudio M. Costa, of the Presidency of the Seventy, preached on the necessity of following the words of the living prophet by quoting past prophets:

I testify to you that Joseph Smith is a prophet, and because I have received this answer from the Lord, I know that all of his successors are prophets too. What a great blessing it is to have prophets in our day! . . . In 1980, when President Ezra Taft Benson was serving as President of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, he gave a powerful message about obedience to the prophets at a BYU devotional in the Marriott Center. His great talk, titled “Fourteen Fundamentals in Following the Prophet,” touched my heart. It made me feel good that I had made the decision to follow the prophets for the rest of my life when I accepted baptism in the Lord’s true Church.

I would like to share with you some of the principles that President Benson taught:

“First: The prophet is the only man who speaks for the Lord in everything” (1980 Devotional Speeches of the Year [1981], 26). . . . We are counseled to “give heed unto all his words and commandments” (D&C 21:4). We also learn:

Again we learn from the living prophets. President Wilford Woodruff said: “The Lord will never permit me or any other man who stands as President of this Church to lead you astray. It is not in the programme. It is not in the mind of God. If I were to attempt that, the Lord would remove me out of my place, and so He will any other man who attempts to lead the children of men astray from the oracles of God and from their duty” (Official Declaration 1).10

Notice that Mr. Costa quoted two past prophets in his sermon to reinforce the importance of a “living prophet.”

5 Turner, Brigham Young, p. 4.
8 Ibid., vol. 13, p. 264.
When a Mormon is confronted with statements by past prophets that don’t agree with the current position of the church, he will often claim that we are to only heed the statements of the “living prophet.” However, LDS conference speakers and manuals repeatedly quote from their past prophets to support their point. In fact, starting in 1997, the church has yearly produced new manuals in a series called Teachings of Presidents of the Church, which covers the sermons of each of their past prophets.

In the introduction to the first manual of that series, entitled Teachings of Presidents of the Church: Brigham Young, we read:

The prophet Brigham Young taught the restored gospel of Jesus Christ in a basic, practical way . . . Though more than a century has now passed, his words are still fresh and appropriate for us today as we continue the work of building the kingdom of God. . . .

This book reflects the desire of the First Presidency and the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles to deepen the doctrinal understanding of Church members and to awaken within them a greater desire to know the things of God.11

However, as one studies the manual it becomes apparent that Young’s sermons have been carefully edited. Young repeatedly preached on such topics as Joseph Smith’s importance, polygamy, the Adam-God doctrine, blood atonement, and the ban on blacks holding the LDS priesthood. Yet, these subjects are not covered in the 1997 manual. In light of this, we will now explore some of Brigham Young’s more controversial sermons as they were originally printed.

JOSEPH SMITH

In the manual Teachings of Presidents of the Church: Brigham Young, is a quote from Brigham Young about the importance of Joseph Smith to the restoration of “the keys and power of the Priesthood of the Son of God.”12 When we go back to the original source of the quote we find that it is taken from a sermon where Young declared that Joseph Smith rules over the spirit world and that one must accept him in order to gain entrance into the Celestial Kingdom:

> Joseph Smith holds the keys of this last dispensation, . . . no man or woman in this dispensation will ever enter into the celestial kingdom of God without the consent of Joseph Smith. From the day that the Priesthood was taken from the earth to the winding-up scene of all things, every man and woman must have the certificate of Joseph Smith, junior, as a passport to their entrance into the mansion where God and Christ are—I with you and you with me. I cannot go there without his consent. He holds the keys of that kingdom for the last dispensation—the keys to rule in the spirit world; and he rules there triumphantly, for he gained full power and a glorious victory over the power of Satan while he was yet in the flesh, and was a martyr to his religion and to the name of Christ. . . . He reigns there [in the spirit world] as supreme a being in his sphere, capacity, and calling, as God does in heaven.13

On another occasion Young stated that anyone who rejects Joseph Smith is “of Antichrist”:

> For unbelievers we will quote from the Scriptures—“Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God.” Again—“Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God.” I will now give my scripture—“Whosoever confesseth that Joseph Smith was sent of God to reveal the holy Gospel to the children of men, and lay the foundation for gathering Israel, and building up the kingdom of God on the earth, that spirit is of God; and every spirit that does not confess that God has sent Joseph Smith, and revealed the everlasting Gospel to and through him, is of Antichrist. . . . They may say that they acknowledge Him until doomsday, and he will never own them, nor bestow the Holy Spirit upon them, and they will never have visions of eternity opened to them, unless they acknowledge that Joseph Smith is sent of God. Such people I call unbelievers. They tell about believing in Jesus Christ, but they might as well talk about birds understanding the Hebrew language. This statement is no more positive than true.14

The Bible cautions us to examine the teachings of anyone claiming to be a prophet. John wrote:

> Beloved, do not believe every spirit, but test the spirits to see whether they are from God, for many false prophets have gone out into the world. (1 John 4:1)

God calls us to faith in Christ, not a man. John wrote:

> For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life. (John 3:16)

Polygamy

Curiously, the LDS manual on Brigham Young never mentions his 55 wives or his 56 children (by 16 of his wives). It does tell of his first wife’s death and his subsequent marriage to Mary Ann Angel in 1834, but does not mention the others. This leaves the impression that he only married one wife after the death of his first wife. Not only that, when quoting his sermons the LDS Church edited out the references to “wives” and substituted “wife.” For instance:

“...especially to those who are presiding officers, Set that example before your [wife] and your children, ..."\(^{17}\)

But the source cited, Discourses of Brigham Young, has it as “wives”:

“...especially to those who are presiding officers, Set that example before your wives and your children, ..."\(^{18}\)

Here is another example from the manual:

“Let the husband and father learn to bend his will to the will of his God, and then instruct his [wife] and children..."\(^{19}\)

However, the quote as printed in Discourses of Brigham Young actually reads:

“Let the husband and father learn to bend his will to the will of his God, and then instruct his wives and children..."\(^{20}\)

Another problem is the use of a few select sentences from a sermon that was actually about polygamy. An example of this appears on page 166 of the manual:

Let the father be the head of the family, the master of his own household; and let him treat them [his family] as an angel would treat them.\(^{21}\)

However, the same sentence in Discourses of Brigham Young reads:

Let the father be the head of the family, the master of his own household; and let him treat them as an angel would treat them; and let the wives and the children say amen to what he says, and be subject to his dictates, instead of their dictating the man, instead of their trying to govern him.\(^{22}\)

Even the quote above, from Discourses of Brigham Young, is an edited version of Young’s sermon. Ironically, the quote was part of a sermon given by Brigham Young in 1856 threatening to disown the women who were complaining about polygamy:

Men will say, “My wife, though a most excellent woman, has not seen a happy day since I took my second wife;” “No, not a happy day for a year,” says one; and another has not seen a happy day for five years. . . .

I wish my own women to understand that what I am going to say is for them as well as others, and I want those who are here to tell their sister, . . . I am going to give you from this time to the 6th day of October next, for reflection, that you may determine whether you wish to stay with your husbands or not, and then I am going to set every woman at liberty and say to them, Now go your way, my women with the rest, go your way. And my wives have got to do one of two things; either round up their shoulders to endure the afflictions of this world, and live their religion, or they may leave, for I will not have them about me. . . .\(^{23}\)

Two paragraphs later we read the quote that is given in the current manual about the father being the head of the family. But the context of that portion of Young’s sermon was about women obeying their husbands in polygamy.

Although the LDS Church today tries to minimize the importance of their past teachings on polygamy, it is still a part of their scriptures. Section 132 of the Doctrine and Covenants warns that once this doctrine has been revealed to a person they are under obligation before God to practice it.

Verily, thus saith the Lord . . . inasmuch as you have inquired of my hand to know and understand wherein I, the Lord, justified my servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as also Moses, David and Solomon, my servants, as touching the principle and doctrine of their having many wives and concubines—Behold, and lo, I am the Lord thy God, and will answer thee as touching this matter.

... For behold, I reveal unto you a new and an everlasting covenant; and if ye abide not that covenant, then are ye damned... (Doctrine and Covenants 132:1-4)

Brigham Young was very adamant about the necessity of practicing plural marriage to achieve exaltation:

The only men who become Gods, even the Sons of God, are those who enter into polygamy.24

On another occasion he preached:

Now if any of you will deny the plurality of wives, and continue to do so, I promise that you will be damned; and will go still further and say, take this revelation, or any other revelation that the Lord has given, and deny it in your feelings, and I promise that you will be damned.25

It should be noted that polygamy in the Bible was never commanded by God or presented as a requirement for eternal life.

Adam is God

One of the more controversial doctrines taught by Young was that Adam is the God over this earth, under the supervision of yet a higher god, and Adam is the father of Jesus. However, the current manual on Brigham Young has carefully avoided this doctrine. On page 30 of the manual is a quote on the nature of God:

Our Father in Heaven begat all the spirits that ever were, or ever will be, upon this earth [see Hebrews 12:9]; and they were born spirits in the eternal world.26

The reference given for the quote is Discourses of Brigham Young.27 However, when we take the reference back another step and look at the original source we find it is Young’s famous sermon on Adam-God:

Our Father in Heaven begat all the spirits that ever were, or ever will be, upon this earth; and they were born spirits in the eternal world. . . .

Now hear it, O inhabitants of the earth, Jew and Gentile, Saint and sinner! When our father Adam came into the garden of Eden, he came into it with a celestial body, and brought Eve, one of his wives, with him. He helped to make and organize this world. He is Michael, the Arch-angel, the ANCIENT OF DAYS! about whom holy men have written and spoken—He is our Father and our God, and the only God with whom we have to do. . . . When the Virgin Mary conceived the child Jesus, the Father had begotten him in his own likeness. He was not begotten by the Holy Ghost, And who is the Father? He is the first of the human family; and when he took a tabernacle, it was begotten by his Father in heaven, . . . I could tell you much more about this; but were I to tell you the whole truth, blasphemy would be nothing to it, in the estimation of the superstitious and over-righteous of mankind.28

In 1857, after some members had questioned the Adam-God doctrine, Brigham Young declared:

Whether Adam is the personage that we should consider our heavenly Father, or not, is considerable of a mystery to a good many. I do not care for one moment how that is; it is no matter whether we are to consider Him [Adam] our God, or whether His Father, or His Grandfather, for in either case we are of one species—of one family—and Jesus Christ is also of our species.29

The Adam-God doctrine was no idle speculation: Brigham Young taught that doctrine throughout his life and declared it to be a matter of revelation. In 1873 the Deseret News quoted one of Brigham Young’s sermons:

How much unbelief exists in the minds of the Latter-day Saints in regard to one particular doctrine which I revealed to them, and which God revealed to me—namely that Adam is our father and God—I do not know, I do not inquire, I care nothing about it. Our Father Adam helped to make this earth, it was created expressly for him, and after it was made he and his companion came here. He brought one of his wives with him, and she was called Eve, . . . 30

Contrary to present LDS understanding that Elohim is the father of our spirits, Brigham Young taught that Elohim, as a higher god, appointed Adam to be the father of our spirits:

We say that Father Adam came here and helped to make the earth. Who is he? He is Michael, a great prince, and it was said to him by Eloheim, “Go ye and make an earth.” . . . Father Adam came here, and then they brought his wife. “Well,” says one, “Why was Adam called Adam”? He was the first man on the earth, and its framer and maker, he, with the help of his brethren, brought it into existence. Then he said, “I want my children who are in the spirit world to come and live

Even though Young taught the Adam-God doctrine for over twenty years, at least one apostle was troubled by it. In Apostle Wilford Woodruff’s journal for September 17, 1854, we read about a meeting where this was discussed:

Brother Pratt Also thought that Adam was made of the dust of the Earth. [Pratt] Could not believe that Adam was our God or the Father of Jesus Christ. President Young said that He was that He came from another world & made this. Brought Eve with him partook of the fruits of the Earth begat Children & they were Earthly & had mortal bodies & if we were Faithful we should become Gods as He was. He told Brother Pratt to lay aside his Philosophical reasoning & get Revelation from God to Govern him & Enlighten his mind more . . .

In 1877 Brigham Young even introduced the Adam-God doctrine into the LDS endowment ceremony in the temple at St. George, Utah, which was the only one then in operation. This lecture was a summary of the theological meaning of the ritual, including the Adam-God doctrine. Young explained that Adam and Eve were once mortals on some other world and after receiving their exaltation the gods sent them to form this world for the habitation of their spirit children, of whom Jesus was the first born. The lecture also taught that Adam was the literal father of Jesus in the flesh. While the original manuscript of the lecture at the veil is not publicly available, L. John Nuttall, Young’s scribe, recorded it in his diary:

In the creation the Gods entered into an agreement about forming this earth & putting Michael or Adam upon it. These thing[s] of which I have been speaking are what are termed the mysteries of godliness . . .

We have heard a great deal about Adam and Eve, how they were formed &c. . . . He was made just the same way you and I are made but on another earth. Adam was an immortal being when he came on this earth. He had lived on an earth similar to ours. . . . and gained his resurrection and his exaltation . . . And [he] had begotten all the spirit[s] that was to come to this earth. And Eve[,] our common Mother who is the Mother of all living[,] bore those spirits in the celestial world. And when this earth was organized by Elohim, Jehovah & Michael[,] who is Adam our common Father, Adam &

Eve had the privilege to continue the work of Progression [and] consequently came to this earth . . .

Father Adam’s oldest son (Jesus the Saviour) who is the heir of the family is Father Adam’s first begotten in the spirit World, who according to the flesh is the only begotten[,] as it is written. (In his [Adam’s] divinity[,] he having gone back into the spirit World and come in the spirit to Mary[,] and she conceived[,] for when Adam and Eve go through with their Work in this earth, they did not lay their bodies down in the dust, but returned to the spirit World from whence they come.[])

Contrary to Young’s doctrine, the Bible, in Genesis 1:26-27, clearly presents Adam as God’s creation. Also, Isaiah declared that there is only one God:

“You are my witnesses,” declares the Lord, “and my servant whom I have chosen, so that you may know and believe me and understand that I am he. Before me no god was formed, nor will there be one after me. I, even I, am the Lord, and apart from me there is no savior.” (Isaiah 43:10-11)

Some may argue that the Adam-God doctrine was never canonized, but by placing this teaching in the temple ceremony Young placed it above the authority of the LDS scriptures. Anyone may read the scriptures, but only faithful Mormons may participate in the temple rituals. One should also note that the temple ceremony itself has never been canonized, but no Mormon would argue that it is not doctrine.

While the Adam-God doctrine has dropped into obscurity, the polygamist splinter groups and some Mormons have continued to believe the doctrine. In 1976 President Spencer W. Kimball denounced the teaching in the October LDS Conference:

Another matter. We hope that you who teach in the various organizations, whether on the campuses or in our chapels, will always teach the orthodox truth. We warn you against the dissemination of doctrines which are not according to the scriptures and which are alleged to have been taught by some of the General Authorities of past generations. Such, for instance, is the Adam-God theory. We denounce that theory and hope that everyone will be cautioned against this and other kinds of false doctrine.34

Kimball’s statement, however, did not end the discussion. In 1981 Apostle Bruce R. McConkie sent a letter to BYU professor Eugene England regarding the Adam-God doctrine:

As it happens, I am a great admirer of Brigham Young and a great believer in his doctrinal presentations. He was called of God. . . . Nonetheless, as Joseph Smith so pointedly taught, a prophet is not always a prophet, only when he is acting as such. . . .

Yes, President Young did teach that Adam was the father of our spirits, and all the related things that the cultists ascribe to him. This, however, is not true. He expressed views that are out of harmony with the gospel. But, be it known, Brigham Young also taught accurately and correctly, the status and position of Adam in the eternal scheme of things. What I am saying is, that Brigham Young, contradicted Brigham Young, and the issue becomes one of which Brigham Young we will believe. . . . If we choose to believe and teach the false portions of his doctrines, we are making an election that will damn us.35

This raises the question: When does a prophet speak for God? Young, as God’s prophet, declared the Adam-God doctrine to be a revelation. Kimball, as God’s prophet, declared it to be false doctrine. Since Deuteronomy 13 states that a true prophet will not lead the people after a false god, it appears that Brigham Young was a false prophet.

Blood Atonement

Another troubling doctrine of Brigham Young’s was blood atonement. This didn’t relate to Christ’s atonement, but to the sinner’s personal blood atonement. In reading the following statements, remember that Brigham Young was not just the president of the LDS Church, but was also the Governor of Utah Territory. In 1856 Brigham Young explained this doctrine:

> There are sins that men commit for which they cannot receive forgiveness in this world, or in that which is to come, and if they had their eyes open to see their true condition, they would be perfectly willing to have their blood spilt upon the ground, that the smoke thereof might ascend to heaven as an offering for their sins; and the smoking incense would atone for their sins, whereas, if such is not the case, they will stick to them and remain upon them in the spirit world.

I know, when you hear my brethren telling about cutting people off from the earth, that you consider it is strong doctrine; but it is to save them, not to destroy them. . . . I do know that there are sins committed, of such a nature that if the people did understand the doctrine of salvation, they would tremble because of their situation. And furthermore, I know that there are transgressors, who, if they knew themselves, and the only condition upon which they can obtain forgiveness, would beg of their brethren to shed their blood, that the smoke thereof might ascend to God as an offering to appease the wrath that is kindled against them, and that the law might have its course. I will say further; I have had men come to me and offer their lives to atone for their sins.

It is true that the blood of the Son of God was shed for sins through the fall and those committed by men, yet men can commit sins which it can never remit. As it was in ancient days, so it is in our day; and though the principles are taught publicly from this stand, still the people do not understand them; yet the law is precisely the same. There are sins that can be atoned for by an offering upon an altar, as in ancient days; and there are sins that the blood of a lamb, of a calf, or of turtle doves, cannot remit, but they must be atoned for by the blood of the man. That is the reason why men talk to you as they do from this stand; they understand the doctrine and throw out a few words about it. You have been taught that doctrine, but you do not understand it.36

Brigham Young further explained:

> Let me suppose a case. Suppose you found your brother in bed with your wife, and put a javelin through both of them, you would be justified, and they would atone for their sins, and be received into the kingdom of God. I would at once do so in such a case; and under such circumstances, I have no wife whom I love so well that I would not put a javelin through her heart, and I would do it with clean hands. . . .

There is not a man or woman, who violates the covenants made with their God, that will not be required to pay the debt. The blood of Christ will never wipe that out, your own blood must atone for it . . .

In another sermon Young stated that this has been carried out:

36  Journal of Discourses, vol. 4, (September 21, 1856) pp. 53-54.
Now take a person in this congregation who has knowledge with regard to being saved in the kingdom of our God and our Father, and being exalted, . . . and suppose that he is overtaken in a gross fault, that he has committed a sin that he knows will deprive him of that exaltation which he desires, . . . is there a man or woman in this house but what would say, “shed my blood that I may be saved and exalted with the Gods?” . . . Will you love that man or woman well enough to shed their blood? That is what Jesus Christ meant. . . .

I could refer you to plenty of instances where men, have been righteously slain, in order to atone for their sins. I have seen scores and hundreds of people for whom there would have been a chance (in the last resurrection there will be) if their lives had been taken and their blood spilled on the ground as a smoking incense to the Almighty, but who are now angels to the devil, until our elder brother Jesus Christ raises them up—conquers death, hell, and the grave. I have known a great many men who have left this Church for whom there is no chance whatever for exaltation, but if their blood had been spilled, it would have been better for them. The wickedness and ignorance of the nations forbid this principle’s being in full force, but the time will come when the law of God will be in full force.

This is loving our neighbour as ourselves; if he needs help, help him; and if he wants salvation and it is necessary to spill his blood on the earth in order that he may be saved, spill it. Any of you who understand the principles of eternity, if you have sinned a sin requiring the shedding of blood, except the sin unto death, would not be satisfied nor rest until your blood should be spilled, that you might gain that salvation you desire. That is the way to love mankind.38

However, the New Testament never mentions any such practice. The atonement for man’s sins was completed with Christ’s death and resurrection. Paul explained:

This righteousness is given through faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe. There is no difference between Jew and Gentile, for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, and all are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus. God presented Christ as a sacrifice of atonement, through the shedding of his blood—to be received by faith. (Romans 3:22-25)

Blacks Cursed

While a few blacks were admitted to the LDS priesthood during Joseph Smith’s lifetime, Brigham Young put an end to that in Utah. Denial of priesthood to blacks was carried on until 1978 when President Kimball reversed the ban.39 Young was very vocal in his disregard of the African race. In 1859 Young declared that blacks are cursed due to Cain’s sin:

You see some classes of the human family that are black, uncouth, uncomely, disagreeable and low in their habits, wild, and seemingly deprived of nearly all the blessings of the intelligence that is generally bestowed upon mankind. The first man that committed the odious crime of killing one of his brethren will be cursed the longest of any one of the children of Adam. Cain slew his brother. Cain might have been killed, and that would have put a termination to that line of human beings. This was not to be, and the Lord put a mark upon him, which is the flat nose and black skin. Trace mankind down to after the flood, and then another curse is pronounced upon the same race—that they should be the “servant of servants;” and they will be, until that curse is removed; and the Abolitionists cannot help it, nor in the least alter that decree. How long is that race to endure the dreadful curse that is upon them? That curse will remain upon them, and they never can hold the Priesthood or share in it until all the other descendants of Adam have received the promises and enjoyed the blessings of the Priesthood and the keys thereof. Until the last ones of the residue of Adam’s children are brought up to that favourable position, the children of Cain cannot receive the first ordinances of the Priesthood. They were the first that were cursed, and they will be the last from whom the curse will be removed. When the residue of the family of Adam come up and receive their blessings, then the curse will be removed from the seed of Cain, and they will receive blessings in like proportion.40

While the Civil War was raging in the east in 1863, Brigham Young declared:

The rank, rabid abolitionists, whom I call black-hearted Republicans, have set the whole national fabric on fire. . . . The Southerners make the negroes, and the Northerners worship them; this is all the difference between slaveholders and abolitionists. I would like the President of the United States and all the world to hear this.

Shall I tell you the law of God in regard to the African race? If the white man who belongs to the chosen seed mixes his blood with the seed of Cain, the penalty, under the law of God, is death on the spot. This will always be so.\textsuperscript{41}

Later in the same year Young preached:

What is the cause of all this waste of life and treasure? To tell it in a plain, truthful way, one portion of the country wish to raise their negroes or black slaves and the other portion wish to free them, and, apparently, to almost worship them. . . .

Ham will continue to be the servant of servants, as the Lord has decreed, until the curse is removed. \textbf{Will the present struggle free the slave? No;} but they are now wasting away the black race by thousands. . . .

Treat the slaves kindly and let them live, for \textbf{Ham must be the servant of servants until the curse is removed.} Can you destroy the decrees of the Almighty? You cannot. Yet our Christian brethren think that they are going to overthrow the sentence of the Almighty upon the seed of Ham. They cannot do that, though they may kill them by thousands and tens of thousands.\textsuperscript{42}

This attitude prevailed among the Mormons for the next hundred years. Then in 1978, after years of civil rights protests, President Kimball made the following announcement that lifted the ban on blacks:

In early June of this year, the First Presidency announced that a revelation had been received by President Spencer W. Kimball extending priesthood and temple blessings to all worthy male members of the Church.\textsuperscript{43}

This shift left many Mormons wondering what to make of the many past statements of their leaders that the blacks would not receive the priesthood until all the rest of mankind were given the opportunity. Consequently, Apostle Bruce R. McConkie stated:

There are statements in our literature by the \textbf{early Brethren} which we have interpreted to mean that \textbf{the Negroes would not receive the priesthood in mortality. I have said the same things}, and people write me letters and say, “You said such and such, and how is it now that we do such and such?” And all I can say to that is that it is time disbelieving people repented and got in line and believed in a living, modern prophet. \textbf{Forget everything that I have said, or what President Brigham Young or President George Q. Cannon or whomsoever has said in days past that is contrary to the present revelation. We spoke with a limited understanding and without the light and knowledge that now has come into the world.}\textsuperscript{44}

As one former Mormon quipped, “Today’s truth may be tomorrow’s heresy.”

There is nothing in the Bible to suggest that white skin is superior to dark skin or that dark skin denotes a curse from God.

Mormons are often advised by their leaders to avoid reading material on the LDS Church that is not produced by them, usually with the warning that those outside of Mormonism distort the church’s true beliefs or misquote the leaders. Speaking at the October 2012 LDS Conference, Apostle Quentin L. Cook admonished the members against reading critical material on the internet:

Some have immersed themselves in Internet materials that magnify, exaggerate, and, in some cases, invent shortcomings of early Church leaders. Then they draw incorrect conclusions that can affect testimony. Any who have made these choices can repent and be spiritually renewed.\textsuperscript{45}

However, from the examples given in this newsletter, it is obvious that it is the LDS Church leaders who edit, “exaggerate” or “invent” statements of their past leaders to suit the current agenda. The real concern of the LDS Church seems to be that the members will read unvarnished, uncensored quotes of their past prophets.

Since each LDS president is ordained as a “Prophet, Seer and Revelator” one is left to wonder why their doctrinal statements vary from man to man? If the prophet can never lead one astray how do we reconcile their contradictory sermons? Those in the audience when Brigham Young was preaching would have been listening to the “living prophet.” Obviously, then, a “living prophet” can teach false doctrine. Since both the Bible and the Book of Mormon warn that false prophets will come there is a need for vigilance.

Beware of false prophets who come to you in sheep’s clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves. (Book of Mormon, 3 Nephi 14:15)

Mormonism is presenting a gospel that depends on the revelations of Joseph Smith and his successors, not on the Christianity revealed in the Bible. In the book of Mark we are warned about false prophets:

For false messiahs and false prophets will appear and perform signs and wonders to deceive, if possible, even the elect. (Mark 13:22)

Peter, in the New Testament, specifically warned against such deception coming not just from without but even from within the Christian community:

But there were also false prophets among the people, just as there will be false teachers among you. They will secretly introduce destructive heresies, even denying the sovereign Lord who bought them—bringing swift destruction on themselves. Many will follow their depraved conduct and will bring the way of truth into disrepute. In their greed these teachers will exploit you with fabricated stories. (2 Peter 2:1-3)

Rather than providing a bedrock of trust in the unchanging God of the Bible, Mormonism is presenting a gospel that depends on Joseph Smith and his successors, not simply on Christ.

March 2012: I was a former mormon. I was around 2 years, my wife was mormon her entire life, I took out my family from the mormon church, your documentation was very useful, my wife found a book regarding the changes of the temple ceremony . . . she was very surprise about all the changes made on the endowment ceremony . . .

we are now in processing in take out our names from the church, we are so graceful for your efforts and your dedication to your ministry, I have my wife’s family still on the church, we are praying for them in order to take them out and show them the real gospel but it is so hard because they have all their brains full of bad doctrine, they do not even read the bible, we are constantly encourage them in read the bible . . . they are so mad at me because they think that I was the reason in take my wife out of the church, in part it is true, they think that my wife had not a testimony about the church, but she has it and a big one, there was a lot of thing that doesn’t match on the church, because all the time I encouraged to my wife in read the bible . . . I always felt that something wrong was on the book of mormon . . . we now are assisting to a christian church, we are so happy . . . I fall in love of my lord Jesus christ.

thank you Sandra for your work and efforts, you are my hero . . .

March 2012: Really trying to totally leave is so difficult . . . I’m challenged at this point with not becoming super angry and feeling betrayed by the church.

Thank you for your work, it has been liberating for me and I feel a sense of happiness I hadn’t before really truly knowing that the church was hiding so much factual history.

April 2012: I left Utah 4 years ago and now live in California. I am currently experiencing the “What just happened to me over the past 36 years” moment and have left the lds church . . . Thank you for providing research links.

April 2012: I hope you’re watching the General Conference of the Church you hate so much . . .

I WITNESS TO YOU IN THE HOLY AND SACRED NAME OF JESUS CHRIST THAT THESE MEN ARE EXACTLY WHAT THEIR TITLES STATE.

I REBUKE YOU IN THE NAME OF THE LORD, AND WITNESS TO YOU THAT IF YOU DO NOT REPENT YOU WILL LITERALLY HAVE HELL TO PAY FOR YOUR BEARING FALSE WITNESS AGAINST, BY ANY MEASURE, GOOD AND HONORABLE MEN.

April 2012: I just wanted to write you and thank you for all you do . . . You may not remember me, but a year ago today April 1, 2011 that my husband and I came into Lighthouse Ministry looking for the DVD “Unveiling Grace”, some one thought you may have a copy.

While there I ask several questions because I had been on path of trying to come out of Mormonism. I walked around with just a part of me still Mormon, However with your help and your loving council, I left your ministry full of literature and a conviction of Joseph Smith not being a prophet of God, and that with that foundation no longer true to me, then the whole LDS religion was also false.

It was that day I turned to my husband and declared myself no longer Mormon. Today I am a Christian, a follower of Christ, I was baptized the end of January of this year. Had I not stepped into your Ministry a year ago today, I would not be who I am in Christ today. I am utmost thankful for all you do, you are such an instrument to bring truth to those who are searching as I was. Again thank you!!

April 2012: I can’t thank you enough for your inspiration and the way you have paved for many Christians who are transitioning out of Mormonism. It has been a painful road. I watched one of your fireside presentations yesterday and it gave me a lot of hope and affirmation . . . I discovered that the Mormon church isn’t what it claims to be this past December. I have stopped going to Church a month ago. I have been happier over the past few weeks . . . I still have tremendous faith in Christ and God.

April 2012: Many years ago you and your husband spoke to my husband who had been a life long Mormon. He had many questions about the religion and you spent several hours discussing it with him and even gave him some tapes to watch. He was a changed person and was born again and has been a Christian for almost 25 years now. Thank-you!

April 2012: I saw u speak in West Monroe, Louisiana at First West! I was born and raised a Christian but my girlfriend is Mormon! She has had questions so I took her to watch you speak! I believe it helped her a lot but she is going through a really tough time in life!

In talking with members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints about their faith and the differences between it and standard Christianity, a Mormon will often revert to "bearing his testimony." LDS Apostle Russell M. Nelson gave a typical testimony at the end of his October 2010 conference address:

I know that God lives. Jesus is the Christ. This is His Church. The Book of Mormon is true. Joseph Smith is its translator and the prophet of this last dispensation. President Thomas S. Monson is God’s prophet today. I so testify in the sacred name of Jesus Christ, amen.¹

Speaking at the October 2006 LDS Conference, Apostle Dieter F. Uchtdorf gave this definition of a testimony:

When we talk about testimony, we refer to feelings of our heart and mind rather than an accumulation of logical, sterile facts. It is a gift of the Spirit, a witness from the Holy Ghost that certain concepts are true.²

When Mormons are asked how they “know” that Joseph Smith is a prophet or that the LDS Church is the true church they will usually respond that they received a burning conviction, a special feeling, as a result of prayer. This burning feeling is based on a passage in their Doctrine and Covenants, sec. 9:8:

. . . behold, I say unto you, that you must study it out in your mind; then you must ask me if it be right, and if it is right I will cause that your bosom shall burn within you; therefore, you shall feel that it is right.

However, simply having a good feeling about something does not necessarily make it true. People from the various polygamist groups bear similar types of testimonies, recounting spiritual experiences that convinced them to embrace Warren Jeffs, or one of the other polygamist leaders, as God’s true prophet. Obviously the numerous testimonies of people for different prophets and religious movements can’t all be right. This is why Paul warned in Galatians 1:8—“But though we or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel, unto you that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed.”

“know” the LDS Church is God’s true church, not simply that you “believe” that to be the case. In fact, sometimes a parent will stand behind the child and prompt him on the words to say.

While I agree with the basic philosophy of training young children in their faith, I am troubled by the LDS methods that seem to border on brainwashing. In 1983, LDS Apostle Boyd K. Packer commented on the process of acquiring a testimony:

> It is not unusual to have a missionary say, “How can I bear testimony until I get one?” . . . A testimony is to be found in the bearing of it! . . . The skeptic will say that to bear testimony when you may not know you possess one is to condition yourself; that the response is manufactured. . . . Bear testimony of the things that you hope are true, as an act of faith. . . . The Spirit and testimony of Christ will come to you for the most part when, and remain with you only if, you share it.”

But Packer’s method is simply brainwashing. If you assert something enough times you probably will come to believe that it is true.

This reminds me of a young Christian man I met some years ago that was dating an LDS girl. She asked him to meet with an apostle so that he could get answers to his questions. He agreed and later met with LDS Apostle Spencer W. Kimball. Kimball brushed aside the young man’s questions and instructed him that if he really wanted a testimony regarding Mormonism he need only follow three simple steps:

1. You must want to believe that Mormonism is true.
2. Pray to know that it is true.
3. Read only the LDS books.

Kimball assured him that this never fails. But such a method would probably work for the polygamist groups as well. It does not establish that what you feel is actually true.

The Testimony Glove

I recently purchased a book at an LDS bookstore, titled The Testimony Glove. It was written by the wife of current LDS Apostle Dallin Oaks and published by Deseret Book. Through this book we get a glimpse of what the LDS Church thinks are the basics of their faith.

First children are instructed to put on the special glove at the front of the book. The glove represents the Holy Ghost, who will guide them in learning the truth.

Next they attach a small picture of a man to the thumb of the glove, who represents God. Kimball brushed aside the young man’s questions and instructed him that if he really wanted a testimony regarding Mormonism he need only follow three simple steps:

1. You must want to believe that Mormonism is true.
2. Pray to know that it is true.
3. Read only the LDS books.

Kimball assured him that this never fails. But such a method would probably work for the polygamist groups as well. It does not establish that what you feel is actually true.

The fourth picture is the Salt Lake Temple. The child is instructed that “The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is the Savior’s true church” and that being sealed in the temple means the child’s family will be together forever.8

On the last finger the child places a picture of the current LDS prophet. From this the child is to conclude that the LDS Church is the true church which is “led by a living prophet, who gets revelation from God” and that she is to “follow the prophet.”9

This glove is to help the child learn the basic components of a testimony: Heavenly Father is real and has a great plan for our lives, Jesus Christ is the Savior, Joseph Smith is God’s prophet, the temple is necessary to be an eternal family, and the current president of the LDS Church is God’s spokesman on earth. As the child continues to attend LDS classes she will be given more in-depth instruction on the five concepts presented in this book. Now let us look at these five points more closely.

Heavenly Father’s Plan

The first point is the LDS doctrine of Heavenly Father and his “great plan of happiness for us.” Since the days of Joseph Smith the LDS leaders have consistently taught that God was once a mortal, after death he received a resurrected body and advanced to godhood, which would necessitate a higher god to oversee the world on which our Heavenly Father grew up.

The 2002 LDS manual Gospel Fundamentals informs us that “our Father in Heaven was once a man who lived on an earth, the same as we do. He became our Father in Heaven by overcoming problems, just as we have to do on this earth.”10 Further on the manual informs us that Heavenly Father has “a resurrected body of flesh and bones.”11

Past LDS president Joseph Fielding Smith explained that our Heavenly Father had a father, a grandfather, and so forth back through the eternities:

> Our father in heaven, according to the Prophet, had a father, and since there has been a condition of this kind through all eternity, each Father had a Father.12

However, Joseph Smith’s doctrine of God is in direct contradiction to the teachings of the Bible.

In Malachi 3:6 the Bible informs us that God does not change and Psalms 90:2 declares that He is “from everlasting to everlasting.”

In Isaiah 44:6 and 8, God instructed Isaiah: “I am the first, and I am the last; and beside me there is no God. . . . is there a God beside me; yea, there is no God; I know not any.”

In fact, the concept that our God was once a mortal man who advanced to the position of God is the most heretical doctrine of Mormonism. This reminds me of Paul’s warning in Romans 1:23 about those who “changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man.”

Coupled with the LDS concept of God is the doctrine of eternal progression, or “plan of happiness” as used in the Testimony book.13 The teaching of man’s eternal progression is the bedrock of LDS doctrine. In the October 2010 LDS Conference, Apostle Robert D. Hales explained: “Before we came to this earth, Heavenly Father presented His plan of salvation—a plan to come to earth and receive a body, choose to act between good and evil, and progress to become like Him and live with Him forever.”14

This concept assumes that there is both a Heavenly Father and a Heavenly Mother who literally procreated us in a pre-earth life and then set in motion a plan for our advancement to godhood.15 Joseph Smith declared: “you have got to learn how to be Gods yourselves, and to be kings and priests to God, the same as all Gods have done before you.”16 In the LDS view, we are literally spirit children of Heavenly parents and the same species as the gods. While Christians talk of being children of God, they are using the term in a spiritual sense, not biological children. Paul wrote about our spiritual adoption in Romans 8:14-16:

> For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God.

There is nothing in this teaching that would suggest we are literally God’s biological children. We are children.

of God by faith, not by birth. In the classic book Articles of Faith by LDS Apostle James E. Talmage, we read:

> We believe in a God who is Himself progressive, whose majesty is intelligence; whose perfection consists in eternal advancement—a Being who has attained His exalted state by a path which now His children are permitted to follow, whose glory it is their heritage to share. In spite of the opposition of the sects, in the face of direct charges of blasphemy, the Church proclaims the eternal truth: “As man is, God once was; as God is, man may be.”

Thus we see that when Mormons speak of becoming God-like or Christ-like, they are not simply speaking of some sort of spiritual growth, but of their hope of achieving actual godhood, the same as their Heavenly Father did before them.

This would include their children, born on some future world, worshipping the now exalted man as their god. This was the clear intent in the 1997 edition of Gospel Principles. It declared that those who achieve exaltation, or godhood, would then procreate spirit children who will “have the same relationship to them as we do to our Heavenly Father.” Thus the spirit children of the exalted LDS man will be sent to the world he creates to become mortal and they will pray to him, the same as he does to his Heavenly Father. Keep in mind that the Mormon is not saying that he will one day be equal to Heavenly Father. The LDS concept is one of a hierarchy of gods, with each god in submission to the one before him, and each god worshiped by his own spirit children.

In the Mormon manual The Latter-day Saint Woman: Basic Manual for Women, published in 2000, is a quote from past LDS president Lorenzo Snow:

> When two Latter-day Saints are united together in marriage, promises are made to them concerning their offspring that reach from eternity to eternity. They are promised that they shall have the power and the right to govern and control and administer salvation and exaltation and glory to their offspring, worlds without end.

Notice that it says they will “administer salvation and exaltation” to their offspring. Thus they are acting in the capacity of a god to their children. Actually, this quote is a little misleading as this only applies to the husband.

The wife will be involved in procreating these children, but not in answering their prayers.

So what is our purpose in life? The Bible does not teach that man’s goal is personal godhood, but to bring glory to the one eternal God, our creator. Isaiah 43:11 records God as saying: “before me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after me.” Further on, in Isaiah 48:11, God declares “My glory I will not give to another.” According to 1 Peter 4:11, all things are to be done with the goal of bringing glory to the Father.

The Christian plan of salvation is summed up in John 3:16: “For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.” There is nothing there about personal exaltation to godhood. We are sinners saved by grace, not “gods in embryo,” as declared by past LDS prophet Spencer W. Kimball.

Jesus Christ

The second point of The Testimony Glove is Jesus Christ. While it does teach that Jesus is our savior, it does not elaborate on their doctrine that Christ’s atonement is just the first step in our ability to acquire eternal life. Besides the atonement, according to Mormonism, one must also live a faithful LDS life, hold their Melchizedec priesthood, and fully participating in their temple rituals throughout life in order to qualify to live in the presence of Heavenly Father. This is the way one achieves eternal life, which is also referred to as exaltation, or godhood.

Mormons value Christ’s atonement as an essential element of their eternal life, but not the full payment. In the February 2003 Ensign, LDS Apostle Russell M. Nelson explained the difference between simply receiving the gift of immortality as opposed to the goal of qualifying for eternal life:

> Thanks to the Atonement, the gift of immortality is unconditional. The greater gift of eternal life, however, is conditional. In order to qualify, one must deny oneself of ungodliness and honor the ordinances and covenants of the temple.

Keep in mind that Mormons make a distinction between “immortality” and “eternal life.” They view Christ’s atonement as a guarantee of resurrection and the ability to live forever, which is termed “immortality.” But they do not believe that this is the same as “eternal life.” That is defined as being married for eternity in an LDS temple, which gives them the ability to procreate.

millions of spirit children to be sent to their own world. “Eternal life” is defined as having an eternal marriage and the ability to procreate life eternally.22

Thus we see that for the Mormon, Christ’s atonement is not enough to return to Heavenly Father. The person must be a fully active, temple going, member of the LDS Church in order to merit eternal life. In Mormonism, “saved by grace” means resurrection to some level of heaven, but should not to be confused with “eternal life,” or godhood, in the highest level of heaven where God resides. If eternal life, or “exaltation,” is “conditional” and something for which we must “qualify,” then it is not a gift, but a reward.

On the other hand, the Christian’s hope is summed up in Ephesians 2:8-9: “For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: Not of works, lest any man should boast.”

Joseph Smith

The next picture on the glove is one of Joseph Smith. In the book the child says “The third truth is that Joseph Smith saw Heavenly Father and Jesus Christ. . . . I know that Joseph Smith is the prophet who was called to restore the gospel and translate the Book of Mormon.”23

This statement brings up three separate issues: Smith’s first vision [which supposedly revealed to him that God and Jesus are separate deities with resurrected bodies], the LDS claim that Joseph Smith restored the true gospel [which implies that all Christians outside of Mormonism do NOT have the true gospel] and the validity of the Book of Mormon [which opens the door for scriptures and doctrines beyond the Bible].

Regarding his claim that in 1820 God and Jesus appeared to him, Joseph Smith did not commit his vision experience to paper until 1832, and later accounts contain significant differences. The earliest account only recorded Jesus as appearing, with no mention of God the Father. Smith’s 1835 version referred to many angels, but with no specific claim that God and Jesus were present. It wasn’t until 1838 that he wrote that the Father and Son appeared to him in his first vision.24 In the early 1830’s neither LDS nor non-LDS sources raised the issue of an 1820 vision or that Joseph Smith was teaching an anthropomorphic deity. This was a doctrinal development of the 1840’s in Nauvoo, Illinois.25

Keep in mind, the Mormons are not just saying God could appear as a man, but that eons ago our Heavenly Father actually was a finite being on some other world, married, had children, died, was resurrected, and then achieved his current level of godhood. Speaking in 1844 Joseph Smith preached:

God himself was once as we are now, and is an exalted man, . . . That is the great secret . . . I am going to tell you how God came to be God. We have imagined and supposed that God was God from all eternity, I will refute that idea, . . . God himself, the Father of us all, dwelt on an earth, the same as Jesus Christ Himself did . . .26

This is not just a past teaching. Smith’s sermon is quoted in current LDS manuals.27

I often talk to Mormons who are unacquainted with Smith’s sermon on the nature of God, but if one is going to assert that he is a prophet, the accuracy of his teaching on God is of vital importance. One of the tests of a prophet is laid out in Deuteronomy 13, where it states that a true prophet will not lead you after a strange god. As we have already pointed out, Smith’s doctrine of a God who was once a finite mortal is totally opposite the teachings of the Bible.

The next problem with the child’s statement is the claim that she “knows” that Joseph Smith, as God’s prophet, restored the true gospel. When a Mormon asserts that he “knows” that Smith was a prophet, he is usually referring to some spiritual conviction that came to him through prayer, not from any sort of testing of his prophetic claims.

The importance of Joseph Smith is canonized in the Doctrine and Covenants, section 135, verse 3:

Joseph Smith, the Prophet and Seer of the Lord, has done more, save Jesus only, for the salvation of men in this world, than any other man that ever lived in it.

However, if Joseph Smith is a false prophet then he has been the means of sending many people down the broad path to destruction instead of pointing them to the narrow way that leads to life.28

The LDS Church is not just claiming to be a better church than the one down the road, but the only “true” church recognized by God. When they talk about Smith restoring the “gospel” they are talking about the doctrines laid out in the Doctrine and Covenants and Pearl of Great Price, not the gospel presented in the New Testament.

28 Matthew 7:13.
Smith taught that Christ’s atonement was just the first installment on our eternal life. We must now faithfully participate in all of the LDS rituals and practices to return to Heavenly Father and achieve exaltation. Apostle Bruce R. McConkie defined the gospel as follows:

The gospel is the plan of salvation. It consists of the laws, ordinances, and eternal truths by conformity to which the spirit children of God can progress and advance until they become like their Eternal Parent.29

Thus the LDS gospel is described as the system of progression of men to godhood.

When Christians talk of the gospel they are referring to the “good news” of Christ’s sacrificial death on the cross, done on our behalf, to reconcile us to God, as laid out in 1 Corinthians, chapter 15.

The Mormon gospel, on the other hand, is one of Christ plus self-effort and centers around a personal quest for exaltation; the Christian gospel is centered in Christ. The Bible does not point us to personal exaltation, but to bring glory to the one eternal, holy God.

Another problem with the Testimony book is the assertion that Smith’s prophetic call included the translation of the Book of Mormon.

First, there is no evidence that there ever were any physical plates. The witnesses to the supposed translation process never mention seeing the plates, uncovered, on the table while Smith was dictating the story to his scribe. They describe a process of Smith looking at a stone in his hat while he dictated the book. They mention hefting the plates that were in a box or in a sack, but who is to say that it actually contained an ancient record? It could have contained scrap metal, rocks or anything heavy.30

Next, there are no artifacts, inscriptions, or monuments produced by the Book of Mormon people. There is no evidence that the American Indians grew wheat, had horses and cows, had chariots or made steel swords, as asserted in the Book of Mormon.31

Third, the Book of Mormon echoes the assumptions of Smith’s day about the American Indian that are no longer seen as valid. Many books of the day speculated that the Indians were descended from the lost tribes of Israel.32 However, DNA shows that the American Indians descend from East Asia, and are not Semitic.33

Fourth, the excessive plagiarism and dependence on the King James translation of the Bible throughout the Book of Mormon shows it to be a modern invention.34

Once a person accepts the Book of Mormon as true, he has accepted the concept that the Bible is unreliable and further revelation is needed. This opens the door to accept all the rest of Smith’s teachings. This raises a curious dilemma. The Book of Mormon does not contain the Mormon doctrines of Heavenly Father and Jesus being separate deities, eternal progression to godhood, temple marriage or work for the dead. If these crucial doctrines were not in the book, but revealed later to Smith, one wonders why God would bother with the Book of Mormon in the first place.

As for the LDS charge that the Bible is not complete, Apostle John acknowledged that all of Jesus’ teachings had not been recorded. However, in John 20:31, he asserted that everything we needed for eternal life has been preserved. He wrote:

But these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name.

If we already have everything we need to know for eternal life in the Bible, why would we need further scriptures?

The LDS Temple

This brings us to the fourth picture on the glove, the LDS temple. In the book, the child says “I know that being married in the temple like Mom and Dad were, makes it possible for our family to be sealed together forever.”35

LDS temple marriage is repeatedly emphasized in various instruction manuals. In the 2004 book, Doctrines of the Gospel Student Manual, the college-age Mormon is instructed:

The most important things that any member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints ever does in this world are: 1. To marry the right person, in the right place, by the right authority; and 2. To keep the covenant made in connection with this holy and perfect order of matrimony—thus assuring the obedient persons of an inheritance of exaltation in the celestial kingdom.36

35 Testimony Glove, p. 16
Notice, the promise of eternal life requires more than just a temple marriage. The couple must also continue to live as faithful Mormons until their death in order for them to achieve exaltation. If temple marriage were this important in God’s plan, one wonders why it was never mentioned in the Bible or the Book of Mormon?

The emphasis on temples is an example of the way Mormon doctrine appropriates Biblical terms and then infuses them with a different meaning. An example is their use of the word “temple.” In the Old Testament the temple, along with its animal sacrifices, were symbolic of Christ’s future atonement for sin. Once Christ died on the cross and was resurrected there was no longer any need for the animal sacrifices of the Old Testament. While the New Testament makes mention of the Jewish temple, Christian rituals were never conducted in it. Christian author Luke Wilson explained:

Jesus replaced the Old Covenant, of which the biblical temple was a part. He established a New Covenant based on His once-for-all atoning sacrifice, and under which He now serves as the believer’s “great high priest” in the very sanctuary of heaven (Hebrews 4:14-16). A New Testament temple building is therefore a contradiction in terms, for it ignores the finished work of Christ, and harks back to the Old Covenant.\(^37\)

An example of the way LDS prophets have twisted the scriptures is this statement by LDS President Spencer W. Kimball:

> “Only through celestial marriage [meaning LDS temple marriage] can one find the straight way, the narrow path. Eternal life cannot be had in any other way.”\(^38\)

Kimball was alluding to Jesus’ statement in Matthew 7:14: “strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.” However, there is nothing in Christ’s teachings to connect eternal life with marriage. In fact, Jesus plainly stated that there is no marriage in heaven in Matthew 22:30:

> . . . Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven. [Also see Luke 20:34-36]

Obviously Paul had no such doctrine. In Romans 7:2 he wrote that when a man dies his wife is free from that marriage. In 1 Corinthians 7:7-8 Paul advised those who were single or widowed to remain unmarried that they might spend more time serving God. If Paul believed that marriage continued in heaven and was essential for eternal life, why did he never mention it?

Also, marriages were never performed in the Jewish temple and the first century Christians did not build temples. They were meeting in the homes of various believers. Another curious fact is that the doctrine of eternal marriage isn’t even taught in the Book of Mormon. Yet the angel who supposedly appeared to Joseph Smith in 1823 declared that the Book of Mormon contained “the fulness of the everlasting Gospel.”\(^39\)

Another difference is the secrecy surrounding the LDS temple ceremony. The Bible describes the Jewish temple rituals in Leviticus, chapters 1-7. Even though the High Priest was the only one who could enter the Holy of Holies, all Israel knew what he did in there. There was no secrecy. Yet the Mormon takes an oath to never divulge their temple ceremony.

The LDS teaching on eternal marriage comes from section 132 of their Doctrine and Covenants. Joseph Smith dictated this revelation in 1843 specifically so that it could be read to Smith’s wife Emma to convince her of the truthfulness of plural marriage. Smith’s faithful scribe, William Clayton, recorded the event in his diary.\(^40\) As we outlined in our May 2009 Salt Lake City Messenger, Smith was married to at least 33 plural wives.\(^41\) Most of them married Smith behind his wife’s back and contrary to the teachings in the 1835 Doctrine and Covenants.\(^42\)

Even though the LDS Church currently tries to distance itself from the doctrine of polygamy, their sealing practices demonstrate that they still believe people will live polygamy in the celestial kingdom. As an example, Kristen Oaks, the author of The Testimony Glove, was sealed in marriage to LDS Apostle Dallin Oaks after his first wife died. He has now been sealed in an eternal marriage to two women, thus guaranteeing, according to LDS teachings, that he will be a polygamist in heaven.

The polygamist groups and the LDS Church all believe that plural marriages prior to 1890 were ordained of God and that those with the proper sealing will be able to live polygamy in heaven. The only difference is whether they believe a person should currently live polygamy on earth.

Another aspect of the LDS teaching on eternal marriage is their doctrine that there is a Heavenly Mother as well as Heavenly Father. The Mormon goal of an eternal marriage is predicated on the concept that God has also been sealed in an eternal marriage to his wife, or wives as the case may be. According to LDS president Spencer W. Kimball, “God made man in his own image and certainly he made woman in the image of his wife-partner.”

According to Brigham Young, Joseph Smith once said he “would not worship a God who had not a father; and I do not know that he would if he had not a mother; the one would be as absurd as the other.”

Even though Mormonism teaches that there is a Heavenly Mother, members are taught that they are not to pray to her. In the October 1991 LDS Conference, President Gordon B. Hinckley instructed members that:

... in light of the instruction we have received from the Lord Himself, I regard it as inappropriate for anyone in the Church to pray to our Mother in Heaven. ... The fact that we do not pray to our Mother in Heaven in no way belittles or denigrates her.

While President Hinckley said the prohibition on praying to Heavenly Mother in no way “belittles or denigrates her,” it surely makes her a silent partner.

The Living Prophet

The last picture to be attached to the glove is one of current LDS President Thomas S. Monson. The girl in the story then testifies “I know we are led by a living prophet, who gets revelation from God.”

One wonders how the girl in the book was supposed to know that Monson gets revelations? The LDS Church has not presented any revelation to the church body since 1978, when the church extended the priesthood to blacks. One could argue that the leaders pray for guidance and feel a spiritual conviction to proceed in a particular way. But how would this differ from thousands of Christians who pray daily for direction? Her testimony is simply a matter of parroting the statements made by LDS leaders.

Joseph Smith claimed that in 1830 God instructed the founding members of the LDS Church to receive Smith’s words “as if from mine own mouth, in all patience and faith.”

This is still the position of the LDS church. The command to follow the current LDS prophets and apostles is laid out in section 68 of the Doctrine and Covenants:

“And whatsoever they shall speak when moved upon by the Holy Ghost shall be scripture, shall be the will of the Lord, shall be the mind of the Lord, shall be the word of the Lord, . . .”

The importance of a living prophet was driven home in the October 2010 LDS Conference when two different church leaders made reference to past President Ezra Taft Benson’s talk on “Fourteen Fundamentals in Following the Prophet.” Benson proclaimed that “the living Prophet ... is more vital to us than the Standard Works” which would include the Bible, Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants and Pearl of Great Price. In fact, his speech is held in such high regard that it is printed in its entirety in the 2010 manual, Teachings of the Living Prophets.

By asserting the supremacy of a current prophet’s teachings over all previous scripture it eliminates any test of its truthfulness. One is expected to simply accept the current LDS leader’s teachings as divine instruction.

For example, when the church changed the authority of the Seventies to also include High Priests, Apostle Harold B. Lee challenged then current President David O. McKay on the change. President McKay asked Lee “have you ever thought that what was contrary to the order of heaven in 1840 might not be contrary to the order of heaven in 1960?”

But this raises the question as to how any Mormon can have confidence that what he currently believes and affirms will be equally true next year?

The LDS leaders would deny that they are teaching the members to have blind faith in them by pointing to speeches where they counsel the members to seek for divine confirmation through prayer. However, the person is still expected to come up with an answer to obey the leaders. Speaking at the April 2001 LDS Conference, Apostle M. Russell Ballard instructed the members: “If you will listen to the living prophet and the apostles and heed our counsel, you will not go astray.” This was further emphasized in the 2010 LDS manual, Teachings of the Living Prophets:

46 Testimony Glove, p. 18.
47 Doctrine and Covenants 21:5.
50 Ibid., p. 21.
51 Ibid., p. 12.
Speaking under the direction of the Holy Ghost, the living prophet’s words take precedence over other statements on the same issue. . . Doctrine are eternal and do not change; however, the Lord, through His prophet, may change practices and programs, according to the needs of the people.52

But historically we see a trail of past teachings and scriptures that have been changed or eliminated. The LDS scriptures have gone through repeated editing, with severe changes being made in several of Joseph Smith’s revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants.

Examples of Changing Doctrine

Plural Marriage—The church affirmed in 1835 that it did not teach or practice plural marriage. Yet we know that Joseph Smith was already practicing it at that time. Then in 1842 Smith dictated a secret revelation commanding plural marriage while publically denying it.53 Once polygamy was openly taught and practiced in the 1850’s the leaders taught that plural marriage was essential for eternal life. Section 132 of the Doctrine and Covenants was considered a mandate for taking additional wives. Now section 132 is reinterpreted to mean one must have a temple marriage in order to enter the celestial kingdom, and plural marriage is no longer considered an important part of the revelation.

Temple Endowment Ceremony—In the 1840’s Joseph Smith instituted the secret temple endowment ceremony, which was supposedly received directly from God. However, these ordinances have undergone repeated changes to tone down some of the more disturbing elements. In 1990 they removed the part in the temple play where a minister was portrayed as making a deal with the devil to teach false doctrine for money. Also removed were the blood oaths where a person swore on his life to always be faithful to Mormonism.54

Priesthood and Patriarchs—From the time of Joseph Smith’s death until 1978 blacks were denied priesthood.55 The various priesthood offices have also been revised. For example, the office of Presiding Patriarch, held by Joseph Smith’s father and then by his brother, Hyrum, was thought to be a lineal line of authority. In 1979 Eldred G. Smith, a descendent of Joseph Smith’s brother Hyrum, was released from his calling as Presiding Patriarch to the LDS Church and placed on emeritus status. Now there is only a local patriarch in each stake, who does not need to be a descendent of the Smiths.56

In spite of the many changes, the leadership continues to assert that the LDS Church is the “restored gospel” from ages past. One wonders how it can be a restoration and yet continually change?

When Joseph Smith gave a revelation to send several early converts to Canada to sell the copyright to the Book of Mormon, the men came back in dismay. The revelation had been a complete failure. But Smith had a ready explanation: “Some revelations are of God, some revelations are of man, and some revelations are of the devil.”57 But that is the very problem, how are we to determine when his revelations are from God? The LDS Church teaches its members to use a very subjective test for determining truth: “Pray about it, and if you get a good feeling, it must be true.” But supposedly Joseph Smith and the early Mormons who took this journey had all prayed about the revelation and it had failed. Time after time in LDS history we see that their inner convictions were proven wrong. The Bible warns us in 1 John 4:1—“believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world.”

Mormons often appeal to James 1:5—“If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God.” However, this is not instruction for testing a prophet. The Bible instructs us to test a prophet by examining his message. Paul challenged the Christians at Thessalonica to “prove all things; hold fast that which is good.” [1 Thessalonians 5:21] Also, Peter warned that in the Christian community there would be “false teachers” that would preach “damnable heresies.”58 Certainly Mormonism comes under this heading. Their doctrines of God once being a man, man’s ability to achieve godhood, and the necessity of a temple marriage for eternal life are in direct contradiction to the teachings of the New Testament. To say that anything, any ritual could add to the work of Christ is belittling his atonement. The writer of Hebrews summed it up this way:

“Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God.” (Hebrew 12:2)

The High Priest in the Old Testament did not sit down in the temple. The metaphor of Jesus sitting down indicated the atonement had been finished. It was complete. In John 19:30 we read that after Jesus had hung on the cross for hours he finally said: “It is finished: and he bowed his head, and gave up the ghost.” The good news is that Christ accomplished everything that was needed for our full salvation in God’s presence. It is our joy and responsibility to share the Biblical gospel with our LDS friends, that they, too, may find the narrow way that leads to eternal life.

April 2012: I have been a Christian for about 15 years now, but never really knew how to talk to Mormons about true grace in Jesus. After watching Heart of the Matter and learning about utlm.org and looking through your resources, I felt comfortable about being able to talk with Mormons. I live in South Korea and I had not seen one the whole time I had been here, then one day I saw a couple on the subway—they were on their mission. I was able to invite them over and make them food and share the grace of Jesus with them. My wife, who is also a Christian, shared her testimony for the first time with someone who was not a Christian.

It was SUCH a blessing to share about God’s work in our lives with them and God used you to help us feel comfortable about sharing. Your great work in this area really allows us and so many people to dialogue with Mormons in a deep and thoughtful way.

Thank you for your work as God works in you to will and to do. Praise God!

May 2012: I am a 35 year old LDS woman who was born and raised in the LDS church. I am also a great great great granddaughter of Brigham Young through his second wife, Mary Ann Angel. . . .

Several months ago my younger sister confided in me that she didn’t want to go to church anymore. She told me of some issues she had with the church that she’d been researching for years. I had no idea she felt this way and I was really shocked. Her main issues were polygamy, and blacks and the priesthood. She also pointed out that she didn’t know why she needed to give signs and tokens to see God again because she should already know her. This was a very powerful point to me. I have struggled with health problems since I was 10. It has been a great trial in my life, and yet, God has always been there with me—even in my darkest times when I wasn’t sure how I’d live to see another year.

I got my endowments out in 2009 and went again to the temple several times after that. Although I felt peace in the Celestial room—I felt uncomfortable in certain parts of the endowment session. More specifically—the prayer circle and when you raise your arms up and down and say “oh God, hear the words of my mouth”. I didn’t know why this made me uneasy, but it [did]. I got the same feeling each time I went to the temple and through the endowment session. I haven’t been very many times due to health problems that make it hard to travel.

When my younger sister mentioned her issues with the church, I spent several weeks trying to reconcile my own testimony. Then the weekend of Easter my sister and I got church, I spent several weeks trying to reconcile my own testimony. Then the weekend of Easter my sister and I got, more specifically—the prayer circle and when you raise your arms up and down and say “oh God, hear the words of my mouth”.

I was able to invite them over and make them food and share the grace of Jesus with them. My wife, who is also a Christian, shared her testimony for the first time with someone who was not a Christian.

That night and for 4 nights afterwards, I prayed to know why I felt uncomfortable during the endowment session. The 4th day I got sick with a high fever and the flu. I was home from work and school. It was this morning that I remembered someone telling me that there were similarities between masons and LDS temples. I also remember people at church mentioning that Joseph Smith was a Freemason. I knew nothing of Masons or Freemasons. So, I began researching about them on the internet. I didn’t want to be “biased”, so I tried to find out about Freemasons first. Then I went to the FAIR website and found an article on the similarities between freemasons and temples. What I read really intrigued me and I couldn’t type fast enough to do more research into what the Master Masons ritual was (as the FAIR article mentioned Smith became one in 1842.) I found a script of the master mason ritual online and scanned over it. I was shocked when I read it. In my mind I could see similarities. I am sure you can guess what I found next. The similar handshakes, clothing, the masonic symbols were on my garments. I felt disgusted and went to the bedroom and took my garments off. It was a pretty bold move, I know—but I told God that I was not a Freemason!

I was still very sick with the flu for the next 5 days, but my research continued. I told my sister what I found and how upset it made me. Shouldn’t our temples be unique and not have similarities to an organization (the freemason)?

This is where my journey began. The weeks that followed I began to have more spiritual experiences regularly. Driving up to KU campus, I felt the Spirit and it testified to me that God created this world and that He loves all His children. These may be small to some people, but according to some LDS people . . . when you start to “stray” . . . doesn’t the Holy Ghost leave you? well that wasn’t and hasn’t happened to me.

I don’t know if that “remembrance” I had that one morning— was an answer to my prayer—but I am so thankful that I have begun to unravel the mystery behind my “uncomfortable feelings”. I also am disturbed by Joseph Smith’s multiple First Vision accounts. I even shared it with my Mom who joined the church before I was born, and she is still very much a strong LDS member. She said she could understand why those would make me upset—but it doesn’t bother her. This is astonishing to me. I even had her go to LDS.org and look at Joseph’s journal from 1832 and read his First Vision account. She agreed that it was Smith’s handwriting. And yet—she isn’t touched by it. maybe some day she will start to understand. I told my Mom that if I had seen God and Jesus, that I wouldn’t forget the details, or change the details to “fit the audience”. People who experience dramatic events in their life don’t forget the key details of those events. Therefore the excuses given by LDS scholars are fallible.

So, this leads to me where I am now. I want to resign from the church. My sister has told me to take it slow because it’s like “ripping off a big bandaid”. She will also be resigning. Our family doesn’t know yet. They will take it very hard. But I must do what I feel is right. What has emerged from this is that I feel a whole new world has opened to me, I am less judgmental of people I see and meet and most importantly, my prayers and relationship with God and with Christ are becoming stronger than I hoped for. This has always been my goal. I have Christian friends who seem to be close to Christ and I was jealous of that. Now, I can also have that and it is truly glorious! I really wish I lived closer to you guys, so I could meet and talk with you in person.

May 2012: You have been a big support for me leaving the LDS faith. Its been a journey for the last 6 months, and each day gets better than the next. Not to say that the beginning was not super hard and sad and lonely. But thank you for standing up for truth.

May 2012: Thank you for staying strong and exposing the big fraud that the Mormon church is. I was a member for 45 years . . . Now I know truth. I left in 2008 with my husband, and all our family (at least 20) are out of the cult.

May 2012: I just wanted to say THANKS for your ministry. I will keep it short (Even though I could write pages and pages and pages.) Anyways, I’m a former LDS member, married in the temple, with a . . . name that dates back to the start of it all. Neil A Maxwell was good friends with my Grandpa etc. etc. etc. . . . I’m now born again with a relationship with the One true God. Free from the chains of a false religion. As you can imagine, at one time I was told by my “leaders” that your website was nothing more than “Anti-Mormon” literature. So I must confess, I thought you were not on God’s side :) Oh, how the tables have turned! I thank God for giving you the courage to do what you do! Your website helped me more than you will ever know. I sincerely thank you. Me, my wife, my Mom, my brother, his wife, and more, have all left the LDS church and into an eternal relationship with Jesus. God bless!

June 2012: I would LOVE to personally thank you for your books and dedication. It was due solely to your and Jerald’s books that brought me out of Mormonism after 19 yrs and a Mission served. I would have never left the church IF not for the both of you, OR help bring out 30 members within my first yr out, all due to material from your books. Keep up the good work . . .

July 2012: I was so thankful that I found you on the Internet. . . . I first want to thank you for giving me the truth and leading me to the God of the Bible! I grew up in Mormonism so you saved me from eternal hell!! Thank you for allowing Jesus to used you in a powerful way!

July 2012: I am disgusted with the cruel sense that you have to bash other people’s religion and beliefs down because I don’t remember Christ ever show that kind of hatred towards others by bashing other people’s religion and beliefs. Jesus Christ taught to love one another not hatred. So how can you say that you are showing this Christ-like love that Jesus taught by doing this. . . . You may not agree with LDS faith, and you may feel you know the only truth. Jesus Christ taught to love one another, should that not go both ways? I am certain that members of your family as well as others who are members of the LDS faith haven’t posted anything against what your beliefs are, how dare you do it to ours and then call yourself a follower of Jesus Christ. Maybe you need to take a step back and think about that. . . . I think you are taking it way too far, and the things you say about the LDS faith does nothing but hurt the people as well as yourself. People like yourself that goes around and bashes other peoples religion shows that they have NO love for the Savior, themselves or others when they do this sort of thing.

August 2012: Thank you so much for your informative website!! I only came to my full knowledge of the LDS church a week ago. Having been a member for 47 years of my life, I have been so indoctrinated!! But not completely. From my own awful experiences with the leadership I became suspicious of doctrines and teachings about two years ago. From that time on, I have had a tendency to speak out in RS [Relief Society] and GD [Gospel Doctrine] classes in disgust of lessons taught there. Now, I am not ashamed to let all my LDS friends know that I have resigned, quit, forsaken, etc, the mormon church. In one week I have learned more about the truth [than] in the 47 years of cover up and lies taught me in the church. . . . Thank you so much for these resources!
August 2012: First off I have lived in Utah my whole life and married the love of my life two years ago, however she was Mormon, she has since converted to Catholicism and we both attend church weekly. I stumbled across your site because we try to find ways to have counter arguments when her family engages in conversation with us and sends missionaries to our house. At church last week our deacon had the book “Mormonism Shadow or Reality” I have since ordered that book on Amazon which directed me to your site. I really appreciate what you are doing, . . .

August 2012: I started reading UTLM materials back in the 80’s as a bible college student (Mormonism Shadow or Reality—the BIG book). In 2002 as an Army Chaplain my chaplain assistant was Mormon. We were in Iraq for a year and after almost 25 years of study I was well prepared to discuss Mormon issues with him over a year’s time.

September 2012: First, I have to apologize and ask for your forgiveness for my disrespectful attitude toward you and your message [in the past].

Second, I want to thank you for your work and your concern for the members of the mormon church. Until last January I had been a member of the church for 45 years. I knew it all and was proud of it.

Through your efforts and those of others the Lord was showing me all along that His love doesn’t come through men nor their organization. My wife was the strength behind our leaving and it has taken me this long to build up the courage to admit that I was wrong that the church is wrong and that the Gospel of Jesus Christ is not something to be ashamed of. I thank God for his grace and thank you for your efforts. May God bless you.

September 2012: After I became a Christian in 2007 we emailed back and forth because God made you my first authority on Mormonism and the intro to cults. I want to thank you for being there to answer my questions and your wonderful resources.

September 2012: I received my latest shipment from Utah Lighthouse Ministries yesterday and decided to start with the [LDS Doctrines of the Gospel] Student Manual, because it is very current and shows what young Mormon students are being taught. . . .

Never in my lifetime, in the years I have been a Christians, or before so far as I know, have I seen so much deception and so much of a need for Christians to have discernment. My wife ______ and I have known for quite a few years that Mormonism does not teach the same things as orthodox Christianity, but what I am seeing in the Student Manual demonstrates why so many Christians do not realize that Mormonism is not the same as Christianity, or else they think the differences are so negligible as not to matter.

Any religion that teaches the existence of plural gods, that men are in essence the same as God to the extent they can achieve exaltation to godhood, that Lucifer is the brother of Jesus, that our spirits existed prior to our earthly existence-—cannot be the same as orthodox Christianity.

In reading the [Doctrines of the Gospel] Student Manual I have to pay very close attention and pray for discernment because there will be a long passage about repentance, about the nature of Jesus Christ that sounds like it could have been written by a born-again Christian, but, not too farther on there will be a mention of our ultimate purpose in life, for people to prepare themselves to become gods. It is important for me to see this in LDS-approved material in case I am questioned about what I write in the future. There is a chapter on “pre-mortal existence” which I recognized immediately as outside of Christian thought, at least as expressed in the Bible.

It has been very disillusioning to me to see some of the most respected ministers in this country condoning Mormonism, but I have to remember The Bible warned us that there would be those who “if possible would deceive the very elect,” and my wife and I see that happening with people we know closely and love, relatives and friends. We need to be diplomatic but as I say, discerning as well.

September 2012: I wanted to say I received my order today . . .

I want to give you a REALLY BIG THANK YOU, for the extra material, especially the DVD — “Joseph Smith/ Jesus/Search for the TRUTH”, and the handout on terminology of the LDS church. This will greatly improve my effectiveness in teaching Mormons about the True Jesus.

I have been watching Ms. Sandra Tanner on the John Ankerberg DVD series on Mormons and have learned a great deal. Your written material, especially the terminology handout will help me learn and retain the info to help lead Mormons out of the deception they are in.

September 2012: Thanks to the You Tube videos, I have stopped going to Mormon meetings of any kind & am letting my Temple Recommend expire with no plans of renewing it. I have shared what I am reading online with my spouse who now sees where he has been lied to in past church teaching. He has been “less active” for some time now with no plans of becoming active again. We will be looking for a new church in ______ Utah.

September 2012: You start by hating the dead. And getting others to hate them. Then hate the living for having the nerve to worship God, according to the dictates of their hearts. ‘They enter not nor do they suffer others to enter’ . . . sound familiar. Hating God’s prophets has always been in vogue, but you act as though it is something you alone have the moral superiority to do right. Squinting at gnats they swallowed a camel. You ridicule the idea of perfection, then in the same breath condemn those who were not. Bla bla bla I’m sure you have heard it all before and will smile and ignore it this time as well. All I can do is pray for you. It isn’t too late to break off your employ with the prince of pride. Come to Christ.

September 2012: I just wanted to thank you for this site. I am a convert to the church. i joined when i was 18 and now I'm 24. i came into the church feeling like a new person and now i am leaving feeling broken. What i do know is that my god is a loving god. Mormon god, seems to be someone a tab bid raciest, sexiest, and closed minded. I didn’t want to spend 1 more minute in sacrament meeting or with SOME of my lds friends who thought that was [ok]. I am a strong, out spoken, democratic, African American woman who was raised by two white lesbian moms. There was no place for me in that church. i thank you for giving people like me hope and the information that we need to go on with our lives.

September 2012: Your site has really good material. i'm a practicing mormon at present but i like your site, id love more info and want to donate.

What’s Hidden in the New Headings?
Changes in the LDS Scriptures

At the end of February, 2013, the Deseret News featured an amazing article: “LDS Church Announces New Scripture Edition.” Utah was buzzing with people trying to determine what had been changed and why. The article noted that the changes included “revisions to study aids, new photos, updated maps,” “making historical and contextual adjustments to the section headings of 76 sections of the Doctrine and Covenants,” and “adding introductory headings to both official declarations at the end of the Doctrine and Covenants.”

According to the same article the LDS Church began working on this project in 2004. Currently the new edition is only available on the LDS web site, and the print version will be available in August 2013.

While many of the changes seem to be minor, some are obviously being made to counter historical problems raised by church critics.

In 2011 an online survey of about 3,000 disaffected Mormons, conducted by Open Stories Foundation, revealed:

. . . 81 percent [of disaffected Mormons] cited loss of faith in Mormon founder Joseph Smith as a moderate or strong factor in their no longer believing in the LDS Church. Another 84 percent said they studied LDS history and lost their faith. About 79 percent lost faith in Mormonism’s founding scripture, the Book of Mormon.

The survey . . . found that the two historical issues that most negatively affected belief in the faith were “the Book of Abraham”—a Mormon text that Smith said was based on Egyptian papyri he obtained—and polygamy, which the church abandoned in 1890.

Some of the alterations to the introductory material in the 2013 edition of LDS scriptures seem to be aimed at lessening the tension on these problem areas.

In the following material we will examine some of the major changes in the 2013 edition of LDS scriptures and discuss their significance.

Book of Abraham

In 1835 Joseph Smith arranged for the LDS Church to purchase a collection of ancient Egyptian papyri for $2,400 (equivalent to about $65,000 in 2012). Such a large investment was done despite the severe financial problems of the church, which shows the significance of the papyri in Smith’s mind. He soon announced that one of the papyri contained the actual writings of the biblical Abraham:

. . . I commenced the translation of some of the characters or hieroglyphics, and much to our joy found that one of the rolls contained the writings of Abraham, . . .

Smith’s translation of the papyri was published first in the 1842 Times and Seasons, in Nauvoo, Illinois, and then in England as part of the 1851 edition of the Pearl of Great Price, although not canonized until 1880. During this time, as scholars in the nineteenth century developed the ability to translate Egyptian hieroglyphics, criticism of Smith’s “translation” grew. Then, in December of 1912, the New York Times printed an article debunking Smith’s translation of the papyri titled “Museum Walls Proclaim Fraud of Mormon Prophet.” From that point on dozens of articles and publications, quoting current Egyptologists, have demonstrated that the Book of Abraham text is not a translation of the papyri. This seems to have been the motivation for the recent change in the Introduction to the Pearl of Great Price. In the 1981 Introduction we read:

The Book of Abraham. A translation from some Egyptian papyri that came into the hands of Joseph Smith in 1835, containing writings of the patriarch Abraham.

The 2013 Introduction to the Pearl of Great Price reads:

Notice the subtle shift from a direct translation to “inspired” in an effort to distance Smith’s text from the papyri. This seems to be a concession that the Book of Abraham text is not a translation of the papyri, thus alleviating the need to defend Smith’s interpretation.

When we examine the Book of Abraham itself we find that the church has removed the heading at the start of the book:

Translated from the Papyrus, by Joseph Smith.

Oddly, they have left unchanged the rest of the heading to the Book of Abraham, which still announces that the text is an actual translation of the papyrus:

A Translation of some ancient Records that have fallen into our hands from the catacombs of Egypt. The writings of Abraham while he was in Egypt, called the Book of Abraham, written by his own hand, upon papyrus.

This uneven editing leaves one wondering what they consider to be the connection between the papyrus and the text? Past leaders clearly believed the Book of Abraham was literally a translation of the papyrus.

The Facsimiles

Even if one were to accept their new explanation that the Book of Abraham was an “inspired translation” (i.e. a product of revelation from God, independent of the actual meaning of the papyri), the problem still remains regarding the drawings that accompany the translation. These facsimiles are clearly based on the images found on the Egyptian material. Smith described Facsimile No. 1 (shown below) as “Abraham fastened upon an altar” and the “idolatrous priest of Elkenah attempting to offer up Abraham as a sacrifice.”

Contrary to Smith’s explanations in the Pearl of Great Price, this is a standard Egyptian drawing relating to the embalming of the dead. The standing black figure is actually Anubis, the Egyptian god of the dead. Smith’s Book of Abraham is clearly dependent on Facsimile No. 1. In Abraham 1:12 we read “that you may have a knowledge of this altar, I will refer you to the representation at the commencement of this record.” Thus the Book of Abraham claims to be an actual translation with an illustration of Abraham being sacrificed. How can the LDS Church divorce the text of the Book of Abraham from the papyrus yet accept the facsimiles as part of Abraham’s record?

Smith’s explanation of Facsimiles No. 2 and 3 are likewise in error. Yet at the end of the explanation of Facsimile No. 2 we read: “The above translation is given as far as we [meaning Joseph Smith] have any right to give at the present time.” However, nothing has been “translated.” The text describing the illustrations does not conform to any actual translation of the Egyptian characters and appears to be entirely fabricated from Smith’s imagination. Noted Egyptologist James H. Breasted, Ph.D., gave this evaluation of Smith’s explanations of the facsimiles:

> These three facsimiles of Egyptian documents in the “Pearl of Great Price” depict the most common objects in the mortuary religion of Egypt. Joseph Smith’s interpretations of them as part of a unique revelation through Abraham, therefore, very clearly demonstrate that he was totally unacquainted with the significance of these documents and absolutely ignorant of the simplest facts of Egyptian writing and civilization.\(^8\)

Even LDS Egyptologist John Gee appears to see the problems with Smith’s purported translation and seems to downplay the significance of those issues. Speaking at the 2009 F.A.I.R. Conference he stated: “How the Book of Abraham was translated is unimportant. The Church does not stand or fall on the Book of Abraham.”\(^9\) However, many people leaving Mormonism disagree. If Joseph Smith fails as a translator of the Book of Abraham where his translation can be checked against the papyrus, why would anyone believe his “translation” of the Book of Mormon when there is no evidence that the gold plates ever existed?\(^10\)

Book of Mormon

The Introduction to the Book of Mormon has undergone a few significant changes. In the first sentence of the 1981 edition we read:

> The Book of Mormon is a volume of holy scripture comparable to the Bible. It is a record of God’s dealings with the ancient inhabitants of the Americas and contains, as does the Bible, the fulness of the everlasting gospel.

The phrase “as does the Bible” has been deleted. It is assumed that it was removed to enhance the importance of the Book of Mormon. After all, if the Bible contains the fulness of the gospel why would we need the Book of Mormon?

Lamanites

The Book of Mormon describes the migration of a group of Israelites from Jerusalem to the New World in about 600 BC. A few years after settling in America these people divided into two groups, the righteous Nephites and the wicked Lamanites. In the past Mormonism has claimed that the American Indians are the descendants of the Lamanites but in recent years this claim has been modified. In the Introduction to the 1981 Book of Mormon we read:

> After thousands of years, all were destroyed except the Lamanites, and they are the principal ancestors of the American Indians.

This has been changed to read:

> After thousands of years, all were destroyed except the Lamanites, and they are among the ancestors of the American Indians.

This change seems to have been made in response to the recent research on Native American DNA,\(^11\) which shows that almost all indigenous people of North and South America are Asiatic, not Semitic.

Also in the front part of the Book of Mormon is a section titled “Testimony of the Prophet Joseph Smith.” In this article Smith recounts the message given to him by the angel who told him of the gold plates containing the text of the Book of Mormon:

> He said there was a book deposited, written upon gold plates, giving an account of the former inhabitants of this continent, and the source from whence they sprang.

Again we see the Native Americans associated with the Book of Mormon people. Past LDS Church writings repeatedly referred to Native Americans as Lamanites, descendents of the Book of Mormon people. In fact some of the earliest LDS missionary efforts were to the “Lamanites” in New York, Ohio and Missouri (D&C 28:9; 32:2).12 Now that those people can no longer be claimed as descendents of Israelites, the church has stopped referring to them as “Lamanites.” But this leaves the Mormons with no identifiable group that has descended from the Book of Mormon people. One of Smith’s revelations prophesied:

. . . this testimony shall come to the knowledge of the Lamanites, . . . for this very purpose are these plates preserved, which contain these records . . . that the Lamanites might come to the knowledge of their fathers, and that they might know the promises of the Lord . . . (Doctrine and Covenants 3:18-20).

This leaves one to wonder how the LDS can take the gospel to the descendents of the Book of Mormon people if they can’t identify anyone as a Lamanite?

Racism

Traditionally LDS Church leaders have explained that the reason Native Americans are dark is that they are descended from the cursed Lamanites.

And he [the Lord] had caused the cursing to come upon them, yea, even a sore cursing . . . wherefore, as they were white, and exceedingly fair and delightsome, that they might not be enticing unto my people the Lord God did cause a skin of blackness to come upon them. (Book of Mormon, 2 Nephi 5:21)

In 1981, in an attempt to minimize the book’s racial teaching about people being cursed with a dark skin, the LDS Church changed the Book of Mormon promise that in the last days the Lamanites who converted to the gospel would revert to being “white” (2 Nephi 30:6). This verse used to promise the descendants of Lehi that upon conversion they would become “a white and a delightsome people.” However, this was changed in 1981 to read “a pure and a delightsome people.”

Now they have introduced additional changes to further obscure the Lamanite’s cursed skin color. The heading for 2 Nephi, chapter 5, has been reworded. In the 1981 edition it read:

Because of their unbelief, the Lamanites are cut off from the presence of the Lord, are cursed, and become a scourge unto the Nephites. (1981 heading for 2 Nephi 5)

It now reads:

Because of their unbelief, the Lamanites are cut off from the presence of the Lord, are cursed, and become a scourge unto the Nephites. (2013 heading for 2 Nephi 5)

Notice the removal of “skin of blackness.” The heading for Mormon, chapter 5, was also reworked. It used to read:

. . . The Book of Mormon shall come forth to convince all Israel that Jesus is the Christ—The Lamanites shall be a dark, filthy, and loathsome people—They shall receive the gospel from the Gentiles in the latter days. (Book of Mormon, 1981 Introduction, Mormon 5)

The 2013 edition has reworded the introduction to this chapter to eliminate the derogatory description of the Lamanites:

The Book of Mormon will come forth to convince all Israel that Jesus is the Christ—Because of their unbelief, the Lamanites will be scattered, and the Spirit will cease to strive with them—They will receive the gospel from the Gentiles in the latter days. (2013 Introduction, Mormon 5)

However, the chapter itself still retains the original racist teaching:

. . . for this people shall be scattered, and shall become a dark, a filthy, and a loathsome people, beyond the description of that which ever hath been amongst us, yea, even that which hath been among the Lamanites, and this because of their unbelief and idolatry. (Mormon 5:15)

In spite of these changes the Book of Mormon continues to promote racism by portraying “white” people as “fair and delightsome” while “dark” people are referred to as “cursed.”13

Plural Marriage

It is interesting to see how the Book of Mormon chapter headings have been reworded in relation to plural wives. In Jacob, chapters 2 and 3, are verses dealing with marriage and polygamy. The old heading for chapter 2 read:

Men should seek riches to help their fellow men—Jacob condemns the unauthorized practice of plural marriage—The Lord delights in the chastity of women.

By using the word “unauthorized” the Mormon was still free to promote plural marriage as long as it was “authorized.” This has been reworded to avoid mentioning plural marriage altogether:

13 www.utlm.org/onlineressources/racialstatements.htm
Men may seek riches to help their fellowmen—The Lord commands that no man among the Nephites may have more than one wife—The Lord delights in the chastity of women.

Regardless of the headings, Jacob 2:24, condemning David and Solomon’s plural wives, still contradicts Doctrine and Covenants 132:1, 38, 39, where David and Solomon’s wives are approved by God.

In response to criticism of polygamy LDS members will often point out that Jacob 2:30 says men are to have only one wife unless the Lord commands otherwise, thus implying that Smith’s polygamy was approved since it was commanded by God. This verse would not provide a justification of Joseph Smith’s many marriages as the Book of Mormon verse seems to indicate that the reason God might command plural wives would be for purpose of procreation:

For if I will, saith the Lord of Hosts, raise up seed unto me, I will command my people; otherwise they shall hearken unto these things. (Jacob 2:30)

However, there is no clear evidence that Smith produced any children from his 33+ plural wives. (Further discussion of plural marriage will be found in the section dealing with the Doctrine and Covenants.)

Monetary System

One criticism of the Book of Mormon has been the lack of evidence for coins in the New World. Prior to 2013, Alma 11 contained this chapter heading:

Nephite coinage set forth.

Evidently the LDS leaders recognize the problem of saying the Native Americans used coins. In trying to minimize the problem the heading has been changed to “The Nephite monetary system is set forth.” However just dropping the word “coinage” does not solve the problem. Alma 11:3 states that a day’s wages were “a senine of gold” or “a senum of silver, which is equal to a senine of gold.” Verse 4 speaks of the “names of the different pieces of their gold, and of their silver, according to their value.” This certainly paints a picture of a system of coins.

However, there is no evidence that Native Americans ever developed a monetary system based on gold and silver, whether one refers to it as coins or weights. Native American economics were based primarily on trade and agriculture. The Mayans traded quetzal feathers, obsidian, jade, cocoa beans, and other agricultural items, but did not use a “monetary system” based on gold and silver. They truly had a barter system.14 This would have been true of the early inhabitants in the eastern area of the United States as well.

Maps

The LDS church announced that the new 2013 edition of their scriptures would include more maps. There are 14 maps relating to the Bible and 7 maps for the church history section. Yet there is not one map relating to the Book of Mormon. The fact that they cannot identify a single location demonstrates that they have no concrete evidence that these people ever existed. To date there is not one artifact or sample of writing (independent of Joseph Smith) attributed to Book of Mormon people.

The closest thing to a map in official LDS literature is the illustration below that is in the 2008 edition of Book of Mormon Seminary Student Study Guide entitled “Possible Book of Mormon Sites (in Relation to Each Other).” However, at the bottom of the illustration is this warning:

Possible relationships of sites in the Book of Mormon based on internal evidence. No effort should be made to identify points on this map with any existing geographical location.15

The illustrator was very careful in making his chart so that one could not correlate it with a map of either North or South America.

Doctrine and Covenants

Smith’s revelations were first published in book form in 1833 under the title Book of Commandments. Then in 1835 a new edition was published under the title Doctrine and Covenants. Smith’s revelations underwent numerous revisions at that time, but other changes have been made since then.16

Code Names

After the Mormons left New York and settled in Ohio and Missouri in the early 1830’s they developed serious financial problems. Joseph Smith and several other leaders embarked on a number of business ventures. Mormon historians James B. Allen and Glen M. Leonard explain:

Administration of these economic affairs was complex, and in April 1832 the Prophet and others attempted to simplify it when they created a new administrative agency known as the Central Council. This council, in turn, immediately created the United Firm (sometimes called the United Order), consisting of Joseph Smith and a handful of other Church leaders in Ohio and Missouri. This was a joint-stewardship in which the members consecrated all their lands and business to the firm. They were to manage “all things pertaining to the bishopric” (D&C 82:12), supervise the establishment of stores in Ohio and Missouri, and use their profits not only for their personal living expenses but also for the economic needs of the Church, including assisting the poor.17

Fearing possible lawsuits, Smith masked their business plans by using code names for various men and locations (i.e. Zion refers to Independence, Missouri) in several of the revelations printed in 1835. These pseudonyms were used in Doctrine and Covenants, sections 78, 82, 92, 96, 103,104, and 105.18 While the new heading for section 78 gives some background on the “United Firm,” it does not discuss the code names used in the original printing of the revelation:

*Revelation given through Joseph Smith the Prophet, at Kirtland, Ohio, March 1, 1832. On that day, the Prophet and other leaders had assembled to discuss Church business. This revelation originally instructed the Prophet, Sidney Rigdon, and Newel K. Whitney to travel to Missouri and organize the Church’s mercantile and publishing endeavors by creating a “firm” that would oversee these efforts, generating funds for the establishment of Zion and for the benefit of the poor. This firm, known as the United Firm, was organized in April 1832 and disbanded in 1834 (see section 82). Sometime after its dissolution, under the direction of Joseph Smith, the phrase “the affairs of the storehouse for the poor” replaced “mercantile and publishing establishments” in the revelation, and the word “order” replaced the word “firm.” (2013 Doctrine and Covenants, Introduction to Section 78)*

Below is an example of the code names used in the 1835 Doctrine and Covenants:

The Lord spake unto Enoch, saying: Hearken unto me, saith the Lord your God, who are ordained unto the high priesthood of my church, who have assembled yourselves together . . . in other words, let my servant Ahashdah and my servant Gazelam or Enoch, and my servant Pelagoram sit in council with the saints which are in Zion. (1835 D&C 75:1-2)

However, the 2013 edition of the same passage reads:

The Lord spake unto Joseph Smith, Jun., saying: Hearken unto me, saith the Lord your God, who are ordained unto the high priesthood of my church, who have assembled yourselves together . . . in other words, let my servant Newel K. Whitney and my servant Joseph Smith, Jun., and my servant Sidney Rigdon sit in council with the saints which are in Zion. (D&C 78:1, 9)

The code names were obviously an attempt to keep the public from knowing the leaders’ financial plans.19 However, even though established by revelation, Smith’s United Firm failed and the church went further into debt.

Civil War Prophecy

Section 87 of the D&C has often been put forward as a proof of Joseph Smith’s prophetic ability, predicting the civil war twenty-nine years before the event.

Revelation and prophecy on war, given through Joseph Smith the Prophet, at or near Kirtland, Ohio, December 25, 1832. This section was received at a time when the brethren were reflecting and reasoning upon African slavery on the American continent and the slavery of the children of men throughout the world. (Sec. 87)

However, research has demonstrated that newspapers of the day had already announced the pending secession of South Carolina, making civil war a likely outcome. Smith was just putting into words the current fears of the nation. The new heading for this revelation seems to concede the point:

Revelation and prophecy on war, given through Joseph Smith the Prophet, at or near Kirtland, Ohio, December 25, 1832. At this time disputes in the United States over slavery and South Carolina’s nullification of federal tariffs were prevalent. (Sec. 87)

When South Carolina backed down from secession the 1832 revelation was evidently tucked away and not published until 1851 in England as part of the Pearl of Great Price. It was not placed in the Doctrine and Covenants until 1876, years after the Civil War had ended and the Mormons felt comfortable claiming it as a revelation.

The new introduction to D&C section 132 states:

Revelation given through Joseph Smith the Prophet, at Nauvoo, Illinois, recorded July 12, 1843, relating to the new and everlasting covenant, including the eternity of the marriage covenant and the principle of plural marriage. Although the revelation was recorded in 1843, evidence indicates that some of the principles involved in this revelation were known by the Prophet as early as 1831. See Official Declaration 1.

Thus the LDS Church now concedes that Smith was teaching plural marriage prior to July of 1843 but doesn’t explain which “principles” were known as early as 1831. At that time Joseph Smith had given a revelation commanding missionaries be sent to convert and intermarry with the American Indians. However, since the men who were sent on the mission were already married, it is obvious that they would have been practicing plural marriage.

While the revelation was not published at the time, it was mentioned in the Ohio Star on December 8, 1831. The purpose of marrying the Native Americans seems to have been aimed at gaining access to the Indian reservations. Ezra Booth wrote:

In addition to this, and to co-operate with it, it has been made known by revelation, that it will be pleasing to the Lord, should they [LDS missionaries] form a matrimonial alliance with the Natives, and by this means the Elders, who comply with the thing so pleasing to the Lord, and for which the Lord has promised to bless those who do it abundantly, gain a residence in the Indian territory, independent of the Indian agent. It has been made known to one, who has left his wife in the state of N.Y. that he is entirely free from his wife, and he is at liberty to take him a wife from among the Lamanites.

The 1831 revelation shows that it relates to marrying Native Americans to fulfill the Book of Mormon promise that in the last days the Indians’ skin color would be changed to “white.” The revelation states:

Verily, I say unto you, that the wisdom of man, in his fallen state, knoweth not the purposes and the privileges of my holy priesthood, but ye shall know when ye receive a fulness by reason of the anointing. For it is my will, that in time, ye should take unto you wives of the Lamanites and Nephites, that their posterity may become white, delightsome and just, for even now their females are more virtuous than the gentiles.

While it does not directly address the issue of plural marriage the fact that married men were commanded to take Native American wives demonstrates that it would have been the logical outcome. W. W. Phelps, early LDS leader, was present when the revelation was given and later asked Smith about it:

About three years after this was given, I asked brother Joseph [Smith, Jr.] privately, how “we,” that were mentioned in the revelation could take wives from the “natives”—as we were all married men? He replied instantly “In the[e] same manner that Abraham took Hagar and Keturah [Keturah]; and Jacob took Rachel Bilha, and Zilpah: by revelation—the saints of the Lord are always directed by revelation.”

If the Mormons are going to claim that there was some other 1831 revelation on marriage they should produce it. To date, the Native American revelation is the only one known.

The next hint of Smith knowing some of the “principles” of eternal marriage relates to his association with Fanny Alger, a young woman living with the Smiths in Kirtland, Ohio. Historian Todd Compton lists Fanny Alger as Joseph Smith’s first plural wife, giving the time of their marriage as early 1833. While there is evidence of an affair between them, proof of an actual marriage ceremony is more sketchy, relying on a late recollection of Levi Hancock.\textsuperscript{25} If Smith was privately married to Fanny, Oliver Cowdery, one of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon, was not aware of it. He wrote to his brother, Warren, in 1838 accusing Smith of having a “dirty, nasty, filthy affair” with Fanny Alger.\textsuperscript{26}

To calm rumors regarding Fanny’s relationship with Joseph, the church quickly added a section on marriage to the 1835 edition of the \textit{Doctrine and Covenants}, which declared, “Inasmuch as this church of Christ has been reproached with the crime of fornication, and polygamy; we declare that we believe, that one man should have one wife . . .”\textsuperscript{27}

Traditionally scholars have listed Smith’s first plural wife as Louisa Beaman, in Nauvoo, Illinois, in 1841. By 1842 rumors were circulating that Smith was secretly taking additional wives. We now know that Smith’s next several wives were already married to other men, which would have provided a cover for his activities.\textsuperscript{28}

In 1842 John C. Bennett, former mayor of Nauvoo and confidant of Joseph Smith, published his expose, \textit{History of the Saints}, charging Smith with secretly practicing polygamy. In answer to Bennett’s book, in August of 1842 the LDS newspaper \textit{Times and Seasons} denounced his charges of plural marriage as “base falsehoods and misrepresentations.”\textsuperscript{29} However, history confirms Bennett’s charge. Historians now concede that Smith had at least 34 wives by the time of his death in 1844.\textsuperscript{30}

In 1843, after Joseph Smith had secretly married about two dozen women in plural marriage,\textsuperscript{31} and had received strong opposition from his wife Emma, Smith’s brother Hyrum implored Joseph to record his revelation. Hyrum was convinced that he could take it to Emma and convince her that plural marriage was ordained of God. The first verse of section 132 explains that the purpose of the revelation was to answer Smith’s questions about “Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as also Moses, David and Solomon, my servants, as touching the principle and doctrine of their having many wives and concubines.”

Verse 4 is very emphatic that those who have had this revelation given to them must obey it or be “damned; for no one can reject this covenant and be permitted to enter into my glory.” Verse 52 specifically commands Emma to accept the women Smith had already married:

And let mine handmaid, Emma Smith, receive all those that have been given unto my servant Joseph, and who are virtuous and pure before me; . . . And I command mine handmaid, Emma Smith, to abide and cleave unto my servant Joseph, . . . But if she will not abide this commandment she shall be destroyed, saith the Lord; . . . (\textit{D&C} 132:52)

When Hyrum returned from showing Emma the revelation he told Joseph “he had never received a more severe talking to in his life.”\textsuperscript{32} Thus we see that the whole reason the revelation was committed to paper was to convince Emma about plural marriage. While Emma Smith probably did not know the extent of Smith’s plural marriages at the time she was shown the revelation, she was well aware of the issue.

Today the church is trying to present section 132 as mainly dealing with their concept of eternal marriage, with polygamy being only a side issue. History shows that it was just the opposite. For instance, Joseph F. Smith, nephew of Joseph Smith, apostle and later president of the LDS Church, preached in 1878 that the practice of plural marriage was necessary to achieve the highest exaltation in heaven. He also emphasized that Joseph Smith only entered into plural marriage after “an angel of God, with a drawn sword, stood before him and commanded that he should enter into the practice of that principle, or he should be utterly destroyed.”\textsuperscript{33}

Lorenzo Snow, fifth president of the LDS Church, gave the following information in an 1869 affidavit:

In the month of April, 1843, I returned from my European mission. A few days after my arrival at Nauvoo, when at President Joseph Smith’s house, he . . . explained to me the doctrine of plurality of wives; he said that the Lord had revealed it unto him, and commanded him to have women sealed to him as wives; that he foresaw the trouble that would follow, and sought to turn away from the commandment; that an angel from heaven then appeared before him with a drawn sword, threatening him with destruction unless he went forward and obeyed the commandment.\textsuperscript{34}

The early LDS Church leaders understood that section 132 of the \textit{Doctrine and Covenants} commanded plural marriage. It was not just a side issue to eternal marriage, it was the key issue. Emma wasn’t sealed in marriage to Joseph until May 28, 1843, at which time Smith had already been sealed to approximately two dozen women. In order to receive her eternal sealing to Smith, Emma had to accept Joseph’s plural marriages.35

The Manifesto – Declaration 1

In 1890 eighty-three-year-old LDS President Wilford Woodruff issued his famous Manifesto, counseling the Mormons to forsake plural marriage. This is printed in the Doctrine and Covenants as Declaration 1. While the Manifesto is presented as the results of a revelation, no actual revelation has been printed. The new heading for Declaration 1 reads:

The Bible and the Book of Mormon teach that monogamy is God’s standard for marriage unless He declares otherwise (see 2 Samuel 12:7–8 and Jacob 2:27, 30). Following a revelation to Joseph Smith, the practice of plural marriage was instituted among Church members in the early 1840s (see section 132). From the 1860s to the 1880s, the United States Government passed laws to make this religious practice illegal. These laws were eventually upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court. After receiving revelation, President Wilford Woodruff issued the following Manifesto, which was accepted by the Church as authoritative and binding on October 6, 1890. This led to the end of the practice of plural marriage in the Church.36

This carefully worded statement is misleading in several areas.
1. Not only does the Bible and Book of Mormon teach monogamy, but from 1835 until 1876 the Doctrine and Covenants contained a section that taught monogamy and denounced polygamy as a crime.

Inasmuch as this church of Christ has been reproached with the crime of fornication, and polygamy: we declare that we believe, that one man should have one wife; and one woman, but one husband, except in case of death, when either is at liberty to marry again.37

In 1876 this section was dropped from the canon and replaced by section 132.
2. The new heading implies that once plural marriage was made illegal the LDS Church gave up the practice. Ironically, polygamy was against the law in Illinois when the early Mormons began practicing it there.38 This was the reason for its great secrecy and the adamant denials of the doctrine and practice by Joseph Smith. Preaching just one month prior to his murder, Joseph Smith gave this denial of polygamy:

What a thing it is for a man to be accused of committing adultery, and having seven wives, when I can only find one. I am the same man, and as innocent as I was fourteen years ago; and I can prove them all perjurers.39

However, research shows that he had at least 34 wives at that time.40

Historian Richard S. Van Wagoner provides the following information about the Illinois law:

Polygamy, a criminal act under the 1833 Illinois Anti-bigamy Laws, was so unacceptable to monogamous nineteenth-century American society that Smith could introduce it only in absolute secrecy. Despite Smith’s explicit denials of plural marriage, stories of “spiritual wifery” had continued to spread.41

3. The heading for the Manifesto refers to polygamy as a “practice,” not a doctrine. The early Mormons risked prison for plural marriage because they believed it was a doctrine, and failure to practice it would keep one from exaltation. Preaching in 1866, President Brigham Young declared:

The only men who become Gods, even the Sons of God, are those who enter into polygamy.42

Joseph Smith told Heber C. Kimball that if he didn’t enter into polygamy “he would lose his apostleship and be damned.”43

4. The new heading states that the issuing of the Manifesto led to the end of the practice of plural marriage in the Church.” Notice that it says led to the end, not that polygamy was actually ended in 1890. What most readers will not know is that after 1890 over two hundred LDS apostles and leaders continued to take plural wives.44 LDS scholar B. Carmon Hardy observed:

The total of 262 post-Manifesto plural marriages found and described in the list [at the back of his book] makes it clear that a strong commitment to the doctrine continued past the turn of the century.45

Also, the statements following Declaration 1 show that the main reason plural marriage was abandoned was simply due to the fear of legal action against the church and possible arrest of the church leaders, not that it was no longer considered a doctrine.

5. By stating that “monogamy is God’s standard for marriage” and that the Manifesto “led to the end of the practice of plural marriage in the Church” the church seems to be suggesting that plural marriage is no longer a part of LDS beliefs. However, after the death of a wife a Mormon man is able to be married/sealed again in the temple to a new wife. According to LDS statements this would result in plural marriage in heaven as the man had two women sealed to him while on earth.

This doctrine was affirmed in October 2007 at the funeral for the second wife of President Howard W. Hunter, the fourteenth President of the LDS Church. The Deseret News reported:

President Hinckley affirmed the eternal nature of the marriage between Sister [Inis] Hunter and the former church president, whose first wife, Claire Jeffs, died after a long battle with Alzheimer’s disease and is now buried beside him in the Salt Lake Cemetery.

Inis Hunter “will now be laid to rest on the other side,” he said. “They were sealed under the authority of the Holy Melchizedek Priesthood for time and for all eternity,” he said, recalling the marriage ceremony he performed for them in the Salt Lake Temple in April 1990.

Another example of plural sealings is Apostle Russell M. Nelson’s marriage in 2006 to a BYU professor. The BYU NewsNet for April 7, 2006, announced the temple marriage of Apostle Nelson, age 81, to Wendy Watson. His first wife died in February of 2005 and this was the first marriage for his new wife. This would mean, according to LDS beliefs, that Nelson has two wives sealed to him for eternity.

Harold B. Lee, the eleventh president of the church, also remarried after his wife’s death and was sealed to another woman and was looking forward to a polygamous relationship in heaven. He, in fact, wrote a poem in which he reflected that his second wife, Joan, would join his first wife, Fern, as his eternal wives:

My lovely Joan was sent to me: So Joan joins Fern That three might be, more fitted for eternity. “O Heavenly Father, my thanks to thee” (Deseret News 1974 Church Almanac, p. 17)

After being widowed, Apostle Dallin Oaks remarried in the temple and believes he will be married eternally to both women. In 2002 he commented on his second sealing:

When I was 66, my wife June died of cancer. Two years later—a year and a half ago—I married [in the LDS temple] Kristen McMain, the eternal companion who now stands at my side. (Dallin Oaks, “Timing,” speech delivered at Brigham Young University, Provo, Utah, January 29, 2002)

According to LDS doctrine, these men will have their faithful wives and children with them in the resurrection, which would mean they will be living polygamy in the Celestial Kingdom.

Thus we see that the doctrine and practice of plural marriage has not been abandoned, but only delayed until the afterlife. It seems the LDS Church simply wants to keep it out of the public eye for better public relations and fear of being identified with polygamist splinter groups.

The new heading for Declaration 2, granting priesthood to blacks, reads:

The Book of Mormon teaches that “all are alike unto God,” including “black and white, bond and free, male and female” (2 Nephi 26:33). Throughout the history of the Church, people of every race and ethnicity in many countries have been baptized and have lived as faithful members of the Church. During Joseph Smith’s lifetime, a few black male members of the Church were ordained to the priesthood. Early in its history, Church leaders stopped conferring the priesthood on black males of African descent. Church records offer no clear insights into the origins of this practice. Church leaders believed that a revelation from God was needed to alter this practice and prayerfully sought guidance. The revelation came to Church President Spencer W. Kimball and was affirmed to other Church leaders in the Salt Lake Temple on June 1, 1978. The revelation removed all restrictions with regard to race that once applied to the priesthood.

While the church concedes that a few blacks were ordained to the priesthood during Joseph Smith’s lifetime, they do not explain that this did not grant blacks access to the temple rites in Nauvoo. For example, Elijah Abel, one of the earliest blacks to receive the priesthood, was never granted temple access, even though he advanced to the level of a Seventy and went on a mission for the church. Jane Manning, a faithful Mormon and maid in the Smith household, begged the church leaders to allow her to be sealed in the temple, but the request was denied.

49 See Jerald & Sandra Tanner, Curse of Cain: Racism in the Mormon Church, (Utah Lighthouse Ministry, 2004), pp. 41-42.
Notice also that the church claims “no clear insights” into why priesthood was denied to blacks. This is a blatant dismissal of over 100 years of racial statements by their prophets and apostles. Prior to 1978 the LDS leaders seem to have been quite clear as to the reason. Preaching in 1859, at the October Conference of the LDS Church, Brigham Young declared:

Cain slew his brother . . . and the Lord put a mark upon him, which is the flat nose and black skin . . . How long is that race to endure the dreadful curse that is upon them? That curse will remain upon them, and they never can hold the Priesthood or share in it until all the other descendants of Adam have received the promises and enjoyed the blessings of the Priesthood and the keys thereof. Until the last ones of the residue of Adam’s children are brought up to that favourable position, the children of Cain cannot receive the first ordinances of the Priesthood. They were the first that were cursed, and they will be the last from whom the curse will be removed.50

Mormon blogger Joanna Brooks gives the following analysis of the new heading:

Church leaders have long maintained public ambiguity about the history of the ban and its end; they have rarely acknowledged the ordination of early African-American Mormons nor have they cited anti-racist teaching in the Book of Mormon in connection with the Church’s own troubled history on race. The new heading historicizes the ban (suggesting the influence of a robust Church History department) and depicts it as a contradiction to the original impulses of the faith, not corrected until 1978. The heading does, some commentators have noted, offer continuing cover to Brigham Young, whose on-the-record racist statements to the Utah legislature suggest his influence in the evolution of a non-ordination policy. Commentators also note the absence of reference to the fact that black women were not historically admitted to LDS temple worship until the 1978 announcement.51

History of the Church

Other interesting deletions from the Doctrine and Covenants include all the references to the History of the Church whose authorship is attributed to Joseph Smith.52 This leaves the reader with no idea where to find further information on the events that led up to the revelations. On the official LDS web site, in a question and answer section relating to the recent adjustments to the LDS scriptures, we read:

While foundational for our understanding of early Latter-day Saint history, the History of the Church contains historical errors about some sections of the Doctrine and Covenants and is inaccessible to most Church members. In addition, the revised section headings rely on other sources, including the Manuscript History of the Church, early manuscript revelation books, and other sources that are reproduced in the Joseph Smith Papers. Quotations from the Manuscript History of the Church and the History of the Church are collectively referred to in section headings as Joseph Smith’s history.53

First, it should be noted that the reason the History of the Church is “inaccessible” is because the church has discontinued printing it. While copies are still available in various libraries, most members do not have these volumes. Second, by simply citing the information as coming from a collection of writings referred to as “Joseph Smith’s history” one is left with no idea as to the specific source. The Manuscript History of the Church is comprised of about 2400 pages and the Documentary History of the Church spans some 3000 pages. To say that a certain statement or quote can be found somewhere therein is like telling a person that the source can be found in the library.

Conclusion

While some of the new headings in the LDS scriptures provide additional information, there is still an obscuring of troubling historical details.

Writing in 2012 reporter Peggy Fletcher Stack commented on the crisis faced by LDS members when they encounter critical information:

Surprised by what they find so easily online, more and more members of the Utah-based Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are encountering crises of faith. Some even leave the fold and, feeling betrayed, join the ranks of Mormon opponents.

“It’s a growing problem, acknowledges LDS general authority Marlin Jensen, the faith’s outgoing church historian, and one Mormon leaders are working to confront.

“Never before have we had this information age, with social networking and bloggers publishing unvetted points of view,” Jensen said in an interview Monday.

“The church is concerned about misinformation and distorted information, but we are doing better and trying harder to get our story told in an accurate way.”

Unfortunately, the LDS Church is the main culprit in the spread of “distorted information.” As more and more people seek information on the Internet and from books not published by the LDS Church, the leaders will need to do a better job of candidly addressing its problematic history.

WHAT HAPPENED TO THE OFFICE OF LDS CHURCH PATRIARCH?

On April 6, 2013 the Salt Lake Tribune announced the death of Eldred G. Smith, at the age of 106, the longest-serving LDS General Authority and last to hold the position of Church Patriarch. He was also the great-great-grandson of Joseph Smith’s brother Hyrum. Originally the office was to be passed down through the Smith lineage, but the LDS Church dropped the position in 1979, when Eldred G. Smith was retired. 1 The article brought attention to the often ignored problem of the demise of a church priesthood office supposedly established by revelation. 2

Joseph Smith claimed through revelation to re-establish the ancient order of “Patriarch,” patterned after the father’s blessings given in the Bible (see Gen. 27 and Gen. 49). Unlike the Old Testament blessings given by a father on his deathbed to his sons, today the LDS blessings are given by non-relatives to various members of the church as a sort of road map for their lives and declares their lineage through one of the tribes of Israel.

Mormonism claims that the designation “Patriarch” is the same as “Evangelist.” LDS Apostle Bruce R. McConkie wrote:

Having lost the true knowledge of the priesthood and its offices, and knowing nothing of patriarch blessings as a necessary part of church administration, the false traditions of the sectarian world have applied the designation evangelist to traveling preachers, missionaries, and revivalists. The sectarian theory is that evangelists travel to spread the gospel. 3

However, there is absolutely nothing in the New Testament about the need of Patriarchs in the church. Also, there is nothing in the Bible to indicate that an evangelist was ever known as a Patriarch. The word “evangelist” comes from the Greek word “evangel” which means “the good news.” Thus an evangelist is one who proclaims “the good news.” Paul wrote to Timothy “Preach the word; . . . do the work of an evangelist.” (2 Timothy 4:2, 5)

Smith originally ordained his father to the office of Church Patriarch, who was later succeeded by Hyrum Smith, Joseph’s older brother. The Doctrine and Covenants, sec. 124:91-92, states: “let my servant William be appointed, ordained, and anointed, as counselor unto my servant Joseph, in the room of my servant Hyrum, that my servant Hyrum may take the office of Priesthood and Patriarch, which was appointed unto him by his father, by blessing and also by right; That from henceforth he shall hold the keys of the patriarchal blessings upon the heads of all my people, . . .”

Prior to 1979 this office was part of the LDS Church General Authorities and held by direct descendants of Smith. The Encyclopedia of Mormonism, vol. 3, under PATRIARCH, explains:

Before 1979, Patriarch to the Church was a Church officer whose chief duty was to confer patriarchal blessings on Church members who generally did not have the service of stake Patriarchs readily available to them. The Prophet Joseph Smith explained that an “evangelist” (as in Ephesians 4:11) is a “patriarch” (TPJS, p. 151); that is, he confers the blessings of a patriarch upon members of the Church. Patriarchs are currently ordained in individual stakes of the Church, but for many years there was a patriarch to the entire Church. He was considered one of the General Authorities.

Today the LDS Church no longer has the office of Patriarch as part of the General Authorities. Currently one man in each stake, or diocese, of the church is set apart as the local Patriarch. But this is a complete reversal of the original office. Since this top leadership position was claimed to be established by revelation one is left to wonder why it was removed. Evidently the LDS Church leaders were concerned about continuing an office that required one to be a Smith descendant. Again Mormons are faced with the problem of current policy overriding past revelation. If it required a revelation to end the ban on blacks holding the LDS priesthood, why wouldn’t it require a revelation to nullify the office of Church Patriarch which was established by revelation? Lorenzo Snow’s Couplet:
“As man now is, God once was;
As God now is, man may be”.

“No Functioning Place in Present-Day Mormon Doctrine?”
A Response to Richard Mouw

By Ronald V. Huggins*

Man may become as God himself!
Let those who disagree howl as they may!
Robert L. Millet and Joseph Fielding McConkie1

I. Richard Mouw’s Tabernacle Apology

During his appearance with Ravi Zacharias in the Mormon Tabernacle on November 14, 2004, Fuller Seminary President Richard Mouw apologized on behalf of evangelicals for “bearing false witness” against Mormons. When challenged about his remarks, Mouw sent out an e-mail identifying places where he felt evangelicals had misrepresented Mormon teaching. Among these was the claim that “Mormonism teaches that God was once a human being like us, and we can become gods just like God is now,”2 a belief, Mouw goes on to assure us, that has “no functioning place in present-day Mormon doctrine.” As anyone familiar with Mormonism will immediately recognize, Mouw’s words allude to the famous couplet coined by the fifth LDS Church President Lorenzo Snow:

As man now is, God once was;
As God now is, man may be.3

Is Mouw correct in saying that the teaching contained in this couplet no longer has any functioning place in present-day Mormonism? In trying to answer this question, we must begin by looking at where Snow’s couplet came from and why it caught on as an important summary of the Mormon doctrinal system.

II. The Origins of Snow’s Couplet

In May 1836 Lorenzo Snow visited Kirtland, Ohio, where his sister Eliza R. Snow had moved the previous year after converting to Mormonism. At a blessing meeting in the Kirtland Temple, Snow met Joseph Smith Sr. (the father of the Mormon Prophet) who predicted that he would soon be converted to the LDS faith. Smith Sr. went on to make the astonishing prediction that afterward Snow would “become as great as you can possibly wish—EVEN AS GREAT AS GOD.” Snow was baptized two weeks later.

Snow was unable to make anything of this remarkable prediction until shortly before embarking on a mission to England in the spring of 1840. He reports that one day as he sat listening to Elder H. G. Sherwood’s explanation of the parable of the laborers in the vineyard (Matt 20:1–16), the Spirit of the Lord rested mightily upon me—the eyes of my understanding were opened, and I saw as clear as the sun at noonday, with wonder and astonishment, the pathway of God and man. I formed the following couplet which expresses the revelation, as it was shown me, and explains Father Smith’s dark saying to me at a blessing meeting in the Kirtland Temple, prior to my baptism, as previously mentioned in my first interview with the Patriarch.

As man now is, God once was:
As God now is, man may be.5

At first Snow did not share his couplet with anyone besides his sister Eliza, and Brigham Young, with whom he served in England. But in January of 1843, after returning from his mission, Snow mentioned it to the Prophet Joseph Smith, who said to him: “Brother Snow, that is true gospel doctrine, and it is a revelation from God to you.”6 4 Eliza R. Snow Smith, Biography and Family Record of Lorenzo Snow (Salt Lake City, UT: Deseret News, 1884) 10.

5 Ibid. 46. This text provides a curious setting since the parable teaches almost the exact opposite of what was revealed to Snow.

He thus imposes on his listeners the conclusion they must draw if he turns out to be wrong about what he says about God in the King Follett Discourse. They are to consider him a “false teacher,” and approve of his renouncing “all further pretensions to revelations and inspirations, or to be a prophet.” Another way of saying this is that if by any defensible standard, Joseph Smith was a prophet of God, then the King Follett Discourse is the product of prophetic inspiration. The comfortable option of continuing to consider Smith a true prophet and the King Follett Discourse mere speculation is not an option Smith himself was willing to leave open.

2. Joseph Smith’s last public discourse. In his last public sermon, given on 16 June 1844, Joseph Smith again turns to the subject of the history of God. This time he offers what he felt sure was biblical support for the idea that God the Father had a father. He found it in the language of the King James Version’s translation of Rev 1:6: “And hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father . . . [italics added],” in accordance with which, he says, there clearly exists “a God above the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.”11

Smith was incorrect in seeing this as the true implication of the passage, a better translation being “unto his [Jesus’] God and Father” (see, e.g., NIV). This he seemed to have recognized more than a decade earlier when he had, under the guidance of inspiration, corrected this same passage in his Inspired Version of the Bible. This version was produced in the early 1830s and rendered the phrase “unto God, his Father.” In the present sermon, however, he declares the KJV rendering “altogether correct in the translation.”12 Thus we find the teaching of Lorenzo Snow’s couplet being confirmed in final discourses of the Prophet Joseph Smith.

III. The Couplet and the Prophet Joseph Smith

1. The King Follett Discourse. On 7 April 1844 Joseph Smith provided public confirmation to the theology of Snow’s couplet in the famous King Follett Discourse. This is clearly seen in the following excerpts:

God himself was once as we are now, and is an exalted man, and sits enthroned in yonder heavens! . . . I am going to tell you how God came to be God. We have imagined and supposed that God was God from all eternity. I will refute that idea . . . . It is the first principle of the Gospel to know for a certainty the Character of God, and to know that we may converse with him as one man converses with another, and that he was once a man like us; yea, that God himself, the Father of us all, dwelt on an earth, the same as Jesus Christ himself . . . you have got to learn how to be Gods yourselves, and to be kings and priests to God, the same as all Gods have done before you, namely, by going from one small degree to another, and from a small capacity to a great one; from grace to grace, from exaltation to exaltation, until you attain to the resurrection of the dead, and are able to dwell in everlasting burnings, and to sit in glory, as do those who sit enthroned in everlasting power.7

The relation between the Prophet’s teaching here and his own revelation did not escape Lorenzo Snow’s notice. According to LeRoi C. Snow, Lorenzo Snow, in his own copy of the Times and Seasons, “which I now have . . . drew more particular attention, with his own indelible pencil, to this part of the Prophet’s King Follett sermon than to any other reference in all the six volumes.”8

As the King Follett Discourse unfolds, it becomes clear that the Prophet Joseph Smith expected his followers to treat what he was saying there with utmost seriousness. Earlier, he had identified as the object of the sermon “to find out the character of the only wise and true God, and what kind of a being he is.” “But if I fail to do it,” he went on to say, “it becomes my duty to renounce all further pretensions to revelations and inspirations, or to be a prophet; and I should be like the rest of the world—a false teacher.”9 Yet after this he goes on to sound a note of confidence, even applying language used of Jesus to himself: “I will prove that the world is wrong, by showing what God is . . . for I speak as one having authority” (see Matt 7:29).10

12 Some editions of the sermon punctuate in such a way as to avoid Joseph’s having meant that God the Father had a Father by placing a comma after above so that it has Joseph saying instead: “…there being a God above[,] the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ” (e.g. JS-H 6:474). There is no indication in the original manuscript of the sermon suggesting the inclusion of a comma (see The Words of Joseph Smith [2d rev. ed./1st computer ed.; comp. and ed. Andrew F. Ehat and Lyndon W. Cook; Salt Lake City, UT: Deseret, 1996] 379 [GospelLink CD-Rom]), nor is the sense it gives borne out in the rest of the sermon. Quite the contrary, the idea that God the Father had a father is explicitly endorsed at other places in the sermon:

If Jesus Christ was the Son of God, and John discovered that God, the Father of Jesus Christ, had a Father, you may suppose that he had a Father also. Where was there ever a son without a father? And where was there ever a father without first being a son? Whenever did a tree or anything spring into existence without a progenitor? . . . Hence if Jesus had a Father, can we not also believe that he had a Father also? (Millennial Star 24:109–10)
IV. THE ONGOING SIGNIFICANCE OF THE COUPLET IN SNOW’S CAREER

Throughout his life Snow continued to stress the centrality of the teaching of the couplet. In a discourse published in 1894 he described it “as a star continually before me.”13 There was never any question for Snow of it having arisen from the realm of speculation on his part. It came to him as a “vision, which was just as clear as the sun ever shone.”14 In 1892 he included it in a poem, part of which reads as follows:

This royal path has long been trod
By righteous men, each now a God:
As Abra’m, Isaac, Jacob, too,
First babes, then men—to gods they grew.
As man now is, our God once was;
As now God is, so man may be,—
Which doth unfold man’s destiny.15

Nor did the couplet cease to represent a central element in Snow’s teaching after he was set apart as the fifth president of the LDS Church on September 13, 1898. Indeed, he re-emphasized it in the strongest possible terms in a sermon preached only five days later, when, speaking on “the highest glory to which it is possible for man to attain,” Snow said:

That exalted position was made manifest to me at a very early day. I had a direct revelation of this. It was most perfect and complete. If there ever was a thing revealed to man perfectly, clearly, so that there could be no doubt or dubiety, this was revealed to me, and it came in these words: “As man now is, God once was; as God now is, man may be.”16

About three months before his death, which occurred on 10 October 1901, Snow again affirmed the truth of the couplet in the following words:

That fulfilled Father Smith’s declaration. Nothing was ever revealed more distinctly than that was to me. Of course, now that it is so well known it may not appear such a wonderful manifestation, but when I received it, the knowledge was marvelous to me.17

V. THE COUPLET IN RECENT TIMES

Mouw’s assertion concerning the teaching of Lorenzo’s Snow’s couplet is remarkable given the fact that (for most of this writer’s lifetime, at least) it has fallen into the category of things Mormons know even if they know nothing else about their faith. The Osmond Brothers even included a song that alluded to this teaching called Before the Beginning on their 1973 album The Plan.18

If by “no functioning place” Mouw means that the couplet is no longer taught or mentioned in official and semi-official Mormon publications, then he is again incorrect. On that level all one needs to do is flip through the pages of the LDS Church’s official weekly newspaper, the LDS Church News, in order to find examples of the couplet being taught. The September 13, 1997 issue, for example, included this quotation from Eldred G. Smith: “Temple Marriage is not just another form of church wedding; it is a divine covenant with the Lord that if we are faithful to the end, we may become as God now is.”19 This passage not only quotes the couplet, it also clearly explains its continuing functioning place as a lynch-pin doctrine of the LDS Church relating to Temple Marriage.

That LDS children continue to be taught the couplet can be seen in the nifty “President Lorenzo Snow Crossword,” included in the March 2002 “Funstuf” section of the LDS Church’s official Children’s magazine Friend, where we read as the clue for 10 across:

He wrote as a couplet (two lines of verse) a revelation that he had and that the Prophet Joseph Smith said was true: As man ______ is, God once was: As God now is, man may be.20

The correct answer filling in the blank is “now.” Notice in this case that the couplet is presented to Mormon children not merely as a “revelation” from God, but also as one that Joseph Smith himself had declared to be true. So again, how can Mouw be correct when he accuses Christians of bearing false witness when they say Mormons teach the couplet?

In defense of his remark Mouw appeals to a number of specific sources, including BYU professors Robert L. Millet and Stephen E. Robinson, as well as the 1997 book Mormon America by Richard N. and Joan K. Ostling. Mouw further states that “a number of LDS writers have been formulating the ‘becoming God’ theme in terms that are common in Eastern Orthodoxy.” We must now examine these sources.

1. Robert L. Millet. Robert L. Millet is a popular LDS writer and scholar toward whom many evangelicals in Utah and elsewhere look as the voice of a new Mormonism. This voice stands at the front of a concerted effort to drag the LDS Church, kicking and screaming if necessary, to a place much closer to traditional Christianity, though Millet himself firmly denies having any such intentions. Millet, Nov. 30, 2004. Millet responded that “I don’t know that we teach it . . . I haven’t heard it discussed for a long time in public discourse.”

Again in an interview with Don Lattin appearing in the San Francisco Chronicle in April 1997, Lattin asked Hinckley: “[D]on’t Mormons believe that God was once a man?” Hinckley replied: “I wouldn’t say that. There was a little couplet coined, ‘As man is, God once was. As God is, man may become.’ Now that’s more of a couplet than anything else. That gets into some pretty deep theology that we don’t know very much about.”

Richard and Joan Ostling noted how shortly after his public remarks, before an “in-house, all-Mormon audience . . . at General Conference, Hinckley talked about media depictions of the church and, in an apparently pointed reference to those interviews, assured his listeners, ‘None of you need worry because you read something that was incompletely reported. You need not worry that I do not understand some matters of doctrine.’ He added, ‘I think I understand them thoroughly.’”

Millet seems to speak of these public statements as if they were official statements of current LDS thinking on the subject. There are three reasons we should not go along with him on this. First, when Luke Wilson, director of the Institute for Religious Research, questioned the First Presidency about the accuracy of the quotation of Hinckley in TIME Magazine, F. Michael Watson, Secretary to the First Presidency, responded: “The quotation you reference was taken out of context.”

Millet does not go as far as Mouw, who asserts that Mormons do not teach the couplet. Millet says that Mormons regard the teaching of the couplet as true but not central. He does so on the basis of a general reference to public statements by current LDS President Gordon B. Hinckley.

2. Gordon B. Hinckley’s public expressions of agnosticism concerning Snow’s Couplet. The statements Millet alludes to both took place in 1997 and have since become well known to critics of the LDS Church. Richard Ostling in his TIME Magazine, PBS NewsHour with Jim Lehrer interview, asked President Hinckley whether “God the Father was once a man as we are.” Hinckley’s answer was: “I don’t know that we teach it . . . I haven’t heard it discussed for a long time in public discourse.”

Following up on Mouw’s remarks I wrote to Millet asking him whether he really said the things Mouw credited him with saying. His answer was as follows:

What I explained to Richard Mouw is that the related doctrines of “God was once a man,” and “Man may become as God,” though a part of our doctrinal literature and certainly accepted as truth by Latter-day Saints, are not a part of what might be called central, saving doctrine. President Hinckley, more than once, stated that he did not know much about the doctrine and didn’t know anyone that did. They are not discussed liberally at general conference, nor do we know much beyond the fact that Joseph Smith and Lorenzo Snow taught them.

21 As he did, for example, in response to a question of mine. I wrote: “I often hear from Evangelicals who look upon you as the voice of a new kind of Mormonism that is in the process of turning its back on the old teachings and aiming to become more mainstream traditional Christian” (e-mail to Millet, Nov. 25, 2004). Millet responded that: “Notwithstanding the repeated suggestion that Latter-day Saints are seeking to move into the mainstream of traditional Christianity, we are not” (e-mail from Bob Millet, Nov. 30, 2004).

22 “Bob Millet has made the same point to many of us.”

28 Ibid., 421.
public remarks in the TIME Magazine, PBS NewsHour with Jim Lehrer interview, at least, should not be taken as representative of Hinckley’s true position, much less the official teaching of the LDS Church on the matter.29

Second, there is evidence that Hinckley, who is regularly referred to as the PR Prophet, was being intentionally vague before non-Mormon audiences, perhaps hoping to make Mormonism appear more mainstream Christian. Thus in an interview on Australian television with David Ransom that was aired on 9 November 1997, Hinckley similarly hedged on another foundational Mormon teaching, only to back down when challenged:

RB: And God has a wife?

GBH: I don’t know, but I suppose so. As we have a Father I assume we have a mother.

RB: I understood your teachings said that God has a wife?

GBH: Yes. Well we . . . Yes we have a mother in heaven. We believe so. We’re sons and daughters of God.30

The doctrine that God has a wife is very frequently and openly taught in official LDS Church publications. It is declared in the widely publicized “The Family: A Proclamation to the World,” issued by the First Presidency and the Council of the Twelve Apostles of the LDS Church in September 1995, that:

ALL HUMAN BEINGS—male and female—are created in the image of God. Each is a beloved spirit son or daughter of heavenly parents, and, as such, each has a divine nature and destiny. Gender is an essential characteristic of individual pre-mortal, mortal, and eternal identity and purpose.31

We see this teaching fleshed out in the model dialogue between a father and his ten-year-old son Dean, in the Parent’s Guide published and currently used by the LDS Church:

“Who made our bodies first of all?”

“Heavenly Father” was the prompt answer.

“That’s right, son. Heavenly Father made Adam and Eve. Who do they look like?”

“Heavenly Father and Jesus, and I guess our heavenly mother too,” said the now attentive boy.

“Well, we really don’t know much about our heavenly mother, but we can expect that Eve looked like her and Adam looked like Heavenly Father.”32

Hymn number 292 in the current LDS hymnal, O My Father, emphasizes this doctrine in the words: “When I lay this mortal body by, Father, Mother may I meet you in your royal courts on high?” In the context the author, Eliza R. Snow, was not speaking of her earthly parents, but of the heavenly Father and Mother. This same hymn is included in the selection of hymns in the standard LDS Church published introductory book on Mormonism, Gospel Principles.33 Gordon B. Hinckley knows it and refers to it in a discussion on whether the practice of some Mormons of praying to the Mother in heaven is acceptable: “It has been said that the Prophet Joseph Smith made no correction to what Sister Snow had written. Therefore, we have a Mother in heaven.”34 So when Hinckley began his answer to the question about the wife of God with, “I don’t know, but I assume . . . ” he was interjecting a note of doubt that we do not find when he speaks of the doctrine before believing Mormons.

Third, we should not look to the context of interviews with outsiders to find Hinckley’s most authoritative explanations of Mormon doctrine. Such settings are not always entirely friendly, so we should not be surprised to find Hinckley somewhat more guarded than when he is before more accepting audiences.

Hinckley himself has remarked that interviews with the public media are “always a worrisome undertaking because one never knows what will be asked.”35 They seem, he goes on to say, to “know how to ask questions that come at you like a javelin. It is not exactly an enjoyable experience.”

Does Hinckley know very much about the teaching of the couplet? The best answer seems to be the one he gave the faithful at the October 1997 general conference: he understands it “thoroughly.” But for some reason he wanted to play down its significance before non-Mormon audiences. Consistent with such a conclusion is the fact that Hinckley is familiar with the King Follett Discourse and refers to it as “an important doctrinal document in 29 This despite the fact that the Ostlings have since proven that Hinckley’s remarks were not in fact taken out of context, that Watson’s accusation was in fact false (see Ostling and Ostling, Mormon America 421–22).

32 The Parent’s Guide (Salt Lake City, UT: The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 1985) 31. It is common in LDS publications to find “Heavenly Father” (caps) but “heavenly mother” (no caps).

the theology of the Church.” In addition, the Teachings of Gordon B. Hinckley, published in the same year as the public statements we have been discussing, contains explicit teaching on the couplet:

The whole design of the gospel is to lead us, onward and upward to greater achievement, even, eventually, to godhood. This great possibility was enunciated by the Prophet Joseph Smith in the King Follett sermon . . . and emphasized by President Lorenzo Snow. It is this grand and incomparable concept: As God now is, man may become!

It should be noted, however, that even though Hinckley is discussing Snow’s couplet, he is not focusing on the first part, the part about God having once been a man. This is consistent with what Hinckley said in the San Francisco Chronicle interview. After Hinckley had said that the couplet contained “some pretty deep theology that we don’t know very much about,” Don Lattin came back with: “So you’re saying the church is still struggling to understand this?” Hinckley replied: “Well, as God is, man may become. We believe in eternal progression. Very strongly. We believe that the glory of God is intelligence and whatever principle of intelligence we attain unto in this life, it will rise with us in the Resurrection. Knowledge, learning, is an eternal thing.”

This raises an interesting question: Is it possible that Hinckley and the present LDS Church are trying to play down the first half of Snow’s couplet while continuing to emphasize the second? Is there a trend toward avoiding discussion of God’s history as a man, while at the same time continuing to affirm our future as Gods? If such a trend is underway, it should not be hard to detect, because the content of official church publications is strictly monitored by the so-called Correlation Committee, which oversees the content of LDS Church publications.

And, indeed, as we look at materials published by the LDS Church itself, as opposed to less official Mormon publishers, which regularly publish much less guarded statements, we discover that this does appear to be a trend.

3. Our becoming Gods. There are regular and repeated references to our becoming Gods, even retaining the capital “G,” but increasingly few explicit statements about how God moved from being as we are now to his current exalted state. So, for example, in the 2001 John Taylor volume of the Teachings of the Presidents of The Church series, used in the regular weekly meetings at the Ward, each human is called “a God in embryo” [capital “G”] who possesses “in an embryonic state, all the faculties and powers of a God. And when he shall be perfected, and have progressed to maturity, he will be like his Father—a God . . . As the horse, the ox, the sheep, and every living creature, including man, propagates its own species and perpetuates its own kind, so does God perpetuate his.

The February 2002 issue of the LDS Church magazine Ensign reprinted a 1909 First Presidency statement declaring that “the undeveloped offspring of celestial parentage [i.e. the human being] is capable, by experience through ages and aeons, of evolving into a God [capital ‘G’].” And lest there be any doubt about the continuing authority of this First Presidency statement, we find in the “Making the Most of This Issue” section at the end of the same issue a teaser for it that 37 Teachings of Gordon B. Hinckley 179. This remark was derived from Gordon B. Hinckley, “Don’t Drop the Ball,” Ensign (Nov. 1994) 48.

40 The plan of salvation is older than the earth and has not been added to or changed since that early time . . . Elder Orson Pratt expressed his understanding of the antiquity and unchangeableness of the plan as follows:

The dealing of God toward his children . . . is a pattern after which all other worlds are dealt with. The creation, fall and redemption of all future worlds with their inhabitants, will be upon the same general plan. The Father of our spirits has only been doing what his progenitors did before him . . . The same plan of redemption is carried out by which more ancient worlds have been redeemed. The reason Elder Pratt’s statement makes doctrinal sense is because the plan of God is perfect, and perfection is unchanging. If the plan of redemption varied from time to time, from world to world, or person to person, men would be saved by different means, and salvation would have its bargain days. The “sameness” of the plan of salvation does not mean that every world is an exact monotonous and unimaginative copy of every other, or that there are the same number of inhabitants on each. It means that the same eternal principles, the same kind of mortality and the same kind of salvation are in effect wherever there are gods and devils and men.

asks: “Ever wonder about the Church’s official teaching on the creation of mankind and evolution?”

The present edition of the widely used introductory manual Gospel Principles declares of those who “receive exaltation in the celestial kingdom” that “[t]hey will become gods” and “will have everything that our Heavenly Father and Jesus have—all power, glory, dominion, and knowledge.”

4. God’s history as a man who worshipped a more ancient deity. Early editions of Gospel Principles (1978–88) said that “[o]ur spirits resemble our heavenly parents although they have resurrected bodies. We have inherited the potential to develop their divine qualities. If we choose to do so, we can become perfect as they are.”

Beginning with the 1992 edition, however, the phrase “although they have resurrected bodies” was dropped.

Among the few explicit discussions of the history of God in recent times in official church publications were (1) the 1985 Search These Commandments: Melchizedek Priesthood Personal Study Guide; and (2) the LDS Institute (college-level) manual Achieving a Celestial Marriage (1992). In the former, we read under the heading “Our Father Advanced and Progressed Until He Became God”:

- President Joseph Fielding Smith said: “Our Father in heaven, according to the Prophet, had a Father; and since there has been a condition of this kind through all eternity, each Father had a Father” (Doctrines of Salvation 2:42).
- President Joseph F. Smith taught: “I know that God is a being with body, parts and passions. . . . Man was born of woman; Christ, the Savior, was born of woman; and God, the Father was born of woman” (Church News [Sept. 19, 1936] 2).

And the first paragraph of the introduction of the latter:

In the relationships of husband and wife and parent and child we begin to approach the divine calling of godhood. Our Heavenly Father and mother live in an exalted state because they achieved a celestial marriage.

As we achieve a like marriage we shall become as they are and begin the creation of worlds for our own spirit children.

For a long time the writer expected Achieving a Celestial Marriage, which continued to be used as an institute text for some years after Hinckley’s 1997 interviews, would be revised or replaced, because it stood nearly alone among LDS Church published materials in the blatant link it makes between our heavenly parents’ exaltation and our own. This finally happened in 2001 when it was replaced by a new manual that avoids such explicit descriptions of the mechanism underlying the first half of Snow’s couplet.

All of this is not to say, however, that the teaching of the first half of Snow’s couplet has been abandoned or rejected. One needs only to read the reaffirmation of it in the new institute manual Presidents of the Church (2003) to know that the LDS Church still embraces both halves.

It would further seem an overstatement to say that the LDS Church is de-emphasizing the teaching of the first half of the couplet. What really appears to be happening is that the language used to express the teaching is being intentionally toned down: same teaching, different words used to describe it.

5. Stephen E. Robinson, Mouw, and the “official” question. Mouw also had said that “Stephen Robinson insisted, in the book he co-authored with Craig Blomberg, that this [i.e. the teaching of the couplet] is not an official Mormon teaching.” Robinson’s actual words in relation to Snow’s Couplet and the King Follett Discourse are as follows:

Neither statement is scriptural or canonized in the technical sense, and neither has been explained or elucidated to the church in any official manner, but they are so widely accepted by Latter-day Saints that this technical point has become moot.

Robinson actually admits that the teaching of the couplet is “so widely accepted by Latter-day Saints” that the technical question of its canonicity “has become moot.” This is not the point one would have naturally gathered from Mouw’s depiction of what Robinson had said.

Robinson’s statement that it has not been “explained or elucidated to the church in any official manner,” however, is simply false. The reality is that throughout the history of the LDS Church it has been almost continually “explained or elucidated” in every possible official manner, short of giving it its own page in LDS Scripture. In the February 1982 Ensign, the issue was raised in the “I Have a Question” column whether Snow’s couplet was “accepted as official doctrine of the church.” Gerald N. Lund responded by saying that “there has been no ‘official’ pronouncement by the First Presidency declaring that President Snow’s couplet is to be accepted as doctrine”—“[b]ut that is not a valid criteria for determining whether or not it is doctrine.”

The bottom line is that “it is clear that the teaching of President Snow is both acceptable and accepted doctrine in the Church today.” Lund also quotes Joseph Fielding Smith’s 1971 remark that Snow’s couplet expressed a doctrine that “has of course been known to the prophets of all the ages.”

Here as well is an appropriate point for bringing up Mouw’s comment that the couplet is not “an official Mormon teaching.” The problem is that the LDS Church has never clearly defined a process by which its doctrines become “official.” For the rank-and-file Mormon the teaching set forth by the prophetic leadership at the semi-annual general conference is as official as it gets. In a way, everything the LDS Church teaches now is official now, but that may all change later, as it has in the past. Therefore everything the Church teaches is also at least potentially unofficial. The main thing the individual Mormon must do is to find out what is being taught now and believe it as God’s word for them. To the evangelical this process seems both dubious and strange, but the Mormon finds it easy to explain under the umbrella of progressive revelation. In the meantime, Mormon scholars quite appropriately speculate about how teachings become “official.” But at this stage their speculations cannot in any way be said to be official, and therefore it is quite inappropriate for them to try to insist that non-Mormon scholars must prove well-known Mormon doctrines to be official before they are allowed to speak of them. Rather, non-Mormon scholars must evaluate the various theories of “official” in order to see which, if any, correspond to the actual way in which authority functions in the Mormon Church. Unfortunately, Robinson himself has set forth a very inadequate theory. According to him, there are three things that make a Mormon teaching official: (1) it is taught in the “standard works, the Bible, Book of Mormon, Doctrine & Covenants, and the Pearl of Great Price”; (2) it appears in an “official statements of the First Presidency and/or the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles”; and (3) it is “sustained” by being voted on in general conference.

Of the three criteria, only the second carries any real weight. Functionally, the reality approaches a situation in which the voice of the present leadership trumps all three. The LDS canon does not function for Mormons in the same way that the biblical canon functions for Christians. One of the reasons for this is that Joseph Smith’s theology changed rapidly and radically during the course of his career. As a result, the Book of Mormon contains teachings that are radically at odds with both current Mormon doctrine and the doctrine of the other books in the Mormon canon. For example, Book of Mormon Christology falls to the right of traditional trinitarianism in that it does not distinguish clearly between the divine persons, yet the Book of Abraham in the Pearl of Great Price falls to the left of traditional trinitarianism in that it abandons the unity of the Godhead in favor of a doctrine of plurality of Gods. Because of this tension current Mormonism can only derive things from the Book of Mormon where it agrees with current LDS teaching. Where it does not agree, it must be artificially harmonized, as when new meanings are given to theological words Joseph Smith used in the Book of Mormon where he originally meant something quite different from current LDS understanding. For example, because the Book of Mormon speaks of God as “omnipotent” (Mosiah 3:5) and “knowing all things” (2 Nephi 9:20), Mormons are forced to own these words. Yet in doing so they must also radically redefine them, so that God’s omnipotence and omniscience do not interfere with the same attributes in all the Gods that went before (e.g. God the Father’s father) and that will come after (e.g. all the Gods in embryo that now dwell upon the earth).

So, for example, since the meaning of traditional theological terms has been redefined in Mormonism, Robert L. Millet and Joseph Fielding McConkie can write things such as the following, which are absurd from a historic Christian perspective:

52 Ensign (Feb. 1982) 40. The reason Lund gives is this: “Generelly, the First Presidency issues official doctrinal declarations when there is a general misunderstanding of the doctrine on the part of many people. Therefore, the Church teaches many principles which are accepted as doctrines but which the First Presidency has seen no need to declare in an official pronouncement.”

56 Stephen E. Robinson, Are Mormons Christians? (Salt Lake City, UT: Bookcraft, 1991) 17: “No new doctrine is binding as the official doctrine of the Church unless it has been received by the President of the Church and until it has been sustained by the Church in general conference.” This is interesting also in light of Millet’s apparent willingness to accept as somehow authoritative the off-hand comments the President of the LDS Church makes in public interviews.

Our Father’s development and progression over an infinitely long period of time has brought him to a point at which he now presides as God Almighty. He is omnipotent, omniscient, and, by means of his Holy Spirit, omnipresent: he has all power, all knowledge, and is, through the Light of Christ, in and through all things.\(^{58}\)

Does Mouw think that the LDS Church has adopted the traditional meanings of the uses of the “omnis” or other traditional terms in relation to God? If so, he is mistaken.\(^{59}\)

Robinson’s third criterion that a teaching has been “sustained” or voted upon in general conference also fails to describe accurately how teachings become official in the LDS Church. In the first place, votes taken at general conference sessions are invariably unanimous. Since Ensign began tracking this in the early 1970s there has never been a report of a non-unanimous vote at general conference. It is true that the reports for the October 1975 general conference and the general conferences from 1981 to 1983 do not mention whether the vote was unanimous and that therefore it may be that some “troublemaker” had voted against the crowd; all the others (October 1974 and April 1975 and every conference between April 1976 and October 1980 and between April 1984 and the present) have been unanimous.

Robinson’s presentation makes things sound more democratic than they really are. As Clark L. and Kathryn H. Kidd write,

Voting against sustaining is such a rare occurrence that many Church members never see it happen. The reason for this is that most members realize that they are not casting a vote when they raise their hands . . . they are being asked to ratify or sustain a decision that has been made by those in authority.\(^{60}\)

Since the results of the sustaining vote are always the same, they are a mere formality, a rubber stamp. Because this is the case, there is really no reason for the leadership to delay action until general conference once they have set their minds on doing something. A case in point is President Spencer W. Kimball’s revelation granting the priesthood to blacks announced on June 9, 1978, which marked one of the greatest turning points in LDS history. Robinson cites it as an example of how doctrine becomes official:

When Spencer W. Kimball declared in 1978, by revelation from the Lord, that the priesthood was henceforward to be given to all worthy male members, this pronouncement became Official Declaration—2 by the sustaining vote of a general conference on 30 September 1978.\(^{61}\)

Robinson only gives part of the story. The LDS Church leadership did not wait until it had been sustained in general conference to put the new revelation into practice. Rather, it began immediately. Probably the first African American to be ordained to the LDS priesthood in the United States was Joseph Freeman Jr. of Granger, Utah, only two days after the June 9 announcement.\(^{62}\) By the time the next general conference was convened the floodgates had already long since been opened and the ordination of blacks become an irreversible reality. The only thing that remained was for the gathered faithful to cast their obligatory unanimous vote in favor of its inclusion in the Doctrine & Covenants, which they did at the Saturday afternoon session on September 30, 1978.

VI. The Couplet and the Doctrine of Deification

Mouw comments that “[a] number of LDS writers have been formulating the ‘becoming God’ theme in terms that are common in Eastern Orthodoxy: that ‘we shall be like Him’ in the sense of I John, but that we will never be Him.” As far as I know, no Mormon ever taught that we are going to be God the Father. A better way of expressing this from the perspective of the Mormon system is to say that we will never catch up with God. We may well reach a point at which we will be equal in attributes and exaltation to God as he is now. But by the time we do, God will have become more exalted. Indeed, the very fact that we as his children come to be exalted actually adds to his greater exaltation, and by extension, to the greater exaltation of the current God’s God, and

\(^{59}\) Such a mistake is certainly understandable in view of the way Robinson writes on these things, as for example when he says: “Latter-day Saints do not, or at least should not, believe that they will ever be independent in all eternity from their Father in heaven or from their Savior Jesus Christ or from the Holy Spirit. Those who are exalted by his grace, always be ‘gods’ (always with a small g, even in the Doctrine and Covenants) by grace, by an extension of his power, and will always be subordinate to the Godhead” (Blomberg and Robinson, How Wode 86). This statement of Robinson’s is of course not official, nor is it consistent with the Church manuals he reads and discusses at his local Mormon ward, which, as we have already seen, freely use the capital “G” in describing what we shall be, as do First Presidency statements (Ensign [Feb. 2002] 30). Nevertheless, Robinson’s view need not contradict what might be called the continuous teaching of the Mormon Church, as long as he is willing to say that the present God the Father is also eternally dependent on his Father, Savior, and Holy Spirit, and therefore is also ultimately only a god with a small “g” just like we will be). However, much as the LDS Church has become reserved in teaching the traditional Mormon plan of salvation as expressed in the couplet, it has never repudiated it. Therefore Robinson must be asked whether he wants to say that the current God is more ultimate in some sense than the Gods that went before. And then, if the answer is yes, why?

instead of all the Gods above him. Exaltation, in other words, functions as a sort of cosmic pyramid scheme. This is the teaching of the Prophet Joseph Smith in the King Follett Discourse: “God is . . . glorified and exalted in the salvation and exaltation of all his children.”

What Mouv is referring to also has to do with the current interest among Mormon apologists in the Eastern Orthodox doctrine of deification. Although we find occasional earlier references to the alleged similarity between the Mormon and Orthodox teaching on deification,64 the current interest among Mormons in this doctrine arose in the 1970s and 1980s after two Mormon scholars, Philip L. Barlow and Keith E. Norman, became interested in the subject independently while studying at Harvard.65

But it is Stephen E. Robinson who has done most to give the apparent similarity an apologetic slant. In his Encyclopedia of Mormonism subentry “LDS Doctrine Compared With Other Christian Doctrines,”66 Robinson quotes what he says is the second-century writer Irenaeus of Lyons as saying, “If the word became a man, it was so men may become gods.” In reality, it is not Irenaeus he is quoting (Irenaeus never said this)67 but the generalized couplet used by Eastern Orthodox theologians, beginning with Athanasius, to express the doctrine. In the context Robinson claims that the Eastern Orthodox couplet says “essentially the same thing” as Lorenzo Snow’s couplet.68

More recently, even Mormon Apostle Dallin Oaks spoke of the alleged similarly between Eastern Orthodox and LDS teaching at general conference when he said that the Mormon understanding of the future life “should be familiar to all who have studied the ancient Christian doctrine of deification or apotheosis.”69

This development would seem to function very nicely in the LDS/Evangelical apologetic exchange, because by appealing to the ancient doctrine LDS writers can present themselves as closer to the roots of Christianity than Western Christians, who use the language of deification only infrequently.70 But the emphasis must rest on the words “seem to function.”

In reality, there is nothing in the Eastern Orthodox or early Christian doctrine of deification to which any Western Christian should object. Indeed, there is much to be gained by reading the mature Eastern Orthodox reflection on the subject.71 The only problem from an exegetical point of view is that the standard formulation of the doctrine relies on a misinterpretation of a particular passage in the Gospel of John. Early Christians did not have trouble describing their future hope in terms of “becoming gods,” because they took Jesus’ quote of Ps 82:6, “I said you are gods,” in John 10:34 to be a reference to “those . . . who have received the grace of the ‘adoption,’ by which we cry, ‘Abba Father’” (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.6.1; cf. Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 124).72 But there is no reason to suppose that that is what the author of John had in mind.

The real appeal of the Eastern Orthodox doctrine to Mormon apologists is that it is regularly stated in a way that sounds similar to Snow’s couplet. But this has to do more with the fact that a couplet is used in both cases than that the two couplets have anything really in common. It is in fact when one lays the two couplets side by side to reflect upon Robinson’s claim that they say “essentially the same thing” that their real differences appear.

70 We still occasionally encounter it, as, for example, in the eighth-century Celtic theologian John Scottus Eriugena (d. c. 877) who declares: “He [Jesus] came down alone but ascends with many. He who made of a human being makes gods of men and women” (Prologue to the Gospel of John 21; ET: Celtic Spirituality [The Classics of Western Spirituality]; trans. and intro. Oliver Davies with the collaboration of Thomas O’Loughlin; New York/Mahwah, NJ: Paulist, 1999) 430). The great western Father Augustine of Hippo (d. 430) also uses the language of deification: “For God wishes to make thee a god; not by nature, as He is whom He has begotten, but by his gift and adoption” (Sermon 166:4; quoted in Norman, Deification: The Content of Athanasian Soteriology 104). Deification language has even been preserved as part of the Roman Catholic Mass, where it currently appears as part of the Liturgy of the Eucharist: “By the mystery of this water and wine may we come to share in the divinity of Christ, who humbled himself to share in our humanity.” On the evangelical side we find it, for example, in the lyrics of the great Methodist hymnologist Charles Wesley (d. 1788): “He deigns in flesh to appear, Widest extremes to join; To bring our vileness near, And make us all divine” (“Blessed Assurance” [hymn Let Heaven and Earth Combine]). Or again, speaking more broadly of the trinitarians as such, Ralph Waldo Emerson writes in his journal entry for Feb. 14, 1827: “The Trinitarian urges a natural & sublime deduction from his creed when he says of the Saviour that as he became a partaker in our humanity so we also shall become partakers in his divinity” (Journals and Miscellaneous Notebooks of Ralph Waldo Emerson [ed. William H. Gilman and Alfred R. Ferguson; Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press of Harvard University, 1963] 3.74).

63 Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith 348. See on this concept the discussion on Lorenzo Snow’s couplet in Millet and McConkie, The Life Beyond 143–53. The passage quoted from Joseph Smith appears on p. 150.

68 The same point is made by Robinson in Are Mormons Christians? (p. 60) and probably also in the booklet Latter-day Saints: 10 Basic Issues (Provo, UT: Foundations for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies, 1998) 26. I say “probably,” because although Robinson is one of the contributors to this booklet, it does not explicitly credit him with this section.

First Half:
Snow’s Couplet: “As man now is God once was . . .”
Athanasius’s Couplet: “the Word of God Himself . . . assumed humanity . . .”
(On the Incarnation of the Divine Word 54)\(^{73}\)

Here Snow is talking about the Father’s having become God, even though he was previously a man. Athanasius was talking about the Son’s having become a man, even though he was previously God.\(^{74}\) Who can fail to see that, although similar words are used, the underlying concepts are completely different?

Second Half:
Snow’s Couplet: “As God now is man may be.”
Athanasius’s Couplet: “. . . that we might become God.”

The Orthodox teaching refers to our becoming, as 2 Pet 1:4 says, “partakers of the divine nature,” through union with Jesus Christ. John’s Gospel presents Jesus as praying that believers will be one as he and the Father are one (John 17:21; cf. 10:30), yet it is without in any way losing sight of Jesus’ unique relationship with God as both the pre-existent Word and only begotten of the Father (John 1:1, 18). The Son has divine life in himself (John 5:26). We have it only through the Son (John 3:36; 6:53–54, 68; 10:28), only as we abide in him (John 15:1–7). The same point is made by Athanasius: we partake of Christ’s divine life only because Jesus first partook of our mortal flesh:

But if death was within the body, woven into its very substance . . . the need was for Life to be woven into it instead . . . the Saviour assumed a body for Himself, in order that the body [i.e. our bodies], being interwoven as it were with life, should no longer remain a mortal thing, in thrall to death, but as endued with immortality and risen from death, should therefore remain immortal. For once having put on corruption, it could not rise, unless it put on life instead.” (On the Incarnation of the Divine Word 44)

Mormons, however, cannot really appeal to 2 Pet 1:4 in defense of their doctrine at all, because their notion of exaltation does not involve becoming partakers of the divine nature.\(^{75}\) They believe that they have the divine nature already, as “literally the sons and daughters of Deity . . . undeveloped offspring of celestial parentage,”\(^{76}\) “gods in embryo,”\(^{77}\) and, to use Robinson’s own words, as the “same species of being as God.”\(^{78}\) They only have to grow up into it through a process toward perfection that includes a period of testing during the mortal experience.

VII. Conclusion:
Mouw, the Couplet, and the Future

Richard Mouw has served very faithfully as a kind of evangelical statesman, and I believe he has much to contribute to the evangelical/Mormon dialogue in the future. In relation to the continuing currency of Lorenzo Snow’s Couplet, however, Mouw is simply incorrect when he says that it has “no functioning place in present-day Mormon doctrine.” Mouw’s recent apology also places him in a somewhat ambiguous position given the fact that he contributed an enthusiastic preface to a book published in 2002 containing two articles presenting Snow’s couplet as representative of Mormon teaching.\(^{79}\) In that preface, Mouw offered an apology similar to the one rendered in the Mormon Tabernacle. He stressed how “ashamed” he was “of our record in relating to the Mormon community”\(^{80}\) and spoke of how “we evangelicals” had been “bearing false witness against our LDS neighbors.” Against this he set the essays contained in the book, which he represented as “a laudable attempt to set the record straight.” The question raised by Mouw’s more recent apology in the Tabernacle is whether he has changed his mind in the past two years and come to believe that the book he previously praised is guilty of bearing false witness as well, and that he now wishes to distance himself from it. However that may be, it has been the writer’s purpose in the present article to show that Snow’s couplet is not irrelevant to current Mormon teaching. Unlike relics of old Mormonism such as Brigham Young’s Adam-God doctrine\(^{81}\) or plural marriage,\(^{82}\) Lorenzo Snow’s couplet summarizes a truth that still lives at the heart and logical center of the whole Mormon religious system. Evangelicals are not therefore “bearing false witness” when they regard it as representative of Mormon belief and critically discuss it as such.

\(^{74}\) Craig L. Blomberg has already underscored this important distinction: “Most of Stephen Robinson’s references to early Christian belief in the corporeality of God are talking about the Incarnation—the Son taking upon himself human flesh, not the Father having a body as in the uniquely Mormon claim” (“Is Mormonism Christian,” in The New Mormon Challenge [ed. Francis Beckwith, Carl Mosser, and Paul Owen; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2002] 320).

Current Status of the Lorenzo Snow Couplet
By Sandra Tanner

During the seven years since the original publication of the previous article by Ron Huggins, Dr. Richard J. Mouw has continued to maintain that the Lorenzo Snow couplet is no longer promoted as LDS theology and refers to it as “folk Mormonism.” However, the official LDS priesthood manuals published in 2011 and 2012 have quoted it. In 2011 the LDS Church issued the manual Teachings of Presidents of the Church: Lorenzo Snow. In it we read:

Eternal life is to us the sum of pre-existence, present existence, and the continuance of existence, holding out to us the power of endless progression and increase. With that feeling and that assurance, we believe that “As man is, God once was, and as God is, man may become.” . . . we believe that it is not improper, that it is not unrighteous, for us to hope that we may be permitted to partake of the attributes of deity and, if we are faithful, to become like unto God; . . .

This year the study manual for both the LDS Priesthood and Relief Society is Teachings of Presidents of the Church: George Albert Smith. In it we read:

“As man now is, God once was:
“As God now is, man may be.”

Feeling that he had received “a sacred communication” that he should guard carefully, Lorenzo Snow did not teach the doctrine publicly until he knew that the Prophet Joseph Smith had taught it. Once he knew the doctrine was public knowledge, he testified of it frequently. . . . His son LeRoi, said, “This revealed truth impressed Lorenzo Snow more than perhaps all else.”

Further on the manual quotes Lorenzo Snow regarding God’s progression:

Through a continual course of progression our Heavenly Father has received exaltation and glory and he points us out the same path and, inasmuch as he is clothed with power, authority and glory, he says, “walk ye up and come in possession of the same glory and happiness that I possess.”

However, the LDS view of a God who hasn’t always been God, and that man’s goal is to achieve the same level of godhood, would strike Christians as a great blasphemy. When God spoke to Isaiah, one of the great prophets of the Old Testament, He declared:

I am the first, and I am the last; and beside me there is no God. . . . is there a God beside me; yea, there is no God; I know not any. (Isaiah 44:6, 8)

. . . from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God. (Psalm 90:2)

I am God, and not man; the Holy One in the midst of thee. (Hosea 11:9)

Excerpts from Letters and Emails

Oct. 2012: Hi this is very interesting journey, by the way i just have to send a comment about your site wow it is a wealth of information. thank you for putting the time and effort in creating a website and thanks again for spending the time helping me and other Mormons . . .

Oct. 2012: I wrote to you a few weeks ago when my brother was killed in an accident and his funeral was [conducted by Mormons] . . . thank YOU personally for, unknowingly, giving a stranger great comfort during this awful and deeply painful time. . . . YOUR VIDEOS, your kind face, your words, your comforting voice, when discussing this odd religion helped me stay strong and got me through those awful days . . . PS, your videos also helped another sister . . .

Oct. 2012: Leaving Mormonism is so difficult to do. You get so brainwashed into not thinking for yourself. I thank God every day that I saw the light. I thank him for Sandra’s part in my conversion.

Oct. 2012: It all started to come apart for me when I read Mormonism: Shadow or Reality . . . especially where it talks about Isaiah 29:4 being prophecy of the BoM. The first time I used a Strong’s Concordance, I looked up all bible passages about familiar spirits and realized Isa 29:4 couldn’t be a prophecy.

Oct. 2012: I’m a 20 year old from Buenos Aires, Argentina. I met the mormon church almost 4 years ago . . . Fortunately I discovered many FACTS that made me KNOW that that church (like any other I guess) is a corporation full of secrets and lies and its real “mission” is to concentrate power and money. Missionaries keep coming to my house and I try to be nice to them (it’s not their fault that they don’t even know their own church, because they are brainwashed since they are little), and I try to tell them why I think the way I think, with FACTS.
Oct. 2012: Today is the 1-year anniversary of the removal of my name from church records. I want to thank you for the help your website & resources have given me. I believe you are called by God to help people like me find the true path to Jesus & God....

Nov. 2012: I stumbled across your website while surfing the internet. It seems to me that your little group is based on hate and intolerance to another religion, much like the Christian persecution of the Jews and with all of the hate in the world, why create and operate some offensive and hateful in today's world? I can honestly say that for you bigoted fools to hold onto such hate is pathetic bs. Look up the definition of Christian and I guarantee you douche bags fall well outside those parameters and it's time to grow up or shut up or don't and reap what you sew.

Nov. 2012: Years ago I had read that you were thinking of retiring. I sent you an email and told you how important your ministry is, and asked you not to. I am so glad that you reconsidered that thought. You are perhaps more needed now than ever... praise God for your ministry.

Nov. 2012: Thank you for everything that you and Jerry have done to help break me free and clear my head. You and Jerry's hard work brought me to a place to where I can think clearly and rationally. I would not be who I am today without you. Thank you.

Nov. 2012: While I feel empathy for the Tanner family at the loss of Jerald, I would have loved to have seen the look on the face of Jerald when he crossed the veil and saw the Prophet Joseph Smith welcoming him. As a convert to the LDS Church, the efforts of people like the Tanner's has only reinforced my testimony because greater is He that is within me [the Spirit] than he that is in the world.

Nov. 2012: You were very instrumental in my conversion from LDS. I have some people in our church who are interested in trying to reach Mormons. Love you and your work.

Nov. 2012: I'd like to extend my thanks to you for all your work. It's been vital to my search for the truths I was denied for 34 years. I'm sharing my LDS membership resignation with you, as I did with Shawn and Alathea, because of how important you've all been to me and my final decision.

Nov. 2012: If you dear people would put all the money you spend on the Salt Lake Messenger into doing good for others, taking care of your own, we would all be better off. We are all entitled to believe as we want to. Give it up! Joseph Smith was & is a Prophet.

Nov. 2012: Good morning. Thank you for the work you do. We are Christians who moved to Utah last year, unaware of what we were really coming to. It has been an unpleasant shock to learn what a God-less, spirit-less place this really is.

Dec. 2012: I suppose I'm sticking with the Mormons because I find them to be very pleasant and agreeable people. Anyway Madam, you seem very polite and ladylike. I've watched some videos of your speeches and can't help but be impressed by your skill in stating your case. Like I say, though, I still feel the presence of the Lord in Mormonism. These people have been good to me and I want to show them loyalty.

Dec. 2012: I wanted to tell you that UTLM has been such a valuable resource for me. I am an ex-mormon (BIC), and my husband and I left the church together after we married. I am teaching a 6 month series of classes to evangelical teens and adults on how to witness to the LDS. Your website provided me with one-stop shopping for these valuable materials, and I was especially delighted to see all the digital content now available.

Dec. 2012: Loved the latest issue of the SLC Messenger [November 2012]. You all did a wonderful job exposing the wackiness of Mormonism. This issue will for sure go into my library of false beliefs. Thank you for your hard work in bringing the true Jesus to the lost.

Jan. 2013: I know you must receive a wide variety of opinions, I want to encourage you to keep spreading the truth of God's love. Speaking the truth in love can be difficult but you have done it well.

Jan. 2013: I'm writing to you because I have a deep appreciation for the work you and Jerald have done over the years. I'm amazed at the dedication you've shown in trying to help Mormons find truth.

For 36 years now, I've been married to a wonderful, faithful, Mormon... She wasn't active in the church when we met in 1976, and we talked about her faith before getting married, resulting in her assuring me she wouldn't go back to Mormonism. Well, as so often happens, when children come into our lives, we reach for our roots and that is what she did. She insisted our kids be raised in the church as well. This has been the only real problem (as a couple) that we've had in our marriage. The church has been between us since 1980 and we have at times struggled greatly with the division it has caused.

In 2009, I decided to give it my all to try and prove (once and for all) that the church was true so we could unite our family in Faith... What I found in my study of church history, and through daily Bible study, has born out what my gut was telling me all along, that Joseph Smith was a fraud... Sandra, as a member of the body of Christ, I want you to know that I love you. You, your family, and Utah Lighthouse Ministry, are in my prayers always. Please pray for... as well. I'm hopeful, in time, she will come to see truth. I continue to encourage her to read the New Testament, but, she almost seems to be afraid to actually do it. I don't want you to worry, I don't push her hard. I've learned I can drop a seed here and there, and not make her miserable.

Again, my main reason for writing is to say thanks! Ministries like yours are making a difference! Knowing the ONE TRUE GOD, is all that matters!

Jan. 2013: After listening to you on a couple of TV programs, I can see that your understanding of Mormonism is limited. Also, you told Jason Wallace and John Ankerberg that the Bible says that God has always been God. The Bible doesn't say that. It says that "... from eternity to eternity, thou art God." The LDS consider each of us as having existed "... from eternity to eternity." So my son can say of me, "Dad, from eternity to eternity, thou art my father." Note, that I haven't been his father forever; but I HAVE existed from eternity, and will continue to exist for all eternity... I believe your declaration that God is unchanging does not apply to ways He adapts to increased horizons.
Jan. 2013: I’m a brazilian member of the mormon church, my baptism was in 1980. I have various doubts about mormon’s doctrine, principally about Joseph Smith. I want to know documents copies for discuss about mormon history. Here in Brasil the members to know only official church history.

Jan. 2013: The In-law side of my family are largely polygamist mormons and I really love witnessing to them using information I receive from you.

Feb. 2013: God has said that the book of mormon is the most correct book and that by reading and living by it. (being the gospel and an additional witness of Christ) we could become closer to God. Realize that he didn’t say the perfect book, but the most correct. Information can only bring us to the desire to read or not to read to pray or not to pray about it. It is truly our choice. But we see that no evidence or archeology has ever sanctified the heart in knowing the truth and being converted to the Gospel of Christ, but by the Spirit of God.

Feb. 2013: On the previous testimony sunday on the 3rd of this month I bore my testimony saying “I know this church is false and I know Joseph Smith was not a prophet”. . . . the only thing I remember was a SIGH in the public in front of me, but I DID IT! I didn’t expect it to be such a relief after saying loud what I KNOW. After testifying I gave to my bishop the resignation letter . . .

Feb. 2013: I accidentally came across your website. I and my husband left the church, 18 months ago. I joined the church in my twenties. . . . And eventually, went to the Temple. My experience there was very mixed. I was shocked in the endowment session, with the slitting of the throat, etc. . . . [prior to 1990] But each day I went along for a week and I rationalized it to be alright. Then I meet my husband [who] grew up in the church. . . . He loved reading FARMS and he subscribed to Dialogue. . . . But with his learning of hieroglyphics he realized that the book of Abraham was false. . . . So we are now members of the Anglican Church, and my husband now smiles when he goes to church, we attend a bible study group. . . . I can only pray that one day they [the rest of the family] will know The Lord.

Feb. 2013: You guys crack me up. . . . why are you making it your life message to “debunk” Mormonism? . . . God has always led his people through prophets, so by what authority are you disseminating “information” in regards to His will? . . . If you think you know better than divine revelation, well, by all means carry on. Sad, sad little people. So sorry to have chanced upon your website.

Feb. 2013: . . . By the way, your book 41 unique teachings has been a top-notch help to me. . . . I witnessed to a lady this morning. . . . THANK YOU THANK YOU

Mar. 2013: Years ago your website was instrumental in freeing our family from Mormonism. You are doing a good work and helping a lot of people. Thank you so much for helping us.

Mar. 2013: THANK YOU for being a force for Christ in the world. The research that you and your husband provide makes a key difference in lives worldwide. In the limited times that I’ve had to talk and witness to Mormons, I know that information gotten from your newsletters really helped.

Mar. 2013: I am a Fancher descendant. Last weekend I visited the Mountain Meadows Massacre site with my two children. The experience was very moving for me and of course has resulted in many discussions among my family (some of whom are now Mormon). . . . I just wanted to say thank you for your work and commitment to truth.

Mar. 2013: I have to tell you, Sandra, that you have inspired me in many ways. When I was still a devout mormon, I thought what you were doing was just a lot of negative energy and time that would be better spent on something else. But that was because I didn’t want to see the truth of it yet. It would mean having the rug pulled out from under me, and having to make some very difficult decisions. But the time came when I had to acknowledge the truth, and could no longer support the lies of mormonism. . . . I knew Christ wouldn’t have had anything to do with it. And I came to realize the value of the gift of truth. Thank you for that.

Mar. 2013: Tanner(s), I have examined much of your “works” and find your scholarly abilities very much hindered by your personal agenda. I was converted to the Mormon Church and Baptized in 2008 after studying “Mormonism” for over 10 years. Your Anti-Mormon literature is good “tabloid” reading (I did enjoy most of what I read), but that is all it is—”the ‘junk’ of your cognitive fallacies. . . . The simple truth is you cannot prove the Book of Mormon was not brought forth by the gift and power of God. Please stop trying!

Apr. 2013: Your ministry and message has helped me steer into truth much easier after leaving Mormonism on 12/13/12. My wife is still in it and has been since age 9, she is 51 now. You and Shawn McCrane have been very helpful in arming me with knowledge to defend my abrupt decision after 12 years LDS to leave it. The Sunday school teacher from my wife’s ward is trying to rescue me. However it is my hope that his plan will backfire.

Apr. 2013: I am a Christian writing to you from UK. I recently found a second hand copy of your book ‘Mormonism: Shadow or reality’ and bought it. I just wanted to write and say ‘thank you’ for this excellently researched resource. There is a Mormon church not far from where I live and a sizeable Mormon population in the area. Your book has enabled me to answer Mormon questions and better defend my faith. You and Mr. Tanner did an amazing job.

Apr. 2013: Ms Tanner, . . . many years ago when I was preparing to marry in the Oakland temple, a valued co-worker of mine loaned me a book of yours that had the ceremony word for word in it. I found it frightening at 19 and find it even more so now. My parents convinced me that I had nothing to worry about so I stuffed it down and went through with it. I wish I had believed what you wrote. I did not have the courage to completely disavow the church until I was already 5 years married to someone from whom I am (happily) divorced after 23 years.

Apr. 2013: Since moving here [Nevada], I have been making friends with the LDS, having them over for meals and attending events with them, such as General Conference and church services (the whole 3 hours!) God had put it in my heart to get involved in a ministry. . . . Anyway, thank you again, Sandra. Your newsletters, videos and website have been invaluable to me.

Their 15 Unanswered Questions

“Some Mormons Search the Web and Find Doubt” declared the front page story in the New York Times on July 21, 2013. Laurie Goodstein reported that Hans Mattsson, LDS European Area Authority Seventy from 2000–2005, and approximately 600 LDS members, mainly in Sweden, were sharing their doubts through contact on the Internet. When members came to Mr. Mattsson with their questions he found himself ill-prepared to answer them and approached his superiors for answers. The article states:

When fellow believers in Sweden first began coming to him [Mattsson] with information from the Internet that contradicted the church’s history and teachings, he dismissed it as “anti-Mormon propaganda,” the whisperings of Lucifer. He asked his superiors for help in responding to the members’ doubts, and when they seemed to only sidestep the questions, Mr. Mattsson began his own investigation. 1

One of the catalysts for some members in Sweden to start investigating LDS claims derived from news stories in 2005 relating to the 200th anniversary of Joseph Smith’s birth in 1805, where historical issues unfamiliar to the Swedes were discussed. A local stake president (administrative overseer of several congregations) even approached Hans Mattsson for answers. 2 This was the first time Mattsson had heard of Joseph Smith translating the Book of Mormon by staring at a stone in his hat, DNA issues, differing accounts of Smith’s first vision, Smith’s polyandry, problems with the Book of Abraham, etc. Hans promised to look into the matter.

Finally a meeting was set up in 2005 for the stake president, Hans Mattsson and a few other Mormons to meet with Mattsson’s superior, and L. Tom Perry, a senior apostle from the LDS Church. 3 The Stake President arrived with a stack of photocopies documenting the various problem areas of Mormon history, which was soon appropriated by the top leaders with a promise that they would get back to him on that. The apostle announced that he “had a manuscript in his briefcase that, once it was published, would prove all the doubters wrong. But Mr. Mattsson said the promised text never appeared, and when he asked the apostle about it, he was told it was impertinent to ask.” 4

4 New York Times (July 21, 2013); Mormon Stories #430-434.
Was the purported manuscript just a delaying tactic or did the apostle realize the answers in his briefcase were not sufficient for the questions? To date, no such book has been printed by the LDS Church.

The Times article continues: “That encounter is what really set off Mr. Mattsson’s doubts. He began reading everything he could. He listened to the “Mormon Stories” podcasts. And he read Joseph Smith: Rough Stone Rolling, a biography by Richard Lyman Bushman, a historian at Columbia University and a prominent Mormon.” After being released from his position as a Seventy and while recovering from heart surgery, Mattsson continued researching on the Internet but often found himself struggling to understand some of the discussions due to the language barrier and issues he had never considered. He also read Fawn M. Brodie’s biography of No Man Knows My History: The Life of Joseph Smith plus many other books.

Through his numerous contacts with other questioning members, Mattsson gathered together an Internet study group of about 600 Mormons. When news of this group surfaced the church was worried that they were starting a new church, but it was simply a matter of like-minded people searching for answers.

During this time Mattsson led a faithful LDS lifestyle, thus hoping to be open to the guidance of the Holy Spirit. The Times reported, “But when he discovered credible evidence that the church’s founder, Joseph Smith, was a polygamist and that the Book of Mormon and other scriptures were rife with historical anomalies, Mr. Mattsson said he felt that the foundation on which he had built his life began to crumble.” He is further quoted as saying, “I felt like I had an earthquake under my feet… Everything I’d been taught, everything I’d been proud of, seemed to have crumbled under my feet. It was such a terrible psychological and nearly physical disturbance.”

Mattsson said that “when he started sharing what he had learned with other Mormons in Sweden, the stake president (who oversees a cluster of congregations) told him not to talk about it to any members, even his wife and children. He did not obey: ‘I said to them, why are you afraid for the truth?’”

The LDS Church’s response to the Swedish members’ questions is without precedence, covering seven years (2005–2012), two apostles’ visits, a meeting with a member of the First Quorum of the Seventy and two official church historians. During the summer of 2010 LDS Apostle Russell M. Nelson and Ronald A. Rasband of the Seventy visited Sweden and met with some of the members, but provided few satisfactory answers. They then promised to send the church historians.

Thus on Sunday evening, November 28, 2010, Marlin Jensen (then a member of the First Quorum of the Seventy and official LDS Church Historian), assistant church historian Richard Turley, Erich W. Kopischke of the First Quorum of the Seventy, R. Ingvar Olsson of the Area Seventy, and approximately 25 members met privately at a church building in Stockholm, Sweden. Most of them were aware of the various historical issues, although a few bishops and stake presidents were not.

While the opening and closing remarks were in Swedish, the major part of the meeting was in English, which was unofficially recorded by one of the attendees. The following quotes are taken from the transcript of the 2010 meeting7

First the Swedish leader made comments relating to seeking truth over error and relying on the Holy Spirit for answers. Then Marlin Jensen spoke of the combination of feeling and intellect in seeking answers, implying that information outside of official church channels was unreliable. He then reassured the members “that everything the church has in the way of historical information will one day become available to the whole world. And one of the ways we’ll do that is by putting on the Internet our church history catalogue that lists everything that we have. And then over time, we’ll make digital copies of all of our documents and make those available to people across the world.”

Unfortunately, it appears that this project will extend years into the future. And even posting the various photos of Smith’s letters and church documents fails to help the average person find resolution for troubling historical issues. While many welcome the plan to make digital images of the early LDS documents, this still is not addressing the need for official LDS Church answers.

Jensen continued that “there will always be two forces working on us: the light of Spirit of Christ and the spirit of the devil.” Later he commented, “But while that’s going on, we still have these two powers to deal with, and every day as we’re in the midst of this, brothers and sisters, we have to make a decision, and the central decision we have to make is whether we’re going to believe or whether we’re going to doubt.”

He concluded, “most of us who have decided to believe are as aware of the questions that you have as you are and maybe even a lot more questions that you haven’t thought about yet.” Jensen went on to observe, “There’s nothing that I know about Mormonism that bothers me. Are there contradictions, are there inconsistencies, are there paradoxes? Yes.” One member called out, “And you’re aware of a lot more things that we might not be aware of yet? But still you stand and you think, ‘I can—I can stand for this’?” To which Jensen replied, “Right. . . . So I’m just saying they’re very good questions, they’re questions that are being asked by others, and there are a lot more questions that could be asked.” The member responded, “Will you have very good answers?” Jensen then commented, “You’ll see in a moment. We’ll have what answers we have.” He then entered into a discussion of how things are “spiritually discerned” and each one must “make your own decisions.” The leaders then took questions from the audience.

While the questions and discussion could have been broken up into many parts, those at the meeting seemed to agree that there were 15 basic questions:8

1. Book of Mormon Translation. The first question related to the translation process used in producing the Book of Mormon. Why would God and the Nephites go to such efforts to preserve the ancient plates when they didn’t seem to be used by Smith to translate the book? Those who witnessed the process described Smith placing his face in his hat and staring at a seer stone, utilizing some sort of visionary process while the plates were either covered and off to the side or not in the room.

David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses of the Book of Mormon, described the process as follows:

I will now give you a description of the manner in which the Book of Mormon was translated. Joseph Smith would put the seer stone into a hat, and put his face in the hat, drawing it closely around his face to exclude the light; and in the darkness the spiritual light would shine. A piece of something resembling parchment would appear, and on that appeared the writing. One character at a time would appear, and under it was the interpretation in English. Brother Joseph would read off the English to Oliver Cowdery, who was his principal scribe, and when it was written down and repeated to Brother Joseph to see if it was correct, then it would disappear, and another character with the interpretation would appear. Thus the Book of Mormon was translated by the gift and power of God, and not by any power of man.9

9 David Whitmer, An Address to All Believers in Christ, (Richmond, Missouri, 1887), p. 12.

In 1888 Emma Smith, Joseph’s wife and scribe, described the dictation process to her son:

In writing for your father I frequently wrote day after day, often sitting by the table close by him, he sitting with his face buried in his hat, with the stone in it, and dictating hour after hour with nothing between us.10

When asked why Smith used a hat, Turley responded: “The hat was apparently to block light out so that Joseph . . . could see what he was doing with the record. Sometimes the light, you know, affects your spirit. We don’t know exactly how it works, but he did say this: in the early days of his translation, he was relying on revelatory tools of some sort or another—Urim and Thummim, seer stones, whatever the case may be.” How was this a “translation” when Smith wasn’t even looking at the metal record?

Also related to that was a question about misleading church artwork. Joseph Smith is always depicted sitting at a desk, staring at the plates and running his finger over the characters while dictating to his scribe. However, those who witnessed the process (Martin Harris, David Whitmer, Emma Smith, Emma’s father Isaac Hale, Smith’s brother William) described him looking at his seer stone in the hat instead of looking at the plates.11 Isn’t the church being deceptive when they print pictures that do not show the actual process?

Turley responded by pointing out that old Christian art wrongly depicts people in the Holy Land as dressed in European garb. It is the artist’s choice. But he sidestepped the issue of official LDS art work always depicting Joseph sitting at a table looking at the plates.

11 “Translation or Divination,” Institute For Religious Research; online at http://mit.irr.org/translation-or-divination as though he was doing a regular translation. When challenged that he hadn’t answered the basic problem Turley responded, “Often the way stories have been told over time don’t conform with the history. And so our goal is to try to make them conform more closely.” Again, this does not answer the question of why the translation process is always depicted incorrectly when the historians have always known what the process was. Someone spoke up, “Can you see that we’ve feel deceived? When you say translated, you had the record and you translated. . . . But he wasn’t. It would be much better if you said he was sitting and praying and got the revelation. But it’s kind of deceiving to say it that way [that it was a translation].” To which Turley responded, “I think that’s a difference in perception rather than in reality. When Joseph used the term ‘translate,’ he meant revelation. OK?”

Jensen then pointed out that he had spiritual confirmation that the Book of Mormon was true. Turley added that the speed of dictating the manuscript also pointed to revelation. Then a member observed, “That is amazing. But those are not the questions we want [answered].” The member pressed again about the misleading art work. Turley admonished they should not blame the prophet, it was done by “ordinary people like me who do the best we know how” and then “new discoveries, new documents” are found and things are rewritten.

The problem with this statement is that they have always known that the witnesses said Smith used a stone in his hat. They just covered it up.

2. Polygamy and polyandry. Turley explained, “Did Joseph Smith practice plural marriage? Yes. Many church members don’t know it but the answer is yes. Did Joseph Smith practice polyandry [marrying women who already had living husbands]? The answer is yes. Joseph Smith did practice polyandry. How many wives did Joseph Smith have? We’re in the process, as you know, of preparing the papers of Joseph Smith for publication. We hope to include in the papers of Joseph Smith a list of Joseph Smith’s wives based on the best available evidence.”

Here again Turley is avoiding the issue. Yes, it would be nice to have an official list of Smith’s wives but why not refer them to current research on the subject? He could have referred them to LDS scholar Todd Compton’s book, In Sacred Loneliness,12 where he gives biographical sketches of thirty-three of Smith’s plural wives. Even the LDS FamilySearch program shows twenty-four wives for Smith.13

Turley continued, “So we’ll answer that question in the future. . . . why did he marry the wives of people [who] were already married? That actually boils down to a marriage by marriage statement. And it’s fairly complex but it’s an excellent question.”

One of the problems of polyandry is that it is not covered in Smith’s polygamy revelation. The Doctrine and Covenants, section 132:61-62, allows for plural marriage with virgins, not women with living husbands. The discussion then turned to the current LDS Church beliefs regarding polygamy. Were Smith’s marriages simply spiritual or were they conjugal relationships? One member brought up the question of Smith having children with his plural wives. “One woman said the child that she bore she didn’t know if it was the child of Joseph or the child of, in this case, Orson Hyde, I think, an apostle. So that indicates that it was definitely not a spiritual marriage, it was all the way marriage. So, I have a question, what do you feel about that?”

Turley’s response was, “It’s true that Joseph Smith [practiced] plural marriage in that he had wives who were not married to anybody else, it’s true that he practiced polyandry and he did have wives who were married to somebody else.”

When pressed about whether polygamy was a current doctrine he replied: “We do believe in polygamy; we don’t practice polygamy. That’s what I’m trying to say.” When pressed about whether or not the church officially endorses Smith’s polyandry, Turley stated, “I’ve never seen a formal statement about that.” He continued, “either Joseph was a prophet of God or he wasn’t. Correct?”

3. Was it right and Christ-like to force women into polygamous marriages? A member asked if it was right “to take the wives or have sex with wives that are already married to other men? To take other women in a secret way, force them into some kind of marriage, I would like to call it mistresses, or forcing 14-year-old girls to marry him against her obvious will, I just don’t understand. Behind his own wife, . . . The deeper you go on this the worse it becomes.”

On the issue of Smith marrying 14 and 16-year-old girls, Turley tried to dismiss this on the grounds that girls married younger on the frontier. However, Nauvoo, Illinois, in the 1840’s was not exactly the frontier. It had 12,000 inhabitants, similar to Chicago, and a local militia of 2,500 men. Also, these were not legal marriages, which would have given the teenager the right of financial support from her husband, standing in the community and rights of inheritance. These were illegal, clandestine unions done in the strictest secrecy, especially kept from Smith’s wife Emma.

Just a few weeks before Smith’s death he preached, “What a thing it is for a man to be accused of committing adultery, and having seven wives, when I can only find one.”\(^{14}\) He had at least thirty-four wives at the time of this sermon and most of them were probably sitting in the audience. Smith had also convinced many of his top leaders to secretly take additional wives. Thus the circle of deception continued to enlarge.

According to George D. Smith, by the end of 1843 there were a total of twenty-five Mormon men and seventy-two women secretly living polygamy in Nauvoo.\(^{15}\) By the time the Mormons fled Nauvoo in 1846 there were 196 male polygamists with 717 wives.\(^{16}\) All of this while church leaders continued to insist there was no truth to the reports of plural marriage. The LDS leaders did not publically announce the doctrine of plural marriage until 1852, five years after they had migrated to Utah. Also, Smith’s revelation on plural marriage, section 132 of the Doctrine and Covenants, was not part of their scriptures until 1876.

The Swedish member was not to be put off. “But why does my spirit talks to me and screams wrong, wrong, even if it’s a prophet of God? Do I have the devil in me who’s talking to me and says I should understand this 14 and 16-year-old girls marrying? . . . So he did that right, it was God told him to do that? Go behind Emma and take these wives?”

At this point one of the Swedish leaders stepped in, explaining that there are many things in the Old Testament that we don’t understand. “So, I don’t know why Joseph did what Joseph did . . . One thing that I know is Moses was a prophet. I know. I know that Jesus is the son of God. And I know that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God. I know that.” And that was the end of the discussion on plural marriage.

4. Book of Abraham. What about the problems with the Book of Abraham and its supposed translation from the Egyptian papyri Smith purchased in 1835 in Kirtland, Ohio? Egyptologists have now translated the papyri and found that they have nothing to do with Abraham.\(^{17}\) Turley responded: “Book of Abraham. Very quickly, let me just say a few things about it very simply. Number 1, again, it was received by revelation. Number 2, we don’t have all the papyrus . . . Number 3, . . . we’ve seen a lot of studies on the so-called alphabet and grammar book. There’s some excellent research coming out of BYU in the next year that you need to read. That’s all I have time to say about that.”

Numbers 1 and 2 seem to contradict each other. If the Book of Abraham was a revelation then why bring up missing pieces of papyri? Even if one were to concede (which critics do not) that the text for the Book of Abraham was actually contained on one of the few missing pieces of papyri, it is clear from the extant papyri that Smith was indeed using them for his supposed “translation.” He believed that the three illustrations taken from the papyri (which were copied and printed with the Book of Abraham) conveyed the same story of Abraham that he was supposedly “translating” from the text, whether that text is on the extant papyri or on the lost pieces. For Turley to simply say that “we don’t have all the papyrus” does not dismiss the fact that the parts that we do have were clearly used by Smith in creating the Book of Abraham, to one extent or another, and their contents clearly depict not a story of Abraham but rather a common Egyptian funerary scene, as has been concluded by Egyptologists for decades.\(^{18}\)

The person then brought up the counterfeit Kinderhook Plates and Joseph Smith’s comments that would indicate they were authentic.\(^{19}\) These six small brass plates, with strange characters etched on them, were supposedly dug from an Indian mound near Kinderhook, Illinois, in 1843. The non-Mormons brought the plates to Smith to see what he would say about them. On May 1, 1843, William Clayton, Joseph Smith’s private secretary, wrote in his journal:

> I have seen 6 brass plates covered with ancient characters of language containing from 30 to 40 on each side of the plates. Prest J. [Joseph Smith] has translated a portion and says they contain the history of the person with whom they were found and he was a descendant of Ham through the loins of Pharaoh king of Egypt.

and that he received his kingdom from the ruler of heaven and earth.\textsuperscript{20} Clayton’s diary account then became the basis for the entry about the plates in the official \textit{History of the Church}, vol. 5, page 372.

On May 7, 1843, Apostle Parley P. Pratt wrote a letter that included:

Six plates having the appearance of Brass have lately been dug out of the mound by a gentleman in Pike Co. Illinois. They are small and filled with engravings in Egyptian language and contain the genealogy of one of the ancient Jaredites back to Ham the son of Noah.\textsuperscript{21}

Turley dismissed the statements about them as secondary and of no value. However, William Clayton and Parley P. Pratt were faithful, believing leaders in Mormonism. They made their comments because of what Joseph Smith had related to them, and they believed him to be right.\textsuperscript{22} The Mormons now concede that the plates were forgeries made to deceive Smith, thus necessitating some sort of dismissal of these statements. Since these plates were frauds there would have been no way for Smith to deduce that they “contain the genealogy” of one of the ancient Jaredites. Turley’s response was “there’s no official Church thing on that.”

5. Lying for the Lord. “I have a question that’s really related to polygamy. When I was on my mission in London in the seventies, we were taught a very important principle called \textit{lying for the Lord}. I mean, we were taught that. And it’s supposed to have been coined, this phrase, by I think John Taylor, and I wonder do you think that there are circumstances where it’s OK to withhold or manipulate truths just to defend or uphold the reputation of the Church? Is \textit{lying for the Lord} still alive? That’s my question.”

It is interesting that the person mentioned Apostle John Taylor. In 1850 he was in Europe on a church mission and debated a minister in France. The minister charged that the Mormons were secretly practicing plural marriage in America. Taylor denied the charge and quoted the then-current \textit{Doctrine and Covenants} which contained a section that specifically denied the practice of polygamy:

Inasmuch as this church of Christ has been reproached with the crime of fornication, and polygamy; we declare that we believe, that \textit{one man should have one wife}; and one woman, but one husband, except in case of death, when either is at liberty to marry again.\textsuperscript{23}

However, John Taylor failed to mention that he had married at least twelve wives by that point.\textsuperscript{24} Turley responded, “There are these clashes where sometimes one moral imperative or ethical imperative becomes superior to another. . . . When people bring up this topic, what they’re usually talking about is during plural marriage time periods when people were asked about plural marriage and, again, it’s a complicated subject but basically, people were trying to decide, do I say something, or do I not? Do I tell the truth or do I not? Do we teach as a church that you should lie? No, we don’t.”

Again Turley sidesteps the basic issue of the ethics of Joseph Smith and all of the LDS Church leadership lying about their illegal, secret plural marriages prior to 1852.\textsuperscript{25}

6. Mark Hofmann Forgeries. The next question related to the church purchasing documents from fellow Mormon Mark Hofmann in the 1980’s despite the fact that they were actually forgeries. Hofmann met on numerous occasions with the President of the LDS Church and various apostles, showing them his documents. Why didn’t the prophet realize the papers were fakes? Turley quickly dismissed this problem by simply referring people to his book, \textit{Victims: The LDS Church and the Mark Hofmann Case}. However, his book does not provide an answer to the question of how a prophet can be thus deceived.\textsuperscript{26}

7. Blood Atonement. What about Brigham Young’s teaching that certain sins required personal blood atonement? When pressed on the issue of whether or not this was practiced, Turley responded: “My personal belief is that during Joseph Smith’s time period, based on statements in the Bible, Joseph Smith said that when men shed blood, their blood should be shed. . . . And I think that when you got into the Brigham Young times, that scripture was taken literally for a time.”

Turley then discussed blood atonement in relationship to capital punishment. However, this ignores all the other times blood atonement was advocated for sins other than murder, such as adultery, theft, marrying a black woman, apostasy, etc.27 One example of such preaching is Young’s sermon in 1857:

Now take a person in this congregation who has knowledge with regard to being saved . . . and suppose that he is overtaken in a gross fault, that he has committed a sin that he knows will deprive him of that exaltation which he desires, and that he cannot attain to it without the shedding his blood, and also knows that by having his blood shed he will atone for that sin, and be saved and exalted with the Gods; is there a man or woman in this house but what would say, “shed my blood that I may be saved and exalted with the Gods?”

. . . Will you love your brothers and sisters likewise, when they have committed a sin that cannot be atoned for without the shedding of their blood? Will you love that man or woman well enough to shed their blood? . . . I could refer you to plenty of instances where men have been ritously slain, in order to atone for their sins. I have seen scores and hundreds of people for whom there would have been a chance . . . if their lives had been taken and their blood spilled on the ground as a smoking incense to the Almighty, but who are now angels to the Devil . . . I have known a great many men who have left this Church for whom there is no chance whatever for exaltation, but if their blood had been spilled, it would have been better for them. . . . This is loving our neighbor as ourselves; if he needs help, help him; and if he wants salvation and it is necessary to spill his blood on the earth in order that he may be saved, spill it. . . .”28

When pressed about whether Blood Atonement had ever been carried out, Turley responded: “I think it’s possible.” He then moved on to the problems of the first vision.

8. First Vision. If Smith was persecuted by the locals for saying he saw God and Jesus in 1820 why isn’t there any mention in early church publications of that vision? Most members of the church in 1830 “hadn’t even heard” about an 1820 vision. Today the 1820 vision is presented as crucial to the founding of Mormonism yet early converts didn’t seem to know about it. Why not?

In relation to Smith’s claim of persecution for telling the first vision story, Turley responded that the simple fact of the Methodist minister scoffing at Smith’s vision could have seemed like persecution to him. “From the vantage point of others it may not have seemed like a big deal, but to a young boy, it seemed like a big deal.”

Turley commented, “In terms of church history, when people tell any kind of an account of history, it’s always selective. If I ask you a question, tell me about your years in high school, the story you tell me may be different than the story I get from your high school boyfriend or another student in your class.”

But this ignores the problem of Smith himself giving several different versions of the 1820 vision, in which not just a few minor points change, but rather some of the most important ones, such as: the purpose of the prayer, the date, who appears in the vision (Jesus, angels, or God and Jesus), and the message that was delivered to young Joseph. In the only account in Smith’s own hand, in his private 1832 journal, he states that “the Lord” appeared, but nothing about God the Father. This account was not made public for over 100 years. In 1835 he mentioned to an acquaintance that many angels appeared in the first vision. But this was not printed until many years later. In addition, the account currently printed at the back of the

9. Censored Church History. “Do the leaders of the church really believe that they are actually inspired by God to act in such a way? Just to tell a selected, nice version of the church—the history of the church—in order to get more converts? Do they believe they are inspired to do this?”

Jensen responded: “Where for a long time we were a persecuted minority in America and our hope was to present our best face to the world. And our history was often written in what was called apologetic style... And in doing that we were being selective. And we are at the time [now], I think, when our history could be told as completely and fully as technology can allow us to tell. . . . There’s never been an attempt to suppress the history of the church or to tell the church’s history in some untrue way to put it into an untrue light to gain some advantage, to gain converts, . . . Hans, I sense that about you. We haven’t betrayed you. These things that you have learned about through the Internet, mainly, have always been known have always been out there in the books. The 19th wife [of Brigham Young] wrote her story years ago. It’s just that it’s published now, everybody’s reading it, they’ve found something new about the polygamy of president Young. It’s been there forever.”

Here the historians are cleverly sidestepping the issue. Yes, many of these problems have been known about for years, but not through official church publications. Wife No. 19 was written by an apostate ex-wife of Brigham Young, hardly a book the church ever encouraged members to read. In 1945 Fawn Brodie, niece of LDS President David O. McKay, wrote the groundbreaking biography of Joseph Smith, No Man Knows My History, for which she was excommunicated. But Mormons have traditionally been told not to read it. Not only has the church hid its history it has discouraged its members from reading outside sources. Just read the various copies of our Salt Lake City Messenger where we continually raise the issue of restricted and/or edited information from the church.

In the past it has only been after a problem becomes well-known (and thus more embarrassing) that the LDS church has decided to write about it. They have certainly not taken the lead in explaining the troubling parts of their past until it becomes critical. Why is it that only now the LDS church is finally making a greater attempt to tell its history “as completely and fully as technology can allow,” when they have had literally decades to do so? If the Swedish situation is any indicator, it must be that the Internet is causing pressure by finally making that history more readily available to the masses.

Even though, as Turley said, these things “have always been out there in the books,” the concern of the Swedish contingency (as with other questioning Mormons) is not so much whether or not the history is out there, but why has it not been given to them by their own church in the first place? What is intended by Turley to be a note of reassurance only makes the shock of discovery more painful for the questioners. If there has “never been an attempt to suppress the history of the church,” as he says, then why have sincere believers like Mattsson had to resort to the Internet and to non-approved sources to get that history?

In short, why is the LDS church needing to play catch-up to what outside historians have been writing about for decades? When Mormon historians have tried to write more fully about the embarrassing parts of the church’s past, it has often resulted in the person being disfellowshipped, excommunicated, receiving warnings from church leadership, or forced retirement from church employment.

A member then raised the issue of the Mountain Meadows Massacre, carried out by faithful Mormons against a wagon train of non-Mormons from Arkansas, in southern Utah in 1857, and its cover-up. Turley responded that he is currently “writing a book” on the period after the massacre that will answer that question. He was further questioned as to whether or not the church has decided to write about it. They have certainly not taken the lead in explaining the troubling parts of their past until it becomes critical. Why is it that only now the LDS church is finally making a greater attempt to tell its history “as completely and fully as technology can allow,” when they have had literally decades to do so? In short, why is the LDS church needing to play catch-up to what outside historians have been writing about for decades? When Mormon historians have tried to write more fully about the embarrassing parts of the church’s past, it has often resulted in the person being disfellowshipped, excommunicated, receiving warnings from church leadership, or forced retirement from church employment.

A member then raised the issue of the Mountain Meadows Massacre, carried out by faithful Mormons against a wagon train of non-Mormons from Arkansas, in southern Utah in 1857, and its cover-up. Turley responded that he is currently “writing a book” on the period after the massacre that will answer that question. He was further questioned as to whether or not the church covered up the massacre.

Turley’s answer was “Did the Church hide it? At the time—short answer—you need to read the book for the long answer. . . . The short answer is that at the time of the Mountain Meadows Massacre, when Brigham Young found out about it, the US Army was on the door of Salt Lake City getting ready to come in and basically massacre his people, that was Brigham Young’s feeling. Ok? So the Mountain Meadows Massacre was the last thing he wanted to talk about under those circumstances. Ok, let’s move on.”
Thus we see that Brigham Young and the church did cover-up the massacre “at the time.” It has been covering up embarrassing events in its past since the beginning, and they are still restricting access to several documents relating to the massacre. In 2008 Turley and two associates published Massacre at Mountain Meadows. At that time Turley said he was working on a sequel dealing with the aftermath of the massacre, which would be the book he mentioned to the Swedes. As of September 20, 2013, Turley’s book has not appeared in print.

10. Should members know all the truth? One person mentioned Apostle Boyd K. Packer’s statements in the PBS television program The Mormons, done in 2007.33 “Elder Packer says there, it is not good for the members to know all the truth. . . . He said as a watchman on the tower he might stop things that could hurt.”

Packer made a similar statement in 1981 to a group of LDS Church educators at BYU:

There is a temptation for the writer or the teacher of Church history to want to tell everything, whether it is worthy or faith promoting or not. Some things that are true are not very useful.34

The historian responded, “The question is really, is all truth useful?” Turley later commented, “Watchmen on the tower. This is something, as you mentioned, President Packer talks about a lot. I think his concern is that providing information to people in a way that’s going to destroy their faith carries with it a responsibility. That’s all I’m going to say about that.” This seems to be an admission that full disclosure of LDS history could “hurt” a member’s testimony, which contradicts the idea that they really have answers for the historical problems. Only a dearth of answers would “hurt.”

11. Priesthood Restoration. The next question related to the lack of early documents reporting the appearance of angels regarding priesthood restoration. “One thing that really bothers me is the lack of contemporary sources for the angelic visitations [of John the Baptist and Peter, James and John relating to the Priesthood]. I understand from both Michael Quinn and Bushman, they say, as I understand, there are sources from 1820–1830—affidavits, letters, minutes—but none of them ever mentions any angelic visitations or a priesthood. . . . So I wonder, why are there not any contemporary testimonies. Or are there?”

Turley tried to smooth over the issue: “Number one, the church in its earliest days was essentially a church of oral tradition. Ok? People did not write things. . . . Joseph Smith really starts writing around—our first revelation for which we have documentary evidence is in the late 1820s. So the first thing he starts writing is scripture. And then, early revelations do have references to angelic visitations. Section 20 of the Doctrine and Covenants, article and covenants of the church, is an example of that. D&C section 20 has references to angelic visitations.”

Turley just admitted that records of Smith’s revelations were being kept “in the late 1820’s” so why isn’t there a contemporary account of the so-called priesthood restoration? It seems rather odd that Turley mentions D&C section 20 to support angelic visits. The only angel specifically mentioned in section 20, verses 6-8, relate to the angel who told Smith of the plates.

Both section 20 and 27 in the current D&C were edited in 1835 to include references to angels, priesthood restoration and offices. Specifically, verses 65-67, relating to the “high priesthood,” were not in section 20 when it was first published in the 1833 Book of Commandments. Section 27, dated 1830, of the current Doctrine and Covenants recounts many angelic visions, including Peter, James and John. But these references to angels and priesthood were backdated and added to this section in 1835. Section 27 is now twice as long as the original printing in 1833. Clearly, claims of Peter, James and John restoring priesthood authority were not known in 1829 or 1830.35 Again, the historians provided no answer to the question.

12. Blacks and Priesthood. One person questioned the background of the revelation granting priesthood to Blacks in 1978. Hadn’t there been earlier efforts to change the doctrine? At one point the questioner mentioned D. Michael Quinn’s book but didn’t give a specific reference. According to Quinn’s book, Mormon Hierarchy: Extensions of Power, in 1969 Apostle Hugh B. Brown “was able to get a proposal allowing full priesthood for Blacks approved by the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles.” With church president David O. McKay unable to function, the way was now open for the two counselors and the Quorum of Twelve to issue a joint declaration granting priesthood to those of black African ancestry.” However, Apostle Harold B. Lee opposed the matter, and “persuaded the Quorum of Twelve to rescind its vote,” which delayed giving the priesthood to Blacks for many years. One Swede asked, “Is this true that there were some apostles that went against the question to give the priesthood to the Blacks?” When he was on his mission in the seventies he remembers hearing Mark E. Petersen talk “a lot about the blacks and the pre-existence and they are damned and so on because they were black.” Yet, now those teachings would be considered false doctrine.

Later Turley responded, “The June 1978 revelation has a history to it like all revelations. You have this period of time in which saints are studying it out in the mind and they eventually flower as revelation.” The questioner persisted, referring again to Quinn’s book, “But my question was, was it three of the apostles that didn’t agree with David O. McKay?” To which Turley replied, “I haven’t looked at the sources myself. I don’t know.” And that was the end of the discussion on blacks and priesthood.

13. Bad Temple Experiences. One member wondered why some people have a bad experience when they first attend the Endowment Ceremony? He commented, “Anyway, when I went to the temple the first time, it was 1970 [when the Endowment ritual still contained the death oaths] in Switzerland. And after being in there the first day, I was terrified. I couldn’t sleep at night. I thought, what is this, you know? There was a black hole in my heart and I had nightmares the whole week. I thought, what is this? Have I been deceived?” Later he added, “Why do we have such a bad feeling when we come to the temple? If the Holy Ghost was there this would give a testimony, you feel good . . .”

Marlin Jensen responded by telling of his daughter’s first experience at the temple. “I remember sitting with our first daughter, . . . after her first temple endowment which I attended with her [prior to the changes in 1990]. . . . I think my little daughter was quite worthy, but she was so disturbed, I’ll say. So surprised by the nature of what happened there that I’m not sure the Holy Ghost had a chance to really help her that day. I remember sitting with her in the celestial room while she cried and said, dad what’s this all about? And I wish I had done a better job. She has persisted and I said to her if you’ll keep coming and keep learning and keep praying about it, you’ll [words unclear] and loves what she feels there. But it’s taken some time. It [witness of the Holy Spirit] isn’t a tap we can always turn on.” To which the member responded, “I think what you’re saying now is your answer to everything. If we keep doing it, we will feel good about it.”

Interestingly, Jensen didn’t mention that the ceremony was changed in 1990 and 2005, removing many of the elements that disturbed people. Evidently the church realized the ceremony, as first presented by Joseph Smith, was too graphic, too Masonic, too tied to nineteenth-century attitudes, and needed to be rewritten to appeal to new members.

14. Vikings and Book of Mormon. Why is there no evidence that the Book of Mormon people ever existed? A member asked, “We had some Vikings visit North America about 1000 years ago, and today we know exactly where they lived actually, there are archeological evidence that they leave there, etc. So what about all the millions of people who have been Lamanites or Nephites . . . What kind of evidence can you show that [they] actually exist?” He later commented, “I mean there were millions of people building cities and creating wagons with wheels, and horses, and had so many things, weapons destroying things . . . so I guess there should be some traces, somewhere, in the whole of Americas if they ever existed.” He also asked about the lack of DNA evidence for Israelites in pre-Columbus America.

Turley combined the issues of lack of archaeological support for the Book of Mormon, DNA problems, and the lack of evidence for Semitic people in America prior to Columbus. “As you know, there are cultural ruins all over the Americas. The question is, were these Book of Mormon peoples or not? Some people have tried to answer that using the DNA to say maybe these were Book of Mormon people, maybe they were not. Are there any DNA experts here? I’m gonna give you my best short answer on DNA.” To which a member called out, “Is it the same as FAIR and FARMS?”

Turley responded “Um. It may be.” He then went into a long discussion of tracing particular family lines, which isn’t quite the same as determining origins of people groups. “We’re continuing to learn over time. The body of types of DNA for these people is growing. With this one, we have no way of knowing the answer. We do not know what Lehi’s DNA was.” But this sidesteps the issue that Native American DNA shows they descended from Asians, not Semitic people.

The member wasn’t satisfied with Turley’s answer. “I actually don’t think that’s correct according to scientific evidence today. I think you actually can trace back to with DNA and tell for instance where the Swedish people are coming from or where the Asian people are coming from.” Again, the historians could supply no official answer to the Book of Mormon problems.

For those interested in reading further on the DNA issue, Simon Southerton, molecular biologist, and author of Losing a Lost Tribe, challenged Turley’s comments in his blog of July 28, 2013. Southerton summarized, “LDS apologists didn’t need ancient Asian DNA to be convinced that American Indians are essentially all descended from Asian ancestors. So why do we need ancient Israelite DNA? . . . The other obvious problem is that we don’t have any Native American DNA lineages that are even candidate Israelite DNA lineages. Those that don’t belong to the five lineage families (A to D, X) are derived from Western European or African populations and arrived after Columbus.”

15. Adam-God. The last question related to Brigham Young’s Adam-God sermons, teaching that there is a hierarchy of gods, and our Heavenly Father is Adam, the God to whom we pray. Why did he teach something that was opposed by some of the apostles and seemed to divide the church? Why wasn’t Young able to convince the others that his doctrine was right? “There was a lot of Apostles and leaders that didn’t agree to what Brigham had to say so if, I don’t know, what is church opinion on Adam-God out there in Utah and why didn’t they clear it up if it is the way I think they—that he actually taught that Adam is not Heavenly Father, but why couldn’t he make other apostles understand that?”

Turley later responded, “Well, it’s complicated, again, because you’ve got a lot of sources. I haven’t seen an official church position that goes back to deconstruct all those sources. So as a historian I have to say if you look at the evidence sometimes it’s a little squishy. . . . you can find evidence that goes both directions.” Again, the historians were not able to provide an answer as to why the president of the church would teach a false view of God from the pulpit, in his role as prophet.

Preaching in 1873 Brigham Young declared, “How much unbelief exists in the minds of the Latter-day Saints in regard to one particular doctrine which I revealed to them, and which God revealed to me—namely that Adam is our father and God. . . . He brought one of his wives with him, and she was called Eve . . . .” Further on he explained that Adam was the father of our spirits. 40

Brigham’s apostles understood what he was saying. Preaching in 1856 Apostle Heber C. Kimball taught, “I have learned by experience that there is but one God that pertains to this people, and He is the God that pertains to this earth—the first man. That first man sent his own Son to redeem the world, to redeem his brethren; . . . " 41

In 1877 Brigham Young even introduced the Adam-God doctrine into the LDS endowment ceremony in the temple at St. George, Utah, which was the only temple then in operation. This lecture was a summary of the theological meaning of the ritual, including the Adam-God doctrine. Young explained that Adam and Eve were once mortals on some other world and after receiving their exaltation the gods sent them to form this world for the habitation of their spirit children, of whom Jesus was the first born. The lecture also taught that Adam was the literal father of Jesus in the flesh. While the original manuscript of the lecture at the veil is not publicly available, L. John Nuttall, Young’s scribe, recorded it in his diary:

In the creation the Gods entered into an agreement about forming this earth & putting Michael or Adam upon it. These thing[s] of which I have been speaking are what are termed the mysteries of godliness . . .

We have heard a great deal about Adam and Eve, how they were formed &c. . . . He was made just the same way you and I are made but on another earth. Adam was an immortal being when he came on this earth. He had lived on an earth similar to ours. . . . and gained his resurrection and his exaltation . . . And [he] had begotten all the spirit[s] that was to come to this earth. And Eve[,] our common Mother who is the Mother of all living[,] bore those spirits in the celestial world. And when this earth was organized by Elohim, Jehovah & Michael[,] who is Adam our common Father, Adam & Eve had the privilege to continue the work of Progression [and] consequently came to this earth . . .

Father Adam’s oldest son (Jesus the Saviour) who is the heir of the family is Father Adams first begotten in the spirit World, who according to the flesh is the only begotten[,] as it is written. (In his [Adam’s] divinity[,] he having gone back into the spirit World and come in the spirit to Mary[,] and she conceived[,] for when Adam and Eve got through with their Work in this earth, they did not lay their bodies down in the dust, but returned to the spirit World from whence they come.)

While the Adam-God doctrine has dropped into obscurity, the polygamist splinter groups and some Mormons have continued to believe the doctrine. In 1976 President Spencer W. Kimball denounced the teaching in the October LDS Conference:

Another matter. We hope that you who teach in the various organizations, whether on the campuses or in our chapels, will always teach the orthodox truth. We warn you against the dissemination of doctrines which are not according to the scriptures and which are alleged to have been taught by some of the General Authorities of past generations. Such, for instance, is the Adam-God theory. We denounce that theory and hope that everyone will be cautioned against this and other kinds of false doctrine.

This raises the question: When does a prophet speak for God? Young, as God’s prophet, declared the Adam-God doctrine to be a revelation. Kimball, as God’s prophet, declared it to be false doctrine.

More Questions Than Answers

After the initial listing of their fifteen questions one member asked if they could get references later so that they could check things out. Jensen responded, “We’ve brought a handout for you. These are the five very best websites for authentic answers to those questions. Let me just say if you spend as much time on these five websites as you spent on other websites cause I have visited as has Brother Turley some of these anti-Mormon websites. And they’re very dark to me.”

While we don’t have the web list that was handed out it is assumed it was the same one passed out in 2012 as part of the Swedish Rescue letter mentioned later.42

However, the Swedes immediately wanted to know if these were “official” answers. One member objected, “I tried to find the church own versions about these things.” To which Richard Turley responded, “They don’t exist.”

Since these historians were already aware of the historical problems bothering the Swedes, one wonders why the historians arrived at the meeting with no prepared answers? These were not new issues. Most of these questions had been troubling various Mormons for decades. In fact, as young Mormons Jerald and I were looking for answers to these issues in 1959 and 1960.43 The LDS Church has had ample time to produce official answers to these questions.

On July 22, 2013, one person posted this observation after reading the transcript of the meeting:

Worked my way through the transcript. I could really feel the frustration of the Swedes as question after question went unanswered. Far as I can tell the church leaders traveled 36 hours out of their way to answer the groups questions with:

- We have the answer but we just don’t have time to explain
- We’re working on it
- I hope to know the answer to that someday

In his summary of the evening, Marlin Jensen stated, “And when I look at those of you, Hans, you included, whom I know best here tonight, who are struggling with these things, my heart goes out to you. . . . I wish deep down we might have helped you more than we have tonight. But I want to say to you as the Savior said to his disciples after he fed the 5000. . . . He turned to his disciples and said, will you leave me also? And what did Peter answer? That’s right. To whom should we go, Lord? For thou hast the words of eternal life. And that’s what I want to say in my final testimony tonight. Where will you go, those of you who have doubts? . . . though there are trials and tribulations and unanswered questions, it is the best way of life, . . .”

Jensen sees LDS truth claims and historical contradictions as secondary to whether or not Mormonism improves your life. However, the message taken to the world by the 75,000 LDS missionaries is that all of Joseph Smith’s claims are true. In an interview for PBS in 2007, President Gordon B. Hinckley boldly stated:

44 It is assumed these were the same five web sites listed in the March 2012 Swedish Rescue documents; online at www.mormonthink.com/swedish-rescue.htm

45 See Salt Lake City Messenger, “Jerald Tanner’s Quest for Truth,” 3 part series, issues 108, 109, 111; online at: www.utlm.org/navnewsletters.htm

46 MormonDiscussions.com, see online http://tinyurl.com/mq4kh7o
Well, it’s either true or false. If it’s false, we’re engaged in a great fraud. If it’s true, it’s the most important thing in the world. Now, that’s the whole picture. It is either right or wrong, true or false, fraudulent or true. And that’s exactly where we stand, with a conviction in our hearts that it is true: that Joseph went into the [Sacred] Grove; that he saw the Father and the Son; that he talked with them; that Moroni came; that the Book of Mormon was translated from the plates; that the priesthood was restored by those who held it anciently. That’s our claim. That’s where we stand, and that’s where we fall, if we fall. But we don’t. We just stand secure in that faith.47

But for many at the 2010 meeting the historians’ answers were not convincing. One person who attended the meeting commented:

The big take away for me at this meeting was that the questions I was having were legit. The history that was troubling me were events that really happened. . . . One comment of the meeting with E. Jensen and Bro Turley was that in many instances we were told that there wasn’t enough time to fully answer the concerns. The paradox was that the Area general authority took almost an hour at the end [in Swedish], sharing the Korihor story [from the Book of Mormon] telling us not to disturb our friends in the church and make a decision to stay or leave. . . . For me it was valuable as it forced me to make a decision I haven’t regretted. Me and my wife have removed our names from the LDS records. We have also removed our children’s name from the records.

After years of internal conflict, and sorrow I am finally at peace. At the end of the day my reasons for being a member of the church was because I was raised to believe that the claims the LDS church makes are literally true. If they are not, I in fact felt like I was supporting a lie by being a member.48

Two Years Later

With growing unrest among the Swedish Mormons, in March of 2012 Ingvar Olsson, Area Seventy for Sweden, sent a document to various church leaders in the country dubbed “The Swedish Rescue.”49 In it was a letter from LDS Historian Marlin Jensen dated January 21, 2012:

Letter from Church History Department

“The Swedish Rescue”
Salt Lake City, January 21, 2012.

I think we all agree that in your efforts to rescue those who are struggling, no “program” is needed. Rather, priesthood leaders who hold keys, who are filled with charity, and who seek the guidance of the Spirit, will know in each case how best to proceed. The following summary of the principles that we discussed during your visit may be helpful to you and local priesthood leaders;

(1) The Church does not hide historical facts. In fact, it makes every effort to be open and honest about its past and current actions.

(2) The internet and digital records now make information about the Church available to many who because of language and other limitations have not previously known of this information. This does not mean that such information was hidden by the Church; it was simply not generally available.

(3) Joseph Smith and the prophets who succeeded him were not wicked or deceiving men. Joseph did not become a “fallen prophet.” He and all other prophets of this dispensation have human weaknesses. They have often admitted this and the scriptures sometimes confirm that God is not pleased with them. However, they worthily exercised their priesthood keys and led the Church in their time as directed by God through revelation. This is true of President Thomas S. Monson today.

(4) Obtaining or regaining a testimony of Joseph Smith as a prophet of God and of the restoration of the gospel through him is always essentially a spiritual quest. Nephi’s reminder to his older brother of the Lord’s words provides a good description of the path each must walk: “If ye will not harden your hearts, and ask me in faith, believing that ye shall receive, with diligence in keeping my commandments, surely these things shall be made known unto you”, (1 Nephi 15:11).

(5) In working with individual members who are expressing doubts, priesthood leaders should (a) provide the best possible answers to the questions the members are asking, (b) teach the spiritual path each must walk to gain or regain a testimony, helping the members to remember past spiritual witnesses and to avoid contact with evil influences, and (c) emphasize that faith is a conscious choice that each must make.

(6) As guided by the Spirit, the scriptures, and Handbook 1 (section 6.7.3 material on Apostasy), priesthood leaders may need to take disciplinary action with those members who persist in publicly opposing the Church and its leaders after they have been lovingly worked with and corrected by their bishop or higher authority. Alma’s counsel is important in this regard: “Now repentance could not come unto men except there were a punishment . . . ” (Alma 42:16).

The three-point approach [1. Prevent, 2. Regain and 3. Facts & Answers] . . . formulated after our meeting may be a very good framework to share with priesthood leaders along with the principles set out above. I think this sums up the things we agreed to during our meeting. We join our faith and prayers with yours that we can make difference in the lives of those Swedish Saints whose faith is being tested. May the Lord bless you and your associates there, is our prayer.

Sincerely your brother

Elder Marlin K. Jensen50

Notice that point number 5 encourages the local priesthood leaders to “provide the best possible answers to the questions the members are asking.” Yet the 2012 material sent to the Swedish leaders did not contain official answers to any of the questions raised in the 2010 meeting.

The author of MormonThink summed up the Swedish Rescue document in these words:

Nowhere in the Swedish Rescue does it mention any specific problem like polyandry, Book of Mormon anachronisms, linguistic issues, archeological problems, DNA studies, Kinderhook Plates, Book of Abraham translation, etc. . . .

We are troubled that the rescue document implies that the true information about the church’s history is somehow evil and shouldn’t be looked at. It uses the phrase “avoid contact with evil influences.” How can looking at historical facts be considered “evil influences”? It talks about the need to “repent”—why would someone reading true, church history need to repent? These subtle labelings seems to be an effort to categorize any research that isn’t faith-promoting as sinful.51

The Swedish Rescue document also included suggested web sites for members to use to find answers:

On the link below can all learn about church history, as a result of continued work of CHD [Church History Department].

https://history.lds.org/?lang=eng

Each can be on the websites follow the Church’s history, such as reading Times & Seasons all the numbers from 1830. All material on church websites is officially approved.

CHD recommend the following websites, which CHD itself uses. These websites are not only focused on the history of the church.

The first LDS FAQ http://ldsfaq.byu.edu/

The second Encyclopedia of Mormonism Online http://ecom.byu.edu/

The third FAIR http://en.fairmormon.org/Main_Page

The fourth Neal A. Maxwell Institute http://maxwellinstitute.byu.edu/

The fifth More Good Foundation http://www.moregoodfoundation.org/52

Unfortunately, many people find these sites are still avoiding or obscuring the tough questions. In the comments section of the 2013 Mormon Stories podcast of an interview with Hans Mattsson, one person wrote:

*When I first started my “crisis of faith” search, I stuck almost exclusively to FAIR’s website. Then I started to venture out a little to mormonthink.com. I could not believe how much FAIR whitewashed or left out facts that didn’t tell the whole story. If you want coddling then go to FAIR or BYU type sites . . . if you want the unvarnished facts then go to mormonthink.com or utlm.org.

I want to know the whole truth so I can make informed decision . . . I mean, we’re only talking about our entire lives and family relationships, and to many, our eternal life with God. Or, we can simply live in naive, blind ignorance and wonder why things don’t add up.*53

After the members had already waited almost two years for answers to the 15 questions of 2010, the “Swedish Rescue” document was all the answer they received. Evidently the “Rescue” plan failed to help the troubled members and was quietly dropped.

After waiting years for answers, Hans Mattsson decided to go public with his story. And this brings us full circle, back to the July 21, 2013, article on the front page of the New York Times, “Some Mormons Search the Web and Find Doubt.” The article interviews Hans Mattsson, Greg Prince and Terryl Givens—all Mormons—and discusses the major stumbling blocks for the Swedes: the method of translating the Book of Mormon from a stone in a hat, priesthood restriction on Blacks, translation problems for the Book of Abraham, Joseph Smith’s polygamy and polyandry, and the Mountain Meadows Massacre. The article states:

Eric Hawkins, a church spokesman, said that “every church faces this challenge,” adding, “The answer is not to try to silence critics, but to provide as much information and as much support as possible to those who may be affected.” . . . But Mr. Mattsson and others say the disillusionment is infecting the church’s best and brightest.

The Times article also mentions special seminars this year entitled “Crucible of Doubt” presented by LDS author Terryl Givens, and his wife, Fiona, in Europe and America. Givens was quoted as saying, “Sometimes they (questioning Mormons) are just this side of leaving, and sometimes they are simply faithful members who are looking for clarity and understanding to add to their faith.”

However, judging by reports of the seminars, Givens is not giving any clearer answers than those offered by the historians to the Swedes in 2010. 54

The article quoted Greg Prince, author of Power from on High: The Development of Mormon Priesthood, that Mr. Mattsson “is, as far as I know, the highest-ranking church official who has gone public with deep concerns, who has had a faith crisis and come forward to say he’s going to talk about it because maybe that will help us all to resolve it.”

Also in the article Richard Bushman, author of Joseph Smith: Rough Stone Rolling, was quoted as saying, “You would be amazed at the number of Mormons who don’t think Joseph Smith practiced polygamy. It just wasn’t talked about. It was never mentioned in church periodicals. That was policy.”

The article continues:

In the last 10 or 15 years, he [Bushman] said, “the church has come to realize that transparency and candor and historical accuracy are really the only way to go.”

Unfortunately, that wasn’t the experience of the Swedes over the last eight years. At the end of the article Mattsson is quoted as saying, “I don’t want to hurt the church, I just want the truth.”

Mattsson’s Interview with John Dehlin

Another amazing event was John Dehlin’s interview with Hans Mattsson, which aired on Dehlin’s podcast series Mormon Stories on July 22, 2013. 55 Although Dehlin’s interview with Mattsson was posted after the 2013 Times article, it was evidently recorded prior to the article. Mattsson explained that he had listened to earlier podcasts of Mormon Stories and felt it was time to share his experiences.

In part 5 of the Dehlin interview Mr. Mattsson answered a number of questions about where he stood at this point. He mentioned the number of spiritual experiences he had as an active, believing Mormon and now doesn’t know how to reconcile those with his current knowledge.

He sees that the Book of Mormon has inspiring passages but wonders if it is an actual historical document? He questions the existence of the gold plates; how the Book of Mormon was supposedly translated; who and where the Lamanites are; whether Jesus actually came to America; why things like horses and steel are mentioned in the Book of Mormon despite the absence of archaeological evidence; why passages from the King James Bible so abundantly fill the Book of Mormon; and why the Book of Abraham seems to be more a product of Joseph Smith’s own mind than an actual translation of the papyri he purchased.

Hans still believes in God and Jesus but he has many questions. As to there being only one true church he wishes the LDS were more open and accepting of others. He feels leaders in other churches are inspired as well.

Dehlin asked if it is possible to take a middle path, not believing all of Mormonism but still stay a part of the community? Mattsson shared that he and his wife had visited other churches but felt uncomfortable, not knowing the people or their type of service. He enjoys visiting the ward and seeing old friends, but it is difficult when you no longer believe it all the same as they do. This has been a very hard journey for him and his wife but he is glad to know the truth even when it is troubling. He advised couples who were struggling with these issues to place their marriage first, don’t put the marriage in jeopardy. Be open and honest with one another.

Mattsson hopes that someday the LDS Church will be open about its past and more welcoming to those with differences. He waited until 2013 to come forward with his story because he was worried about its repercussions, but has faith that God will take care of them. He doesn’t believe the church will take action against him because he is not advocating that people should apostatize, he just wants more openness and an accepting spirit towards those who struggle. His wife shared a spiritual experience they recently had. A man came jogging past their house, then turned around and came back with a message for them. He just felt impressed to share with them that God loves them. He was part of a local church, wasn’t Mormon and as far as the Mattssons knew, he didn’t know anything about them. 56

2011 Survey of Doubting Mormons

Beginning in the Fall of 2011 John Dehlin, a graduate student of clinical and counseling psychology at Utah State University, conducted an online survey of 3000
Mormons “who at one time believed their Church was true, but no longer believe,” titled Understanding Mormon Disbelief. Almost half of the participants reported their current status as agnostic/atheist/humanist, while only 11% identified themselves as Christian (non-Mormon).

The study found that “on average, survey respondents cited 15 major factors (with scores of 3 or 4) and 13 minor factors (scores of 1 or 2) as having an impact, indicating that there was not simply one or two issues that led to disbelief; on the contrary, many issues appeared to ‘stack up’ until belief was lost.”

The seven top historical problems leading to disbelief were:

- Polygamy/Polyandry
- Book of Abraham
- Blacks and the Priesthood
- DNA and the Book of Mormon
- Masonic influences in the temple ceremony
- Multiple, conflicting versions of the First Vision
- Anachronisms in the Book of Mormon (e.g. horses, steel, etc.)

Peggy Stack, writing for the Salt Lake Tribune, in 2012, reported on the survey:

> Surprised by what they find so easily online, more and more members of the Utah-based Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are encountering crises of faith. Some even leave the fold and, feeling betrayed, join the ranks of Mormon opponents.

> It’s a growing problem, acknowledges LDS general authority Marlin Jensen, the faith’s outgoing church historian, and one Mormon leaders are working to confront.

> “Never before have we had this information age, with social networking and bloggers publishing unvetted points of view,” Jensen said in an interview Monday. “The church is concerned about misinformation and distorted information, but we are doing better and trying harder to get our story told in an accurate way.”

> “I definitely get the sense that this is a real crisis,” said Mormon scholar and writer Terryl Givens. “It is an epidemic.”

The article continues:

> There is a “discrepancy between a church history that has been selectively rendered through the Church Education System and Sunday school manuals, and a less-flattering version universally accessible on the Internet,” Givens wrote in an email from Virginia. “The problem is not so much the discovery of particular details that are deal breakers for the faithful; the problem is a loss of faith and trust in an institution that was less than forthcoming to begin with.”

> Another issue is the “veneration for Smith and other leaders that imposes on them an idealized portrait of goodness and inerrancy out of all proportion to Smith’s own self-understanding of his role,” said Givens, a professor of literature and religion at the University of Richmond.” . . .

> LDS scholar Richard Bushman, author of the critically acclaimed biography Joseph Smith: Rough Stone Rolling, has become a kind of historical therapist, he wrote in an email from his home in New York, “counseling with distraught wives and parents or disaffected Mormons themselves.”

> For those who discover unwelcome information about the church’s history online, Bushman said, “the whole picture changes in a flash — like those optical illusions that show a beautiful woman and a hag.” . . .

Following Stack’s report, the Salt Lake Tribune posted:

Why some Mormons leave

In a nonscientific online survey last fall, researchers at the Open Stories Foundation found that 81 percent cited loss of faith in Mormon founder Joseph Smith as a moderate or strong factor in their no longer believing in the LDS Church. Another 84 percent said they studied LDS history and lost their faith. About 79 percent lost faith in Mormonism’s founding scripture, the Book of Mormon.

The survey, which was posted on various LDS-related blogs and websites as well as Facebook, attracted more than 3,000 self-selected, nonrepresentative responses. It found that the two historical issues that most negatively affected belief in the faith were “the Book of Abraham” — a Mormon text that Smith said was based on Egyptian papyri he obtained — and polygamy, which the church abandoned in 1890.

58 This may not be a good indication of the actual percentage of those who leave the LDS Church and still embrace Christianity since the survey was mainly publicized on sites rarely frequented by those who have moved on to another faith system.

61 Salt Lake Tribune, (February 3, 2012), online comments following Peggy Stack’s article.
April 2013 LDS Conference

Possibly in response to the issues in Sweden, as well as to Dehlin’s survey and the resulting news articles about those who are leaving the LDS Church, LDS Apostle Jeffrey R. Holland gave this admonition in the April 2013 annual church conference:

Be as candid about your questions as you need to be; life is full of them on one subject or another. But if you and your family want to be healed, don’t let those questions stand in the way of faith working its miracle. . . . Brothers and sisters, this is a divine work in process, with the manifestations and blessings of it abounding in every direction, so please don’t hyperventilate if from time to time issues arise that need to be examined, understood, and resolved. . . . When doubt or difficulty come, do not be afraid to ask for help. If we want it as humbly and honestly as this father did, we can get it. The scriptures phrase such earnest desire as being of “real intent,” pursued “with full purpose of heart, acting no hypocrisy and no deception before God.” I testify that in response to that kind of importuning, God will send help from both sides of the veil to strengthen our belief.62

Contrary to Holland’s assessment, most of the people we speak to who have researched the problems and sought answers from the LDS Church have not been satisfied with their answers.

Even though the church is continually posting more documents from the Joseph Smith papers on their website they have not added any official FAQ page answering the most troubling historical issues. Instead, they seem to have moved the other way. In July of 2013 the LDS Church announced a new feature on their official web site www.lds.org. In an article titled “New LDS.org Search Harnesses Power of Google” it was stated that now members could search for information without fear of encountering troubling information:

Official, Safe Content

The new search provides a more safe and Church-specific search experience than Google, said Brother Ward. When you search from Google’s website, the results you get back may or may not be official content, he explained. Some results might be links to members’ personal blogs or even anti-Church sites.

The LDS.org search, however, only returns links to official Church-approved content that is currently available on LDS.org and other Church websites. And even though Google’s technology is used, no user information is provided back to Google. “It provides a safe, private, shock-free environment to search for approved gospel resources,” said Brother Ward.

In other words, parents won’t need to worry that they or their children might stumble onto inappropriate content listed in other search engine results.63

An example of how the new search box leads seekers practically nowhere can be seen by simply typing in “Joseph Smith polygamy.” You will receive links to several articles that do mention that Smith practiced polygamy, but these give no information as to how many wives he had, the circumstances of their marriages, or why he lied to his wife and the church about it.

Also try doing a search on “Joseph Smith polyandry.” You will get a reference to the D&C 132:51, dated 1844, which hardly answers the question and leaves one wondering why someone thought that it was pertinent. Joseph Smith had already entered into many polyandrous relationships. This verse is directed at Emma:

D&C 132:51: Verily, I say unto you: A commandment I give unto mine handmaid, Emma Smith, your wife, whom I have given unto you, that she stay herself and partake not of that which I commanded you to offer unto her; for I did it, saith the Lord, to prove you all, as I did Abraham, and that I might require an offering at your hand, by covenant and sacrifice.

She is then told in the next verse to accept Joseph’s wives who “are virtuous and pure,” and in verse 54 she is told to “abide and cleave unto my servant Joseph, and to none else” or she will be “destroyed.” Historians have speculated that Joseph was interested in marrying Jane Law and offered her husband, William Law, to Emma but then withdrew the offer.

George D. Smith, author of Nauvoo Polygamy, mentions a curious entry by William Law which states Joseph had “offered to furnish his wife, Emma, with a substitute . . . by way of compensation for his neglect of her.” George Smith continues, “Whatever was behind the talk of Emma or William as a sacrificial offering for sake of harmony at home could not have gone over well with the Laws.”64

Try finding a discussion of Book of Mormon problems such as the lack of evidence that there were horses or chariots in America during the Book of Mormon time period. Or try finding a map for the geography of the Book of Mormon.

Those who have come across problematic issues of LDS history will soon tire of searching for answers on www.lds.org. Despite its self-declared effort to be more open and accessible to questioners, the LDS church seems just as selective and silent as ever on the topics that matter most.

Other Instances of Apostasy

In January of 1981 we received correspondence from a family in New Zealand describing their exodus from Mormonism. By June 12, 1981, they reported that “nearly 70 Mormons” had come out of the Church:

On May 17th we sent to every Mormon Church leader and every Mormon on our mailing list in New Zealand a copy of our mailer . . .

The response has been amazing. . . . The most wonderful thing is that we have been able to assist nearly 70 Mormons out of Mormonism and many of them to the real Lord Jesus Christ. We have a Mormon Bishop, 5 returned missionaries and two stake high councilmen now on our mailing list. Every day some one approaches us and we are able to show them that Mormon claims are false. . . . It really touches us when a returned missionary who has just been shown all the evidence in your books that we have in our shop says with tears in his eyes “The Church is not true and I have wasted two years of my life and all that money for nothing.” Two days later he accepted the Lord and is being baptised at the end of this month. He is helping his mother and aunt out of the church. The aunt rang us earlier this week and we sent her a library copy of “Mormonism Shadow or Reality?” She phoned us back yesterday to say she had read it (must be a speed reader) and she now knows that the church is not true. She is a third generation Mormon!

Some people declare to us after seeing the truth and coming to know that Mormonism is not true . . . “It’s Me getting out of a prison.” One young man who said those exact words has now accepted Christ and was baptised earlier this week.65

An article published in 2003 by Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought, illustrated a similar apostasy in Bremen, Germany, that predated the events in Sweden:

Then, in 1996, a member of the [Bremen] ward encountered a couple of disturbing articles about the early history of the church from the Utah Lighthouse Ministry, a conservative Protestant organization with an anti-Mormon mission. Attempting to come to terms with these, he asked friends in the ward for help and, in so doing, unintentionally started a wave of apostasy. Another brother translated parts of these articles into German and distributed them to members. In the fall discussion circles formed and letters were written to local and regional church authorities, questioning the official version of church history. The issues at stake were, first, the different versions of the First Vision as evidence of a developing concept of God rather than an initially clear and complete picture through revelation; second, differences between the Book of Commandments and the Doctrine and Covenants as evidence of changed (or possibly forged) revelations; and, finally, controversy over whether the Book of Mormon was a fiction or a genuinely ancient record. The members were especially upset because these papers had been written twenty years earlier (when most of them had just begun their membership in the church), but evidently no church response or explanation had ever been made available.

In February 1997 the mission president tried to solve the problem in one stroke by inviting everyone to a question-and-answer evening. During that meeting tension became acute between the group questioning the church’s truthfulness regarding its history and members affirming their testimonies and high esteem for the Book of Mormon and the First Vision. The mission president did not answer the questions specifically, but called for a spiritual approach when hard historical facts were placed in question. When he defined truth as “whatever the prophet says, if he is not mistaken,” some members decided to leave the ward. Two former bishops and a former branch president were among those who left. All together thirty people left, most of them long active in responsible church positions such as branch and district presidencies, district and stake high councils. The wards, of course, were left in an uproar and are still trying to regain composure. The Delmonhorst Branch was subsequently dissolved. The remaining dwarf units continue to struggle.66

Some people regard Mormonism’s past as irrelevant to its validity as a church today. However, Joseph Smith and his successors have always maintained that the LDS Church is both historically and doctrinally true. The 75,000 LDS missionaries being sent out this year are certainly proclaiming that message door to door. The issues discussed in this article are as relevant today as they were fifty years ago. As LDS President Gordon B. Hinckley so candidly acknowledged, either Joseph Smith invented Mormonism or it was from God. Both the Bible and history declare it to be a fraud. Our plea is for the troubled Mormon to go back to the New Testament and read it again. The message of Christ is beautifully simple—we are adopted into the family of God by grace, through faith in Christ, not the LDS Church.◆

65 Salt Lake City Messenger, (October 1981), no. 46; online at www.utlm.org/newsletters/no46.htm#Success

In mid-October 2012, a returned LDS Mission President contacted me to arrange a meeting. Several days later, he called again and said that a member of the First Quorum of the Seventy also wished to attend. He said the General Authority would attend on condition that I not name him or repeat any stories that would identify him. He explained that neither of them, including the GA’s wife, believed the founding claims of the restoration were true. He clarified that they had read my book, An Insider’s View of Mormon Origins, and had concluded that the LDS Church was not true; was not what it claimed to be. The GA often went to the MormonThink.com website for information and there discovered my book. The Mission President said he received my book from the GA.

We have at this writing met three times. We first met on Tuesday, October 23, 2012 and again February 14, 2013 at my house. On March 26, 2013 we convened at the GAs house. Upon entering my home for the first meeting the GA said, “We are here to learn.” I recognized him. He has been a member of the First Quorum of the Seventy for a number of years. He has served in several high profile assignments during this period. The following are the more important statements made by the GA during our first three meetings. We now meet monthly.

He said that each new member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles is given one million dollars to take care of any financial obligations they have. This money gift allows them to fully focus on the ministry. He said that the overriding consideration of who is chosen is whether they are “church broke,” meaning, will they do whatever they are told. He said the senior six apostles make the agenda and do most of the talking. The junior six are told to observe, listen and learn and really only comment if they are asked. He said that it takes about two to three years before the new apostle discovers that the church is not true. He said it took Dieter F. Uchtdorf a little longer because he was an outsider. He said they privately talk among themselves and know the foundational claims of the restoration are not true, but continue on boldly “because the people need it,” meaning the people need the church. When the Mission President voiced skepticism and named ____ as one who surely did believe, The GA said: “No, he doesn’t.” The one million dollar gift, plus their totally obedient attitude makes it easy for them to go along when they find out the church is not true. For these reasons and others, he doesn’t expect any apostle to ever expose the truth about the foundational claims.

When I asked the GA how he knew these things, he answered by saying that the Quorum of the Twelve today is more isolated from the Quorums of the Seventies now because there are several of them. When only one Quorum of the Seventy existed, there was more intimacy. During his one on one assignments with an apostle, conversations were more familiar. He said that none of the apostles ever said to him directly that they did not believe; but that it was his opinion based on “my interactions with them.” Also, that none of the Twelve want to discuss “truth issues,” meaning issues regarding the foundational claims of the church. He said that the apostle’s lives are so completely and entirely enmeshed in every detail of their lives in the church, that many of them would probably die defending the church rather than admit the truth about Joseph Smith and the foundations of the church.

The GA stated that my disciplinary action (which would have occurred on the final Sunday of October 2010 had I not resigned), was mandated/ordered/approved by the First Presidency of the Church. I said that if the apostles know the church is not true and yet order a disciplinary hearing for my writing a book that is almost certainly true regarding the foundational claims of the church, then they are corrupt even evil. He replied, “That’s right!”

The GA said the church is like a weakened dam. At first you don’t see cracks on the face; nevertheless, things are happening behind the scenes. Eventually, small cracks appear, and then the dam will “explode.” When it does, he said, the members are going to be “shocked” and will need scholars/historians like me to educate them regarding the Mormon past.

The Mission President and the GA both said they attend church every Sunday and feel like “a hypocrite and trapped.” The GA said his ward treats him like a king and when he gives firesides and speaks to LDS congregations they have high expectations of him. He would like to do more in getting the truth out besides raising a few questions when speaking and gifting my book to others when feeling comfortable. Perhaps this is why he has reached out to me. The GA is a man of integrity and very loving. Upon leaving each time, he always gives me a big hug. •

May 2013: I have been reading your website for a long time and finally left the Mormon Church in December of this past year. . . . It took me a long time to realize all the problems and out-right lies of Mormonism. I was very upset at having been miss-led so completely.

It's hard to leave and I was still somewhat insecure about it at the time. However, I have joined a Christian Church which teaches nothing but the Bible, . . . The Minister has even read to us (and explained the native tongue meanings) from Hebrew and Greek Bibles so as to aid in our understating of some of the English Bible passages. . . . This is complete opposite of the shallow depth of knowledge I had seen in the local Stake Presidents and/or Bishops. . . . I have learned more in the past 7 months about the true and in-depth understanding of the Christian Bible than all of 40 years of surface knowledge handed out by the Mormon Church Melchizedek priesthood holders, Bishops, local Presidents, and stake Presidents. . . . Thank you so much for your work. I know you have brought many to Christianity.

May 2013: Your site and books have been an enormous help to me. I was needing a crash course in Mormonism to engage a Mormon friend who was going to spend a week with us in early May. She had given me a BoM earlier, but I had found it extremely difficult to read. . . . My friend. . . . arrived as scheduled . . . I had formed a handful of questions on basic BoM to ask her and as anything LDS is her favorite subject, getting the conversation going was easy. Is it real history? Translation or transliteration? Anachronisms: chariots, horses, steel etc. Archeological sites? Going was easy. Is it real history? Translation or transliteration? Anachronisms: chariots, horses, steel etc. Archeological sites? Language, DNA. You get the picture. For each question she had a push button, no nonsense reply and prying about them further formed a handful of questions on basic BoM to ask her and as anything LDS is her favorite subject, getting the conversation going was easy. Is it real history? Translation or transliteration? Anachronisms: chariots, horses, steel etc. Archeological sites? Language, DNA. You get the picture. For each question she had a push button, no nonsense reply and prying about them further produced a strong push back, so I was looking for a different approach when I thought of Sam, Lehi's son.

When I had first read about Sam in the BoM I remember bursting out laughing. No Israelite would ever name their child "Sam", cutting off "el", God.

So I asked her about Sam. And we talked about Hannah, being barren, and why she named her son Samuel - Shema El. God hears. And recited the Jewish Shema - "hear o Yisrael", Then we talked about El. God. Beth El. House of God, etc. "El" would never knowingly be omitted from a name. So, knowing that no Israelite would ever name a child simply "Hear", explain to me how and why Lehi came up with "Sam"? She had not heard that question before, fully understood the logic and therefore the legitimacy of it, and had no answer. It was the first time in the few years I have known [my friend] that she did not have an answer for a BoM question. Stunning. For all her LDS brainwashing she is intellectually honest. One just has to breach the Mormon armor of an auto-answer to find it. When she left a few days later she was still puzzling over "Sam" and promised to get back with me. Inside I was doing handsprings.

The Holy Spirit found a small niche for His truth to rest in the mind of my friend, and I am praying for it to grow and produce a fatal crack in the Mormon lie that has her so bound.

May 2013: Looking back over that time between when I was exiting Mormonism and when God put and established me in Christ, there were a host of other influences that tried to reach out and grab me. I thank God that one counterbalancing influence was you, Sandra, and your books, and the personal time you gave me. I am ever grateful.

May 2013: I know that we are all sons and daughters of God. I have a current Temple recommend Being fast Sunday today I bore my Testimony to the truth fullness of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter day Saints and of the prophet Joseph Smith and our current prophet pres. Monson.

May 2013: I recently resigned my membership in the LDS Church. I was “born and raised” in the church, rendered lip service to professing a testimony, served on a foreign mission, served as well in a ward bishopric, and was even ordained a High Priest by Thomas Monson—all gratefully repudiated, I might add. . . . My renunciation and denunciation of Mormonism have NOT been difficult—not laden with remorse, guilt, or misgivings. I have never been happier since voluntarily throwing off the trappings of “the church.” It was the appropriate decision when, after 76 years of church membership, I came to the full realization one fine day that the so-called Gospel as taught in my former church was a sham and a lie.

May 2013: After reading your latest newsletter/magazine, I handed it to a Mormon in my housing unit. At first he didn’t want it, but took it in the end. Yesterday he asked me to pray for him as he is now struggling with his Mormon/LDS faith.

June 2013: In search of the truth and my heart hurts but I know that this pain is necessary. Thank you all. . . . I’m Former Sunday School President, after 4 years I resigned for the right reasons . . . NOT a Mormon heter but have confirmed that the deceit from the LDS church is not: Christ-like, honest or helpful.

I recently had my Bishop ask me not to baptize my son; this was because I was honest enough to state a small fraction of my concerns in private. I simply focused on Brigham Young’s Adam/God issue since I know it didn’t hit at HIS core values. I was accused of not praying reading scripture enough. NOPE!! Take care, God Bless and more power to you!

July 2013: I do not believe you or your words at all. Go Away!

July 2013: My wife and I recently resigned from LDS church after 40 years of life-long service and TONS of money donated. It all started on February 10, 2013, when we were sitting in Gospel Doctrine class and I read D&C 49:16 about having one wife. For some reason the question pricked me . . . If God commanded Joseph in a modern day revelation that we should only have one wife, then why did we ever practice polygamy?? I had recently gotten an iPad with my scriptures on it so I decided to do a quick internet search and see how the church justified that. I’ve never gone outside the scriptures and basic LDS resources to read and study so I was blown away when I pulled up fairmormon.org. I had never heard of that site before, nor had I ever realized there were SO MANY problems the church was dealing with! Within a week of all-consuming research, I lost my testimony of the church. My wife immediately followed and we officially resigned a few months ago.

I’m a successful small business owner with a wife and three great kids. Born and raised in Utah and then moved [out of state] in 2003. We are eternally grateful for people like you who have shed light on the dreary world of Mormonism!! Your website and extensive information is incredible! Thank you, thank you, thank you!!

July 2013: hey i was wondering why you spend these countless hours trying to disprove the church when you could go on living your life. you guys have serious issues you are dealing with here.
July 2013: First off, I want to say thank you so much for your web site. Thank you so much for putting the facts there. I'm 29 years old, born and raised in the LDS Church and very active in it all those years for the most part.

After my divorce I had a few bishops wanting me to go through the temple to get my endowments. I told them I took it very seriously and I just didn't feel like it was the right time to go through. I went through the Temple [in 2012] for my first time (I did baptisms for the dead when I was in young womens and in institute—lots of times). They told me to focus on the feeling and just enjoy it. But it was sooo different then I had thought. It was so confusing to me before I even got to the endowment session.

I thought the priesthood, the men, are the ones that have the priesthood so the washing and anointing having the female do it really confused me. I could see on the board the [new] name written and had been erased, when she gave me my secret name it was the same one and I tried not to let that bother me and put it in the back of my mind. It was so much different than I thought it would be. I thought it would be more personable and felt more closer to God but it was different and I left with a head ache. But I told everyone that I loved it and I felt good being in there and it was a good experience. But it really did confuse me and it was so not what I thought it was going to be and I was kind of disappointed!

20 days later at my work I met a guy and we started dating. Little by little he would always talk about Joseph Smith, free masonry, the temple and etc. The things he told me did not feel right and I was like no that can't be true. I was never taught a lot of those things he was telling me. . . . and he even showed me some things in the church history volumes, so he always proved everything he told me.

First I tried to prove him wrong about polygamy and some things from the Bible since that was the only book he believed in. . . . He showed me the similarities to the book of the hebrews and the book of mormon, the stone and the hat, the magical practices and basically the whole translation process. Those hit me hard. (I mean the book of mormon is the cornerstone of the religion!) One day though he told me that he showed me everything he could and that he gave up on me with showing me stuff and get through to me. He told me boy the Ids church really has its claws in you! He was right, I was 100 percent all in it and I was happy in it.

One day I prayed to Heavenly Father to guide me to the truth, that I wanted to know the truth no matter the price. That I want to return to him again and I love him and Jesus and if He wants me to stay in the church I will, if he wants me to leave I will, just let me know what is true. I thought I had the truth, but please guide me to it.

Boy did he answer that prayer so fast! I asked the guy I was dating one more time to show me things. So he showed me the information about the stone and the hat etc. I watched a movie on 'Jesus vs Joseph Smith' that some Christians put out I think. Everything clicked, it felt like that and everything came pouring out and it just all hit me! Joseph Smith was not what he claimed and the Church leaders are deceiving and lying to the Ids people! Then I started doing research on my own, he gave me all the websites and places I needed so I could do deep research. Now all I see when I look at the temple is that it is masonic and not from God. . . .

I had always thought that since Joseph smith got a revelation from god about polygamy that he did practice it, but I don't think I was ever taught that, they focus on him and emma. So it wasn't that big of a deal to find out he did have more than one wife, and the 14 year olds he married was gross, but what bugged me even more was the polyandry. I did deep research and that guy helped me a lot.

But the only one who could touch my heart and actually get through to me was God. He answered my prayer and I have never felt closer to him. I came to find out that I can trust the Bible and on mother's day I started going to a non denominational Christian church. I love it! I am reading the new testament and I have never felt Jesus so close to me. I have never felt so much love for him and from him, comfort and peace! It is amazing! I love Jesus so much! The cross was enough! What my Savior did for me and everyone was enough! He did it all! It is so hard for me with there being no pre-existence and then trying to figure out what really is biblical and true vs what is man made by Joseph Smith and the LDS Church.

July 2013: I am a former LDS member and a Biblical Christian. Actually, I have not officially resigned from the LDS church . . . but my husband and I physically left the church about 15 years ago and have been members of a couple of solid Christian churches since then. There were many things that the Lord used in the beginning to show us there was a problem in the LDS teaching, by the way, and we did end up looking at some of the 'Tanners' material. We're grateful for your work and that you seek to represent the church accurately because we agree it does Christians and Mormons a great disservice to do otherwise.

July 2013: Thank you for the prompt processing of my order [digital PDF copy of Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?]. I've been examining your work for the last hour or so. I am nothing but impressed so far! . . .

I am especially grateful for the photo of Jerald and Sandra at the end of the book. It helps to buttress my representations to my still-LDS-believing family members that the book was NOT written by demons but by extremely intelligent, spiritual, compassionate, and hard-working human beings who care about truth.

July 2013: Dear sister in Christ, I just wanted you to know that I am so grateful for your service. Thank you so much dear, dear sister.

About month ago I found out information about history of the mormon church. It was really hard time in my life because I was a faithful member of this church about 11 years, served my mission and now I know the truth. I am sorry for my poor english, but my poor english helped me to understand most of information. I still wondering about how this church is man-made and fake religion and has awful history. It's still hard for me . . . and I stopped attending their worship. And all my friends in Russia they are mormons . . . . I feel so bad because they were deceived and many of them just ignoring information about history of the church . . . . I loosing my friends and my family . . . . But now I know the real Christ. And it worth it. I feel his love for me, but I still feel lonely with my new reality. I reading the Bible every day and sometime it's hard to understand things because of the doctrine of mormonism in which i believed. . . . It is more harder for Russians to know the real situation of things, you know, because we have no translated books and have no church libraries where you can find information . . . . well, Sandra, because of your ministry now I know the truth and I was born again and I want to follow the Jesus till the end. I now preparing my paper for resignation from the church.

July 2013: This article [www.utlm.org] helped me a lot...the way we have explained and have put Jesus’s saying before any other person...I love it...I’m thinking of joining the Ids church and when researched a little about Ids and joseph smith i found out about his wives...and this ruined everything...but this article helped me see that no matter what people teach we can always chose whether to accept it or not...God has given us free will...thank u for reminding me...actually recently my boyfriend became a member of the Ids church and just went for serving a mission. The thing is I found out all this after so long I mean I’ve to wait till he comes back. For me to explain to him.
July 2013: I have a meeting w/ my Bishop coming up . . . I prepared in part for this meeting thru the books from UTM [www. utm.org]. . . . I resigned from my Sunday school president position in January. The genesis was that I saw the church manuals for what they are managed and at the “George Washington chopped down the cherry tree level.” I started my own research and WOW! I was mislead, lied to and have been rebuked for stating the truth.

July 2013: My story of finding Jesus! Those of you who have known me for a long time are probably wondering why I left the Mormon Church. I want to share my story with you . . . I was born and raised in the Mormon faith. It completely defined who I was. I met my husband just as he was coming home from serving a 2 year mission for the Mormon Church. We were married in the temple.

Those of you who knew me when I was Mormon knew I lived it. Down to every last detail the prophets laid out for me. No rated R movies, living the word of wisdom fully, no extra piercings, etc. . . . I was attending the temple with my husband at least once a month or even more frequently. I had a calling in the Mormon church and was serving faithfully in my calling. One hundred percent lived and believed in Mormonism, I was all in.

One day my husband sat me down to have a talk. He said he had been reading the Bible and he didn’t feel the Mormon Church was the right way to follow Jesus. I was floored. What? How could this be? He proceeded to show me multiple places in the Bible that contradicted Mormon doctrine. He also began to show me that the history of the Mormon Church that I had been taught my whole life was not the whole truth. The history taught by the Mormon Church has many important details left out and many lies are told. (If you are interested in knowing these things I am more than happy to share them with you, also at Deseret Book you can buy a book called “Joseph Smith: Rough Stone Rolling” it is a book about the history of Joseph Smith written by a historian for the Mormon church.)

I was shocked by these things but I remained in a place of faith. I had believed my whole life that this was the only true church, so I was going to continue to cling to it. Over the next couple years our marriage struggled in a major way. My husband left the Mormon Church completely and told me he wouldn’t be going back. I had family members (who are Mormon) telling me my sweet 2 year old . . . I couldn’t bear the thought of splitting up his parents.

So I began praying to God to tell me what to do. I got a very sure answer that God did NOT want me to split up my family. So I stayed and slowly through reading and studying I began realizing the true character of Joseph Smith. For a man who claimed he “saw God”, he did not act like one. I realized the things he did and the lies he told were not anything God would condone or allow for one of His prophets. That testified to me that he was not ever a true prophet of God. Once I came to that realization I was pretty sure that the Mormon Church wasn’t true. So I took it one step further and asked God if the Mormon Church was true. I got a very sure and quick answer and it shocked even me. God was telling me that Mormonism was false.

During this time of questioning we were introduced to a non-denominational church. We began going occasionally. It was there that I was introduced to a new concept. It was that: Jesus died for us on the cross and there is nothing we can do on our own to go to heaven, all we can do is accept Jesus as our Lord and Savior and His sacrifice for us and we will be saved (Romans 10:9-10, Acts 4: 10-12). I was amazed that I felt the Holy Spirit so strong when they were saying these things. It was stronger than I had ever felt it in my life. One Sunday during the church service, it hit me. I realized I never knew this Jesus they were talking about. Yes I was taught of a Jesus in the Mormon Church, but it wasn’t this Jesus they were telling me about.

When I was Mormon I was told that in order to go to heaven (their “highest degree of Glory”) I had to do things. I had to be baptized, and I had to make and keep covenants in the temple. I now know that Jesus meant it when he said “It is finished”. He died and was raised from the dead and when we accept Him we are saved. To think that there is anything you can do to get to heaven is complete blasphemy (Isaiah 64:6). You cannot earn your spot in heaven (Ephesians 2: 8-10, Titus 3: 5-7). Jesus paid it all, period! Either you are going to accept and trust in God’s sacrifice fully or you are going to trust in yourself. When we stand before God on the judgment day it will go one of two ways. Jesus will come forward for you and say “She/he is mine, I died for her/him” or you will be judged according to your own works. I can tell you right now your works will never be enough (Galatians 2:16). Accept God at His word (John 3:16) and stop relying on yourself.

It isn’t about belonging to a specific church or a joining a specific religion. It’s all about Jesus. I left the Mormon Church for a personal relationship with Jesus. I challenge anyone who is Mormon or in any other religion to take a good look at what you believe in. Do you trust in God? Or are you relying on your own works? It can’t be both! If your Church is teaching you that there are any works you can do of yourself to get to Heaven, then it is false. Don’t discount what Jesus did for you any longer. Accept Him into your heart and into your life and be saved.

August 2013: Have you received a witness from God that your efforts are “on track” with His will? Do what is right.

August 2013: I too have been raised in the LDS church. I believe that I am one of the few [in my extended family] who have recognized the deceit of the church. My direct GG grandfather knew JS personally and was there with the polygamy revelation. In fact JS married two of my [ancestors]. I believe that my family is the largest in the church. My nephew is currently on a mission and is right.

August 2013: I love your ministry. I was going to convert to Baptist Church and everything seems like a foreign language to me. . . and was surprised to hear that someone else is a Christ follower and being related to you know who. It is real awesome . . . and to know that I am not alone in the fight to bring home those who believe in Mormonism.

August 2013: I am a Christ follower, I was born and raised in the Mormon church and my mother’s maiden name is Young. My great-great-grand father is Brigham Young. I heard of you . . . and was surprised to hear that someone else is a Christ follower and being related to you know who. It is real awesome to know that I am not alone in the fight to bring home those who believe in Mormonism.

August 2013: So, what do you feel your mission is? Do what is right.

August 2013: My daughter and I . . . recently left Mormonism after 35 years of my life. I served a mission and was married in the Temple. We are a mixed faith household. God called myself and my 10 year old out but my husband is still in the Bishopsric and my 12 year old son is 2nd counselor in the deacons presidency. Please pray. This is so hard. We are attending a Baptist Church and everything seems like a foreign language to me.

They visited her within 2 days and gave her 2 days to decide to resign or she would be excommunicated. She and hubby sent letters by registered mail and both the bishop and stake president refused the letters and had them returned to sender...

LDS Church’s New Statements on Gospel Topics

Since its founding in 1830 by Joseph Smith, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (originally titled the Church of Christ) has struggled with its public image. Charges of fraud related to Smith’s money-digging and magic practices were a stumbling block to many from the very beginning. In subsequent years his visions, new and changing scriptures, secret polygamy, racism, the political kingdom of God and temple rituals added to the flow of criticism towards Joseph Smith and the Mormons.

After Smith’s death, Brigham Young, the second prophet of the LDS Church, proved to be just as controversial. His sermons on Adam-god, racism, blood atonement, the political kingdom of God and plural marriage led to extensive criticism in the eastern newspapers and various books. Also, the 1857 Mountain Meadows Massacre and the U.S. government’s legal battles to end polygamy kept Mormonism in the press for years. However, after LDS Apostle Reed Smoot was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1903 his right to be seated was challenged because of the Mormons defiance of the United States’ laws, especially regarding polygamy in Utah, which led to a four-year investigation of the LDS Church by the Senate. Subsequently, the LDS Church embarked on a new course of currying favor with the outside world. As the sermons of Joseph Smith and Brigham Young faded into the past the LDS Church entered a new period of public relations to reshape its image into one of patriotism, family values and clean living.

When Fawn Brodie published her landmark biography of Joseph Smith, _No Man Knows My History_, in 1945 she reopened the old wounds of the LDS Church’s troubled past. Her biography was followed by dozens of books challenging Mormonism. But it would take the invention of the Internet for those issues to become known worldwide. In our Fall 2013 newsletter, _Apostasy in Sweden_, we related the experience of a number of LDS members who, through the Internet, became aware of the challenges to LDS truth claims. This led to visits to Sweden by LDS apostles and historians, between 2005 and 2010, to calm the troubled members.

The major questions raised in these meetings centered around the following issues: Why are there varying First Vision accounts? Did Smith use a magic stone to translate the Book of Mormon? Why did Joseph Smith lie about polygamy and polyandry? Why doesn’t the Book of Abraham translation match the papyri? Why censor church history? Should members know all the truth? When was the priesthood restored? Why were blacks denied priesthood until 1978? What about bad temple experiences? Why did Brigham Young preach on personal Blood Atonement? Did Brigham Young teach false doctrine when he preached that Adam is our God?

Without compelling answers to the members’ questions the discontent grew. Today Mormons around the world seem to be stumbling across the same issues and are troubled by the lack of candid answers from the LDS Church.6

Evidently, in response to this growing body of questioning members, Dieter F. Uchtdorf, of the LDS First Presidency, gave the following comments at the October 2013 LDS General Conference:

Some struggle with unanswered questions about things that have been done or said in the past. We openly acknowledge that in nearly 200 years of Church history—along with an uninterrupted line of inspired, honorable, and divine events—there have been some things said and done that could cause people to question. . . .

And, to be perfectly frank, there have been times when members or leaders in the Church have simply made mistakes. There may have been things said or done that were not in harmony with our values, principles, or doctrine. . . .

Therefore, my dear brothers and sisters—my dear friends—please, first doubt your doubts before you doubt your faith.7

What Uchtdorf seems to miss is that the problems of Mormonism’s past are so troubling and clearly documented, that one’s testimony must be re-evaluated. Internet search engines like Google provide instant access to the original sources, causing many to lose faith in Mormonism.

Gospel Topics

It appears that the LDS Church is now embarking on a project to provide answers to these issues on its official web page, under the heading “Gospel Topics.”8 On January 17, 2014, the Provo Daily Herald reported:

Over the past few months, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has released more complete and detailed information on doctrinal beliefs, practices and historical events of the church than at any other time in its history. Blacks and the priesthood, polygamy and the translation of The Book of Mormon are topics discussed in recent months. It is all part of a special [Gospel] Topics Project by the church to help members, media and others have a more defined and complete understanding of the church and its beliefs. . . . “Some of our members are surprised by our history,” [Church historian Elder Steven E.] Snow said. “We want them to go to a place with accuracy.”9

While Mr. Snow indicates that these new articles will provide the members with accurate information, we found them to be somewhat superficial, admitting a few problems but generally skimming over the more troubling aspects.

Two new articles have been posted on Gospel Topics relating to the Book of Mormon. The first article, “Book of Mormon Translation,” deals with the translation process. Joseph Smith explained that special instruments resembling large spectacles, called either “interpreters” or the “Urim and Thummim,” were preserved with the ancient plates to aid the future translator in his task.10

The other instrument, which Joseph Smith discovered in the ground years before he retrieved the gold plates, was a small oval stone, or “seer stone.” As a young man during the 1820s, Joseph Smith, like others in his day, used a seer stone to look for lost objects and buried treasure. As Joseph grew to understand his prophetic calling, he learned that he could use this stone for the higher purpose of translating scripture.11

Missing from the article is a description of how the “seer stone” was used. Those who witnessed the process described how Smith would put the stone in his hat, pulling it close to his face, and then as the words appeared on the stone he would read them to his scribe, while the plates were either covered by a cloth or hidden in the woods.12 Evidently, Smith didn’t even look at the ancient plates to accomplish his translation.

Why would God carefully preserve the plates and the divine “interpreters,” mentioned in the Book of Mormon, as a translation tool, when a magic stone found in a neighbors well, and then placed in a hat, worked just as well?13

The other article, “Book of Mormon and DNA Studies,” was equally misleading. DNA studies show that the Native Americans descend from tribes in Siberia, and are not Semitic. Yet, since the days of Joseph Smith the leaders of the LDS Church have repeatedly stated that the Native Americans are the descendents of the Book of Mormon people, Hebrews who migrated to the Americas at approximately 600 BC.

Race and the Priesthood

The article “Race and the Priesthood” attempts to define the age-old ban on blacks from the LDS priesthood as merely a misdirected “practice” without addressing the fundamental teachings in LDS scripture that gave rise to it. In tracing the history of this ban the article points the finger at Brigham Young (the second president of the LDS Church) while exonerating Joseph Smith, implying that Smith must not have had any such racist intentions since he ordained a few black men to the priesthood. However, the article conveniently fails to explain just how limited their priesthood ordinations were since those same black men were not allowed to participate in the temple endowment ceremony in Nauvoo, Illinois. Without those rituals these men would not be eternally sealed to their mates and could not follow the same path as the other LDS men on their eternal progression to godhood.

But whether the ban is said to originate with Joseph Smith, Brigham Young, or any other church leaders, the fundamental basis for it is still rooted in LDS scripture, which is why the church’s stance for decades was to say that it was simply God’s will, as typified by their First Presidency’s 1969 statement:

> Our living prophet, President David O. McKay, has said, “The seeming discrimination by the Church toward the Negro is not something which originated with man; but goes back into the beginning with God . . .”

If the priesthood ban did not come from God but was merely a misguided practice of Brigham Young and his successors, why was a revelation from God needed to officially end the ban in 1978?

Plural Marriage and Families in Early Utah

The LDS article “Plural Marriage and Families in Early Utah” deals with the 1890 Manifesto, in which the church promised the U.S. government that it would no longer condone the practice of plural marriage among its members. The article concedes that there were still some plural marriages performed after the Manifesto but from this brief acknowledgment readers can hardly appreciate just how complex and prevalent the practice continued to be.

Historian B. Carmon Hardy lists the names of 220 LDS men, including apostles, stake presidents and bishops, who took plural wives after the Manifesto. For example, Hardy noted that some of these marriages were performed by LDS apostles: “Apostles John Henry Smith and John W. Taylor sealed several couples in polygamy during a trip through Arizona in the late 1890’s.” All of which shows a willful disobedience on the part of the LDS Church toward the United States government.

Another one of their recent posts, “Becoming Like God,” will be discussed in a later issue of our Messenger. While each of these topics deserves a fuller treatment, due to space, we will focus on their article relating to Joseph Smith’s 1820 vision.

First Vision Accounts

Joseph Smith’s First Vision was emphasized as the foundation of the LDS Church by President Gordon B. Hinckley at the October 1998 Conference of the LDS Church:

> “Our entire case as members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints rests on the validity of this glorious First Vision. . . . Nothing on which we base our doctrine, nothing we teach, nothing we live by is of greater importance than this initial declaration. I submit that if Joseph Smith talked with God the Father and His Beloved Son, then all else of which he spoke is true. This is the hinge on which turns the gate that leads to the path of salvation and eternal life.” (The Ensign, November 1998, pp. 70-71)

Given the importance the LDS Church places on Smith’s First Vision, the new LDS article, “Joseph Smith’s First Vision Accounts,” is certainly a welcome step toward full disclosure. The article provides links to the major documents relating to Smith’s vision.

However, upon reading the various accounts one is faced with a number of inconsistencies.

The LDS article states, “Joseph Smith testified repeatedly that he experienced a remarkable vision of God the Father and His Son, Jesus Christ.” Granted, he repeatedly spoke of visions, but not necessarily of the Father and Son. As we will show in this article, the story evolved over the years.

Part of the LDS canon is the “Joseph Smith—History,” located at the back of the Pearl of Great Price. This section includes Joseph Smith’s first published account of a vision he claimed to have had in 1820. This account was composed in 1838, then printed in the Times and Seasons, a Mormon newspaper, in 1842, and finally canonized in 1880 as part of the Pearl of Great Price.

In it Smith related that when he was fourteen there was a revival in his neighborhood causing “an unusual excitement on the subject of religion. It commenced with the Methodists, but soon became general among all the sects in that region . . . and great multitudes united themselves to the different religious parties.” Smith went on to relate that due to this revival his mother, sister and two brothers joined the Presbyterians, while he favored the Methodists. “My mind at times was greatly excited, the cry and tumult were so great and incessant. The Presbyterians were most decided against the Baptists and Methodists . . .”

Consequently, in the spring of 1820 he went into the woods to seek God’s direction on which church to join. When he knelt to pray, “I was seized upon by some power which entirely overcame me,” his tongue was bound, he was overcome by “thick darkness” and feared for his life. Then “a pillar of light” appeared over his head, expelling the darkness, and two beings, “whose brightness and glory defy all description,” appeared above his head. “One of them spake unto me, calling me by name and said, pointing to the other—This is My Beloved Son, Hear Him!” After composing himself, Smith asked the personages which of all the sects was right (for at this time it had never entered into my heart that all were wrong)—and which I should join. I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt; that they draw near to me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me, they teach for doctrines the commandments of men, having a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof.22

When young Smith returned home he said to his mother, “I have learned for myself that Presbyterianism is not true.” A few days later he related his experience to the local Methodist minister, who berated him for making such a claim. Smith claimed that he shared his experience with others, which “excited a great deal of prejudice against me among professors of religion, and was the cause of great persecution, which continued to increase; . . . all united to persecute me. . . . However, it was nevertheless a fact that I had beheld a vision . . .”23

Yet history does not seem to support Smith’s story.

Challenging the First Vision

Fawn Brodie, writing in 1945, pointed out that there were no contemporary accounts of Smith’s 1820 vision until Orson Pratt published his pamphlet “Remarkable Visions” in 1840.24 LDS historian James B. Allen frankly admitted that the story of the First Vision “was not given general circulation in the 1830’s.” Dr. Allen also admitted that “none of the available contemporary writings about Joseph Smith in the 1830’s, none of the publications of the Church in that decade, . . . mentions the story of the first vision. . . .” Dr. Allen went on to state that in the 1830’s “the general membership of the Church knew little, if anything, about it.”25

While there were a few mentions of the First Vision in literature during Brigham Young’s lifetime, they seem to have had little impact on how the Mormons presented their message. Other than one article by Orson Pratt in 1849, they did not appeal to this 1820 experience to establish the LDS doctrine of God and Jesus being totally separate deities with physical bodies until after 1880.

Research regarding Smith’s visions entered a new era in 1965 when Paul Cheesman finished his BYU Master’s thesis, An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith’s Early Visions, which contained the long suppressed 1832 account of Smith’s First Vision, wherein only Christ appears. We then published this account in our booklet, Joseph Smith’s Strange Account of the First Vision. Another important challenge to the First Vision story came in 1967 when Rev. Wesley P. Walters published his booklet “New Light on Mormon Origins From the Palmyra, N.Y. Revival” in which he challenged Smith’s story regarding a revival in Smith’s neighborhood in 1820.26 Beginning in the 1960’s the church has occasionally published articles trying to correlate the various First Vision accounts, however, the average Mormon seems to have remained uninformed on the issue.

While the new Gospel Topics article “First Vision Accounts”27 does reference Joseph Smith’s various narratives of the event, it glosses over the contradictions. The article states, “Joseph shared and documented the First Vision, as it came to be known, on multiple occasions.” However, this might leave the reader with the impression that it was an oft told story. Actually, while Joseph Smith had mentioned the vision on a few occasions, the first published account was not until 1840, twenty years after the event, by LDS Apostle Orson Pratt, in a pamphlet published in Scotland.28 The next published account was one written by Joseph Smith and printed in the LDS newspaper Times and Seasons in 1842. This account would later be canonized in the Pearl of Great Price. With only two published accounts by 1842, most Mormons would not have been familiar with the story.

Contradictions

A few basic contradictions among the accounts include the following: According to the 1832 account Smith had already concluded that all churches were wrong before entering the grove to pray, but the official account claims it is the heavenly visitors who first inform him of that. Also it does not mention a demonic presence at the start of the experience, yet later accounts do. In the 1832 account only Jesus was said to have appeared, but in later versions it was either angels or the Father and Son. The early accounts mention Smith was seeking forgiveness for his sins, whereas later accounts stress his desire to know which Christian denomination was accepted by God. According to various accounts Smith had his First Vision in 1820, 1821, or 1823. Additionally, in the official account Smith claimed that the neighborhood revival occurred in 1820, while historical records indicate a revival date between 1824-1825.

Most of the accounts of the First Vision prior to 1875 described the appearance of either one or more angels, but rarely God and Jesus.29

President Gordon B. Hinckley declared that the First Vision was the greatest revelation of God that man has ever experienced:

I hope with all my heart that each member of this Church will read the story of the Prophet Joseph Smith, read the story of the First Vision . . . cultivate within your hearts a testimony of the truth of that marvelous experience, when the Father and the Son appeared to the boy Joseph. There’s no other event in all recorded history that compares with it, not even at the baptism of the Savior. . . . He had an understanding of the Father and the Son that no other man had really ever experienced.30

However, if this vision really was so fundamental to Joseph Smith’s understanding of the nature and identity of God as a physical being one wonders why he did not use it as the basis for promoting such a revolutionary theology, a theology that flew in the face of the Bible and centuries of established Christian doctrine.

Indeed, when Smith gave his clearest teaching on the nature of God in his famous 1844 sermon (known as the King Follett Discourse), in which he refuted the orthodox belief of God as a spirit, and emphatically taught that God has a physical body of flesh and bone, he did not appeal to his First Vision as the source of this knowledge.31

Evolving First Vision Story

Below is a timeline analyzing the evolving LDS concept of God and the First Vision.

1820 — While Smith gave this date to his First Vision story years after the event, there is no contemporary documentation that Joseph Smith told anyone of a vision that year. Also, there is no record of a revival involving the Methodists, Baptists and Presbyterians, as described in Smith’s 1842 account published in the Pearl of Great Price. According to the records of those churches, each of them showed either losses or only modest gains of a handful of people, not the massive numbers expected from a revival.32

Walters, (Salt Lake City: Smith Research Associates, 1994), chapter two. H. Michael Marquardt has now expanded this research under the title The Rise of Mormonism: 1816-1844.

1822 — Joseph Smith found a magical stone while digging a well, which he later used in both money-digging and translating the Book of Mormon.

1823 — Allegedly, an angel appeared in Joseph’s bedroom on September 21, 1823, to tell him of an ancient record engraved on metal plates and buried in a nearby hill, recounting God’s dealings with the forefathers of the Native Americans. He was not yet allowed to retrieve the plates, but was to meet the angel each year on September 22nd until God saw fit to deliver the plates into Smith’s hands for translation. There are no contemporary accounts of Smith telling people of this vision. It would be several years before anyone mentions this event.

Two months later Joseph’s brother Alvin died a tragic death. The date of Alvin’s death becomes important in establishing the date of the revival that Smith said led to his prayer in the woods close to his home.

1824-25 — A large revival took place in the Palmyra area involving the Methodists, Presbyterians and Baptists. This revival, rather than one Smith claimed to have occurred in 1820, seems to fit the description given by Smith in his 1842 account. One of the participants at the revival was Mr. Lane of the Methodist Church, who came to the area in 1824 but was not there in 1820.33 Records show that approximately 300 people joined the three churches as a result of the revival. Joseph’s mother, two brothers and sister joined the Presbyterians at this time.34 Joseph’s mother, Lucy Smith, later wrote that the large revival happened after Alvin’s death. Smith’s father would not attend the revival because one of the ministers had earlier spoken at Alvin’s funeral and had inferred that Alvin was in hell since he had never been baptized.

Writing in 1851, Orsamus Turner, a former resident of Palmyra, New York, recollected that Joseph had caught “a spark of Methodism in the camp meeting, away down in the woods, on the Vienna road, he was a very passable exhorter in evening meetings.”35 An exhorter would have addressed the people at the meeting after the preacher had finished his message, giving further encouragement to follow the minister’s instruction.

Supposedly Smith would have met the angel again in September of 1825, but was still not able to recover the plates.

Shortly after the annual visit from the angel, Joseph and his father left Manchester, New York, and traveled across the state to Harmony, Pennsylvania, to work for Josiah Stowell, as he searched for a lost silver mine.36 Joseph is often portrayed as merely being a laborer, hired to help dig for the treasure. However, Martin Harris, one of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon, stated that Smith was hired due to his special powers:

Joseph had had this stone for some time. There was a company there in that neighborhood, who were digging for money supposed to have been hidden by the ancients. Of this company were old Mr. Stowell—I think his name was Josiah—also old Mr. Beman, also Samuel Lawrence, George Proper, Joseph Smith, jr., and his father, and his brother Hiram [Hyrum] Smith. They dug for money in Palmyra, Manchester, also in Pennsylvania, and other places. When Joseph found this stone, there was a company digging in Harmony, Pa., and they took Joseph to look in the stone for them, and he did so for a while, and then he told them the enchantment was so strong that he could not see, and they gave it up. There he became acquainted with his future wife, the daughter of old Mr. Isaac Hale, where he boarded. He afterwards returned to Pennsylvania again, and married his wife, taking her off to old Mr. Stowel’s, because her people would not consent to the marriage. She was of age, Joseph was not.37

Lucy Smith, Joseph Smith’s mother, also wrote that Stowell sought out Joseph specifically “on account of having heard that he possessed certain keys, by which he could discern things invisible to the natural eye.”38 Thus we see that Stowell was actually hiring Smith for his magical powers. In anticipation of finding a treasure, the Smiths signed an agreement with several other men to divide the spoils, each to receive a percentage of the treasure. While boarding with Isaac Hale, one of the men named in the treasure agreement, Smith met his future wife, Emma Hale, Isaac’s daughter.39

being “a disorderly person and an impostor.” Wesley Walters and Michael Marquardt observed:

While Joseph Smith was working for Josiah Stowell, he was brought before a court on charges sworn against him by a nephew of Josiah Stowell, Peter G. Bridgman (or Bridgeman). Apparently Bridgman became concerned that his uncle’s money was being spent in the pursuit of elusive treasure.

Smith’s defense was that he was not an impostor, but truly had a gift to look at his stone in his hat and discern the location of buried treasure, “but of late had pretty much given it up on account its injuring his health, especially his eyes—made them sore.” After spending two nights in custody and appearing before the judge, he was evidently allowed to escape.

Smith may have had his money-digging adventures in mind when he later wrote in his history about his youth:

I was left to all kinds of temptations, and mingling with all kinds of society, I frequently fell into many foolish errors and displayed the weakness of youth and the corruption of human nature, which I am sorry to say led me into divers temptations, to the gratification of many appetites offensive in the sight of God.

1827 — In January Joseph eloped with Emma Hale. Isaac Hale, Emma’s father, had objected to Joseph courting his daughter due to his lack of a respectable job and his treasure seeking. Even though Mr. Hale had earlier been involved in money-digging, he had become disillusioned with the project. After Smith married his daughter, Mr. Hale stated that Joseph promised him “that he had given up what he called ‘glass looking’ and that he expected to work hard for a living.” It was only after Joseph and Emma moved to Hale’s property that he “was informed that at such a place in a certain hill, in an iron box, were some gold plates with curious engravings, which he must get and translate, and write a book... In all this narrative, there was not one word about “visions of God,” or of angels, or heavenly revelations. All his [Joseph Smith’s] information was by that dream, and that bleeding ghost. The heavenly visions and messages of angels, etc., contained in Mormon books, were after-thoughts, revised to order.

In September Joseph was finally able to take the ancient plates home and began his translation.

1830 — The Book of Mormon was published in March of 1830, having been financed by Martin Harris, one of the three witnesses to the book. Smith’s new scripture does not contain any teaching that God the Father has a physical body, only the Son.

Shortly after the publication of the Book of Mormon, Smith formed the Church of Christ, then in 1834 it was renamed the Church of the Latter-day Saints, and in 1838 it was given its current name, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

Evidence that the early Mormon teachings on the godhead were fairly typical of the day can be seen in the testimony of the three witnesses, at the front of the Book of Mormon: “And the honor be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, which is one God.”

This same concept is repeated in the text of the Book of Mormon:

2 Nephi 31:21—And now, behold, this is the doctrine of Christ, and the only and true doctrine of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, which is one God, without end.

Mormon 7:7 speaks of those in heaven singing endless praise “unto the Father, and unto the Son, and unto the Holy Ghost, which are one God.”

In 3 Nephi 11:27 the resurrected Jesus instructs the Nephites “verily I say unto you, that the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost are one; and I am in the Father, and the Father in me, and the Father and I are one.”

Contrary to current LDS teachings on the Godhead, the Father and Son are described as the same person. The title page of the Book of Mormon reads: “to the Father and Son are described as the same person. The title page of the Book of Mormon reads: “to the convincing of the Jew and Gentile that JESUS IS THE CHRIST, the ETERNAL GOD, manifesting himself unto all nations.”

In Ether 3:14 we read: “Behold, I am Jesus Christ. I am the Father and the Son.”

In Mosiah 15:1-3 we read that

God himself shall come down among the children of men, and shall redeem his people. And because he dwelleth in flesh he shall be called the Son of God, and having subjected the flesh to the will of the Father, being the Father and the Son—The Father, because he was conceived by the power of God; and the Son, because of the flesh; thus becoming the Father and Son. And they are one God, yea, the very Eternal Father of heaven and of earth.

The Book of Mormon also teaches that God is a spirit and never mentions that the Father has a physical body. In Alma 18:28 Ammon instructs the king that the “Great Spirit” is “God.” Later in the story a man named Aaron informs another king of the “Great Spirit” who is “God” (Alma 22:8-11).

Thus we see that the doctrine of God in the Book of Mormon contradicts Joseph Smith’s teaching that the Father has a body of flesh and bone and is totally separate from the Son.

Towards the end of 1830 Joseph Smith began working on his Inspired Revision of the Bible and changed verses to make the Father and Son one. For instance, Luke 10:22 of the King James version states “no man knoweth who the Son is, but the Father; and who the Father is, but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him.” However, Smith changed this to read:

... no man knoweth that the Son is the Father, and the Father is the Son, but him to whom the Son will reveal it. (Luke 10:23)

This hardly seems like a change one would make if ten years earlier the Father and Son had appeared to Smith as two separate individuals.

1831 — Lucy Smith, Joseph’s mother, wrote to her brother Solomon Mack, Jr., about the coming forth of the Book of Mormon and the establishing of the true church, but made no mention of God appearing to her son in 1820. Instead, she began Joseph’s story with the angel telling of the hidden record:

He [God] has now commenced this work. he hath sent forth a revelation in these last days, & this revelation is called the book of Mormon, . . . Perhaps you will enquire how this revelation come forth. it has been hid up in the earth four=teen hundred years, & was placed there by Moro[ni] one of the Nephites; it was engraven upon plates which have the appearance of gold . . . Joseph after repenting of his sins and humbling himself before God was visited by an holy Angel whose countenance was as lightning and whose garments were white above all whiteness and gave unto him commandments which inspired him from on high. and gave unto him by the means of which was before prepared that he should translate his book . . .

That same year Alexander Campbell, the famous preacher of the Restoration Movement, printed a criticism of Joseph Smith and his Book of Mormon, but made no mention of Smith claiming an appearance of God to start his work.

51 “An analysis of the book of Mormon with an examination of its internal and external evidences, and a refutation of its pretenses to divine authority,” by Alexander Campbell, the Millennial Harbinger: Bethany, Virginia February 7th, 1831: “Numerous have been the imposters among christians since the great apostacy began; . . . Since the Millennium and the evils of sectarianism have been the 1832 — Smith started working on the first draft of his history in 1832.\textsuperscript{52} In his handwritten account he related that he was fifteen (in his “sixteenth year”) when he had his first vision and that he had already concluded that all the churches were wrong:

... which led me to searching the scriptures... thus from the age of twelve years to fifteen I pondered many things in my heart... my mind become exceedingly distressed for I become convict of my sins and by searching the scriptures I found that mand <mankind> did not come unto the Lord but that they had apostatised from the true and living faith and there was no society or denomination that built upon the gospel of Jesus Christ as recorded in the new testament...

Yet this contradicts his 1842 account, where he said that prior to his vision “it had never entered into my heart that all were wrong.”\textsuperscript{53}

Also absent from the 1832 account is any admonition to not join any existing church. He then discussed the appearance of Christ, but nothing was said about God the Father:

\begin{quote}
... while in <the> attitude of calling upon the Lord <in the 16th year of my age> a pillar of fire light above the brightness of the sun at noon day come down from above and rested upon me and I was filled with the spirit of god and the <Lord> opened the heavens upon me and I saw the Lord and he spake unto me saying Joseph <my son> thy sins are forgiven thee. go thy <way> walk in my statutes and keep my commandments behold I am the Lord of glory I was crucified for the world that all those who believe on my name may have Eternal life...
\end{quote}

If this vision happened when Smith was 15 it would place the vision in the Spring of 1821, not a year earlier, since he wouldn’t have turned 15 until December of 1820.

This account is silent about the presence of a demonic force just prior to the vision. The sinister element doesn’t enter the story until 1835 and is expanded in the official 1842 account:

I kneeled down and began to offer up the desires of my heart to God. I had scarcely done so, when immediately I was seized upon by some power which entirely overcame me, and had such an astonishing influence over me as to bind my tongue so that I could not speak. Thick darkness gathered around me, and it seemed to me for a time as if I were doomed to sudden destruction.

But, exerting all my powers to call upon God to deliver me out of the power of this enemy which had seized upon me, and at the very moment when I was ready to sink into despair and abandon myself to destruction... I saw a pillar of light exactly over my head, above the brightness of the sun, which descended gradually until it fell upon me. It no sooner appeared than I found myself delivered from the enemy which held me bound.\textsuperscript{55}

Another problem with his 1842 version, is that he claimed he experienced great persecution for telling people of his first vision:

I soon found, however, that my telling the story had excited a great deal of prejudice against me among professors of religion, and was the cause of great persecution, men of high standing would take notice sufficient to excite the public mind against me, and create a bitter persecution; and this was common among all the sects— all united to persecute me.\textsuperscript{56}

Yet there is no evidence that anyone had heard of this experience until after he started his church in 1830. Since others had related similar heavenly visits it is doubtful that Smith’s vision described in this 1832 account would have caused much of a stir.

For instance, in 1816 a minister by the name of Elias Smith (no relation to Joseph Smith) recounted his conversion to Christianity. Notice how similar it is to Joseph Smith’s first account:

\begin{quote}
... I went into the woods... a light appeared from heaven... My mind seemed to rise in that light to the throne of God and the Lamb... The Lamb once slain appeared to my understanding, and while viewing him, I felt such love to him as I never felt to any thing earthly... It is not possible for me to tell how long I remained in that situation...
\end{quote}

Alexander Campbell wrote the following on March 1, 1824, concerning a “revival in the state of New York”:

Enthusiasm flourishes. . . . This man was regenerated when asleep, by a vision of the night. That man heard a voice in the woods, saying, “Thy sins be forgiven thee.” A third saw his Savior descending to the tops of the trees at noon day.58

Asa Wild claimed to have a revelation which is very similar to the story Joseph Smith published in 1842. It was printed in the Wayne Sentinel (the paper to which Joseph Smith’s family apparently subscribed) on October 22, 1823:

It seemed as if my mind . . . was struck motionless, as well as into nothing, before the awful and glorious majesty of the Great Jehovah. He then spake . . . He also told me, that every denomination of professing christians had become extremely corrupt. . . .59

Joseph Smith’s 1832 revelation, Doctrine and Covenants 84:20-22, stated that “without the ordinances thereof, and the authority of the priesthood” no one can “see the face of God.” According to this revelation Smith could not have seen God in 1820 since he made no claim to priesthood at that time.

1833 — In an 1833 interview, Willard Chase, the man who hired the Smith’s to dig a well in 1822, said he had known the Smiths since 1820. “At that time, they were engaged in the money digging business, which they followed until the latter part of season of 1827.” Mr. Chase went on to state that in 1827 Joseph Smith, Sen. told him about the angel appearing to young Joseph several years earlier to tell him of the plates. Yet Chase makes no mention of Smith claiming a vision of God and Jesus in 1820.60

Joseph Smith’s revelations were printed in A Book of Commandments for the Government of the Church of Christ. However, there is no material dealing with Smith’s claim of an 1820 vision.

1834 — E. D. Howe’s exposé, Mormonism Unvailed, was published toward the end of 1834, which contained statements by various neighbors and acquaintances of the Smiths, yet it is silent about Joseph claiming a vision in 1820. Mr. Howe did not attack Smith on a claim of seeing God and Jesus in 1820, but on Smith’s money-digging and his new scripture, the Book of Mormon.

That same year Oliver Cowdery, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, with the help of Joseph Smith, published the first history of Mormonism in the LDS paper Messenger and Advocate, starting in 1834 and continuing into 1835.61

However, Cowdery did not mention any vision in 1820, but began Smith’s story with an account of a revival in the Palmyra area when Smith was in his 15th year (age 14).62 But further on Cowdery corrected Smith’s age, stating Smith would have been in his 17th year (16) not his 15th year (14) and placed both the revival and the angel vision in 1823.63

According to Cowdery’s account, following the 1823 religious excitement Smith prayed to know “if a Supreme being did exist, to have an assurance that he was accepted of him.” Smith’s prayer was answered on September 21, 1823, when a “messenger” appeared to him in his bedroom “to deliver a special message, and to witness to him that his sins were forgiven, and that his prayers were heard.”64

If Smith had already seen God and Jesus in 1820 why would he later pray in 1823 to know if God existed? And why wouldn’t Oliver Cowdery start with Smith’s earlier 1820 vision if Smith often shared the story?

It should also be remembered that the records during this period of Mormonism show a fairly standard Trinitarian view of the godhead. Their baptismal prayer ended with the phrase “in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and the Holy Ghost.” Their sacrament prayer starts, “O God the Eternal Father, we ask thee in the name of thy Son Jesus Christ, to bless and sanctify this wine to the souls of all those who drink of it.”65

1835 — A larger compilation of Smith’s revelations was published under the title Doctrine and Covenants of the Church of the Latter Day Saints. The preface states “We deem it to be unnecessary to entertain you with a lengthy preface to the following volume, but merely to say, that it contains in short, the leading items of the religion which we have professed to believe.” Again, there is no mention of an 1820 vision or God having a body of flesh and bone. In fact, it taught just the opposite.

The first part of the 1835 Doctrine and Covenants was the “Lectures on Faith,” which were a series of seven lectures delivered to the elders of the LDS Church in Kirtland, Ohio, to establish them in correct doctrine. Yet these lessons fail to present the view of God currently held by the LDS Church. These lectures were printed in every edition of the Doctrine and Covenants until 1921.

Lecture five made the distinction that the Father is “a personage of spirit” while the Son is “a personage of tabernacle.” This would contradict the current LDS teaching that God the Father has a physical “tabernacle” as well as Jesus. The lecture goes on to explain that there are two personages in the godhead, with the Holy Ghost being the mind of the two.

In light of these lessons it is obvious that Joseph Smith was not teaching people that he saw God the Father in 1820 as a distinct being of flesh and bone.

According to Joseph Smith’s journal, on November 9, 1835, he was visited by “Joshua the Jewish minister,” later identified as Robert Matthias, to whom Smith recounted some of his early life:

being wrought up in my mind, respecting the subject of religion and looking at the different systems taught the children of men . . . I retired to the silent grove and bowed down before the Lord, . . . I made a fruitless attempt to pray, but could not, the noise of walking seemed to draw nearer, I sprang up on my feet, . . . I kneeled again my mouth was opened . . . and I called on the Lord in mighty prayer . . . a personage appeared in the midst of the pillar of flame which was spread all around, and yet nothing consumed, another personage soon appeared like unto the first, he said unto me thy sins are forgiven thee, he testified unto me that Jesus Christ is the Son of God; <and I saw many angels in this vision> I was about 14 years old when I received this first communication; When I was about 17 years old I saw another vision of angels in the night . . .

If the being had actually been Jesus one would not expect him to give testimony of himself. And since this was followed by the claim of seeing “many angels” it appears that Smith was not identifying the being as Jesus, but as an angel.

Several days later, on November 14, 1835, Smith gave another account of his early life to Erastus Holmes:

I commenced and gave him a brief relation of my experience while in my juvenile years, say from 6 years old up to the time I received the first visitation of Angels which was when I was about 14 years old and also the visitations that I received afterward, concerning the book of Mormon, . . .

This November 14th account of angels reinforces the assessment of the November 9th account as being angels as well, not God and Christ.

1837 — At this point Joseph Smith seems to be making a greater distinction between the Father and Son. Thus in the second edition of the Book of Mormon the phrase “the son of” was added to several verses to distinguish between the Father and Son. One of the most significant changes was made in 1 Nephi 13:40 where it originally stated that the purpose of the Nephite record was to make known that “the Lamb of God is the Eternal Father and the Savior” (Book of Mormon, 1830 edition, page 32). But in 1837 it was changed to read “the Lamb of God is the Son of the Eternal Father, and the Savior” (Book of Mormon, 1 Nephi 13:40).

Another important change was made in 1 Nephi 11:18. In the 1830 edition, page 25, it read “Behold, the virgin which thou seest, is the mother of God, after the manner of the flesh.” In modern editions it has been changed to read, “Behold, the virgin whom thou seest is the mother of the Son of God, after the manner of the flesh.”

1838 — Joseph Smith commenced dictating a new account of his history, which would be printed in the 1842 LDS newspaper, the Times and Seasons, and would later become the official account printed in the Pearl of Great Price.

In this account we see the purpose of the vision shift from seeking forgiveness of sins to determining which church to join. Smith mentions “an unusual excitement on the subject of religion” which soon spread to “all the sects in the region of country.” After hearing the competing arguments Joseph concluded that since each group understood the Bible differently his only recourse was to seek a direct answer from God. When the two heavenly beings appeared Smith inquired “which of all the sects was right, that I might know which to join.” However, this account mentions nothing about seeking a forgiveness of sins, as stated in earlier versions.

While this First Vision account is similar to the one given in 1835 to Robert Matthias, Smith now claims that the first personage introduced the second personage with the words “This is My Beloved Son, Hear Him!” This seems to mark the point at which Smith switched from claiming the visit of angels to an appearance of the Father and Son. But even in this account he is not making the point that they have physical bodies.

1840 — LDS apostle Orson Pratt published An Interesting Account of Several Remarkable Visions in Scotland. He related that when Smith was “about fourteen or fifteen years old” he was praying in the woods when “immediately his mind was caught away, from the natural objects with which he was surrounded; and he was enwrapped in a heavenly vision, and saw two glorious personages who exactly resembled each other.” Smith was then given the assurance that his sins were forgiven and instructed to not join any of the existing churches.

It is very similar to Smith’s 1842 account. While the vision implies that the heavenly messengers were the Father and Son, they were not specifically named. Also, seeing them in a “vision” does not demand a literal understanding that they were two physical beings standing before him.

> In the year 1816 or 1817, the whole [Smith] family removed to the State of New York . . . They were in rather low circumstances, and followed farming. About the year 1823, there was a revival of religion in that region, and Joseph was one of several hopeful converts . . . Joseph hesitated between the different denominations. While his mind was perplexed with this subject, he prayed for divine direction; and afterwards was awaked one night by an extraordinary vision. The glory of the Lord filled the chamber with a dazzling light, and a glorious angel appeared to him, conversed with him, and told him that he was a chosen vessel unto the Lord to make known true religion.

1842 — In the March 1, 1842, issue of the Times and Seasons Joseph Smith printed his letter to John Wentworth, editor of the Chicago Democrat, in which he recounted his vision of “two glorious personages.”

A similar letter (with some revisions) was published by Daniel Rupp in 1844 in a book called An Original History of the Religious Denominations at Present Existing in the United States.

In the next issue of the Times and Seasons Joseph Smith published his official account of his early life, which would eventually be canonized in LDS scriptures.

According to this account, when he was in his 15th year (age 14) his mother, sister, and two brothers joined the Presbyterian Church due to a revival in the neighborhood. The revival started with the Methodists and soon spread to the Presbyterians and Baptists.

Joseph went into the grove to ask God which church to join “for at this time it had never entered my heart that all were wrong.” Two beings appeared. One spoke, pointed to the other being and said “This is my beloved Son, hear him.”

He was told to join none of the churches “for they were all wrong . . . all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; . . .”

This is also the first that we read of him being persecuted for telling people of his first vision. Yet the early critics of Joseph Smith, such as E. D. Howe and Alexander Campbell, fail to mention his claim of an 1820 vision.

While this account mentions the appearance of God and Jesus, there is no evidence that people understood this in a literal sense. Without any instruction to the contrary, people would not have understood this account to mean that God had a physical body. In light of the previous twelve years of Smith teaching God is a spirit, they would have presumably understood this account as a vision, not an actual physical appearance of God and Jesus.

Interestingly, that same issue of the paper contained part of the Book of Abraham, where Smith introduced a plurality of gods into the Genesis creation account:

> And then the Lord said, let us go down; and they went down at the beginning, and they organized and formed, (that is, the Gods,) the heavens and the earth. . . And they said, the Gods, let there be light, and there was light.

Six months later, in the September 15, 1842, issue of the Times and Seasons, Joseph Smith wrote about his view of the godhead:

> We believe in three Gods . . . no odds whether there be two, three, or “Gods many.” The Father, and the Son are persons of Tabernacle; and the Holy Ghost a spirit.

This view is in conflict with the earlier 1835 teaching in the Lectures on Faith where the Father is described as a personage of spirit, while the Son is a personage of tabernacle. From this point on Smith paints a much clearer picture of the Father being a totally separate god from Jesus.

1843 — On April 2nd Smith instructed the Mormons in Ramus, Illinois: “The Father has a body of flesh” and bones as tangible as man's; the Son also; but the Holy Ghost has not a body of flesh and bones, but is a personage of Spirit" [D&C sec. 130:22].

If Joseph Smith had been teaching from the founding of the LDS Church that God had a physical body, why was there a need for this revelation?

An example of how Mormons understood the vision is seen in Levi Richards’ journal for June 11, 1843. Richards recorded hearing Smith tell of his first vision, but gives no year for the vision and says nothing about God and Christ appearing:

Pres. J. Smith bore testimony to the same— saying that when he was a youth he began to think about these things but could not find out which of all the sects were right— he went into the grove & enquired of the Lord which of all the sects were right— re received for answer that none of them were right, that they were all wrong, & that the Everlasting covenan[n] it was broken= he said he understoo ood the fulness of the Gospel from beginning to end — & could Teach it & also the order of the priesthood in all its ram ifications= Earth & hell had opposed him & tried to destroy him— but they had not done it= & they <never would>.

God himself was once as we are now, and is an exalted man, and sits enthroned in yonder heavens! That is the great secret. If the veil were rent today, and the great God who holds this world in its orbit, and who upholds all worlds and all things by His power, was to make himself visible,—I say, if you were to see him today, you would see him like a man in form—like yourselves in all the person, image, and very form as a man; ... it is necessary we should understand the character and being of God and how He came to be so; for I am going to tell you how God came to be God. We have imagined and supposed that God was God from all eternity. I will refute that idea, and take away the veil, so that you may see. ... He was once a man like us; yea, that God himself, the Father of us all, dwelt on an earth, the same as Jesus Christ Himself did; ... .

This would have been a logical place to make reference to his own experience of seeing the Father and Son as two separate Gods in 1820, but Smith makes no appeal to his First Vision.

On May 24th, Alexander Neibaur, a German convert to Mormonism, recorded in his journal the following account given by Joseph Smith:

Br Joseph told us the first call he had ... went into the Wood to pray kneelt himself down his tongue was closet cleavet to his roof— could utter not a word, felt easier after a while= saw a fire towards heaven came near & nearer saw a personage in the fire light complexion blue eyes a piece of white cloth drawn over his shoulders his right arm bear after a w[h]ile a other person came to the side of the first Mr Smith then asked must I join the Methodist Church= No= they are not my People, th all have gone astray there is none that doeth good no not one, but this is my Beloved son harken ye him, the fire drew nigher Rested upon the tree enveloped him.

While this account does not give a date for the vision, it does make it clear that the two personages were God and Christ. However, in this account it is the Father who delivers the message, not Jesus.

Two months later, on June 7, the one and only issue of the Nauvoo Expositor was printed by former leaders in the LDS movement. After pleading privately with Smith to give up plural marriage, they now went public with their charges of Smith being a fallen prophet. Besides their objections to plural marriage and political issues, they charged Smith with teaching false doctrine:

Among the many items of false doctrine that are taught the Church, is the doctrine of many Gods, one of the most direful in its effects that has characterized the world for many centuries. We know not what to call it other than blasphemy, for it is most unquestionably, speaking of God in an impious and irreverent manner. It is contended that there are innumerable gods as much above the God that presides over this universe, as he is above us; ... and now, O Lord! shall we set still and be silent, while thy name is thus blasphemed, and thine Honor, power and glory, brought into disrepute? See Isaiah c 43, v 10; 44, 6-8; 45, 5, 6, 21, 22; ... .

Obviously throughout the history of the movement Smith had not been teaching that there was a plurality of gods. Otherwise, his top leaders would have had no reason to raise the issue in the Nauvoo Expositor in 1844.

In response to the Nauvoo Expositor, on June 16, Smith delivered another sermon on the nature of God:

Now, you know that of late some malicious and corrupt men have sprung up and apostatized from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and they...

declared that the Prophet believes in a plurality of Gods, and, lo and behold! we have discovered a very great secret, they cry—"The Prophet says there are many Gods, and this proves that he has fallen." . . I will preach on the plurality of Gods. . . . I have always declared God to be a distinct personage, Jesus Christ a separate and distinct personage from God the Father, and the Holy Ghost was a distinct personage and a Spirit: and these three constitute three distinct personages and three gods.80

Again, he did not appeal to his experience in the grove to establish this doctrine. In fact, Smith’s teachings through the years do not show that he had always taught God to be a distinct being from Jesus. This seems to be a new teaching in the 1840’s, and not preached in the 1830’s.

Despite Smith’s claims of consistency in the above statement, there is clearly an evolution to his teaching on the nature of the Godhead, which even Mormon scholars recognize. LDS scholar Charles R. Harrell observed:

> In March 1839, Joseph first hinted that there may be more than “one God” (D&C 121:28); however, it wasn’t until 1842 that he specifically referred to the godhead as consisting of three separate beings who were also “three Gods.” He seems to now consider them to be one only in the sense that they “agree as one.” In his last public discourse, given June 16, 1844, Joseph repudiated the trinitarian notion of a three-in-one God. “Men say there is one God—the Fa[the]r, Son & the H.G. are only 1 God—It is a strange God anyhow 3 in one & 1 in 3.” . . 81

Joseph Smith made another interesting point in his June 16, 1844, sermon in which he appealed to Revelation 1:6, which says “And hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father” to prove there was a God above our Heavenly Father. Smith separated “God” from the clause “and His Father”:

> the apost[les] have disc[overed]d. that there were Gods above—God was the Fa[the]r of our Ld. J.C.—my object was to preach the Scrip—& preach the doctrine there being a God above the Fa[the]r of our Ld. J.C.82

Yet this is in direct contradiction to his change in his Inspired Version of the Bible, written in the early 1830’s, when he still believed in one God. At that time he changed the verse to read “and hath made us kings and priests unto God, his Father.”83 By dropping the “and” and inserting a comma he made the verse clearly state that it is only referring to Heavenly Father. Thus Smith contradicted his own revision of the Bible to prove there is a God above our Heavenly Father.

Harrell also observed:

> Joseph’s teachings regarding the members of the godhead appear to have progressed from essentially a trinitarian three-in-one God with a modalistic flavor, to a godhead consisting of “two personages” united by the indwelling Holy Spirit, to a godhead consisting of “three personages,” and finally to a godhead consisting of “three Gods.”84

One of the troubling aspects of Smith’s evolving First Vision story is the lack of importance given to it in the historical record. As we have already shown, the LDS Church’s current claims of the importance of the First Vision to their understanding of God and Jesus are questionable given how little Smith himself referred to it during his lifetime. LDS scholar James B. Allen observed:

> It is worth noting that Joseph Smith himself never used the First Vision to illustrate his own expanded teachings about God. It appears, in fact, that he seldom referred to it at all, except in private conversation, even after it was published.85

But a further indication of its lack of importance is how much variation occurs between the details of the different accounts, not just the details of Joseph’s age and the revivals of the time but most crucially the identity of the being who was speaking to him in the vision. One would not expect a person to forget whether it was a mere angel or God Almighty when gripped with such a riveting and life-changing experience.

First Vision References After Smith’s Death

After Joseph Smith’s death the early church leaders continued to teach a plurality of gods. However, they did not appeal to Joseph Smith’s First Vision to prove the doctrine. When Smith’s earliest vision was mentioned, it was usually associated with an angel, not the Father and Son.

84 Harrell, “This is My Doctrine,” p. 114.
1845 — The Latter-Day Saints Millenial Star, in England, printed an article titled “The Book of Mormon” which included an account of Smith’s First Vision. However, the article places the beginning of Smith’s call to 1823, not 1820:

The late martyred servant of the Lord, Joseph Smith, being much exercised in his mind on the subject of religion, when about the age of seventeen, and religious revivals, as they are termed, being the order of the day; . . . he was induced to retire in secret, and making his supplications unto the Lord, ask him for that wisdom which he had promised to give liberally without upbraiding.

The result of his pleadings before the Lord, was the ministration of an angel of the Lord, communicating unto him what was necessary for him to know, . . .

Even Lucy Smith, Joseph’s mother, did not mention Joseph’s 1820 vision in her manuscript of the family history. The only revival she mentions is the one following Alvin’s death. Evidently, the publisher of her book, Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith the Prophet, in 1853 inserted the section of Joseph’s 1820 story from the Times and Seasons, thus making it appear that Lucy mentions the First Vision. It also makes it appear that there were two revivals, one in 1820 and one following Alvin’s death.

Even though William Smith, Joseph’s younger brother, had earlier told people that Joseph’s First Vision was of an angel in his bedroom, in 1883 he revised his story, noting that Joseph’s vision happened in the woods. However, in both accounts he maintained the event happened in 1823.

In 1822 and 1823, the people in our neighborhood were very much stirred up with regard to religious matters by the preaching of a Mr. Lane, an Elder of the Methodist Church, . . . Joseph, then about seventeen years of age, had become seriously inclined, . . . At length he [Joseph Smith] determined to call upon the Lord until he should get a manifestation from him. He accordingly went out into the woods and falling upon his knees called for a long time upon the Lord for wisdom . . . an angel then appeared to him and conversed with him upon many things. He told him that none of the sects were right; but that if he was faithful in keeping the commandments he should receive, the true way should be made known to him; that his sins were forgiven, etc.

Significantly, the two Smith relatives who would have been in the home during Joseph’s teen years did not show any knowledge of an 1820 vision.

1849 — Writing in the Millennial Star, an LDS newspaper published in England, Apostle Orson Pratt seems to be the first to appeal specifically to Smith’s vision to demonstrate that the Father and the Son were two distinct persons:

In the first vision which Joseph Smith received in the spring of the year 1820, he being between fourteen and fifteen years of age,) both the Father and the Son, while he was praying, appeared unto him. . . . Thus we find that the visions both of the ancient and modern prophets agree, and clearly demonstrate the existence of two distinct persons—the Father and the Son.

In spite of Pratt’s statement, most of the leaders continued to refer to the First Vision as one of angels.

1854 — Speaking at LDS General Conference, in Utah, April 6, 1854, Apostle Orson Hyde stated:

Some one may say, “If this work of the last days be true, why did not the Saviour come himself to communicate this intelligence to the world?” Because to the angels was committed the power of reaping the earth, and it was committed to none else. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 335)

1855 — LDS President Brigham Young taught on February 18, 1855:

. . . so it was in the advent of this new dispensation. . . . The messenger did not come to an eminent divine. . . . The Lord did not come with the armies of heaven, . . . But He did send His angel to this same obscure person, Joseph Smith jun., who afterwards became a Prophet, Seer, and Revelator, and informed him that he should not join any of the religious sects of the day, . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, p. 171)

A few days later Apostle Wilford Woodruff preached:

That same organization and Gospel that Christ died for, and the Apostles spilled their blood to vindicate, is again established in this generation. How did it come? By the ministering of an holy angel from God, . . . The angel taught Joseph Smith those principles which are necessary for the salvation of the world; . . . He told him the Gospel was not among men, and that there was not a true organization of His kingdom in the world, . . . This man to whom the angel appeared obeyed the Gospel; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 2, pp. 196-197)

86 Latter-Day Saints Millenial Star, (August 15, 1845), vol. 6, p. 69.
87 Early Mormon Documents, vol. 1, p. 288, note 87.
1857 — LDS Apostle Heber C. Kimball, speaking November 8th, 1857, seemed to be oblivious to any vision where Smith saw God and Christ:

Do you suppose that God in person called upon Joseph Smith, our Prophet? God called upon him; but God did not come himself and call, but he sent Peter to do it. Do you not see? He sent Peter and sent Moroni to Joseph, and told him that he had got the plates. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 6, p. 29)

1860 — John Hyde, a former Mormon, is a good example of the confusion regarding who appeared to Smith. In his book, Mormonism: Its Leaders and Designs, page 199, he related: “1820 . . . April . . . He [Joseph] asserts that God the Father and Jesus Christ came to him from the heavens.”

However, on page 240 of his book, he stated “Joseph Smith, born in 1805, sees an angel in 1820, who tells him his sins are forgiven.”

1863 — Apostle John Taylor explained in a sermon March 1, 1863:

How did this state of things called Mormonism originate? We read that an angel came down and revealed himself to Joseph Smith and manifested unto him in vision the true position of the world in a religious point of view. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 10, p. 127)

LDS Apostle George A. Smith, November 15, 1863, preached:

When Joseph Smith was about fourteen or fifteen years old, . . . he went humbly before the Lord and inquired of Him, and the Lord answered his prayer, and revealed to Joseph, by the ministration of angels, the true condition of the religious world. When the holy angel appeared, Joseph inquired which of all these denominations was right and which he should join, and was told they were all wrong. . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, pp. 333-334)

1864 — One year later, November 15, 1864, Apostle George A. Smith seemed to be describing the vision in a more traditional way:

When the Lord appeared to Joseph Smith and manifested unto him a knowledge pertaining to the coming forth of the Book of Mormon and the work of the last days, Satan came also with his power . . . He [Joseph] thus describes the incident: “In the spring of 1820, . . . I saw a pillar of light . . . I saw two personages . . . “This is my beloved son, hear him.” . . . just at the time that God was revealing unto his servant Joseph to raise up men to bear testimony of the principles of the Gospel . . . Satan was at work stirring up the hearts of the children of men . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 11, pp. 1-2)

1869 — Five years later Apostle Smith again referred to Smith’s First Vision:

He sought the Lord by day and by night, and was enlightened by the vision of an holy angel. When this personage appeared to him, of his first inquiries was, “Which of the denominations of Christians in the vicinity was right?” (Journal of Discourses, June 20, 1869), vol. 13, pp. 77-78

Speaking on December 19, 1869, Orson Pratt taught:

By and by an obscure individual, a young man, rose up, and, in the midst of all Christendom, proclaimed the startling news that God had sent an angel to him; . . . This young man, some four years afterwards, was visited again by a holy angel. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 13, pp. 65-66)

1871 — On March 19 Orson Pratt preached:

He [Joseph] went out to pray, being then a little over fourteen years of age, . . . He saw in this light two glorious personages, one of whom spoke to him, pointing to the other, saying, “This is my beloved Son, hear ye him.” . . . When these persons interrogated him to know what he desired, he answered and said, “Lord show me which is the true church.” He was then informed by one of these personages that there was no true church upon the face of the whole earth; . . . The vision withdrew; the personages attending and the light withdrew. . . . he knew that God had manifested himself to him; . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 14, pp. 140-141)

Although Orson Pratt’s sermon on March 19, 1871, could be interpreted as an appearance of God and Jesus, his sermon on December 10 of that year clearly identified the messengers as angels:

Here was Joseph Smith, a boy, . . . he was only between fourteen and fifteen years of age. . . . Would he stand forth and bear testimony that he had seen with his own eyes a messenger of light and glory, and that he heard the words of his mouth as they dropped from his lips and had received a message from the Most High, at that early age? And then . . . to have the finger of scorn pointed at him, . . . “No visions in our day, no angels come in our day, . . .” and still continue to testify, . . . that God had sent his angel from heaven. (Journal of Discourses, vol. 14, p. 262)

Yet in all of these sermons no one appealed to the First Vision to establish that God the Father has a body of flesh and bones.
1880 — Joseph Smith’s 1842 First Vision account was canonized as part of the Pearl of Great Price, thus giving it doctrinal standing in the church. James B. Allen notes that the First Vision gained new importance after 1880 in part because the church needed a new focus after years of legal battles regarding polygamy.

The time was ready — made for the outpouring of a new identity with the founding prophet — new reminders to the Saints of what their heritage really was, and of what Joseph Smith’s testimony really meant to them personally. The First Vision was a natural tool for such a purpose, and a new generation of writers could hardly fail to use it.

Further on in the same article, James Allen commented on the growing importance of the vision in LDS literature:

The vision and its attendant uses quickly began to appear in lesson manuals, augmenting the Mormon awareness of its transcendent importance. In 1899 the Young Men’s Mutual Improvement Association used it to demonstrate that it had ushered in the “Dispensation of the Fulness of Times.” The vision was thus replacing the angel in Mormon thought as the implementing factor in the restoration.

At the beginning of the twentieth century the First Vision also took a permanent place in the missionary literature of the church. The Sacred Grove [in New York] was acquired by the church in this period, and pilgrimages to the grove became sacred experiences for many Mormons. By the beginning of the twentieth century, belief in the First Vision was fundamental to the faith of the Latter-day Saints.

Conclusion

For the past 100 years the LDS Church has placed paramount importance on the appearance of God and Christ to Joseph Smith in 1820. Speaking in the October 2002 General Conference, President Hinckley declared:

Our whole strength rests on the validity of that [First] vision. It either occurred or it did not occur. If it did not, then this work is a fraud. If it did, then it is the most important and wonderful work under the heavens. I knew a so-called intellectual who said the Church was trapped by its own history. My response was that without that history we have nothing. The truth of that unique, singular, and remarkable event [The First Vision] is the pivotal substance of our faith.

Yet Joseph Smith’s 1820 vision was not the center of the LDS teaching during his lifetime or Brigham Young’s. It is now established that the documents and published records of the 1820’s–1830’s show no knowledge of Smith claiming an appearance of the Father and Son in 1820. While Smith did print one account in 1842, he did not appeal to his vision as proof that God has a body of flesh and bone, an important tenet of LDS theology. It was not until 1880 that the vision took on a major role in the church’s literature.

In recent years LDS scholars have tried to minimize the many inconsistencies among the differing First Vision accounts by emphasizing the core element of Joseph’s having seen SOMETHING in the grove that day. But this misses the important point that if he only saw something then he did not receive specific information on the nature of God.

Gordon B. Hinckley, while serving as an apostle, declared: “Either Joseph talked with the Father and the Son, or he did not. If he did not, we are engaged in blasphemy.”

Yes, if Mormonism is not true its doctrine of God would be a great blasphemy.

Smith not only taught that the Father and Son were two separate deities, he also taught that God at one time was a mortal on another earth, overseen by yet a higher deity. When God was a human he went through the same type of life that we are going through, he suffered death, was resurrected, and after eons arrived at the position of a god himself. Preaching in 1844, Joseph Smith declared:

I am going to tell you how God came to be God. We have imagined and supposed that God was God from all eternity I will refute that idea, and take away the veil. . . . he was once a man like us; yea, that God himself, the Father of all, dwelt on an earth, the same as Jesus Christ himself did. . . . The Scriptures inform us that Jesus said, As the Father hath power in Himself, even so hath the Son power—to do what? Why, what the Father did. The answer is obvious — in a manner to lay down His body and take it up again. Jesus what are you going to do? To lay down my life as my Father did, and take it up again. . . . Here, then, is eternal life—to know the only wise and true God; and you have got to learn how to be Gods yourselves, and to be kings and priests to God, the same as all Gods have done before you, namely, by going from one small degree to another . . . 94

Joseph Smith’s 1820 vision is obviously a later invention and then back-dated to give a more dramatic start for his prophetic career and to introduce a heretical view of God.

Yet when we turn to the Bible for instruction, we find a very different doctrine of God than the one Smith proclaimed the last year of his life. Bill McKeever, of Mormonism Research Ministry, summed it up this way:

The Mormon doctrine of God is not the same as the historic Christian view. It holds that God and man are essentially of the same species, and that God the Father has a body of flesh and bones. He is not uniquely self-existent, transcendent, or eternal. Neither is he truly the creator of all things, for he is one among potentially billions of Gods, and does not even have the ability to create matter. . . .

To the contrary, God says in Isaiah 43:10, “Before me no god was formed, nor shall there be any after me.” Psalm 90:2 says of him, “Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever you had formed the earth and the world, from everlasting to everlasting you are God.” This is the God Christians worship. Of him we can say, “Who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been his counselor? Or who has given a gift to him that he might be repaid? For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be glory forever. Amen” (Romans 11:34-36).95

The God of the Bible is not the god of Joseph Smith.

Gospel Topic Essays: Fixing History?

By Eric Johnson

www.mrm.org

In what appears to be an attempt to deal with several vital historical issues propogated by the LDS Church throughout the years, the Mormon Church has been producing essays since late 2013 under its “Gospel Topics” section of its lds.org website, attempting to reconcile the facts with what had been taught by earlier leaders and church manuals.

The Reaction of Ganesh Cherian

On February 12, 2014, Ganesh Cherian—who is currently serving as a stake high counselor in Wellington, New Zealand—wrote a very honest blog titled “A Former Bishop’s Doctrinal Dilemmas” that expresses his deep concern about the church’s attempt at honesty. We encourage you to read in its entirety: http://www.patheos.com/blogs/kiwimormon/2014/02/a-former-bishops-doctrinal-dilemmas/

In his blog, Cherian—who was a bishop for five and a half years—referred to an October 2013 general conference talk given by Dieter Uchtdorf, a member of the First Presidency. Cherian wrote:

President Uchtdorf gave an impassioned plea to those who have left the church, admitting mistakes in leadership, and promising a place for those who doubt. Since then it feels like the church has changed. While Uchtdorf’s talk seemed extraordinary at the time, in retrospect it feels like it was a preface for that change. Change that is not without its challenges.

Cherian continued:

During this particular lesson one of my fellow high-priests informed us that two friends (a former Bishop, and a Stake President) in England had recently left the church over the ‘Race and the Priesthood’ essay. As dutiful leaders they had instructed their congregations, referring to the ‘the seed of Cain’ explanation for withholding the priesthood from Black members of the church until 1978. This recent ‘clarification’ had apparently undermined their understanding of both revelation and doctrine. Though I haven’t left the church, this shift to more transparency is a challenge for me as well. Not because I don’t welcome these revisions. They seem very fair and thoroughly researched. But like my fellow high priests, I too used these now discarded explanations and doctrines throughout my leadership to teach – and now I’m left to wonder.

He then referred to the four essays mentioned above (and listed with their links below), explaining:

Each is a challenge to the seemingly authoritative version of our history – and the intention is to release more revisions/explanations by April 2014. Drawing on historical evidence and scholarship these essays go further than any previous official publications issued by the church in contradicting those narratives that good members have long repeated as justifications for our more curious doctrines and practices. And naturally, many are baffled.
Pointing out that during the second week of January, Mormons all over the world studied chapter 1 of Teachings of Presidents of the Church: Joseph Fielding Smith that discussed the “First Vision,” Cherian continued:

But after a careful reading of the new source material it would appear that the First Vision account as we have come to know it, was virtually unheard of for the first decade of the Church’s existence. What we now regard as pivotal to our claim to divine mandate was absent for the first members. Leaving many questions over what those founding Mormons actually believed about the nature of the Godhead, and what caused them to join the church?

The changing of history caused this former bishop to be “perplexed.” He writes,

I have repeated stories to my ward to justify particular church practices. I have given the hard line on church policies and doctrines and have held people accountable. As recently as June I reasoned with a friend that polygamy was needed because there were so many more women than men at the time, an argument that the polygamy essay seems now to repudiate.

Imagine the position this man and so many others in the Mormon Church are in. For years, he followed party lines and repeated the history as he was instructed. Now, because the church is trying to “come clean,” so to speak, by admitting historical problems of its past, there is a problem. Everything that the Mormons were taught before these essays were printed was apparently based on lies or half-truths. This was the crux of the complaint made in 2010 by a group of Swedish Saints.

Let’s allow Cherian by providing the core section of his blog:

All of this has caused me to grapple with my own questions. Is it possible that I have hurt people with doctrines and dogmas that in the light of these essays seem to sit on shaky ground? I understand how essential it is to ‘sustain’ the Brethren but these days I live with a caution that those ideals that I believe today could be dismissed by future First Presidencies. As a Bishop I once performed a wedding for a friend of a friend. The grooms [sic] ex-wife and her girlfriend were guests and as I was seated at their table during the reception we chatted. It became apparent that they had really enjoyed the way I had conducted the ceremony and they asked if I would be willing to be their forthcoming ‘Civil Union’ celebrant. I turned them down explaining that as an officer of the LDS church I wasn’t permitted. I tried to be as sensitive and compassionate as possible and one of the women seemed genuinely understanding of my position but her partner was visibly upset. At the time I felt reassured that I was ‘right,’ and that any distress I had caused them was totally justified. I even congratulated myself on some level that I was sharing the gospel with them. I look back at that experience with regret. I now wish that I had just reached out and given them both a big hug.

I also question myself regarding how blameless I am in my representation of these doctrines as definitive? Was I complicit in telling stories I suspected were problematic? Could I have made an effort to be more informed? Could I have asked more questions, been more thoughtful, mindful? How did I get to this place where I have cause to wonder about my own, and the church’s integrity?

Today I am reeling from the translation of the ‘Book of Mormon’ essay. Exactly how was I to know that Joseph Smith got the words to the Book of Mormon by burying his head in a hat. How was I to know that a stone he found in a well was instrumental in this process of translation? Every picture, or video I have ever seen has him sitting at a table with the gold plates before him pouring over these ‘curious characters’ by the light of a candle! Was I naive to have faith in this story? Was I wrong to retell this story as a teacher, as a missionary, or as a priesthood leader? What am I now to make of the ‘truth of the matter’ when it speaks neither to my heart nor my soul. What am I to make of a story I find confounding and frankly bizarre?

Again, feel free to read the whole blog in detail, but before we close, we must consider his final words:

But as for me I am left to wonder where I go from here. I am torn. I love my church and credit where I am in my life to years of church service – but I cannot ignore the dishonesty. I feel aggrieved that in attempting to sustain and perpetuate stories of faith, the church has accredited doctrines to God that are simply fictions. Can such a chasm be bridged as President Uchtdorf suggests?

As we file out of class, a fellow high councillor remarks, ‘Isn’t it interesting that today’s challenge to our faith is coming directly from the church?’

Amazing words! Notice that last line again; “Today’s challenge to (the LDS) faith is coming directly from the church”! By attempting to correct the decades of fully documented teaching—shall we call it “indoctrination” that begins in primary and goes all the way through general conference, the LDS Church is now causing more angst by trying to reconcile its history. As Cherian infers, how can a Latter-day Saint know that what is being taught today won’t be changed tomorrow? This is a bag of worms with a hole on the bottom.

While we’re happy that the leadership is at least attempting to deal with the historical mess, could meddling with past teachings cause an even greater migration from the Mormon Church?■
September 2013: would like to thank you for your UTLM web site, it is a great source of information. I am hoping to convince my Mother of the fraudulent and deceptive nature of the Mormon Religion, she has been a member for 40 years. I too was a member, missionary, branch president but came to realise that I was fooling myself, and believing in malicious fairy tales. I have only recently come across your site but it is great.

October 2013: WHY.....why.....do you waste your time, and energy, writing garbage and untruths about Mormons, and the LDS church? This is America . . . everyone is FREE to worship how and who they want. Why are you so consumed by the message of your particular interpretation of “Jesus” that you have to show how wrong someone else’s faith is to justify your own position of belief? It is a smug thing to say, “we have the truth and you don’t!!”

I have been and experienced all types of ‘religions’, and have left because what they offered did not work for me. I just left, I didn’t create a newspaper listing ALLLLLLLL what was wrong with that particular church.

October 2013: Just lately I found some of your lectures on the internet, so I thought I would send an email. 40 years ago, I was struggling with Mormonism. Your pamphlets, and Fawn Brodies’ book helped me leave. I was raised in the church, and I always knew there was something wrong with Mormonism. Lots of thing really bothered me. But . . . the things I learned from you, Gerald, and Fawn Brodie . . . well I knew absolutely nothing about that stuff at all.

October 2013: I have read your website with interest over the last several years and have also wanted to have a chat with the editors. It seems that there are a lot of strong opinions on this website and I often wonder how much research is actually undertaken in order to compose the results that are currently displayed.

I find it very interesting to note the animosity towards the mormon religion when we certainly do not go out of our way to belit[tle] any of our fellow believers of any religion. There obviously has to be an emotional connection attached to the vicious attack and this would certainly be clouding ones ability to research and portray beliefs accurately.

October 2013: I got to know the LDS Church in the late 70s. But I was baptized in it [in] May of 1980. I took an active part in it since then. I stayed in it for 30 long years. I only left in March 2010, after having read (from cover to cover!) Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s book “The Changing World of Mormonism.” I also read . . . many other books published by former mormons. I have also had access to numberless testimonies by many ex-mormons like us. I have officially resigned the LDS Church this year. I feel happier since I left it. I admit that I felt an emptiness deep inside me, since mormonism occupied many hours of my life, like my wife’s and children’s. But, the best thing of all is that I eventually learned by myself (with God’s help, I believe) that mormonism isn’t true as they claim.

October 2013: OMG I can’t believe I found you on FB. Fifteen years ago . . . when I was on a LDS mission in California I thought you were the devil! (LOL). You are a saint! God Bless.

November 2013: Just this past year my wife and i have had a troubled heart about the mormon church and some of their beliefs. I have always had questions my whole life, but was taught to have faith in the church and not believe some of the rubbish i hear. Well i happened to stumble across a few websites like . . . yours and others and i listened to them and i was shocked at some of the things i found out about Joseph Smith and the mormon church. I felt betrayed, and confused. I thought to myself how can i have been deceived for 42 years, let alone my parents, siblings. wife. grandparents ect . . . have been deceived also. Then i realized i was under mind control. I was born into it, so i didn’t know any better as did the rest of my family. I am a truth seeker as is my wife. I love the lord Jesus christ. I cannot dispute any of the evidence i have learned about joseph smith and mormonism. It makes too much sense to me. I can never go back to mormonism after what i have learned. It poses a problem though. I don’t know what to do about my parents and other siblings. They are devout mormons.

November 2013: Cindy Prince, author of It’s Time: A Family’s Journey of Discovering Truth and God’s Amazing Grace, wrote:

I just wanted to share with you that the part in our story when our arrogant Bishop decided to bring up Adam-onid-alman to John, trying to show how smart he was and assumed my husband was too inferior to know anything about it, the reason John was armed for that moment was because of reading your material about it. We had “heard” of it when we were members but didn’t know anything really. . . . But the reason John was able to hold his own, stun the bishop, and tell him the “real” story behind the ‘revelation’ was because of the information he had read in your work. . . . I know I’m a broken record here but thank you for all you sacrificed to get that information in all of our hands when there’s no way we could have done that ourselves!

November 2013: I have enjoyed watching and listening to your video clips on you tube. i want to thank you for opening my eyes to the truth about the LDS religion.

November 2013: I’m so glad that your website is available like a brazen serpent raised on a staff to heal any if they will only look. The truth of mormonism is so easy to find thanks to your ministry. The LDS church has taken great efforts to erase the evidence of its checkered past, and tried to whitewash their image and proclaim a perfect church. The LDS have succeeded in placing millions under mind control and for almost 30 years of my life, I was one of them. . . .
I have found that you can leave the church, but the church won’t leave you alone. We have regularly had the pressures of ward missionaries sent to “work” with us. . . . I feel sorry for them, and I do pray for them, but I am no longer like them, and I owe that to your website. . . . And there I found that the truth of Mormonism is not to be found inside the manuals of the LDS church.

November 2013: You truly need to stop fighting against the Lord’s true church Sandra. I testify that if you continue, the Lord will not hold you innocent at the last day. You will be held accountable for all souls you teach false doctrine to and lead astray. They too will be held accountable, but YOU will be held more accountable for actively teaching them lies.

November 2013: People like YOU spread rumors and lies in hatred against the church. That is YOUR issue. The church is still true and always will be REGARDLESS of what YOU believe or teach. Do you get that? Learn to wise up and realize you left the church, because YOU chose to believe lies. That’s a fact. I KNOW that you misrepresent the LDS church and you lie. You spread lies in attempt to justify what YOU chose to believe. You won’t accept that YOU strayed from the truth and accepted lies of the devil. You now actively fight against the truth. You and your husband apostatized. That’s a fact.

November 2013: I’m going through a transition which is very scary for me. I don’t think the mormon church is true anymore. It scares me. I was born and raised LDS. I married outside of the temple to my wife who I baptized but we quickly became weary and fell away. . . . Are what people saying truly fact about danites and what all the church has lied or hid from us. They give no answer except have faith carry on.

November 2013: I testify Sandra that what you and your husband have done in fighting against the LDS church is 100% wrong. You will not stand blameless at the last day Sandra. I hope you will repent and come back to the church. Don’t judge the church by individual people Sandra. People make mistakes, but that doesn’t make the LDS church false. Lies about Joseph Smith don’t become true based on how many times the lie is told to others Sandra. I know Joseph Smith was a prophet of God. I KNOW IT!

We are reading in the new testament and learning about the Christian Jesus. We have a pastor and she is helping us on the way.

---

December 2013: i left the church back in Sep 2011 after 36 years, i found the [LDS apostle] Delbert Stapley letter [to Governor George Romney regarding racial issues. http://tinyurl.com/ydlat82], then it all came crashing down.

Since then my life has been great and i have such inner peace and joy . . . i feel free, thank you so much for all you have done. When i was a missionary back in 1977 we knew about you and your husband to stay clear, who would ever think i would be here saying thank you.

December 2013: God knows Joseph Smith was called to be a prophet. Did you ignore the fact that God warned Joseph his name would be had for both good and evil among men?. . . You need to stop teaching lies against the LDS church . . . Your progression and salvation are dependent upon whether you continue to persecute the saints and fight against Christ’s church. . . . I testify of this. My witness of the truth of the LDS church WILL stand against you if you refuse to stop teaching lies.

December 2013: I just wanted to thank you again for visiting with me and my sister this past November at your store. What a thrill it was to meet you in person and have you sign my copy of Mormonism Shadow or Reality. Thank you for taking time to share and pray with us. I was impacted by you and your husband’s book back in 1973 while a freshman student at Eastern New Mexico University.

December 2013: Thank you and your Dear Gerald for your work, your research and faith in Jesus Christ and for putting it all online. I studied your website until to learn the truth and now i have a wonderful personal Relationship with the real God and Savior and a trust in God’s precious and cherished Word the Holy Bible. thank you with endless gratitude for doing the Lord’s work.

February 2014: As a person who became intrigued with Mormons and Mormonism over year ago, I want to thank you for saving from me from joining what I now realize is a cult. I’d been reading and listening to everything I could find concerning LDS doctrine and theology. More than anyone or anything else, the many interviews and speeches of yours I’ve watched on YouTube have helped me see that the claims of Joseph Smith and the religion he founded cannot be true. . . . I just wanted you to know that you are making a difference in the lives of people you haven’t even met!

February 2014: I converted to the church in my early 20’s. I was told horrific things about you and your husband. I was counseled to stay as far away from your writings. In other words, looking into your story meant getting together with Satan. Needless to say I lived the TBM [true believing Mormon] life to a T. I had my whole being invested in the church. My five children were also raised to be tbm. . . . Fast forward 26 years from my conversion. I resigned last May. Seeing your videos and reading your story helped me tremendously in my search for real truth.
February 2014: A lot of this information you have could be false. A lot of documents and records were from people who were enemies of Joseph Smith. . . . So a lot of records could be things Joseph Smith’s enemies could have written. . . . Joseph smith knew the bible he lived by his good morals and wanted other people to follow his good morals . . . And I love how people say how bad the church is and that Joseph wasn’t a prophet when clearly they have never felt the gift of the holy spirit. Have you experienced yourself the holy spirit? It’s an overwhelming type of feeling that’s gives me peace and happiness.

February 2014: I come from a Mormon family, was half in and half out for 48 years, polygamy never did sit well with me, but my parents are true believers, so I went with it. My truth finding mission started with reading a book on Mark Hofmann and wondering why the church leaders paid thousands to hide his work. Then I got the real truth from Fawn Brodie. Information from your web site and your personal experience with the church took away any doubts I may have had. Thank you for your courage and dedication to God’s truth!

February 2014: God has used your little bookstore to shake that whole state, and abroad. Our family prays for your ministry often. You spent about a hour and a half ministering to my mom in your bookstore and explained lds problems to her with clarity and compassion. I will always remember that. Your a blessing! Thank you for serving Him!

March 2014: I’m from Brasil and i’m reading the digital book “The Changing World of Mormonism.” I’ve served a mission, maried at the temple, served in others positions on the local church . . . I alwais had some doubts about the church history and doctrine. This book is helping me so much . . . Thank you.

March 2014: I want to personally thank you and Jerold, for all that you have personally done for my family. . . . Both I and my husband . . . were born and raised in the LDS church . . . If it wasn’t for you, I don’t know if we ever would of heard the truth. I can’t stop the tears from flowing this morning . . . . We love you Sandra and [in our] heart are forever grateful. Your sister in Christ,

April 2014: Saw your last post and it reminded me of how much you and your knowledge has helped me. From trying to lift your display of golden plates to the books you have that shed light on the Gospel. I found Jesus two years ago and with the help of people like you, so has my oldest daughter, son-in-law and granddaughter.

April 2014: I was an investigator considering joining the LDS church until I started seeing how many things I was taught in the lessons don’t match up to archaeology findings and also the many changes that happened to their Book of Mormon.

LDS Growth Stats

In 2012 the LDS Church announced that it was lowering the age of its male missionaries from 19 to 18 years old. The age of women missionaries was dropped from 21 to 19 years old. This resulted in a significant increase in the number of missionaries for 2013. Below are the statistics for both 2012 and 2013, taken from the LDS conference reports.

<table>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>LDS Church Membership</th>
<th>New Children of Record</th>
<th>Convert Baptisms</th>
<th>Missionaries</th>

<td>15,082,028</td>

<td>83,035</td>

The new report is of particular interest as it gives us an idea of the effectiveness of increasing the number of LDS missionaries last year. The results are less than impressive. The Salt Lake Tribune reported:

In the year and a half since the LDS Church lowered the minimum age for full-time missionary service, the Utah-based faith has seen its proselytizing force swell from 58,500 to more than 83,000. That’s a 42 percent leap.

The number of convert baptisms last year grew to 282,945, up from 272,330 in 2012. That’s an increase of—less than 4 percent.

How can that be? Why would a surge of 25,000 additional eager and earnest suit-and-dress-wearing, scripture-packing, pamphlet-peddling young “elders” and “sisters” not translate into a similarly dramatic jump in the number of Mormons on membership rolls? (“Mormon conversions lag behind huge missionary growth,” Salt Lake Tribune, May 2, 2014)

Matt Martinich, an independent researcher, saw it as market saturation. The extra missionaries were sent into areas where the LDS Church had already done significant proselytizing. The article continues:

As it stands, the ratio of converts to Mormon missionaries has slipped from 5-to-1 in 2010 to less than 3.5-to-1 last year.

The article concludes: “Ultimately, though, the goal of Mormon missionary work may be as much about converting the proselytizer as converting the proselyte” (Salt Lake Tribune, May 2, 2014).

When Marlin K. Jensen, retired General Authority and historian of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, was asked in November of 2011 if the LDS leaders were aware that people are leaving the Mormon Church in droves after learning of troubling aspects of church history, he responded:

The fifteen men [First Presidency and Quorum of Twelve] really do know, and they really care. And they realize that maybe since Kirtland, we never have had a period of, I’ll call it apostasy, like we’re having right now; largely over these issues.1

Evidently in response to the growing number of Mormons disturbed by researching sensitive topics on the Internet, on September 9, 2014, the LDS Church issued a directive to all “General Authorities; Area Seventies; Stake, Mission, and District Presidents; Bishops and Branch Presidents” informing them of the new Gospel Topics section of the LDS Church’s website (lds.org/topics):

The purpose of the Gospel Topics section is to provide accurate and transparent information on Church history and doctrine within the framework of faith. . . . When Church members have questions regarding Church history and doctrine, possibly arising when detractors spread misinformation and doubt, you may want to direct their attention to these resources.2

According to the Salt Lake Tribune, “For about a year, the LDS Church has been posting on its website carefully worded, scholarly essays about touchy topics from the faith’s history and theology.”3 A few of these essays are:

“First Vision Accounts”
“Are Mormons Christian?”
“Book of Mormon Translation”
“Race and the Priesthood”
“Plural Marriage and Families in Early Utah”
“Book of Mormon and DNA studies”
“Becoming like God”
“Peace and Violence among 19th-Century Latter-day Saints” “Translation and Historicity of the Book of Abraham”

The Book of Abraham

In 1835 Michael Chandler brought his traveling exhibit of Egyptian artifacts to the Mormon town of Kirtland, Ohio. Upon examination, Joseph Smith offered to buy the collection as he had discerned that two of the Egyptian papyri contained the writings of the Old Testament patriarchs Abraham and Joseph. After purchasing the mummies and scrolls for $2,400 (approximately $65,500 in today’s dollars), Smith embarked on his new translation project, starting with the Book of Abraham scroll. If these were truly the writings of Abraham it would be the oldest known biblical text. Even the Dead Sea Scrolls would dim in comparison. Smith’s new scripture was officially canonized by the LDS Church in 1880.

3 Ibid.
Like the Book of Mormon, Joseph Smith professed to be translating an ancient record, preserved by God to come forth in these last days. However, Egyptologists find no connection between the Egyptian text on the papyri and Smith’s Book of Abraham. Smith’s supposed translation has been challenged for over one hundred and fifty years, starting with Theodule Deveria in 1861, concluding with Dr. Ritner’s 2014 article, “A Response to ‘Translation and Historicity of the Book of Abraham.’”

In July of this year the LDS Church added “Translation and Historicity of the Book of Abraham” to Gospel Topics in an effort to downplay the fact that the papyri Joseph Smith purchased in 1835 have nothing to do with Abraham. The church-owned Deseret News reported:

A new essay published Tuesday by the LDS Church on its website says scholarly or critical efforts to determine Joseph Smith’s ability to translate papyri are “likely futile.”

The new Gospel Topics essay acknowledges that the papyri have no relationship to the text of the Book of Abraham:

Mormon and non-Mormon Egyptologists agree that the characters on the fragments do not match the translation given in the book of Abraham . . .

The essay concludes:

The veracity and value of the book of Abraham cannot be settled by scholarly debate concerning the book’s translation and historicity. The book’s status as scripture lies in the eternal truths it teaches and the powerful spirit it conveys. . . . The truth of the book of Abraham is ultimately found through careful study of its teachings, sincere prayer and the confirmation of the Spirit.

Notice how they concede that the papyri contain nothing about Abraham yet maintain the Book of Abraham is scripture on the basis of a spiritual experience. However, when Joseph Smith examined the papyri he specifically claimed to be translating the ancient documents. On July 5, 1835, Smith commented:

I commenced the translation of some of the characters or hieroglyphics, and much to our joy found that one of the rolls contained the writings of Abraham, another the writings of Joseph of Egypt, etc.

In fact, the declaration that it is a literal translation is still reflected in the heading of the book itself:

The Book of Abraham; Translated from the papyrus, by Joseph Smith A Translation of some ancient Records that have fallen into our hands from the catacombs of Egypt. The writings of Abraham while he was in Egypt, called the Book of Abraham, written by his own hand, upon papyrus.

That Smith was purporting to literally translate the Egyptian material is seen in an entry in the History of the Church:

The remainder of this month [July 1835], I was continually engaged in translating an alphabet to the Book of Abraham, and arranging a grammar of the Egyptian language as practiced by the ancients.

Identifying the Scroll for the Book of Abraham

While the LDS Church states that it is not known which piece of the papyri Smith used for his new scripture, it is clear that he was claiming to translate the scroll called “Breathing Permit of Hor.” The first illustration on this papyrus, with added details, became Facsimile 1 in the Book of Abraham. It is stated very specifically in Abraham 1:12 “that you may have a knowledge of this altar, I will refer you to the representation at the commencement of this record.” But herein lies the problem: Scholars agree that Facsimile 1 has nothing to do with Abraham. In the LDS article we read:

None of the characters on the papyri fragments mentioned Abraham’s name or any of the events recorded in the book of Abraham. Mormon and non-Mormon Egyptologists agree that the characters on the fragments do not match the translation given in the book of Abraham, though there is not unanimity, even among non-Mormon scholars, about the proper interpretation of the vignettes on these fragments. Scholars have identified the papyri fragments as parts of standard funerary texts that were deposited with mummified bodies. These fragments date to between the third century B.C.E. and the first century C.E., long after Abraham lived.

8 History of the Church, vol. 2, pp. 235-236.
Now that the original papyrus used for Facsimile 1 has been identified it is clear that it was damaged in certain areas before it came into the Mormons’ possession. Evidently Smith or one of his associates penciled in what they thought would have been the missing parts.

Dr. Robert Ritner, Professor of Egyptology at the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, explains:

The published text of the Book of Abraham is accompanied by three woodcut “Facsimiles” with explanations authored by Joseph Smith himself. The facsimiles are all based on ancient Egyptian documents, and the Egyptian texts of all three can now be deciphered. In addition, the representations of all three conform to well-known Egyptian models. Facsimiles 1 and 3 represent sections of one papyrus: the “Breathing Permit of Hor” (P.J 1). . . . Comparison of the surviving initial vignette of the Hor papyrus with Facsimile 1 proved beyond doubt, as the LDS web post agrees, that it was “the vignette that became facsimile 1.” However, neither Facsimile 1 nor 2 is a true copy, and both contain added forgeries, including the human-head and knife of the supposed “idolatrous priest of Elkenah” (Fig. 3 on Facsimile 1) as can be seen in the crude pencil additions to the original papyrus sheet as mounted and “improved” for publication by the LDS church in 1842.12

Dr. Ritner further commented:

All of Smith’s published “explanations” are incorrect, including the lone example defended by the new [LDS] web posting: the water in which a crocodile is swimming (Fig. 12 of Facsimile 1), supposedly a representation of “the firmament over our heads . . .” Although Egyptians might place heavenly boats in the sky, that is not relevant “in this case” where the water is placed below the figures and represents the Nile, not the sky. The selective defense of these explanations by the church is telling, and all other explanations are simply indefensible except by distorting Egyptian evidence.

Smith’s Egyptian Alphabet and Grammar

Shortly after the Mormons purchased the papyri, Joseph Smith started working on an alphabet and grammar of the Egyptian language to aid in his translation work.13

The LDS Gospel Topics article continues with its emphasis on Smith’s study of the characters and his translation:

Some evidence suggests that Joseph studied the characters on the Egyptian papyri and attempted to learn the Egyptian language. His history reports that, in July 1835, he was “continually engaged in translating an alphabet to the Book of Abraham, and arranging a grammar of the Egyptian language as practiced by the ancients.” This grammar, as it was called, consisted of columns of hieroglyphic characters followed by English translation recorded in a large notebook by Joseph’s scribe, William W. Phelps. Another manuscript, written by Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery, has Egyptian characters followed by explanations.

The relationship of these documents to the book of Abraham is not fully understood. Neither the rules nor the translations in the grammar book correspond to those recognized by Egyptologists today. Whatever the role of the grammar book, it appears that Joseph Smith began translating portions of the book of Abraham almost immediately after the purchase of the papyri. 14

The lack of correlation between Smith’s Alphabet and Grammar and the papyri demonstrate Smith’s total lack of knowledge of anything Egyptian. Included in Smith’s Egyptian working papers are parts of the text of the Book of Abraham lined up with Egyptian characters taken from the Breathing Permit document which were attached to the original drawing of Facsimile 1. Researcher Christopher C. Smith observed:

Consistent with this conclusion, three handwritten Book of Abraham manuscripts from the Kirtland period contain, in their margins, sequential Egyptian characters from the first column of the Hor Document of Breathing (pJS XI). These characters are matched up with discrete units of English text. They appear to be aligned this way in order to show which portions of the English text were translated from which Egyptian characters. 15

In the next column is a photo of a manuscript page for the Book of Abraham, with the Egyptian characters copied from the papyrus in the left hand column. 16

Smith’s representation of whole paragraphs being translated from one or two Egyptian symbols is consistent with his earlier claim that the Nephites wrote in “reformed Egyptian” because it took less space than Hebrew (Book of Mormon, Mormon 9:32-33). This is not actually the case, but it gave Smith an excuse for being able to translate whole paragraphs from simple characters.

On the following page is another example of Smith purporting to translate the “Breathing Permit” in the manuscript pages for the Book of Abraham contained in his Alphabet and Grammar. 17

Notice the dozens of words supposedly translated from a character resembling a backward E. Dr. Ritner comments:

It is now evident that over half of the text of the Book of Abraham was invented by Smith from only two incomplete lines in the “Breathing Permit of Hôr” (P. JS 1, col. 2 [=Fragment XI], lines 1-2). The few Egyptian words “great lake of Khonsu, [and the Osiris Hôr, the justified] born of Taikhibit, the justified, likewise” were spun into the full Book of Abraham 1:4-2:2.

It is not surprising that Smith’s translation of just a few Egyptian words could become a lengthy narrative.

16 Tanner, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? p. 312.
Before the 1822 decipherment of hieroglyphs by Jean-François Champollion in France, it had been wrongly assumed that the Egyptian writing system was purely symbolic, not phonetic.

Further evidence that the Book of Abraham could not have been translated from the Egyptian papyri can be seen in Dr. Ritner’s book, The Joseph Smith Egyptian Papyri.

Facsimile Two

Beneath each of the three facsimiles in the Book of Abraham is Smith’s explanation of the drawings. Unfortunately, none of Joseph Smith’s material matches the descriptions given by the Egyptologists. One problem area is Smith’s attempt to restore the missing portions of the round disc known as a hypocephalus, which was placed under the head of the mummy. In LDS scriptures it is referred to as Facsimile 2. Dr. Ritner writes:

Facsimile 2 derives from a separate burial, for an individual named Sheshonq. Large portions of this published “facsimile” were improperly inserted from unrelated papyri.

In the next column is a photo of the earliest drawing of Facsimile 2, taken from Joseph Smith’s Kirtland Egyptian papers. Notice in the second drawing the blank areas were filled in when it was printed in the Times and Seasons in 1842.

18 Ritner, “A Response to ‘Translation … of the Book of Abraham.’”
19 Ibid.
We now know that the Egyptian characters used to fill in the blank spots on Facsimile 2 were actually copied from the Breathing Permit scroll and haphazardly placed on the hypocephalus, rendering the text at that point unintelligible.21

Mormon scholar Michael D. Rhodes observed:

A careful examination of Facsimile 2 shows that there is a difference between most of the hieroglyphic signs and the signs on the right third of the figure on the outer edge as well as the outer portions of the sections numbered 12-15. These signs are hieratic, not hieroglyphic, and are inverted, or upside down, to the rest of the text. In fact, they are a fairly accurate copy of lines 2, 3, and 4 of the Joseph Smith Papyrus XI, which contains a portion of the Book of Breathings. Especially clear is the word sns, in section 14, and part of the name of the mother of the owner of the papyrus, (tay-)uby.t, repeated twice on the outer edge. An ink drawing of the hypocephalus in the Church Historian’s office shows these same areas as being blank. It is likely that these portions were destroyed on the original hypocephalus and someone (the engraver, one of Joseph Smith’s associates, or Joseph himself) copied the lines from the Book of Breathings papyrus for aesthetic purposes.22

This would be equivalent to finding that your Bible was missing a page so you tore a page from a history book and inserted it in the Bible, upside down, so that the book would have the right number of pages. But the added text would make no sense next to the other pages. Obviously Joseph Smith totally lacked any understanding of the Egyptian material.

Is Min God?

When the hypocephalus was prepared for publication in 1842 Smith had the engraver add numbers to certain figures that would correspond to the explanations underneath the drawing. He identified number 7, the seated figure (lower right area, upside-down) as God:

Represents God sitting upon his throne, revealing, through the heavens the grand Key-words of the Priesthood; as, also, the sign of the Holy Ghost unto Abraham, in the form of a dove.23

However, this is actually a representation of Min, the Egyptian god of fertility, shown with an erection. LDS scholars have defended Smith’s use of Min to represent God in his regenerative powers. For instance, LDS Egyptologist Michael Rhodes explains:

7. A seated ithyphallic god with a hawk’s tail, holding aloft the divine flail. . . . Before him is what appears to be a bird of some sort, presenting him with an Udjat-eye. . . .

The seated god is clearly a form of Min, the god of the regenerative, procreative forces of nature, perhaps combined with Horus as the hawk’s tail would seem to indicate.

Joseph Smith mentions here the Holy Ghost in the form of a dove and God “revealing through the heavens the grand key-words of the priesthood.” The procreative forces, receiving unusual accentuation throughout the representation, may stand for many divine generative powers, not least of which might be conjoined with the blessings of the Priesthood in one’s posterity eternally.24

This would fit with the LDS theology of God being a resurrected being from another world who achieved godhood and has a tangible body. Brigham Young, the second prophet of the LDS Church, explained:

The birth of the Saviour was as natural as are the births of our children; it was the result of natural action. He partook of flesh and blood—was begotten of his Father, as we were of our fathers.25

While a sexually active god may fit in with LDS theology, it does not represent the God of the Bible. In the book of Numbers we read:

21 Tanner, Mormonism—Shadow or Reality, pp. 338-344.
23 Pearl of Great Price, Facsimile 2 from the Book of Abraham.
God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent. (Numbers 23:19)

In the book of Romans Paul declared:

Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like a mortal human being and birds and animals and reptiles. . . They exchanged the truth about God for a lie, and worshiped and served created things rather than the Creator—who is forever praised. (Romans 1:22-25 NIV)

The Joseph Smith hypocephalus, with its multiple drawings of Egyptian deities, is similar to numerous ones preserved in various museums. Below is a drawing of a hypocephalus in the Leiden Museum in Germany that is very close to the one in the Book of Abraham. Notice that it also has the god Min in the same location on the disc.26

The LDS article claims that “the book of Abraham largely follows the biblical narrative but adds important information regarding Abraham’s life and teachings.”27 The fact that it changes the nature of God is one of the doctrinal problems in the Book of Abraham. The Old Testament is very emphatic that there is only one God—i.e. Isaiah 43:10-11; Isaiah 44:6 and 8. Yet the Book of Abraham introduces a plurality of gods. Below is a comparison between Smith’s translation and Genesis:

Pearl of Great Price: Abraham 4:1 – And then the Lord said: Let us go down. And they, that is the Gods organized and formed the heavens and the earth.

Genesis 1:1 – In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.

Why should anyone accept the new concepts in the Book of Abraham (plural gods, pre-mortal existence, racial cursing) when there is no historical validity to the book, and its teachings run counter to those of the Bible?28

Facsimile Three

Joseph Smith also totally misidentified all the figures in Facsimile 3. Below is a side by side comparison of the identification of the figures. 29

Dr. Ritner explains:

In Facsimile 3, Smith confuses human and animal heads and males with females. No amount of special pleading can change the female “Isis the great, the god’s mother” (Facsimile 3, Fig. 2) into the male “King Pharaoh, whose name is given in the characters above his hand,” as even the LDS author Michael D. Rhodes accepts. Here Smith also misunderstands “Pharaoh” as a personal name rather than a title meaning “king,” so he reads “king king” for a goddess’s name that he claims to have understood on the papyrus!30

Joseph Smith’s explanations of the facsimiles in the Book of Abraham were refuted over one hundred years ago, in 1912, when the major Egyptologists of the day gave their evaluation of the drawings.

Dr. Arthur Mace, Assistant Curator for the Department of Egyptian Art of the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York:

The Book of Abraham, it is hardly necessary to say, is a pure fabrication. Cuts 1 and 3 are inaccurate copies of well-known scenes on funeral papyri, and cut 2 is a copy of one of the magical discs which in the late Egyptian period were placed under the heads of mummies. There were about forty of these latter known in museums and they are all very similar in character. Joseph Smith’s interpretation of these cuts is a farce of nonsense from beginning to end. Egyptian characters can now be read almost as easily as Greek, and five minutes’ study in an Egyptian gallery of any museum should be enough to convince any educated man of the clumsiness of the imposture.

Dr. A. H. Sayce from Oxford, England:

It is difficult to deal seriously with Joseph Smith’s impudent fraud. The fac-simile from the Book of Abraham No. 2 is an ordinary hypocephalus, but the hieroglyphics upon it have been copied so ignorantly that hardly one of them is correct. I need scarce say that Kolob, etc., are unknown to the Egyptian language. . . . Smith has turned the Goddess into a king and Osiris into Abraham.

Dr. Flinders Petrie of London University:

In the first place, they are copies (very badly done) of well known Egyptian subjects of which I have dozens of examples. Secondly, they are all many centuries later than Abraham. . . . The attempts to guess a meaning for them, in the professed explanations, are too absurd to be noticed. It may be safely said that there is not one single word that is true in these explanations.

Dr. James H. Breasted of the Haskell Oriental Museum, University of Chicago:

It will be seen, then, that if Joseph Smith could read ancient Egyptian writing, his ability to do so had no connection with the decipherment of hieroglyphics by European scholars . . . . The three fac-similes in question represent equipment which will be and has been found in unnumbered thousands of Egyptian graves . . . . The point, then, is that in publishing these fac-similes of Egyptian documents as part of an unique revelation to Abraham, Joseph Smith was attributing to Abraham not three unique documents of which no other copies exist, but was attributing to Abraham a series of documents which were the common property of a whole nation of people who employed them in every human burial, which they prepared.

The full statements of these renowned Egyptologists can be read in our publication, Why Egyptologists Reject the Book of Abraham. 31

Possible Answers

In an attempt to obscure the problem of purporting the Book of Abraham to be an actual translation the church is now proposing two alternate answers—

1. We may not have the right piece. Since the surviving pieces of papyri have no relationship to Abraham, his writings may have been on one of the missing artifacts. The article states:

It is likely futile to assess Joseph’s ability to translate papyri when we now have only a fraction of the papyri he had in his possession. . . . The loss of a significant portion of the papyri means the relationship of the papyri to the published text cannot be settled conclusively by reference to the papyri. 32

2. Smith’s use of the word “translate” does not require a typical definition. The papyri may have served as a catalyst for revelation. Following this line of reasoning, Smith didn’t need the missing pieces. He could have just as easily used a book on geography for his inspiration. The LDS article explains:

According to this view, Joseph’s translation was not a literal rendering of the papyri as a conventional translation would be. Rather, the physical artifacts provided an occasion for meditation, reflection, and revelation. They catalyzed a process whereby God gave to Joseph Smith a revelation about the life of Abraham, even if that revelation did not directly correlate to the characters on the papyri. 33

Either way, the church is now admitting that there is absolutely nothing on any of the papyri in its possession that has anything to do with Abraham, that all the pieces of papyri only relate to the Egyptian religion. This would include the three illustrations in the Book of Abraham. Egyptologists can translate most of the material on these drawings and find them to be standard Egyptian burial documents, depicting their numerous deities.

While the LDS article suggests the Book of Abraham material may have been attached to the end of the Breathing Permit papyrus, scholars Andrew W. Cook and Christopher C. Smith have challenged that assumption:

The question then becomes whether the undamaged scroll of Hôr was ever long enough to accommodate a hieratic Book of Abraham source text. The Book of Abraham translation contains 5,506 English words. The hieratic text in the instructions column of the Document of Breathing translates to ~97 English words. This column is ~9 cm wide. Hence, if the Book of Abraham were written on the scroll in the same hieratic font as this portion of the Document of Breathing, it would have taken up ~9(5,506/97)=~511 cm of papyrus. Since the Book of Abraham translation is incomplete, the actual space required for a hieratic original would presumably have been even longer.34

The authors then use mathematical calculations to demonstrate that the papyri could not have been long enough to contain the text of the Book of Abraham.

The LDS Church feels the issues can be resolved through prayer, however, non-Mormon scholars remain unconvinced. After spending considerable time examining the papyri owned by the LDS Church, Dr. Ritner stated:

Such a declaration [that the veracity of the Book of Abraham is to be found in prayer] may seem reasonable to those already predisposed to accept it, but on closer reading, the LDS church posting suggests discomfort with its own conclusions and reasoning. Not a single opposing scholar is mentioned by name, nor are their reasons for rejecting the Book of Abraham. Yet the LDS paper attempts to engage in scholarly debate from a one-sided position, repeatedly citing in the footnotes the same limited set of apologists who are primarily church employees at BYU in Provo.35

While conceding that the truthfulness of the Book of Abraham is a “matter of faith” the Pearl of Great Price Student Manual promotes Joseph Smith’s translation as a great accomplishment since Egyptian could not be deciphered at that time:

The book of Abraham is an evidence of the inspired calling of the Prophet Joseph Smith. It came forth at a time when the study of the ancient Egyptian language and culture was just beginning. The scholars of the 1800s had scarcely begun to explore the field of Egyptology, and yet, with no formal training in ancient languages and no knowledge of ancient Egypt (except his work with the Book of Mormon), Joseph Smith began his translation of the ancient manuscripts. His knowledge and ability came through the power and gift of God, together with his own determination and faith.36

With such emphasis on Smith having “no formal training in ancient languages” and that “study of the ancient Egyptian language” was just beginning, this statement would lead one to conclude that Smith’s translation would have corresponded to an Egyptologists translation. Yet no connection has been found.

Conclusion

Non-LDS Egyptologists have long argued that Smith’s work has no relationship to the ancient Egyptian papyri purchased in 1835. Dr. Ritner, in his article responding to the Gospel Topics essay, observed:

Scholarly rejection of the authenticity of the Book of Abraham is now not new and has continued unabated since the study by Jules Remy and Theodule Deverial in 1861, with multiple scholars (including A. H. Sayce, Arthur Mace, Flinders Petrie, and James H. Breasted) dismissing the book’s validity in 1912. With the rediscovery of the papyri at the Metropolitan Museum in New York in 1967, analysis by John Wilson, Richard Parker and Klaus Baer (all 1968) and even the LDS apologist Hugh Nibley (in 1975) disproved any possibility that the Book of Abraham could be an acceptable translation of the surviving Egyptian papyri. My own works on the papyri (in 2002, 2003, 2011 and 2013) showed the same result, as did the LDS-sponsored translations by Michael Rhodes (2002) and the 2005 revision of Nibley’s volume. Thus has arisen a host of alternative defenses for the Book of Abraham, questioning the meaning of the word “translation,” the length of the original papyri, the possibility of a now lost section with the Abraham text, etc.37

Even if one were to concede (which critics do not) that the text for the Book of Abraham was actually contained on one of the missing pieces of papyri, it is clear from the extant papyri that Smith was indeed using them for his supposed “translation.” He believed that the three illustrations taken from the papyri (which were copied and printed with the Book of Abraham) conveyed the same story of Abraham that he was supposedly “translating” from the text, whether that text is on the extant papyri or on the lost pieces. To simply say that “we don’t have all the papyri” does not dismiss the fact that the parts that we do have were clearly used by Smith in creating the Book of Abraham, to one extent or another, and their contents clearly depict not a story of Abraham but rather a common Egyptian funerary scene, as has been concluded by Egyptologists for decades.

In 2011 John Dehlin, a fifth generation Mormon and creator of Mormon Stories podcast, conducted a survey of 3,000 former Mormons, examining the reasons for their loss of faith. One of the top reasons given was loss of faith in Joseph Smith’s supposed translation of the Book of Abraham.38 The LDS Church’s latest article on the Book of Abraham does not provide the answers necessary to stem the tide of defection. Dr. Robert Ritner has responded to their article and demonstrates that their arguments are spurious.39

The LDS article concedes that there is no connection between the papyri and the text of the Book of Abraham. Yet that is exactly how it has been presented to the world for over 170 years. It is time for the LDS Church to decanonize the Book of Abraham and admit that it is a product of Joseph Smith’s imagination.

April 2014: Thank you does not even come close to expressing my deep gratitude for the service you are rendering, God bless you!

I have been on what seems like a life long quest for the truth in all areas, but most importantly, [em]pathizes with those that know the truth.

I am in such a precarious place, all of my family and closest friends are strong Mormons. I have three brothers, one of which is a bishop, one in the bishopric, and the oldest a student of the "scriptures." They have alienated me and think me lost for all eternity.

April 2014: I have seen you as a guest on “Polygamy What Love Is This.” I am very impressed with your vast knowledge of the LDS doctrine and history. I was LDS my entire life, until a few years ago. It is because of what I have learned from you, Doris Hanson and Shawn Mc Craney, that it has been proven to me that the LDS doctrine contradicts the bible, and it’s based on the lies of a false Prophet.

April 2014: I really enjoy hearing you speak. It has helped me coming out of Mormonism. Since I was 16 I’ve always wondered about Joseph Smith and the gold plates. Now I’m 84 and know the truth for the past 6 yrs.

April 2014: As a 73 year old woman, I cannot thank you enough or express my gratitude enough for you and your website. I came out of Mormonism 27 years ago . . . I was not raised Mormon but converted when going thru a difficult time.

I found them to be wonderful people, but I could never believe the Joseph Smith story.

May 2014: Now that my husband and I have studied church history I can’t believe that we ever believed it at all. What a shame that the LDS church has hidden the true history of the church. The terrible part is that we taught our children the lies. I doubt we will ever be able to get thru to one of our sons.

May 2014: I cannot believe that you delude yourself so much you can actually believe this stuff. I can only assume you say and do these things to appease your new followers because they hang on your every vengeful and derogatory post. I hope you have a change of heart in your tactics whether or not you have a change of heart about the church.

May 2014: My wife and I . . . were both very active LDS, up until last summer. I will be 38 years old this year and still can’t believe how firm I thought my “testimony of Mormonism” was, up until last year. Both sides of my family go back to the 1830s in Mormonism. On my Mom’s side, my “multiple great” grandfather is William Clayton. I was on track to becoming a lifelong LDS leader and then really found out who Jesus Christ is and now enjoy attending an incredible Bible Fellowship about 10 minutes from our home, here in Texas. . . . Easter Sunday . . . we attended two different Bible Fellowship Services. Both of them were, hands down, the most powerful and uplifting Easter Services we had ever experienced! Easter Sunday, in Mormonism, was such a let down every year. . . .

During my many years as a novice LDS historian and a professional LDS Religious Educator, you and your husband’s names were infamous as THE anti-Mormons of our day. Even as a TBM, I never felt comfortable with such a label . . . I want to apologize for the unfair and unjust treatment you and your late husband have endured for decades, just for following Christ and having the courage to tell the truth! . . . We devastated our family and friends by leaving it all. But, we have discovered a vast group of wonderful, like-minded people, with the help of the internet, and a truck load of supporting evidence for our decision. . . . Finally, I have to tell you of the absolute peace and clarity my sweet wife and I feel as we have come to know the pure Love of Jesus Christ in our lives. HE IS ENOUGH and that is such a relief, after decades of trying to be “worthy” in the legalism of Mormon orthodoxy.

May 2014: So very grateful for your television ministry, many years ago God used you on The John Ankerberg show [www. jashow.org/television-shows/] to help my husband become free from Mormonism and he has been walking with God ever since. Thank you! Bless you!!! BLESS YOU!!!!

May 2014: Thankful for how God has used you and your husband. I still remember looking at your plagiarism page in 1997 when you compared 1 Corinthians to [Mosiah]. God used that in getting me to doubt the BOM as the authority.

[Book of Mormon, about 121 B.C.] Mosiah 5:15: “Therefore, I would that ye should be steadfast and immovable, always abounding in good works, that Christ, the Lord God Omnipotent, may seal you his, . . .”

[Bible, about 51-60 A.D.] 1 Corinthians 15:58: “Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye stedfast, unmovedable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.”
May 2014: I was aware of your publications early on, but approached them from the perspective of a true believer; seeds can take a long time to germinate! It took me many years to overcome the mind control used by the Mormon Church, after my converted brother brought into about half of our family.

I was such a true believer that I took Brigham Young’s words seriously, about “God’s law of polygamy” being eternal. Thus I was brought under the spell of [a polygamist sect] for a brief time. . . . Anyway, I thought it would be a good time to thank you for your work, and encourage you to keep freeing people from this horrible, horrible “religion.” . . . What helped me most was Ann Eliza Young’s Wife Number 19. [www.utlm.org/onlineresources/brighamyoungswives.htm]

May 2014: I just viewed your 4 part interview with John Dehlin. What an amazing story. . . . Watching and reading your material has helped me find the grace in Jesus Christ after being a Mormon for over 30 years. I am the first in my family of 10 siblings to leave Mormonism. Today I’m 57 and I’ve been a Christian for 3 years. . . . My 4th great grandmother was Patty Sessions and 3rd great grandmother was Silvia Lyon Sessions. When I was a child my mother proudly told us that we’re to keep the polygamous relationship a secret because it was sacred, as they were sealed to Joseph Smith. When I attended Rick’s College a church history professor told me I was of “royal blood.” Mother always told us children that Joseph had several wives but he never ever had sexual relations with any of them except Emma. And of course I was never informed that 11 were already married to living husbands, and that our great grandmothers were mother-daughter wives. Even as I write this it is tasteless!

May 2014: I listened to your recent interview with John Dehlin [www.youtube.com/playlist?list=PLXq5qj6Gq0DZPewyQyXZ WLoD_fD1MtZiM] and loved it. I am a recent convert FROM mormonism and appreciate your work and your insights into these difficult topics. My wife and I aren’t sure exactly where our spiritual journeys will lead us; but right now we are quite happy attending a local Methodist church and are very active there. My wife and I both came precariously close to leaving mormonism in favor of Atheism. It’s a common transition for ex-mormons as you know. That is why your work is so vital, I believe. I am not against the Mormon church. I feel that it has done and currently does good in the lives of many. I have felt God speak to me when I was an active member and I cannot deny it. But I feel Him continuing to speak to me outside of “the Church” and I am grateful.

June 2014: your interview with John Dehlin [MormonStories podcast] was absolutely incredible. I’ve shared it with many people. I was an LDS convert, but left two years ago. I too believe in the historical Christ. I have hope, and faith, but still, some questions about God. Your story gave me such hope.

June 2014: First off I want to apologize for any negative thoughts I ever sent your way. I don’t live in Utah and was never an orthodox Mormon but I did believe that you were fighting a lost cause for no reason. Second I need to thank you for that fight. How you managed to do this without the internet is mind-boggling but you have and did.

I recently left the church after questioning for years. My “shelf” finally fell but my husband is a Mormon blue blood who believes with every fiber of his being and it breaks my heart.

June 2014: I’m from Brazil. I’m a third generation mormon. . . . I was raised an ultra-believing mormon. I’ve been a missionary myself and have served five years as a bishop. I was serving for two years as a High Councilor when my eyes were finally opened and I saw the Church as it really is.

It was a terrible experience to realize everything I was based on lies by a handful of 19th Century crazy villains. For weeks I stood alone in my realization, fearful of the consequences of telling my wife, parents, siblings and extended family. I think I will bear the scars of the psychological damage forever. Eventually, I told my wife (a fourth generation mormon), who believed me, and my parents, who respected my decision even if they would rather not research themselves.

I immediately asked to be released from the Stake High Council and sent my resignation letter, along with my wife and children. As I was a very visible figure in the Stake, of course it sent shockwaves throughout the membership. Half a dozen have already left the Church after I did and others are still reeling from it.

The final trigger to the process that led me out of the Church were the “essays” [Gospel Topics on www.lds.org], but I know they were a mere consequence of the work you two pioneered many decades ago. I’m so thankful to the courage you had to invest your life to help people that had nothing but hate for you. I’ve watched Sandra’s interview on MormonStories [podcast], and I can only imagine the huge personal cost you had to pay as individuals and as a family . . . I don’t know if there’s a god, but if there is, I hope he will reward you for standing for what is right. My family and descendents for many generations will be free because of your sincere work.

June 2014: Hey just wanted to let you know that I loved your interview with John Dehlin. I was not planning on listening when he said he was interviewing you but I found you so sincere, and interesting. I appreciate the work you do.) . . . It gave me good advice on how to proceed with my wife and children. I feel like god can get our family through this. Although it will be very tough . . .

My wife has a strong testimony. I feel bad bc we married as strong members and I feel that it’s letting her down, and not giving her what she planned when we married in the temple. She is troubled w[ith] the idea of having to live polygamy in the next life tho.

July 2014: I am always amazed at people like you....if you want to try to discredit the L.D.S Church........what do you have that I would want in my life... nothing....after you have gone to University why would you want to return to grade one........It must be easy to tell people the L.D.S Church is wrong. Didn’t you act in or present “The God Makers”? I watched that movie and I could disprove everything that was said....my comment to the people like you or that showed it .......was this........why don’t you do something good with your life instead of running down something that is so good and true....Is your Church man made.....it sounds like it is.....I have 17 points that prove that the L.D.S Church is true........do you know that Satan shows a few truths and the rest are lies........

[Nothing was deleted from the message. The man inserted all the periods.]
July 2014: First, let me say that Mrs. Tanner . . . has given me "new light" on Mormonism and the many fallacies therein. I thank her and I want her and all of you associated with UTLM to know that I, as a black man, am sincerely grateful for your candid, open, honest exposure . . . This for me started, obviously, with the "mark of Cain" issue. As an intelligent, information seeking hound it became a personal crusade of mine to just understand the strange beliefs of Mormonism. And thanks to UTLM and other resources, I am much more equipped to help in the plight of misguided Mormons. Thanks.

July 2014: Just wanted to say: if two years ago someone would have told me I would 'like' something "Sandra Tanner" said on Facebook, I would have called them crazy! . . . I listened to one or two of Dehlin’s podcasts before but somehow recently had the time to listen to all of yours with him. It really opened my eyes as to how 'The Church' — both formally and informally — manages its image. Your (and your husband's) story was — totally believable! I’m so glad to be now seeking out information on my own rather than taking only what gets endorsed by the church. Cheers to you, and thank you for sharing your story!

July 2014: I know the church is true and Book of Mormon and the bible and Doctrine Covenants Pearl of Great Price are the fullness of the gospel. . . . You need to come back to the church Sandra. Your salvation depends on it.

August 2014: I have just watched a few of your youtube videos. I bought your book Mormonism Shadow or Reality back in 1978 and ate it up. I was in my last year of Bible College at the time. I commend you on your stedfastness through all these years. God Bless you!

August 2014: I just watched ALL of your fascinating interviews with John Dehlin of Mormon Stories. Thanks . . . They opened to me an even clearer picture of the outrageous treachery of Joseph and most of the leaders who followed him. I was struck by your simple honesty in reporting your and Jerald's courageous journey over many years and sharing your vast knowledge about the machinations of the Mormon hierarchy. Though I have not been a member of the Mormon church for many years, I still find it necessary to explore writings which reveal truths more recently uncovered. It broke my heart to leave the Mormon church, but I knew it was necessary to prevent the slow strangling of my soul.

August 2014: You, my friend, are sunshine. I’m early on in my journey, still going to church most Sundays but it is becoming harder to separate myself and just go to my mental happy place when I hear things that aren’t quite true. I’ve begun to broach tough subjects with my cute hubby, but the last thing I want to do is have people think I’m filled with darkness when this new awareness in me of true Christianity is making me feel filled with light. Not sure where to go from here but I’m trying to learn all I can and be honest about things without being antagonistic and picking a fight. Tricky balance when I’ve always just tried to make people happy and not stressed. Thank you for your courage and research and candor. I really hope to get to meet you someday!!!

August 2014: I previously ordered UTLM’s first seven digital (PDF) book offerings and am delighted with the quality and portability of those books most of which I also own in their original print editions.

In 2007, while co-writing The Kingdom of the Occult (Nelson, 2008), I was investigating whether astrology or horoscopes carried any sway among Mormon leaders.1 That was when I discovered thirteen issues of the Deseret Almanac series, published from 1851-1865, which I had never seen before. They were compiled by a respected Latter-day Saint and educator, William Wines (W. W.) Phelps,2 and printed by a member of the LDS First Presidency, Willard Richards, the Second Counselor to Brigham Young. Not to be confused with the modern LDS publication under a similar name, Deseret News Church Almanac (1974 to the present), the nineteenth-century publication followed the motif of New England and European almanacs, with calendric coordination of planetary movement and weather forecasting, although the Deseret Almanac rejected astrological (occult) forecasting.

These early publications yield a trove of new quotations, offering fresh insights of nineteenth-century Mormon doctrine, its propagation, and in some cases, its changes.3

This cache of documents, which seems like an odd place for doctrine, provides us with multiple references about the uniquely Mormon concepts that God the Father is a resurrected mortal man who was born on another planet, that the Father has a father god who is Jesus' grandfather god, that the Father is married to the Queen of Heaven, also known as Mother God, that the Father was married to Mary to prevent Jesus from being an illegitimate child, that many gods exist, that Satan is also a spirit son of God, that the sun, moon, and stars are inhabited by humans, that dark-skinned people (particularly Lamanites and Blacks) are under a curse, and that the Bible contains a great many blunders. Numerous curiosities are mentioned in passing, such as Adam came to Earth from the planet Kolob and brought seeds to plant the Garden of Eden and that he lived in the Americas (Missouri, in particular) for 997 years.

Various repositories yielded clear copies of each edition of the Deseret Almanac and I was amazed at the doctrinal items crammed into the calendar pages. Eventually, I collected enough scans and photographs to make a feasible set.4 In a search of hundreds of Mormon books, only a few acknowledged the almanac’s existence. Stranger yet, none of these references gave any indication that they contain a wealth of LDS doctrinal matters, including the only scholarly analysis of them, by David J. Whittaker, in his BYU Studies essay.5

Background of the Deseret Almanac

Whittaker creates an exciting atmosphere as he threads together how the earliest Mormons, from Joseph Smith’s family to other New England Mormons, used and relied upon almanacs. Indeed, almanacs, in general, held a rich heritage in early America. Phelps considered his almanacs indispensable to Latter-day Saints, stating in an 1860 advertisement that “A person without an almanac is somewhat like a ship without a compass; he never knows what to do, nor when to do it.” Like any good salesman, he added, “Buy Almanacs, and pay the maker” (Almanac, 1860, 32). Whittaker adds these almanacs to other historical works that “constitute a large body of source material for those who wish to probe the intellectual and cultural history of early Mormonism.”

“Almanacs,” he said, “were mirrors of, as much as they were windows to, early Mormons.”

William W. Phelps was the original periodical publisher for the Mormon Church. He was one of Joseph Smith’s scribes and was, uniquely, Smith’s ghostwriter for certain works. It is not a stretch to say that he knew the prophet’s mind and was trusted by Smith to convey his thoughts. During these early years, as one Mormon historian observes, Phelps was a “Prominent Church leader 1831-38.” Still, he ran afoul of Smith in 1839, causing a brief excommunication, but Smith restored him through rebaptism the following year.

Phelps supported Brigham Young’s prophetic succession, though he was again briefly excommunicated and rebaptized in 1847, he still followed Young and the Mormons to Salt Lake City in 1849, residing there until his death in 1872. When he began publishing the almanacs, it was conducted with the counsel and approval of Brigham Young. The two were so closely associated on the almanac project that Brigham Young’s surviving copy of the 1854 Deseret Almanac is a special, leather-bound edition with the title and his name embossed in gold.

There were thirteen almanacs published by Phelps between 1851 and 1865. The title changed three times; initially it was the Deseret Almanac, covering 1851 through 1858. It changed to the Almanac in 1859 through 1864 and then back again to the Deseret Almanac in 1865. Collectively I will refer to them as the Deseret Almanac.

The 1851 almanacs were originally distributed and sold through the Post Office. Willard Richards, who was the editor of the Deseret News, provided editorial space for Phelps to explain why the almanacs are important and why they lack astrological information. Richards had a personal stake in promoting the almanac, so he published an announcement in the Deseret News, stating that it is “desirable, useful, and acceptable to the Saints of Deseret.” The LDS Church also profited by distributing the almanacs. Beginning in 1852, they were sold through the Church’s Tithing Office. There, the almanacs could be purchased by “cash, butter, eggs, cheese, lard, tallow, and such other chicken fixins [sic] as may be convenient and valuable.”

11 Cook, 87-88. Phelps served on the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah (1841-1857), was the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and was appointed the Superintendent of Meteorological Observations (1857). Interestingly, his associate for the almanacs, Richards, was President of the Legislature Assembly while Phelps served his position.

12 Whittaker references a number of personal letters between Phelps and Young, where he sought Young’s counsel and input prior to publishing them. See Whittaker, 112, n. 40, 42, 45, 46, 48, and 113, n. 50.

15 Deseret News, (8 February 1851): 2. This is not surprising, since Richards, the printer, was also the Postmaster for the Post Office at the time.

16 Ibid. Also in Deseret News, (8 March 1851): 3.

Phelps published a renouncement of astrology in the first three almanacs, 1851-1853. His article for the Deseret News was rationally sound and contained reasons why astrology is untrustworthy. Later, though, in 1857, Brigham Young persuaded him that astrology was true and belonged to the holy Priesthood, so Phelps changed his mind accordingly. Both Young and Phelps rejected astrology again in 1861.19

The Contents

The first few almanacs (1851-1854) contain most of the theological statements of interest to students of Mormonism. The Improvement Era commented on them in 1948, “Of course the Deseret Almanacs were published for the benefit of the Church and contained Church historical material, including the birthdates of the General Authorities.”20 Still, there will be Mormons who will object to these quotations but the implications cannot be ignored.

First, we have theological statements that are exclusively LDS. The Mormon cosmology of gods and goddesses, interplanetary kingdoms, and spirit-children, are examples of these exclusive doctrines. These speak of a restoration to a Mormon, but unusual or heretical concepts to a Christian.

Second, Mormons may attempt to brush them aside as merely Phelps’s opinion. This, however, magnifies the problem rather than solving it, since Phelps relied upon input from Brigham Young and Willard Richards, both members of the First Presidency. Nobody is claiming scriptural status for the almanacs, but only succinct doctrinal statements from one who was entrusted by Smith as his ghostwriter.

Third, there were no retractions or corrections of the Mormon doctrinal statements in subsequent editions, like what there was for astrology. Astrology was renounced in 1851, then reevaluated and codified by Young in 1857, and once again renounced in 1861.21 Yet all of the Mormon doctrinal statements remain intact without alteration by Phelps, Young, Richards, or any other LDS leader.

Fourth, the dissemination of the almanacs primarily came through the Church Tithing Office. This speaks volumes about the acceptance of the Mormon doctrinal statements contained in them. It was not shocking or surprising to Latter-day Saints when they read the doctrinal statements in the almanacs, because that is what was already being taught.

Fifth, there are three newer arguments that are offered by Mormon intellectuals that we may encounter. One of these is the “obscure source” argument. The thinking is that if the quotation can be marginalized as either an obscure source or a thoughtless, random one-time statement, then they no longer need to deal with it. This argument fails to recognize the fifteen-year historical weight of Phelps’s almanacs and its distribution by the LDS Church. Their historical significance belies any attempt to marginalize them.

Another tactic is to diminish the importance of a quotation from an older LDS source based upon what some Mormon defenders call “Mormon Reformation” thinking. They believe that by assigning undesirable quotations to the reformation time frame, then they do not have to account for its subject or its existence. Former BYU professor Robert Millet has popularized this and he attempts to draw a parallel between the Mormon Reformation and the fiery sermons preached by Jonathan Edwards and Protestant revivalists.

The fallacy of a false analogy arises in Millet’s position. Jonathan Edwards and Protestant revivalists did not preach false doctrine in order to bring people to the truth. Essentially, Millet and others argue for using false doctrine, like Brigham Young’s “blood atonement” sermons (their best example), to bring wayward Mormons back to restoration truth. This objection does not diminish Phelps’s doctrinal statements, which were written for the purpose of dissemination under the authority and counsel of the First Presidency. The almanacs, mainly from 1851-1854, do not fit the time period of the Mormon Reformation, which is restricted by two Mormon scholars from late 1855 to mid-1857 or more narrowly between early 1856 and mid-1857.22

Another popular objection that we encounter is the “yawn” effect. That is, the Maxwell Institute (formerly the Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon 19 This is one of Whittaker’s most interesting footnotes. He wrote, “Phelps, of course, was not a farmer, and by 1857 changed his mind about astrology after a discussion with Brigham Young. After President Young told him that he believed astrology was true, Phelps wrote to Young, ‘I believe I did wrong in saying I did not know what astrology was . . . so I will now say that astrology is one of the sciences belonging to the holy Priesthood perverted by vain man.’” Whittaker, 112-113, n. 50.

20 Improvement Era, (1948).

21 See n. 16 on previous page. In January 1857, the Utah Territorial Legislature created an office of Superintendent of Meteorological Observations and appointed Phelps as its first superintendent. Whittaker, 103. This may have fostered renewed discussion about the place of astrology in Mormon thinking, which Young then favored.

Studies—FARMS) fosters the idea that Evangelical Christians rehash the same old worn-out statements and quotations that have been published for decades.\textsuperscript{23} Apparently, the reasoning is that if a quotation can be labeled as boring, with a yawn for emphasis, then it no longer needs to be answered or even acknowledged.

However, merely closing one’s eyes to it does not make it go away. One reason why Evangelical Christians often repeat the same theme is simply because each time they have a new audience. By analogy, one would be remiss to condemn a school teacher as boring because he or she teaches the same lessons without considering that each year it is also a new audience. The same is true among Evangelicals who compare Christianity with competing religious truth claims.

God the Father is a resurrected mortal man who was born on another planet.

The Mormon view that God progressed from a man to an exalted Being is different from anything found in the history of Christianity. In proper theology, the nature and attributes of God are perfect and absolute. We call God immutable for good reason, since he himself declared, “I am the LORD, I change not” (Malachi 3:6).\textsuperscript{24} God does not change with time, he does not grow older (Psalm 102:26) or learn new things (Psalm 139:1-6) or become more powerful (Matthew 19:26). He is immutable. This prevents him from becoming a lying, evil, or unholy being, which is impossible, according to (Hebrews 6:17-18).

Mormonism supersedes biblical teachings with new revelation about God. In the Doctrine and Covenants, Joseph Smith wrote, “The Father has a body of flesh and bones as tangible as man’s . . .” (130:22). His revelatory powers were on full display when he preached one of his most famous sermons, the King Follett Discourse. In it, he told Latter-day Saints that their God began with a human body like theirs. Smith said, “I will go back to the beginning before the world was, to show what kind of a being God is . . . God himself, the Father of us all, dwelt on an earth, the same as Jesus Christ himself did.”\textsuperscript{25} In this April 7, 1844, funeral sermon, Joseph Smith revealed that God the Father was a man from another earthlike planet.

The planet where God the Father was born and grew up, where he “dwell on an earth,” is not Kolob. Kolob is the planet mentioned in the Book of Abraham as “nigh unto the throne of God” (Abraham 3:9). The planet where the Father was born remained a mystery to many Mormons. If we look back to the mid-1850s, we will find that the name of the Father’s birth planet was known by quite a number of Latter-day Saints. In fact, all subscribers and readers of the Deseret Almanac knew about it. Phelps made the following statements on the daily calendar about Teman being the planet where God the Father was born, reared, and worshiped a god who preceded him. In poetic form, he wrote,

God, like man, has a spirit,
God was a man and came from Teman.
(Deseret Almanac, 1852, 7).

The following two statements are in the same edition where Teman is mentioned:

\begin{quote}
OUR FATHER IN THE HEAVENS.
. . . Then our Father in his youth,
Came from Teman full of truth . . .
(Deseret Almanac, 1852, 8)
\end{quote}

PHILOSOPHY OF THE HEAVENS.
. . . Every world “rolls on its wings,” and is controlled by a God . . .
—and, as quick as sight or thought, a look, a sign, or a hint to God in Kolob, Teman, or any glorified kingdom, brings assistance, that earth and hell cannot demonstrate.
(Deseret Almanac, 1852, 37)

Phelps wrote that preexistent spirit babies lived on Kolob. Teman, though, is where God keeps records.

24 The immutability (changelessness) of God is itself a divine attribute. It is based upon both observations of his nature in Scripture and his self-declaration. The word “immutable” is used twice in Hebrews 6:17-18, to declare God’s absoluteness in his decrees and nature. God, in Malachi 3:6 states it strongly, “I change not,” and Hebrews 1:10-12 tells us that He remains the same.

Call, O call me back to Kolob,
When the resurrection’s pass’d!
For I love my Father’s garden—
Where the first will be the last:—
(Deseret Almanac, 1854, 6)

In his mansion with my mother
As I sat upon her knee—
Sacred records kept in “Teman,”
Till the flesh has conquered sin,—
By the Priesthood, faith and virtue.
Then I’ll know them all again!
(Deseret Almanac, 1854, 8)

Brigham Young also taught that the Father came from Teman. In a sermon, found in the Journal of Discourses, Young used a verse from Habakkuk as his proof that God is a man:

Our former religious traditions has taught us that our Father in heaven has no tabernacle, that his center is everywhere and his circumference nowhere. Yet we read that “God came from Teman, and the Holy One from Mount Paran.” . . . The idea that the Lord our God is not a personage of tabernacle is entirely a mistaken notion. He was once a man. (9:286)

A search of Mormon books on DVD databases produces little information about the Father’s birth planet, but it seemed popular in the nineteenth century. The verse that Young uses from Habakkuk has nothing to do with a star or planet. The verse speaks of Teman as a place to the south of Israel. Biblical commentaries have identified Teman as Africa. It began as an individual’s name in the Old Testament (Genesis 36:11). His posterity built dwelling places to the south of Israel, which was later called Teman. It has nothing to do with a fixed star and certainly nothing to do with a planet where the Father was born.

God the Father had a Father God before him, who is Jesus’ grandfather god.

In the article below, Phelps synthesized the Book of Abraham with Smith’s teaching about the Father’s god, who is Jesus’ grandfather god. This is based upon a false reading of Habakkuk 3:3.

BIBLE ASTRONOMY.

The nearest “fixed star” must be Mount Paran, mentioned by Habakkuk, the fruitful world of glory where the “Holy One” came from; or rather Kolob, where our Father in the Heavens resides in the midst of his glory and kingdoms.

The next nearest “fixed star,” also mentioned by Habakkuk, must be Teman, the world of perfection where God came from to do the works of his Father, spoken of by John the Revelator, (Rev. 1:6,) which Father of God, and grand father of Jesus Christ, must now be living in one of the eternity of eternities—which closes the Lord’s prayer in the Greek version, and is mentioned by John, (Rev. 19—3, &c.) (Deseret Almanac, 1852, page 5. Jesus’ grandfather god.)

Joseph Smith claimed that God the Father had a Father when he was on his earthlike planet. Smith used Revelation 1:6 (And hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father:) to support his idea, which Phelps repeated. However, Smith misread the King James Version in Revelation 1:6 and did not check his rendering of it against the Greek New Testament. Smith and Phelps are reading it as two persons, “God and his Father,” whereas the Greek New Testament text has one definite article, indicating one person, which is properly translated as “His God and Father.”

Joseph Smith contradicts his earlier rendering with his “Joseph Smith Translation” on Revelation 1:6. When he had the opportunity to call attention to the two gods that he preached in 1844, from Rev. 1:6, he instead translated it as one God: “And hath made us kings and priest unto God, his Father: to Him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.” Smith removed the word “and,” making both “God” and “Father” descriptions of one person.

God the Father is married to a celestial goddess wife, the Queen of Heaven, also known as Mother God in Mormonism.

The Mother God doctrine in Mormonism is an elusive one. Only in recent years have we seen more sincere, open and frank discussions about the Father’s heavenly wife among Mormons. Most quotations about her, though few, were indirect and were implied with vague terms, like “heavenly parents.” The most popular and perhaps boldest quotation is the third stanza of the 160-year-old hymn, “O My Father,” penned by Eliza Snow in October 1845, and it remains in the Mormon hymnal today:

In the heavens are parents single?
No; the thought makes reason stare!
Truth is reason, truth eternal
Tells me I’ve a mother there.²⁷

Phelps, whose doctrinal input is the core of our study, wrote a hymn about Mother God a year ahead of Snow, he indirectly wrote of her in the Times and Seasons, but by the end of 1844, he was calling her the Father’s partner, “Mother, the Queen,” in a hymn sung during the dedication of the Nauvoo Seventies Hall, in December 1844:²⁸

Come to me; here’s the myst’ry that man hath not seen:
Here’s our Father in heaven, and Mother, the Queen,
Here are worlds that have been, and the worlds yet to be:
Here’s eternity,—endless; amen: Come to me.²⁹

Still, aside from Snow’s popular hymn, there are two often-quoted General Authorities who published books that included Mother God up to the mid-1900s, Apostle James E. Talmage, in 1901, and Milton Hunter, a member of the First Council of Seventy, in 1945.

³⁰ Talmage, in his exposition of the LDS Articles of Faith, wrote, “Neither of the sexes is complete in itself as a counterpart of Deity. We are expressly told that God is the Father of spirits, and to apprehend the literalness of this solemn truth we must know that a mother of spirits is an existent personality.”³¹

³² Hunter wrote, “The stupendous truth of the existence of a Heavenly Mother, as well as a Heavenly Father, became established facts in Mormon theology.”³³ In later years, he added, “Thus males were created in the image and likeness of God the Eternal Father while the females were formed in the image and likeness of God their Eternal Mother.”³⁴ Other than that, the discussions were privileged and infrequent, intended for the faithful Saints at LDS Conferences or faithful readers of Improvement Era and Ensign.

It was not until the more open years in the last half of the twentieth century that we find candid references to Mother God, especially in topical references, like the Encyclopedia of Mormonism (1992) and Bruce R. McConkie’s Mormon Doctrine (1966), where each devoted an entry to her. By the twenty-first century, we find Mormon publications venturing into the discussion along with books by Mormon women of a feminist flair.³⁵ None are quite as authoritative as the official website of the LDS Church, where an essay directly referenced her in 2014.³⁶ Earlier published references have been scant to say the best of them. The exception is the Deseret Almanac of the mid-1850s, which provide six published and circulated direct quotations about her.

There are three views of “the Queen of Heaven” among Mormon writers. One is in the doctrinal sense, where the Queen of Heaven is Mother God. The other two are condemned as pagan by Mormons, both in Jeremiah’s day, where the people worshiped the Queen of Heaven, and in the Christian era, where Catholics venerate Mary as the Queen of Heaven. Returning to the former, the sense in which Mormons believe that it describes Mother God, this originated in Nauvoo, in 1844, with Phelps’ Times and Seasons hymn and the following article.

²⁷ Originally under the title “My Father in Heaven,” it was published in the Mormon periodical, Times and Seasons 6 (15 November 1845): 1039; and it entered the Mormon hymnal in 1851. So beloved is her hymn that it has been quoted in a few LDS Conference speeches by General Authorities as a reference. Other General Authorities have quoted her in their books when discussing Mother God in a more genteel manner, as “heavenly parents.”

³¹ Milton R. Hunter, Gospel Through the Ages (Salt Lake City: Deseret Book Co., 1945), 104.

A letter by William Smith, one of Joseph Smith's brothers, dated November 10, 1844, was published in the Times and Seasons by the editor, John Taylor, an Apostle at the time. W. W. Phelps was assigned to answer it, which he did on December 25, 1844. In his answer, we find Mother God referred to twice as the Queen of Heaven in an official LDS periodical. These two periodicals precede the Deseret Almanac by ten years.

Phelps expanded on this idea in an 1852 Deseret Almanac article entitled, “The Eternal Mother.” Below is the first article solely devoted to Mother God in Mormonism.

THE ETERNAL MOTHER.

The 11th chapter and 7th verse of Job, rightly rendered from the original Hebrew, reads:—“Who has searched out God? Canst thou find out the Eternal Mother? Canst thou find out the perfection of the Almighty?”

All right; spiritually or temporally, there cannot be a father without a mother, in truth, to continue the ad infinitum of lives,—except the sectarian god, who has neither body, parts, or passions; he has no wife, and, of course, he had no mother. “Oh gracious!” inquires the philosophising [sic] granny, “where did he come from?” “Why,” replies the King’s Jester, “maybe he is one of the Misses Lucifer’s come-by-chances.” Now hush, you,—slanderizing the Prince of this world’s family. Hush! (Deseret Almanac, 1852, 32)

Notice here that Phelps found it irresistible to take shots at the biblical God because we, as Christians, do not teach that the Father has a body, a wife, and a mother. He then ridiculed Christianity as an entity by calling us Lucifer’s family, “the Prince of this world’s family.” In this article, he agrees with Joseph Smith that the Father had a Father, but he goes further by opening up a succession of Mother Gods; the Father had a Mother too.

Prior to this, in the 1851 issue, he asked “Who is the Queen of Heaven?” His answer followed, “The King’s wife” (Deseret Almanac, 1851, 9). Then in the calendar “fillers” for the following year, he added, “there are Kings, there are Queens . . . The Queen of heaven hath a husband” (Deseret Almanac, 1852, 10, 13). We further find a blessing by the Heavenly Parents upon their Son, “the blessing of the King and Queen of heaven, upon their Son, before he came down, upon his mission . . .” (Deseret Almanac, 1854, 24). Phelps, who adapted well to prose and poetry, wrote a short blurb about “The Epitome of Truth.” In it, he includes, among other things, “The Virtues of the Queens of Heaven” (Deseret Almanac, 1855, 20).

No current Mormon writer credits Phelps with the origin of his 1852 statement, “There cannot be a father without a mother,” yet it has been often quoted in Mormon speeches and was included in Bruce R. McConkie’s Doctrinal New Testament Commentary, 2:159.

Polytheism—the belief that many gods exist and man can become a god.

One does not have to worship multiple gods in order to be a polytheist. All one has to do is recognize the existence of more than one god and, by definition, one is a poly-theist. Everything we have seen so far, the Father’s Father, the Father’s Mother, the Father’s wife, and the heavenly Kings and Queens, speak of polytheism, which doctrine is rejected by the Bible. Jews, and therefore Christians, are strictly monotheists. Both the Old and New Testaments attest to this. If one God exists without compromising the terms, then everything discussed so far in Mormonism falls woefully short of the truth. Consider these verses:

> Know therefore this day, and consider it in thine heart, that the LORD he is God in heaven above, and upon the earth beneath: there is none else. (Deuteronomy 4:39)

> Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD. (Deuteronomy 6:4)

> Ye are my witnesses, saith the LORD, and my servant whom I have chosen: that ye may know and believe me, and understand that I am he: before me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after me. (Isaiah 43:10)

> Fear ye not, neither be afraid: have not I told thee from that time, and have declared it? Ye are even my witnesses. Is there a God beside me? yea, there is no God; I know not any. (Isaiah 44:8)
And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel; The Lord our God is one Lord. (Mark 12:29)

Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe, and tremble. (James 2:19)

Whether one calls it polytheism or plural gods, it is the same. We begin with another short article by Phelps in which he not only promotes polytheism, but he claims that Virgil was a Mormon!

Virgil a Mormon.

Virgil, the poet, who was born 70 years before Christ, and flourished and died before the birth of Jesus, represents the Great Apollo, speaking from the heavens, and addressing a youth thus:

“Macie nova virtute puer, sic itur ad astra;
“Dis genite, et geniture Deos.”

Imitated in English thus:

Go on in virtue, boy;
so is the way to the stars;
You were begotten by the gods, and gods by you must be begot.

(Deseret Almanac, 1852, 32)

Salvation belongs to saved beings—but exaltation belongs to the Gods. (Deseret Almanac, 1853, 7)

Light is as the great ocean of the Gods, for the commerce of the heavens, without attraction or gravity. (Deseret Almanac, 1853, 13)

Economy in labor, economy in land, economy in living, economy in salvation, economy in heaven, and economy with God, constitute one portion of glory, that is as infinite and eternal and perpetually progressive, as the perfections of the Gods, which increase with the ceaseless rounds of existences. (Deseret Almanac, 1854, 12)

The Book of Abraham as translated by Joseph Smith, gives seven thousand years for the creation by the Gods. (Almanac, 1860, 22)

Zion Is the house of the Gods, said Obadiah. (Almanac, 1864, 26)

Preexistent spirit-children and Mary’s other husband, God.

In Mormonism, the Father was once a mortal and evidently retains procreative powers in his resurrected, exalted state. He procreates children in heaven with his wife, among whom Jesus was the firstborn and Lucifer was the second (cf. Book of Moses 1:13), and everyone else followed. The term “sired” is used frequently in Mormonism to describe the sexual procreative act of the Father begetting spirit children in heaven and siring the body of Jesus on earth. Of Jesus’ preexistence, Phelps wrote, “...he had a Father and Mother in heaven” (Deseret Almanac, 1854, 22).

In a search of the word sired, as used in a database of Mormon books, it is used seven times to represent God the Father begetting us through his goddess wife, as preexistent spirit children and twice of him siring the preexistent Jesus. (LDS Collectors Library, 2005)

The word sired is used nineteen times to describe the Father siring the body of Jesus on earth through Mary, which is why two early Mormons, Brigham Young and Orson Pratt, legitimized it by claiming that the Father was married to Mary, as her other husband. Now we have another source stating the same thing, from the Deseret Almanac. This was not a hidden doctrine in the 1850s. It was published widely through The Seer, by Pratt, Young’s sermons (Journal of Discourses), and the Deseret Almanac, by Phelps.

Phelps stated, “God was married, or how could he beget his Son Jesus Christ lawfully, and do the works of his father?” (Deseret Almanac, 1853, 7). In other words, had the Father not been married to Mary, then their child Jesus would have been illegitimate. This accords perfectly with what Young and Pratt said on the same subject, but Phelps and the Deseret Almanac would have been first to publish it, which makes Apostle Pratt and Prophet Young following his lead.37

Adam and the Garden of Eden in Missouri.

In the preexistence, according to some Mormon writers, Adam (some say all of us) helped to make the earth. It is taught among the Mormons that the earth is a copy of another planet. Everything was brought here in seed form and planted, often referred to as first spiritual then temporal. The Deseret Almanac clarifies it, “Who is the ‘oldest inhabitant?’ Adam, according to the Bible. Where did Adam get his seed for the garden of Eden? Brought it from his father’s garden. Earthly things are pattern’d after heavenly” (1853, 8).

Adam planted seeds in the earth, particularly in the Garden of Eden that was located in today’s Missouri, and he lived there for nearly 1,000 years. The council of Gods sent Adam to the earth, “English bids fair, to become the great, last, and best, till the Lord restores a ‘pure language,’ even the one that Adam brought from Kolob, or the celestial garden, when he came to this globe and gave names to all,—according to the council of the Gods in the ‘elder world’” (Deseret Almanac, 1853, 14). Phelps also stated, “Adam, in Adam-ondi-Ahman [Missouri], held a blessing meeting, and blessed his children—aged 997 years, three years previous to his death” (Deseret Almanac, 1852, 38).

In this article, Phelps is praising the strengths of the United States in relationship to the Bible. He states that Adam lived in what is now the United States, as did Enoch, and Noah, where he also built his ark. He wrote:

The land where the “United States” once flourished as a free government for the good of mankind, was a “choice land” beyond the common knowledge of the world. Upon that land was planted the Garden of Eden, before Satan brought sin along to try virtue. Upon that land, Adam offered sacrifice, repented, was baptized, received the gift of the Holy Ghost, raised a large family by Eve. Upon that land, Enoch built up Zion, which was translated to heaven. Upon that land, Noah built the Ark, which saved some of all flesh for the present world. (Almanac, 1862, 30)

Condemnation of the Bible.

The eighth Article of Faith in the LDS Church states, “We believe the Bible to be the word of God as far as it is translated correctly; we also believe the Book of Mormon to be the word of God.” Notice that doubt is cast only upon the Bible, but not upon the Book of Mormon. The Book of Mormon fostered skepticism about the Bible in several places, so it is no wonder that Mormons question the Bible.38 The Almanac states it with these words:

37 Orson Pratt wrote, “The Father and Mother of Jesus, according to the flesh, must have been associated together in the capacity of Husband and Wife; hence the Virgin Mary must have been, for the time being, the lawful wife of God the Father…Inasmuch as God was the first husband to her, it may be that He only gave her to be the wife of Joseph while in this mortal state,” (“Celestial Marriage,” in The Seer, vol. 1, no. 10 (October 1853), 158. Young made his declaration August 19, 1866, “The man Joseph, the husband of Mary, did not, that we know of, have more than one wife, but Mary the wife of Joseph had another husband. On this account infidels have called the Savior a bastard.” (Journal of Discourses, 11:268). Young and Pratt use both arguments that Phelps used, the Father was Mary’s husband to prevent Jesus from being illegitimate.

38 Cf., 1 Nephi 29:3-6; 29:10.
TRANSLATORS’ BLUNDERS.
The Bible contains a great many blunders which causes the unlearned to doubt the divine authority of revelation. The Book of Mormon, the Saints true interpreter, says, all the most plain and precious parts of Scripture were taken away—by the translators. (Almanac, 1861, 22)

People on the sun, moon, and stars.

There have been statements made from the time of Joseph Smith to Brigham Young, claiming that there were inhabitants of the moon and the sun. Young said, “Who can tell us of the inhabitants of this little planet that shines of an evening, called the moon? . . . when you inquire about the inhabitants of that sphere you find that the most learned are as ignorant in regard to them as the ignorant of their fellows. So it is in regard to the inhabitants of the sun. Do you think it is inhabited? I rather think it is. Do you think there is any life there? No question of it; it was not made in vain.”

This was not an uncommon thought in the nineteenth century. As a church publication, though, we would not expect such speculation. The Deseret Almanac references people on the sun, “Now who lives in the sun? Now Sects! Wonder! Philosophers stare!” (1852, 13). The almanac had even more to say about the inhabitants of the moon, who view the earth through their telescopes and read by the light of the earth:

THE MOON.

Every one, perhaps, is not aware how the earth appears to the inhabitants of the Moon. As more than three fifths of the earth is covered with water, and being nearly 13 times larger than the moon, a full earth must be a grand sight! The earth light there must be sufficient to read and work by. Again, as the moon always keeps the same side to the earth, those who live on the back side, must naturally enjoy themselves in taking pleasure rides to the Frontiers, to view through their telescopes, and Urim and Thumims, the earth’s grandeur, and glory, and some of the curiosities of their next worldly neighbors.

Aside from our neighboring planets in this solar system, the distant stars are also inhabited, “The stars are worlds of people” (Deseret Almanac, 1853, 5). Phelps also taught the “Priesthood” presides “over the planets and stars, and their beings, forever . . . to the millions of worlds and their people, forever” (Deseret Almanac, 1851, 3).

Racist statements about Indians and Blacks.

The Book of Mormon presents the world with the idea that sinfulness directly influences skin tone. The Book of Mormon divides people into two classes, white and dark. It classifies one group of people as “white, exceedingly fair, and delightful,” the Nephites (2 Nephi 5:21). The other group, “a dark, and loathsome, and a filthy people, full of idleness and all manner of abominations,” who are the Lamanites (1 Nephi 12:23). These people were cursed by God with dark skin, “the Lord God did cause a skin of blackness to come upon them” (2 Nephi 5:21).

Joseph Smith added the same concept to the Book of Moses, with a racist curse upon Blacks, “and there was a blackness came upon all the children of Canaan, that they were despised among all people . . . the seed of Cain were black, and had not place among them” (Book of Moses 7:8, 22).

The almanacs also carried the racist idea that Lamanites and Blacks are cursed with dark skin, “What Makes the difference in color among men? Transgressions of crime” (Deseret Almanac, 1851, 9). And, Phelps published this poem at the brink of the Civil War, in 1860:

> And then, alas! Ham’s Canaan,
> So dark—must dig (ah me !)
> The “’servants’ servant,” be
> The under stock of ages
> —Still cursed, and black.
> (Almanac, 1860, 28)

Conclusion:

There was a wealth of information to mine from these almanacs that have rarely been cited in any works. The usefulness of these quotations is not so much a question of their authority to speak for the LDS Church, though they were distributed through the Tithing Office, but they show us that some of the teachings that circulated in the mid-1800s were not isolated statements or random thoughts. They were teachings that were left in a record that sheds light upon the Mormon thinking and culture of the day.

Problems in the LDS Essays on Plural Marriage

The startling headline in the New York Times read “It’s Official: Mormon Founder Had Up to 40 Wives.” The article explained:

Mormon leaders have acknowledged for the first time that the church’s founder and prophet, Joseph Smith, portrayed in church materials as a loyal partner to his loving spouse Emma, took as many as 40 wives, some already married and one only 14 years old.

The church’s disclosures, in a series of essays online, are part of an effort to be transparent about its history at a time when church members are increasingly encountering disturbing claims about the faith on the Internet.

Further on in the Times article we read:

Most of Smith’s wives were between the ages of 20 and 40, the essay says, but he married Helen Mar Kimball, a daughter of two close friends, “several months before her 15th birthday.” A footnote says that according to “careful estimates,” Smith had 30-40 wives.

The biggest bombshell for some in the essays is that Smith married women who were already married, some to men who were Smith’s friends and followers.

Prior to the New York Times article, many Latter-day Saints had not heard of the new Gospel Topics essays posted on the official LDS web site. One Mormon man, who recently came to our ministry to visit, told how this was the first he knew about the number of Joseph Smith’s wives, their ages and that some were already married to other men. This launched him on a journey of discovery to learn what else the LDS Church had failed to mention during his lifetime, and now he is contemplating leaving the church. This is not an isolated event.

The unwelcomed attention drawn to Joseph Smith’s life, along with a number of other media articles about Smith’s many wives, may explain the sudden drop in the references to Joseph Smith in the recent April 2015 LDS Conference.

Gospel Topics Essays

Starting in 2013 the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has issued a number of essays dealing with controversial aspects of their history on their web site, www.lds.org, under the heading of Gospel Topics. At the October 2013 LDS Conference, Dieter Uchtdorf, second Counselor to LDS President Thomas S. Monson, acknowledged:

Some struggle with unanswered questions about things that have been done or said in the past. We openly acknowledge that in nearly 200 years of Church history—along with an uninterrupted line of inspired, honorable and divine events—there have been some things said and done that could cause people to question. . . . And, to be perfectly frank there have been times when members or leaders in the Church have simply made mistakes. There may have been things said or done that were not in harmony with our values, principles, or doctrine.

Unfortunately, Mr. Uchtdorf failed to inform us as to the nature of these “mistakes.” However, one may speculate that he was referring to the problems covered in the recent LDS essays. One of these topics is polygamy.

From the 1830s to the present there have been charges of immorality leveled against Mormonism’s founder, Joseph Smith. While Smith repeatedly denied having relationships with any women other than his legal wife, the LDS Church is now being more open about his multiple marriages.

Over the last two years the LDS Church has posted four essays on the topic of polygamy:
1. Plural Marriage in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints
2. Plural Marriage in Kirtland and Nauvoo
3. Plural Marriage and Families in Early Utah
4. The Manifesto and the End of Plural Marriage

While it is encouraging to see LDS leaders be more forthright about their troubled past, the essays still maintain a fog over the more troubling aspects.

In this article we will address a few of the major problems in the four LDS essays. While we do not intend to go through the essays line by line, a closer look at the opening article demonstrates the careful massaging of the story.

Essay: Plural Marriage in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

The first sentence states: “Latter-day Saints believe that the marriage of one man and one woman is the Lord’s standing law of marriage.”

The misleading nature of this statement can be seen in the simple fact that the revelation commanding plural marriage, section 132 of the Doctrine and Covenants, is still a part of their scriptures, making it a part of their doctrine.

Also, men today are allowed to be sealed [married] to multiple women by marrying again in the temple after the death of a wife or after a divorce. At least two of the current LDS apostles have married in the temple after the death of their first wife: Dallin Oaks and Russell M. Nelson.

According to Mormon doctrine, these men will have both of their wives as eternal mates in the Celestial Kingdom. Since it is currently possible for a living LDS man to be sealed to multiple women, thus guaranteeing the practice of polygamy in heaven, it appears that the church is not committed to “one man, one woman.” Why don’t they just admit they still believe in the doctrine of plural marriage?

The next sentence is equally misleading: “In biblical times, the Lord commanded some to practice plural marriage—the marriage of one man and more than one woman.” However, the Bible does not record a single instance of God commanding a man to take additional wives. Yes, there are polygamists in the Old Testament, but not because of a religious doctrine or command from God, but because of the culture of the day. The LDS article gives a footnote to Genesis 16, where Sarah, who had been barren, tells Abraham to take her maid in order to have a child. However, the Bible says nothing about God commanding this but rather that “Abram hearkened to the voice of Sarai” (Genesis 16:2).

Genesis 16:5 makes it clear that Sarah had initiated the union: “And Sarai said unto Abram, my wrong be upon thee . . . ” On the other hand, Doctrine and Covenants 132:65 states: “. . . I, the Lord his God . . . commanded Abraham to take Hagar to wife.”

Although some of the kings mentioned in the Old Testament had many wives, Deuteronomy 17:17 condemned this practice: “Neither shall he [the king] multiply wives to himself that his heart turn not away . . . ” There is no mention in the New Testament of any of the apostles practicing polygamy. In fact, in 1 Timothy the bishops and deacons were instructed to be “the husband of one wife” (1 Timothy 3:2, 12). In Titus we find that elders are to be “the husband of one wife” (Titus 1:5, 6). Even the Book of Mormon says that polygamy is an abomination in Jacob 2:24 and 27:

> Behold, David and Solomon truly had many wives and concubines, which thing was abominable before me, saith the Lord. . . .

> Wherefore, my brethren, hear me, and hearken to the word of the Lord: For there shall not any man among you have it be one wife; and concubines he shall have none.

Another Old Testament statute that Joseph Smith broke was the prohibition against sexual relations with a mother and daughter or sisters. Smith married Patty Sessions and her daughter Sylvia, plus four sets of sisters, Zina and Presendia Huntington, Delcena and Almera Johnson, Sarah and Maria Lawrence and Emily and Eliza Partridge.

While polygamy, like slavery, was practiced by people in the Old Testament, there is nothing to indicate that it was a doctrine instituted by God.

1831 Polygamy Revelation

The LDS essay then states: “By revelation, the Lord commanded Joseph Smith to institute the practice of plural marriage among Church members in the early 1840s.”

While on the surface the statement is correct, it obscures the origins of Smith’s polygamy. In the essay Plural Marriage in Kirtland and Nauvoo, it is admitted that Joseph Smith had already received a revelation on polygamy as early as 1831, just a year after the founding of the LDS Church. However, the only 1831 revelation on the subject seems to be the one regarding married missionaries taking Native American wives. Historian Richard Van Wagoner observed:

> It is difficult to determine exactly when Joseph Smith first felt compelled to practice polygamy. W.W. Phelps recollected three decades after the fact in an 1861 letter to

Brigham Young that on 17 July 1831, when he and five others had gathered in Jackson County, Missouri, Smith stated: “It is my will, that in time, ye should take unto you wives of the Lamanites and Nephites [Native Americans], that their posterity may become white, delightsome and just.” Phelps added in a postscript that “about three years after this was given, I asked brother Joseph, privately, how ‘we,’ that were mentioned in the revelation could take wives of the ‘natives’ as we were all married men?” He claimed that Smith replied, “In the same manner that Abraham took Hagar and Keturah; and Jacob took Rachel, Bilhah and Zilpha, by Revelation.”

As far as we know, there were no marriages at that time between the LDS missionaries and the Native Americans. But it does show that Smith was open to polygamy even at this early date. Another factor that may have raised the question of polygamy in Smith’s mind was his recent work on his new version of the Bible, where he would have read about polygamy in Genesis.

1835 Doctrine and Covenants

Overlooked in the essays is an explanation of the denial of plural marriage in the 1835 Doctrine and Covenants, section 101:

In as much as this church of Christ has been reproached with the crime of fornication, and polygamy: we declare that we believe, that one man should have one wife; and one woman, but one husband, except in the case of death, when either is at liberty to marry again.

This denial may have been precipitated by rumors of Joseph Smith’s union with Fanny Alger, a teenager living in the Smith home between 1833 and 1836 in Ohio. While the LDS essay Plural Marriage in Kirtland and Nauvoo lists Fanny as Joseph’s first plural wife, there is no contemporary evidence that an actual marriage ceremony took place and Smith had not yet claimed the restoration of the keys supposedly necessary for sealings. Oliver Cowdery, one of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon and early church leader, was not aware of any religious meaning to the union, referring to Joseph’s coupling with Fanny as “a dirty, nasty, filthy affair.”

The essay on Kirtland states: “Little is known about this marriage, and nothing is known about the conversations between Joseph and Emma regarding Alger. After the marriage with Alger ended in separation, Joseph seems to have set the subject of plural marriage aside until after the Church moved to Nauvoo, Illinois.”

While there is no contemporary account of Joseph and Emma’s conversation, it seems clear that there was an argument which led to Emma expelling Fanny from the home. Fanny then went to stay with Chauncey Webb and his wife until further arrangements could be made. Mr. Webb later recounted “He [Joseph Smith] was sealed there [in Kirtland] secretly to Fanny Alger. Emma was furious and drove the girl, who was unable to conceal the consequences of her celestial relation with the prophet, out of her house.”

Public Denial

The 1835 section denouncing plural marriage was in every edition of the Doctrine and Covenants until 1876, when it was replaced by section 132, commanding polygamy. For forty-one years, during the main period of LDS polygamy, the official scriptures of the church contained a section condemning the practice. Yet Apostle John Taylor, speaking in France in 1850, denounced the charges that the Mormons practiced polygamy in Utah on the basis of the 1835 section on marriage. Europeans made decisions to join the Mormons and immigrate based on this 1835 denunciation of polygamy, only to arrive in Salt Lake and find polygamy preached from the pulpit and all the main LDS leaders married to multiple wives. Historian Richard Van Wagoner commented:

Though the Mormons were living in isolation [in Utah Territory], hundreds of miles from other settlements, their polygamous behavior became increasingly apparent to the outside world. Apostle John Taylor, for example husband to fifteen wives, defensively argued in July 1850 during a public discussion in Boulogne-sur-Mer, France, that “we are accused of polygamy, and actions the most indecent, obscene and disgusting, such that none but a corrupt and depraved heart could have contrived. These things are too outrageous to admit of belief. . . . I shall content myself by reading our views of chastity and marriage, from a work published by us, containing some of the articles of our faith.”

At that point, LDS Apostle John Taylor read from section 101 of the 1835 Doctrine and Covenants denouncing plural marriage. With a dozen wives and eight children back in Utah Territory, Taylor was fully aware that he was lying to the people in France. Taylor seems to have been following Joseph Smith’s lead in lying about polygamy. In 1844, just weeks before his death, Joseph Smith publicly denied plural marriage:

What a thing it is for a man to be accused of committing adultery, and having seven wives, when I can only find one. I am the same man, and as innocent as I was fourteen years ago; and I can prove them all perjurers.”

Keep in mind, even the LDS essay Plural Marriage in Kirtland and Nauvoo concedes Smith had 30-40 wives at this time, most of whom were probably sitting in the audience that day. The essay on Nauvoo goes on to state: “The rumors prompted members and leaders to issue carefully worded denials that denounced spiritual wifery and polygamy but were silent about what Joseph and others saw as divinely mandated ‘celestial’ plural marriage.” This demonstrates the double-speak of the early leaders. By carefully defining what Joseph and his leaders were doing as “celestial” marriage they could then publicly deny “polygamy” as though they were two totally different things. If a member entered plural marriage without Joseph’s approval he could be denounced for practicing “polygamy.” Yet it was not just a case of being “silent” about the doctrine of plural marriage, Joseph was specifically denying he had multiple wives.

Smith’s Children?

The first essay then turns to the Book of Mormon, Jacob 2:30, for a justification of plural marriage, to “raise up seed” unto the Lord. In the essay on plural marriage in Kirtland and Nauvoo it states:

> Marriage performed by priesthood authority meant that the procreation of children and perpetuation of families would continue into the eternities. Joseph Smith’s revelation on marriage declared that the “continuation of the seeds forever and ever” helped to fulfill God’s purposes for His children.

Yet, this doesn’t seem to have been Smith’s goal as he evidently only fathered a few children by his plural wives. Mary Elizabeth Rollins Lightner, one of Smith’s wives, stated:

> I know he had six wives and I have known some of them from childhood up. I know he had three children. They told me. I think two are living today but they are not known as his children as they go by other names.17

Lucy Walker Kimball, one of Smith’s teenage brides, also gave a statement years after moving to Utah Territory:

> . . . I consented to become the Prophet’s wife, and was married to him May 1, 1843, Elder William Clayton officiating. I am also able to testify that Emma Smith, the prophet’s first wife, gave her consent to the marriage of at least four other girls to her husband, and that she was well aware that he associated with them as wives within the meaning of all that word implies. This is proven by the fact that she herself, on several occasions, kept guard at the door to prevent disinterested persons from intruding, when these ladies were in the house.18

Notice, Lucy did not say Emma consented to her marriage to Smith. The four girls she refers to would have been the Partridge and Lawrence sisters. Joseph convinced 17-year-old Lucy to marry him while her father was away on a mission and Emma was on a trip to St. Louis.19 Historian Todd Compton gave this background on their marriage: “Lucy was another young wife of Smith—he proposed to her when she was fifteen or sixteen. In her story we find the familiar pattern of the teenage girl living in the Mormon leader’s house, whom Joseph then approaches and marries.”20

Further on in his book, Compton explains that Smith’s proposal was presented to Lucy as something that would bring her “damnation” if she refused. It was a “command of God” to her. Lucy later recalled:

> I felt at this moment that I was called to place myself upon the altar a living Sacrifice, perhaps to brook the world in disgrace and incur the displeasure and contempt of my youthful companions; all my dreams of happiness blown to the four winds, this was too much, the thought was unbearable.21

Compton observed: “Like Helen Mar at the age of fourteen, Lucy thought of her peer group and of the disaster that polygamy would bring to her teenage dreams.”22

In their recent book, LDS historians Brian and Laura Hales discuss possible children born to Smith’s plural wives:

> An account from Lucy Meserve Smith, wife of Apostle George A. Smith, recalls that her husband, “related to me the circumstance of calling on the Prophet one evening about 11 o’clock, and he was out on the porch with a basin of water washing his hands, I said to him what is up, said Joseph one of my wives has just been confined and Emma was midwife and I have been assisting her. He said she had granted a no. [number] of women for him.”

> A daughter [of Joseph Smith], Josephine Lyon, was born to plural wife Sylvia Sessions in 1844. Josephine is likely the only offspring to live to adulthood. . . . There is evidence that a child was born to Olive Frost who did not live long or may have miscarried. In addition, at least eighteen other children have been promoted as the Prophet’s progeny. DNA testing has been performed for six of the eighteen who were most likely to be Joseph’s children. The results have all been negative. The other claims suffer from multiple weaknesses and appear to be based primarily upon unverifiable rumors.23

It should also be noted that Sylvia Sessions, Josephine’s mother, was already married to a Mormon at the time she secretly married Joseph Smith in polygamy.

In footnote 29 of the Plural Marriage in Kirtland and Nauvoo essay it is estimated that the number of married women Joseph Smith took as wives “range from 12 to 14.”

21 Ibid.
22 Ibid.
Mormons try to defend this by claiming that he did not cohabitate with the married wives. However, since Smith consummated his marriage with Sylvia Sessions, there is no reason to think he didn’t consummate his other sealings to married women.

The Nauvoo essay gives this defense of Smith taking married women as wives:

Joseph Smith’s sealings to women already married may have been an early version of linking one family to another. In Nauvoo, most if not all of the first husbands seem to have continued living in the same household with their wives during Joseph’s lifetime, and complaints about these sealings with Joseph Smith are virtually absent from the documentary record.

First, his sealing to the women would mean the legal husband would be cut out of the eternal “linking” and only the men’s wives would be a part of Smith’s family. Second, the fact that we don’t have any complaints about this from the husbands during Joseph’s lifetime is no reason to accept the arrangement as from God. The essay continues:

These sealings may also be explained by Joseph’s reluctance to enter plural marriage because of the sorrow it would be to his wife Emma. He may have believed that sealings to married women would comply with the Lord’s command without requiring him to have normal marriage relationships. This could explain why, according to Lorenzo Snow, the angel reprimanded Joseph for having “demurred” on plural marriage even after he had entered into the practice. After this rebuke, according to this interpretation, Joseph returned primarily to sealings with single women.

This rationale overlooks the fact that Smith had already broken Emma’s heart with his first affair/marriage with Fanny Alger in the 1830s. Also, Smith’s marriages to teenagers was traumatic for Emma, caused numerous arguments, and the husbands during Joseph’s lifetime are no reason to accept the arrangement as from God. The essay continues:

When the family organization was revealed from heaven—the patriarchal order of God, and Joseph began on the right and on the left, to add to his family, what a quaking there was in Israel. Says one brother to another, “Joseph says all covenants are done away, and none are binding but the new covenants; now suppose Joseph should come and say he wanted your wife, what would you say to that!” “I would tell him to go to hell.” This was the spirit of many in the early days of this Church.

What would a man of God say, who felt aright, when Joseph asked him . . . “I want your wife?” “O yes,” he would say, “here she is, there are plenty more.” . . . Did the prophet Joseph want every man’s wife he asked for? He did not.24

The reason there were so few children born to Smith’s plural wives remains a debate. Often a Mormon will insist that Joseph Smith did not have intercourse with his wives, maintaining that these marriages were only for the hereafter. Yet, several women and relatives left statements that these marriages were consummated. Benjamin F. Johnson, a personal friend of Joseph Smith, told of Smith’s 1843 marriage to his sister Almera and confirmed that the marriage included physical relations. Compton provides this information:

Benjamin gave some of the details of the actual marriage ceremony: “Meanwhile the Prophet with Louisa Beeman [Joseph’s plural wife] and my Sister Delcena [another plural wife] had it agreeably arranged with sister Almara and after a little instruction, She Stood by the Prophets Side & was Sealed to him as a wife by Brother Clayton. After which the Prophet asked me to take my Sister to occupy Room No 10 in his Mansion Home during her Stay in the City. . . .

Almera and Benjamin returned to Macedonia on about April 23. Smith visited Ramus again on May 16. “The Prophet again Came and at my house occupied the Same Room & Bed with my Sister that the month previous he had occupied with the Daughter of the Late Bishop Partridge as his wife,” Benjamin wrote.25

Brian and Laura Hales admit that Joseph “may have consummated at least twelve of his plural marriages.”26 Given the reticence of most people to speak of sexual encounters in the 1800s, it is amazing that there are statements confirming that Smith consummated at least a third of his marriages. With such admissions, why shouldn’t we assume he consummated most, if not all, of the marriages?

Given the fact that all the marriages were clandestine and any time spent together would likely have been emotionally charged with fear of detection, would this hinder conception? With almost 40 secret wives, how often could Smith have intercourse with them? Were all of Smith’s teenage wives mature enough to conceive? Did Smith’s wives use some sort of birth control or have abortions? Were some children raised in other homes? Due to the limited number of historical records, these questions may never be fully answered. But the question remains, if the justification for polygamy is to “raise up seed” why didn’t Joseph have more children?

14-YEAR-OLD GIRLS

The essay on Nauvoo polygamy concedes Smith’s marriage to 14-year-old Helen Mar Kimball, but refers to it as happening “several months before her 15th birthday.” Why the evasive wording? Are they embarrassed to simply say 14? But she wasn’t the only one. Joseph married another 14-year-old girl, Nancy Maria Winchester. There is some question if the marriage to Nancy happened before or after her 15th birthday in 1843. George Smith observes: “Whatever the exact date, Nancy holds the distinction, with Helen [Kimball] Whitney, of being one of the two youngest brides in Smith’s 26 Hales, Joseph Smith’s Polygamy, p. 68.

repertoire."27 Besides these two, Smith married approximately seventeen other women in 1843, when he was 37.28

Joseph Smith first approached Helen’s father, Heber C. Kimball, in 1842 about polygamy, before seeking Helen as a wife. Todd Compton explains:

The first chapter in the story of Smith, the Kimballs, and polygamy is that of Vilate’s offering, which Orson Whitney, Helen’s own son, recounted in his biography of Heber. In early 1842, apparently, Joseph approached Heber and made a stunning demand: “It was no less than a requirement for him to surrender his wife, his beloved Vilate, and give her to Joseph in Marriage!”29

After agonizing over this request for three days, Heber finally “led his darling wife to the Prophet’s house and presented her to Joseph.”30 Joseph then embraced Heber, telling him it was only a test of his faith. Nothing is known of Vilate’s response to Joseph’s request, but their reward for such obedience was the uniting of the couple in eternal marriage. Heber’s next test was Joseph’s demand that he take a plural wife and keep the information from Vilate. He was informed that if he refused to do this he would “lose his apostleship and be damned.”31

Months later Helen’s father, Heber, took her aside and told her about plural marriage, which incensed Helen: “The first impulse was anger . . . My sensibilities were painfully touched. I felt such a sense of personal injury and displeasure.” To soften Helen’s rebellion, Heber brought Sarah Ann, one of her girlfriends, to see her and introduced her as one of Joseph’s wives. Helen later wrote:

Having a great desire to be connected with the Prophet, Joseph, he [Helen’s father] offered me to him [Joseph], this I afterwards learned from the Prophet’s own mouth. My father had but one Ewe Lamb, but willingly laid her upon the alter: how cruel this seemed to the mother whose heartstrings were already stretched until they were ready to snap asunder, for he [Helen’s father] had taken Sarah Noon to wife & she thought she had made sufficient sacrifice but the Lord required more.32

LARGE FAMILIES?

The essay continues:

Plural marriage did result in the birth of large numbers of children within faithful Latter-day Saint homes. It also shaped 19th-century Mormon society in many ways: marriage became available to virtually all who desired it; . . .

First, Joseph Smith had as many as 40 wives yet this did not result in “large numbers of children.” Second, one must keep in mind that since there was not an imbalance of women to men these women would have been able to marry and produce the same number of children, if not more, in monogamous marriages. Mormon Apostle John A. Widtsoe admitted that there was no surplus of women:

Plural marriage has been a subject of wide and frequent comment. Members of the Church unfamiliar with its history, and many nonmembers, have set up fallacious reasons for the origin of this system of marriage among the Latter-day Saints. The most common of these conjectures is that the Church, through plural marriage sought to provide husbands for its large surplus of female members. The implied assumption in this theory, that there have been more female than male members in the Church, is not supported by existing evidence. On the contrary, there seems always to have been more males than females in the Church. . . .

The United States census records from 1850 to 1940, and all available Church records, uniformly show a preponderance of males in Utah, and in the Church. Indeed, the excess in Utah has usually been larger than for the whole United States, . . . Orson Pratt, writing in 1853 from direct knowledge of Utah conditions, when the excess of females was supposedly the highest, declares against the opinion that females outnumbered the males in Utah. . . .

Another conjecture is that the people were few in numbers and that the Church, desiring greater numbers, permitted the practice so that a phenomenal increase in population could be attained. This is not defensible, since there was no surplus of women.33

In a system with equal numbers of men and women, polygamy would not make marriage “available to virtually all who desired it.” Plural marriage would deny some men the ability to find even one wife. George D. Smith observed:

...Smith not only persuaded women to marry him, he convinced his closest male followers to expand their own families, adding more wives to their homes. This occurred within the last three years of Smith’s life... Over the next year and a half, under the direction of Brigham Young, plural marriages multiplied in Nauvoo so that by the time the Saints abandoned the city in 1846 there were about 200 male polygamists in the church with 700 plural wives added to their families.34

This imbalance would later cause one apostle to admonish the missionaries going to Europe to not select wives from the converts until they had arrived in Utah, to give all the men an equal chance to select a wife. Speaking to a group of departing missionaries in 1860, Apostle Heber C. Kimball declared:

Brethren, I want you to understand that it is not to be as it has been heretofore. The brother missionaries have been in the habit of picking out the prettiest women for themselves before they get here, and bringing on the ugly ones for us; hereafter you have to bring them all here before taking any of them, and let us have a fair shake.35

While Brigham Young married at least 55 wives, he fathered 57 children by only 16 women.36 Since the justification for plural marriages has always been to “raise up seed” one wonders why children weren’t born to some of the other women? One answer may lie in Brigham’s attitude towards his wives. Apostle Wilford Woodruff, who would later issue the famous Manifesto to end polygamy, gave the following account of Brigham Young’s sermon on March 23, 1857:

“their is many women that care more about their wives Husband sleeping with them than they do about God or his kingdom & if a man was to submit to such women he would not be worth shucks in building up the kingdom of God.[.] I have got some such women & I visit them on[c]e a year or once in 3 years as I please & they may go to heaven or Hell just as they please[.] I shall not turn away from the work of God for any woman.”37

Brigham Young’s attitude may explain why only 16 of his 55 wives had children. Obviously, raising up seed was not the first consideration in LDS polygamy. Brigham’s legal wife, Mary Ann Angel once remarked: “God will be very cruel if he does not give us poor women adequate compensation for the trials we have endured in polygamy.”38

POLYGAMY ILLegal

Further in the essay it states that “In Joseph Smith’s time, monogamy was the only legal form of marriage in the United States.” This raises the problem of Smith not only living in secret polygamy, denying it publicly and lying to his wife about it, but also breaking the laws of the land. Bigamy was specifically illegal in Illinois, where Smith had been sealed to approximately 35-40 women. In 1833 the state of Illinois passed a law making bigamy illegal:

[Typescript] Sec. 121. Bigamy consists in the having of two wives or two husbands at one and the same time, knowing that the former husband or wife is still alive. If any person or persons within this State, being married, or who shall hereafter marry, do at any time marry any person or persons, the former husband or wife being alive, the person so offending shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine, not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisoned in the penitentiary, not exceeding two years. It shall not be necessary to prove either of the said marriages by the register or certificate thereof, or other record evidence; but the same may be proved by such evidence as is admissible to prove a marriage in other cases, and when such second marriage shall have taken place without this state, cohabitation in this state after such second marriage shall be deemed the commission of the crime of bigamy, and the trial in such case may take place in the county where such cohabitation shall have occurred. (Revised Laws of Illinois, 1833, pp. 198-199)

Richard Van Wagoner provides the following information:

Polygamy, a criminal act under the 1833 Illinois Anti-bigamy Laws, was so unacceptable to monogamous nineteenth-century American society that Smith could introduce it only in absolute secrecy. Despite Smith’s explicit denials of plural marriage, stories of “spiritual wifery” had continued to spread.39

Smith’s polygamy would also have been at odds with his own 1831 revelation in the Doctrine and Covenants. Section 58:21 states: “Let no man break the laws of the land, for he that keepeth the laws of God hath no need to break the laws of the land.” Also, the LDS twelfth Article of Faith reads: “We believe in being subject to kings, presidents, rulers, and magistrates, in obeying, honoring, and sustaining the law.” Plural marriage was never legal in the United States or Utah Territory. The laws passed in the 1860s and 1870s regarding polygamy merely confirmed the already established position of monogamy in the United States.40

RESTORATION OF ALL THINGS

Joseph Smith’s polygamy is usually defended on the basis of restoring ancient principles. In the first essay we read:

Latter-day Saints understood that they were living in the latter days, in what the revelations called the “dispensation of the fulness of times.” Ancient principles—such as prophets, priesthood, and temples—would be restored to the earth. Plural marriage, practiced by ancient patriarchs like Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, was one of those ancient principles.

As we have seen earlier, there is no mention in the Bible of God commanding polygamy so there would hardly be any reason for it to be “restored.” If plural marriage was an “ancient principle” of God which needed to be restored, along with priesthood and temples, one wonders why its practice would be cancelled? The other elements mentioned are considered essential rites for today’s Latter-day Saints and necessary to achieve eternal life. Why wouldn’t polygamy fall under the same necessity?

CONCUBINES

Another curious part of Section 132 is the mention of concubines in verses 1 and 39. While Joseph Smith didn’t seem to have any concubines, the issue emerged in 1894 when Apostle George Q. Cannon appealed to the concept in order to raise up seed for his deceased son. Scholar D. Carmon Hardy explained:

Some months before the October 1894 discussion with Abraham [Cannon], during a meeting with the Quorum of Twelve Apostles and First Presidency, George Q. Cannon said he felt something needed to be done to remedy circumstances created by the [1890] Manifesto: “My son David died without seed,” he said, “and his brothers cannot do a work for him in rearing children to bear his name because of the Manifesto. I believe in concubinage, or some plan whereby men and women can live together under sacred ordinances and vows until they can be married.”

Two years later Abraham Cannon, along with his dead brother’s fiancée Lillian Hamlin and President Joseph F. Smith, traveled to Catalina Island, off the coast of California, where he and Lillian were presumably married. Historian D. Michael Quinn suggests the marriage happened earlier in the Salt Lake Temple in June of 1896, prior to their trip to California.

 MOTIVATION FOR RECORDING THE REVELATION

The next paragraph in the opening essay reads:

The same revelation that taught of plural marriage was embedded within a revelation about eternal marriage—the teaching that marriage could last beyond death.

However, this statement is totally opposite of the facts. The revelation is specifically about polygamy, and eternal marriage is only a part of it. One simply needs to read the opening verse of Doctrine and Covenants 132:

Verily, thus saith the Lord unto you my servant Joseph, that inasmuch as you have inquired of my hand to know and understand wherein I, the Lord, justified my servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as also Moses, David and Solomon, my servants, as touching the principle and doctrine of their having many wives and concubines...

Section 132 was dictated in July of 1843 to enable Joseph’s brother Hyrum to use it to persuade Emma to finally accept polygamy and his plural wives, not to convert her to the idea of being eternally married to Joseph. While Smith had already been sealed to dozens of women by the time he dictated the revelation, Emma was probably only aware of a few of the single girls he had married, and had evidently given her consent to his marriage to Emily and Eliza Partridge on May 11, 1843. Emma evidently gave her consent to secure her own eternal sealing to Joseph on May 28th. But months later Emma changed her mind and demanded that the girls leave the home, which led to Hyrum suggesting to Joseph to write down the revelation so he could take it to Emma. William Clayton, Joseph’s personal secretary, explained how the revelation came to be recorded:

On the morning of the 12th of July, 1843, Joseph and Hyrum Smith came into the office in the upper story of the “brick store,” on the bank of the Mississippi River. They were talking on the subject of plural marriage. Hyrum said to Joseph, “If you will write the revelation on celestial marriage, I will take and read it to Emma, and I believe I can convince her of its truth, and you will hereafter have peace.” Joseph smiled and remarked, “You do not know Emma as well as I do.” Hyrum repeated his opinion and further remarked, “The doctrine is so plain, I can convince any reasonable man or woman of its truth, purity or heavenly origin,” or words to their effect. Joseph then said, “Well, I will write the revelation and we will see.”

When Hyrum returned he reported “he had never received a more severe talking to in his life, that Emma was very bitter and full of resentment and anger. Joseph quietly remarked, ‘I told you you did not know Emma as well as I did’ . . .”

44 Compton, In Sacred Loneliness, pp. 4-6.
Next the essay states that the revelation “did not explain how to implement plural marriage in all its particulars.” This is a diversion. None of Smith’s revelations explain anything in ALL its particulars. However, the revelation does give specific instructions about marrying “virgins”:

And again, as pertaining to the law of the priesthood—
if any man espouse a virgin, and desire to espouse another, and the first give her consent, and if he espouse the second, and they are virgins, and have vowed to no other man, then is he justified; he cannot commit adultery for they are given unto him . . . (Doctrine and Covenants 132:61)

Yet by July of 1843, when section 132 was dictated, Smith had already been sealed to eleven married women and three widows (besides the many single women) which would seem to violate the revelation. It is assumed that Emma was unaware of Smith’s union with married women. Also in the revelation is a portion addressed to Emma, with instruction that she is to accept all those who had already married Smith, unless the woman was not “virtuous.” This statement implies that some of the women Joseph married were not virtuous.

And let mine handmaid, Emma Smith, receive all those that have been given unto my servant Joseph, and who are virtuous and pure before me; and those who are not pure, and have said they were pure, shall be destroyed, saith the Lord God. (Doctrine and Covenants 132:52)

In verse 54 Emma was threatened that if she did not accept this revelation she would be destroyed.

And I command mine handmaid, Emma Smith, to abide and cleave unto my servant Joseph, and to none else. But if she will not abide this commandment she shall be destroyed, saith the Lord for I am the Lord thy God, and will destroy her if she abide not in my law.

This threat was continued in verse 64:

I say unto you, if any man have a wife, who holds the keys of this power, and he teaches unto her the law of my priesthood, as pertaining to these things, then shall she believe and administer unto him, or she shall be destroyed, saith the Lord your God; for I will destroy her.

It should be noted that Joseph Smith was murdered the next year, as a result of ordering the destruction of the Nauvoo Expositor which exposed his secret polygamy, while Emma, who opposed plural marriage, lived until 1879.

THREATENED BY AN ANGEL

Women were not the only ones threatened with destruction if they didn’t obey the revelation. In the essay Plural Marriage in Kirtland and Nauvoo we read that an angel threatened Smith’s life if he did not pursue more plural wives:

Joseph told associates that an angel appeared to him three times between 1834 and 1842 and commanded him to proceed with plural marriage when he hesitated to move forward. During the third and final appearance, the angel came with a drawn sword, threatening Joseph with destruction unless he went forward and obeyed the commandment fully.

Mary Elizabeth Rollins Lightner, one of Smith’s wives who had a living husband, gave a detailed account of the angel:

the Angel came to him three times the last time with a drawn Sword and threatened his life. I did not believe[,] if God told him So, why did he not come and tell me [?] the angel told him I should have a witness, and an Angel came to me, it went through me like lightning, I was afraid, . . . Brigham Young Sealed me to him [Joseph], for time & all Eternity[,] Feb 1842. 48

Another young married woman, Zina Diantha Huntington Jacobs, entered into a polyandrous marriage with Joseph Smith after Joseph told her of the angel. Todd Compton explained:

. . . an angel with a drawn sword had stood over Smith and told him that if he did not establish polygamy, he would lose “his position and his life.” Zina, faced with the responsibility for his position as prophet, and even perhaps his life, finally acquiesced. 49

Notice that both of these young women were already married. Why would the angel demand that Joseph marry them? Why not offer them eternal sealings to their current husbands? How does this benefit the “restoration” of all things? It looks more like spiritual black-mail, putting on husbands? How does this benefit the “restoration” of all things? It looks more like spiritual black-mail, putting on

Lorenzo Snow, brother of Eliza R. Snow (one of Smith’s wives) reported:

He [Joseph Smith] said that the Lord had revealed it [the doctrine of the plurality of wives] unto him and commanded him to have women sealed to him as wives, that he foresaw the trouble that would follow and sought to turn away from the commandment, that an angel from heaven appeared before him with a drawn sword, threatening him with destruction unless he went forward and obeyed the commandment. 50

Given the LDS doctrine of free agency one wonders why God would threatened Smith with “destruction” if he did not obey when by 1842 Smith would have already married approximately five plural wives?

Secrecy

The main essay then addresses the issue of secrecy:

> The practice [of polygamy in Nauvoo] was introduced carefully and incrementally, and participants vowed to keep their participation confidential, anticipating a time when husbands and wives could acknowledge one another publicly.

This secrecy included hiding it from Emma Smith. One of the strangest of marriages was Smith’s marriage to 17-year-old Sarah Ann Whitney in 1842. First Joseph approached the parents about the new doctrine of polygamy and after extensive prayer they believed they had spiritual confirmation that it was true.

Elizabeth Whitney wrote “our hearts were comforted and our faith made so perfect that we were willing to give our eldest daughter, then only seventeen years of age, to Joseph, in the holy order of plural marriage . . . laying aside all our traditions and former notions in regard to marriage, we gave her with our mutual consent.” Joseph then issued a personal revelation to the parents that their reward would be “honor and immortality and eternal life to all your house, both old and young because of the lineage of my Priesthood, saith the Lord . . . .”

However, this marriage was made behind Emma’s back. A month after the marriage Smith sent a letter to the Whitneys asking them to secretly meet him “in my lonely retreat” at another member’s home. In the letter he wrote:

> all three of you come a little a head, and nock at the south East corner of the house at the window; it is next to the cornfield; I have a room inti=rely by myself, the whole matter can be attended to with most perfect safty, I know it is the will of God that you should confort me now in this time of affliction, . . . the only thing to be careful of; is to find out when Emma comes then you cannot be safe, but when she is not here, there is the most perfect safty.

Eight months later, on April 29, 1843, Joseph instructed Sarah Ann to enter into a pretend marriage with widower Joseph C. Kingsbury, Joseph himself performing the ceremony. This was to cloak Smith’s marriage to Sarah Ann. Kingsbury evidently agreed to this in order to receive his eternal sealing to his deceased wife.

Another problem arose when Emma realized that Joseph had married 16-year-old Flora Woodworth, it caused such an argument that Joseph had to use “harsh measures” to put an end to it. William Clayton, Smith’s private secretary, wrote in his journal on August 23, 1843:

> President Joseph told me that he had difficulty with E[mma] yesterday. She rode up to Woodworths with him and called while he came to the Temple. When he returned she was demanding the gold watch of F[lora]. He reproved her for her evil treatment. On their return home she abused him much and also when he got home. He had to use harsh measures to put a stop to her abuse but finally succeeded.

Several of Joseph Smith’s young wives boarded at the Smith home, but for the most part they lived elsewhere and none of them were publicly acknowledged as wives. Remember, these were not marriages by any normal standard, they were not legal, and for the most part, the women did not even know who the other wives were.

The Nauvoo Expositor

One situation not discussed in the Nauvoo essay was the destruction of the Nauvoo Expositor and its relationship to Smith’s polygamy and to the events leading to his murder.

In the later part of May, 1844, William Law, who had been a member in the First Presidency, brought charges against Joseph Smith for adultery in relation to his polygamist union with Maria Lawrence, a nineteen-year-old. She and her sister Sarah were Joseph’s wards and lived in the Smith home. According to researcher George D. Smith:

> On Thursday, May 23, Law filed a complaint in the Hancock County Circuit Court in Carthage alleging that Smith had lived with Maria Lawrence “in an open state of adultery” from October 12, 1843, to May 23, 1844, while serving as her guardian and co-executor of her estate.

Joseph responded by preaching on May 26, 1844:

> When facts are proved, truth and innocence will prevail at last. . . . In all these affidavits, indictments, it is all of the devil—all corruption. . . . I have more to boast of than ever any man had. I am the only man that has ever been able to keep a whole church together since the days of Adam. . . . Another indictment has been got up against me. It appears a holy prophet has arisen up, and he has testified against me: the reason is, he is so holy. . . . I had not been married scarcely five minutes, and made one proclamation of the Gospel, before it was reported that I had seven wives. . . .

> This new holy prophet [William Law] has gone to Carthage and swore that I had told him that I was guilty of adultery. This spiritual wifeism! Why, a man dares not speak or wink, for fear of being accused of this. . . . What a thing it is for a man to be accused of committing adultery, and having seven wives, when I can only find one.

William Law and his brother pleaded with Smith to put a stop to this new practice but were only rebuffed. Seeing that there would be no repentance, the Laws, along with several other dissidents, announced plans to print a newspaper detailing the various secret teachings of Joseph Smith. The one and only issue of the Nauvoo Expositor was printed on June 7, 1844, enumerating various false teachings of Smith, such as polygamy, multiple gods, secret societies and financial misdeeds.58

The Nauvoo City Council, along with Joseph Smith, mayor of Nauvoo, met on June 10th and declared the Expositor a “libelous and slanderous” nuisance and requested the mayor to “abate the said nuisance.” Smith ordered the city marshal to destroy the press “without delay.”59

Author Hal Schindler gave an overview of the destruction of the press and its aftermath:

Smith’s City Council passed a libel law and then charged the Expositor with being a public nuisance. In the next breath, Smith ordered the city marshal to abate the nuisance—“destroy the press and pi the type.” But even Smith was unprepared for the uproar that followed. Freedom of the press once more had been trammeled in Illinois, and the residents would have none of it.

The Expositor editors swore out complaints and found enthusiastic backing from another enemy of the Smiths—Thomas Sharp, editor of the Warsaw Signal, who editorialized in blind fury: Citizens arise, one and all!! Can you stand by, and suffer such infernal devils! To rob men of their property rights, without avenging them. We have no time for comment! Everyman will make his own. Let it be with powder and ball.

Joseph and Hyrum thought of leaving Nauvoo and making tracks for the Rocky Mountains, but halfway across the Mississippi, Joseph was persuaded to return to surrender at Carthage and face trial. Governor Thomas Ford interceded to calm the Smiths’ apprehension regarding their safety and promised protection while they were in Carthage Jail. There were strong questions concerning Ford’s role in what was to transpire, with some Mormons suggesting that the chief executive was connected with the assassination plot, for he left Carthage for Nauvoo after promising he would stay.

In any case, the Carthage Greys, a militia company, was assigned to guard the jail, but with an armed mob painted and howling, as one writer put it, “like demons vomited from hell,” the militia detachment commanded by Lt. Frank Worrell offered only token resistance and stepped aside, allowing the attackers to gain the second floor where the Smiths, John Taylor and Willard Richards were sequestered.

After a brief struggle—during which Joseph Smith, who had armed himself with a smuggled pepperbox revolver, reached around the doorjamb and fired all six chambers—Hyrum fired through the door and was struck in the left ear lobe, had been forgotten by the mob almost at the instant he thought himself a dead man.

Once Joseph Smith had fallen from the second-story window, the mob began to disperse. Someone shouted, “The Mormons are coming!” and the milling crowd fled in panic. But no Mormons came. Richards went for help for the wounded Taylor. (They survived to make the trek West.)60

Thus Joseph’s secret polygamy and the destruction of the Nauvoo Expositor became the catalyst for his murder.

Plural Marriage in Utah

The essay then switches to the Utah practice of polygamy.

> Women and men who lived within plural marriage attested to challenges and difficulties but also to the love and joy they found within their families.

Whatever “love and joy” that was experienced in a polygamist home probably centered more around the children than the relationship between various wives and their husband. We know that Joseph and Emma fought over polygamy, and two wives were driven from the home.61

After Smith’s death, Brigham Young, Heber Kimball, and seven others of the hierarchy married twenty-four of Smith’s widows.62 Todd Compton explains:

Most of [Smith’s wives], because of their marriages to the Mormon prophet, became “proxy wives” to Mormon apostles and other leading Mormons, especially to Brigham Young and Heber Kimball—sealed to Smith for eternity, with the apostle standing in as Smith’s proxy in the flesh, to “raise seed” to Smith in this life—and thus the proxy husband was married to the woman only for time. This arrangement had significant advantages for the women (high status and visibility in Mormon society) and certain drawbacks. As Young and Kimball were among the most married of Mormons, many of Joseph Smith’s widows experienced the difficult trial of living in very large polygamous families.63

Another example of the misery in these households is seen in a sermon by Jedediah M. Grant, second counselor to Brigham Young, on September 21, 1856:

And we have women here who like any thing but the celestial law of God; and if they could break asunder the cable of the Church of Christ, there is scarcely a mother in Israel but would do it this day. And they talk it to their husbands, to their daughters, and to their neighbors, and say they have not seen a week’s happiness since their husbands took a second wife.

Following Grant’s sermon, Brigham Young expanded on the problem of disgruntled polygamist wives, threatening to expel all the women who were complaining:

Now for my proposition; it is more particularly for my sisters, as it is frequently happening that women say they are unhappy. Men will say, “My wife, though a most excellent woman, has not seen a happy day since I took my second wife.” “No, not a happy day for a year;” says one; and another has not seen a happy day for five years . . . that many of them are wading through a perfect flood of tears, . . .

I wish my own women to understand that what I am going to say is for them as well as others, and I want those who are here to tell their sisters, yes, all the women of this community, and then write it back to the States, and do as you please with it. I am going to give you from this time to the 6th day of October next, for reflection, that you may determine whether you wish to stay with your husbands or not, and then I am going to set every woman at liberty and say to them, Now go your way, my women with the rest, go your way. And my wives have got to do one of two things; either round up their shoulders to endure the afflictions of this world, and live their religion, or they may leave, for I will not have them about me. I will go into heaven alone, rather than have scratching and fighting around me. I will set all at liberty. “What, first wife too?” Yes, I will liberate you all . . .

Sisters, I am not joking. I do not throw out my proposition to banter your feelings, to see whether you will leave your husbands, all or any of you. but I know that there is no cessation to the everlasting whining of many of the women in this territory; I am satisfied that this is the case. . . .

Prepare yourselves for two weeks from to-morrow; and I will tell you now, that if you will tarry with your husbands, after I have set you free, you must bow down to it, and submit yourselves to the celestial law. You may go where you please, after two weeks from to-morrow; but, remember, that I will not hear any more of this whining.

Compton gives further insight into the lives of those living celestial marriage: “Polygamist wives often experienced what was essentially acute neglect. Despite the husband’s sincere efforts, he could only give a specific wife a fraction of his time and means.”

Percent of Men and Women

The essay continues: “Although some leaders had large polygamous families, two-thirds of polygamist men had only two wives at a time.” In a society that has approximately equal numbers of men and women, one would hardly expect to see the practice of polygamy wide spread. Given the fact that the leaders had taken the lion’s share of young women it is a wonder that the average Mormon man could find even one wife. The following list illustrates that most of the top LDS leadership in Nauvoo followed Smith’s lead and entered into polygamy.

Prominent LDS Men and their Wives

This list covers those who entered polygamy in Nauvoo and eventually had at least six wives.

The essay goes on to say, “At its peak in 1857, perhaps one half of all Utah Latter-day Saints experienced plural marriage as a husband, wife, or child. The percentage of those involved in plural marriage steadily declined over the next three decades.” This decline is no doubt due to the shortage of single females and the beginning of government legal action in 1862 against polygamists.

ETHNIC INTERMARRIAGES?

One advantage of plural marriage proposed in the essay was “ethnic intermarriages were increased, which helped to unite a diverse immigrant population.” This might suggest to some that there were many racial minorities involved in polygamy. The few blacks in Utah Territory did not marry in polygamy, and only a few Native Americans were Mormon. The “ethnic” immigrants can only mean the many English and European converts. Granted, there were different languages and nationalities in Utah Territory, such as German and Danish, but they would have been almost exclusively Caucasians. Again, since there was not a shortage of women, the “intermarriages” between various American and European peoples would have resulted in the same uniting of the population with or without polygamy.

DEMANDED OF EVERYONE?

Next we read that “during the years that plural marriage was publicly taught, not all Latter-day Saints were expected to live the principle, though all were expected to accept it as a revelation from God. Indeed, this system of marriage could not have been universal due to the ratio of men to women.” Since there were not enough women to allow every man to have at least two wives, they argue that all were not expected to live it. But this is opposite the instructions given by their leaders. In 1862 Brigham Young preached:

Monogamy, or restrictions by law to one wife, is no part of the economy of heaven among men . . . this monogamic order of marriage, so esteemed by modern Christians . . . is nothing but a system established by a set of robbers, . . . Why do we believe in and practice polygamy? Because the Lord introduced it . . . and the Lord’s servants have always practiced it. “And is that religion popular in heaven?” It is the only popular religion there. 68

During Brigham Young’s presidency if one aspired to the highest level of heaven one would have needed both polygamy and an eternal sealing. Brigham Young declared: “The only men who become Gods, even the Sons of God, are those who enter into polygamy.” 69

Such zealous preaching no doubt contributed to men going to extreme measures to obtain a plural wife. In 1857, just months before the infamous Mountain Meadows Massacre, Bishop Warren Snow, of Manti, Utah, set his eye on a young woman who was betrothed to a young man in the area. When he couldn’t persuade the young man to relinquish the woman to be Snow’s plural wife, the bishop had the young man castrated. John D. Lee gave this account:

It was then decided to call a meeting of the people who lived true to counsel, which was held in the school-house in Manti . . . The young man was there, and was again requested, ordered and threatened, to get him to surrender the young woman to Snow, but true to his pledged troth, he refused to consent to give up the girl. The lights were then put out. An attack was made on the young man. He was severely beaten, and then tied with his back down on a bench, when Bishop Snow took a bowie-knife, and performed the operation in a most brutal manner, and then took the portion severed from his victim and hung it up in the school-house on a nail, so that it could be seen by all who visited the house afterwards.

The party then left the young man wailing in his blood, and in a lifeless condition. During the night he succeeded in releasing himself from his confinement, and dragged himself to some hay-stacks, where he lay until the next day, when he was discovered by his friends. The young man regained his health, but has been an idiot or quite lunatic ever since. . . .

Brigham Young evidently approved of the action. D. Michael Quinn gave this background on the castration:

In May 1857 Bishop Warren S. Snow’s counselor wrote that twenty-four-year-old Thomas Lewis “has now gone crazy” after being castrated by Bishop Snow for an undisguised sex crime. When informed of Snow’s action, [Brigham] Young said: “I feel to sustain him,” even though Young’s brother Joseph, a general authority, disapproved of this punishment. In July Brigham Young wrote a reassuring letter to the bishop about this castration: “Just let the matter drop, and say no more about it,” the LDS president advised, “and it will soon die away among the people.”

In 1878 Apostle Joseph F. Smith, who later became the sixth president of the LDS Church, preached on the necessity of living plural marriage:

Some people have supposed that the doctrine of plural marriage was a sort of superfluity, or non-essential to the salvation of mankind. In other words, some of the Saints have said, and believed that a man with one wife, sealed to him by the authority of the Priesthood for time and eternity, will receive an exaltation as great and glorious, if he is faithful, as he possibly could with more than one. I want here to enter my protest against this idea, for I know it is false. . . . Therefore, whoever has imagined that he could obtain the fullness of the blessings pertaining to this celestial law, by complying with only a portion of its conditions, has deceived himself. He cannot do it. When the principle was revealed to the Prophet Joseph Smith, he very naturally shrank, in his feelings, from the responsibilities thereby imposed upon him . . . But he did not falter, although it was not until an angel of God, with a drawn sword, stood before him and commanded that he should enter into the practice of that principle, or he should be utterly destroyed, or rejected. . . .

If then, this principle was of such great importance that the Prophet himself was threatened with destruction, . . . It is useless to tell me that there is no blessing attached to obedience to the law, or that a man with only one wife can obtain as great a reward, glory or kingdom as he can with more than one, . . .

I understand the law of celestial marriage to mean that every man in this Church, who has the ability to obey and practice it in righteousness and will not, shall be damned, I say I understand it to mean this and nothing less, and I testify in the name of Jesus that it does mean that.

God and Jesus Polygamists

While the LDS essays do not mention it, Brigham Young and several apostles went so far as to proclaim that both the Father and the Son were polygamists. When the non-Mormons argued that polygamy was one of the “relics of barbarism,” Brigham Young replied: “Yes, one of the relics of Adam, of Enoch, of Noah, of Abraham, of Isaac, of Jacob, of Moses, David, Solomon, the Prophets, of Jesus, and his apostles.” On another occasion Brigham Young stated: “The Scripture says that He, the Lord, came walking in the Temple, with his train; I do not know who they were, unless his wives and children; . . .” In 1855 Apostle Orson Hyde declared:

I discover that some of the Eastern papers represent me as a great blasphemer, because I said, in my lecture on Marriage, at our last Conference, that Jesus Christ was married at Cana of Galilee, that Mary, Martha, and others were his wives, and that he begat children. All that I have to say in reply to that charge is this—they worship a Savior that is too pure and holy to fulfil the commands of his Father. I worship one that is just pure and holy enough “to fulfil all righteousness;” not only the righteous law of baptism, but the still more righteous and important law “to multiply and replenish the earth.”

Legal Battles

The LDS essay then begins a discussion of the laws enacted by the U.S. government against polygamy:

Beginning in 1862, the U.S. government passed laws against the practice of plural marriage. After the U.S. Supreme Court found the anti-polygamy laws to be constitutional in 1879, federal officials began prosecuting polygamous husbands and wives during the 1880s. Believing these laws to be unjust, Latter-day Saints engaged in civil disobedience by continuing to practice plural marriage and by attempting to avoid arrest by moving to the homes of friends or family or by hiding under assumed names. When convicted, they paid fines and submitted to jail time.
It seems ironic that the LDS Church wants to defend itself by arguing for “civil disobedience” because the laws were unjust, yet stood against “civil disobedience” during the civil rights debate of the 1950-1960s. Interestingly, the church has now changed its position on both polygamy and blacks in the priesthood.

Monogamy was always the only legal form of marriage in the United States and bigamy was specifically illegal in Illinois, where Smith secretly presented plural marriage to his top leaders. But the Mormon practice spurred the U.S. government into passing laws in 1862 prohibiting it. D. Michael Quinn commented: “Brigham Young demonstrated his resistance to the Morrill Act by fathering five more polygamous children and marrying six more wives after 1862.”76 In 1879 the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the 1862 Morrill Anti-Bigamy Act and “all new polygamous marriages in Utah and surrounding territories were in violation of both congressional and Constitutional law. . . . But new polygamous marriage ceremonies continued to be performed under the direction of the First Presidency.”77

When these laws did not prove effective in stopping polygamy, “Congress passed the Edwards Law which provided up to five years’ imprisonment and a $500 fine for entering into polygamy, six months’ imprisonment and a $300 fine for the resulting unlawful cohabitation, and which disfranchised polygamists.”78

For several years President John Taylor and other top leaders stayed in hiding for fear of being arrested on bigamy charges. In 1887, the U.S. Congress passed the Edmunds-Tucker Act, which allowed the government to seize church property in excess of $50,000. Faced with this financial crisis, Wilford Woodruff, who had succeeded Taylor in 1889, issued the 1890 Manifesto advising church members to cease the practice of polygamy.

THE MANIFESTO

To explain the reasons for issuing the 1890 Manifesto, the essay states:

The work of salvation for both the living and the dead was now in jeopardy. In September 1890, Church President Wilford Woodruff felt inspired to issue the Manifesto. “Inasmuch as laws have been enacted by Congress forbidding plural marriages,” President Woodruff explained, “I hereby declare my intention to submit to those laws, and to use my influence with the members of the Church over which I preside to have them do likewise.”

Notice, there is no mention of a revelation, only Woodruff’s “intention to submit to those laws.” There was no specific declaration that God had instructed the Mormons to give up the practice. And Woodruff himself did not “submit.” Woodruff was one of thirteen of the First Presidency and Apostles who took plural wives after the Manifesto.79 Besides that, various apostles conducted 67 plural marriages after the Manifesto. Scholar B. Carmon Hardy concluded that there were 262 post-Manifesto plural marriages between October 1890 and December 1910, involving 220 different men.80

As the LDS essay mentions, in 1904, after a number of plural marriages were exposed during the Senator Reed Smoot hearings,81 President Joseph F. Smith issued a second manifesto, threatening excommunication for those who continued to take more wives. While the numbers certainly dropped after that conference, we know that two apostles took plural wives after 1904.82 As mentioned in the LDS essay on the Manifesto, “Some couples who entered into plural marriage between 1890 and 1904 separated after the Second Manifesto, but many others quietly cohabited into the 1930s and beyond.”

Paul Reeve, who teaches at the University of Utah, was quoted in the Deseret News as follows:

These bookends of polygamy—the introduction and the end—are wrenching for Mormonism. And those two bookends are the two periods we know the least about. The church went from secrecy about polygamy in Kirtland to openness in Utah back to secrecy after the Manifesto, and from monogamy to polygamy and back to monogamy in this 60-year period.83

81 LDS Apostle Reed Smoot was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1903. Many Protestants, who feared the Mormons were trying to gain undue political power, challenged his right to the office. There was also concern that the Mormons were still practicing polygamy. This led to a Senate hearing that lasted for several years, but Smoot was finally allowed to serve. CONCLUSION

Mormons often defend Joseph Smith on the basis of the good done by the current LDS Church, sighting Matthew 7:16-17: “Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit.” However, Mormons tend to gloss over the negative fruits of Joseph Smith’s doctrines; such as his lying to Emma, to the church, and to the public, the heartache foisted on Emma, the misery and disruption of families and wives, the numerous polygamist groups, with tens of thousands of people, currently practicing polygamy.84 All of these people look to Joseph Smith as a prophet and feel compelled to obey his revelation in section 132 of the Doctrine and Covenants. This isn’t a case of just saying he got that one wrong. Either God ordered polygamy or Joseph Smith was a false prophet.

Excerpts from Emails and Letters

August 2014: You are truly a “pioneer” for truth. I’m a native Floridian and saw your interview with John [Dehlin – Mormon Stories]. I left the church a year ago and have felt lots of persecution and lost many friends. But have gained truth and found a new church and new friends. And don’t think I could have been strong like you. I hope before you pass on you can see the fruits of your labor. The LDS church will fall one day. Truth reigns. Love you Sandra. You are a strong woman. Worthy of the title, hero.

September 2014: While I am currently Agnostic, I highly respect you and what you do. I stopped by your shop a few days ago but you were sadly not in. Thank you for doing what you do. . . . I have a true passion in educating those on the truth of the LDS church. I became suicidal after doing my own research years ago. It hurt so much knowing that the religion I loved was a fraud and was very un-ethical in its religious and business workings. Again thank you very much for what you have done and what you are doing.

September 2014: Thank you so much your time and God’s blessings to you and to your ministry.

Really quick, I have been a Christian since 2007 after living a life inside Mormonism. I even served a mission in SLC 91-93. During my mission I called [ed] ultm and told the person on the phone off (the person I know now as Sandra Tanner). Though I did call a year or so ago and apologize to Sandra and she graciously forgave me.

I have loved hearing about the story of Jerald and Sandra and the amazing work The Lord accomplished in and through them. Praise Jesus.

As for myself I have been attending Bible college . . . . I’m still not sure what The Lord has for me. . . . There are Many who are in my extended family who refuse to speak to me about Jesus because they claim that I’ve forsaken the true gospel.

September 2014: So you insist that hatred for others is your true religion. How sad to build your foundation upon hate.

I bet Christ doesn’t agree with this philosophy. You never seem to form your opinions on anything productive. How depressing. Did you run out of Happy pills? If you waller in the depths of negativism you will never climb out.

September 2014: I imagine that you probably get a lot of nasty mail, so hopefully this is a welcome message. To make a long story short, I have been a baptized LDS member for all of my 37 years, though inactive for the past 21 years, inactive. Even so, until this last year I would have said I had a strong testimony. As I study more and more about the vast falsehoods and cover-ups of the church—I cannot anymore say that Joseph Smith was a prophet—in fact quite the opposite. As I now understand things, I would even go as far to say that that he was a scoundrel, a liar, and even used his position and trust to take advantage of women, even using God’s name to ruin reputations, threaten and coerce people into fulfilling his desires. I am currently composing my exit letter, and I am not sure I can be even that short and sweet. And if it means anything to you, I have never had such a faith in Jesus Christ’s gospel and am already attending another non-denominational Christian church.

Sandra, I can’t thank you enough for the decades of level headed and very well researched material and dedication to help bring people out of this polytheistic fraud called mormonism. Looking back I can't believe I believed it so long—and I am already having troubles with my parents, who are both converts but still are very active, even doing very frequent work in the temple. It really, really bothers me because my mother especially is a very smart and perceptive person—and I am in my mind, I think, forming some kind of life mission to bring them out. But I know my mother thinks that I am saying she wasted her whole life in the church—so please pray for me to help her understand that the parts about loving the Lord, building a family etc were not in vain. I just am worried about their salvation especially and to show them that Christ is sufficient and to get them away from these blasphemous aspects within Mormonism, no matter how well organized the community or how nice the people and families are.

September 2014: I just want to say thank you! The amount of love and gratitude I have for you is tremendous! . . . I live in Ogden, UT. I am currently in the process of transitioning out of the LDS church. My story is not special. But because of people like you that work so hard to bring people like me the truth, I am in the process of learning how special I am to the Lord. And I am learning who the Lord is.

September 2014: Food for thought. Why do you think it's okay to preach what you do and yet after reading some of your material I see the very thing that you preach is slander and mockery of some kind. What do you get in life by the unkind words you use towards God's Church? Followers? Is that what your after? I don't understand why these so called Christian folks try to belittle others beliefs. I am a member of the Church of Jesus Christ LDS and it does not sit well with me to hear people belittle the church and basically make fun of my beliefs. How would you like it if someone made fun of you. I could make fun of you all day long and tell you how wrong your beliefs are, but I choose not to because that would be ignorant. Anyway enjoy your following.

October 2014: I just wanted to let you know that it was a visit to your store, when I was starting to seriously question Mormonism, and a purchase of several of your books, that finally led me out of the LDS Church and into a more peaceful place in my life. Thank you.

October 2014: I just wanted to write to you to thank you for the interview that you did that is now on Youtube regarding Joseph Smith and the LDS Church

I was only baptised in 2010. I started looking into the history of the Church and the Bishop said I had not to do that. I took my Endowments and, as soon as I saw the Endowment film in the Temple, I knew that there was something wrong.

None of the issues you discussed are ever mentioned in the LDS Church at all, not ever. Questions are still not encouraged on those subjects.

I investigated the notions put forth in the Endowment film, then watched everything I could find on youtube.

I have now requested my membership be rescinded. Fortunately there is only myself to consider in this, so only myself to get out of this mess.

Am now attending a true Christian evangelical church in England near to where I live, which is where I should have been in the first place.

October 2014: A few months ago I came across Sandra’s interviews on the Mormon Stories podcast as well as the now infamous CES Letter. After 23 years of being a converted member (I'm 35 now) I feel compelled to acknowledge that the LDS Church is not true.

What truly hurts is that this whole ordeal has put a strain on my marriage. We got married in the ____ Temple six months ago. As early as June my wife and I started having numerous arguments and discussions about the validity of the Book of Mormon and Joseph Smith’s claims. The church means a lot to her because it’s the only place she can worship God and feel warm fuzzies.

A short while ago we both decided to try attending other Christian services. Two Sundays ago it was a Presbyterian church and yesterday it was a non-denominational service. I thought both had great things to offer. She didn’t seem to like either one.

Last night we got a visit from a faithful couple in our LDS ward wanting to discuss our concerns. Towards the end the husband gave us both blessings, the one to my wife telling her the Lord chooses imperfect men to do his work and the one to me telling me the Lord is not pleased with my search for information. Both blessings suggested we expel Satan from our home.

After having meetings with our bishop, our stake president, and these two ward members she’s now committed to devoting the rest of her life to Mormonism. She justifies the warm fuzzies as a sign of truth by turning to Luke 24:32, “They said to one another, ‘Were not our hearts burning within us while he was speaking to us on the road, while he was explaining the scriptures to us?’” . . . May the blessings of the Lord be with you.

Follow-up email in January 2015.

I have some good news. My wife and I both decided to stop going to the LDS Church a month ago. It was a real struggle for us. After reviewing the evidence we were left with no other choice. The UTLM book order I placed on October 15th really sealed the deal for me. . . . I got about halfway through “View of the Hebrews” and had enough of a witness that The Book of Mormon was not a translation of ancient records. My wife, on the other hand, really had a hard time letting go of her spiritual testimony as noted in my e-mail from October 13th . . . Since June we had had heated arguments about LDS history and doctrine. I had defended the church for years, but once I came across the Letter to a CES Director I could no longer believe. At one point we even considered divorce. It would have been tragic had we gone that route especially considering we got married last April after eight years of friendship.

Ironically, the nail in the coffin for my wife was the church essay Plural Marriage in Kirtland and Nauvoo. Finally we could turn to a source from the church that confirmed many of the horrible details regarding how polygamy was practiced. She immediately saw all the frustration on the part of members posting on John Dehlin's Facebook fan page. In her mind she could no longer believe that this was a church established by God.

Since making the decision to stop going we have attended a non-denominational Christian church where an old friend from high school goes. It really has been liberating to finally be able to agree as a couple that the LDS church does not tell the truth about its history and its origin cannot be attributed to the work of God.
While we have stopped attending we aren’t in the clear. We are now getting visits, phone calls, and texts from members in our Spanish-speaking congregation. Many of them are close friends of ours. My wife has already made it clear to our Relief Society presidency that she will no longer teach any classes and thus should be released as Relief Society teacher. I will write to our stake president over the coming week asking to be released as Stake Young Men’s second counselor. Many thanks for all that you do. I will be looking for more of your videos on YouTube.

October 2014: I left the LDS church back in the 80’s but have only RECENTLY begun studying LDS history because it only just now occurred to me that real historical information might be available online. It has been very interesting and a bit shocking as well.

At any rate, I recently came across your interview on Mormon Stories and just wanted to say how much I enjoyed your thoughtful and honest research. I had sort of a Tanner marathon that day and thought how exhausting that must have been, but you were undaunted! You’re a great story teller too! Truth teller? I’ve just purchased [Mormonism—] Shadow/Reality and look forward to reading it. Thanks so much for BEING THERE for all of us who are on this quest for the truth.

October 2014: I would sincerely appreciate being added to your mailing list for the Salt Lake City Messenger. I admit that I feel somewhat at odds with my request as I am currently a member of the LDS Church but I have been going through a real spiritual battle for the past year. My husband and I have been suffering with many unusual health problems which have been finally diagnosed as environmental which has meant I haven’t been able to attend church meetings regularly. During this time issues relating to the problem has caused me to look at the church with a great deal of questions and loss of faith or testimony. I am a convert (1996) and never have really had a testimony of Joseph Smith, but the faith in Jesus and family has kept me drawn to the church. . . . I feel like I am dying of thirst waiting for a word from the pulpit or teachers about my Savior. . . . I don’t believe in the book of Mormon. I’m tired of hearing about the prophets and leaders of the church when the Lord Jesus Christ seems secondary.

October 2014: I’m feeling sort of out of it right now. After 57 years in the church and having been in five bishoprics, a branch president, seminary teacher and most recently a temple society presidency that she will no longer teach any classes and thus should be released as Relief Society teacher. I will write to our stake president over the coming week asking to be released as Stake Young Men’s second counselor. Many thanks for all that you do. I will be looking for more of your videos on YouTube.

October 2014: I’m 52, born under the covenant, active LDS member; with all the LDS heritage, and recently discovered the deception. . . . As I do my own research and try to put my thoughts on paper, I find it healing and damaging as well; because of this internal confusion. With everything I have now learned, my mind still wont let the church go and it really plays with my emotions. I hope with my writings that some day my wife & family will understand why I would consider leaving the church.

November 2014: Paraphrased version of the last few years of my life. . . . Take vacation to meet with old army buddy haven’t seen in 10 plus years. Meet his best friends girl at bonfire party. She breaks up with guy. . . . We fall in love and I find out she is LDS. After a few years of her attending the Baptist church I go to she gets urges to return to LDS and proselytize me. This is where I will slow down. Until about 6 months ago I thought/assumed Mormons were some weird Christian denomination. Then the missionaries started coming and things just didn’t seem right. Her returned missionary brother came for a visit and we went to see the Kirkland Temple (about an hour from where I live). . . . I was a terrible Christian. So when I am confronted with this LDS stuff and their historic site I can admit I was a little swayed. But my thanks to God for his never failing love that I so undeserved.

I have heard many testimonies of God speaking directly to people. Never once had I ever experienced it. Yes, I have been blessed by numerous answered prayers; mostly undeserved answers at that. But one day when I decided to pray the Mormon prayer “Heavenly Father please reveal to me the truth of the book of Mormon”, I received a direct answer from God. No not an audible voice. But I heard “Just read your Bible.” . . . I down loaded a Bible app on my phone and spent six months or so reading everything I could while at work. Also, I began researching what the LDS church believes and focusing my biblical research to refuting the lies and twistings of LDS doctrine. What I came to realize is that Joseph Smith’s teachings are actually the exact opposite of what the Bible says is true. . . .

One of the hardest moments in my life was to tell my LDS fiancé that we would have to postpone our wedding till we worked out our difference of religion. My every desire was to pursue our wedding plans and assume that religion would work itself out. I am so glad I didn’t follow my desires. God has blessed me with the privilege of leading my fiancé to the truth of salvation. She has left behind the lies of the LDS church. She is so passionate now about learning the truth and passing it on to her family. She has been doing lots of investigation into what the Mormon doctrines really are. What finally broke through her Mormon barrier of anything not LDS approved? Not logic. Not my arguing. It was J. Smiths “King Follett Sermon”. It was J.S. explaining that we could all become gods and that God had a body of flesh and lived just like men on a different planet. . . . Terrible Christian I have been, I am pleased to say God has used the LDS to get my life back on track.

After reading about the LDS Gospel Topics essays, one man wrote:

November 2014: Finally—finally—the Mormon church acknowledges what you and Jerald have been saying for a long time! There are more issues, but it must be wonderful for you to live and know your work was not in vain!

November 2014: You have nothing to hope for. Because whatever you believe is as phony and fantasy as every bit of Mormonism. Yes, I found out (long time ago) the truth about Mormonism thanks to your efforts, but apparently I had more courage than you because I went a step further and investigated the truth about Jesus. Jesus was as phony as Joseph ever was. As we trusted you to show us the true colors of Mormonism, why can’t you check the reality about Jesus yourself?
November 2014: I am quite impressed on your work on the changes to the book of Mormon and I plan to spread the word to my other fellow Mormons of your findings. I have read other documents on what the church does not want their members to know such as “why I left the Mormon church” and it is enough for me to get back to my bishop on confirming that I seriously want to be excommunicated from the church.

December 2014: Where is this infinite knowledge you possess to give you the right to tell others they are wrong? . . . The sheer fact you espouse to know more than others, is telling of your M.O. This is not done in a loving, caring, manner. I challenge you to debate your perspectives outside of common “I’m not going to discuss” & “I’m not listening”. “Oh, here is a specific scripture my interpretation says otherwise.”

How could you expect the Holy Spirit to do its job of witnessing and confirming Truth, if you are dead set on an agenda of retaliation? . . . Thank you for helping confirm my faith, I want nothing to do with an org/church that benefits from love gifts and the error of evangelicism.

December 2014: Instead of slamming the Prophet Joseph, just don’t. You’re speaking of things you don’t even understand. Try doing something better with your life than to ATTEMPT to destroy others faith. The LDS church is and will always be true.

January 2015: I have been through a lot of changes this last week. I have discovered that Joseph Smith is a con man, and I have stopped attending meetings and paying Tithing. One of the things that affected me was a video you were in that stated that Emma Smith found Joseph Smith & Fanny Alger together in a barn. . . . Even assuming the best of intentions on the part of Joseph Smith, I still came away feeling disappointed in him. . . .

When he brought Fanny Alger into his home as a servant, he should have considered her as one of his own children and taken a vow of strict hands-off policy. . . . The girls probably idolized him for being the Prophet of the Restoration. It just doesn’t feel right. It was unfair to Oliver Cowdery for Joseph to put him in a situation where he had to say this was a filthy, dirty, nasty little affair. So I looked closer at other things. . . .

I agree wholehearted about what you said in the video about the marriages Joseph had with women who were already married. Some of [the husbands] were non-members, and they didn’t care about it. But Joseph was taking away the love of their life for the member husbands?

Worse, Joseph was taking away their exaltation, unless they decided to be sealed to another woman by the new and everlasting covenant. It was like Joseph was forcing these men to have plural wives in order for them to become Gods.

For me, the point of no return was the seer stone that Joseph found digging a well.

The description of the translation process meant that Joseph was not really involved in the process at all. All he did was read an English phrase out loud, and somebody wrote it down.

Anyone could do that! Oh, that’s right, Joseph had a gift. Not everyone can see using a seer stone . . . I am really disappointed in myself for not having seen this and so many other things more clearly.

January 2015: I writing to you today in search of the truth, im recently converted member of the LDS church at the time i felt everything was true. but things in my mind change when some of the elders and bishops said dont go onto things like youtube and search on google about anything to do with Lds, as you will find many things which are false. For me, something that suppose to come from our lord, they shouldnt need to say that, and me being me im always looking for the truth no matter what it is, as im doing my research on Josepsh smith and the book of Mormon. i finding alot of things out and its not looking good to what i signed up for. . . . I thought by joining the lds church i would be closer to Jesus now im even more confused any help would be greatly appreciated, i live in the UK and prior to being a member of Lds i was a christian.

A few days later he wrote again.

I was only told about the great things of the church and what it could do for me like a sales man would do and not the small print so to speak. to be honest im finding more information about the church in the last few days then i have done in the last 6 months, There are great people and i cant fault them in any way. its just the church in how it is run and the faults of its origins. Literally in the last few days i have made my self inactive from the truth as i cant attend to the things im finding out and i have only scratch the surface.

Thank you for the information and contact you have given me this will help a great deal in my studies. I always struggled to understand the words of wisdom and also tithing to be honest as i didnt feel it was right. Thank once again, God bless

January 2015: Thank you so much for your time and kindness. It helped to talk to someone I felt I could trust. The good news is that I haven’t cried for 3 days! I think the shock and grief is ebbing enough that I can function a bit better. And not attending church or temple every week has greatly reduced my normal lifelong anxiety.

I’ve watched a few episodes with Earl [Erskine], and even discovered someone I knew from a previous ward on one of his episodes! I’m halfway through the book you gave me and love what I’m learning. If I didn’t have a 12 hr a day job, I could spend more time reading and studying . . . Thanks again for holding me together last week.

January 2015: I was raised in Salt Lake LDS. I wasn’t super active growing up and was always troubled with a few of the beliefs. I didn’t agree with “one true church” having 3, and 4 yr Olds stand and bear their testimony while mom told them what to say in ear, along with a few other things. Due to these things I never became “temple worthy” but due to my heritage, never considered leaving the church either. I moved to Az and married a non-member who was born and raised Catholic. We have been attending a non-denominational Christian church for about 6 yrs. I am confused. There are so many things I love about the people and the religion, but at the same time, I also feel organized religion may not be for me. It’s nice to just follow the teachings of the bible . . . I’m really struggling. It’s something non-members would not understand. Or active members so I feel I have no one to talk to. Thanks for your time.

January 2015: I was born and raised in the church. We were the perfect “mormon family” until my parents divorced when I was 14. I left the church around that time. I am now 50. My father remarried another mormon and they are very active in the church. My mother fell away from the church when my parents divorced. She recently returned . . . to my shock. I thought her and I were on the same page.

Several months ago the missionaries came knocking on my door. I let them in and my hubby and I started taking the lessons. I returned to church for 2 weeks and was loving it. My husband dug in much deeper and read the BOM as well as the D&C. He began telling me all these terrible things. I was very upset. I said to myself, I am going to prove him wrong. As I did my research, I realized I could not prove him wrong as he was right!

I called the missionaries and told them I was done with the church and I told them what happened. It didn't go over so well. They were really mad. The only thing they could say or do was to bare their testimony to me and tell me that they knew Joseph Smith was a prophet. They just kept baring their testimony over and over. Now I have been trying to open my parent's eyes and I am getting a lot of resistance. I show them something that I think is really big and I think this will convince them but it doesn't.

January 2015: Thanks for your courage and work. I like your intellect and “sounding of the whistle”. Many like you have helped me in the darkest of times. I am a 40 year old Mormon. Well maybe not a Mormon but that's what I have known and on Sunday's that's where I go. I have a wife and three children who believe.

Surprisingly . . . I have read and studied much as of late and like many have realized Joseph was maybe not inspired from God. . . anachronism, polyandry, polygamy, 1830 vs 1837 BM, Kinderhook Plates, Greek Salter, Hoffman, 3 First Visions, hazy priesthood restoration, antitrust bank, Joseph killing 2, Danites, Rigdon, mt. meadow, Sidney's writings in Missouri, BYU quotes, John Taylor quotes, blacks in relation to Can, Adam God, Blood Atonement, Book of Abraham papyri, Visions, hazy priesthood restoration, antitrust bank, Joseph killing 2, Danites, Rigdon, mt. meadow, Sidney's writings in Missouri, BYU quotes, John Taylor quotes, blacks in relation to Can, Adam God, Blood Atonement, Book of Abraham papyri, lying for the Lord and the suppression on Church History have racked my mind. . . . And of course I can go on and on. The disloyalty to Emma, Law, Hyde and to all three first witness . . . Frustrates me.

Cognitive dissonance . . . For sure! Men on moon . . . The people of the sun. The prophecies of Joseph not coming to past mainly the 2nd coming? Dead Sea scrolls . . . Great Isaiah scroll.

The Sun receiving energy from another sun? Holland and Hinkley lying on national tv? Temple endowments changed?

I do also fear polygamy will return with liberal marriage control! My side of the family and my wife's side are all believers. I really have no one to share with. I told my wife about what I see . . . of the inconsistency and errors of the LDS church about 6 Months ago. We almost lost our marriage over it.

I am so scared that it might one day lead to our separation. I live in ___ Florida. I have served an honorable mission, was AP, was EQP, was a YM president and my last call Stake Young Pres.

How did I get here? Lol

When I started to realize more about secular history it lead to a complete division with my wife and family members (once again . . . about 6 months ago). Since then I have asked to be released from calling and stopped wearing garments . . . And yes drink a little . . . and yes almost lost my marriage and have lost much “face” among close friends, leaders and family.

My wife has come a long way since then and is reading Bushman (better than nothing) she tells me she loves me regardless however seems to not want to even really look at the problems. She says her feelings tell her it's true. also . . . Her father is a “seventy” and she looks at him like a true hero . . . . I don't want to lose my family however I don't want to offend God. I believe—as you—in the Bible.

I still feel the Savior's love. I have listen and read from Palmer, Brodie, Vogul and you and your husband . . . Many more too. I find your views very similar to mine.

January 2015: I just finished your interview (most of my weekend free time) on Mormon Stories. Wanted to write you and thank you.

Part 4 was moving. Through a flurry of devil's advocate questions (read: challenges) I saw you bear your faith in God and Jesus. Minus husband plus army escort of angels. I love you, Sandra. I'm sure I'm not alone in this.

January 2015: You will probably not remember me, but I met with you at your bookstore just about one year ago. At the time I felt so lonely in my search for the truth about mormonism. You took the time to talk with me for a few hours, and you were so kind and gentle in answering my questions. I just wanted to thank you for your kindness, and the time you took to talk with me that day. My husband and I finally resigned from the LDS church in December, and we are happier than ever. We live in Boston now. but if we lived in Salt Lake still I would come give you a big hug! You will never know the impact you had on our lives. Thank you!

January 2015: I'm still on this extreme emotional roller coaster which is very frustrating and, at times, nearly debilitating. Sometimes I'm surprised by the calmness that settles in my heart and I feel “all is well”—at least for the moment. Other times, I'm so completely undone by feelings of betrayal, anger and grief that I pray for “my life to be taken.” Every thought, action, goal, decision, and feeling I've ever had has been under the all encompassing umbrella of Mormonism. Nearly every happy moment, good friendship, service and college opportunity, as well as every depressive episode, suicidal act, abusive situation, and family relationship is couched in Mormonism. Sometimes the grief is so overwhelming I can't breathe and have no desire to do so. At this point in time, I experience the latter far more frequently that the former.

I know these feelings are probably normal for the situation, but I'm feeling crushed by them. If something that has consumed my life for 54 years be a farce, how can I ever trust myself to recognize truth? And is there really any “truth” to be found outside of the fact that Jesus Christ is the Savior of the world? And even though I know THAT to be true, I don't really understand the true NATURE of God! I'm still drinking from the fire hydrant of information, though I've been forced to slow the flow a tiny bit in order to survive. I still feel like I'm drowning most every day. Everything hurts: heart, head, stomach.

One thing that I think has lessened the blow a bit is that I've been separating my relationship with God from my relationship the church for many years. When bishops would throw condemnation and their “authority” in my face, or members would say and do things in the name of the church, I knew that those were not in keeping with God's nature and His relationship with ME. I'm still trying to navigate my way through the crashing rapsids of knowledge. It feels as if I've gone over a raging waterfall and am being pounded against the cliff and boulders as I frantically try to claw my way to the water's surface for much needed air before it's too late.
I don’t expect that there are any easy answers to calm the raging emotions (and menopause isn’t helping.) I don’t expect you to do or say anything to make things better. But it helps to know that you, Lynn [Wilder], Earl & Karla [Erskine] are aware of my struggles and are willing to listen as I try to sort it all out and rebuild a new life . . . yet again! Thank you for your time and prayers on my behalf.

January 2015: I just came across part 4 of the interview video titled Mormon Stories Anti Mormonism. I am going to listen to this again and look up parts 1-3. and all I find on internet regarding you, you and your husbands courageous work! I left the Mormon church when I was 15 ____ huge family on both sides who have never been happy with me . . . showing so in multiple ways! An ever non-ending moral superior attitude. The thing is, I believe I understand quite well, not to take offense, and if so only just a little to let go off with Gods help. It is the teachings so deeply ingrained with the programming. I went through it myself as a child. What they say to me, show me I know is because they believe what they were taught and want me to do what they have been taught is right.

I have done aloot of my own homework and always even in primary felt the bible speak to my heart and spirit. . . . The Bible has been my source, personal relationship with the Lord in my adult life.

I was so moved hearing you in the video and I love you! I wanted to reach into the video and hug you so tight. I am so thankful to have you close to me in my home although it be video . . . and as sisters in Christ connected through the holy spirit.

Thank you so much for your sharing of faith, your hard work, deep commitment, and for pure Christlike motive so clear to hear and see. I am not anti- mormon either, but concerned about the teachings and the organization. I know you love the people. It is a gift from God to be able to be a critical thinker, test everything, God bless you for having the courage to speak up on matters so important.

January 2015: Hello, . . . I am a Native American, Seneca tribe, wolf clan and I live on the Cattaraugus reservation. We have what I believe to be the only Ids church located on a reservation in the U.S. Maybe you could let me know if I am right. . . . I would like to thank Sandra and Jerold Tanner for opening my eyes to the suspect doctrine and beliefs of the Ids church. Although I am still a mormon on paper I have found my way back out and am beginning a new life with Jesus Christ as my Lord and Saviour. I must have been taken in by the connection that mormonism is said to have with Native Americans. Even being told that during my missionary talks before I joined the church. I do plan on submitting my resignation from the church membership rolls.

March 2015: I just wanted to send you a message and say I listened to your podcasts with John Dehlin. I found them extremely interesting and thought-provoking. I’m a member of the LDS church with very serious doubts about its truth claims. You can only imagine, and I’m sure are fully aware, the stress these doubts have placed on my family and community life.

March 2015: I owe you, and your late husband, a sincere apology for my misguided judgment. I’m sorry. I love you two. I was born and reared Mormon in Ogden, Ut; descended directly from Parley P. Pratt’s 7th wife. My immediate and extended family has held, and still holds, substantial positions within the hierarchy of the Mormon Church. Shortly after I received my mission call, in October of 1983, I receive a pamphlet in the mail from the Utah Lighthouse Ministry. I don’t know who sent it, don’t care. I read it; had my doubts, and discussed it with my bishop. He dismissed it as anti-mormon lies with no basis in fact. I believed him—as any wide-eyed young man would do. I went on to serve my mission (in Brazil). Here I am, now, 32 years later, living on the East Coast. I faithfully served in every call I was given. In 2000 (at age 35) I was called to serve, and served, as Bishop of a newly created ward. When I was released, in 2005, I was called to a position of authority in the Washington DC Temple (in Kensington). I served there until early 2008, when I asked to be released. Very long story short: I have always been an avid student of Christianity. The more I studied, the more I wanted to know. Of course, as I studied, one thing led to another thing and eventually I lost my “testimony” in the church. That loss came at great expense; my family (now divorced); my friends (I had 345 friends [members of my former ward], I now have 342 enemies); my reputation; and, sadly, my faith. I was hurt, angry, sad, betrayed, humiliated, betrayed, embarrassed, etc. I spend my life in a long hallway with two walls on either side and a path forward. When I lost my faith in the church, those walls fell . . . and for the first time ever, I looked left, right, all around. I found a world around me, not walls. That was 2010.

Since then I’ve spent tireless hours tracking down wonderful people I “disciplined” as sinners when I was bishop. My sweetest moment ever came in 2013 in downtown Baltimore when I met with a young man I had excommunicated because he had had same sex relations while being a member. I met him in a small corner café, after dozens of messages begging him to meet with me. We met; we talked for an hour. I begged his forgiveness for my un-Christ-like behavior—I begged for his forgiveness. He forgave me. When we left the café, we hugged and he broke down crying—his tears soaked through my shirt on my shoulder. I was forgiven, I was forgiven. I am sorry for judging you and your husband. I ask your forgiveness. . . . Thank you and Jerald for all you have done.

March 2015: My name is C_____, I'm from [European country] we’ve been sealed as a family in the Switzerland Temple, I graduated in both Seminary and Institute and served a full time mission. I’ve . . . served in most of the available callings where I live. My wife and I left the LDS Church about 9 moths ago after discovering the painful truth. I have two sisters living in Salt Lake City area and one of them left the LDS Church about four moths before I did. The curious thing about this is that we haven’t talked each other about this but a couple months after I left the Church. The path now is being really hard, I was about to became atheist after reading a lot of stuff in the Internet and a lot of contradictory information.

Fortunately I came to the conclusion that there is a God that created us and created this wonderful world where we live in. This is all I have for now. I’ve read a lot of LDS Church controversial material such as Journal of Discourses, Church History by Joseph Smith, [Address] To all believers in Christ by M. Harris [actually by David Whitmer] and my sister sent me a copy of the 1830 traslation of the Book of Mormon. I’ve watched a lot of your interviews in Youtube, specially those with both Shawn Mc Craney and John Delhin. Those interviews helped me a lot to see everything more clearly and I’m really thankful for those. I’ll keep on following you because I still have a long way to go and a lot to learn. Thanks again for all what are you doing, you are doing such a great work. God bless you.

March 2015: I love being LDS! Thank you lord for showing me that the [LDS] GosPe is true.

March 2015: First off, I want to say thank you so much for your time. Your truly a wonderful lady with so much knowledge and truth to share with others in doubt of Mormonism.

My husband and I mailed out our letters to the bishop the other day and he received a text today from the bishop saying that he received our letters regretfully and that we would need to mail him our current temple recommends if we didn’t want to see him in person. At first I was extremely upset that he even took the step to text us since in our letter we said the only contacted we wanted from the church was proof of our names being taken off the membership. However, we decided we are just going to mail our recommends (once we even find them, we have no clue where they even are), and have a short talk with him over the phone explaining why we are leaving. I really learned something from you in not to be anti mormon. I posted a note on facebook about why we are leaving the church but still love the people in the church but why I personally couldn’t agree with their doctrine. I have gotten an extremely positive letter from someone in the church telling me that they hoped I would remain friends with them despite leaving the church and not believing in their doctrine anymore. They also stated that they loved me and would miss seeing out family but that they respected our decisions. I think if I would have approached it in a extremely negative way and treated people mean that a lot of nice people would have been hurt by me and how sad that would have made Christ. I know that I have a job to be an example to people in Mormonism and to reflect the light of christ and how could I possibly do that if I’m being hateful?

March 2015: I had a bit of a freeing experience yesterday. We had to go to Salt Lake City yesterday (my husband had business he needed to take care of and so me and my daughter went along and made a family day of it.) As we were driving I saw the Salt Lake City Temple in the distance. All of a sudden I started silently crying tears of joy and relief; I would no longer have to worry about doing my ancestors work or having to worry about getting the temple endowment. All my fears and burdens lifted off my shoulders. The tears that I cried were extremely healing to me. And I’m even crying writing this letter.

I can finally say I’m free from Mormonism; now that I have seen the light and learned the truth I can never go back. It makes me sick to my stomach that I held Joseph smith in such a high place over Christ. I truly hurt for the ones who are still in the church; it’s truly bondage. Not freedom. . . . We will be attending a baptist church down the street tomorrow; [my husband] has agreed to come with me. Please be praying that we make good progress. And I’m even crying writing this letter.

Christian friends and have a good support system.

March 2015: I just wanted to Thank you for all the work you have done. Your research has helped my husband and I immensely as we have studied and learned the truth about mormonism. We both grew up in the LDS church and come from active families. After meeting at ______ college we were married in the Temple.

About ten years ago my husband was studying up at USU and realized he had sat down by some church history books. He started reading them and was totally blown away. After that he completely stopped believing in the mormon church and also lost his faith in God and wasn’t really sure if God even existed.
I didn’t want to listen to anything that he would try and tell me.

Last summer I finally decided to look into things. It only took me about a week and I just knew the LDS church wasn’t what it claimed to be. Luckily we were really good friends with a pastor at Alpine Church. He spent a lot of time answering questions for us and encouraged us to do our own studying.
We accepted Jesus and since we have had him in our hearts our eyes have been opened to the truth of the Bible. We now have a personal relationship with Jesus that we never knew could exist.
We also have an overwhelming peace and the happiness that comes from that. We were set free in Christ. It has been a hard journey and will continue to be so. All of our family is still LDS and our neighbors have turned their backs on us. We pray that in time all will be able to learn and find the truth as we have.

April 2015: You will never know just how much the work you and Gerald have done showing the truth of Mormonism and how it helped me in my deepest fear, saddest and loneliest time of my life. I knew no other teaching except LDS teachings.
The programming was deep and I feared leaving the church, my temple marriage, because of their teaching that all other churches are wrong. After I left, I saw God in all He created around me yet felt there was no church to go to. Thank you for all the books you published. I bought many off of Ebay out deception to sort through things. I remember going to the Concerned Christians conference when you were there and bought more of your books. I pray that God will bless you to continue to help others when they feel lost and wondering what now. You were my lighthouse and for many others of us as we were sinking in the depths of fear and made it to solid ground.
I’m sure there are many others out in the world that are silently thanking you and your husband to find the real Jesus. God bless you Sandra! With much love in Christ . . .

April 2015: Thank you for your brave and fair information in [Mormonism] Shadow or Reality. I took that bold leap of faith about 8 years ago. My eyes have been opened and I have been set free. I once said that the greatest threat to my family and marriage were my duties in the church. I can now see how foolish I was, and I have spiritually lost three of my six children to drugs. I read your book (with the bathroom door tightly locked ha ha!) and then read the book of Abraham book. The truth truly set me free. My spirituality still has a creator, I revere the idea of mother nature, although I think she is a force. I love physics and metaphysics. My mind has been opened to all that is good and true. I am listening to your you tube discussions with John [Dehlin].

April 2015: I met you today in the bookstore. Thanks again for taking the time to talk to me about leaving Mormonism, and encouraging me to talk to my grandpa [who left the LDS Church years ago]. He was so sweet and it was so very comforting to talk to him. This process is definitely overwhelming, but it’s people like you that make it easier to go through it. Your Mormon Stories interview was immensely helpful, and I’m looking forward to reading my new books. I am hopeful that the end of this road is more peaceful and happy than the start of it.
Although I believe a life based on truth is worth all the work anyways. Thanks for your advice and all you do to help others.

Joseph Smith’s Seer Stone
By: Robert M. Bowman Jr.
(Director of Institute for Religious Research - IRR.org)

On August 4, 2015, the LDS Church issued a press release that was picked up and reported on National Public Radio and Fox News, by the Associated Press, and by many other news outlets. The focus of the story was the publication that day of high-resolution photographs and a printed transcript of the Printer’s Manuscript of the Book of Mormon. Judging from the press release and the news stories, one would never know that the text of the Printer’s Manuscript had already been published in 2001. There wasn’t much newsworthy there, although scholars will appreciate being able to examine photographs of the manuscript.

The real story is that the LDS Church also has published color photographs of the seer stone (including the photo shown here⁠¹) that Joseph Smith used to dictate his translation of the Book of Mormon. Until the end of 2013, the Church had generally represented Joseph as having translated the Book of Mormon by reading the gold plates through transparent stone spectacles that he had found along with the plates in a stone box buried near his home. Prior to that time the LDS Church had only occasionally mentioned Joseph’s seer stone, sometimes admitting he used it in translating and sometimes questioning if he did so, and never with any explanation as to what it was.

The explosion of easily accessible information online about Joseph’s treasure hunting using seer stones and about his using one of those seer stones when he dictated the Book of Mormon finally caught up with the LDS Church in 2013. At the very end of that year, they quietly published an article under Gospel Topics Essays on their official website (LDS.org) admitting that Joseph had used a seer stone for treasure hunting and later used the same stone for translating at least part of the Book of Mormon. As the article acknowledged, Joseph’s method was the same for both activities: he would place the stone inside a hat, bury his face in the hat to block outside light, and call out what he claimed to be able to see through or on the stone—either the location of hidden treasure or the translation of the supposed gold plates.2

Unless you were an avid Mormon-watcher, however, you could easily miss that article, which the LDS Church posted with no press release and no effort to make even its own rank and file membership aware of it. By contrast, on August 4, 2015, the LDS Church made sure as many people as possible would hear about the seer stone photos by presenting them in a larger story about the Printer’s Manuscript being published by the Church Historian’s Office in its “Joseph Smith Papers” project. (The Joseph Smith Papers is a years-long undertaking to publish online and in print all of the writings of Joseph Smith, including diaries, letters, and the manuscripts for his histories and revelations.) The message the Church hopes people will hear is that they are serious about being “transparent” in addressing “sensitive” or “controversial” matters. In addition to the press release, the LDS Church posted on its website advance copies of articles discussing Joseph’s seer stones scheduled for the September and October 2015 issues of Ensign, its official monthly magazine.3

The fact that Joseph Smith used a seer stone in dictating the text of the Book of Mormon is something that has been known by Mormon and non-Mormon researchers and scholars for decades. It’s nice that the Church Historian’s office has published a picture of it, but we already knew about it and even knew what it looked like (a small, smooth, chocolate-colored stone). Our organization, the Institute for Religious Research, has had an article about Joseph using the seer stone to dictate the Book of Mormon on its website since 1999.4

Although the LDS Church is now at least talking about the seer stone, it is still far from addressing the issues adequately.

Joseph Smith’s Seer Stones

Historians agree now that Joseph had at least two seer stones and probably more. The first seer stone Joseph used, though, belonged to a neighbor girl named Sally Chase.5 According to a later story, Joseph looked at her stone and saw the location of a stone far away under the roots of a tree a mile from Lake Erie; he later went there, dug, and found his first stone. It is well established that he found one of his seer stones on Sally’s farm in 1822 when he was supposedly helping her older brother Willard to dig a well.6 Most likely, Joseph and Willard were digging for treasure, perhaps with Joseph using his other stone if he already had it, or perhaps using the stone that belonged to Sally. The stone found on the Chase farm is usually said to have been the brown stone, though one LDS scholar has argued it was the whitish stone.7 What is certain is that Willard considered the stone found on his family farm to be his property. Ironically, it may be that Joseph dictated his “translation” of the Book of Mormon using a seer stone stolen from someone else.

Mormons seem somewhat conflicted with regards to how to view Joseph’s exploits with the seer stone. On one hand, LDS writers have pointed out that using seer stones to look for lost property or buried treasure was a feature of common folklore in Joseph’s culture, even if viewed with disdain by most of the educated or elites.8 The point here seems to be that believing today in Joseph’s calling as a prophet does not entail believing in the use of seer stones or similar divining objects. On this way of looking at the issue, the stone was not important; God simply chose to work through Joseph’s belief in the power of the stone.

On the other hand, Mormons sometimes try to validate Joseph’s use of seer stones in ways that imply that the stone was important. Two examples supposedly proving that Joseph could really see something in the stone are usually given. Both of these examples come from one of Joseph Smith’s scribes, Martin Harris, who may fairly be said to have been the least credible witness among Joseph’s associates.9 In one story, Harris claimed that he hid a pin in a haystack and that Joseph found it immediately without even looking in the hay by gazing at his seer stone in his hat while reaching his hand into the hay to extract the pin.10 Since “a needle in a haystack” was a familiar idiom in Harris’s day, some skepticism about this story seems appropriate. Whether one accepts this story as factual or not, it shows that Harris, at least, believed that the stone itself had a special power.

Harris’s other story was that he once secretly substituted a lookalike stone in Joseph’s hat when they were translating the gold plates, and that when Joseph looked in the hat he expressed surprise that he could not see anything.11 This story implies not only that Joseph needed a stone to function as a “seer” but that it had to be a genuine seer stone. The story conflicts with the idea that God was merely working through Joseph’s belief in seer stones inherited from his culture. It implies instead that the power really was in some sense in the stone. If the stone was necessary only because Joseph thought it was, then Joseph’s mistaken belief that the stone in his hat was the seer stone should have been sufficient for him to continue receiving revelation. A Mormon can accept this story at face value as testifying to Joseph’s ability to see things in the stone only if he also accepts the notion that the ability depended on having the right stone. Unless we accept the belief that certain stones were specially invested in magical or supernatural power, we will need to view Harris’s story with some skepticism.

Mormons sometimes also argue that as Joseph matured as a prophet, he became less dependent on such instruments, to the point of not needing them to produce his later translations and revelations.12 Again, the implication is that the instrument was not crucial to Joseph’s “gift.” The problem is that Joseph claimed that the instruments were essential. For example, he stated with regard to the “Urim and Thummim” that “the possession and use of these stones were what constituted ‘seers’ in ancient or former times” (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith–History 1:35). This is the fact that Joseph actually dug up the stone he used to translate the gold plates five years or so before he obtained the “Urim and Thummim”—perhaps when supposedly digging a well on his neighbor’s farm—has come as shocking news to some Mormons.

12 E.g., Neal A. Maxwell, “‘By the Gift and Power of God,’” Ensign, (Jan. 1997); Turley, Jensen, and Ashurst-McGee, “Joseph the Seer.” This was the larger thesis of Ashurst-McGee’s “Pathway to Prophethood.”

Joseph’s Treasure Hunting with a Seer Stone

Until recently, the LDS Church avoided acknowledging that Joseph was engaged in hunting for buried treasure using a seer stone prior to his claiming to have found and translated the Book of Mormon. When the issue did come up, their spokesmen generally questioned that he did so or commented on the issue in such a way as to imply that Joseph’s reputation in this regard was undeserved.13 In skirting this issue, the LDS Church was simply following Joseph’s lead. In Joseph Smith–History, printed in the Pearl of Great Price, he claimed that his reputation as a treasure-hunter was a misunderstanding. In October 1825 Joseph had, he said, gone to live in the home of Josiah Stowell as a hired hand. Stowell had learned about a lost silver mine supposedly located in Harmony (PA). Joseph reported, “After I went to live with him, he took me, with the rest of his hands, to dig for the silver mine, at which I continued to work for nearly a month, without success in our undertaking, and finally I prevailed with the old gentleman to cease digging after it. Hence arose the very prevalent story of my having been a money-digger” (Pearl of Great Price, JS–H 1:56).

Now that Joseph’s treasure-hunting is well known, Mormons are claiming that his reference to the Stowell expedition shows that he did not try to hide his involvement in such activities.14 However, Joseph did try to hide the nature and extent of his involvement. He was actually the defendant in a court case in 1826 in regards to the expedition with Stowell in late 1825. In the records of that case, Joseph admitted that he had a stone that he had used “occasionally” for three years to locate lost items and buried treasures. This would be three years prior to the Stowell expedition in late 1825, taking us back to 1822, the year Joseph found his seer stone on the Chase farm. Joseph suspended the use of his seer stone in money-digging for most or all of 1826 due to the trial, but resumed the practice for part of 1827.15 Years later, Martin Harris claimed that Joseph had told him that an angel commanded him to quit money-digging.16 In reality, Joseph quit because it was a condition for financial help from his father-in-law Isaac Hale, as both Hale and another witness, Peter Ingersoll, attested. It is also worth noting that according to Ingersoll, Joseph admitted to Hale that “he could not see in a stone now, nor ever could; and that his former pretensions in that respect, were all false.”17 This testimony fits the facts since, in Joseph’s five years of treasure hunting, he never actually acquired anything of value, unless one counts the gold plates.

The fact that Joseph was engaged in “money-digging” for years prior to working for Stowell is not mentioned in any of the recent LDS Church articles for general readers. However, it has been acknowledged in a couple of Mormon books published in 2015 on the subject of Joseph’s translation of the Book of Mormon.18 Since Joseph had been using his seer stone to find buried treasure for three years when Stowell hired him to search for the silver mine, Joseph’s claim that his reputation as a money-digger arose from that one short-lived effort at the end of 1825 is false.

Worse still, Joseph’s account omits the most controversial and relevant aspect of his “money-digging”: his claim to be able to locate buried treasure using a seer stone. Stowell hired Joseph for his silver mine quest, not to perform the manual labor of digging as Joseph Smith—History would lead readers to believe, but to use his reputed gift with the seer stone to locate the mine. We know this both from the 1826 trial and from the later account of Joseph’s mother Lucy, who said that Stowell hired Joseph because he had heard that Joseph “possessed certain keys, by which he could discern things invisible to the natural eye.”19 Mormon scholars have acknowledged that these “keys” were Joseph’s seer stones.20 In an article in the September 2015 Ensign, the LDS Church admitted for the first time that Stowell had hired Joseph because of his reputation for finding treasure using a seer stone.21

The reason why Joseph tried to cover up his years of treasure-hunting is not hard to discern: this was the original context in which Joseph’s supposed discovery of the gold plates took place. In the folklore of Joseph’s early American culture, buried treasure was commonly guarded by spirits—typically either demons or the ghosts of the departed—and thus divination instruments such as divining rods or seer stones were required to locate the treasure. According to Joseph, the gold plates were buried in the ground and guarded by a supernatural being, later identified as the angel Moroni, who refused to allow Joseph to take the plates until various conditions were met. Thus, the story of the finding of the Book of Mormon is a story of buried treasure, one that some LDS scholars have admitted fit comfortably into the folklore beliefs accepted by the Smiths and their associates.22 One recent LDS article explains that Joseph’s account merely “emphasized his visions and other spiritual experiences,”23 but this understatement ignores Joseph’s attempt to explain away his notoriety as someone who for several years had claimed the ability to find lost treasures by looking in a stone.

Joseph also says in this same account that he was visited annually by the angel Moroni, shown the gold plates, and instructed at length about his mission, from 1823 to 1827. As we have seen, this was the very period during which he was often engaged in searching for buried treasures supposedly guarded by spirits. The coincidence raises the reasonable suspicion that the five annual visits of Moroni are a later fiction to replace Joseph’s youthful career as a treasure hunter with a more religiously edifying story about a heavenly angel.

Joseph’s Seer Stone and the Book of Mormon

Mormon scholars and leaders now concede that Joseph used his seer stone to dictate at least a large part of the Book of Mormon. They have not always agreed this was the case. For example, Joseph Fielding Smith, the tenth President of the LDS Church, dismissed all of the accounts of Joseph using his seer stone: “The information is all hearsay, and personally, I do not believe that this stone was used for this purpose.” Smith admitted that the accounts might be true but suggested that the witnesses were confused due to the fact that Joseph did have a seer stone but used it for other purposes.24 A few LDS Church publications after the time of Joseph Fielding Smith mentioned without explanation Joseph using a seer stone to translate,25 while others made reference to the seer stone but implied some doubt as to whether he actually had used it to translate.26 (None of these earlier publications, it should be noted, explained what the seer stone was.) As recently as 2013, an official LDS Church publication hedged on the issue by saying that “Joseph may have used a seer stone he found in his youth to translate a portion of the Book of Mormon.”27 Such uncertainty is now officially gone, as the LDS Church now states explicitly that Joseph did use his seer stone for that purpose.28

Joseph’s wife Emma and the men who were supporting and working with Joseph when he produced the Book of Mormon gave numerous statements years later that all agree as to how Joseph did it. LDS historian Richard Bushman summarized the method as follows: “Joseph put the seer stone in a hat to exclude the light and read off the translated text by looking in the stone. All the while, the plates lay wrapped in a cloth on the table. Apparently Joseph did not look at the plates through most of the translation.” As Bushman conceded, “The actual process by which the Book of Mormon was translated, according to the witnesses of the event and the earliest sources, is generally unknown to members of the Church.”29

That the gold plates were not in view as Joseph dictated his “translation” bears emphasizing. While at times the plates lay covered on a table, at other times they were apparently not even in the room. David Whitmer, for example, stated frankly that Joseph “did not use the plates in the translation.” According to Whitmer, “The plates were not before Joseph while he translated, but seem to have been removed by the custodian angel.”30 Isaac Hale commented that Joseph dictated his translation “with a stone in his hat, and his hat over his face, while the Book of Plates were at the same time hid in the woods!”31

The LDS Church for many years fostered the belief that Joseph Smith actively studied the plates as part of his work of translating them. For example, Joseph Fielding Smith described Joseph’s translation work in this way: “He was busy studying the characters and making himself familiar with them and the use of the Urim and Thummim. He had a great deal more to do than merely to sit down and with the use of the instrument prepared for that purpose translate the characters on the plates.”32 According to a 1988 Ensign article, “The scriptures indicate that translation involved sight, power, transcription of the characters, the Urim and Thummim or a seerstone, study, and prayer.”33 A curriculum manual for upper elementary students currently on the LDS website states: “At first Joseph spent a lot of time becoming familiar with the plates and the language in which they were written. As he studied and prayed, the Urim and Thummim helped him understand the characters on the plates.”34 This understanding was reinforced in LDS artwork depicting Joseph closely examining the plates, often with his finger touching a plate as if he were examining a specific word or character. (Below is an example by Del Parson.)

Once again, the misunderstanding goes back to Joseph Smith, who never mentioned the seer stone or the hat in connection with the translation of the Book of Mormon. Rather, he consistently claimed that he translated the gold plates using spectacles made of transparent stones that he found with the plates at the location revealed by the angel Moroni. According to his official history, Moroni told him that "there were two stones in silver bows—and these stones, fastened to a breastplate, constituted what is called the Urim and Thummim—deposited with the plates; and the possession and use of these stones were what constituted 'seers' in ancient or former times; and that God had prepared them for the purpose of translating the book" (JS–H 1:35). In another statement issued in 1838 he said, "I obtained them [the plates], and the Urim and Thummim with them; by the means of which, I translated the plates; and thus came the book of Mormon."35 In his 1842 Wentworth Letter, Joseph said, "With the records was found a curious instrument which the ancients called 'Urim and Thummim,' which consisted of two transparent stones set in the rims of a bow fastened to a breastplate. Through the medium of the Urim and Thummim I translated the record by the gift and power of God."36 Naturally, Mormons have assumed that these miraculous spectacles with transparent stones were used to read the gold plates but, as scholars have known for many years, Joseph did no such thing.

Mormons have offered two explanations to harmonize Joseph’s repeated, unqualified statement that he translated the Book of Mormon using the stone spectacles he found with the gold plates and the multiple testimonies from witnesses who observed Joseph dictating the Book of Mormon with a seer stone in his hat. The first is that Joseph and his associates began using the term “Urim and Thummim” to refer to both the stone spectacles and the individual seer stone, resulting in some confusion as to which instrument was meant.37 While this might be a possible explanation for other statements using the term, it cannot explain away Joseph’s explicit statements, quoted above, describing the Urim and Thummim as transparent stone spectacles found in the stone box with the gold plates.

The other harmonization goes back to statements made by Joseph’s associates in the decades following his death. According to Joseph’s widow Emma, David Whitmer, and former LDS apostle William McLellin, Joseph used the stone spectacles when he dictated the 116 pages of manuscript that Martin Harris lost in 1828, but used his seer stone when he dictated in 1829 the text of the published Book of Mormon.38 If one assumes that the stone spectacles existed, this would seem to be the only satisfactory explanation.

On the other hand, no one ever saw Joseph using the stone spectacles to translate the gold plates. Harris, who served as Joseph’s scribe for the lost 116 pages, never saw Joseph during the process, as a curtain or blanket was hung that shielded him (and the reported plates and stone spectacles) from view. Harris told at least two different individuals, John A. Clark and Charles Anthon, about the curtain or blanket.39 Harris’s own understanding was that Joseph began with the stone spectacles but soon switched during their translation work to the seer stone “for convenience.”40 Thus, the claim made by Emma and others that Joseph used the stone spectacles for the lost 116 pages is at least largely negated by Harris’s story.

In short, according to the testimonies of his associates (other than Oliver Cowdery), Joseph used the seer stone for much if not most of the lost 116 pages dictated in 1828 and for all of the pages they witnessed him dictating in 1829 that became the published Book of Mormon. This makes his unqualified claim to have translated the Book of Mormon with the stone spectacles at least misleading if not an outright lie.

Translating with the Seer Stone: Was It a Miracle?

Granting that Joseph dictating of the Book of Mormon with his face in his hat is contrary to his own account of what happened, many Mormons have argued that the method confirms that the translation was a divine miracle. After all, they ask, how could Joseph have dictated the Book of Mormon using his own natural knowledge or resources with his face buried in his hat? No doubt his dictating pages of manuscript without looking up from his hat impressed Joseph’s original circle of supporters who watched him do so. Richard Bushman has commented, “Although the witnesses’ explanations of the translation process differ from what is generally understood by Church members, the testimonies of these witnesses affirm that the use of the seer stones—placed as they were in a hat to block out the light so the words of God could be read—was the greatest evidence to them of the miraculous nature of the translation process.” As impressed as Joseph’s associates may have been, there are reasons to conclude that Joseph’s dictation was not a divine miracle.

First, the method of “translation” was the same divination method Joseph and others in his society used in trying to find the location of buried treasure. Divination, which is a form of magic, and miracle are two distinct concepts even though both of them involve unseen forces. Mormon scholar John Welch’s comment that religion seeks “a deity’s actions” and “makes petitions to God” while “magic typically tries to command, control, or manipulate the supernatural” helpfully points in the right direction. Divination was and is an art performed by individuals especially adept or skilled at utilizing certain objects as instruments for tapping into unseen sources of knowledge. The knowledge is accessed by using the right kind of objects or paraphernalia and performing the right actions according to very specific instructions and under the right conditions. Whereas in the Bible God has the freedom to deny or to approve a request for a miracle however well or poorly presented, in magic the desired result comes automatically as long as the proper procedure is carried out to the letter; failure is always due to some mistake or imperfection in the process used by the practitioner. Thus, the fact that Joseph’s translation was produced using a form of divination common in the folkloric magical practice of his culture is evidence against it having been a genuine miracle.

Second, Joseph’s method of dictating with his face in the hat meant that no one could actually observe the instrument of the seer stone working. His associates were given to understand that when Joseph looked into his hat with all outside light blocked, he could see words in light emanating from or in the stone. But the same method that kept outside natural light from coming into the hat kept any supposed supernatural light from coming out of the hat. Joseph’s associates could only take his word for it that he saw anything in the hat at all.

Third, assuming that the witnesses truthfully reported watching Joseph dictate with his face in his hat, this does not mean that all of the Book of Mormon original manuscript was dictated or written in that fashion. There is no journal recording what pages or text of the Book of Mormon were dictated from day to day. We also do not have detailed records telling us on which days the various witnesses actually sat and watched Joseph dictating the text to Oliver Cowdery, the main scribe for the Book of Mormon. About three-quarters of the original manuscript is no longer extant (having apparently suffered irreparable water damage), complicating any study to determine if it had all been produced in the same way. Thus, it is possible that some of the manuscript was dictated with Joseph not looking in his hat. This possibility leads us to the next point.

Fourth, there is good evidence that Joseph used a Bible when he dictated the Book of Mormon material that parallels chapters of the Bible. There are well over 600 verses of the Bible that are duplicated in the Book of Mormon (representing 27 chapters of the Bible), and this material is at least 96 per cent verbally identical to the King James Version. Hypothetically, one can imagine three explanations for this fact: Joseph supernaturally had the words of the KJV revealed to him, he memorized the chapters before sitting for his dictation, or he had a Bible in hand when he dictated those chapters.

The supernatural explanation is the easiest to disprove, because if true one would expect that the text would match the KJV exactly except where the KJV wording was somehow wrong. That is, if God had supernaturally revealed the words of the Book of Mormon translation to Joseph, and if God had chosen... to use the KJV as the basis for biblical quotations, one would expect variations from the KJV only where there was some problem with the KJV wording. However, the four per cent of verbal variations from the KJV in biblical quotations in the Book of Mormon are generally not corrections of problems in the KJV. For example, in duplicating the Beatitudes more or less as they appear in Matthew 5, the Book of Mormon has the trivial word “and” inserted at the beginning of all but the first of the Beatitudes (3 Nephi 12:4-11). The only point to such a trivial deviation from the KJV text is to make it seem as if the “translation” is not simply copied from the KJV.

The hypothesis that Joseph memorized chapters or sections of the Bible before dictating them is not as implausible as today’s Google-dependent readers might imagine. In Joseph’s day it was not at all uncommon for young men to have memorized whole chapters and even books of the Bible.45

The third hypothesis, that Joseph dictated the biblical chapters into the Book of Mormon with Bible in hand, is however the most likely explanation. This follows from the fact that Joseph introduced minor as well as major variations into the biblical material, something that might be difficult to do while reciting from memory.

Many of the insignificant variations from the KJV in biblical quotations are placed either at the beginning of a verse or are associated with the italicized words in the KJV. The KJV used italics to indicate that an English word did not correspond to a specific word in the original Hebrew or Greek text. So, for example, Matthew 5:11 in the KJV reads, “Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake.” The Book of Mormon parallel reads exactly the same except for two changes: it adds “And” to the beginning of the verse (as mentioned earlier), and it omits the italicized word “you” after the word “persecute” (3 Nephi 12:11). These minor variations (and there are many of them throughout the Book of Mormon) are strong evidence that these passages were composed by someone who had a KJV in hand, reading along and making mostly minor verbal changes at what seemed to be opportune places.

Some respected Mormons have agreed that Joseph used a KJV when dictating passages from the Bible. Historian B. H. Roberts, President Joseph F. Smith, Apostle Bruce McConkie, and BYU professor Kent Jackson are just some of the LDS scholars and leaders who have put forward this conclusion.46 Evidently, Joseph dictated most of the Book of Mormon with his face in his hat, but not all of it, as is shown by his use of the KJV.

Thus, far from showing that the translation of the Book of Mormon was a miracle, Joseph’s use of the divination practice of gazing at his seer stone in a hat raises a number of difficulties for the belief that Joseph was divinely inspired in his translation.

The Seer Stone: What Difference Does It Make?

What is the significance of the fact that Joseph dictated his translation of the Book of Mormon using a seer stone in his hat rather than a pair of stone spectacles? Michael Ash, a popular Mormon apologist, puts the question this way: Does it really matter whether Joseph dictated the Book of Mormon using one stone or two stones?47

1. The difference is not merely a matter of one stone versus two stones, but of two very different instruments and two very different methods. Whereas Joseph claimed to have translated the Book of Mormon using transparent stone spectacles that were in the box where the gold plates were found, in fact he dictated his translation by looking at a non-transparent, chocolate-colored stone in his hat. Not only are the instruments very different, the method is very different: Joseph did not “read” the gold plates with the stone spectacles or even look at the plates while dictating his translation, but instead had his face buried in his hat.

2. It makes a difference that Joseph used a seer stone because it means that Joseph Smith did not tell the truth when he claimed that he used the stone spectacles found with the gold plates. This falsehood is part of the official account contained in Mormon scripture (Joseph Smith—History), making it a very serious problem. Moreover, this is not the only such instance, which leads to the third point.

3. Joseph’s use of the seer stone in the hat reveals that the Book of Mormon originated in the context of Joseph’s disreputable magical “money-digging” enterprises. We showed earlier that Joseph falsified his official history by claiming that his involvement in treasure hunting was limited to a month-long expedition in which he was buried in his hat, but not all of it, as is shown by his use of the KJV.

44 I discuss this example and many more in “The Sermon at the Temple in the Book of Mormon: A Critical Examination of Its Authenticity through a Comparison with the Sermon on the Mount in the Gospel of Matthew” (Ph.D. diss., South African Theological Seminary, 2014), chapter 7.

45 See further Robert M. Bowman Jr., “Did the Young Joseph Smith Study the Bible?” (IRR, 2010).

just one of several manual laborers who dug for Josiah Stowell. In fact Joseph engaged in treasure-hunting operations with his family and others over a five-year period, and his main implement was not a shovel but a seer stone. This makes two deliberate falsehoods in Joseph's scriptural account. Now we have seen that treasure-hunting was the context not only of Joseph's claim to have found the gold plates but also of his claim to translate them by divine power. It thus becomes clear that the motivation for Joseph's falsifying his history with regard to the instrument used to translate the plates was the same as the motivation for his falsifying his history with regard to his involvement in money-digging.

Joseph wished to persuade people that he was a prophet of God who found and translated the Book of Mormon by divine revelation. He recognized that this claim would not be credible if the Book of Mormon was viewed as originating in his years-long career of using a magical stone to lead people to buried treasure.

4. The preceding two points establish that Joseph Smith's account of the origins of the Book of Mormon cannot be considered reliable. That Joseph was not forthright about the origins of the Book of Mormon is hard to deny. When his brother Hyrum in 1831 directly asked him at a general conference of the LDS Church to explain how he translated the Book of Mormon—a question Hyrum asked in full faith that the translation was inspired—Joseph “said that it was not intended to tell the world all the particulars of the coming forth of the Book of Mormon; and also said that it was not expedient for him to relate these things.”

The most he would ever say was that he did so using the Urim and Thummim that he had found with the gold plates—which we know was not true—and that he did so “by the gift and power of God.” Mormon apostle Neal A. Maxwell admitted, “The Prophet Joseph alone knew the full process, and he was deliberately reluctant to describe details.” Maxwell, however, dismissed the question as unimportant: “Our primary focus in studying the Book of Mormon should be on the principles of the gospel anyway, not on the process by which the book came forth.” In view of the evidence that Joseph deliberately misled people as to “the full process,” anyone who honestly wants to know the truth should be concerned.

5. The fact that Joseph Smith did not use the stone spectacles to translate the Book of Mormon stands in conflict with the teaching of the Book of Mormon itself. Joseph’s statement that “the possession and use of these stones [of the spectacles called the Urim and Thummim] were what constituted ‘seers’ in ancient or former times” (JS–H 1:35) clearly implies that if Joseph did not use those stones (but instead a seer stone he found years earlier) then he was not genuinely functioning as a “seer” in his translation. This implication is supported by the Book of Mormon.

In one passage, a figure named Ammon is quoted as saying that he knows of a man that can translate records in an unknown language, “for he has wherewith that he can look, and translate all records that are of ancient date; and it is a gift from God.” These “things are called interpreters,” and whomever God commands “to look in them, the same is called seer” (Mosiah 8:13). After hearing more about the powers of a seer, the king agreed that “these interpreters were doubtless prepared for the purpose of unfolding all such mysteries to the children of men” (8:19). The interpreters were “two stones which were fastened into the two rims of a bow” and that were “prepared from the beginning, and were handed down from generation to generation, for the purpose of interpreting languages” (28:13-14).

These are the same “interpreters” that Joseph claimed he used to translate the Book of Mormon. Yet it turns out that he did not do so. If the use of these specific stones as spectacles were what enabled certain men to function as “seers,” it follows that anyone falsely claiming to have used those stone spectacles would not be a genuine seer. Thus the problem goes beyond the fact that Joseph falsified his testimony about how he translated the plates, as bad as that is. According to his own claim and the very text he claimed to have translated supernaturally, the fact that he did not use the ancient stone spectacles and yet claimed to do so disqualifies him as a genuine seer.

6. The fact that Joseph did not look at the gold plates when dictating his “translation” means that the Book of Mormon need have no relation to the supposed gold plates at all. Joseph’s method of producing the text of the Book of Mormon in effect renders the gold plates irrelevant. There was no need for Moroni (whom the Book of Mormon identifies as its last ancient author) to carry the gold plates (weighing forty pounds or more according to Joseph’s associates, though if they really were gold they should have weighed closer to two hundred pounds) thousands of miles from Central America to upstate New York (a tall order, to put it mildly) in order to bury them for Joseph to discover fourteen centuries later. (The people of ancient Mesoamerica had no pack horses or other beasts of burden, so Moroni would have had to carry the plates, and I [Jesus] say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. (Matthew 16:18 KJV) along with the stone spectacles and the breastplate, on his own.) Yet Joseph did not need the plates, the stone spectacles, the breastplate, or anything other than what he already had, his small treasure-hunting seer stone and his hat, along with the divine revelation Mormons claim he received.

The best Mormon apologists have been able to say in response to this point is that Joseph needed to have contact with the gold plates as physical assurance that the Book of Mormon was based on something real. There are two objections to this explanation. The first is that if the point of having the plates was to be assured that the Book of Mormon was an ancient text, then Joseph should have used the transparent stone spectacles he claimed had been provided. Doing so would have produced a much more direct, tangible demonstration to Joseph—and anyone else permitted to watch—that the Book of Mormon was really translated from ancient scriptures. Second, the explanation is out of sync with the constant refrain of Mormon leaders, scholars, and apologists that knowledge of the truth of the Book of Mormon must be gained by a witness of the Holy Ghost and not by physical evidence (cf. Moroni 10:4-5).

Joseph Smith’s use of a seer stone when dictating the Book of Mormon is extremely consequential with regard to the truth claims of Mormonism. It discredits the honesty and credibility of his account of the origins of the Book of Mormon, establishes the folkloric, superstitious context of Mormon beginnings, contradicts the teaching of the Book of Mormon itself, undermines the reliability of the LDS Church’s teaching about its history, and disconnects the Book of Mormon from its supposed ancient physical basis. No wonder that many erstwhile faithful Mormons have been shocked by this news, as was a Mormon leader in New Zealand last year:

Today I am reeling from the translation of the “Book of Mormon” essay. Exactly how was I to know that Joseph Smith got the words to the Book of Mormon by burying his head in a hat. How was I to know that a stone he found in a well was instrumental in this process of translation? . . . What am I to make of a story I find confounding and frankly bizarre?51

What indeed.

Give Brother Joseph a break?
By Sandra Tanner

Over the last two years the LDS Church has issued a number of essays in an attempt to answer some of the troubling aspects of Joseph Smith’s life and teachings, such as Smith’s stone in the hat, lack of evidence for the Book of Mormon, marrying married women and girls as young as 14, failed translation of the Book of Abraham, etc. However, many Mormons have found these essays troubling, not just because of new information but also due to the minimizing of the depth of the problems.

At the October 2015 semi-annual conference of the LDS Church there were several talks admonishing the faithful to follow the brethren, set aside their doubts and seek faith. Speaking at the Saturday evening Priesthood session, Apostle Neil L. Andersen admonished:

The questions concerning the prophet Joseph Smith are not new. They have been hurled by his critics since this work began. To those of faith who, looking through the colored glasses of the 21st century, honestly question events or statements of the prophet Joseph from nearly 200 years ago, may I share some friendly advice? For now, give Brother Joseph a break! In a future day you will have 100 times more information than from all of today’s [Internet] search engines combined. And it will come from our all-knowing Father in Heaven.1

But must we wait until we stand before God for such answers? Andersen pleads “Give Brother Joseph a break,” but there are already enough facts for the average rational person to conclude that Joseph doesn’t measure up as a prophet of God. We are regularly receiving visits and phone calls from troubled LDS members who are struggling with their faith in Mormonism. Many of them say it all started after just reading the various Gospel Topics essays. The problem isn’t that we lack sufficient information, the problem is that the information counters a lifetime of indoctrination.

How much of a break are Mormons willing to extend to some of the prophets of the breakoff polygamist groups? Couldn’t the FLDS just as rightly call for giving Warren Jeffs a break, even though he is serving a lifetime sentence in Texas for relations with twelve to fourteen-year-old girls? How is this any different than Joseph Smith taking fourteen-year-olds as secret polygamist wives?2 Both Jeffs and Smith claimed revelation for their acts.

When Paul preached to the Jews in Berea that Jesus was the Messiah, they were not told to just have faith in what Paul told them, they were commended because they “searched the scriptures daily, whether those things were so” (Acts 17:11). In today’s world of competing truth claims we would do well to examine the evidence, not just rely on our feelings. ■
Many readers were surprised when they opened their copy of the Salt Lake Tribune, August 5, 2015, to see a photo of Joseph Smith’s long concealed “seer stone,” which is kept in the LDS First Presidency’s vault.

This stone had been unearthed while Joseph Smith was digging a well for a neighbor in the early 1820s and used to discover hidden objects and later to decipher the text of the Book of Mormon.

During the four-year time period that an angel was supposedly grooming Smith for the role of “Seer” (before allowing him to retrieve the plates) Joseph and his father were consulting the stone while engaged in treasure digging. While Smith’s use of a divining rock has been known since the early days of Mormonism, this is the first time the LDS Church has released photographs of the stone.

In the recent LDS article “Book of Mormon Translation” it is conceded that he used both the interpreters (spectacles) stored with the plates and the seer stone. However, the article still minimizes the use of the stone:

Apparently for convenience, Joseph often translated with the single seer stone rather than the two stones bound together to form the interpreters. These two instruments—the interpreters and the seer stone—were apparently interchangeable and worked in much the same way such that, in the course of time, Joseph Smith and his associates often used the term “Urim and Thummim” to refer to the single stone as well as the interpreters.

However, the eye-witnesses to the translation only described Joseph Smith staring at his stone in a hat, not of him looking at the plates through large spectacles. David Whitmer explained the process:

I will now give you a description of the manner in which the Book of Mormon was translated. Joseph would put the seer stone into a hat, and put his face in the hat, drawing it closely around his face to exclude the light; and in the darkness the spiritual light would shine. A piece of something resembling parchment would appear, and on that appeared the writing. One character at a time would appear, and under it was the interpretation in English. Brother Joseph would read off the English to Oliver Cowdery, who was his principal scribe, and when it was written down and repeated to Brother Joseph to see if it was correct, then it would disappear, and another character with the interpretation would appear. Thus the Book of Mormon was translated by the gift and power of God, and not by any power of man.

Curiously, after examining a number of LDS manuals no illustrations were found depicting Smith using his stone. Instead, he is almost always shown sitting at a desk and simply looking at the plates, as though he were doing a regular translation. The cover for the February, 2001, Ensign is an example of this.

An article in the October 2015 Ensign, “Joseph the Seer,” concedes the Smith’s magic involvement:

The young Joseph Smith accepted such familiar folk ways of his day, including the idea of using seer stones to view lost or hidden objects. Since the biblical narrative showed God using physical objects to focus people’s faith or communicate spiritually in ancient times, Joseph and others assumed the same for their day. Joseph’s parents, Joseph Smith Sr. and Lucy Mack Smith, affirmed the family’s immersion in this culture and their use of physical objects in this way, and the villagers of Palmyra and Manchester, New York, where the Smiths lived, sought out Joseph to find lost objects before he moved to Pennsylvania in late 1827.

However, the Smiths’ involvement with the occult was more extensive than the LDS article describes.

Smith’s 1826 Arrest

In the early 1820s the Smiths were known to be searching for hidden treasures. In fact, a man named Josiah Stowell hired Joseph Smith to use his stone to help find a long lost silver mine. Researchers H. Michael Marquardt and Wesley P. Walters provide background on this event:

When Joseph Smith recalled his money-digging activities for his official history, he wrote only about searching for a lost mine in 1825 for Josiah Stowell. But contemporary records suggest that this had been one of the Smith family occupations in the Palmyra/Manchester area since the early 1820s. For example, Joshua Stafford of Manchester recalled that he “became acquainted with the family of Joseph Smith, Sen. about the year 1819 or 20. They then were laboring people, in low circumstances. A short time after this, they commenced digging for hidden treasures, . . . and told marvellous stories about ghosts, hob-goblins, caverns, and various other mysterious matters.” Willard Chase, another friend of the family, similarly recalled, “I became acquainted with the Smith family . . . in the year 1820. At that time they were engaged in the money digging business.”

While Mormons often defend Smith’s employment as a money-digger as simply a matter of being a hired hand, Smith’s mother states that Mr. Stowell traveled across the state to hire Joseph Smith specifically due to his reputation of special powers. Lucy Smith wrote:

A short time before the house was completed [1825], a man by the name of Josiah Stoal came from Chenango county, New York, with the view of getting Joseph to assist him in digging for a silver mine. He came for Joseph on account of having heard that he possessed certain keys by which he could discern things invisible to the natural eye.

In November of 1825 Mr. Stowell and a group of men, including the Smiths, signed an agreement to share any gold or silver recovered from their dig. LDS Apostle Russell M. Nelson recently mentioned this money-digging agreement, but didn’t explain that Joseph was specifically hired to serve as the medium to locate the treasure.

When no treasure was found, a relative of Josiah Stowell, fearing that his uncle was being swindled, brought charges against Joseph Smith for fraudulently claiming powers he did not have. According to court records, in 1826 Joseph Smith, the “glass looker,” was arrested and brought before Judge Albert Neely on charges of being a “disorderly person” due to his professed power to use his seer stone to find buried treasure. Smith’s defense was that he truly had such powers, “but of late had pretty much given it up on account its injuring his health, especially his eyes.” The court record was published in the New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge in 1883:

People of State of New York vs. Joseph Smith. Warrant issued upon oath of Peter G. Bridgman, who informed that one Joseph Smith of Bainbridge was a disorderly person and an imposter. Prisoner brought into court [March 20, 1826]. Prisoner examined. Says that he came from town of Palmyra, and had been at the house of Josiah Stowell in Bainbridge most of time since; had small part of time been employed in looking for mines, but the major part had been employed by said Stowell on his farm, and going to school; that he had a certain stone, which he had occasionally looked at to determine where hidden treasures in the earth were; that he professed to tell in this manner where gold-mines were a distance under ground, and had looked for Mr. Stowell several times, and informed him where he could find those treasures, and Mr. Stowell had been engaged in digging for them; that at Palmyra he pretended to tell, by looking at this stone, where coined money was buried in Pennsylvania, and while at Palmyra he had frequently ascertained in that way where lost property was, of various kinds; that he has occasionally been in the habit of looking through this stone to find lost property for three years, but of late had pretty much given it up on account its injuring his health, especially his eyes—made them sore; that he did not solicit business of this kind, and had always rather declined having anything to do with this business. . . . And thereupon the Court finds the defendant guilty.

In 1971 Wesley P. Walters located the Chenango county documents relating to Smith’s 1826 arrest and hearing in the damp, musty basement of the jail in Norwich, New York. In these bundles of papers were two documents that related to Smith’s 1826 hearing. Mr. Walters explained:

The discovery among the 1826 Chenango County bills of two bills from the officials who participated in the arrest and trial of Joseph Smith at South Bainbridge in 1826 now confirms this story beyond question. The bill of Justice Albert Neely carries this entry:

same vs Misdemeanor
Joseph Smith
The Glass looker
March 20, 1826
To my fees in examination of the above cause 2.68

The phrase “Glass looker” appearing on Mr. Neely’s bill is the precise terminology preferred by Joseph Smith himself to describe his crystal gazing occupation. The bill of Constable Philip De Zeng gives further historical evidence and details concerning this trial, by listing:8

The documents suggest that Joseph Smith appeared before Justice Neely for what was known as an “examination.”9 This seems to be like a preliminary hearing we have today where the accused is bound over for trial at a later date. It would appear from page 109 of A New Conductor Generalis that since Justice Neely found Joseph Smith “guilty” of being a “disorderly person” he could have immediately sentenced him to “sixty days” in the “bridewell or house of correction, at hard labor,” but instead he bound him over to be tried by three justices at a later date. These justices could have ordered “him to be detained at hard labor, for any future time not exceeding six months, and during his confinement to be corrected by whipping, according to the nature of the offense, as they shall think fit.”

Since we do not have the rest of Justice Neely’s docket book or any other extant record concerning the matter, it is difficult to determine what finally happened in this case. It is possible that Joseph Smith could have admitted his guilt and struck an agreement with the county. Often officials who wanted to cut expenses would be willing to let prisoners go if they would agree to leave the county where the crime took place. The main point is that his arrest as a “glass looker” confirms Joseph Smith’s role as village magician.

Smith’s father-in-law, Isaac Hale, claimed that after Joseph married Emma in 1827 he promised to give up money-digging and seek regular employment. However, he seems to have simply moved from claiming to find lost treasures through his stone to translating hidden scriptures through the same means. Mr. Hale stated:

Smith stated to me, that he had given up what he called “glass-looking,” and that he expected to work hard for a living, and was willing to do so . . . Soon after this, I was informed they had brought a wonderful book of Plates down with them . . . The manner in which he pretended to read and interpret, was the same as when he looked for the money-diggers, with the stone in his hat, and his hat over his face, while the Book of Plates were at the same time hid in the woods!10

Faculty of Abrac

Another example of the Smith’s involvement with magic is found in mother Smith’s preliminary draft of her biography. She acknowledged the family’s “sooth saying” but assured her readers that this never interfered with their regular efforts to earn a living:

Let not the reader suppose that because I shall pursue another topic for a season that we stopt our labor and went at trying to win the faculty of Abrac [,] drawing Magic circles or sooth saying [sic] to the neglect of all kinds of business[.] [W]e never during our lives suffered one important interest to swallow up every other obligation but whilst we worked with our hands we endeavored to remmember [sic] the service of & the welfare of our souls.11

The “faculty of Abrac” relates to the belief that by possessing an amulet with Abracadabra written in a special way the owner would be assured of good health. Below is an example of this:12

Researcher Robert N. Hullinger tied Abrac with Masonic practices:

Abrac, from Abracadabra and Abraxis, is a magic word or formula used on amulets to work magic charms. Eighteenth century Masons were said to know how to conceal “the way of obtaining the faculty of Abrac,” which implied that they knew how to get it.13

In regards to Lucy Smith’s statement about magic circles, William Safford, a friend of the Smiths, testified:

I, William Stafford, having been called upon to give a true statement . . . do say, that I first became acquainted with Joseph, Sen., and his family in the year 1820. . . . A great part of their time was devoted to digging for money: especially in the night time. . . . I have heard them tell marvellous tales, respecting the discoveries they had made in their peculiar occupation of money digging. They would say, for instance, that in such a place, in such a hill, on a certain man’s farm, there were deposited keys, barrels and hogsheds of coined silver and gold—bars of gold, golden images, brass kettles filled with gold and silver—gold candlesticks, swords, &c. &c. They would say, also, that nearly all the hills in this part of New York, were thrown up by human hands, and in them were large caves, which Joseph, Jr., could see, by placing a stone of singular appearance in his hat, in such a manner as to exclude all light; at which time they pretended he could see all things within and under the earth,—that he could see within the above mentioned caves, large gold bars and silver plates—that he could also discover the spirits in whose charge these treasures were, clothed in ancient dress. . . . These tales I regarded as visionary. However, being prompted by curiosity, I at length accepted of their invitations, to join them in their nocturnal excursions. I will now relate a few incidents attending these excursions.

Joseph Smith, Sen., came to me one night, and told me, that Joseph Jr. had been looking in his glass, and had seen, not many rods from his house, two or three kegs of gold and silver, some feet under the surface of the earth; and that none others but the elder Joseph and myself could get them. I accordingly consented to go, and early in the evening repaired to the place of deposit. Joseph, Sen. first made a circle, twelve or fourteen feet in diameter. This circle, said he, contains the treasure. He then stuck in the ground a row of witch hazel sticks, around the said circle, for the purpose of keeping off the evil spirits. Within this circle he made another, of about eight or ten feet in diameter. He walked around three times on the periphery of this last circle, muttering to himself something which I could not understand. He next stuck a steel rod in the centre of the circles, and then enjoined profound silence upon us, lest we should arouse the evil spirit who had the charge of these treasures. After we had dug a trench about five feet in depth around the rod, the old man by signs and motions, asked leave of absence, and went to the house to inquire of young Joseph the cause of our disappointment. He soon returned and said, that Joseph had remained all this time in the house, looking in his stone and watching the motion of the evil spirit—that he saw the spirit come up to the ring and as soon as it beheld the cone which we had formed around the rod, it caused the money to sink.14

Sinking Treasures

The common belief that treasures could sink is also present in the Book of Mormon. In Mormon 1:18-19 we read that the people “began to hide up their treasures in the earth; and they became slippery, because the Lord had cursed the land, that they could not hold them, nor retain them again. . . . there were sorceries, and witchcrafts, and magics; and the power of the evil one was wrought upon the face of the land, . . .”

The Book of Mormon also makes these statements concerning hidden treasures:

And behold, if a man hide up a treasure in the earth, and the Lord shall say—Let it be accursed, because of the iniquity of him who hath hid it up—behold, it shall be accursed.

And if the Lord shall say—Be thou accursed, that no man shall find thee from this time henceforth and forever—behold, no man getteth it henceforth and forever. (Book of Mormon, Helaman 12:18-19)

. . . whoso shall hide up treasures in the earth shall find them no more, because of the great curse of the land, save he be a righteous man and shall hide it up unto the Lord.

For I will, saith the Lord, that they shall hide up their treasures unto me; and cursed be they who hide not up their treasures unto me; for none hideth up their treasures unto me save it be the righteous; and he that hideth not up his treasures unto me, cursed is he, and also the treasure, and none shall redeem it because of the curse of the land. (Ibid., Helaman 13:18-19)

Behold, we lay a tool here and on the morrow it is gone; and behold, our swords are taken from us in the day we have sought them for battle.

Yea, we have hid up our treasures and they have slipped away from us, because of the curse of the land.

O that we had repented in the day that the word of the Lord came unto us; for behold the land is cursed, and all things are become slippery, and we cannot hold them.

Behold, we are surrounded by demons, yea, we are encircled about by the angels of him who hath sought to destroy our souls. . . . (Ibid., Helaman 13:34-37)

Even Oliver Cowdery, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, said that when Joseph Smith went to the hill to get the gold plates he was concerned about not being able to obtain them because “he had heard of the power of enchantment, and a thousand like stories, which held the hidden treasures of the earth.” 15

Seer Stone or Interpreters?

The LDS Church has traditionally written about the translation of the Book of Mormon in terms of Smith’s use of the “Urim and Thummim” without explaining that the term was applied to two different items. Smith first used the “interpreters” (large spectacles) preserved with the plates but soon switched to using the seer stone found in a well. When questioned in 1870 as to the process of translation, Emma Smith wrote:

“Now the first that my husband translated, was translated by the use of the Urim and Thummim [interpreters], and that was the part that Martin Harris lost, after that he used a small stone, not exactly black, but was rather a dark color.” 16

While David Whitmer was not a scribe during the dictating of the first 116 pages of text, he did state that he never saw Smith use the spectacles. In 1879 J. L. Traughber reported his earlier conversation with Whitmer:

“With the sanction of David Whitmer, and by his authority, I now state he does not say that Joseph Smith ever translated in his presence by aid of Urim and Thummim [the spectacles], but by means of one dark colored, opaque stone called a ‘Seer Stone,’ which was placed in the crown of a hat, into which Joseph put his face, so as to exclude the external light. Then, a spiritual light would appear before Joseph, upon which was a line of characters from the plates, and under it, the translation in English; at least, so Joseph said.” 17

Many years ago M. T. Lamb made some important observations regarding Joseph Smith’s strange habit of using his seer stone instead of the instruments preserved with the plates:

Finally, according to the testimony of Martin Harris, Mr. Smith often used the “seer stone” in place of the Urim and Thummim, even while the latter remained in his possession—using it as a mere matter of convenience.

It seems almost too bad that he should thus inadvertently give the whole thing away. You must understand that the Urim and Thummim spoken of, and called throughout the Book of Mormon “the Interpreters,” had been provided with great care over 2500 years ago by God himself, for the express purpose of translating these plates. They are often mentioned in the Book of Mormon as exceedingly important. They were preserved with the greatest care, handed down from one generation to another with the plates, and buried with them in the hill Cumorah over 1400 years ago; as sacred as the plates themselves. So sacred that only one man was allowed to handle or use them, the highly favored prophet, Joseph Smith himself. But now, alas! After all this trouble and pains and care on the part of God, and on the part of so many holy men of old, this “Urim and Thummim” is found at last to be altogether superfluous; not needed at all. This “peep stone” found in a neighbor’s well will do the work just as well—and is even more convenient, “for convenience he used the seer stone.” So we are left to infer that when he used the Urim and Thummim at all, it was at some inconvenience. And probably he only did it out of regard to the feelings of his God, who had spent so much time and anxiety in preparing it so long ago, and preserving it to the present day for his special use! 18

Joseph’s Jupiter Talisman

Contrary to the Bible’s strong denunciation of magic and necromancy, such as in Deuteronomy 18:9-14 and elsewhere, Joseph Smith and many, if not all, of the witnesses had been involved in the magic practices of the area, believing in ghosts who guarded buried treasures, using magic spells and paraphernalia.

Besides Joseph Smith’s seer stone, he also owned a magic Jupiter talisman (a silver medallion worn on a string around the neck).19 LDS historian Reed C. Durham made these observations about Smith’s talisman in his presidential address to the Mormon History Association on April 20, 1974:

All available evidence suggest that Joseph Smith the Prophet possessed a magical Masonic medallion, or talisman, which he worked during his lifetime and which was evidently on his person when he was martyred. His talisman is in the shape of a silver dollar and is probably made of silver or tin... [it] can now be identified as a Jupiter talisman. It carries the sign and image of Jupiter and should more appropriately be referred to as the Table of Jupiter. ... In astrology, Jupiter is always associated with high positions, getting one’s own way, and all forms of status.20

According to Emma Smith’s stepson, the talisman passed from Joseph to Emma after his death. The stepson later sold the object to Wilford C. Wood, a Mormon collector in Woods Cross, Utah. Charles E. Bidamon stated: “I certify that I have many times heard her [Emma Smith Bidamon] say, when being interviewed, and showing the piece. That it was in the Prophets pocket when he was martyred at Carthage Ill.” Mr. Bidamon also claimed that Emma “prized this piece very highly on account of its being one of the prophet’s intimate possessions.”21

Hyrum Smith’s Magic Papers

Hyrum Smith, Joseph’s older brother, also owned magic paraphernalia. Among his possessions were several magic parchments, a pouch for storage, and a magic dagger.22

These artifacts are currently in the possession of the Eldred G. Smith family. Eldred, who died in 2013, was Patriarch emeritus of the LDS Church and great, great-grandson of Hyrum Smith. Mormon writer Pearson H. Corbett described these relics of Hyrum Smith in his book, Hyrum Smith—Patriarch:

Dagger, Masonic ten inch, stainless steel—wooden handle—Masonic symbols on blade.

Emblematic parchments—Masonic—three, original hand painted on heavy bodied paper—on border appears initials “I.H.S.” ... Pouch, Masonic cotton fabric 4” x 4” with draw string attached.23

Historian D. Michael Quinn made the following observation about the Smith family’s magic artifacts:

The three magic parchments possessed by the Smith family have three different purposes, all interrelated. The “Holiness to the Lord” parchment is a lamen of ceremonial magic to receive visitation from “good angels.” The “Saint Peter bind them” parchment is a talisman for personal protection. The faded “Jehovah, Jehovah, Jehovah” parchment is a house-amulet.24

These artifacts certainly demonstrate a deeper level of involvement with magic than simply using a “seer stone” to translate the Book of Mormon.

Unlike the early converts to Christianity in Acts 19:19 who burned their magic artifacts, Joseph and Hyrum Smith preserved theirs.

Smith and the Methodists

It is interesting to note that as early as 1828 members of the Methodist Church were forced to evaluate Joseph Smith’s involvement with magic. He had taken steps to join their church, but they felt his dealings in magic made him unfit to be a member.

In the book Inventing Mormonism we read:

In 1879 Joseph and Hiel Lewis, cousins to Joseph’s first wife, Emma Hale, stated that Joseph joined the Methodist Episcopal church or class in Harmony, Pennsylvania, in the summer of 1828. There was disagreement about how long Joseph’s name remained on class rolls. See the articles in the Amboy [Illinois] Journal. . . . It is possible that Joseph attended class with his wife Emma because of the death of their first son on 15 June 1828. That Joseph was a member of the class was not questioned, only the length of time his name remained on the class record.25

Joseph and Hiel Lewis recounted that Smith had “presented himself in a very serious and humble manner, and the minister, not suspecting evil, put his name on the class book, in the absence of some of the official members.”26 When Joseph Lewis learned of this act, he felt that Smith was not truly repentant of his magic involvement and felt him to be unfit for membership. Mr. Lewis further details the incident:

I with Joshua McKune . . . thought it was a disgrace to the church to have a practicing necromancer, a dealer in enchantments and bleeding ghosts in it. So on Sunday we went . . . and talked to him some time . . . Told him that his occupation, habits and moral character were at variance with the discipline . . . that there should have been recantation, confession and at least promised reformation—That he could that day publicly ask that his name be stricken from the class book, or stand investigation. He chose the former, and did that very day make request that his name be taken off the class book.27

It is certainly strange that Joseph Smith would try to join the Methodist Church if, in fact, he had been instructed by God in 1820 not to join any church. According to Smith’s history:

I asked the Personages who stood above me in the light, which of all the sects was right (for at this time it had never entered into my heart that all were wrong)—and which I should join.

I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight . . . . (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History 1:18-19)

Animal Sacrifices

Animal sacrifices were often a part of the magic rituals that accompanied money-digging. In the first edition of his book, Early Mormonism and the Magic World View, page 144, Dr. D. Michael Quinn gives this information: “A cousin of Smith’s wife Emma reported that Smith ‘translated the book of Mormon by means of the same peep stone, and under the same inspiration that directed his enchantments and dog sacrifices; it was all by the same spirit’ (H. Lewis 1879).”

In a magic book known as The Greater Key of Solomon, page 122, we read that “In many operations it is necessary to make some sort of sacrifice unto the demons, and in various ways . . . Such sacrifices consist of the blood and sometimes of the flesh.”

The evidence seems to show that Joseph Smith did make sacrifices to the demons. In an affidavit published in 1834, William Stafford, one of the neighbors of the Smith family, reported the following:

Joseph Smith, Sen., came to me one night, and told me that Joseph Smith Jr. had been looking in his glass, and had seen, not many rods from his house, two or three kegs of gold and silver . . . Joseph, Sen. first made a circle, twelve or fourteen feet in diameter. This circle, said he, contains the treasure. He then stuck in the ground a row of witch hazel sticks, around the said circle, for the purpose of keeping off the evil spirits. . . . another time, they devised a scheme, by which they might satiate their hunger, with the mutton of one of my sheep. They had seen in my flock a sheep, a large, fat, black weather. Old Joseph and one of the boys came to me one day, and said that Joseph Jr. had discovered some very remarkable and valuable treasures, which could be procured only in one way. That way, was as follows:—That a black sheep should be taken to the ground where the treasures were concealed—that after cutting its throat, it should be led around in a circle while bleeding. This being done, the wrath of the evil spirit would be appeased: the treasures could then be obtained, and my share of them was to be four fold. To gratify my curiosity, I let them have a large fat sheep. They afterwards informed me, that the sheep was killed pursuant to commandment; but as there was some mistake in the process, it did not have the desired effect. This, I believe, is the only time they ever made money-digging a profitable business. (Mormonism Unvailed, 1834, pp. 238-239; also reproduced in Early Mormon Documents, vol. 2, pp. 59-61)

The reader will notice that it was a “black” sheep that was supposed to have been sacrificed. This is interesting because The Greater Key of Solomon, page 122, says that, “Sometimes white animals are sacrificed to the good Spirits and black to the evil.”

In any case, BYU professor Richard L. Anderson said that, “If there was such an event of a borrowed sheep, it had nothing to do with dishonesty.”28 Anderson also quotes the following from BYU Professor M. Wilford Poulson’s notes of a conversation with Wallace Miner: “I once asked Stafford if Smith did steal a sheep from him. He said no, not exactly. He said, he did miss a black sheep, but soon Joseph came and admitted he took it for sacrifice but he was willing to work for it. He made wooden sap buckets to fully pay for it.”29

C. R. Stafford testified concerning the same incident:

Jo Smith, the prophet, told my uncle, William Stafford, he wanted a fat, black sheep. He said he wanted to cut its throat and make it walk in a circle three times around and it would prevent a pot of money from leaving.30

The current leaders of the Mormon Church have turned away from the early occultic practices, which played such an important role in the church Joseph Smith founded. In fact, the church hierarchy has publicly condemned magic. In the LDS manual Gospel Principles we read:

Mediums, astrologers, fortune tellers, and sorcerers are inspired by Satan even if they claim to follow God. Their works are abominable to the Lord (see Isaiah 47:12-14; Deuteronomy 18:9-10). We should avoid all associations with the powers of Satan.31

Most Mormons are not aware of Joseph Smith’s involvement in the occult because their leaders have systematically covered up the more embarrassing parts of Smith’s history.

A Book of Mormon Witness with a Stone

Hiram Page, one of the eight witnesses to the Book of Mormon, also had a seer stone which he used to obtain revelations. Joseph Smith charged that Page gave false revelations through his stone and believed that the other witnesses to the Book of Mormon were being influenced by his revelations:

To our great grief, however, we soon found that Satan had been lying in wait to deceive, . . . Brother Hiram Page had in his possession a certain stone, by which he obtained certain “revelations” . . . all of which were entirely at variance with the order of God’s house, . . . the Whitmer family and Oliver Cowdery, were believing much in the things set forth by this stone, we thought best to inquire of the Lord concerning so important a matter . . . .32

Seeing a threat to his leadership, Joseph Smith countered with a revelation stating that “no one shall be appointed to receive commandments and revelations in this church excepting my servant Joseph Smith, Jun., for he receiveth them even as Moses” (Doctrine and Covenants 28:2). Then in verse eleven, Oliver Cowdery was instructed to tell Hiram Page that “those things which he hath written from that stone are not of me, and that Satan deceiveth him.”

Cowdery’s Divining Rod

Oliver Cowdery and his family, along with the Smiths, were involved in the folk magic of the New England states. When Cowdery met Smith he evidently brought with him a reputation of working with a divining rod, a forked witch hazel stick used to locate water or minerals.

The money-diggers used divining rods to find buried treasure. They were also used as a “medium of revelation.” Those who used divining rods were at times referred to as “rodsmen.” Richard P. Howard, RLDS church historian, observed:

29 Ibid., p. 294.
31 Gospel Principles, (Salt Lake City: LDS Church, 2009), p. 131.

Several writers have established that both in Vermont and in western New York in the early 1800’s, one of the many forms which enthusiastic religion took was the adaptation of the witch hazel stick . . . For example, the “divining rod” was used effectively by one Nathaniel Wood in Rutland County, Vermont, in 1801. Wood, Winchell, William Cowdery, Jr., and his son, Oliver Cowdery, all had some knowledge of and associations with the various uses, both secular and sacred, of the forked witch hazel rod. Winchell and others used such a rod in seeking buried treasure; . . . when Joseph Smith met Oliver Cowdery in April, 1829, he found a man peculiarly adept in the use of the forked rod . . . and against the background of his own experiments with and uses of oracular media, Joseph Smith’s April, 1829, affirmations about Cowdery’s unnatural powers related to working with the rod are quite understandable . . . 33

Smith gave a revelation to Cowdery in 1829 commending him for his “gift of working with the rod: behold it has told you things; behold there is no other power, save the power of God, that can cause this rod of nature, to work in your hands” (Book of Commandments, section 7:3, 1833).

However a couple of years later Smith revised this revelation to hide its magical overtones. It now reads: “Now this is not all thy gift, for you have another gift, which is the gift of Aaron; behold, it has told you many things; Behold, there is no other power, save the power of God, that can cause this gift of Aaron to be with you” (Doctrine and Covenants 8:6-7). Richard P. Howard explained:

By the time that Joseph Smith approached the reinterpretation and wording of this document for the 1835 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants, he had had time and experience necessary to place his 1829 assessment of the meaning of Cowdery’s gift of working with the rod in a somewhat more accurate perspective. Both he and Cowdery had developed away from an emphasis on the religious or mystical meanings in such mechanical objects as the water witching rod. Joseph’s 1835 wording of this document . . . left behind the apparent 1829 reliance upon external media, which by 1835 had assumed in Joseph’s mind overtones of superstition and speculative experimentation.34

May 2015: What a whirlwind these last few days have been! . . .

Yesterday (Saturday) my son, __ and his wife, ___ unexpectedly showed up . . . [My son], a real estate agent, asked why I didn’t tell [the neighbor] to list her home with him. Without thinking, I blurted out, “I haven’t been to church in 4 months. I don’t [know] anything that’s going on in the ward.” To which [my son] immediately replied, “What?! Did [a friend] convert you to her church?” . . .

To make a long story less long, [my daughter-in-law] scrubbed [my] walls and cupboards, [my son] kept the two toddlers out of mischief, and I rocked the baby while telling them the story of my journey over the last few months. Every once in awhile I’d stop talking to let them absorb it. After a few moments, [my son] would say, “Keep talking.” So I did. I prayed God would give me the words to speak, and that they would have ears to hear.

I told them about the day my world came crashing down unexpectedly as I hadn’t been questioning or doubting . . . at least not on a conscience level. I told them about calling my Christian friend, ___ who gave me a copy of “Unveiling Grace.” Then about calling Lynn [Wilders], and how each person I met led me to another wonderful Christian woman who knew and loved Christ . . . After a few hours, [my daughter-in-law] asked if she could talk to [my Christian friend]. I made the phone call, and within 20 minutes, she and her husband [a local pastor] were in my home to answer their questions and stayed for 2 1/2 hours!

My darling [daugher-in-law] sobbed! She said as soon as I started talking she knew she had lost [her husband]. (This was a surprise to me as I’d thought [my son] was solid in his testimony and loyalty to the church.) She also cried because she knows that if she leaves the church, she will lose the newly found relationship of love and acceptance she has finally cultivated with her mother. Poor girl. I felt exactly the same way about my relationship with them! By the time they left last night, [my dauther-in-law] was pretty shell-shocked, but [my son] seemed calm and curious.

As we talked last night, [my son and wife] were both surprised at some of the church doctrine regarding the LDS teachings of the origin of God and other theology, and I was surprised they didn’t know it. [My son] commented, “I guess I’m not a very good Mormon since I didn’t know this stuff.” My thought was, “I wasn’t a very good Mormon Mom as I hadn’t taught him this in Family Home Evening.” But who am I kidding! I had 5 rowdy little boys! He was short and to the point and was usually about character development: kindness, tolerance, love, sharing, honesty, etc.

Then [the pastor] pointed out something I hadn’t realized. The doctrine this generation is learning is different than what my generation had learned. But as we talked and I told them about changes in the temple ceremony and other church-related teachings, we were all pleasantly surprised to discover they held more Christian beliefs than any of us realized.

When they asked why I’d kept it a secret all these months, I told them I didn’t want the stress of this revelation to interfere with [my daughter-in-law’s] health or the health of the unborn baby . . . and I was fearful they would turn their backs on me and take away my grandchildren. [My son’s] reply was: “Mom! Really?!” [His wife] commented, “I could tell you weren’t wearing your garments anymore, and that you didn’t get upset if someone bought something on Sunday. . . .

So now it’s Sunday. When I opened the front door this morning, [my son] announced, “We brought your grandchildren back!” And I was so happy to see them! I had offered to watch the boys if they wanted to go to CenterPoint church [in Orem] . . . and they took me up on it! I’d really love to be at church with them, but I wanted them to enjoy their first Christian service and meet new people without the worry of 3-year-old [son having] autistic meltdowns that are triggered by crowds and loud noises. We’ll figure out a way to worship as a family if they choose to return.

Before they left this morning, they shared with me that they had both been contemplating what life would be like if they weren’t Mormons, but hadn’t shared that thought with each other. . . .

I asked [my friend] to bring a copy of “Unveiling Grace” for them and I had bought an extra copy of an NIV Bible that I gave them as well. I pray their journey to Christ will be as healing and rapid as mine . . . if not more so!

And that, my friends, is the beauty of this weekend! One son knows I’m not a “true believing Mormon” anymore, and it hasn’t harmed our relationship! We are now on this journey together.

May 2015: Thank you for your wonderful work. Very enlightening and life changing for me. I have watched and listened to Sandra Tanner on MormonStories [mormonestories.org — #472-475] with John Dehlin and have been consumed with studying the history of my mormon faith over the past few months. I cannot seem to stop.

I am a 6th generation Utah Mormon who has been shocked by what I have learned The Church has intentionally hid/tied about all of my life. I am 34 and am seriously considering leaving the church but have all the reservations anyone in my shoes would have. All of my family, extended family and those in my community are staunchly active LDS and if I leave I fear I will send my family/friends into shock and be ostracized.

The hardest thing for me to accept is that as an LDS missionary in South Africa I taught and baptized many by using the teachings I had been taught to regurgitate in the MTC and now these converts could easily look to Google and see that I (unintentionally) had lied to them. That hurts immensely. I taught what I had been taught, and what I had been told was true from a young age. Now my son is turning 8 . . . and will want to be baptized. This is a dilemma for me to overcome. Your work, websites, and books have helped me so much. With all sincerity and gratitude, thank you!

May 2015: Thank you SO much. Just a quick praise report after three LONG years after I busted free (praise be to God) my mom has seen the light! She is RS president and everyone she knows is Mormon. She just decided this week to leave for good so we were doing research to arm her with ammo and I told her you have already done all the grunt work but I couldn’t find this specific thing. So thanks so so much for the link. Thanks for all you do, God bless! Please add her to your prayer list, she needs strength for sure.

May 2015: It is against my wishes but I must ask to be removed from your messenger mailing list . . . my husband is getting way too mad about it. I guess I have been getting them but my husband just throws them in the trash . . . I’m exmormon and my husband is jack Mormon . . . it’s so difficult on our marriage . . . I get so frustrated. I appreciate what you do. Keep on telling The truth!!!
May 2015: Thank you, Mrs. Tanner for your devotion to the true gospel. God saved me out Mormonism, granted me repentance and taught me saving faith in Christ alone. I have found many of your materials and research very helpful and encouraging and I want to express my deep gratitude for the work that you are doing. Blessings.

May 2015: Sandra is an Anti Christ . . . keep following her.

May 2015: God has led me to your youtube videos and website, they were crucial to keeping me from joining the lds church. I have learned so much that my church is having me teach a class on Mormonism in the fall.

May 2015: I saw your website. I am the member of the church of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in Europe (Hungary) I have been a member for my whole life basically. I was 3 years old when the missionaries found my family. I have served a mission and served in many callings just as a branch president as well. I [now have] a lot more time to read and get to know more about the history of the church the doctrine of the church and have a lot of questions about everything and started to feel that maybe what I believe in is false.

I read a couple of things online what is against the church and make sense, but still I am so confused. The only thing what I want just to know the truth but now as I learn a lot about my church I feel that if it is not a reliable source of truth then where is it? What can I trust? If my church is not true, then where is the real one. If my God is not the real God then where is he and how can I know. I also question if the Bible is true. I think you probably know what I am going through.

June 2015: Just wanted to write you a quick note and thank you for all of the hard work that you and Gerald have put in to Lighthouse Ministries. I was really touched by your interview with John Dehlin, particularly the way you talked about your relationship with Gerald. It’s interesting how in spite of all of the evidence I have found that would lead me to walk away from Mormonism, it was the sincerity and love I felt from people like you that ultimately gave me the courage to stand apart. Your example has changed my life’s course. Thank you.

June 2015: Due to God’s grace and love, and the material you’ve blessed me with, a fellow inmate has now left his Mormon faith and accepted Jesus Christ into his heart as personal Lord and Saviour. He is scheduled to be baptized in a few weeks.

July 2015: I turned in my church resignation the 13th of June, and had my named removed and letter back by the 22nd of June. So all is good. I’ve been over a year at this, And it was hard to do after 76 years with the church. It was Quite devastating at first, And in some ways still is. I love the members and Know they are good people that have been mislead by the leaders of the church as I was. I would like to help them, but I know they will not listen to me now. I live about 2hrs from the Hill Cumorah.

July 2015: Please put me on your mailing list of the messenger. Also, any other info that would be pertinent to a 56 year old “member” that is beginning to have serious questions on what I have been taught my whole life.

July 2015: Truly. I especially appreciate you sharing feedback and letters from other fellow travelers who have come or are in the process of coming to realize the tremendous mis-truths the Mormon church continues to delve out. When I read their stories and experiences . . . I feel so much less alone. There is such peace in knowing I’m not the only one gullible enough to have believed for so long . . . nor am I alone in my decision to walk away. Thank you for the tremendous contribution you have made and continue to make in countless lives. “I throw my past behind me like a robe worn threadbare at the seams.”

July 2015: Thank you for your timely response. I really appreciate all you have done over the years.

I married a return missionary when I was 18 (1997). I was baptized and went through the temple on our one year anniversary. I never could gain a testimony of Joseph Smith or the church. I was made to feel unworthy no matter how hard I tried to fit in. I actually felt physically ill as I went through the temple ceremonies. Jesus was rarely mentioned at church. We spent an entire year learning about the prophets (the white-washed version of course).

I began to research history and doctrine and was horrified by what I found. I would show it to my husband and he would become very angry about me reading “anti-mormon literature”. We divorced in 2005 and he has now become a born again christian with the help of his new wife.

I recently finished reading a book purchased from your store. It was written by Carma Naylor. I have given it to my father and he has agreed to read it with an open mind. I told him that if he would do that, I would never bug him about the church again.

It breaks my heart that Mormons refuse to believe anything that goes against what they have been told. I have found that they refuse to look into things even when provided with well documented proof. I pray that more mormons will be bothered by the information that is out there and will come to discover the Real Jesus. I have found a new love for the Bible and have never been so content with my life. I am truly grateful for you and others like you.

Thanks again for all of your hard work and dedication to finding the truth and for sharing it with others.

August 2015: Having a personal testimony founded on personal revelations, . . . [I know] that the LDS Church is the only living and true church in the whole world, increased, and greatly. Through your different publications, I can easily see how much you hurt inside, and find yourselves in so much misery of the pain from jealousy . . . revenge . . . hate . . . feelings which are clearly seen and perceived through the many enraged and despiseful words you use . . . Truth will always find oposition, like in the time of Enoch, Noah, Jeremiah, Jesus, . . . I beg you to come back.

September 2015: I just wanted to thank you for all the research and documents you and Jerald have put out! I wouldn’t have come out of the church if it wasn’t for, Mormonism: Shadow or Reality, and 3,913 Changes . . . These have led me and some of my friends at BYU out and now to knowing the true Jesus! My brother and his family just came to know the true God also! I am seeing this happen more frequently and cannot begin to explain my gratefulness to you and your ministry!
Three New LDS Apostles: All From Utah
By Sandra Tanner

Following the death of three of the fifteen top leaders of the LDS Church, new apostles were appointed on October 3, 2015, at the semiannual conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. While many members were hoping for a foreign-born appointment, those chosen were all white men from Utah.1

Prior to conference, Brady McCombs, of the Associated Press, reported that “scholars predict that for the first time ever, at least one could be from outside North America and Europe.”2 Those hoping for a sign of diversity were certainly disappointed. The New York Times reported:

“The Mormon church didn’t go far to select three new members for a top governing body that sets policy and runs the worldwide faith’s business operations—choosing two former business executives and a cardiologist from Utah who had already been serving in lower church leadership positions.

Ronald A. Rasband, 64, is a former CEO of the Huntsman Chemical Corporation. Gary E. Stevenson, 60, was the co-founder of an exercise equipment manufacturing company. Dale G. Renlund, 62, was a cardiologist and directed a cardiac transplant program.

Their appointments—announced Saturday at church conference in Salt Lake City—surprised many outside religious scholars who speculated that the Utah-based faith would choose at least one new member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles from a country outside the U.S., perhaps from Latin America or Africa.

That would have been a symbol and recognition of the expanding global reach of a religion that has more than half of its 15 million members outside of the United States.

Instead, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints made safe, solid and comfortable decisions that fit the template for choosing modern apostles in the church, said Patrick Mason, associate professor of religion at Claremont Graduate University in California . . .

The article then quoted Ignacio Garcia, a BYU professor:

Saints of color always have to respond to: “Why do [we] belong to that white church?” . . . It becomes harder and harder as we go further into the 21st Century: We still can’t point to a more diversified leadership.

Garcia was also quoted in a Salt Lake Tribune article:

The real challenge is “is not whether we get a person of color—people of color are ready to serve,” says BYU history professor Ignacio Garcia. “The question is whether the church is ready for the changes a person of color might make necessary.”

Right now, the church is perceived as a white institution, he says, and so it needs to prepare itself for the evolving demographics that will come both in the church and outside.

“It isn’t just picking a brown or black face as an apostle, says Garcia, author of Chicano While Mormon: Activism, War and Keeping the Faith. “It’s about what that says about us and about our faith.”

One event that might have raised hopes for the appointment of an apostle outside of the usual pioneer descended members was the Fall 2014 short-lived experiment of allowing foreign-born speakers at General Conference to deliver their talks in their native language. At that time four men elected to speak in their mother tongue. Writing for the BYU Digital Universe, Annmarie Moore reported that students expected “that the Church’s decision to allow general conference talks in foreign languages would help its international image.”4 That it was not repeated in 2015 may be a matter of logistics. When those talks were broadcast, instead of someone hearing the leader speak in Spanish or Portuguese, the voice of someone speaking in English was dubbed over the sound of the original language, thus losing the whole point. One person commented “I was really excited to hear some general authorities speak their native language but was disappointed when I heard a translator speak for them.”

LDS apostles are appointed for life and are ranked in order of ordination to the office. Thus the next president of the church is not chosen by a vote, but is the apostle with the most seniority. Although during the early days of the LDS Church the apostles ranged in age from 24 to 36, with the most seniority. Although during the early days of the LDS Church the apostles ranged in age from 24 to 36, with a system of lifetime appointments, the age of succeeding apostles and presidents continually advanced. By the time of Brigham Young’s death, his replacement was 69-year-old John Taylor. Current president Thomas S. Monson was 81 when he became president. Next in line for the presidency is 91-year-old Russell M. Nelson. Thus we see that the system of lifetime appointments guarantees that the top leaders of the LDS Church will always be older men. And with no diversity in the apostleship, the future presidents will continue to be white.

Is There a Mother God?

In the fall of 2015 the LDS Church reaffirmed its doctrine of a Heavenly Mother, the wife of Heavenly Father, in its latest essay, Mother in Heaven. This article is said to complete the thirteen Gospel Topics essays dealing with controversial areas of Mormon doctrine and history.\(^1\) While some of the Mormon teaching manuals refer to “Heavenly Parents” this is the clearest official statement about the doctrine of God’s wife.

The essay affirms that “all human beings, male and female, are beloved spirit children of heavenly parents, a Heavenly Father and a Heavenly Mother.” Unlike the traditional Christian belief that the term “Heavenly Father” is a metaphor, LDS prophets not only teach that the designation is literal but that God has a wife (at least one). This was explained in the October 2015 Ensign:

The Family in Premortal Life

In our premortal life, each of us was born as “a beloved spirit son or daughter of heavenly parents.” As such, we were all brothers and sisters and lived as members of God’s family. Although all of us were part of this eternal family of God, the only ones who enjoyed the blessings of eternal marriage were our heavenly parents. Only they could have children and be called father and mother.\(^2\)

This premortal family group would have included everyone who has or will be born on this earth, as well as our elder brothers Jesus and Lucifer, and one third of the spirits who chose to rebel and were cast out with Lucifer.

This relationship is discussed in the 1997 LDS Sunday School manual for children ages 8-11:

1. In the premortal life we were spirit children and lived with our heavenly parents (Hebrews 12:9).
2. Jesus was the firstborn spirit child of Heavenly Father (D&C 93:21) and is the older brother of our spirits.
3. Lucifer, who became Satan, was also a spirit child of Heavenly Father.\(^3\)

This is all part of the LDS concept of eternal progression, and is often referred to as Heavenly Father’s Plan of Happiness. Not only are we on a journey to attain future godhood, Mormonism teaches that our Heavenly Father and Mother once traversed the same path. They were once mortals on another world, overseen by yet another eternal couple, where they experienced mortality, death and resurrection. The doctrine that God has a resurrected body was explained in The Presidents of the Church: Teachers Manual:

> It is wonderful to know the truth—that God the Eternal Father and Jesus Christ are exalted, tangible beings, with resurrection bodies in whose image we are made, and that Jesus Christ is literally the Father’s Only Begotten Son in the flesh.\(^4\)

Brigham Young, second president of the LDS Church, taught that God had once been a mortal. In the 1997 manual Teachings of Presidents of the Church: Brigham Young, he is quoted as saying:

> The great architect, manager and superintendent, controller and dictator [absolute ruler] who guides this work is out of sight to our natural eyes. He [God] lives on another world; he is in another state of existence; he has passed the ordeals we are now passing through: he has received an experience, has suffered and enjoyed, and knows all that we know regarding the toils, sufferings, life and death of this mortality, for he has passed through the whole of it, and has received his crown and exaltation and holds the keys and the power of this Kingdom; . . .

On page 34 of the same manual we read:

The doctrine that God was once a man and has progressed to become a God is unique to this Church. How do you feel, knowing that God, through His own experience, “knows all that we know regarding the toils [and] sufferings” of mortality?

The LDS Church continues to teach that God has not always been God, but achieved this status in the distant past. In their 2002 teaching manual, Gospel Fundamentals, we read:

It will help us to remember that our Father in Heaven was once a man who lived on an earth, the same as we do. He became our Father in Heaven by overcoming problems, just as we have to do on this earth.

Notice that for our heavenly father to have once been a mortal it would require a god before him to oversee his mortality. Joseph Smith expounded on this idea in one of his last sermons in June of 1844. John G. Turner explained:

only eleven days before his murder, Smith said he would “preach the doctrine [of] there being a God above the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.” Fleshy ideals introduced in the Book of Abraham, the prophet suggested that “there are gods many and Lords many . . . but to us there is but one God pertaining to us.” Smith reiterated his point: “if Jesus Christ was the Son of God and . . . God the Father of Jesus Christ had a father you may suppose that he had a Father also.” . . . Smith’s words hinted at a chain of divine beings who had “laid down” their lives and taken them up again: a possible infinite regression of gods and saviors. Drawing on an array of Old and New Testament passages, Smith also spoke of a single “head of the gods” presiding over a divine council of heavenly beings, one of whom became earth’s god. The universe contained a plurality, perhaps an infinitude of gods.

Contrary to the Mormon view of a god among many, the Bible teaches that God is not only eternal but that there are no other deities.

Contrary to the Mormon view of a god among many, the Bible teaches that God is not only eternal but that there are no other deities.

Thus saith the Lord, thy redeemer, and he that formed thee from the womb, I am the Lord that maketh all things; that stretcheth forth the heavens alone; that spreadeth abroad the earth by myself. (Isaiah 44:24)

Before the mountains were born or you brought forth the whole world, from everlasting to everlasting you are God. (Psalm 90:2)

To whom will ye liken me, and make me equal, and compare me, that we may be like? . . . for I am God, and there is none else; I am God, and there is none like me. (Isaiah 46:5, 9)

These verses, along with other biblical passages, would also preclude a Heavenly Mother.

Once Joseph Smith developed the idea that God was literally our father it wasn’t long before the idea of a mother goddess was added. Linda Wilcox explained:

The Mother in Heaven concept was a logical and natural extension of a theology which posited both an anthropomorphic god, who had once been a man, and the possibility of eternal procreation of spirit children.

According to LDS teachings, after the mortal death and resurrection of the couple who would eventually become our Heavenly Father and Heavenly Mother they advanced to the position of Gods and, after eons of procreation, sent their literal spirit born children to this earth to receive mortal bodies and for a time of testing to determine who would follow in their steps and progress to godhood. In a 1909 statement by the LDS Church First Presidency we read:

Man is the child of God, formed in the divine image and endowed with divine attributes, and even as the infant son of an earthly father and mother is capable in due time of becoming a man, so the undeveloped offspring of celestial parentage is capable, by experience through ages and aeons, of evolving into a God.

Mormonism teaches that gods and men are all the same species. Sterling W. Sill, of the First Quorum of the Seventy, explained:

It is helpful for us to remember that God, angels, spirits, and men are all of the same species in different stages of development and in various degrees of righteousness.

5 Teachings of Presidents of the Church: Brigham Young, (LDS Church, 1997), p. 30.
6 Ibid., p. 34.
The essay on Heavenly Mother explains that while there is limited knowledge about “a Mother in Heaven” members need to “appreciate the sacredness of this doctrine and to comprehend the divine pattern established for us as children of heavenly parents. As Elder Dallin H. Oaks of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles has said, ‘Our theology begins with heavenly parents. Our highest aspiration is to be like them.’”

Joseph Fielding Smith, tenth president of the LDS Church, explained that the concept of being like God includes eternal procreation:

The Father has promised us that through our faithfulness we shall be blessed with the fulness of his kingdom. In other words we will have the privilege of becoming like him. To become like him we must have all the powers of godhood; thus a man and his wife when glorified will have spirit children who eventually will go on an earth like this one we are on and pass through the same kind of experiences, being subject to mortal conditions, and if faithful, then they also will receive the fulness of exaltation and partake of the same blessings. There is no end to this development; it will go on forever. We will become gods and have jurisdiction over worlds, and these worlds will be peopled by our own offspring. We will have an endless eternity for this.

This pattern of couples advancing from spirit children to godhood is often referred to as the Plan of Salvation. In the LDS manual Doctrines of the Gospel we read:

God the Father provided the plan of salvation by which His spirit children could eventually become like Him.

Because of the carefully worded promise of becoming “like Him” many do not realize how literally this is meant. For example the leadership obscures the doctrine of godhood in the different versions of the manual Gospel Principles.

1988—We can become Gods like our Heavenly Father. This is exaltation.

1997—We can become like our Heavenly Father. This is exaltation.

Even though the teaching is still the same, by dropping “Gods” from the 1997 manual, it might not be as obvious to non-Mormons how literally the LDS Church teaches that they hope to become Gods.

Traditionally Christianity has seen God as our creator, not our literal parent. We are not the same species as God, but His creation. The Bible proclaims, I am the Lord, and there is no other; apart from me there is no God (Isaiah 45:5). In Psalm 95:6 we read: Come, let us worship and bow down, Let us kneel before the LORD our Maker.

From One God to Many

Mormon theology did not start with the concept of “heavenly parents” but with the belief in one God. The LDS doctrine of God has undergone major revisions since Joseph Smith published his Book of Mormon in 1830. Time after time the book proclaims that the Father, Son and Holy Ghost “is one God.” Even the testimony of the three witnesses at the front of the Book of Mormon affirms that the Father, Son and Holy Ghost “is one God.” Christians of the day did not criticize the Mormon view of God but the idea of modern day revelation and Smith’s claim of unearthing an additional book of scripture.

Kurt Widmer, of the University of Lethbridge, observed:

It was not that the Book of Mormon taught new truths about God which drew the early converts. Rather, the Book of Mormon presented a God who was active in the world. The God revealed through early Mormonism was a God who was more concerned with practicing what was believed, than with theorizing about what is to be believed.

Early LDS literature contains no mention of Heavenly Father having a resurrected body. Mormons today assume that Joseph Smith’s 1820 vision, showing that the Father and Son are two distinct beings, was known by the early church. Yet that story has gone through radical changes. The first time Joseph committed his first vision to paper in 1832, he only mentioned “the Lord” as appearing, informing him that his sins were forgiven. In 1835 Joseph was telling a slightly expanded version of this vision, recounting that many angels appeared, but nothing is specifically said about God or Jesus being there as well. It wasn’t until 1842, twenty-two years after the purported event, that Smith officially printed the story known to most LDS today.

In 1835, as part of the Doctrine and Covenants, a series of lectures were published as the Lectures on Faith. In Lecture 5 the Father and Son are discussed and differentiated—the father is described as a personage of “spirit” while the son is a personage of “tabernacle.”

This would be a strange description if Smith had been teaching for years that he had seen the Father and He had a physical body. Thus Mormonism moved from the one God of the Book of Mormon to two separate gods, where the father is a spirit and only the son has a physical body.

By the 1840s Smith was proclaiming that Heavenly Father had a beginning, that the Father and Son are two totally different people with resurrected bodies and that there is a plurality of gods. Preaching in 1844, Joseph Smith declared “I am going to tell you how God came to be God. We have imagined and supposed that God was God from all eternity. I will refute that idea.” Part of this sermon is also quoted in the 2004 LDS manual Presidents of the Church Student Manual:

> God himself was once as we are now, and is an exalted man and sits enthroned in yonder heavens! . . . It is the first principle of the Gospel to know for a certainty the Character of God, . . . and that he was once a man like us; yea, that God himself, the Father of us all, dwelt on an earth, the same as Jesus Christ himself did; and I will show it from the Bible.22

Contrary to Joseph Smith’s claim, the Bible explains that God is not a man that he should lie, neither the son of man, that he should repent (Numbers 23:19). Also God instructed Isaiah I am the first and I am the last; and beside me there is no God. . . . Is there a God beside me? yea, there is no God; I know not any (Isaiah 44:6, 8).

Since Mormonism teaches that we were literally born to Heavenly Parents in a pre-mortal existence they interpret Bible verses referring to us as children of God in a very literal way. Joseph Smith taught that “the inhabitants [of the world] are begotten sons and daughters unto God” (Doctrine and Covenants 76:24). Thus the LDS believe we were literally born to our Heavenly Parents as spirit beings in a prior existence, making us “begotten” children of God. Beyond this, according to the LDS teachings, Jesus is not only a begotten son from the pre-mortal life, he is the only literally begotten son in the flesh. Dr. Ron Rhodes observed:

> Another verse Mormons appeal to in support of the idea that Jesus is “begotten” of the Father is John 3:16, which in the King James Version reads: “For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life” (emphasis added). The New International Version translates “only begotten” as “one and only,” and indeed, this is what the original Greek communicates. The Greek word monogenes means “unique” or “one of a kind.” It does not communicate procreation or derivation. Jesus is the unique or one and only “Son of God” in the sense that He has the same name as the Father—a divine nature . . . Hence, when Jesus claimed to be the Son of God, His Jewish contemporaries fully understood that He was making a claim to be God in an unqualified sense (John 5:18). This is why, when Jesus claimed to be the Son of God, the Jews insisted: “We have a law, and according to that law he [Christ] must die, because he claimed to be the Son of God (John 19:7). Recognizing that Jesus was identifying Himself as God, the Jews wanted to put Him to death for committing blasphemy.23

The Bible speaks of God as our father in a figurative sense. In the New Testament we are told that we become children of God through faith, not a literal birth in a prior life. It is a spiritual adoption.

> Yet to all who did receive him, to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God. (John 1:12)

> So in Christ Jesus you are all children of God through faith. (Galatians 3:26)

Evolving Doctrine of God

Mormon scholar Melodie Moench Charles acknowledges that the LDS view of God has evolved from one God to many. She argues, in fact, that at least some of the teachings of the Book of Mormon regarding God go even beyond the orthodox Trinitarian doctrine in emphasizing the oneness of God:

> Recently when I was teaching the Book of Mormon in an adult Sunday school class we discussed Mosiah 15. . . . I said that I saw no good way to reconcile Abinadi’s words with the current Mormon belief that God and his son Jesus Christ are separate and distinct beings. I suggested that perhaps Abinadi’s understanding was incomplete. . . .

> When we explore what the Book of Mormon says, its christology or doctrines concerning Christ differ from the christology of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints since at least the 1840s. . . .

Book of Mormon people asserted that the Father and Christ (and the Holy Ghost) were one God. When Zeezrom asks Amulek, “Is there more than one God?” Amulek, who learned his information from an angel, answers, “No” (Alma 11:28-29). At least five times in 3 Nephi, Jesus says that he and the Father are one. Emphasizing that oneness with a singular verb, Nephi, Amulek, and Mormon refer to “the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, which is one God” (2 Ne. 31:21; Alma 11:44; Morm. 7:7, emphasis added). . . .

In isolation the Book of Mormon’s “which is one God” statements sound like orthodox trinitarianism, but in context they resemble a theology rejected by orthodox Christianity since at least 215 C.E., the heresy of modalism (also known as Sabellianism). Modalists believed that for God to have three separate identities or personalities compromised the oneness of God. Therefore, as Sabellius taught, “there is only one undivided Spirit; the Father is not one thing and the Son another, but . . . both are one and the same” (Lonergan 1976, 38). Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are three labels for the different functions which the one God performed. . . . The Book of Mormon often makes no distinction between Christ and God the Father. For example, Jesus in 3 Nephi talked about covenants which his father made with the Israelites, and yet beyond anything he claimed in the New Testament he also claimed that he was the God of Israel who gave them the law and covenanted with them . . .

The Book of Mormon melds together the identity and function of Christ and God. Because Book of Mormon authors saw Christ and his Father as one God who manifested himself in different ways, it made no difference whether they called the God the Father or the Son. They taught that Jesus Christ was not only the one who atoned for their sins but was also the god they were to worship. He was the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the God of Israel and the Book of Mormon people. . . .

Like the Book of Mormon, Mormonism before 1835 was largely modalistic, making no explicit distinction between the identities of the Father and the Son. Yet Mormonism gradually began to distinguish among different beings in the Godhead. This means the christology of the Book of Mormon differs significantly from the christology of the Mormon church after the 1840s. . . .

The current theology that most Mormons read back into the Book of Mormon is tritheism: belief in three Gods. Joseph Smith and the church only gradually came to understand the Godhead in this way. When he translated the Book of Mormon, Smith apparently envisioned God as modalists did; he accepted Christ and Christ’s father as one God. In his first written account of his “first vision” in 1832 Smith told of seeing “the Lord”—one being. . . .

Later, in 1844, Smith said, “I have always declared God to be a distinct personage—Jesus Christ a separate and distinct personage from God the Father, the Holy Ghost was a distinct personage and or Spirit, and these three constitute three distinct personages and three Gods”. . . Mormon history does not support Smith’s claim about what he taught earlier. Documents from early Mormonism reflect that Smith went from belief in one god to belief in two and later three gods forming one godhead.24

LDS scholar Charles R. Harrell observed:

Joseph’s teachings regarding the members of the godhead appear to have progressed from essentially a trinitarian three-in-one God with a modalistic flavor, to a godhead consisting of “two personages” united by the indwelling Holy Spirit, to a godhead consisting of “three personages,” and finally to a godhead consisting of “three Gods.”25

However, the Mormon description of the godhead, Father, Son and Holy Ghost, fails to explain the role of Heavenly Mother. Some Mormons have tried to rectify this by speculating that when they speak of “God” it includes “Heavenly Mother.” But this would seem to relegate Heavenly Mother to a silent partner. Yet this is supposedly the role that all LDS women are to strive for.

Earliest Accounts of Heavenly Mother

While Joseph Smith’s sermons and revelations are silent about God having a wife, the idea would seem to be a logical extension of his teaching that the term “Heavenly Father” is to be understood literally, which would seem to require a mother as well. The new essay cites, in footnote number four, the earliest printed reference to a mother god from a poem written by early LDS leader W. W. Phelps, and published in the church newspaper in January of 1845, six months after Smith’s death. The sixth stanza reads:

Come to me; here’s the myst’ry that man hath not seen; Here’s our Father in heaven, and Mother, the Queen; Here are worlds that have been, and the worlds yet to be; Here’s eternity,—endless; amen: Come to me.26

The essay concedes that “while there is no record of a formal revelation to Joseph Smith on this doctrine, some early Latter-day Saint women recalled that he personally taught them about a Mother in Heaven.” For example, Eliza R. Snow, one of Smith’s secret plural wives, published her poem “My Father in Heaven” in the Times and Seasons on November 15, 1845.27 The poem was later set to music and today is a well-known hymn in Mormonism. Verse three refers to both Heavenly Father and Heavenly Mother:

I had learned to call thee Father,
Thru thy Spirit from on high,
But, until the key of knowledge
Was restored, I knew not why.
In the heav’ns are parents single?
No, the thought makes reason stare!
Truth is reason; truth eternal
Tells me I’ve a mother there.28

The essay continues “Subsequent Church leaders have affirmed the existence of a Mother in Heaven. In 1909, the First Presidency taught that ‘all men and women are in the similitude of the universal Father and Mother, and are literally the sons and daughters of Deity.’”29

Keep in mind that when the LDS leaders speak of humans as “literally” being the children of Heavenly Father and Heavenly Mother, they are referring to our spirit birth in a prior existence, where God and his wife, each having a physical resurrected body, literally copulated to produce each spirit child.

After these spirit children reached maturity in this heavenly realm, according to Mormonism, they were sent to earth to be born as mortals to another set of parents, who would actually be their spirit brother and sister from this prior life.

Praying to Heavenly Mother?

If one believes that there is a heavenly mother as well as a heavenly father, it would seem logical that one would or could pray to her. Yet this is not condoned in Mormonism. In the 2002 LDS manual Gospel Fundamentals we read:

Father in Heaven: A perfect being who looks like a mortal man but has a resurrected body of flesh and bones. He is the Father of our spirits, to whom we pray.29

Notice, there is no mention of a mother, only a father of our spirits. While the concept of a heavenly mother may seem to offer equality to both men and women in their quest for godhood, it appears that the woman would still be in a silent partnership, not part of the godhead and not prayed to. In the LDS essay on Heavenly Mother we read:

Latter-day Saints direct their worship to Heavenly Father, in the name of Christ, and do not pray to Heavenly Mother. In this, they follow the pattern set by Jesus Christ, who taught His disciples to “always pray unto the Father in my name.” Latter-day Saints are taught to pray to Heavenly Father, but as President Gordon B. Hinckley said, “The fact that we do not pray to our Mother in Heaven in no way belittles or denigrates her.” Indeed, as Elder Rudger Clawson wrote, “We honor woman when we acknowledge Godhood in her eternal Prototype.”30

But is this “prototype” simply demonstrating that a woman’s role is eternal motherhood, giving birth to billions of spirit children, but then dropping from the scene? This issue was addressed by Peggy Stack, in the Salt Lake Tribune:

For her part, BYU-Idaho historian Andrea Radke-Moss raises questions about Heavenly Mother’s role. “Is she truly a goddess and a priestess who enjoys priesthood power through the creation of worlds and spirits?” Radke-Moss asks. “Or is she like what women are expected to be on Earth—a submissive helpmeet to God the Father . . . —[or] a spiritual birthing/nurturing machine?”

Part of the problem, the historian says, is that “both gender roles are currently embodied only in God the Father—he is both priesthood leader and loving nurturer. She is absent from this gendered division of labor in families.”31

The tension of a Heavenly Mother who stands apart from the godhead was addressed by LDS scholars David L. Paulsen and Martin Pulido, in their 2011 article in BYU Studies:

The doctrine of a Heavenly Mother appears to be in tension with Mormonism’s trinitarian heritage. Overemphasizing the Trinity, or the Godhead, while underemphasizing a Heavenly Mother raises questions concerning the equality of deified males and females and the nature and importance of marriage. On the other hand, overemphasizing Heavenly Mother breaks with traditional Christian, and even Mormon, understandings.

More than One Heavenly Mother?

Some have speculated that one reason we are told not to pray to Heavenly Mother is that since God has multiple wives we wouldn’t know who to pray to since each of us could have a different mother. Mormon blogger Joanna Brookes wrote:

One sometimes also hears in Mormon circles the hushed speculation that we don’t talk about Heavenly Mother because there are in fact plural Heavenly Mothers. This is a bit of theological speculation we can trace to the nineteenth-century LDS theologian Orson Pratt’s The Seer, which was in its own day disclaimed by LDS authorities as a speculative rather than a doctrinal text. I have also met contemporary polygamous Mormon fundamentalist women who do believe that Heavenly Father has many exalted wives—many Heavenly Mothers for the whole human family.33

One is left to wonder if this is why Apostle Jeffrey R. Holland recently referred to “a” Mother in Heaven rather than to “the” or “our” Mother in Heaven?:

To all of our mothers everywhere, past, present, or future, I say, “Thank you. Thank you for giving birth, for shaping souls, for forming character, and for demonstrating the pure love of Christ.” To Mother Eve, . . . to Mary of Nazareth, and to a Mother in Heaven,

Historian Linda Wilcox raised a similar question:

A question to which there is no definitive answer—but much speculation—is whether there is more than one Mother in Heaven. The Mormon church’s doctrinal commitment to celestial (plural) marriage as well as the exigencies of producing billions of spirit children suggests a probability of more than one mother in heaven. This problem is illustrated by an anecdote where a wife asks her husband, “What do you think Heavenly Mother’s attitudes are about polygamy, Frank?” to which the husband responds, “Which Heavenly Mother?”

Apostle John Taylor, writing in answer to a question reportedly raised by a woman in the church, said in 1857 in a newspaper he was publishing in New York City: “Knowest thou not that eternities ago thy spirit, pure and holy, dwelt in the Heavenly Father’s bosom, and in his presence, and with thy mother, one of the Queens of heaven, surrounded by the brother and sister spirits in the spirit world, among the Gods?” He implied one Heavenly Father with many “Queens.”

An LDS Seminaries and Institutes student manual also hints at the possibility of multiple heavenly mothers. In a diagram entitled “Becoming a Spirit Child of Heavenly Parents,” an individual (male) is depicted with upward lines to his heavenly parents, the one parent labeled “Heavenly Father” (caps), the other labeled, “a heavenly mother” (lower case).35

Is Mary One of God’s Wives?

While the average Mormon would probably say that Mary was a virgin when she conceived Jesus, LDS theology would lead to a different conclusion. Since Mormonism teaches that God has a physical resurrected body, it follows that if Jesus is literally his only begotten son in the flesh that Mary conceived through intercourse with God.36

The 2010 manual Doctrines of the Gospel quotes LDS Apostle James E. Talmage to establish that Jesus is literally the son of God the Father:

That Child to be born of Mary was begotten of Elohim, the Eternal Father, not in violation of natural law but in accordance with a higher manifestation thereof; and the offspring from that association of supreme sanctity, celestial Sireship, and pure though mortal maternity, was of right to be called the “Son of the Highest.”37

The manual goes on to quote President Heber J. Grant to emphasize the literalness of Jesus’ paternity:

“We believe absolutely that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, begotten of God, the first-born in the spirit and the only begotten in the flesh; that He is the Son of God just as much as you and I are the sons of our fathers.”

Ezra Taft Benson, the thirteenth president of the LDS Church, wrote that Jesus’ mortal body was literally “sired” by God:

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints proclaims that Jesus Christ is the Son of God in the most literal sense. The body in which He performed His mission in the flesh was sired by that same Holy Being we worship as God, our Eternal Father.

Brigham Young believed that God, as a physical resurrected being, had relations with Mary, thus making Jesus the literal son of the father:

The birth of the Saviour was as natural as are the births of our children; it was the result of natural action. He partook of flesh and blood—was begotten of his Father, as we were of our fathers.

Because of this Apostle Orson Pratt concluded that God and Mary must have been husband and wife:

The fleshly body of Jesus required a Mother as well as a Father. Therefore, the Father and Mother of Jesus, according to the flesh, must have been associated together in the capacity of Husband and Wife; hence the Virgin Mary must have been, for the time being, the lawful wife of God the Father: we use the term lawful Wife, because it would be blasphemous in the highest degree to say that He overshadowed her or begat the Savior unlawfully.

Orson Pratt also taught that God was a polygamist:

We have now clearly shown that God the Father had a plurality of wives, one or more being in eternity, by whom He begat our spirits as well as the spirit of Jesus His First Born, and another being upon the earth [Mary] by whom He begat the tabernacle of Jesus, as his only begotten in this world. We have also proved most clearly that the Son followed the example of his Father, and became the great Bridegroom to whom kings’ daughters and many honorable wives were to be married. We have also proved that both God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ inherit their wives in eternity as well as in time; . . . it would be so shocking to the modesty of the very pious ladies of Christendom to see Abraham and his wives, Jacob and his wives, Jesus and his honorable wives, all eating occasionally at the same table, . . . If you do not want your morals corrupted, and your delicate ears shocked and your pious modesty put to the blush by the society of polygamists and their wives, do not venture near the New Earth; for polygamists will be honored there, and will be among the chief rulers in that Kingdom.

However, the Bible paints no such picture. First, God is the creator of everything, there are no other deities.

This is what the Lord says—your Redeemer, who formed you in the womb; I am the Lord, the Maker of all things, who stretches out the heavens, who spreads out the earth by myself. (Isaiah 44:24)

Second, the Bible does not promote the necessity of marriage, eternal or otherwise. When Jesus was asked about marriage he replied:

You are wrong, because you know neither the Scriptures nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are like angels in heaven. (Matthew 22:29-30)

Third, Mary’s conception of Jesus is described as a miracle, not the act of a physical union.

This is how the birth of Jesus the Messiah came about: His mother Mary was pledged to be married to Joseph, but before they came together, she was found to be pregnant through the Holy Spirit. (Matthew 1:18)

Achieving Godhood

Joseph Smith explained that before Heavenly Father became a god he was a savior on another world. After achieving exaltation He then sent his oldest spirit born son, Jesus, to this earth to complete his journey to godhood, as many gods had done before him:

There is much said about God and the Godhead. . . . If I were to testify that the Christian world were wrong on this point, my testimony would be true. . . . The Son doeth what He hath seen the Father do: then the Father hath some day laid down His life and taken it again; so He has a body of His own; . . .

This is reminiscent of part of the LDS temple ceremony, where God and Lucifer exchange words in the garden of Eden after the fall. Heavenly Father asks Lucifer “what hast thou been doing here?” To which Lucifer replies, “I have been doing that which has been done in other worlds.” God curses Lucifer, who angrily responds 38 Heber J. Grant, as quoted in Doctrines of the Gospel, p. 9.

41 Orson Pratt, The Seer, p. 158.
“If thou cursest me for doing the same thing which has been done in other worlds, I will take the spirits that follow me, and they shall possess the bodies thou createst for Adam and Eve!”44

It should be noted that there is no Heavenly Mother in the LDS temple endowment ceremony where the creation story is reenacted. The play only portrays Heavenly Father, Jesus, and Michael (who will become Adam) as working together in the creation.

The concept of additional worlds beyond our own is also taught in the Book of Moses, part of the Pearl of Great Price, where God declares that our earth is not the first world he created:

> And worlds without number have I created; and I also created them for mine own purpose. . . . But only an account of this earth, and the inhabitants thereof, give I unto you. For behold, there are many worlds that have passed away by the word of my power. And there are many that now stand, and innumerable are they unto man, but all things are numbered unto me, for they are mine and I know them. 45

Thus the goal of the Mormon priesthood holder is to eventually create worlds without number for his posterity, as his Heavenly Father has done.

Mormonism is not saying that men will become gods independent of Heavenly Father, but it is like an escalator, as each man/god ascends the stairway of exaltation he is always behind his Father, and the man’s offspring are behind him. Thus Mormons believe they will always be subject to the god above them and their children who achieve godhood will follow behind them, making an unending chain of countless gods, each subordinate to the one ahead of him. Joseph Smith explained that Jesus followed the same path as his father in order to “inherit the same power, the same glory and the same exaltation” as God:

> Here, then, is eternal life . . . you have got to learn how to be Gods yourselves, and to be kings and priests to God, the same as all Gods have done before you, . . . What did Jesus do? . . . My Father worked out his kingdom with fear and trembling, and I must do the same; and when I get my kingdom, I shall present it to my Father, so that he may obtain kingdom upon kingdom, and it will exalt him in glory. He will then take a higher exaltation, and I will take his place, and thereby become exalted myself. So that Jesus treads in the tracks of his Father, and inherits what God did before; and God is thus glorified and exalted in the salvation and exaltation of all his children. . . . When you climb up a ladder, you must begin at the bottom, and ascend step by step, until you arrive at the top; and so it is with the principles of the Gospel—you must begin with the first, and go on until you learn all the principles of exaltation.”

Brigham Young, Joseph Smith’s successor, preached that our heavenly father “was once a man in mortal flesh as we are, and is now an exalted Being.” Young went on to explain “How many Gods there are, I do not know. But there never was a time when there were not Gods and worlds, and when men were not passing through the same ordeals that we are now passing through.”47

Eternal Procreation

The LDS leaders continue to teach that the highest goal of an LDS couple is to achieve godhood, just as Heavenly Father and Heavenly Mother did before them. Lorenzo Snow, fifth president of the LDS Church, taught:

Women can become like our mother in heaven. You sisters, I suppose, have read that poem which my sister [Eliza R. Snow] composed years ago, and which is sung quite frequently now in our meetings. It tells us that we not only have a Father in “that high and glorious place,” but that we have a Mother too; and you will become as great as your Mother, if you are faithful.48

Joseph Smith’s revelation regarding eternal life and polygamy includes the promise of godhood and eternal progeny to those who obey the tenants of Mormonism:

And again, verily I say unto you, if a man marry a wife by my word, which is my law, and by the new and everlasting covenant, and it is sealed unto them by the Holy Spirit of promise, . . . Ye shall come forth in the first resurrection; and . . . inherit thrones, kingdoms, principalities, and powers, dominions. . . . and they shall pass by the angels, and the gods, which are set there, to their exaltation and glory in all things, as hath been sealed upon their heads, which glory shall be a fulness and a continuation of the seeds forever and ever.

Then shall they be gods, because they have no end; therefore shall they be from everlasting to everlasting. . . . Then shall they be gods, because they have all power, and the angels are subject unto them. (Doctrines and Covenants 132:19-20)

Notice, the promise of godhood for the couple includes the “continuation of the seeds forever.” The concept of exalted couples governing their endless posterity is discussed in the 2000 LDS booklet, The Latter-day Saint Woman: Basic Manual for Women:

The Blessings of Eternal Marriage

President Lorenzo Snow taught: “When two Latter-day Saints are united together in marriage, promises are made to them concerning their offspring that reach from eternity to eternity. They are promised that they shall have the power and the right to govern and control and administer salvation and exaltation and glory to their offspring, worlds without end. And what offspring they do not have here, undoubtedly there will be opportunities to have them hereafter. What else could man wish? A man and a woman, in the other life, having celestial bodies, free from sickness and disease, glorified and beautified beyond description, standing in the midst of their posterity, governing and controlling them, administering life, exaltation and glory worlds without end.”

When LDS leaders speak of a couple producing “offspring, worlds without end” and the “continuation of the seeds forever” they are referring to eternal sex. In his book, Rational Theology, Apostle John A. Widtsoe explained that intercourse will continue among couples who inherit the celestial kingdom:

Sex Among the Gods. Sex, which is indispensable on this earth for the perpetuation of the human race, is an eternal quality which has its equivalent everywhere. It is indestructible. The relationship between men and women is eternal and must continue eternally. In accordance with Gospel philosophy there are males and females in heaven. Since we have a Father, who is our God, we must also have a mother, who possesses the attributes of Godhood. [p. 69]

Eternity of Sex. It has already been said that sex is an eternal principle. . . . Since sex, then, represents an eternal condition, the begetting of children is coincidentally an eternal necessity. [p. 155]

Celestial Marriage. If sex is eternal, it follows of necessity that the marriage covenant may also be eternal. . . . one of the chief duties of men and women will be to beget spiritual children. These spirits, in turn, in the process of time, will come down upon an “earth,” . . . It is a reward of intelligent development, that we may become to other spiritual beings, what our God has been to us. [p. 157]

Eternal life in Mormonism is equated with exaltation, or godhood. Most of God’s children will only receive immortality in a lower part of heaven, but the faithful temple married couple hope for godhood in the highest level of heaven. Milton R. Hunter, of the First Council of Seventy, wrote:

The principal purpose of the gospel of Jesus Christ and the ultimate goal of eternal progression is to receive eternal life, i.e., to become as God is. It is thoroughly understood, however, that a vast majority of the human family will never become gods, because to do so they must accept the true [LDS] gospel, receive all the ordinances—including celestial marriage—and obey all of God’s commandments faithfully to the end.

Here again we see LDS doctrine redefining standard Christian terms. Eternal life in the Bible is equated with individual salvation through Christ while Mormonism equates it with a couple’s eternal marriage. A single Mormon cannot achieve eternal life, it is offered only to those married in an LDS temple. On the other hand, the New Testament offers the gift of eternal life to each believer, not selectively to obedient couples (see John 3:16; Romans 6:23; Ephesians 2:8-9).

John G. Turner explained Mormonism’s shift from preaching individual salvation to a couple’s quest for exaltation:

In the early 1840s, Smith expanded on what mortal men and women needed to do to progress from mortality to divinity. Exaltation hinged on the fulfillment of divine ordinances, and several of the ordinances Smith introduced in the early 1840s were for couples rather than individuals. Church members needed an eternal companion to attain exaltation, and the exaltation of eternally sealed (i.e., bound together for eternity) families rather than the salvation of individuals became the primary end of Mormon doctrine and ritual. As families, the Saints would return to the presence of their heavenly Father and savior, and they would participate in the creative work of the gods. Marriage and procreation were the heart of exaltation. . . To be exalted meant the eternal increase of progeny. Smith confirmed this meaning of exaltation when he dictated his revelation on eternal and plural marriage.52

While faithful Mormon women are promised godhood it seems to be tied to eternal motherhood and confined to giving birth to billions of spirit children. Her husband will be in charge of sending these spirit children to another earth to experience mortality, where they will only have contact with their Father, not the Mother. Melodie Moench Charles observed:

Our theology currently gives women no hope that their participation in priesthood will ever be great enough to allow them to create anything but children. Some women might be excited by the possibility of providing the womb through which a never-ending stream of children would be born but I am not.53

The Brigham Young Era

Joseph Smith’s successors continued to develop the idea of multiple gods and wives. In 1852, after the move to Utah territory, the LDS Church publicly admitted to the practice of plural marriage. This doctrine seemed to mesh well with their concept of multiple gods who form additional worlds. If a man is to produce enough spirits to populate a world it would seem logical that he would need more than one wife. Preaching in 1866, Brigham Young declared “The only men who become Gods, even the Sons of God, are those who enter into polygamy.”54

LDS apostle Orson Pratt reasoned “If none but Gods will be permitted to multiply immortal children, it follows that each God must have one or more wives.”55 In another article, Orson Pratt explained:

It must be remembered, that seventy thousand million, however great the number may appear to us, are but two-thirds of the vast family of spirits who were begotten before the foundation of the world: . . . Add to seventy thousand million, the third part [of God’s spirit children] which fell, namely, thirty-five thousand million, and the sum amounts to one hundred and five thousand million which was the approximate number of the sons and daughters of God in Heaven . . . If we admit that one personage was the father of all this great family, and that they were all born of the same mother, the period of time intervening between the birth of the oldest and the youngest spirit must have been immense. If we suppose, as an average, that only one year intervened between each birth, then it would have required over one hundred thousand million of years for the same mother to have given birth to this vast family . . . If the father of these spirits, prior to his redemption, had secured to himself, through the everlasting covenant of marriage, many wives, . . . the period required to people a world would be shorter, . . . with a hundred wives, this period would be reduced to only one thousand million of years. . . . While the Patriarch with his hundred wives, would multiply worlds on worlds, . . . the other, who had only secured to himself one wife, would in the same period, just barely have peopled one world.56

Brigham Young even taught that Adam was a polygamist: “When our father Adam came into the garden of Eden, he came into it with a celestial body, and brought Eve, one of his wives with him.”57

Is Jesus Married?

If God is married and mortal couples must also have eternal mates to achieve godhood it follows that Jesus would also be required to marry. During the early years in Utah territory the leading authorities of the church not only taught that Jesus was married, but that he was also a polygamist. Jedediah M. Grant, second counselor to Brigham Young, made these comments:

The grand reason of the burst of public sentiment in anathemas upon Christ and his disciples, causing his crucifixion, was evidently based on polygamy. . . . A belief in the doctrine of a plurality of wives caused the persecution of Jesus, and his followers. We might almost think they were “Mormons.”58

On another occasion Brigham Young said: “The Scripture says that He, the LORD, came walking in the Temple, with His train; I do not know who they were, unless His wives and children . . . ”59

Apostle Orson Hyde asserted:

It will be borne in mind that once on a time, there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee: ... no less a person than Jesus Christ was married on that occasion. If he was never married, his intimacy with Mary and Martha, and the other Mary also whom Jesus loved, must have been highly unbecoming and improper to say the least of it. ... At this doctrine the long-faced hypocrite and the sanctimonious bigot will probably cry, blasphemy! ... Object not, therefore, too strongly against the marriage of Christ ... 60

When the non-Mormons decried polygamy, claiming it was one of the "relics of barbarism," Brigham Young replied: "Yes, one of the relics of Adam, of Enoch, of Noah, of Abraham, of Isaac, of Jacob, of Moses, David, Solomon, the Prophets, of Jesus, and his Apostles."61

While the LDS Church today does not talk about Jesus being married, it would seem to be a necessity since God is married and they believe all of his children must do the same in order to progress to godhood.

Ending Polygamy?

President Brigham Young was very emphatic in proclaiming that the church could never give up polygamy:

I heard the revelation on polygamy [from Joseph Smith], and I believed it with all my heart, and I know it is from God. ... “Do you think that we shall ever be admitted as a State into the Union without denying the principle of polygamy?” If we are not admitted until then, we shall never be admitted.62

However, as the United States government continued to press the church to give up the practice, new laws were enacted to force compliance. In 1887 the Edmunds-Tucker Bill was passed which, among other things, "declared that marriages not publicly recorded were felonies ... The most serious stipulation of the bill, however, was the threat to dissolve the legal entity of the LDS church corporation and to confiscate all church property in excess of $50,000."63

According to historian B. Carmon Hardy, "Then, on September 24, 1890, President Woodruff produced his famous Manifesto, advising church members to obey the laws of the land as they related to polygamy."64 Part of the 1890 Manifesto reads:

62 Deseret News (October 10, 1866).

Without further clarification, many Mormons were left to wonder if this statement was to be considered a revelation or just an admonition. Did it mean all Mormons were to discontinue living with their plural families, refrain from having more children born to these unions, or just that they were not to take any additional wives? There seemed to be one policy for the public and another in private. In the appendix to his book, Professor Hardy lists the names of 220 LDS men, including apostles, stake presidents and bishops, who continued to take plural wives after the Manifesto.66

Polygamy in Heaven?

Some may dismiss plural marriage as a thing of the past. Yet LDS men have continued to be sealed in the temple to additional women when the man has outlived his first wife. This would necessitate polygamy in heaven. Writing in 1897 LDS Apostle Charles W. Penrose stated:

In the case of a man marrying a wife in the everlasting covenant who dies while he continues in the flesh and marries another by the same divine law, each wife will come forth in her order and enter with him into his glory.67

This doctrine was reaffirmed in October of 2007 at the funeral for the second wife of President Howard W. Hunter, the fourteenth President of the LDS Church. The Deseret News reported:

President Hinckley affirmed the eternal nature of the marriage between Sister [Inis] Hunter and the former church president, whose first wife, Claire Jeffs, died after a long battle with Alzheimer’s disease and is now buried beside him in the Salt Lake Cemetery. Inis Hunter “will now be laid to rest on the other side,” he said. “They were sealed under the authority of the Holy Melchizedek Priesthood for time and for all eternity,” he said, recalling the marriage ceremony he performed for them in the Salt Lake Temple in April 1990.68

Another example of plural sealings is Apostle Russell M. Nelson’s marriage in 2006 to a BYU professor. The BYU NewsNet for April 7, 2006, announced the temple marriage of Apostle Nelson, age 81, to Wendy Watson. His first wife died in February of 2005 and this was the first marriage for his new wife. This would mean, according to LDS beliefs, that Nelson has two wives sealed to him for eternity.

Joseph Fielding Smith, tenth president of the LDS Church, remarried twice after the death of his first wife, and in his book, Doctrines of Salvation, vol. 2, page 67, he remarked: “. . . my wives will be mine in eternity.”

Harold B. Lee, the eleventh president of the church, also was sealed to another woman after his wife’s death and was looking forward to a polygamous relationship in heaven. He, in fact, wrote a poem in which he reflected that his second wife, Joan, would join his first wife, Fern, as his eternal wives:

My lovely Joan was sent to me: So Joan joins Fern That three might be, more fitted for eternity. “O Heavenly Father, my thanks to thee.”

After being widowed, Apostle Dallin Oaks remarried in the temple and, according to Mormonism, will be married eternally to both women. In 2002 he commented on his second sealing:

When I was 66, my wife June died of cancer. Two years later—a year and a half ago—I married [in the LDS temple] Kristen McMain, the eternal companion who now stands at my side.

Given these plural sealings, many women are left today with the uneasy knowledge that if they precede their husbands in death they may have to accept plural wives in the afterlife. They may be sealed to only one Heavenly Father but will they end up being one of several Heavenly Mothers?

Since the LDS Church maintains that all the women sealed in marriage to a man will be his in eternity, then obviously most of the LDS past prophets will live polygamy. Joseph Smith and Brigham Young alone were sealed in marriage to dozens of women during their lifetime and many more women were sealed to them after their deaths.

Conclusion

Some LDS women may find comfort in the idea of a Heavenly Mother but have they fully realized the implications of such a doctrine? The Mormon heaven is filled with multiple gods, with dozens of wives giving birth to billions of spirit children as each god creates another world.

In 1988 LDS scholar, Melodie Moench Charles, urged the LDS Church leaders to “rethink our theology of heaven. The nineteenth-century Mormon men who fleshed out the theological skeleton provided by scriptures and revelation fleshed it out according to their own cultural prejudices . . . It is time to reject those aspects of Mormon heaven that are uninspired, unreasonable, unfair, damaging, and serve no virtuous end.” Sadly, the LDS leaders have now more firmly established the heretical doctrine of a Heavenly Mother, as well as the goal for Mormons to aspire to godhood.

Rob Bowman of the Institute for Religious Research concluded:

One lesson to be learned from the development of the Mormon doctrine of Heavenly Mother is that false doctrine tends to grow and to get worse over time. At first Joseph Smith taught that God had a spirit body that looked like ours but was not flesh and bones. He affirmed that there was only one God and that all things were created by God alone. But Joseph’s theology changed. Human beings went from created physical beings to created spiritual beings and then to uncreated spiritual intelligences. The Father went from a personage of spirit to a personage of flesh and bones to an exalted Man. God the Father went from being God from all eternity to being a mortal man who attained Godhood by his exaltation. The number of Gods went from one to two, from two to three, and at the end of Joseph’s life to an uncountable number of Gods, including Gods before Heavenly Father.

The Mormon doctrine of a Heavenly Mother is simply one result of that doctrinal development. Once God the Father had been conceptualized as a male human being with a flesh-and-bone body like ours with his own divine Father, and humans had been conceptualized as the Father’s children in heaven, it was a natural next step to conclude that our spirits had a Mother in heaven. Joseph Smith’s logic by which a father who has a son must also himself have a father led to the conclusion that where there is a father there must also be a mother. The doctrine of a Heavenly Mother is false, but the real problem lies in the Mormon doctrine of God. Having made the Gods in man’s image as literally beings of the same kind, Mormonism was bound to make the Gods male and female.73

In recent years a few Christian leaders have been encouraged through dialogue with various LDS scholars that the LDS Church is moving, however slowly, toward Christian orthodoxy. They point to the increased emphasis on Jesus and the decreasing emphasis on God once being a mortal. Others see this as more a matter of simplifying the message for the public without actually changing their doctrine.74

With the issuing of the LDS essay on Heavenly Mother the LDS Church has reaffirmed its doctrine of a progressive God and his wife who are “the divine pattern established for us as children of heavenly parents.” The 2012 LDS manual Teachings of the Presidents of the Church: Lorenzo Snow declares that “As man now is, God once was; As God now is, man may be.”75

Thus we see that the LDS Church still teaches the following:

1. God has not always been God, but achieved this position after years of self-effort.
2. Heavenly Father and his wife, Heavenly Mother, were once mortals on another world, ruled by yet a different “god.”
3. Heavenly Father and Heavenly Mother are resurrected mortals who have achieved godhood.
4. The goal of the LDS couple is to achieve godhood and become a Heavenly Father and Heavenly Mother to their posterity.
5. God, men and angels are the same species, just in different levels of achievement.

In other words, Mormonism is still a heretical offshoot of Christianity. ■

75 Teachings of the Presidents of the Church: Lorenzo Snow, LDS Church (2012), p. 83.

Excerpts from Letters and Emails

September 2015: I have watched your interviews and I am shocked that more Mormons haven’t figured this out already. I know that now there are more leaving than ever before . . . . I am LDS but not active . . . One day I want to tell my husband of my finding and feelings but I am going to have to have solid facts and understanding to do that.

Searching for truth . . .

October 2015: Being raised LDS I was taught not to just be skeptical of any non-LDS material but to flat out reject it because anything that would make “the church” look bad was an obvious lie. It has been through your hard work and dedication that I was able to find so much damaging information through LDS sources. I left the LDS church last year and have been running after Christ ever since. Thank you for all you do! God bless.

October 2015: Thank you Miss Sandra for speaking with me today. It is my birthday. You answering the phone was one of the best gifts ever.

I have been obsessively watching anything on YouTube with you in it for the past few months. Thank you for your gracious forgiveness for me thinking evil of you and your ministry for all these years.

I actually tempted the LORD when I dialed the number posted on your site and bet I could never get to talk to The Sandra Tanner. Your accessibility must be exhausting but it meant much . . . .

I have been going off and on to a very small non-denominational church for a while. The strange thing is my former stake president and another former bishopric member . . . are attending on the sly sporadically . . . . These guys are prominent, dept heads in the university of the city’s ward. This church is about 25 miles out.

It was surreal to see them in attendance. This would be HUGE if discovered, but I have assured them it won’t happen because of me . . . . There seems to be serendipitous moments going in and exiting out of Mormonism. It is so difficult to remove the scales off the eyes and unstop the ears. So easy a task, but hard . . . . God bless you.

October 2015: I wanted to first thank you for what you are doing. I am a recent convert and have since been questioning my decision.

October 2015: I’m not sure if this letter will get to Sandra Tanner, but I wanted to send it to thank you.

You see, I wasn’t born into mormonism; but it affected my life because it influenced me at a vulnerable young age. I was born a Lutheran, as a kid I was more interested in the Baptist beliefs, but at 18 I converted to mormonism when 2 sister missionaries knocked on my door when I was in a very vulnerable time. I joined in innocent ignorance. I have been a seeker all my life. As a result, I’ve been swept up by the many deceptions that are out there . . . .

Gospel Principles 2009 as a Significant Perpetuation of Traditional Mormon Theology

By Aaron Shafovaloff

Salt Lake City Messenger No. 115
http://utlm.org/newsletters/no115.htm#gp
Well, I went on a mission, which was disastrous and the beginning of my long exit out. I got married in a temple. But the whole time there was something inside me that told me to flee mormonism. It took me awhile.

In 1992 I finally left Mormonism, but I didn’t know any of the ‘truths’ and deceptions.

Then in 2003 I was looking for ex-eastern websites, because I was being lured into eastern beliefs. . . . I was concerned because mormonism was already one strange system that I had released from, and I didn’t want another. So when I looked for ex-eastern forums I noticed an exmormon forum: the recovery for mormonism forum. . . .

Well, I was in shock as I read information. I had no idea that I had been lied to and that it was a complete fraud. I had to go back and re-sort the information that I now knew was deception. . . . I learned of your website and that it was greatly respected for the pioneering work you and your husband had done. . . . Now I was suspicious of beliefs again. . . . I never like to use the word God, but I thought there was an energy that created. . . . I thought there was an energy that had been split in two and showed up as good/bad, light/dark. Beyond that I was rather lost. I also had no idea how to stay in the ‘good’ side of this. Everything appeared so deceptive to me. . . .

In fall of 2013 my marriage was at an all-time low. I won’t go into detail, but Satan planned to destroy us through a marriage crisis but God used that to get us back to him. Because we had been so involved in so many beliefs, from new age research, to channelling to you name it, we had become an open receptor and had no way of discerning God’s ways from imposters (except for mormonism, that we knew was a fraud.) Still, leaving mormonism was based on God’s truths. . . .

I still could not connect to God and Jesus in a way I did as a baptism kid, nor as a mormon for that matter. I couldn’t read the bible because I still experienced it with repulsion and distrust. I still had trouble with the name God and really couldn’t use the name Jesus. I couldn’t accept the bible either.

But in april of 2015 everything changed for us. My husband and I, who both work for the same company, got in a work crisis. This crisis involved a serious litigation, as we had been deceived by a co-worker to help her. . . .

We have a history of being entangled with liars (mormonism being the first one) to the point that I became suicidal and didn’t want to live in this world anymore, as I am too innocent and get manipulated. I decided that I didn’t like this world and could no longer live on it. That it wasn’t for me.

But God had other plans. God used this to bring us to our knees and lead us out of the valley. He used it to bring us back to an understanding of God, . . . I also wanted to let you know how much you’ve helped me, as I think that God has pronounced you as a blessing in the exmormon community . . . May I ask you to pray for my husband and I . . . We are newly rescued as of a few months and are getting stronger and stronger with every day, through God’s mercy and guidance.

And that’s where I get a little fear show up, because I’ve been deceived so many times by religious beliefs, I’m concerned to get deceived again so I haven’t found a church to go to. . . . This new found feeling in God and Jesus is so much different than what I experienced in Mormonism. It seems simplified and cleaned up. . . . Let us thank and praise God’s Holy name.

November 2015: You are more than a ministry. You are more than a bookstore. You are a light to the world. You provide not only perspective, but also hard facts. What has impressed me since I learned of your ministry, is that you have had a focus on showing first hand documents. People, if they want to see the truth, can open their eyes, and see the facts for themselves.

You cannot change someone’s mind, but you can show them the difference between a shadow and reality.

Thank you for everything that you do. Keep up the ministry of truth.

November 2015: I read the Gospel Topics essays on plural marriage with interest, and believe that they are intended to deceive the faithful who cling to their family legacy and what they’ve been taught since birth (in most cases). With the availability of information on the Internet, Mormon leaders probably felt pushed into a corner to respond in some way. Sure there are admissions in these essays, but they are couched in carefully crafted rhetoric. Presenting Helen Mar Kimball’s age as “several months before her 15th birthday” (rather than the 14-year-old that she was) was an obvious example of these manipulative disclosures (which are not easily accessed on the church website). Dieter Uchtdorf’s acknowledgement that some Mormon leaders may have “said or done things that were not in harmony with our values, principles, or doctrine” is somewhat ridiculous given that it was Joseph Smith, their founder, who was a chief perpetrator of these “mistakes.” As a history major at BYU in the early 1970’s, I studied and had access to many primary sources containing Mormon History. If the Mormon leaders truly want to honor the truth and respect the integrity of their members, these primary sources should be fully disclosed. Let the people decide for themselves.

December 2015: I was sucked into the LDS life when my world was upside down. Been out since Nov 19, 2013.

January 2016: I’ve watched so many of your videos and many that others have posted with you in them. I have just become so fascinated with Joseph Smith and Mormonism. I am a born again Christian that attends a Baptist church. I watch a family on YouTube that it turns out are Mormon and I began to wonder what they believe. . . . I just love your videos and the way you explain things makes so much sense to me. I just wanted to tell you how smart and brave I think you are to break away from Mormonism and try to tell people the truth. I really think the head people of the Mormon church use mind games to keep their people in a protected bubble.

January 2016: Sandra Tanner, I owe you an apology. Years ago, I fancied myself an amateur Mormon apologist. I found a cool thing on the Internet newsgroups. . . . I spent hours each day there and thought I was smart enough to defend Mormonism.
During that time, you were often the foil for our apologetics. We lumped you into a derogatory group known as “The Tanners”—you know, those apostate anti-mormons who twist and turn everything. . . .

But my naïve focus back then was focusing on arguing miniscule doctrine and things like: does Jesus being born “at Jerusalem” (BOM) really mean “in Bethlehem?” Does “My house has many mansions” refer to the three Mormon kingdoms? There were never any real answers to those questions.

I don’t remember exactly what I knew about you back then—other than that I knew you must be evil and in Satan’s power. I never really read any of your stuff because I knew it would just be rubbish. If I had painted a picture of you, it would have been dark—you as an evil demon sucking peoples souls.

Last year, I heard your interview with John Dehlin on Mormon Stories. To my surprise, you were nothing like my caricature. You were kind, articulate and caring. You were intelligent. You were thoughtful. . . . And you were right.

My journey out of Mormonism has allowed me to open my eyes and my heart to many new things. And I want to thank you for being a pioneer in post-mormonism.

I humbly admit that I am a child among men when it comes to Mormon history. I knew nothing about the real history of the church and its foundations. All I knew was the Pabulum I had been taught. The more I learn now, the more I realize how little I knew then.

So, I want to apologize for what I thought of you. I want to apologize because I would have shunned and avoided you at all costs if I had been in the same room. I would have told others that you were full of lies and deceit. I’m sorry that you have had to live with people like me thinking bad things about you.

I was wrong.

Thank you for being true to yourself. I hope that someday I can meet you and thank you in person. I would like to hug you and, tell you that you are a beautiful child of God.

Someday, I’d like to call you my friend.

January 2016: Dear Sir, allow me the presumptuous assertion of your lack of understanding about the subject of “prophecy.” Also, allow me a few moments of your time to try and educate you, if only merely superficially regarding prophecy. I shall be as brief as possible.

I propose the spirit of prophecy is subject to the true prophets. Implying, generally it takes the spirit of prophecy and being a prophet (i.e. the actual/factual testimony of Jesus) to gain understanding from any prophecy. That there is really no personal interpretation of prophecy, but only truth as it is given by the spirit of God. The spirit of God giving knowledge of things past, present, and future in the correct context for the individual(s). . . .

Don’t be too quick to judge the concept of prophecy in light of your own limited understanding. It takes deep philosophy to truly understand it, only imparted by the Spirit of God to His Latter Day Saints. In your chapter you utilized argumentative constructs to “prove” the Great Seer Joseph Smith was a false prophet. However, by your same reasoning Jesus Christ must have been a false prophet (See Mark 9:1). Now, you may utilize some fancy argument that “explains” away why that verse is being misunderstood by me. But then again I can utilize even more intelligent argument to show why you misunderstand the prophecies of Joseph Smith.

But in the end, the only way to KNOW the truth is by doing the works laid out by Jesus. Hence, you should repent in humility, call for those young unlearned Mormon missionaries to teach and baptize you, then have hands laid upon your head, and the Holy Ghost will teach you about old Joe Smith and his prophecies. If not, you will spend up your time and energy wasted on that which will never satisfy. The Mormon religion is here to stay! It is the Kingdom of God on earth. Intelligent and educated people (like myself) will always flock toward it. It is the most intelligent religion on the planet.

January 2016: Sister Tanner, over a year ago I made an anonymous account and I was incredibly rude and disrespectful towards you. I wish I could convey how sorry I am. I am sorry. I was doubting and afraid.

January 2016: You don’t know me but you have blessed my life so much!!!!! I once believed all of the things I was told about you and a great blessing to me has been to realize I was a brainless, fed, Stepford, shallow, judgmental woman.

I now understand what grace means so I am not saying this in a condemning way over myself but a freeing way of thank God I now know more, better, understand the pain those who faced rejection and being lied about so that people like me can be freed and live in this BEAUTIFUL life after the church (which I was taught by the church, would be torment. I receive spiritual experiences though I was taught the Holy Spirit (Ghost) would be sucked out of me and I understand how to really love people without judging them (which I see now as a form of loathing people) and I have learned to be compassionate with myself and others and to meet myself and others where we are in this journey and just love. Work in progress and working a lifetime of false-teaching (which I believed whole-heartedly until I was 40) and I am sure it will take a long time to get it all out but I am finally through the grief stages and it is coming out beautifully.

Thank you for being you, for being strong, for facing control I don’t think I would have had the guts to face, for being such a great example of meeting people and loving them where they are at on this journey. So much love and gratitude to you! I am SO thankful you were born!!!

January 2016: Sandra. It was yours and Jerald’s writings that kept me from returning to the Mormon Church after I first came out. So many times I was “this” close to going back. Your devotion and dedication will never be forgotten.

January 2016: I recently finished “Mormonism, Magic, and Masonry,” and . . . it . . . was . . . AWESOME. Those kooky Mormon Glass Lookers. I’m an ex-Mo and I can’t believe I went on a mission to preach about this bat-sh crazy dude.
Looking back on my mission I laugh now at the memories of those people I ran into that called Joseph Smith, Joe Smith, or John Smith. At any rate . . . I loved M, M, and M by the Tanners, very good. I loved all of it but Abrac was hilarious. Thank you for your hard work in telling the truth about ole’ Joe Smith.

February 2016: Dear Sandra—I have recently been listening to your lectures and interviews on YouTube and want to thank you for what you and your late husband, Jerald, have done in exposing the deceit, corruption and evil of the Mormon religion. I am so impressed by your courage, scholarship and integrity in investigating and how you have stood for the truth of the Biblical gospel.

I’ve always known Mormonism to be fraudulent, but recently have been doing a more thorough investigation because our oldest granddaughter began dating a Mormon and has in fact been baptized into the M. church a few months ago. She was raised in a Bible-believing church and family and yet Satan has been able (thus far) to blind her eyes. We are all heart broken and praying for her salvation and for the young man as well. We have shared loads of Scripture with her and all kinds of links to ministries that are revealing the false teachings of the Mormons. If she were seeking truth, it is everywhere for her to see, but at this point I think she’s so into the guy that she just wants Mormonism to be true. We pray for the Lord to open her eyes, snatch her from the fire.

I especially appreciated your explanation of all the temple rituals. I would think that if [our granddaughter] knew some of this creepy stuff it would give her pause. Maybe the Lord will give me an opportunity to let her in on some of this. I think she’s only hearing the “palatable” stuff at their weekly meetings. Also, from your interviews, I realized how central polygamy is to the teaching of the church. I doubt if [our granddaughter] has any idea of that and probably only thinks that polygamy is part of the history (not current doctrine) and/or connected with the fundamentalist strains of Mormonism—when in fact, it’s part of the teaching of the mainstream church.

Your teaching also helped me reconcile how intelligent, educated people (Mitt Romney, my husband’s dermatologist, etc.) can hold to Mormonism. I’m seeing now that they may even know it’s false and still cling to it because of the culture, the family ties, etc. So sad that people are willing to value these things before truth!

I’m so happy to learn that many Mormons are coming to Christ! . . . And thank you so much for being one who values and stands for truth. I’m amazed how well you are able to articulate all that you have learned and thank the Lord for your scholarship and clear mind! To me, you and the record of your work are a real treasure.

February 2016: I just finished watching the documentary . . . [The Mormons: Who They are, What They Believe] and wanted to reach out and thank you for the brutal honesty by all of the past members who appeared in the documentary (Sandra especially!!).

February 2016: Sandra,

I have watched and read anything and everything that has your name on it. I have learned so much from your videos, Conference talks, your fireside talks, research on Joseph Smith and your interview with Bishop Earl on the ex Mormon files (and many more) . . . .

I am 38 years old and came out of Mormonism around the age of 30. I know more about Mormonism now than I did when I was in it. I also realized that I was in a cult all the years I was in Mormonism. I had my Mormon goggles on and pressure from my Bishop dad keeping me in when I knew it was not right. My Mormon temple ceremony was horrible. By the time we were in the second room and chanting everything in me was screaming “this is a cult!!!” The Holy Spirit was telling me that it was not right.

I left the celestial room as fast as I could and ran to the bathroom and cried. When I turned to my Mormon escort through the temple and told her that I felt horrible about what just happened and that it felt cultish she brushed me off with no words of encouragement or explanation. My husband at the time was only a member for one year before we went to the temple. The only part that did not feel like a cult was when we were sealed to our three beautiful children. But my poor husband had to watch me, a member of this church my whole life, cry all the way home from [one state] back to our home in [another state]. I can only imagine what was going through his head. Two months after going to the temple he had an affair and we shortly thereafter divorced.

Since then I have finally opened my eyes and started thinking for myself and reading everything about Mormonism that I can get my hands and eyes and ears on. I am now a Christian who believes that Jesus Christ is my savior and gave me the gift of grace. Grace is not a word to hear in Mormonism. I just felt like I needed to reach out to you and tell you how much you have helped me in my journey to better understand that Mormonism is not Christian. And the things about Joseph Smith that are so true that the church hides from the members. What a horrible horrible man he was. Again I thank you for all the research and information that you give people and I’ll pass it on to everyone that I now witness to. You and your husband truly have done the work that God will be proud of.

March 2016: I am a member of the Church of Latter Day Saints. I am so sorry that I had never heard of the Tanner’s before now. Unbelievable I know.

Anyway, I have been contemplating leaving the church ever since the announcement came about the children of Gay couples . . .

So I began doing research on the church. I came across a nice young man called Jeremy Runnels. It is through him that I heard of Sandra Tanner.

I have found all of the information about the church history fascinating. But what I really found so awesome was the information about Jesus being all we really need for our salvation.
As I am sure you know, Mormons have a very different view of being “saved.” We are taught to suspect anyone who uses that term. lol.

I bought a bunch of Bibles because I wanted to “start fresh” as it were and not have all of the commentary and footnotes that I have in my quad.

I bought a KJV Bible, a NIV Bible and a big nice fancy leather bound one for my front room so that when the visiting teachers come over we can read from the Bible instead of from the Ensign.

I have not “officially” left yet. My husband is totally done with the Church at this point and he is being incredibly supportive and patient as I go at my own pace.

I thing after this Easter Sunday I will try to find a non-denominational church around where I live.

I watched your “fireside” just recently. I can’t believe I never heard of you. :)

March 2016: Thank you Sandra. So much information you’ve shared here. I really appreciate your time. I’ve studied probably 20 hours and learned probably more than most Mormons know about their religion at this point. The problem is, my [19 year old] son [with a Mormon girlfriend] will not listen to any of it, will not look at anything on the internet, does not want to talk to anyone about it. He says it’s between him and God and he will pray whether or not it’s true. (I’m sure you know where that idea came from). I’ve encouraged him to talk to his pastor about it as he had just been baptized the week before he was given the BOM by a non-denominational pastor. He hasn’t done that either. He’s afraid he will be influenced by outside resources and he believes this needs to come from the Holy Spirit.

I never in my wildest dreams thought about this type of thing happening to him. He’s been raised in a Christian home his whole life and all of our extended family are Christians, all grandparents, etc.

March 2016: [From granddaughter of longtime friend] Thank you for praying for my salvation before I was born. Thank you for loving me and my family. I will be forever grateful for you. Would appreciate your continued prayers for the Lord to save the rest of them. Blessed Resurrection Sunday! I thank the Lord for you and your ministry.

April 2016: Oh yeah of little faith…… convert to Islam please.

April 2016: I am a fairly young college student, . . . I did not know anything about Mormonism until about 2 and a half years ago when many of my LDS friends left for their missions. A few of them shared their beliefs with me before they left. Ever since, missionaries have been showing up at my door constantly. I was later introduced to some friends from church that use their home in Utah to evangelize during the Manti Pageant. This has become an annual mission trip for me, and this past year I had the pleasure of visiting the Utah Lighthouse Ministry and meeting Sandra Tanner. I learned so much just from visiting, and from the books I have purchased since. I’d like to make sure that those involved with this ministry know that people are thankful for them and their work.

Additionally, I want those involved in this ministry to know that it is making a difference. One of my closest friends, who is LDS, revealed to me, and me alone so far, his questioning of the Book of Mormon, particularly why it seems to support the Trinity. I know that the past two and a half years of us discussing Mormonism and Christianity have influenced his doubts. I have this ministry, and others like Mormonism Research Ministry to thank for equipping me for this kind of ministry, and God of course.

April 2016: Hi, over there!

I’m just a little curious. I am (was) a mormon until a couple of weeks ago. I am a convert who joined the church here in Norway when I was in my teens. All the candy flossed information that is surrounding an every day mormon is fine to live with until you get to know what is really going on.

I really felt, when I was looking into the internet on other information about the church, that I was doing something terribly wrong. Everybody within the church is saying that we must stay away from all that kind of info since it is anti-mormon. NOBODY has ever told me about the church essay’s. Feel like I have been played for a fool by those who have red them. Is there a lot who knows but don’t have the courage to speak out about it or are they just really well flossed with all the easy going things?

It is incredible how this organization is able to endure with all this evidence that the church is way of track. And they have been that way ever since Joseph Smith found out he could write a book and make money on it. He should have continued with his moneydigging and we would have been spared for all this trouble.

There is a lot that could have been said but I am wondering if there is other norwegians that have made contact and are curious on what’s going on? There is about 2000 active members in Norway. But I think more and more will be informed with the dreadful things of what they have believed in.

I want to thank you, Sandra, for your steadfastness in the truth. You and Jerald are giants. You have made it possible for us to go deeper into the material. When I first found out, I wanted to know everything, and sat up late at night to watch your interview with John Dehlin. It was great. And I also listened to Lee Baker. I have now bought Shadow or reality on PDF and look forward to increase my knowledge. . . .

Though it must be said it is probably easier to leave church here in Norway then it would be in the LDS capitol. Luckily, but the feeling of betrayal is ever present.

The New Mormon History - Excerpt from Chapter 11

“Divorce among Mormon Polygamists: Extent and Explanations”

Eugene E. Campbell and Bruce L. Campbell

Studies of Mormon polygamy have tended to emphasize the origin and motivation for the practice, courtship techniques, inter-family relationships, economic adjustments, housing arrangements, and legal difficulties, but very little has been written concerning divorce. . . . Nevertheless recent studies have revealed that 1,645 divorces were granted by Brigham Young during the period of his presidency and that many of these were obtained by prominent pioneer leaders involved in the practice of plural marriage. . . . First, many prominent men known to be polygamists are listed on these records of divorce. The names of many general authorities of the LDS church as well as stake and ward leaders are included. Second, several cases reveal that two or more wives were divorced from one man on the same day. The most unusual case is that of George D. Grant who was divorced from three wives on the same day and from a fourth wife within five weeks. More conclusive evidence is the fact that Brigham Young did not have authority to grant civil divorces terminating monogamous marriages, but as president of the church he alone had the right to sever polygamous relationships. Polygamous marriages were always extralegal, and in the Mormon system only the president had the right to authorize marriages and divorces. The incoming and outgoing correspondence of the pioneer leader is replete with requests for permission to take extra wives as well as to be divorced from them. . . .

Evidence from D. Michael Quinn’s prosopographical study of early LDS church leaders tends to bear out these assumptions. He discovered that of the seventy-two general authorities who entered plural marriage, thirty-nine were involved in broken marriages, including fifty-four divorces, twenty-six separations, and one annulment. (The New Mormon History, pp. 181-182)
Both the Bible and the Book of Mormon present themselves to their readers as many separate works written by different authors over many centuries, eventually collected together into one book. Now the Bible clearly is just that. But what about the Book of Mormon? Is it really the same sort of book the Bible is? Or, as C. S. Lewis suggested, is it rather a book written in imitation of the Bible? The introduction of the current edition of the Book of Mormon asserts it is the former:

The Book of Mormon is a volume of holy scripture comparable to the Bible. It is a record of God’s dealings with ancient inhabitants of the Americas and contains the fulness of the everlasting gospel. The book was written by many ancient prophets by the spirit of prophecy and revelation. Their words, written on gold plates, were quoted and abridged by a prophet-historian named Mormon.

These words merely reiterate the view of the Book of Mormon officially held by the Mormon Church from the time Egbert B. Grandin of Palmyra, New York, published it on March 26, 1830, right down to the present day. This was also the view put forward by Joseph Smith himself, as indicated in the title he chose for the original edition: The Book of Mormon: An Account Written by the Hand of Mormon upon Plates Taken from the Plates of Nephi. In providing this title, Joseph Smith is giving us to understand that Nephi (7th/6th cent. BC) and Mormon (4th/5th cent. AD) were real historical people and that the Book of Mormon was translated into English from an abridgment of the plates of Nephi by Mormon. From the beginning as well the Book of Mormon has included two additional documents under its covers called “testimonies,” one of three and the other of eight witnesses, all of whom say they actually saw the plates from which Joseph translated the Book of Mormon and the characters on the plates. Both “testimonies” begin with the remarkably comprehensive line identifying the intended audience of the book: “BE it known unto all nations, kindreds, tongues, and people, unto whom this work shall come. . . .” The plain intention of these testimonies is to assure readers everywhere that the Book of Mormon

2 The Book of Mormon: An Account Written by the Hand of Mormon upon Plates Taken from the Plates of Nephi (Palmyra, NY: E. B. Grandin, 1830), [589] and [590].
was not a mere imitation of the Bible but actually what it purports to be: another Bible, and that it was translated, according to the oft-used expression, “by the gift and power of God.” But what exactly does that phrase mean?

“By the Gift and Power of God”

Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, and Martin Harris are the names of the men who signed the Book of Mormon “testimony of the three witnesses” declaring that: “We also know that they [the plates] have been translated by the gift and power of God” (italics added). One of the three, David Whitmer, left the following description of what he understood by that phrase, “by the gift and power of God”:

I will now give you a description of the manner in which the Book of Mormon was translated. Joseph Smith would put the seer stone into a hat, and put his face in the hat, drawing it closely around his face to exclude the light; and in the darkness the spiritual light would shine.
A piece of something resembling parchment would appear, and on that appeared the writing. One character at a time would appear, and under it was the interpretation in English. Brother Joseph would read off the English to Oliver Cowdery, who was his principal scribe, and when it was written down and repeated to Brother Joseph to see if it was correct, then it would disappear, and another character with the interpretation would appear. Thus the Book of Mormon was translated by the gift and power of God, and not by any power of man. (italics added)

Another of the three, Martin Harris, corroborated
Whitmer’s story of the miraculous process of translation:

He [Martin Harris] said that the Prophet possessed a seer stone, by which he was enabled to translate as well as from the Urim and Thummim, and for convenience he then used the seer stone. Martin explained the translating as follows: By aid of the seer stone, sentences would appear and were read by the Prophet and written by Martin, and when finished he would say, “Written,” and if correctly written, that sentence would disappear and another appear in its place, but if not written correctly it remained until corrected, so that the translation was just as it was engraved on the plates, precisely in the language then used.

Even the Prophet Joseph Smith’s own wife, Emma Hale Smith, added her testimony to the above described manner of translation:

When my husband was translating the Book of Mormon,
I wrote a part of it, as he dictated each sentence, word for word, and when he came to proper names he could not pronounce, or long words, he spelled them out, and while I was writing them, if I made any mistake in spelling, he would stop me and correct my spelling, although it was impossible for him to see how I was writing them down at the time. Even the word Sarah he could not pronounce at first, but had to spell it, and I would pronounce it for him.

If what David Whitmer, Martin Harris, and Emma Smith say is true, if this really was the way the Book of Mormon came forth, then it’s really not surprising that Joseph Smith would describe it as “the most correct of any book on earth.” Imagine what is being claimed by these witnesses, namely, that the Book of Mormon, at least in the original dictated manuscript or manuscripts, represents, very literally, God’s own English translation of the Reformed Egyptian characters inscribed on the ancient Nephite plates. Not only do all the words come directly by divine dictation, but all the grammar and spelling as well.

Obviously this story of miraculous origins was intended to underscore the claim that the Book of Mormon is a divine book in its own right and no mere imitation of the Bible. But what if the witnesses’ stories turned out not to be true? What if the story was made up and the Book of Mormon turned out to be just another book written in imitation of the Bible? If that were so, the situation would become more complicated than our merely being able to assign the book, as C. S. Lewis did in his non-confrontational way, to the morally-neutral category of an imitation of the Bible. If the claims turned out not to be true, the Book of Mormon becomes not merely a 9 Strictly speaking only portions of the original dictated manuscript exist, but the entire copy that was produced from it, called the Printer’s Manuscript, exists in its entirety and represents for many parts the closest we can get to what the Original Manuscript looked like. These Bible imitation, but a full-blown Bible forgery. As Eric Hebborn (d. 1996), one of the most accomplished art forgers of the twentieth century, wrote: “The making of a new Old Master is not itself a crime... A crime has only been committed when the fake is offered for sale as genuinely old.” And so in this case, making an imitation of the Bible is one thing, but falsely putting it forward as ancient or divine in origin quite another.

Given the point he makes above, when Hebborn would paint a forgery he would never actually claim it was authentic. Instead he devised a series of strategies to gently nudge others into making their own affirmative judgments concerning authenticity. In contrast, Joseph and his early followers did not hesitate to venture authenticity claims of the most remarkable nature for the Book of Mormon.

The task of examining the Book of Mormon as a Bible forgery, rather than a Bible imitation, is forced upon us once we face how great an effort on the part of those who produced it to convince people that it was indeed a divine book, as when Joseph Smith declared the Book of Mormon, “the keystone of our religion, and a man would get nearer to God by abiding by its precepts, than by any other book.” If Joseph Smith said this, knowing he’d made the whole thing up, then he was, very simply, a very bad man, a man who defrauded people spiritually by producing a fake Bible, in the same way counterfeiters and art forgers defraud people materially or aesthetically by making fake money and fake Picassos.

There will be those, of course, who will resist making such a pointed conclusion about Joseph in this case by suggesting some mitigating factor in his case, as, for example, did Major Lewis C. Bidamon, Emma Smith’s second husband, when he told Edmund C. Briggs, “I believe Joseph Smith was an honest man, but think he might have been deceived.”

The Consistency Test:
Does the suspected forgery match its maker’s description?
Does its maker act as though he himself believes his description?

Inner motivations and their attendant virtues or culpabilities can be hidden. It’s hard to tell when somebody’s lying. But happily when trying to detect a forgery we don’t always have to. What we do have to do is carefully examine whether what the suspected forger does matches what (s)he says. To begin with one example, if there’s reason to suspect that a forgery has been perpetrated, the thing to do is to determine whether the statements of the forger both before and after producing the suspected work are consistent with the process (s)he claimed to have used in creating the suspected forgery. An example of what I mean can be found in the story of the flamboyant British art forger Tom Keating (d. 1984). Keating claimed that the spirits of the old masters actually possessed him and painted new paintings of their own through him and that sometimes this even happened when he was sleeping. Was Keating lying? Did he actually believe his claim that: “I woke up one morning and found it [a self-portrait of the French painter, Edgar Degas (1834-1917)] on the easel, in place of the scratchy, silly daub that I’d been working on the day before?”

Notice now that I am not asking if we believed the story, but if he, Tom Keating, believed it. We might believe Keating believed that dead artists possessed living ones, even if we didn’t believe ourselves that such things ever actually happened. On those grounds we might perhaps be willing even to excuse him for signing their names rather than his own while under the influence.

One way to test whether Keating believed his own story or not would be to ask whether his actual procedures in producing the paintings matched this stated belief? Perpetrators of art forgery very often go to great lengths to produce canvas, ground paint and so on, that exactly match the precise period of the painters they are trying to reproduce. If it could be shown in Keating’s case that he employed this kind of measures in producing his forged canvases, then of course, his claim of being simply possessed by the artists he was replicating would come under suspicion, due to his efforts to deceive those who might examine the painting closely. If, on the other hand, he simply took up the materials immediately at hand on his painting table and dashed off pictures in the precise manner and style of the painters that had allegedly taken hold of him, then, true or not, his excuse would at least be consistent with his claim about being possessed by the spirits of dead artists. And as it happens in Keating’s case, his excuse did turn out to be more or less consistent with the kind of process we might expect him to have adopted under the alleged circumstances. Keating had already confessed when he gave this excuse, and surely knew that if scientific tests were done on his forgeries his materials would not have matched those used in the times of the artists he was imitating. In other words his excuse was well invented, if not to persuade people that the forgeries were real, at least to provide himself a justification that might keep him out of jail. But what of Joseph?

11 History of the Church, 4:461.
12 Briggs, “Visit to Nauvoo,” 446.

If the accounts of David Whitmer, Martin Harris, and Emma Smith accurately reflect what happened then we would expect to find evidence of that fact in both the products of the allegedly miraculous translation process and how Joseph Smith himself treated those products afterward. We must ask on the one hand whether what we see in the manuscripts is consistent with their having been produced by the sort of direct, divine oversight described in three accounts. And then on the other hand, whether Joseph treated the original inadvertent transcriptions as absolutely sacrosanct and authoritative in the production of the various editions of the Book of Mormon produced during his lifetime. In each case the answer is no. Neither the internal evidence of the original manuscripts themselves nor the way Joseph treated them afterward are consistent with the story.

The Manuscripts as Witnesses to the Translation Process

In the first place the original manuscripts, and indeed the original published Book of Mormon as well, represent an odd mix of English. On the one hand there appears to have been an attempt to make the English sound Bible-like by mimicking the familiar cadences of the King James Bible throughout. As Mark Twain famously pointed out, the author labored to give his words and phrases the quaint, old-fashioned sound and structure of our King James' translation of the Scriptures; and the result is a mongrel—half modern gibberish, and half ancient simplicity and gravity. The latter is awkward and constrained; the former natural, but grotesque by the contrast. Whenever he found his speech growing too modern—which was about every sentence or two—he ladled in a few such scriptural phrases as “exceeding sore,” “and it came to pass,” etc., and made things satisfactory again. “And it came to pass” was his pet. If he had left that out, his Bible would have been only a pamphlet.

Overuse of “And it came to pass” in both the Book of Mormon and the Pearl of Great Price: Moses raises suspicion of Bible forgery.

Certainly Mark Twain was correct about the Book of Mormon’s overuse of “It came to pass.” The phrase does occur quite often in the King James Bible (453 times), but it occurs more than three times as often in the Book of Mormon (1447 times). The mere frequency of the phrase, in and of itself, raises suspicion concerning the authenticity of the text. Suspicion is increased when it is discovered that a similar thing occurs in Joseph’s other revelational projects.

The overuse of “it came to pass,” is very evident in the Pearl of Great Price: Moses, which represents the LDS Church’s canonized Old Testament selection of the so-called Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible (JST). In preparing the JST, Joseph used the King James Version (KJV) as his base text, this time in the form of a pulpit-style Bible published in 1828 by H. & E. Phinney, Cooperstown, New York, which he and Oliver Cowdery purchased from Palmyra printer and bookseller Egbert B. Grandin on October 8, 1829.

The eight chapters of the Book of Moses in the Pearl of Great Price represent Joseph’s reworking of Genesis 1:1–6:13. Behind the use of the King James Bible’s phrase “And it came to pass,” is the familiar Hebrew form wayêhî. Most modern translations of the Bible simply leave wayēhî untranslated because it is a redundancy, it merely moves the narrative forward, without substantially affecting the meaning.\textsuperscript{19} In the course of the King James version of the 50 chapters of the book of Genesis, “And it came to pass” occurs 63 times, a little more than once per chapter. In Genesis 1:1–6:3 in the King James, the passage covered by the Book of Moses, the phrases appears 3 times (Genesis 4:3, 4:8, 6:1).\textsuperscript{20}

In reworking those chapters in the Book of Moses, however, Joseph increased the number of occurrences of “And it came to pass,” from 3 times to 44 times, making Joseph’s restoration of the first 5 chapters of Genesis plus the first 13 verses of the 6th chapter contain more than two thirds the number of occurrences of “And it came to pass” as in the entire 50 chapters of KJV Genesis.

Given the great frequency of the phrase “And it came to pass” in both the Book of Mormon and in the Book of Moses, one has to at least consider the possibility that it derives from Joseph’s prophetic style, rather than from anything present in the texts Joseph claimed he was translating on the one hand and restoring on the other.

When Mark Twain noted the odd mix of what he described as “a mongrel—half modern gibbiness, and half ancient simplicity and gravity,” he was pointing out another issue that needs considering when trying to determine whether the Book of Mormon is another Bible or another Bible forgery.

If the story is true about Joseph seeing the translation of each word and phrase on the stone (or through the Urim and Thummim), then reciting it to his scribe, who in turn had to get it right before the stone would move on to the next word or phrase, then we have to come to terms with the idea that during the translation process, God for some reason elected to throw a little backwoods grammar, as for example, a little mismatching of singular and plural subjects with the appropriate singular and plural verbs, into the King James mix. This means we must accept the idea that when Joseph looked at the stone while translating 3 Nephi 17:6-7, what he saw written there in shining letters had Jesus telling the ancient Nephites: “Behold, my bowels is filled with compassion towards you . . . my bowels is filled with mercy.”

Further in view of the descriptions of the translation process the remark on the title page of the 1830 first edition of the Book of Mormon stating that “if there be fault, it be the mistake of men”—which is also present in the current edition—it can only refer to (1) errors made by the ancient authors of the Book of Mormon, in which case we would be dealing with an inerrant translation of a potentially errant text, or (2) typographical errors that occurred in the process of turning the contents of the divinely dictated manuscripts into a book. In the case of the bowels passage, the printed text of the original Book of Mormon does, in fact, reflect the reading of the Printer’s Manuscript, a copy of the original dictated manuscript produced by Oliver Cowdery.\textsuperscript{21}

If the story of the divine origin of the English translation of the Book of Mormon is true, we may well ask why God chose to employ the odd mix of only partially successful attempted Elizabethan English and crude American back-woods slang. From the perspective of a non-committed person trying to discern whether we are dealing with a Bible or Bible forgery, this mixed style, especially in light of the Book’s failure to sustain a truly plausible imitation of early 17th century English throughout the course of the narrative,\textsuperscript{22} naturally points toward considering the work a forgery produced by someone trying to make it sound like the King James Bible without having the linguistic capacity to actually pull it off. The point is illustrated well in a short story by the late Nobel Prize-winning author Isaac Bashevis Singer entitled “The Séance.” In the story the down-on-his-luck scholar Dr. Zorach Kalisher is befriended by a poorly educated psychic named Mrs. Lotte Kopitzky. When Mrs. Kopitzky goes into her trances she supposedly channels a spirit who lived in the 4th century A.D. named Bhaghavar Krishna:

Everything was exactly as it had been yesterday and the day before. Bhaghavar Krishna began to speak in English with his foreign voice that was half male and half female, duplicating Mrs. Kopitzky’s errors in pronunciation and grammar. Lotte Kopitzky came from a village in the Carpathian Mountains. Dr. Kalisher could never discover her nationality—Hungarian, Romanian, Galician? She knew no Polish or German, and little English; even her Yiddish had been corrupted through her long years in America. Actually she had been left

\textsuperscript{19} So for example, where the KJV reads at Genesis 6:1: “And it came to pass, when men began to multiply on the face of the earth,” the NRSV, NAB, NIV, ESV, HCSB, JB, NJB, pass over the wayēhî and start the passage with “When (man, men, mankind, human beings, people) began to multiply . . .” The NASB, as an example of one of the few Bibles English translations that does translate wayēhî here, reads “Now it came about, when men . . .”

\textsuperscript{20} All three passages translating wayēhî, but the first two inserting additional words between “and” and “it came to pass.”

\textsuperscript{22} Apart from those places where the Book of Mormon extensively copies directly from the King James text itself.
languageless and Bhaghavar Krishna spoke the various jargons. At first Dr. Kalisher had asked Bhaghavar Krishna the details of his earthly existence but had been told by Bhaghavar Krishna that he had forgotten everything in the heavenly mansions in which he dwelt. All he could recall was that he had lived in the suburbs of Madras. Bhaghavar Krishna did not even know that in that part of India Tamil was spoken. When Dr. Kalisher tried to converse with him about Sanskrit, the Mahabharata, the Ramayana, the Sakuntala, Bhaghavar Krishna replied that he was no longer interested in terrestrial literature. Bhaghavar Krishna knew nothing but a few theosophic and spiritualistic brochures and magazines which Mrs. Kopitzky subscribed to.23

To be sure we expect to encounter different styles in a work containing different authors representing a number of different genres. It is quite another matter when the whole of the work appears to be dominated by an overarching and clumsy attempt on the part of the author to make the work appear to be what it is not. When John Ballou Newbrough rolled out his massive Oahspe, a New Bible in the Words of Jehovih [sic] and his Angel Ambassadors in 1882,24 we can scarcely think the New York Times reporter who covered the event meant to endorse the work’s authenticity when (s)he remarked that “The style is in one place modern, and in another ancient, and the English of the King James version of the Christian Bible is mixed with the English of to-day’s.”25

And yet ingenuity driven by necessity seldom fails at inventing alternative explanations. LDS researcher Mark Thomas, for example, argued that the peculiarities of the language of the Book of Mormon resulted from its being high art, something on the level of William Blake or other great poets and authors. At the 2016 Sunstone Symposium he sought to demonstrate this dramatically by reading passages from the Book of Mormon in what he imagined the early 19th century accent of Joseph Smith must have sounded like.26 Thomas’s view rests on an aesthetic judgment that relatively few (including this author) would share.27 But does Thomas’s suggestion really succeed in providing a plausible way of explaining why God chose to translate the Book of Mormon using the strange mixture of rough hewn and faux elevated Englishes, or is there a simpler explanation?

The Evidence of Joseph’s Treatment of the Manuscripts

Even if we accept the story of the coming forth of the Book of Mormon told by the witnesses despite its odd mix of Englishes, did Joseph himself act as though he believed the story? Did he treat the dictated transcriptions created in the course of the translation process as absolutely sacrosanct and authoritative when overseeing the production of the various editions of the Book of Mormon published during his lifetime? When the stone presented the words “Behold, my bowels is filled with compassion towards you . . . my bowels is filled with mercy,” when the stone would not move on to the next word or phrase until Joseph’s scribe had carefully copied those words down, bad grammar and all, just as they appeared on the stone, did Joseph, did anyone involved in the printing process, proceed to the next step as if that were what happened? The answer is, they did not. What they did do was treat the Book of Mormon manuscripts like pretty much anyone would have treated any other humanly produced manuscript. They cleaned it up, corrected spellings, fixed grammar, changed words, expressions, here and there, without any warrant in the manuscript and on their own volition, even sometimes where it affected the book’s basic doctrine. So, for example, the bowels phrase, which was faithfully reproduced from the Printer’s Manuscript in the original 1830 edition of the Book of Mormon, was corrected in the 1837 second edition to read instead: “Behold, my bowels are filled with compassion towards you . . . my bowels are filled with mercy.”28

25 “Dr. Newbrough’s ‘Oahspe.’ An ‘Inspired’ Volume Giving the History of 24,000 Years,” The New York Times (Oct. 21, 1882): 5. The article explains that the text was produced through automatic writing.

A large number of such corrections were entered into the Printer’s Manuscript in preparation for the second edition, many of them, including this one apparently, by Joseph himself. As LDS scholar Royal Skousen comments, “The text has undergone considerable editing in order to remove cases of subject-verb disagreement. This is especially the case in Joseph Smith’s editing of the 1837 edition.” In an earlier work assessing this situation, RLDS Church Historian Richard Howard counted 137 places where Joseph corrected the grammar by replacing “was” with “were,” “were” with “was,” “is” with “are,” “are” with “is.” Howard counted more than two thousand refinements that had been entered into the Printer’s Manuscript, mostly by Joseph Smith himself, more than a thousand of which ended up in the 1837 second edition of the Book of Mormon. Most, but not all, of Joseph’s corrections, as Skousen tells us, “are grammatical in nature,” a fact that caused Howard to remark: “The improvement of the text for the 1837 edition makes it clear that Joseph Smith’s grammatical abilities matured greatly from the year 1829.”

While only the Printer’s Manuscript of the Book of Mormon is extant for the bowels passage, we can be sure from other passages that the various changes Joseph made in the Printer’s Manuscript were not motivated by trying to bring it into more perfect agreement with the Original Manuscript.

This is so, as we said, even where important doctrinal issues were at stake. For example, as Joseph’s prophetic career progressed so did his doctrine of God. This can be seen clearly in the way Joseph tweaked language that equated Jesus and God the Father in the 1830 first edition of the Book of Mormon in order to distinguish between the two divine figures in the 1837 second edition. In what is now 1 Nephi 11:18, the 1830 Book of Mormon referred to Mary as “the mother of God” (p. 25). A few lines later (now 1 Nephi 11:21), Jesus was equated with the Father in the statement: “behold the Lamb of God, yea, even the Eternal Father” (p. 25). In each case the 1830 Book of Mormon reproduced the wording that appeared in both the Original Manuscript and the Printer’s Manuscript, and in each case significant words were added to the 1837 second edition. “Mother of God” at 1 Nephi 11:18 became “mother of the Son of God,” (p. 27) and “even the Eternal Father” at 1 Nephi 11:21, to “even the Son of the Eternal Father!” (p. 28). In the former case, Joseph himself introduced “the son of” above the line. In the latter case the correction was introduced into the second edition without having been entered into the the Book of Mormon manuscripts beforehand.

Sometimes it’s not as immediately clear why Joseph departs from the Book of Mormon manuscripts when talking about Jesus and the Father. In the 1830 Book of Mormon at what is now 1 Nephi 12:18 we read of the “justice of the Eternal God, and Jesus Christ, which is the Lamb of God” (p. 28). This was the reading of both the Original Manuscript and the Printer’s Manuscript. But again Joseph takes the liberty to change it by entering a correction into the Printer’s Manuscript in preparation for the 1837 printed edition. He marked out the words “Jesus Christ which” and replaced them with “Mosiah who,” indicating that the passage should now read: “justice of the Eternal God & Mosiah, who is the Lamb of God.” “Mosiah” is apparently a misspelling of Messiah, and in the 1837 second edition the passage reads: “the justice of the eternal God, and the Messiah, who is the Lamb of God” (p. 30). 39

So why the departure from the divinely dictated text in this case? Why the change? Perhaps the reason is that the name “Christ” wasn’t supposed to be revealed until later in the Book of Mormon narrative, as is suggested by 2 Nephi 10:3, where the Book of Mormon character Jacob says, “it must needs be expedient that Christ—for in the last night the angel spake unto me that this should be his name—should come.” The first time “Jesus Christ” was introduced into the narrative was in 2 Nephi 25:19: “the Messiah cometh in six hundred years from the time my father [Lehi] left Jerusalem; and according to the words of the prophets, and also of the angel of God, his name shall be called Jesus Christ.” In changing “Jesus Christ,” to “Mosiah” (“the Messiah”) at 1 Nephi 12:18 in the second edition, Joseph was apparently clearing up an anachronism in the text, 40 and in the process preferring to use a word other than the one he had supposedly read from the stone earlier. 41

Many similar examples of substantive changes in later editions of the Book of Mormon, years after the allegedly divinely guided dictation from the stone took place, are plentiful. The ones presented here were chosen because they come from points where the original dictated manuscript is still extant. It’s clear that at least by the time Joseph was preparing the second edition of the Book 39 Richard P. Howard credited “Mosiah,” here to a scribe who misheard Joseph’s dictated word “Messiah” (Howard, Restoration Scriptures, 45), but Royal Skousen and Scott Robin Jensen identify the word as being introduced by Joseph’s own hand (Joseph Smith Papers: Printer’s Manuscript 1, 57).

40 The change also causes one to wonder whether Joseph realized at that point that “Christ” simply translated the Greek translation of the Hebrew word “Messiah,” which already appears in the very first chapter of the Book of Mormon (1 Nephi 1:19). Against the idea that Joseph was simply taking Christ as Jesus’s last name is the appearance of the phrase “Jesus is the Christ,” in, e.g., 2 Nephi 26:12, Moroni 7:44.

41 I am indebted to Sandra Tanner for explaining this puzzling change, and for pointing me to her and Jerald’s discussion of it in their Covering up the Black Hole in the Book of Mormon (Salt Lake City, UT: Utah Lighthouse Ministry, 1990), 64-65. An expanded edition of this work now appears as the second part of Jerald and Sandra Tanner, Joseph Smith’s Plagiarism of the Bible in the Book of Mormon (rev. ed.; Salt Lake City, UT: Utah Lighthouse Ministry, 2010), 216-17.

of Mormon for the press he was clearly not treating the original dictated manuscripts of the Book of Mormon in such a way as to indicate that he himself believed the claim of his followers about the word for word dictation from the stone. Had he believed it, we’ve no cause to suppose he’d have taken the liberties he did with the text.

Anachronism as Key to Detection

In rectifying the anachronism of having Jesus Christ named by a Nephite in the story line of the Book of Mormon before that name had supposedly been initially revealed to the Nephites, if indeed that’s what he did, Joseph was tacitly recognizing an important reality, namely that the presence of anachronisms in a text is one of the first things one must look to when trying to discern whether a text or picture or similar production is a forgery or not. The Merriam Webster’s 3rd International Dictionary gives as part of its definition for the word anachronism “a chronological misplacing of persons, events, objects, or customs with regard to each other.”

In other words, an anachronism is something out of its proper place or time, and so in the case of detecting literary forgeries, a chronological synchronicity of two things that would have been unlikely or impossible. Something is there in the story that would not/could not have been there at the time the events being described in the story allegedly took place.

Francisco Candido Xavier, Two Thousand Years Ago

One very amusing example of the presence of anachronisms in a book pretending to give a first-hand account of a person living in first century Palestine is the channeled Two Thousand Years Ago, supposedly related to the Spiritist Francisco Candido Xavier back in 1939 by a spirit named Emmanuel, who, back in the first century, was a Roman Senator named Publius Lentulus. 42 On the whole Emmanuel gets the lay of the land as it would have been right, although he does occasionally get snagged on his geography, as, for example, when he describes traveling to Galilee from Jerusalem on the road through Samaria, but says it “often skirted the light, limpid waters of the Jordan River.” Yet like the Hollywood movies of the thirties, Emmanuel seems to have no sense of creating historically plausible dialogue. We can’t help but smile, for example, when we read of Publius stopping by Pontius Pilate’s “office,” or when we encounter a Roman slave giving deference to his mistress by calling her “ma’am”. The feel of the language is neither ancient nor modern. It is 1930s-ish. It’s anachronistic. And if we had occasion to want to take a cue from that fact we might even be able to rummage around popular sources available to the scribe/author Xavier in those days and see where he really got his information for writing the book. Still such verbal anachronisms as we find in Two Thousand Years Ago might be legitimately explained away as part of providing a fully “modern” translation. But there are anachronisms that cannot be explained away because their presence create alleged historical situations that could not have happened, that were, in fact, impossible.

42 Conveniently, the same name as that given to the alleged author of a forged letter by a supposed contemporary of Jesus that shaped depictions of Jesus in the West. See Joseph Leo Koerner, The Moment of Self-Portraiture in German Renaissance Art (Chicago & London: University of Chicago Press, 1993), 103-104. See the critical edition of the letter prepared by Ernst von Dobschütz, Christusbilder: Untersuchungen zur christlichen Legende (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs’sche Buchhandlung, 1899), 293-330, esp. 319.

The Donation of Constantine

One of the most famous of all religious forgeries was a medieval document known as the Donation of Constantine, which pretended to be a decree of the fourth century Emperor Constantine telling the story of how he had been healed of leprosy through the ministrations of Pope Sylvester and of how in gratitude he deeded the Pope and his successors his palace, Rome itself, and the Western Roman Empire. The document, purporting to date from the fourth century, seems to have actually emerged in the ninth. For centuries it served the Papacy essentially as a deed of ownership of Western Europe. Its character as a literary forgery was finally demonstrated in the fifteenth century by the Italian humanist scholar Lorenzo Valla in a work entitled De falso credita et ementita Constantini donatione declamatio (1440). Key to Valla’s demonstration were two undeniable anachronisms in the Donation’s text. The first was reference on the part of Constantine to “satraps” in his government. Valla pointed out that satraps did not exist as an office in the Roman government. The other was Constantine’s declaration in the text that the Pope of Rome should exercise dominion over the other chief seats of Christendom, including Antioch, Alexandria, Constantinople, and Jerusalem. At the time Constantine supposedly issued the decree, however, Constantinople had not been founded yet, much less arisen to an ecclesiastical status rivaling the other four major seats of Christendom. Later in the document Constantine actually reports his intention after gifting Rome to the Pope to depart and build a new capital for himself in Byzantium in the East. The capital he spoke of was not named in the document, but it was, of course, Constantinople, a city he had already named in the document as if it was already a prominent city.

Levi Dowling’s Aquarian Gospel

Over the centuries many books, like the Book of Mormon, have been put forward claiming to be other Bibles or Bible portions (e.g., alleged lost Gospels) that are clearly identifiable as forgeries due to the presence of anachronisms. A very clear example is the Aquarian Gospel of Jesus Christ by one Levi H. Dowling of Bellville, Ohio (1844-1911). Dowling claimed to have, as it were, downloaded the text of the Aquarian Gospel psychically from the mystical source known as the Akashic Records, something akin to the storehouse of all human consciousness. The document, however, is bristling with anachronisms, proving if nothing else, that the Akashic Records are no credible source of Gospel history. During the course of telling the story of Jesus’s travels, Levi has him visit Persepolis in Persia (AG 38:6), Abraham’s city, Ur of the Chaldees (AG 42:7), and the Dalai-Lama’s city of Lhasa in Tibet (AG 37). However, the sites of both Persepolis and Ur had long been destroyed and/or abandoned centuries before Jesus (both c. 4th cent. BC) and Lhasa wasn’t to be built until centuries after Jesus (7th cent. AD). Levi also has Jesus encounter a Hindu healer who draws a comparison between the human body and a harpsichord, a musical instrument that did not exist until centuries after Jesus (AG 53:5).

Despite the description of the book as a “novel” in the title, that is not the way the material is represented in the introductory material nor in the text itself.

The Archko Volume

Quite often in such cases the anachronisms point not only to the fact that a forgery was committed but also when it was committed. We may think, for example, of the 19th century Presbyterian W. D. Mahan, who produced the work that now travels under the title The Archko Volume, which, he claimed, represented records from the Jewish and Roman courts relating to the trials of Jesus. Mahan claimed he’d discovered the material in the library of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople (Istanbul). But he really plagiarized at least some of it out of Lew Wallace’s novel Ben Hur, causing the original publishing date of Ben Hur to represent the real terminus a quo, that is to say, the time before which Mahan’s book could not have been written. In an ironic twist of poetic justice, the unfortunate Mahan did not realize that the very man whose novel he had plagiarized was then living in Constantinople serving as American minister to Turkey and who, seeing how his novel was being plagiarized, took the trouble to make a personal visit to Hagia Sophia accompanied by another person who afterward provided a letter declaring that “No book answering to the description given by Mr. Mahan was found . . . Zia Bey, the librarian, assured General Wallace that he had been in charge of the library for thirty years, and it contained no such manuscripts as Mr. Mahan professed to have seen.” This was in 1885, within two years of Mahan’s supposed visit to Constantinople. In consequence Mahan was disciplined by his denomination, and, as so often happens, his bogus volume has been selling pretty well ever since.

The Gospel of Barnabas

To provide yet another example, Muslim apologists often appeal to a work called the Gospel of Barnabas, which pretends to have been written by the famous first century missionary associate of St. Paul’s (see Acts 4:36), who is erroneously portrayed in the book as one of the twelve apostles, and which represents Muhammad as the true Messiah. The anachronisms contained in the book identify it rather as a late medieval Gospel forgery probably originally written in Italian.

One of the giveaways for dating the work was the Gospel of Barnabas’s descriptions of a seven-level hell based on the traditional list of the Christians’ Seven-Deadly Sins, a list that was first enumerated by Pope Gregory the Great (540-604) in his magisterial Morals in Job, which was completed in 596 AD or after. The reason the Gospel of Barnabas is generally understood to have been written in the 14th century rather than merely sometime after the 6th (i.e., after Gregory the Great’s time) is the fact that its seven-level hell (135) appears to be modeled after the seven-level island mountain of Purgatory in the Divine Comedy by Dante Alighieri (1265-1321), using the same standardized Western names of the true Messiah.

48 Mahan’s Bible forgery has, during its long history, traveled under various titles. The edition I am working with here has the lengthy title: Historical Records Concerning Jesus the “Christ” Messiah: Records Copied from the Official Manuscripts and Scrolls made by the Senatorial Courts of Tiberius Caesar, and by the Sanhedrim,—in the days of Jesus, entitled “Christ,” found in the Libraries at Rome and Constantinople (comp. by Rev. W. D. Mahan between the Years 1858-1883; trans. by Drs. McIntosh and Twynans of the Antiquarian Lodge, Genoa, Italy; Monrovia, CA: Author E. Overbary, 1942), 34.

51 E.g., Muhammad ‘Ata ur-Rahim and Ahmad Thomson, Jesus: Prophet of Islam (rev. ed.; New York: Tahrirke Tarsile Qur’an, 2003), 105. To his credit, one Muslim apologist, Jerald F. Dirks, cautions his compatriots that “intellectual honesty compels the admission that the Gospel of Barnabas, as currently received, cannot be traced in unbroken provenance prior to around the start of the 18th century” (The Cross and the Crescent [Beltsville, MD: Amana, 2001], 83).
for all the sins as Dante. The author of the Gospel of Barnabas is even suspected of echoing Dante’s language at times, most strikingly in its repetition of the line dei falsi e bugiardi, “false and lying Gods” (Inferno 1:72 = Gospel of Barnabas 23, 78, 217). But the forger provided a more decisive anachronistic clue that enables us to date the work even more precisely to between the years 1300 and 1329. We see this in the author’s reference to “the year of jubilee, which now comes every hundred years” (sec. 82). The hundred year Jubilee was first instituted by Pope Boniface VIII in 1300. How could the author, writing not too long after that, have known that the practice would be abandoned in favor of fifty year Jubilees by 1350?

James Strang’s The Book of the Law of the Lord

Another Bible forgery, closely related to Mormon origins, is James Strang’s Book of the Law of the Lord. When Joseph Smith died Strang was one of the men who put himself forward as his chosen successor. All the surviving original witnesses who had signed the “testimonies” in the Book of Mormon (except Oliver Cowdery) followed Strang. In the fulness of time Strang produced his own miraculous translation of his own ostensibly newly discovered ancient plates, which was also accompanied by a testimony signed by several witnesses addressed, like the Book of Mormon, with the nearly identical phrase “Be it known unto all nations, kindreds, tongues and people, to whom this Book of the Law of the Lord shall come.” The book (except for a small portion of it) presented itself as having been given to Moses by God, but “kept in the ark of the covenant, and . . . held too sacred to go into the hands of strangers.”

Again, however, the presence of anachronisms in the text prove that was not its origin.

One very prominent anachronism is the frequent use of the word synagogue, an institution that first came into existence long after Moses. The generally accepted theory of its origin is that it arose during the exile to Babylon, which began in 586 BC, or shortly after as a compensatory response to the destruction of Solomon’s temple. But actual evidence for its existence even that early is entirely lacking. It was, in fact, only on the eve of the New Testament period that the synagogue began to come into its own as an established institution within Judaism. Even the word itself is Greek not Hebrew, related to the word synagō (“gather together”). Strang treats what goes on in synagogues throughout as basically the same as temples, which was never the case. Furthermore, the same misunderstanding of what synagogues were all about appears both in those sections of the Book of the Law of the Lord supposedly translated from the ancient plates, and those supposedly given to Strang by direct revelation from the Lord.

At many points Strang begins his various sections with a phrase or passage from the King James Bible and then proceeds to freely expand on it. The anachronistic character of these is most obvious where he is quoting books from the King James New Testament, books which 54 Even those who have not read Dante may well remember Domenico di Michelino’s small but famous image of the island of Mount Purgatory rising up behind the full-figure standing portrait of the great 13th/14th century poet on the North Wall was of Florence’s Duomo. Here are the Italian words used in the Gospel of Barnabas followed by their standard Latin counterparts. From lowest to highest level: (1.) The proud (superbo / L. Superbia), (2.) The envious (inuidiosso / L. Invidia), (3.) The covetous (hauaro / L. Avaritia), (4.) The lustful (lusuriosso / L. Luxuria = Lust), (5.) The slothful (accidiosso / L. Acedia), (6.) The glutinous (gollosso / L. Gula), and (7.) the wrathful (irachondo / L. ira).

56 The Book of the Law of the Lord: Consisting of an Inspired Translation of Some of the Most Important Parts of the Law given to Moses, and a very few Additional Commandments, with Brief Notes and References (St. James, A. R. I: At the Royal Press, n.d.), 7.

59 Compare what appeared on the ancient plates (15.1; 19.1; 26.2; 27. 1, 2 [2 times], 3 [2 times], 4 [2 times]; 32.1, 2, 5; 33.2) to those that came to Strang by way of direct revelation (35.11; 40.2, 4, 15).
did not exist until more than a thousand years after the time of Moses. So, for example, Strang takes the phrase that appears in the King James version of the Gospel of John 3:5—“Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God”—and uses it as the basis for the opening lines of sections on Baptism and Confirmation in The Book of the Law of the Lord (BLL):

BLL 11.1: “Except a man be born of the water, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God.”

BLL 13.1: “Except a man be born of the spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God.”

Never mind that attributing the institution of Baptism and Confirmation to Moses was also anachronistic! Another clear example of anachronistic quotation, this time following Revelation 7:14, is found in Strang’s section, “Healing”:

Rev 7:14: “These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.” (Rev. 7:14)

BLL 16.2: thou shalt come to the assembly of those who have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

In connection with the dating of the previously examined Gospel of Barnabas, Oddbjørn Leirvik, has written: “If historical research is to have any value at all, it must be possible to conclude that a certain manuscript is not of ancient, but—in this case—of late medieval or early modern origin.”60 The same standard, of course, must also apply in the case of the literary products of the prophetic ministry of Joseph Smith. Our main focus here is trying to decide whether the Book of Mormon is another Bible or another Bible forgery. It is a question, however, that cannot be fully pursued unless we are willing to look at evidence pertinent to the question provided by his other prophetic productions. If an artist, for example, is once caught creating and passing off a demonstrable fake, it cannot help but cast a shadow on the authenticity of all his work produced both before and after. And nowhere, in my view at least, does Joseph more conspicuously show his hand in this regard, than in the example we shall discuss next.

Book of Abraham 4

The prophetic production of Joseph Smith that most readily invites being considered a literary forgery, or in our case a Bible (portion) forgery, is the inadequately scrutinized fourth chapter of the Book of Abraham, now canonized as part of Mormon Scripture in the Pearl of Great Price. The clear signs of literary forgery there have been largely overlooked due, no doubt, to the many more pressing issues relating to the authenticity of the Book of Abraham, including such conspicuous problems as the historically implausible setting of the narrative as a whole, which represents Abraham’s city of Ur, usually understood as being located in southern Mesopotamia (modern southern Iraq) as practicing Egyptian religion under the dominion of the Egyptian Pharaoh. As Christopher Woods of the University of Chicago’s Oriental Institute, Department of Near Eastern Studies writes:

If we are correct in identifying Abraham’s Ur with Babylonian Ur, this poses grave difficulties for the account given in the Book of Abraham, as there is no evidence whatsoever for the cults of the purported Egyptian gods described in the narrative or for established Egyptian religious practices more generally in the city. Of this we can be sure based on the thousands of cuneiform records that concern Ur and excavations of the city conducted by Sir Leonard Woolley between 1922-34, and, moreover, on everything we know of the history, culture, and religions of the ancient Near East.61

[This problem sent LDS Church scholars scrambling in search of another Ur further to the North which might fit the story better, yet all probably in vain since, as Woods goes on to explain, “there is no evidence for the regular worship of Egyptian gods in Haran or, for that matter, at any other location in northern Mesopotamia.”62]

Also more pressing in discussions of the Book of Abraham is the fact that Joseph clearly but falsely presented the work as, to quote the 1851 first edition of the Pearl of Great Price:

A TRANSLATION OF SOME ANCIENT RECORDS, THAT HAVE FALLEN INTO OUR HANDS FROM THE CATECOMBS OF EGYPT, PURPORTING TO BE THE WRITINGS OF ABRAHAM WHILE HE WAS IN EGYPT, CALLED THE BOOK OF ABRAHAM, WRITTEN BY HIS OWN HAND, UPON PAPYRUS.

62 Ibid., 74.
This same heading accompanied the first installment of the Book of Abraham in the March 1, 1842, issue of the early Mormon periodical Times and Seasons (3:704), and it is still used today in the LDS Church published Pearl of Great Price. In Book of Abraham 1:12 Joseph even has Abraham referring his reader back to Facsimile 1 at the beginning of the book, implying that Abraham himself had included the picture to illustrate what happened to him in the story. Yet, as people have been pointing out for a very long time, and the LDS Church has only recently admitted, the real contents of the papyri Joseph obtained in 1835 from antiquities dealer Michael Chandler and put forward as the basis for his translation of the Book of Abraham, had nothing whatever to do with the story told in the Book of Abraham. To quote the recent Gospel Topic essay on the official LDS Church website:

None of the characters on the papyrus fragments mentioned Abraham’s name or any of the events recorded in the book of Abraham. Mormon and non-Mormon Egyptologists agree that the characters on the fragments do not match the translation given in the book of Abraham . . . Scholars have identified the papyrus fragments as parts of standard funerary texts that were deposited with mummified bodies. These fragments date to between the third century B.C.E. and the first century C.E., long after Abraham lived.63

So, too, in Book of Abraham 4 there is no connection between that chapter and the papyri Joseph purchased from Michael Chandler. But there is a conspicuous connection with that portion of the Book of Abraham and two other known documents. What we have there, in fact, is the King James Bible’s version of the first chapter of Genesis modified in light of Joshua Seixas’s Manual Hebrew Grammar for the Use of Beginners (1834). What the chapter purports to be is a vision of the creation received by the patriarch Abraham. The portion that became chapter 4 was first published in the March 15, 1842, issue of Times and Seasons (pp. 720-22). We first begin to suspect literary forgery from the conspicuous fact that much of the KJV creation story is carried over unchanged into the Abraham creation story. So, for example, 647 of the 864 words in KJV Genesis 1:1–2:3 are retained in the Abraham account, with almost all of the original KJV word order retained as well. In addition to the 647 words retained, many other KJV words have simply had their tenses or persons adjusted into the plural in order to make them conform to Joseph’s new doctrine of creation by a plurality of Gods, which, as we shall see in a moment, is one of the principal concepts governing his reworking of the chapter.

But it is not the mere fact that KJV singular verbs have been retained in plural form that is alone significant as proof that Abraham is dependent on the KJV. Also very important are places where in copying the story out of the KJV Joseph Smith or one of his scribes accidentally forgot to change the tense or person from the singular to the plural when he should have. This occurs twice in the section as it originally appeared in the Times and Seasons, once in connection with the plurality of gods idea and once in relation to a simple tense change.

KJV Genesis 1:16 reads: “And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: he made the stars also.” The parallel verse in the original Times and Seasons passage (cf. Abraham 4:16) reads: “And the Gods organized the two great lights, the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night; with the lesser light he set the stars, also.” The KJV he should have been changed in Abraham to they. That this was an error is shown by the fact that it had already been corrected to read “they set the stars also” in the 1851 first edition of the Pearl of Great Price (p. 26).

The second example is KJV Genesis 1:20, which contains God’s command that the waters “bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life.” The parallel passage in Abraham (4:20) reads instead: “moving creatures that hath life.” Since Abraham replaced the KJV’s singular creature with the plural creatures it should also have replaced the third person singular form hath with the third person plural form have. Perhaps Smith was not familiar enough with older English usage to have noticed that in retaining hath he was making the same mistake a modern person would if he said: “the moving creatures that has life.” But again we find the error was later set right in the first edition of the Pearl of Great Price.

Most of the places where Joseph departs from the King James text are easily accounted for by his reliance on Seixas’s Manual Hebrew Grammar, which he used while studying a little Hebrew with Seixas himself during the winter of 1835-1836. Perhaps one of the reasons Joseph

But Joseph was jumping the gun there, and his claim that the “learned Jew . . . acknowledged I was right” was probably wishful thinking, since he wasn’t correct.68 But whether Joseph knew Hebrew or not is not our concern here, only whether he was creating a literary forgery in which he represented the products of his efforts as one thing (a translation of some of Abraham’s ancient writings, “written by his own hand, upon papyrus”)69, when really it was something else (a reworking of the first chapter of the King James Bible by an overconfident beginning student of Biblical Hebrew).

The fact that Joseph apparently felt no qualms about incorporating a whole chapter of the King James Bible (which he modified here and there) into what he presented to his followers and the world as a translation of ancient Egyptian Papyri, must be kept in view when considering the significance of his dropping large chunks of the King James Version of Isaiah70 and Matthew71 into what was supposed to be a translation of ancient Nephite plates written in Reformed Egyptian.

Changing the Revelations

And this brings us again to a crucial question associated with the detection of a forgery: Were the actions of the suspected forger consistent with the claims he made about the suspected forgery? To this point we have seen very little evidence of Joseph’s acting in a way that was consistent with the claims he and others close to him put forward about his various prophetic projects. But the inconsistency grows as we consider further statements by Joseph concerning what he claimed he was doing. It is by now common knowledge that the revelations printed in the 1833 Book of Commandments were freely expanded and modified in the 1835 Doctrine and Covenants without any basis in the supporting manuscript material. David Whitmer came to consider this issue as proof that Joseph Smith, whom he believed really had been acting as God’s prophet when he produced the Book of Mormon, later fell away. A key piece of evidence for this in Whitmer’s mind was a revelation dated March 1829 (now D&C 5).

As it was recorded in the 1833 Book of Commandments.

(the precursor to the Doctrine and Covenants), God made it clear to Joseph Smith that his prophetic calling was to end once the Book of Mormon was finished: “he [Joseph] has a gift to translate the book, and I have commanded him that he shall pretend to no other gift, for I will grant him no other gift” (Book of Commandments 4:2 [p. 10]). Sometime after, however, Joseph appears to have come to feel that God’s language here was a little too restrictive, and so he created a little wiggle room for himself by doctoring the passage, pretending that what God had actually commanded was to “pretend to no other gift until my purpose is fulfilled in this; for I will grant unto you no other gift until it is finished” (D&C 32:1 [1835] = current LDS D&C 5:4). Whitmer came to claim that God told him to separate from Joseph and the Latter-day Saints and he linked the veracity of his original testimony of the Book of Mormon to the veracity of God’s later command to separate from Joseph and the Latter-day Saints:

If you believe my testimony to the Book of Mormon, if you believe that God spake to us three witnesses by his own voice, then I tell you that in June, 1838, God spake to me again by his own voice from the heavens, and told me to “separate myself from among the Latter Day Saints, for as they sought to do unto me, should it be done unto them.” In the spring of 1838, the heads of the church and many of the members had gone deep into error and blindness. I had been striving with them for a long time to show them the errors into which they were drifting, and for my labors I received only persecutions.

A common attempt to minimize the significance of the changes in the revelations has been that “God had the same right to authorize his appointed Seer to add to or diminish any of the revelations certain words and facts, that he has to give him any revelations at all.” It was a nice thought. But it was not one that Joseph himself endorsed. Or so we gather from a response from him to a request made by Oliver Cowdery to modify D&C 20:37, in order that, Cowdery said, “no priestcraft be amongst us.” Joseph reports the request causing “both sorrow and uneasiness,” and his immediately writing back and asking “by what authority he took upon him to command me to alter, or erase, to add or diminish to or from a revelation or commandment from Almighty God.” And yet he evidenced no such reservations when it came to his own extensive modifications of the text. Joseph said he believed the revelations couldn’t be tampered with because they came from God. His actions, however, were not consistent with such a belief. He can be shown to have freely tampered with them.

Mark Hofmann’s Anthon Transcript and the Kinderhook Plates

When, in the Spring of 1980, Mark Hofmann made public his forgery of the transcription of characters Joseph Smith had supposedly copied from the Gold Plates and sent along with Martin Harris to Professor Charles Anthon in New York City to see if he could decipher them, it became the occasion of testing not only for Hofmann’s character and credibility, but for other people’s as well. Hugh Nibley, one of the most vigorous and learned Mormon apologists at the time, had gotten his first look at the document on Friday, April 25, 1980, and was ready to declare it authentic to the author of an article published in a Provo, Utah, paper before the following Thursday (May 1). “Nobody could have faked those characters,” Nibley told the reporter. “It would take 10 minutes to see that this is fake.” Not only was it authentic, it was translatable, Nibley said, claiming that he had already “counted at least two dozen out of 47 characters of the Demotic alphabet that could be given a phonetic value, and that the document was meant to be read “from right to left.”

Contrast this with Klaus Baer of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago: “What is it?” wrote Baer on May 10, “Probably not Egyptian, even if here and there signs appear that could be interpreted as more or less awkwardly copied hieroglyphs of hieratic signs . . . I suspect one could have the same batting average in 73 That the added words were not part of the original revelation can now be seen in The Joseph Smith Papers: Documents, Volume 1: July 1828–June 1831 (eds. Michael Hubbard MacKay, et al.; The Church Historian’s Press, 2013), [20], where an image of the original revelation, identified as being in the hand of Oliver Cowdery, is presented. The original reading was “he hath A gift to translate the Book & I have commanded him that he should pretend to no other gift.” The same image is available online at josephsmithpapers.org.

77 One can, of course, suggestively parse out the passage to make the matter appear less problematic by insisting that Joseph only meant to explode Oliver’s prophetic presumptions by saying something along the lines of “Silly Oliver! Aren’t you getting above your station? I’m the only one with the right to ‘alter, or erase, to add or diminish to or from a revelation or commandment from Almighty God.’” comparing this with Chinese or Japanese.” The same as it turns out could be said when comparing the characters with the English alphabet.

Going even beyond Nibley, was Barry Fell, author of America B.C.: Ancient Settlers in the New World (1976). In a letter dated May 5, 1980, Fell declared the document “immediately decipherable and comprehensible.” It employed, Fell said, “four ancient North African alphabets,” all of which apparently Fell was able to read. Most exciting, though, was Fell’s description of what the document actually said: “The text states,” wrote Fell, “that it is the witness of Nefi, who says he is the son born to sagacious parents. Zedekiya of Judah, was reigning over the people. The account is written as a record of piety, and in secret code on account of the persecutions[.]” N[efi], goes on to report that a shining light of fire appeared to his father, whose name was Lehiya.

After gazing steadfastly at it, he went by foot to Salem the Holy city and . . . end of page.” Fell even went so far as to offer to provide BYU Studies with a complete translation of the document.

Scarcely anyone would dispute that the claims Nibley and Fell made before it was known that Hofmann’s Anthon transcript was a forgery, represented a rather serious blow to their more general scholarly credibility. Yet, a very similar testing happened to Joseph Smith in May of 1843 when he was presented with six bell-shaped metal plates covered with what appeared to be ancient characters. They had supposedly been dug out of an ancient mound near Kinderhook, Illinois, but had actually been forged by the men who presented them to him. And sadly, Joseph responded in the same way as Hugh Nibley and Barry Fell did. In a May 2, 1843, letter, Charlotte Haven tells how Joshua Moore told her he’d shown the plates to Joseph Smith, who’d told him that “the figures or writing on them was similar to that in which the Book of Mormon was written, and if Mr. Moore could leave them, he thought that by the help of revelation he would be able to translate them. So a sequel to that holy book may soon be expected.”85 Already the day before (May 1) Joseph’s secretary William Clayton recorded that “President Joseph has translated a portion [of the plates] and says they contain the history of the person with whom they were found and he was a descendant of Ham through the loins of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and that he received the kingdom from the ruler of heaven and earth.”86 The LDS Church would finally admit the Kinderhook plates were a forgery in 1981.86

The Book of Abraham 4, the changing of the revelations, the Kinderhook Plates incident, all cast a shadow of doubt over the credibility of Joseph Smith as an authentic restorer and recoverer of ancient texts, as a producer, that is, of another Bible. So how do things look when we turn to examine more closely the text of the Book of Mormon itself? We begin by discussing the large scale anachronistic dependence of the Book of Mormon on the King James Version of the Bible, which was first published in 1611.

The Book of Mormon's Direct Reliance on the King James Bible

Historically Mormons haven’t been particularly troubled by the idea of large chunks being taken over from the King James Bible’s books of Isaiah and Matthew and plunked into the Book of Mormon. It seemed easy enough to just assume that when Joseph came upon parallel texts in the Book of Mormon, he translated them as they appeared in the King James, since that was the English version of the Bible everyone was familiar with, especially where such suppositions were supported by reassurances of the sort Hugh Nibley gave when he wrote that “the Book of Mormon follows the language of the King James Bible only as far as the latter conveys the correct meaning of the original.”87 In reality Stan Larson’s claim is closer to the truth when, after examining the textual history of Matthew’s Sermon on the Mount, he concluded that “the Book of Mormon blindly follows the KJV at the precise point where the KJV falls into error due to mistranslating the Greek or translating late and derivative Greek texts which are demonstrably secondary developments in the textual tradition.”88 But for most Mormons the kinds of issues he raises might be a bit too arcane to grasp. One issue that does occasionally arise is the recognition that the standard explanation, which has Joseph, for example, coming to the Sermon on the Mount in the Gold Plates and turning to his King James Bible to copy out that part, doesn’t match early descriptions of the original Book of Mormon translation process. Roger Terry recently included as part of the “Book of Mormon Translation Puzzle,” the fact that “whole chapters of text repeated almost verbatim from the King James Version of the Bible, despite the fact that witnesses, including Emma, insisted that Joseph never referred to outside sources.”89

85 An Intimate Chronicle: The Journals of William Clayton (ed. George C. Smith; Salt Lake City, UT: Signature Books, with Smith Research Associates, 1995), 100. The Manuscript History of the Church, based on Clayton’s diary, recast this statement into the first person so as to read: “I have translated a portion of them, and find they contain the history of the person with whom they were found. He was a descendant of Ham, through the loins of Pharaoh, King of Egypt, and that he received his kingdom from the ruler of Heaven and Earth” (May 1, 1843), 1542. (See History of the Church 5:372). For a further early account see Parley P. Pratt to John Van Cott (May 7, 1843), (LDS Church Archives MS. 5238).
And indeed Joseph Smith’s wife, Emma, when she was interviewed by her son, Joseph Smith III, in 1879, did very definitively reject the idea that Joseph employed any book or manuscript during the translation process:

Q. Had he not a book or manuscript from which he read, or dictated to you?
A. He had neither manuscript nor book to read from.

Q. Could he not have had, and you not know it?
A. If he had had anything of the kind he could not have concealed it from me. . . .

Q. Could not father have dictated the Book of Mormon to you, Oliver Cowdery and the others who wrote for him, after having first written it, or having read it out of some book?
A. Joseph Smith [and for the first time she used his name direct, having usually used the words, “your father,” or “my husband”) could neither write nor dictate a coherent and well-worded letter, let alone dictating a book like the Book of Mormon.90

In fact, we know now that Emma’s claim that Joseph could not have read from a manuscript or book because he “could neither write nor dictate a coherent and well-worded letter,” was, like certain other things Emma said in that interview, quite untrue. Already back in 1948, for example, Dale Morgan countered the claim in a letter he wrote to Francis W. Kirkham in response to the latter’s reproducing the above quotation in the second edition of the first volume of his A New Witness in America to the Book of Mormon (1947). In the letter Morgan suggested Kirkham “should submit Emma Smith’s statements about Joseph’s illiteracy to the actual test of his writing,” because, in Morgan’s view, letters then available at the Chicago Historical Society and the Reorganized Church Libraries dating to 1832 “evidence a flair for words and a measure of eloquence.”91 In the context Morgan was commenting upon, Kirkham had made mention of a personal diary in Joseph’s own hand that would verify what Emma had said. Morgan, who had not seen the diary, suggested to the contrary “that it too would invalidate Emma’s memory.” At the time the LDS Church was suppressing more than one personal diary of Joseph Smith’s as well as an important 1832 account of the First Vision, again in his own hand. Kirkham was referring to the 1832-1834 diary, which Joseph had purchased on November 27, 1832, and amounts, in the portions written by Joseph himself, to the recording of brief notations of daily happenings.92 What we do see there, however, is that, contrary to what Kirkham said, Joseph was able to write quite well enough to keep up a daybook. But much more important toward proving Morgan’s point, was another document, written earlier in 1832, that neither Morgan nor Kirkham probably ever saw: the earliest extant account of the First Vision, again written by Joseph in his own hand. In it we indeed see in evidence the “flair for words” and “measure of eloquence” Morgan spoke of:

I looked upon the Sun the glorious luminary of the earth and also the moon rolling in their majesty through the heavens and also the stars shining in their courses and the earth also upon which I stood and the beast of the field and the fowls of heaven and the fish of the waters and also man walking forth upon the face of the earth in majesty and in the strength of beauty whose power and intelligence in governing the things which are so exceeding great and marvelous even in the likeness of him who created them and when I considered upon these things my heart exclaimed well hath the wise man said the it is a fool that saith in his heart there is no God my heart exclaimed all all these bear testimony and bespeak an omnipotent and omnipresent power a being who maketh Laws and decreeth and bindeth all things in their bounds who filleth Eternity who was and is and will be from all Eternity to Eternity.93

91 Dale Morgan on Early Mormonism: Correspondence & A New History (ed. with biographical intro., John Phillip Walker; pref., William Mulder; Salt Lake City, UT: Signature Books, 1986), 186. The letter’s date was January 3, 1948.
93 History 1832, Joseph Smith Letterbook 1, 1-2.
Although admittedly this document makes it clear that Joseph was not the best speller, it does show that he definitely had a rhetorical flare of the sort Morgan had detected elsewhere. Also, his penmanship is quite competent and good as well.94

Joseph himself tells us in this same document that even though his education was limited, he had been “instructed in reading and writing and the ground rules of Arithmatic.”95 And then finally, another proof of Joseph’s literacy is seen at one point in the Original Manuscript of the Book of Mormon itself (Alma 45:22) there is a sample of Joseph’s own handwriting that runs 28 words. According to Royal Skousen, “These twenty-eight words in Joseph Smith’s hand are written very carefully. And except for one spelling variant (citty), all the extant words are spelled according to standard orthography.”96

The reason Emma had stressed Joseph’s alleged illiteracy was in support of the idea that he could not have read from another book or manuscript during dictation. But the undeniable evidence of many chapters copied verbatim from the King James into the Book of Mormon text suggest otherwise, unless we wished to posit Joseph’s having a photographic memory.

Still it’s not only the large chunks of King James text but the ubiquitous presence of shorter quotations and allusion to the King James text that even more firmly counters Emma’s claims. It is to these that we shall turn in part 2 of this article.

Excerpts From Letters and Emails

May 2016: Blessings! Just writing to say I just handed an LDS friend your newsletter (Heavenly Mother). He said he would read it! Praying God will open his eyes.

May 2016: Sandra Tanner is a hateful lady. Freedom of speech or rumors . . . Why the hate towards the Mormons? What a sad why to live. Hurting others. We don’t hate Christians . . .

May 2016: Your Issue 126 [Is There a Mother God?] is outstanding. Well organized and expertly researched and referenced.

May 2016: I wanted to say thank you for the free Newsletters and free stuff you sent out to me. I just left the Lds church 6 weeks ago. Thank you for your kindness. Your ministry is a blessing.

May 2016: Hi again, . . . [in Doctrines of Salvation by Joseph Fielding Smith] CH-12 page 182. 1954 Spanish. It says on the head of the paragraph that there is no salvation if we don’t accept Joseph Smith. It also says that no one can reject his testimony without carrying terrible consequences. My family is all Mormon. I am the only one that the Lord has helped to see the light so far. I was just talking to my sister who is very active in the church. I was showing her a copy of D&C changed that I got from your source. She is still firm in her faith. I told her my faith is in The Lord and nothing else. The bible is the word of God and period. I am so thankful for all the work you do to bring the truth out. My wife is active Mormon too. I don’t have any confrontations with her right now because she is in France. I don’t know how we are going to handle having different beliefs when she comes back. Well, thanks again for helping many Mormons see behind the curtain. I can’t believe Sandra Tanner wrote to me. God Bless you.

June 2016: As I referenced a page on the utlm website today, I found myself needing to give thanks to you and Gerald for your work. Until now, you haven’t known me, and I only know you through this work — The Changing World of Mormonism, the utlm website and several youtube videos.

Thanks for your persistence in getting information out of the LDS Church, and publishing what they were unwilling to share with their adherents. I was one of them for 41 years, and have now resigned. It is difficult to remove oneself from such an organization — thank you for helping me see elements of the truth that were hidden, and escape from a life dedicated to an organization that requires so much, but provides only a narrow, misleading interpretation of the truth.

June 2016: Call to Repentance.

From what I’ve read on the website, I gather y’all were once LDS. Why y’all left, idk. (If it’s explained on the site, perhaps I should have looked for it, to get a better understanding of y’all. & if its not, perhaps you’ll explain such).

& now, you’ve made it your life’s work to destroy the faith of others. You claim to be providing “truth”, but what you’re actually doing, is playing “wolf in sheep’s clothing”, providing either irrelevant material (irrelevant of salvation, & being a deciple of Christ) or, half-truths meant to mislead/cause doubt.

I feel bad for my lost brothers & sisters. However, I feel more sad for the state of your souls at Judgment Day, when y’all are called upon to take responsibility for the waywardness you’ve caused. & I sincerely hope y’all turn back from this destructive path, & seek to make restitution for the dmg’s you’ve caused, b4 the day of Reckoning is here.

PS: I like how y’all show comments from both friend/foe, but I think it’d be more helpful, if ya showed the sender’s name (unless asked for anonymity). Esp in case of multiple parts. I also find it amusing, you deceptively state “we have the right to twist your words, by omitting parts of a msg” in the legality statement. [Sent by “saberthedragon” anonymously.]

August 2016: On July 25th, I was in town for a family member’s funeral and I stopped by Lighthouse Ministry and we chatted for 30 minutes or so. I want to thank you for taking the time to talk with me and for freely sharing your experience and conclusion regarding tough doctrinal issues as well as challenging LDS themes. I very much enjoyed the conversation and hope you and your ministry continue to thrive despite the incredible odds against you in the heart of Utah.

August 2016: I have been a Christ-follower (I like that term better than “Christian” these days) for over forty years now, since I entered His kingdom as a junior in high school in South Bend, Indiana.

I was a growing Christian (OK, I used it that time) at Purdue University in the ‘70s when I helped lead a friend named Jim to Christ (as far as I could tell, at least), and then he promptly fell under the influence of local LDS missionaries and was baptized into their heresy. He then started to bring missionaries to the dorm, and a couple of other brothers and I made sure we crashed the “party” whenever the “elders” showed up.

Although we didn’t know a lot about LDS at that time, we at least knew Jesus and the Bible enough to break up their presentation and turn things toward Jesus instead. Overall, hopefully, we helped several guys look at true Christianity as opposed to a counterfeit. My first exposure to countering LDS doctrine was the section in Walter Martin’s Kingdom of the Cults, but I didn’t really study much beyond that then.

I haven’t really been involved in ministry to cultists in recent years, but the dedication of the new Indianapolis LDS temple last summer helped get my juices flowing again. I made sure I toured it so I could know what a temple looks like on the inside and have the opportunity to share Christ with someone (a beautiful building, but oh, what a waste of money on a pack of lies!).

I started off by asking (innocently enough :-) ) why there was a gold angel with a trumpet on the roof instead of a cross, and that got a conversation started with a guy about my age and his adult son. By the time we were back at the parking lot after the tour, I had at least shared enough scripture that I could summarize it by saying, “So you worship a different God and a different Jesus, and you have a different gospel than the Bible.” Hopefully, I left them with something to think about.

Anyway, that has kind of gotten me to the point where I have been studying online resources to be more effective in sharing the Truth and confronting their lies. So we’ll see if God opens more doors to ministering to LDS folks here in the Indy area. I certainly pray for God’s intervention every time I pass the temple building itself.

All that to say, thank you so much again for your walk with Christ and your ministry!

August 2016: I need to thank you for your’s and Jerald’s work.

I know you wouldn’t even remember my visit to your store, but it was a life changing day for me and I have been meaning to thank you for your love toward me and my daughter that day.

I am . . . a lifetime member of the LDS church even though I’ve never had a testimony or really believed it. I went because my family and neighbors went and it was expected. I married in the temple and raised my five children as LDS. In 2006 my husband died and left me on my own, so I no longer had to follow him to church or be “bishopric guy’s” dutiful wife, which was a relief. Then several years ago, the last of my kids left home, my parents passed away, I was an empty nester, no longer responsible for being that smiling mormon mom and finally free to totally quit the church. It was like a weight lifted from my soul. One by one, four of my children also left the LDS church and moved on to other churches. I was able to aid each one of them as they transitioned to their new, happier paths.

The big problem was my daughter who was attending BYU. She was still a believer and still faithful and was guilt riding me over my inactivity and angry over the fact I had not fought harder to keep her siblings in the church. I realized I needed to tell her my entire truth and just accept whatever the consequences would be, even if it ruined our relationship.

I prayed over how to accomplish this and the answer was you. We drove two hours down from Wyoming . . . Along the way, I was able to tell her my story and my struggles with the church. When we got to SLC I told her I would like to buy her a book on Emma Smith and this certain bookstore had the book I wanted to give her . . . so we made our way to your store. You were there and told me that we were fortunate that you were there that day because you had been traveling and had only come in for a few hours that day because you were getting ready to leave again. I felt like it was indeed, an answer to my prayers.

I told you that I had just that day come out of the “apostate closet” to my daughter who was a BYU student. You walked over to her and hugged her and expressed to her how difficult that probably was for her. Then you took her for a walk around your store, and showed her some books and testified to her, and ever so gently talked to her about facts and problems with the church. You spoke to her intelligently and without any judgement toward her beliefs. We walked out with several other books she chose on your recommendation beside the Emma Smith book. She took them all back to her dorm and read them all. She started asking questions and finding answers herself.

A year later, I am overjoyed to tell you that my daughter has resigned from the LDS church and actually escaped BYU without a husband. She is now attending a grad school in Texas and is so happy with her new life. She still speaks fondly of that day in your bookstore where she felt so loved and accepted and taught . . . So thank you. I know these words are not even enough to express gratitude for the gift you and your husband have given the world with your work.

September 2016: I am a member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and I feel sorry for the Tanners. They have cut themselves off from eternal blessings and have tried in vain to hinder the work of the Lord. Being related to Brigham Young or any other famous person in LDS history does not carry any weight with the Lord. It is individual faith in Jesus Christ and His atonement that is the foundation of our salvation. The Tanners cannot damage the Lord or His Church. Who can contend with the Lord of Host, or violate sacred covenants and not lose it all eventually?

October 2016: I am a young LDS, and I have a few questions to ask Sandra.

1. Why did you fall away from the church?
2. Do you not realise that this only strengthens the truth of the gospel?
3. The only thing that you can’t realise is that faith is the step to know that Joseph Smith did see the Lord our God and, his son Jesus Christ?
4. Why do you seek to destroy the church?

You do not have to answer these questions, only ponder them.

Many thanks,
E

(Sandra Tanner’s Response)

Dear E,

I am happy to explain why I left the LDS Church. After graduating from LDS Seminary, and attending various LDS Institute classes, I met Jerald (whom I would later marry). We are both from 5th generation LDS homes.

When the bishop started hinting that Jerald should go on a mission he decided to make a more careful study of LDS history and doctrine. When I met him he started showing me the problems he was finding. Joseph Smith’s revelations in the D&C have been changed since their first printing. Smith told differing versions of the 1st vision, he was involved in magic and money digging, the Book of Mormon doesn’t teach the same as the D&C, Brigham Young taught that you must live polygamy to have exaltation, Young also said the Blacks were not to receive the priesthood until the millennium, the Book of Abraham is not a genuine translation of the papyri the church purchased in Kirtland, the Bible says eternal life is gained through faith in Christ and his atonement, it is by grace, not works. The Bible never mentions Christians
If Joseph Smith did NOT see God and Jesus in 1820, if there never were any Nephites, if the Book of Mormon is a work of fiction, if the temple ritual is NOT from God, then Mormonism SHOULD be exposed as a deception so that people will be free to seek salvation through Christ as offered in the Bible.

New Witnessing DVD and Manual

Missionary 911 is Main Street Church’s latest video project: a video teaching tool to help equip Christians to have meaningful, respectful, and productive conversations with Mormon missionaries!

Missionary 911 is a video teaching series that consists of five parts, or “modules”, each approximately a half-hour in length (or a little shorter). There is a DVD and a manual with notes and supplemental information.

The Five Modules:
1. MYTHS & MINES: Alleviate a lot of your anxiety by clearing up some common misunderstandings about the missionaries (hint: they’re really not that intimidating!) And while we’re at it, we’ll learn how to avoid some of the pitfalls, or “landmines” that can short-circuit a productive conversation.
2. FROM HERE TO ETERNITY: Understanding the Mormon “plan of salvation” will help you make better sense of the missionary lessons. You’ll learn some of the jargon, and see how it differs from the biblical gospel. This will be a road map that will help keep you from feeling “lost” later down the road.
3. DON’T SELL THE CAR!: There’s a saying in car sales: “Don’t sell the car, sell what the car can do!” The missionaries take a similar approach. Their goal is to share what the church can do for you. So here we’ll present an overview of the actual lessons that the missionaries will cover with you. But we’ll also move past the “shiny exterior” they’ll present, and take a look “under the hood,” so that you can ask thoughtful, well-informed questions, and get the most from your conversations.
4. THE PROBLEMS WITH PIES: You’ve probably heard about some of the awkward issues with Mormonism—its odd mythology, multiple wives, and mystical temple rituals, stuff like that. Those things spark the curiosity of outsiders, but they’re not usually the best place to go in your conversations. Instead, we’ll take a look at just a few “slices” of the more relevant issues in Mormonism . . . and more importantly, how to raise them gently and respectfully. These aren’t bullets for a gun; they are just some ideas to encourage your new friends to think more deeply.
5. STEPPING UP TO THE PLATE: Now it’s your turn at bat . . . you’re the missionary now! Learn how to share your own faith story with the missionaries in an authentic and natural way that will “connect” with them . . . and learn how to invite them to put their hope and trust not in a religion or a church, but in the Jesus of the Bible.

In our concluding remarks in Part 1 of this article, which appeared in the previous issue of the Salt Lake City Messenger, we noted that,

The reason Emma had stressed Joseph’s alleged illiteracy was in support of the idea that he could not have read from another book or manuscript during dictation. But the undeniable evidence of many chapters copied verbatim from the King James [e.g., from Matthew and Isaiah] into the Book of Mormon text suggest otherwise, unless we wished to posit Joseph’s having a photographic memory. Still it’s not only the large chunks of King James text but the ubiquitous presence of shorter quotations from and allusions to the King James text that even more firmly counters Emma’s claims.

Let us begin then by looking at the influence of these shorter quotations and allusions to the text of the King James Bible upon the Book of Mormon, an influence that is less direct in that it does not involve actual copying of large passages from the King James Version (=KJV) but rather Joseph’s drawing upon his memory of favorite King James passages, which in turn provide him with a stock prophetic vocabulary that he resorted to using whenever he was in any sense presenting himself as speaking for God. This practice resulted in a myriad of anachronisms being introduced throughout the Book of Mormon text. Michael Hubbard MacKay and Nicholas J. Frederick in their recent faith-promoting book about Joseph Smith’s use of seer stones, states the matter in a way that provides a convenient entry point into the sort of King James influence I mean to explore. They write:

[H]ow can a text written centuries prior to the King James Bible, and supposedly translated through a seer stone, contain so much of it? Hundreds, if not thousands, of unique phrases from the King James Bible can be found in the Book of Mormon . . . how can Lehi, a prophet living in 600 BC, have a discussion with his son in which he quotes from the Gospel of John, a text that is still 700 years in the future (2 Nephi 2:6 cf. John 1:14)? Such a literal translation of the Egyptian from the gold plates would not produce such obvious parallels with the King James Bible.1

Okay, so what are MacKay and Frederick talking about exactly when they say that Lehi in 600 B.C. quoted a passage from the first century A.D. Gospel of John? Here is what Lehi says in the passage they are referring to:

1 Michael Hubbard MacKay and Nicholas J. Frederick, Joseph Smith’s Seer Stones (Provo, UT: Religious Studies Center, Brigham Young University/Salt Lake City, UT: Deseret Book, 2016), 113.
Wherefore, redemption cometh in and through the Holy Messiah: for he is full of grace and truth. (p. 63)

The page number following the above passage (and those that follow) indicates where it appears in the 1830 edition of the Book of Mormon. In each case I will quote the form of the passage from that edition, but with the chapter and verse references of the current Book of Mormon.

I have bolded the phrase MacKay and Frederick were referring to in the passage, “full of grace and truth.” John 1:14 reads in the KJV:

and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.

In referring to this MacKay and Frederick have opened the door just a little on something that, as we said, is very prominent in the prophetic productions of Joseph Smith, namely that whether he presents himself as translating an ancient Nephite text (the Book of Mormon), or restoring the Hebrew, Aramaic and Greek text of the Bible (the Joseph Smith Translation), or simply delivering direct communications from God (the Doctrine and Covenants), Joseph tended in each case to mix in variations of a number of his favorite Bible passages from the KJV. In this he especially favors passages taken from the New Testament books traditionally attributed to the Apostle John son of Zebedee, namely the Gospel of John, the first, second and third epistle of John, and the book of Revelation. Most scholars agree, both liberal and conservative, that all of these books (indeed all the books of the New Testament) were written in the first century A.D., which is to say within living memory of the life of Jesus. Following MacKay and Frederick’s lead then we shall focus in this section of our article on favored passages of Joseph’s drawn from the New Testament writings attributed to the Apostle John.

It wasn’t only the little phrase “full of grace and truth” that Joseph liked repeating from John 1:14 but the rest of the passage as well, including the very important theological expression only begotten, which we will discuss further after first displaying other examples of Joseph’s use of the passage:

John 1:14: And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father.) full of grace and truth.

The following are dependent on John 1:14

Alma 5:48 . . . the Son of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace, and mercy, and truth. (p. 236; about 83 B.C.)

Alma 9:26: . . . the glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace, equity, and truth, full of patience, mercy, and long-suffering . . . (p. 247; about 82 B.C.)

Alma 13:9: . . . the Son of the only begotten of the Father, who is without beginning of days or end of years [==echo of Hebrews 7:3], who is full of grace, equity, and truth. (p. 259, about 82 B.C.)

In the Book of Mormon Jesus is called the Only Begotten nine times. As a Christological title this designation, which translates the Greek word monogenes, appears only in the writings of John (John 1:14, 18; 3:16, 18; 1 John 4:9). As such it becomes an easily recognizable marker indicating dependence on John. It also serves as the basis for Christ’s being described as “begotten not made,” in the fourth-century Nicene Creed. The most obvious points of contact (3 of 9) between the Book of Mormon and John are with John 1:14.

Given the above evidence from the Book of Mormon suggesting that Joseph liked spinning off variations of John 1:14, we are not surprised to find him doing the same thing as well in the Pearl of Great Price.

The Pearl of Great Price included a selection from the Joseph Smith Translation, an alleged revelatory restoration of the Bible to its original uncorrupted condition, which Joseph began on March 26, 1830, and finished July 3, 1833. This portion covers several chapters of Joseph’s “restored” version of the Book of Genesis and presents itself as having been written by Moses (usually dated to the latter half of the second millennium B.C.). It includes an extensive first person account allegedly given by the pre-flood figure Enoch, the seventh generation from Adam and Eve. This section of the Pearl of Great Price is called the Book of Moses.

Here again, Joseph presents us with God allegedly quoting John 1:14 to Adam, Moses, and Enoch. The number of cribbed Johannine only begotten appears more than twice as many times in a few chapters in this section of the Pearl of Great Price than in the whole of the Book of Mormon. Four of these are conspicuously derived from John 1:14.

In order to remain close to the form of the text as originally dictated, I rely in my quotations here on the transcript of the original dictation manuscript of the Book of Moses (including corrections) prepared by Kent P. Jackson. Again I begin by reproducing John 1:14 as it appears in the KJV:

KJV John 1:14: And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.

The following are dependent on John 1:14:

Moses 1:6: . . . mine Only Begotten is and shall be the Savior, for he is full of grace and truth. . . . (God speaking to Moses)

Moses 1:32: mine Only Begotten Son, who is full of grace and truth. (God speaking to Moses)

Moses 5:7: the sacrifice of the Only Begotten of the Father, which is full of grace and truth. (God telling Moses what the Angel of the Lord said to Adam)

Moses 6:52: . . . mine Only Begotten Son, who is full of grace and truth, which is Jesus Christ . . . (Enoch quoting what God said to Adam)

Finally there is a revelation in the Doctrine and Covenants in which Jesus quotes variations of several other passages from the Gospel of John along with the promise that “the fulness of John’s record is hereafter to be revealed.” The prophesy is dated May 1833, only a couple of months before his “restored” version of the Bible was completed (July 3, 1833) and so presumably was intended as a sort of direct divine infomercial for the soon-to-be-released Joseph Smith Translation. As it would happen, Jesus’s prediction in this prophesy did not come true during Joseph’s lifetime, nor has it ever come true for the LDS Church, which never accepted the Joseph Smith Translation as scripture. In any case here again we give John 1:14 followed by Jesus’s quotation of a variation on the passage in a revelation given to Joseph. I give the text as it appeared in the original 1835 Doctrine and Covenants (D&C):

John 1:14: And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.

D&C 93:11: And I John’s bare record that I beheld his glory, as the glory of the Only Begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth, even the Spirit of truth [see John 14:17], which came and dwelt in the flesh, and dwelt among us. (sec. LXXXII, p. 211)

Jesus as the Lamb of God

The Apostle Paul speaks of “Christ our Passover” being “sacrificed for us” (1 Cor 5:7), and Peter, of how we are redeemed with the precious blood of Christ, as “a lamb without blemish and without spot” (1 Peter 1:18-19). But it is in the Gospel of John that we are introduced to the designation Lamb of God, and in the Revelation of John where Christ is called the lamb 26 times (in the KJV). And it is these two sources that influenced Joseph Smith’s use of the term in the Book of Mormon. Indeed the Book of Mormon calls John “the Apostle of the Lamb of God” (1 Nephi 14:27, p. 34).

8 Except the small selections appearing in the Pearl of Great Price.

9 Here we should pause a moment to discuss the words “I John” in the above passage. “The formula I + NAME is quite rare in the Bible. There is no I David, I Solomon, I Abraham, I Moses, or I Isaiah in the Bible. There is, of course, I Paul six times (1 Thess. 2:18; 2 Cor. 10:1; Phm. 1:19; Gal. 5:2; Eph. 3:1; Col. 1:23) in the New Testament, but it is from the book of the Revelation with its I Jesus and three occurrences of I John (1:9; 21:2; 22:8) that Joseph probably derived the formula. Smith uses I John several times in D&C 93 (11, 12, 15, 16). We also find I Jesus in D&C 17:9 and 18:23, 47. The I+ NAME formula is a constant of Joseph Smith’s favored prophetic vocabulary. It occurs very frequently in the Book of Mormon. I Nephi, for example, occurs 87 times, I Jacob 16 times, I Enos 5 times, I Mormon 15 times, I Moroni 17 times. And then we find I Abraham 11 times in the Book of Abraham. The I God formula that appears upwards of 30 times in the Pearl of Great Price Book of Moses does not occur at all in the KJV.

10 There have been those from very early times who doubted that the Book of Revelation was written by the author of the Gospel of John. And there are those today who would no doubt hesitate to include it among the writings of the author of the Gospel of John. I do so here partly for convenience and partly because Joseph Smith takes for granted, both in the Book of Mormon and elsewhere, that the Apostle John was the author of both (e.g., 1 Nephi 10:4; D&C 93).
The designation Lamb of God occurs no less than 25 times in the Book of Mormon. The very first occurrence plainly reveals Joseph Smith’s dependence on the Gospel of John in the King James Bible. Nephri records how his father Lehi prophesied in great detail how the Messiah was going to appear “six hundred years from the time that my father left Jerusalem” (1 Nephi 10:4). And, as is typical of vaticinia ex eventu, that is, prophesy after the fact, Lehi’s description is too obvious in revealing its literary dependence on the King James translation of the Gospel of John to easily pass as an authentic before-the-fact prediction. And so we read there concerning the coming Messiah:

1 Nephi 10:9-10: And my father saith that he [the Baptist] should baptise in Bethabara, beyond Jordan; and he also spake, that he should baptise with water; yea, even that he should baptise the Messiah with water. And after that he had baptised the Messiah with water, he should behold and bear record, that he had baptised the Lamb of God, which should take away the sins of the world. (1 Nephi 10:9-10)

The claim that this text originated centuries before Christ again runs into trouble by its clear derivation from John 1:28-32:

John 1:28-32: These things were done in Bethabara, beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing. (29) The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world . . . (31) And I knew him not: but that he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water. (32) And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him.

Of particular note is the phrase in 1 Nephi, “the Lamb of God, which should take away the sins of the world,” which closely echoes John’s “the Lamb of God, which should take away the sins of the world,” in John 1:28-32. Consequently virtually all current English translations, read “Bethany,” there (not to be confused with the other Bethany near Jerusalem mentioned, for example, in John 12:1).

The replacement of “Bethany” with “Bethabara” in a few manuscripts is usually credited to the promotion of the latter reading by the third-century writer Origen of Alexandria. Origen himself admitted that in his day “Bethany” appeared in “almost all the copies,” but 11 Since Cumorah: The Book of Mormon in the Modern World (Salt Lake City, UT: Deseret Book, 1967), 129. Sidney B. Sperry noted how “interesting” it is that “the Book of Mormon verifies the reading of the Received Text of John 1:28 instead of the one accepted by scholars which is based on textual criticism and which reads ‘Bethany.’” (Sidney B. Sperry, Book of Mormon Compendium [Salt Lake City, UT: Bookcraft, 1968], 115). Sperry even went so far as to affirm that “the inspired Book of Mormon . . . says that ‘Bethabara’ is the correct reading and that our modern scholars are wrong in choosing the reading ‘Bethany’” (“Special Issue: The Book of Mormon Writings of Sidney B. Sperry,” FARMS Journal of Book of Mormon Studies 4.1 [Spring 1995]: 183). But, as a number of studies have shown, the mere fact that Joseph Smith follows the KJV where it contradicts the critical Greek text is no safe basis for determining where the latter is wrong. See, e.g., Kevin L. Barney, “The Joseph Smith ‘Translation and the Ancient Texts of the Bible,’” in The Word of God: Essays on Mormon Scripture (ed., Dan Vogel; Salt Lake City: Signature Books, 1990), 143-60 and Ronald V. Huggins, “Joseph Smith’s ‘Inspired Translation’ of Romans 7,” in FARMS Journal of Book of Mormon Studies 4.1 [Spring 1995]: 183). But, as a number of studies have shown, the mere fact that Joseph Smith follows the KJV where it contradicts the critical Greek text is no safe basis for determining where the latter is wrong. See, e.g., Kevin L. Barney, “The Joseph Smith ‘Translation and the Ancient Texts of the Bible,’” in The Word of God: Essays on Mormon Scripture (ed., Dan Vogel; Salt Lake City: Signature Books, 1990), 259-87. Nor even does Mormon apologist/scholar John W. Welch try to insist that whenever Joseph Smith departs from the KJV text it should be assumed that he is adopting instead the correct ancient reading. Rather Welch argues, for example, that when Joseph Smith reworked the Sermon on the Mount in the Book of Mormon and the Joseph Smith Translation, he only departs from the KJV text where it really matters (Illuminating the Sermon at the Temple & Sermon on the Mount [Provo, Utah: Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies, 1999], 208).

was convinced “that we should not read ‘Bethany,’ but ‘Bethabara.’”

But his reasons for thinking so fall short of being persuasive. Origen had actually visited the area himself but couldn’t find any Bethany in Transjordan. Instead he reports that “they say that Bethabara is pointed out on the banks of the Jordan, and that John is said to have baptized there.”14 As likely as not the location of the original Bethany beyond Jordan was lost in the wake of the Romans’ devastating military sweep down the east side of the Jordan in the Spring of 68 A.D., making it necessary for a new location to be arrived at later on due to the increasing number of pilgrims visiting the Holy Land and wanting to see where Jesus had been baptized.

But to return to our point about the connection of John 1 to 1 Nephi 10. In both passages the title Lamb of God is followed with a reference to the fact that he “taketh away the sin of the world.” The same is true of Alma 7:14, which, with its “the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world” is virtually identical to what John’s gospel has.

Both occurrences of this expression in the Gospel of John are also preceded with the word behold: “Behold the Lamb of God” (John 1:29 and 35). This too impressed itself in the Book of Mormon, where “Behold, the Lamb of God” occurs twice (1 Nephi 11:21 and Mormon 9:3) and “beheld the Lamb of God,” once (1 Nephi 11:31-32).

Even more conspicuous is the reliance of the Book of Mormon on the lamb language of the book of Revelation. Two passages from that book (Rev. 7:14 and 21:14) are quoted especially often in the Book of Mormon:

These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. (Rev. 7:14)

From this passage Joseph Smith derived:

1 Nephi 12:11: These are made white in the blood of the Lamb. (p. 27, 600-592 B.C.)

Alma 13:11: their garments were washed white, through the blood of the Lamb. (p. 259, about 82 B.C.)

Alma 34:36: their garments should be made white, through the blood of the Lamb. (p. 321, c. 82 B.C.)

Mormon 9:6: found spotless, pure, fair, and white, having been cleansed by the blood of the Lamb. (p. 535, 401-421 A.D.)

Ether 13:10: whose garment are white through the blood of the Lamb. (p. 567, from Jaredite record of Ether from the 24 plates found by the people of Limhi in about 121 B.C.)

Ether 13:11: for they have been washed in the blood of the Lamb. (p. 567, from Jaredite record of Ether from the 24 plates found by the people of Limhi in about 121 B.C.)

The second passage is Rev. 21:14: “the twelve apostles of the Lamb,” which is taken over by the Book of Mormon at 1 Nephi 11:35, 36; 12:9; 13:26, 39, 40, 41; and 14:20. For the sake of space I leave my readers to look up these parallels themselves.

Jesus the Good Shepherd

In John 10:16 we find the famous phrase: “. . . and there shall be one fold and one shepherd” (first century A.D.). This is taken over by the Book of Mormon at 1 Nephi 22:25: “. . . and there shall be one fold and one shepherd” (sixth century B.C.). The words come from Jesus’s Good Shepherd sermon in the Gospel of John:

And other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd. (John 10:16)

Mormons have traditionally interpreted the above passage as a veiled prophetic reference to Christ’s post-resurrection labors among the ancient Nephites. They are not, however, the only newer religion to appeal to this verse as evidence that Jesus traveled far beyond the boundaries of his native homeland. The Ahmadiyya movement in Islam, for example, uses the same verse to argue that Jesus traveled to India and Kashmir in search of the lost tribes of Israel, whom, they say, settled in Kashmir and Afghanistan. It is to them Jesus is referring when he speaks of the “other sheep” of John 10:16. They say that Jesus traveled east to preach to the lost sheep and then, in the course of time, he died and was buried.

there in the city of Srinagar where his tomb is pointed out to this day.15

The supposed link between the tomb in Srinagar and Jesus is not ancient, rather it was “discovered” around the turn of the last century by the founder of the Ahmadiyya movement, Hazrat Mirza Ghulam Ahmad, who needed a dead Jesus to make way for his claim to represent in his own person both the promised Messiah and the Second Coming of Christ. The idea was that just as the promise of the coming of Elijah was fulfilled not in the return of Elijah in person, but in the coming of John the Baptist, so too the promised return of Jesus was fulfilled not in the return of the person of Jesus but in the coming of . . . himself, Hazrat Mirza Ghulam Ahmad!16 In 1890 it had been told in a revelation that “Jesus son of Mary is dead and that you are sent, as was promised, in his power and spirit.” Then in 1895 he conveniently “discovered” the tomb of Jesus.17

The Mormon interpretation of the passage goes back to the Book of Mormon itself, which presents Jesus as quoting verbatim the King James rendering of this verse from the Gospel of John. The Mormon Jesus tells us that the Father had not commanded him to inform his old-world disciples about the Jewish migration to the Americas, but that he could inform his twelve new-world disciples about it:

This much did the Father command me, That I should tell unto them, that other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd. (3 Nephi 15:16-17)

Given that Jesus had already made that statement about the other sheep in other folds in the Old World, one might not object to simply viewing this Book of Mormon quotation as a case where Joseph encountered the saying on the plates, and then simply chose to recast it in the familiar form in which it appeared in the King James Gospel of John. Given the brevity of the text it would not even be necessary to bring the suggestion into conflict with Emma’s claim that he consulted no books or manuscripts during the course of translation. He may have known the text well enough to recite it to the scribe without taking his eyes off the stone. But the problem, again, is that John 10:16 is part of a larger passage from John anachronistically quoted and commented on in other parts of the Book of Mormon.

At the beginning of this section we have already given an example of Nephi quoting the closing phrase of John 10:16 in what was being presented as a document composed in the sixth century B.C. Similarly, Alma gave a sermon to the Church at Zarahemla around 83 B.C.,18 which it is hard to view as anything other than an expanded homily on John 10:16 in its larger context:

Behold, I say unto you, that the good shepherd doth call you; yea, and in his own name he doth call you, which is the name of Christ; and if ye will not hearken unto the voice of the good shepherd, to the name by which ye are called, behold, ye are not the sheep of the good shepherd. And now if ye are not the sheep of the good shepherd, of what fold are ye? Behold, I say unto you, that the Devil is your shepherd, and ye are of his fold; and now who can deny this? Behold, I say unto you, whomsoever denieth this, is a liar and a child of the Devil; for I say unto you, that whomsoever is good, cometh from God, and whatsoever is evil, cometh from the Devil; therefore, if a man bringeth forth good works, he hearkeneth unto the voice of the good shepherd, and he doeth follow him; but whomsoever bringeth forth evil works, the same becometh a child of the Devil: for he hearkeneth unto his voice, and doth follow him. . . . For what shepherd is there among you having many sheep, doth not watch over them, that the wolves enter not and devour his flock? And behold, if a wolf enter his flock, doth he not drive him out? Yea, and Chaudhary, “The Israelite Origin of People of Afghanistan and Kashmir,” Review of Religions (April 2002): 45: “This was the reason that Jesus undertook the long and arduous journey to Afghanistan and later to India and Kashmir, where he settled, in search of those lost tribes whom he referred to as ‘lost sheep’ and ‘other sheep’. He did this migration in his post crucifixion period of his life when he had despaired of the Jews in Palestine.” Naturally the literature on the alleged tomb of Jesus in Kashmir is quite extensive. For the Hazrat’s own original presentation see, Hazrat Mirza Ghulam Ahmad, Jesus in India: An Account of Jesus’ Escape from Death on the Cross and His Journey to India (Amsterdam: Fredonia Books, 2004 [orig. 1899]). Contrary to the general Christian belief that Jesus is to return from the sky in an miraculous manner as they believe he ascended into the sky, Hazrat Mirza Ghulam Ahmad claimed that he had appeared in the power and spirit of Jesus. He proved from the Quran, Bible and historical sources that Jesus never did die on the cross in the first place but died a natural death in Kashmir where he had travelled in search of the Lost Sheep of Israel after the event of the crucifixion from which he survived.”

18 According to the chronology given in the current LDS edition of the Book of Mormon.
Nephi also refers to the “voice of the Good Shepherd,” in a sermon he preached in around 23-20 B.C., one of four occurrences of that phrase in the Book of Mormon (see Alma 5:38, 41, 57). The language of John 10:16 is also echoed in God’s words to Alma in Mosiah 26:21: “And he that will hear my voice shall be my sheep.”

In Spirit and in Truth

In John 4:23-24, in the famous story of the woman at the well, Jesus tells the woman:

> But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him. God is a Spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth.

We find the same expression used in pre-Christian times in the Book of Mormon:

- Alma 34:38: worship God, in whatsoever place ye may be in, in spirit and in truth. (p. 321, c. 74 B.C.)
- Alma 43:10: whosoever should worship God, in spirit and in truth. (p. 341, c. 74 B.C.)

You Must Be Born Again!

There is scarcely any passage in the New Testament more familiar than Jesus’s words to Nicodemus when he came to speak to Jesus at night:

> John 3:3-5: Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. . . . Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God . . . Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again.

From this passage Joseph Smith derived:

- Mosiah 27:25: Marvel not that all mankind, yea, men and women, all nations, kindreds, tongues and people, must be born again; yea, born of God. (p. 214, 100-92 B.C.)
- Alma 5:49: I say unto you, the aged, and also the middle aged, and the rising generation; yea, to cry unto them that they must repent and be born again. (p. 236, about 83 B.C.)

Alma 7:14: Now I say unto you, that ye must repent, and be born again; for the spirit saith if ye are not born again ye cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven. (p. 240, about 83 B.C.)

So, too, in the Pearl of Great Price Book of Moses, where Joseph was supposedly restoring the text of Genesis to its original uncorrupted form, we find God paraphrasing John 3 to Adam:

> Moses 6:59: even so ye must be born again into the kingdom of heaven, of water, and of the Spirit.

The extensive dependence of both the Book of Mormon and the Joseph Smith Translation book of Genesis (Pearl of Great Price Book of Moses) on the Gospel of John in the language of the King James Bible all but proves that Joseph was not, in either case, miraculously translating or restoring ancient texts, and even more to the point, was not engaging in the process described by those who observed him translating the Book of Mormon. The simplest answer to Michael Hubbard MacKay and Nicholas J. Frederick’s question “how can a text written centuries prior to the King James Bible, and supposedly translated through a seer stone, contain so much of it?” is “it can’t.” The simplest explanation in the case of the above quotations and allusions is that in contrast to the larger chunks of the King James, they probably could not have found their way into the Book of Mormon at all unless Joseph had copied them directly. Here we see revelatory texts of various kinds being produced out of the storehouse of Joseph’s own familiarity with the King James text. Joseph regularly bulked up whatever he happened to be working on with stock phrases from the King James Bible.

Many more examples from the Gospel of John and other New Testament books could be noted, but I will limit myself to a single example where Jesus repeatedly speaks of himself in words taken from the author of the Gospel of John in its King James dress when giving revelations to Joseph. The example I have in mind represents a pastiche of John 1:5 and 11-12, and the examples are going to be drawn from the Doctrine and Covenants (and its precursor, the Book of Commandments). Again in order to get close to the form given by Joseph himself I present the passages as they appeared in the 1833 Book of Commandments or in the 1835 first edition of the Doctrine & Covenants, in cases where no parallel version appeared in the Book of Commandments (BC). In each case I give the references where the passages can now be found in the current edition of the Doctrine & Covenants:

KJV John 1:5, 11-12: And the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not . . . He came unto his own, and his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name:

From this passage Joseph Smith derived:

D&C 11:11 / BC 10:5 (1835 D&C 37:5): I am the light which shineth in darkness, and by my power I give these words unto thee.

D&C 34:2 / BC 36:2-3 (1835 D&C 56:1): the light and the life of the world: A light which shineth in darkness and the darkness comprehendeth it not: Who so loved the world that he gave his own life [= added echo of John 3:16], that as many as would believe might become the sons of God.19

D&C 39:2-3 / BC 41:1 (1835 D&C 59:1): . . . the light and the life of the world; a light which shineth in darkness and the darkness comprehendeth it not: The same which came in the meridian of time unto my own, and my own received me not; but to as many as received me, gave I power to become my sons.

D&C 11:28-29 / BC 10:12 (1835 D&C 37:12): Behold I am Jesus Christ, the Son of God: I am the life and the light of the world: I am the same who came unto my own, and my own received me not: but verily, verily I say unto you, that as many as receiveth me, them will I give power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on my name: Amen.

D&C 45:7-8 / BC 48:8-10 (1835 D&C 15:2): . . . the light and the life of the world, a light that shineth in darkness and the darkness comprehendeth it not: I came unto mine own and mine own received me not: But unto as many as received me, gave I power to do many miracles, and to become the sons of God.

D&C 88:48-49 (1835 D&C 7:12): he who came unto his own was not comprehended. The light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not.20

The phrase “I am the light and the life of the world,” which is in evidence in two of the passages just looked at, appears to be a hybrid of John 8:12 “I am the light of the world,” with John 1:4: “In him was life; and the life was the light of men.” Interestingly this hybrid begins to appear on the lips of God/Jesus in Joseph Smith’s early revelations (D&C 10:70, 11:28, 12:9, 34:2, 39:2, 45:7) and in the Book of Mormon (Mosiah 16:9, Alma 38:9, 3 Nephi 11:11, Ether 4:12) at roughly the same time, i.e., when Joseph was working on both. This in turn raises the question of whether we should view it in both cases as a contemporaneous invention of Joseph Smith.

Anachronistic Quotations of the King James Point to Bible Forgery

After Wesley P. Walters described the Book of Mormon as being “generously sprinkled with passages lifted from the King James Version” back in 1960,21 Hugh Nibley attempted to brushed the whole thing off by saying “people are preached to from their own Bible. To the world to which the English translation of the Book of Mormon was addressed there was the only one acceptable Bible, the King James translation.”22 In the recent book by Michael Hubbard MacKay and Nicholas J. Frederick we find a similar attempt at minimizing the significance of the Book of Mormon’s reliance on the King James Bible: “Many nineteenth-century readers, particularly those involved in the Restorationist movement, would have expected any word from God to sound like the words from God they already had (in other words, the KJV).”23

In both cases the authors appear to have been speaking beyond their ken, since, in fact, for many nineteenth-century Christians, the King James Bible was not “the only one acceptable Bible.” The Methodists were encouraged to prefer Wesley’s New Testament translation along with its Explanatory Notes (1755) and those involved in the Restorationist movement, far from preferring the King James more than what was usual among other Christians, had the Alexander Campbell New Testament produced in the 1820s. Although both Wesley’s and Campbell’s New Testaments were based on earlier translations, neither of them built off the King James.24

Yet, however that may be, if the Book of Mormon was presented in King James dress as a way of appealing to how people in those days would have expected words from God to sound like, as the authors just cited claimed, that does nothing to give us confidence regarding its potential authenticity, rather it should be regarded as a mark against it. It is good to remember that after Joseph died, most of the surviving signers of the testimonies to the authenticity of the Book of Mormon became followers of James Strang. After claiming to be Smith’s divinely appointed successor, he miraculously translated his own new scriptures from his own set of newly discovered ancient plates, this time called the Book of the Law of the Lord, which had supposedly been “kept in the ark of the covenant, and was held too sacred to go into the hands of strangers.”25 This volume again began with the identical proclamatory statement that we find in the Book of Mormon testimonies—“BE it known unto all nations, kindreds, tongues, and people, unto whom this work shall come . . .”—and it included a page giving a statement of testimony signed by a number of witnesses who testified to having seen and handled the ostensibly ancient plates. But most importantly for what we are saying here, it too was “generously sprinkled with passages lifted from the King James Version,” and it too mimicked the King James style throughout.

Likewise the book that Shaker Philemon Stewart, claimed he received by Revelation, A Holy, Sacred and Divine Roll and Book; from The Lord of Heaven, to the Inhabitants of Earth, also adopted the King James style.26 It was Stewart’s book that Martin Harris is reported to have “declared repeatedly that he had as much evidence for a Shaker book he had as for the Book of Mormon.”27 In each case the use of the King James style may have enhanced the works believability, but it did nothing toward establishing its divine authenticity.

The presence of the stock phrases from the King James Version’s Gospel of John as filler in the Book of Mormon and Joseph’s prophetically restored Book of Genesis shows that in both cases we are dealing with more than his simply preferring to use the King James text when encountering parallel texts in the Book of Mormon. Even if we were willing to grant that Nephi might have quoted numerous passages from Isaiah or that Jesus might have repeated his Sermon on the Mount over again in the New World, the regular appearance of stock phrases from the King James padding the Book of Mormon from end to end still points in the direction of the very extensive anachronistic literary dependence of the Book of Mormon on the King James throughout. And that in turn points in the direction of the Book of Mormon being another Bible forgery rather than another Bible.

Contradicting the Grand Narrative

So far in our attempt to discover whether the Book of Mormon is another Bible or another Bible forgery we have focused on whether or not Joseph’s actions were consistent with a belief in the story of divine dictation told by his close associates. And the answer is that those actions were not. Yet there is another side to the question that is equally important to our investigation, namely—Were the descriptions of Joseph’s close associates as to what they saw Joseph doing consistent with the story he himself put before the public? And here again the answer is no.

The story Joseph put before the public only spoke of one supernatural instrument used in the process of translating the Book of Mormon: the Urim and Thummim. The discovery of this unique instrument along with the golden plates is an essential feature of the foundation story of Mormonism that is not only enshrined in Mormon scripture, but has also been a persistent part of standard LDS missionary presentations. According to the story the angel Moroni, one of the Book of Mormon’s ancient authors, appeared to Joseph on the evening of September 21, 1823, and informed him of the existence of “a book deposited, written upon gold plates, giving an account of the former inhabitants of this continent,” which contained “the fulness of the everlasting Gospel . . . as delivered by the Saviour to the ancient inhabitants,” and that along with it, “there were two stones in silver bows—and these stones, fastened to a breastplate, constituted what is called the Urim and Thummim—deposited with the plates, and the possession and use of these stones was what constituted ‘seers’ in ancient or former times, and that God had prepared them for the purpose of translating the book” (Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History 34-35).

The story goes on to say that on September 22, 1827, Joseph finally manages to recover the gold plates along with the Urim and Thummim from their ancient hiding place in the Hill Cumorah. As Joseph reported the story in the 1838 Elders' Journal, “I obtained them, and the Urim and Thummim with them; by means of which, I translated the plates; and thus came the Book of Mormon.” Joseph makes the same claim in a letter he wrote in 1842 to John Wentworth, editor of the Chicago Democrat:

With the records was found a curious instrument which the ancients called “Urim and Thummim,” which consisted of two transparent stones set in the rim of a bow fastened to a breastplate.

Through the medium of the Urim and Thummim I translated the record by the gift, and power of God.

The unique significance of this supernaturally appointed and preserved instrument, however, was not only an integral part of the story of the coming forth of the Book of Mormon as Joseph told it, but of the grand narrative of the Book of Mormon itself. Indeed the story of the instrument, according to the Book of Mormon, dated back to the time of the confusion of languages in the generation of the Tower of Babel. At that time, says the Book of Mormon, Jesus Christ gave a number of great revelations, including a revelation of himself (even his name), to the pious brother of Jared and instructed him to write a record of it and to seal it up. At the same time he provided the brother of Jared with the two stones of the Urim and Thummim because “the language which ye shall write I have confounded; wherefore I will cause in my own due time that these stones shall magnify the eyes of men these things which ye shall write” (Ether 3:24). (The two stones are called “the interpreters” in the Book of Mormon not “Urim and Thummim”).

After this the brother of Jared along with other members of his extended family, came to be called Jaredites, and they were eventually destroyed. A record of their history was written by the Jaredite Ether on twenty-four gold plates, which he, in turn, hid away along with the Urim and Thummim (Ether 4:5, 15:33). Both were rediscovered in the second century B.C. by some people from king Limhi (Mosiah 8:9), who in turn brought them to Ammon asking whether he might be able to translate them. Ammon suggests Mosiah, who he says, can translate the records: for he hath wherewith that he can look, and translate all records that are of ancient date; and it is a gift from God. The things are called interpreters; and no man can look in them, except he be commanded, lest he should look for that he ought not, and he should perish. And whosoever is commanded to look in them, the same is called seer. (Mosiah 8:13)

The plates were duly brought to king Mosiah (Mosiah 21:27, Ether 1:2), who eventually translated them “by the means of those two stones which was fastened into the two rims of a bow.” In any case, Mosiah then passes all the records along with the “interpreters,” and commands they be preserved (Mosiah 28:20). Then finally Moroni, at the end of the Book of Mormon period, is commanded to seal up the records along with the interpreters by hiding them “again in the fifth century A.D. (Ether 4:3-5). It is this same Moroni then, who afterward appears, more than a thousand years later, to Joseph in his bedroom on the evening of September 21, 1823, to tell him about the existence of the ancient record hidden away with the brother of Jared’s/Mosiah’s interpreters and to explain how he has been chosen to become the new seer and custodian of the ongoing grand narrative. But there’s only one problem. Where is the ongoing central role of the Interpreters (the Urim and Thummim) in the ongoing grand narrative? The answer apparently is nowhere at all! According to both Emma Smith and David Whitmer none of the current Book of Mormon was produced using the Urim and Thummim. Here’s what happened.

Martin Harris’s service as scribe to Joseph Smith, which began on April 12, 1828, came to a sudden end on June 14, 1828, after he’d borrowed and irretrievably lost the manuscript of the first 116 pages translated to that point. Joseph, who apparently feared that if he were to try to replicate what he had already written (which shouldn’t have been a problem if he had really simply read it off the stone as reported) was ostensibly told by God that he should not retranslate the portion he’d already done, which was called the Book of Lehi. Instead he was to translate another account also available among the plates which covered the same basic material. As a result none of the text included in the 116 pages was ever retranslated into what eventually became the Book of Mormon.

Joseph reports further that as a result of God’s anger at him for entrusting the 116 pages “into the hands of a wicked man,” (D&C 10:1) “both the plates and the Urim and Thummim were taken from me again; but,” he continues, “in a few days they were returned to me.”

But the claim that the Urim and Thummim were returned is inconsistent with the accounts of the same incident by Emma Smith and David Whitmer, both of whom claimed Joseph didn’t use the Urim and Thummim in translating after having them taken away. In an 1870 letter the Prophet’s wife wrote: “Now the first that my husband translated, [the book] was translated by the use of the Urim, and Thummim, and that was the part that Martin Harris lost, after that he used a small stone, not exactly, black, but was rather a dark color.” David Whitmer similarly recounts how the loss of the 116 pages, evoked the stormiest kind of chastisement from the Lord, who took from the prophet the Urim and Thummim and otherwise expressed his condemnation. By fervent prayer and by otherwise humbling himself, the prophet, however, again found favor, and was presented with a strange, oval-shaped, chocolate-colored stone, about the size of an egg, only more flat, which, it was promised, should serve the same purpose as the missing Urim and Thummim . . . With this stone all of the present Book of Mormon was translated.\(^{37}\)

Whitmer told John Traughber in 1879 that he actually never saw Joseph use the Urim and Thummim at all.\(^{38}\)

Further, the testimony of Martin Harris, who only served as scribe during the production of the lost 116 pages, suggests that Joseph used a seer stone rather than the Urim and Thummim at least some of the time even before the pages were lost: “He [Martin Harris] said that the Prophet possessed a seer stone, by which he was enabled to translate as well as from the Urim and Thummim, and for convenience he then used the seer stone.”\(^{39}\) The very fact that Harris presents a picture of Joseph being able to use the Urim and Thummim or not according to his “convenience,” greatly reduces the significance of the instrument to the story of the coming forth of the Book of Mormon. And if the Urim and Thummim were not used at all during the process of translating the current Book of Mormon, as Emma and David Whitmer reported, then the claim by Joseph in the Elders’ Journal and Wentworth letter, are simply misrepresentations in which Joseph was saying the Book of Mormon came forth in one manner, when really it came forth in another. And in fact even if Joseph did not use seer stones in a hat to translate the entire text of the present Book of Mormon there can now be no doubt that he used them in translating a good portion of it. This is something even the LDS Church itself has recently formally admitted, even publishing, for example, a photograph of the brown seer stone Joseph used in translating the Book of Mormon in the October 2015 issue of its official Ensign magazine.\(^{40}\) This was

38 “With the sanction of David Whitmer, and by his authority, I now state that he does not say that Joseph Smith ever translated in his presence by aid of Urim and Thummim; but by means of one dark colored, opaque stone, called a ‘Seer Stone,’ which was placed in the crown of a hat, into which Joseph put his face, so as to exclude the external light.” (“Testimony of David Whitmer,” Saints’ Herald 26 [Nov. 15, 1879]: 341.) followed up by a faith-promoting book, Joseph Smith’s Seer Stones, by two BYU professors, bolstered up with an introduction by Mark Ashurst-McGee, Senior Historian at the Church History Library, and published jointly by the BYU’s Religious Studies Center and the Church-owned Deseret Book.\(^{41}\) The purpose of the book, quite clearly, is to ease faithful LDS Church members into the idea that Joseph translated using seer stones along with/instead of the Urim and Thummim without such a fact leading to a crisis of faith. Finding out about their use, as it stressed near the beginning of the book, is not supposed to be something to be alarmed about, but rather it is “deep doctrine,” that resulted in a “deep theological tradition” representing a part of the LDS Church’s “rich history . . . ripe for exploration.”\(^{42}\)

The LDS Church’s recent attempts at normalizing Joseph Smith’s uses of seers stones even extends to materials produced for children. We see this in the February 2017 Friend, the LDS Church’s children’s magazine, which shows a cartoon picture of Joseph Smith holding a seer stone in his hand, and the explanation:

Joseph used a special rock called a seer stone to translate the plates. He also used a tool called the Urim and Thummim, two clear rocks bound together with metal that looked like a pair of glasses.\(^{43}\)

It is, of course, perfectly legitimate for faithful Mormons to both admit that Joseph used seer stones and to do all they can to integrate that fact into a faithful understanding of what it means. In our quest to discover whether the Book of Mormon was another Bible or another Bible forgery, the issue of Joseph’s use of the seer stones plays a much simpler role, namely showing that although he told one story publicly about how the Book of Mormon came about, those who saw it in the process of happening, contradict him. Joseph said one thing, and did another. And because of this the issue of the seer stones versus the Urim and Thummim once again points in the direction of considering the Book of Mormon a forgery.

The Gold Plates

The other half of the formula in Joseph’s public descriptions of the process of translation, was the gold plates, that is to say the claim that he used the Urim and Thummim to translate the gold plates. Yet according to the testimonies quoted earlier from those who observed the process, it is not clear that the plates played any direct role in the process at all. As he translated Joseph wasn’t looking at the plates, he was looking in his hat. Consequently it would be more correct to say that the Book of Mormon came not from the plates but from the seer stone. And this contradicts not only the basic story Joseph presented to the public about what he was supposedly doing in translating the plates, but also the representation of what he was doing in LDS Church materials ever since. We see this perhaps most strikingly in the Church’s artistic depictions of the translation process, which, until very recently, have invariably shown Joseph with the plates before him as he translated.\(^{44}\) So what is the significance of this?

Presenting the Book of Mormon’s coming forth from the gold plates through the Urim and Thummim provided the project with an aura of respectability that it would not have had if Joseph’s actual translation process had been known, a process, moreover, which would likely have been generally disapproved of due to its occult associations. And if it were known that Joseph had earlier used the same seer stones while working as a conjurer for money-diggers, that would have only made things much worse. And so the real story was concealed, even from many of his earliest followers, some of whom had knowledge of the stone but, given their reactions to other people who were doing precisely what Joseph had done, had somehow failed to put two and two together. We see this very strikingly in two cases where Mormons were disciplined while Joseph was still living for doing the same thing Joseph did. The first involved a young man who both pretended to recover an ancient text and used a stone to find treasure. The story was told in the December 1, 1842, issue of the LDS Church’s Times and Seasons newspaper:

We have lately seen a pamphlet, written, and published by James C. Brewster; purporting to be one of the lost books of Esdras; and to be written by the gift and power of God. We consider it a perfect humbug, and should not have noticed it, had it not been assiduously circulated, in several branches of the church. This said Brewster is a minor; but has professed for several years to have the gift of seeing and looking through or into a [sic] stone; and has thought that he has discovered money hid in the ground in Kirtland, Ohio.45

The boy and his father were suspended and only escaped being actually cut off from the Church by promising “to desist from their ridiculous and pernicious ways.”

The author of the piece further writes: “We . . . should not have noticed it [the incident],” had it not been for the fact that “His father and some of our weak brethren, who perhaps have some confidence in the ridiculous stories that are propagated concerning Joseph Smith, about money digging.”

A second incident, which occurred among the Latter-day Saints in England, involved a certain Brother Monford (Mumford? Mountford?), who was “disfellowshiped by the council of officers, for using magic, and telling fortunes &c.”46

Among those participating in deciding Monford’s fate were Mormon leaders Alfred Cordon and Wilford Woodruff, both of whom left an account of the event in their diaries. According to Cordon:

bro Mountford had in his possession several Glasses or Chrystals as he called them. they are about the size of a Gooses Egg made flat at each end. he also had a long list of prayers wrote down which he used. The prayer was unto certain Spirits which he said was in the Air which says he when I pray to them in the name of the Father, Son, Holy Ghost, any thing that I want will come into the Glass. for instance if A Young woman had a desire to know who she would have for an Husband, she came to him and made the case known, and he brought out his Chrystals and prayed unto a certain Spirit then she must peep into the Chrystal and in it she would see the Young man that would become her husband. Elder Woodruff made some observations on the subject. when it was moved and Unanimously carried that no such Magic work be allowed in the Church.47

Woodruff, for his part, reported:

Brother Mumford who was ingaged in the Magic or Blackart fortune telling &c which prevails to a great extent in this Country. But as he persisted in his course after being laboured with the Council withdrew fellowship from him. He was holding the office of a Priest & one thing is worthy of notice that while the Priesthood was upon him, he could not see his magic glasses as before until after he ceased to fill the Priest office & rejected our council.49

These Mormons in both cases were condemned for doing the very thing Joseph had done and yet were treated as though they were engaging in things that were obviously unacceptable for anyone wanting to remain in the LDS Church. The reference to the “ridiculous stories” of Joseph’s career as a money-digger, in the account of the first case, implies that the LDS Church at the time either did not generally know or was denying the truth about Joseph’s earlier years. In their recent book on Joseph’s seer stones cited earlier, Michael Hubbard MacKay and Nicholas J. Frederick both admit this aspect of Joseph’s earlier career, and attempt to justify it by blurring the distinction between occult magic and orthodox Christianity by pretending people didn’t draw clear distinctions between the two in Joseph’s day: “Early believers did not necessarily struggle with the fusion of Joseph the treasure seeker and Joseph the translator.”50 Yet how could they “struggle,” given that Joseph hid it from them? And why did he hide it if such distinctions really didn’t matter? In the same question and answer article in the Elders’ Journal quoted above, where the claim is made that Joseph translated the gold plates with the Urim and Thummim, there also appeared the following question and answer about the Prophet’s previous career as a money-digger:

Question 10. Was not Jo Smith a money digger?

Answer. Yes. But it was never a very profitable job for him, as he only got fourteen dollars a month for it.51

46 “To The Saints Abroad,” Times and Seasons 2.15 (June 1841): 434.
The answer, however, evades the extent of Joseph’s real involvement by presenting Joseph as a simple workman who was just trying to make a few dollars digging holes.

One of the most significant remarks in the two accounts cited above is Wilford Woodruff’s description of what Monford was doing as “Blackart,” indicating that the early Mormon leader Woodruff viewed the practice as more akin to witchcraft than to Christianity. A similar attitude to Woodruff’s toward the connection between seer stones and money digging and the black arts is also well illustrated in John G. C. Brainard’s 1827 poem, The Money Diggers:

THUS saith The Book—“Permit no witch to live;”
Hence, Massachusetts hath expelled the race,—
Connecticut, where swap and dicker thrive,
Admits not to their foot a resting-place.
With more of hardihood and less of grace,
Vermont receives the sisters gray and lean,
Allows each witch her airy broomstick race,
O’er mighty rocks and mountains dark with green,
Where tempests wake their voice, and torrents roar between.

And one there was among that wicked crew,
To whom the enemy a pebble gave,
Through which, at long-off distance, she might view
All treasures of the fathomable wave;
And where the Thames’ bright billows gently lave,
The grass-grown piles that flank the ruined wharf,
She sent them forth, those two adventurers brave... 52

By using the story of the gold plates translated through the ancient Urim and Thummim as a cover for the actual manner in which he’d produced the Book of Mormon, Joseph shielded it from immediately being recognized as what would more recently come to be called a “channeled” text, a kind of text produced sometimes with, sometimes without, the aid of occult mantic devices, which was already a familiar genre of literature in Joseph’s time, and would become increasingly so after. Joseph claimed to be able to recover ancient texts with or without plates, and to be able to translate them with or without his seer stones. With the seer stone, for example, he claimed to recover and translate the “record made on parchment by John [the Apostle] and hidden up by himself” that now appears as part of D&C 7. Then without his seer stone he also claimed to produce his Joseph Smith Translation of the Bible, restoring lost sections that had allegedly been taken out by the Great and Abominable Church (1 Nephi 13) or otherwise lost.

In either case Joseph’s claiming to have obtained texts in such a manner was hardly a novel activity. The occult art of obtaining books by scrying, which is what Joseph was doing with his stone, was well known. We may think, for example, of the legendary occultist John Dee (1527-1608), who’d received a number of books in the 1580s, including the Liber Logaeth and De heptarchia mystica, with the help of his scryer, Edward Kelly.53

Or again, we might think of Emanuel Swedenborg with his many interactions with the other side reported in books like Concerning Heaven and its Wonders and Concerning Hell from Things Heard and Seen (1768).

Then there was the 1852 book Principles of Nature, Her Divine Revelations, and a Voice to Mankind described on its title pages as being “by and through” the Poughkeepsie Seer, Andrew Jackson Davies.

Or to mention once more John Ballou Newbrough’s—
“I... beheld the line of light that rested on my hands extending heavenward like a telegraph wire toward the sky”—book the Oahspe Bible.54 We spoke of this work in the first part of our article, where we mentioned also the Aquarian Gospel, a work psychically downloaded from the Akashic Records by Levi Dowling.

To this list we could add as well the famed Mahatma letters, allegedly written by the two prolific ascended masters named Morya and Koot Hoomi. These were claimed to have miraculously appeared in a shrine cabinet at the headquarters of the Theosophical Society in Adyar, India, but upon more careful examination they turned out to have been penned by the hand of Madame Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, the ever colorful, chain-smoking, theosophical prophetess from Yekaterinoslav, who afterward slipped them into the cabinet through a hidden sliding panel in the back.55

Then there was C. G. Jung’s Septem Sermones ad Mortuos, attributed to the second-century Gnostic teacher Basilides of Alexandria, which was dictated to (and through) Jung one Sunday afternoon in 1916 just after 54 “J. B. Newbrough to the Editor of the Banner of Light, Boston, MA (Jan 21, 1883),” in Oahspe: Epoch-Making Revelations of Grave Importance to Everyone: Booklet Number 1 (Los Angeles, CA: repr. Walter Wiers, n.d.), [iv].

the front doorbell had begun ringing frantically at the instigation of an invisible hand. The house, Jung recalled, was “crammed full of spirits . . . and the air was so thick it was scarcely possible to breathe.” Jung himself was “all a-quer” and asked, “For God sakes, what in the world is this?” Then they [the spirits] cried out in chorus, “We have come back from Jerusalem where we found not what we sought.” After which, Jung reports, the rest of the Septem Sermones “began to flow out of me.”

Nor is there any lack of more recent examples of such texts, including for example, the Urantia Book, communicated by masters from other spheres with outlandish names like “a Secondary Lanonandek Son,” “the Chief of the Archangels of Nebadon,” and “a Mighty Messenger temporarily sojourning on Urantia” (i.e., Earth), and A Course in Miracles, dictated to Helen Schucman by “the Voice.”

If you want something with a more Mormon feel, try The Book of Azrael, consisting of a retake on the history of the world from Adam and Eve to Abraham, set out with chapters and verses like the Bible. And who is Azrael? He’s Archie Dean Wood of Pocatello, Idaho, “Teacher of Righteousness in the School of the Prophets,” whose ministry is announced in the first chapter of his book, where God says:

And I shall set over them a new shepherd [i.e., Archie], who will watch over them, who will lead them in the words of the Lord, for I shall stretch forth my hand into a desert place [i.e., Pocatello, Idaho] to bring forth my servant. Him shall I prepare from youth that he may teach my people; a teacher of righteousness shall he be unto me, for I shall hide up in his inward parts the power of my word. (Book of Azrael, 1.1.11-12)

Like the Book of Mormon and James Strang’s book, Archie’s book also adopts the King James style and includes a “testimony” statement signed by 13 witnesses, this time affirming having seen a vision of Christ on a mountain outside of Pocatello.

In each case the production of the Book of Mormon has more in common with these books than it does with the Bible, and people who find the comparison between the Book of Mormon and these other texts offensive or absurd need to address the question for themselves that if the Book of Mormon is somehow different from all the rest, how does it stand out from the group, and why is it different? Very often Mormons insinuate that Christians reject the Book of Mormon simply because they believe in a closed canon and are therefore “not open to new revelation.” Yet to a Mormon bringing such an accusation I can only ask, “So then, are you open to the ‘new revelations’ I have just been describing? And if not, why not? How can you accuse me of being closed to new revelation when your ‘new revelation’ looks to me pretty much how I imagine the ‘new revelations’ I have just been describing looks to you? And how is it that your book, produced in much the same way as these other books, is somehow legitimate while they are not?”

Conclusion

Is the Book of Mormon another Bible or another Bible forgery? Think, if you will, of each of the issues raised in this article as possible red flags against the Book of Mormon’s claim to be another Bible. Very often when people lose faith in the Book of Mormon they not only reject it but they reject the Bible also, on the grounds, they say, that the Bible “has the same kind of problems,” as the Book of Mormon. But that is exactly what is not the case. The Bible actually is what it presents itself to be, i.e., many separate works written by many different authors over many centuries, eventually collected together into one book. The Book of Mormon only pretends to be that. And it is precisely here that the Bible and the Book of Mormon are most definitely not alike, and do not have the “same kind of problems.” Please understand, I am not saying that the Bible has no “problems,” only that they are very different problems from what we face with the Book of Mormon. Many questions arise from the very fact that the Bible really was written by many authors over a large period of time with later authors interpreting earlier ones and different authors giving different accounts of the same events, influenced perhaps by somewhat differing purposes and theology. Are we always sure, for example, that the New Testament authors get it right when quoting the Psalms or Isaiah? Is it more appropriate to try to harmonize the cosmological descriptions in the Bible with ancient cosmology, with modern science, or with both? Did Jesus’s followers accurately represent his teachings? Which Greek manuscript families represent the earliest form of the New Testament text? Are the Roman Catholics, the Greek Orthodox, or the Protestants right when it comes to their understanding of the boundaries of the Biblical canon (i.e., which books should be included in the Bible)? Should we prefer the Hebrew or the Greek text of the Old Testament as more authoritative? Can we really know what this or that ancient Hebrew/Greek word really meant in its ancient context? Were particular books included in the Bible written by the authors traditionally attached to them? Did the Apostle Paul write Hebrews, for example, or did the same John write both the Gospel of John and the book of Revelation, or were there perhaps two different Johns, as certain early Church writers suspected?61 Careful students of the Bible regularly face questions like these from time to time as they try to better understand their Bibles.

57 The Urantia Book (Chicago, IL: Urantia Foundation, 1955), 588, 373, 1277.

But these are not the kind of questions the Book of Mormon poses. There we are faced with an entirely different set of questions. Given that the book is written with perfect hindsight, there is no need to wonder whether Alma understood Nephi correctly. Since the entire Book of Mormon is written from the perspective of one who is totally familiar with the King James Bible, there is no question of earlier authors being misrepresented by later. As we have seen the name Jesus Christ is already revealed by the time of the building of the Tower of Babel and all the details of his life, death, and resurrection, fully revealed long before he arrives on the scene. As a result serious efforts to place the separate books within the Book of Mormon into their alleged ancient contexts lead to little and dubious results. Efforts at placing the whole against its nineteenth-century background, however, has proven much more fruitful for the simple reason that that is its true background. Similarly, its heavy reliance on the King James Bible makes it more productive to investigate the relationship of that text to the Book of Mormon, rather than, say, to the Dead Sea Scrolls, with which, as an early nineteenth-century production, the Book of Mormon has no relation.

Two different kinds of problems arising from dealing with two different kinds of books. The problems attending the Bible arise from the Bible’s being what it is. The problems attending the Book of Mormon arise from its pretending to be what it's not. The Book of Mormon is not another Bible; it is another Bible forgery, and therefore rejecting the Bible along with the Book of Mormon because they “have the same kind of problems” is simply absurd. Mark Hofmann, the famous forger of Mormon documents, also branched out on at least one occasion to try his hand at composing an Emily Dickinson poem, which he then used to produce a forgery in the poet’s own handwriting. The forgery eventually came up for auction at Sotheby’s and was sold to the library in Dickinson’s hometown of Amherst, Massachusetts for $24,150.62 Naturally much consternation followed the eventual discovery that the poem was a fake. How could an auction house of Sotheby’s reputation have been so careless as to present a faked Dickinson as real? Selby Kiffer, of Sotheby’s, could only say, that it had been “an extraordinarily good forgery,” even to the point that it used the “correct paper for the period and, the correct writing instrument for the period, the literary tone was quite good—and the imitation of the writing.”63 Still, even granting it was a good forgery didn’t put it in anybody’s mind on the same level of an original Emily Dickinson. Nor was anybody foolish enough to propose discarding real original Emily Dickinson poems as an appropriate response to somebody’s forging an Emily Dickinson poem. How is it less absurd, then, to jettison the Bible after losing faith in the Book of Mormon?

November 2016: LDS lady in Utah:
I am almost done reading this book, "Starting at the Finish Line." Sooooo, perfect!!! Sooo good!!! Thank you for your recommendation to read it! 😊

I feel like God is revealing himself to me a bit at a time...probably all I can handle at once...already my mind is blown!! Wow!!! He really did ALL!!! My heart is overflowing with gratitude! Thank you, thank you, thank you again—for the role you played in bringing me to real truth!!! Hallelujah!! Praise God!!! I am free in Jesus!! I am free from the tyranny and bondage of man made “shoulds”!!!!

December 2016: Thank you to Sandra and all those at utlm. I am not LDS however my long time fiancé of 6 years was raised LDS and quit attending. . . . Being around his family of whom I greatly care about, I was very confused of things they spoke of so several months ago I began researching the history of modern day mormons and the history. I told my fiancé one day I’ll know more than you and last week I stunned him (he is well versed in literature and books). Big thank you to Sandra for her and Jerald’s teachings. Now I must learn to watch my tongue around them because they will be greatly offended and label me anti mormon. Listening to recordings and other materials I have also learned of more biblical teachings. . . again thank you.

October 2016: I, myself, left the church after graduating BYU-I[daho] just about a year ago. I have absolutely no doubt of its falsehood but I find myself wanting to help others open their eyes. It is difficult, as I can only imagine you know better than I, but I feel like truth and reason will eventually manifest through all of the cognitive dissonance. I feel like the average LDS member is simply oblivious, naive, and ignorant of the church’s history. I have experienced this by asking questions such as “Why was Joseph incarcerated in Carthage?” The following answers are always amusing and seldom even close to accurate. Thank you so much for all you have done to help people, such as myself.

October 2016: I had an easy time leaving the church, I said to myself, “I will never let my children go thru the guilt that I have felt.”

My entire [family] is totally LDS, I mean 200% . . . I admire your work, I know you receive much hatred, I believe that you touch many lives that you will never even know of.

I send you blessings and Praise to Him who saved us.

December 2016: Sandra this is T__ J____ (I am a Ukrainian who came by to buy a book on polygamy last Friday). It was so nice to visit with you! I feel so lucky that I found your ministry. It will help me in my transition out of Mormonism. Thank you.

January 2017: I discovered this website in my research of how to help my Mormon friends see the Light of Jesus. All I can really say is thank you. Thank you for making this website. Thank you for providing everyone with this knowledge.

February 2017: I am disturbed. The leaders are intelligent men. Most are leaders in their field. One was Vice President of Bank of America. One was a pilot for Lufthansa and a pilot instructor. They have to know what they are doing. I am a high school graduate but I uncovered so much on my little iPad. How can they continue to lie to millions? Don’t they fear God?

February 2017: Ms. Tanner, I grew up in the Netherlands in a strict LDS family. We sometimes heard about you, being portrayed as the evil anti-LDS machine. Well, I just wanted to thank you for all your work. It has helped me greatly! With admiration and respect.

February 2017: I appreciate all the work you have done exposing the errors of Mormonism, and envy the time and resources you have to do so living in Salt Lake City. I actually grew up in Salt Lake City and spent the first 20 years of my life in the Mormon faith. I am now 44, so it has been a long while since I studied my own way out of it. . . . [I] never removed my name from the records. My reason has always been that since they have my info and are able to track me down, it is a good opportunity to tell them I am no longer a part of it. Most are curious which is why I try to use it as a stepping stone. Some have called me all kinds of names, which I’m sure you have heard as well. However, I am at a point where I am considering removing my name. . . . If I were to write a letter, I have no idea who the Bishop may be or even where my records are at this point. . . . I appreciate any insight you can offer pertaining to this. Thanks again for your effort and material you make available.

February 2017: Hello Sandra,
You helped me when I wrote to you about 1991. I want to express my gratitude for a changed, very happy and content life.

Back then I was studying for an MBA in Canada. As I studied Organizational Behaviour I immediately identified how the church controls and manipulates its members. The page with a descriptive list of such organizations jumped out at me.
I was a Temple Recommend holder, married to an active LDS High Priest with four active children. For years I had concerns with the temple ordinances and temple garments. Whenever I mentioned my concerns at Bishop interviews I was told to attend the Temple more regularly, fast and pray.

As I studied this university course I became more uneasy about the church especially since I already had doubts about church history during the four years I taught the Gospel Doctrine class. I explained my concerns to a Religion professor and asked if he knew how I could find objective, well researched information regarding LDS history that wasn’t just hateful anti-Mormon literature. He recommended I contact you, which I did. You wrote a supportive letter and over the following months I read a few of your books.

Fortunately when I told my husband I couldn’t sit through another church meeting he said he had already come to the same conclusion but for different reasons. Much to my surprise three of our children were happy to leave the church. We sent an exit letter and totally cut our ties with the church.

It wasn’t easy dealing with our LDS family and friends. Like you we received hate letters.

After moving to Australia I attended a Stake conference with family. I could hardly sit and listen as young people were being taught how to behave in a guilt promoting talk. It’s the only time I’ve attended the LDS church since I left except for a wedding and funeral.

In those pre Internet days you and Gerald were a blessed resource for people like me. I still enjoy listening to you on YouTube. I’m happy that so much of the truth is now on-line, people are writing books, there are blogs, podcasts, ex-Mormon groups and lots of people are leaving the church. I wish my extensive Mormon family would leave.

I’m so grateful to you. If I hadn’t left the church it’s possible my children would have gone on missions and/or married in the church. When I left I felt an urgency as I didn’t want the church carried into another generation. My fourth child officially left the church when he dated (later married) the daughter of an Anglican Church minister.

Thank you, thank you, thank you.

February 2017: I owe to you and your late husband Jerald Tanner much of what I’ve learned about the “untruth” of the LDS church. Your book “The Changing World of Mormonism” was INDEED a terrific eye-opener to me. I shed tears, I suffered a great deal! But I am thankful to both of you for the freedom my immediate family and I enjoy nowadays. It’s been seven years I’ve officially renounced my membership in the church. It’s been indeed the VERY BEST decision I’ve ever taken in my life, after 30 long years! Thank you for your book!

[The Changing World of Mormonism, is posted on our web site: utlm.org/onlinebooks/changecontents.htm]

March 2017: Great talking with you the other day. I’ve downloaded M.T. Lamb’s book [The Golden Bible] and am going through that—very interesting.

I did some math [on the weight of the Book of Mormon plates, see www.utlm.org/newsletters/no105.htm ] and I thought I’d share it with you.

If the plates were tumbaga as some have claimed, and realizing that the ratios for tumbaga varied widely, at a ratio of 77% copper and 23% gold, they’d still weigh as much as your 100% lead plates that you have. Further, the lifting of your plates while certainly difficult, is made somewhat easier by the wood base under which one can place their hands and get a good grip. By themselves, the plates would be much harder to manage—finger strength becomes an issue in holding them.

Anyway, just thought I’d share that math with you. :)

Thanks again for your time the other day.

March 2017: In my self-righteous zeal, and fear instilled in me by the church to not seek out “anti-Mormon” materials, all my life, I used to avoid your site like the plague, believing it was anti-Mormon of the worst degree. How wrong I was! I find myself watching Youtube videos of interviews with you, as well as visiting your site often.

I can’t imagine the courage it has taken for you and your husband to have stepped up to the plate to make materials available to Mormons who are seeking truth. It makes me mad that I have been lied to by my church, all my life, in some degree or other. Where was the honesty, the integrity, the holding to God’s word?

It makes me mad that I brought up my nine children to believe in the Book of Mormon, sent two on foreign missions, and served in many capacities in the church and often nearly killing myself off in fulfilling callings.

Service opportunities and such, in the church, made me who I am today, and it wasn’t all trial and tribulation. But I see that even such good things we do, do not buy our way into heaven. So many years of constantly wondering if this or that “good” thing I did would get God’s notice and earn me points. How vain I have been.

I’m grateful for the thorough documentation you and other historians have done on Mormonism. There is no doubt in my mind that I have been, as it says in the South Pacific movie, “carefully taught”—another gospel Paul warned against doing if an angel should come and deliver other than what Christ taught and gave us. It is obvious that an angel did come that delivered another gospel, with another way to heaven by our own efforts of our own fleshly works instead of softened hearts with Christ’s law of love written on them.

This October the LDS Church celebrated its 187th Semiannual Conference without 90-year-old president Thomas S. Monson in attendance. Monson, who was appointed to the council of Twelve Apostles in 1963, became the sixteenth president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in 2008. After a couple of years of deteriorating health, it was announced on May 23, 2017, that “Because of limitations incident to his age, President Monson is no longer attending meetings at the Church offices on a regular basis. He communicates and confers with his counselors on matters as needed.”

Many people are surprised to learn that upon Monson’s death the office of prophet/president will pass to 93-year-old Russell M. Nelson, the senior apostle. But why not appoint a younger man? The answer to this requires a bit of digging into LDS church history.

During Joseph Smith’s lifetime there were a number of possible successors to the office of president. Historian D. Michael Quinn observed “by the summer of 1844 [following the death of Joseph Smith] there was no explicit outline of presidential succession in print.”

Part of the problem was that through the 1830s and early 1840s Joseph Smith had rearranged his leadership offices and designated various leaders as his successor. With no clear instructions as to a successor to Smith, many laid claim to the title due to either importance of their particular office or special ordination.

While today’s Mormonism has a well-developed hierarchal system, with a president/prophet and two counselors who oversee twelve apostles and dozens of Seventies, such was not the case at the beginning. In the Articles and Covenants, dated June of 1830, Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery, a former rod worker and one of the Book of Mormon witnesses, were appointed apostles and elders, sharing jointly in directing the fledgling church. The church minutes for June 9, 1830, show that the church offices were elders, priests and teachers, following the pattern laid out in the Book of Mormon.

Soon Hiram Page, a former money-digger and one of the eight witnesses to the Book of Mormon, started claiming revelations through his own seer stone, thus presenting a rival to Smith’s authority. This led to Smith issuing a revelation in September of 1830 that only Joseph Smith was to receive revelations for the church “for he receiveth them even as Moses.” The revelation goes on to instruct Oliver Cowdery to inform Hiram Page “that those things which he [Hiram] hath written from that stone are not of me, and that satan deceiveth him.”

In 1830 there was no concept of a First Presidency with two counselors, or the Melchizedek and Aaronic Priesthood. These ideas developed over the next few years. D. Michael Quinn explains:

A closer look at contemporary records indicates that men were first ordained to the higher priesthood over a year after the church’s founding. No mention of angelic ordinations can be found in original documents until 1834-35. Thereafter accounts of the visit of Peter, James, and John by Cowdery and Smith remained vague and contradictory.

The distance between traditional accounts of LDS priesthood beginnings and the differing story of early documents points to retrospective changes made in the public record to create a story of logical and progressive development. For example, as now published in Doctrine and Covenant 68:15 a revelation of November 1831 referred to “the Melchizedek Priesthood.” However, the original text of the 1831 revelation did not contain that priesthood phrase which was a retroactive addition in 1835.

Quinn further explains “The traditional account of church origins, which assumes that Smith encountered Peter, James, and John sometime in 1829, also claims that at the church’s organization in April 1830 those ordained ‘elders’ were ordained on that date and received the Melchizedek priesthood. A closer look at the evidence demonstrates that they were in fact re-ordained [later] and that no concept of higher priesthood existed. The office of elder was at first associated with what would come to be known as the lesser (or Aaronic) priesthood.”

The ordination of the original LDS apostles occurred in 1835, five years after the founding of Smith’s church. Although their ranking was done by age, the current seniority system, based on when they were ordained an apostle, developed after Joseph Smith’s death. However, in the early church simply being an apostle was not considered the path to become president of the church.

The changing claims of priesthood, apostleship, High Councils and First Presidency over the fourteen years Joseph Smith led the church left the Mormons with a number of competing claims of authority after Smith’s death on June 27, 1844.

Possible Successors to Smith

1. Oliver Cowdery

At the founding of Joseph Smith’s church in 1830 Oliver Cowdery, Smith’s main scribe in the production of the Book of Mormon, was called to be Second Elder and Smith was to be First Elder, as recorded in Doctrine and Covenants 20:2-3. This placed Cowdery next to Smith in authority.

As others were given various callings in the coming years, Cowdery’s position became less clear. But on December 5, 1834, Smith reaffirmed Cowdery as standing next to him in authority. D. Michael Quinn explained “Smith conferred on him [Cowdery] an office which further complicated the lines of authority. On 5 December 1834 Smith ordained Cowdery to the office of assistant president of the high priesthood to assist in presiding over the Church, and bearing the keys of this kingdom.’ Cowdery’s understanding was that he would not be subordinate to the current first and second counselors.”16 However, with Cowdery’s apostasy in 1838, his claim to succession was no longer considered valid.

2. SIDNEY RIGDON

The concept of a First Presidency gradually developed with the 1832 appointment of Sidney Rigdon, former preacher, and Jesse Gause, former Shaker, as counselors to Joseph Smith. After Gause left the church, Smith reorganized the presidency in 1833 and appointed Frederick G. Williams to replace Gause. This also required changing the name of Gause to Williams in the D&C sec. 81 revelation. Sidney Rigdon was appointed to be “equal with thee [Joseph Smith] in holding the keys of this last kingdom.”17

Rigdon was not always in agreement with Smith, but by 1841 his standing seemed to improve. In June of 1841 the Times and Seasons reported that “Sidney Rigdon has been ordained a Prophet, Seer and Revelator,” reinforcing his position as first counselor to Smith.18 However, the next year Rigdon and Smith were once again in conflict due to Smith’s overtures to Rigdon’s daughter, Nancy, to marry him in polygamy.19 His standing improved when Smith decided to run for President of the United States in the next election and Rigdon was chosen as his running mate. In fact, the reason Rigdon was not in Illinois when Smith was killed was because of Rigdon’s need to establish residency in Pennsylvania in order to qualify as Smith’s running mate.20

When Rigdon arrived in Nauvoo, over a month after Smith’s murder, the church leaders were still in a quandary as to who should lead the church. Rigdon, as assistant president, felt he was the rightful successor. There followed a number of meetings with Rigdon and Brigham Young presenting their claims to the leadership. However, Smith’s inner circle feared Rigdon’s opposition to their secret polygamist activities.

Richard Van Wagoner observed “On the public record, Smith and the Quorum of the Twelve denied polygamy.

At the time of Smith’s death, he and at least twenty-nine other known polygamous males in Nauvoo, including the Twelve, had married a total of 114 women. Many more would contract polygamous marriages before the main body of Saints trekked west. . . . Rigdon viewed spiritual wifery and the smokescreen that concealed it as reprehensible, less to do with God’s work than the affairs of men.”21

3. DAVID WHITMER

In July of 1834 David Whitmer, one of the three Book of Mormon witnesses, was appointed by Smith to be President of the High Council in Missouri. Four years later Joseph Smith gave “a history of the ordination of David Whitmer, which took place in July 1834, to be a leader or a prophet to this Church, which (ordination) was on conditions that he (J. Smith jr) did not live to God himself.”22

D. Michael Quinn observed:

Whitmer’s ordination as successor was known to only a few in Missouri, and news of this most important appointment was not published in the Church periodical at the headquarters in Kirtland, Ohio. The fact that Whitmer was excommunicated from the Church in 1838 for apostasy removed his name as a possible successor, but did not alter an important development in the succession question. Joseph Smith had established precedent for ordaining men to the highest offices of the Church without prior common consent and without immediate public knowledge.23

After Smith’s death in 1844, William E. McLellin, former member of the twelve apostles, appealed to David Whitmer to embrace his right to succeed Joseph Smith based on the 1834 calling. Quinn tells that on September 6, 1847, “William E. McLellin and Book of Mormon witnesses John Whitmer, Jacob Whitmer, and Hiram Page ordain David Whitmer as ‘Prophet, Seer, and Revelator, and Translator’ for the church organized at Kirtland in February.”24 This splinter group, named after the original 1830 Church of Christ, only lasted a few years.

Then in the 1870s Whitmer tried to restart the Church of Christ. While David Whitmer maintained his testimony of the Book of Mormon throughout his life, he never rejoined the LDS Church. And until his death in 1888 he believed Smith had gone astray shortly after the publishing of the Book of Mormon:

If you believe my testimony to the Book of Mormon, if you believe that God spake to us three witnesses by his own voice, then I tell you that in June, 1838, God spake to me again by his own voice from the heavens and told me to “separate myself from among the Latter Day Saints, for as they sought to do unto me, so it should be done unto them.”

Since David Whitmer had left the main body of Mormons in 1838 and never returned, his earlier ordination was considered null and void.

4. Joseph Smith III

Joseph Smith III was only eleven years old at the time of his father’s death. While some believed he was the heir apparent, his age kept people from pressing the succession claim until he came of age. Historian Roger Launius explained:

From the perspective of the Reorganized Church, there can be little doubt that Joseph Smith Jr. believed in the right of lineage, as “Old Testament” an idea as ever there was, and numerous statements abound about this particular aspect of his belief system. An 1835 revelation to Joseph Smith Jr. proclaimed lineal priesthood: “The order of this priesthood was confirmed to be handed down from father to son, and rightly belongs to the literal descendants of the chosen seed, to whom the promises were made.” In 1841 he announced another revelation making a direct statement about the favored position of his own descendants: “In thee and in thy seed shall the kindred of the earth be blessed.”

Perhaps no issue has been more controversial than presidential succession in the Latter-day Saint movement. Joseph Smith III, son of the Mormon founder, buttressed his ascension to the presidency of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in 1860 through several methodologies. One of those, and a powerful one for many Mormons of the nineteenth century, was Smith’s legitimacy based on lineal priesthood succession.

5. David Smith-youngest son of Joseph

According to D. Michael Quinn:

Smith’s intentions for his unborn son David rivaled his succession ordinances for Joseph III. Brigham Young said that in the spring of 1844 Smith told him: “I shall have a son born to me, and his name shall be called David; and on him, in some future time, will rest the responsibility that now rests upon me.” Young added that Smith made this statement to Young and several others.

Quinn also explained that in “April 1844 Smith prophesied that his son would succeed him and would become ‘president and king of Israel.’ The child was named David. Needless to say, he never became ‘president and king of Israel.’ Nor did he succeed his father. He died in 1904 at the age of 60, after spending the last 27 years of his life in an insane asylum.”

Joseph’s widow, Emma Smith, raised her sons with the firm assertion that their father never taught or practiced polygamy, thus making them unacceptable to the Utah Mormons.

6. Hyrum Smith, Joseph’s brother

Due to Oliver Cowdery’s apostasy in 1838 he lost his calling as Assistant President. The position was not filled until January of 1841 when Joseph appointed Hyrum Smith, his older brother to be Assistant President:

And from this time forth I appoint unto him [Hyrum] that he may be a prophet, and a seer, and a revelator unto my church, as well as my servant Joseph; That he may act in concert also with my servant Joseph; and that he shall receive counsel from my servant Joseph, who shall show unto him the keys whereby he may ask and receive, and be crowned with the same blessing, and glory, and honor, and priesthood, and gifts of the priesthood, that once were put upon him that was my servant Oliver Cowdery.31

Joseph Smith’s revelation also announced Hyrum’s calling as “Patriarch” to fill the vacancy left by the death of Joseph Smith’s father. However, Hyrum’s death at Carthage changed everything. Quinn observed:

On 15 June 1844, less than two weeks before his death, Hyrum Smith signed an announcement as “HYRUM SMITH, President of the Church.” A few months later, Brigham Young remarked “Did Joseph ordain any man to take his place? He did. Who was it? It was Hyrum, but Hyrum fell a martyr before Joseph did. If Hyrum had lived he would have acted for Joseph.”32

7. SAMUEL H. SMITH, JOSEPH’S BROTHER

Samuel Smith was one of the eight witnesses to the Book of Mormon, a founding member of the LDS Church and early missionary. William Clayton, Joseph Smith’s trusted secretary, recorded in his 1844 journal the various meetings by the top leadership as they tried to resolve the succession question after Joseph and Hyrum’s murder. Then on July 12, 1844, Clayton wrote “Joseph has said that if he and Hyrum were taken away Samuel H. Smith would be his successor.”33 However, there was opposition to appointing a successor until all of the apostles were convened in Nauvoo. Samuel’s efforts to press his claim ended on July 30, 1844, a month after Joseph and Hyrum’s death, when he became violently ill and died.

Some in the Smith family felt he had been poisoned to stop his appointment as president of the church. Quinn explains: “William [Smith] eventually concluded that Apostle Willard Richards asked [Hosea] Stout to murder Samuel H. Smith. The motive was to prevent Samuel from becoming church president before the full Quorum of Twelve arrived.34 Quinn went on to speculate that “Samuel was dead, possibly a murder victim of the succession crisis.”35

8. WILLIAM MARKS

While William Marks, president of the Nauvoo High Council, did not make a claim to be Smith’s successor, Joseph’s widow Emma pushed for him to be appointed trustee in trust for the church. With her husband dead she found herself in dire financial straits. Historian John S. Dinger explains:

When Joseph died, his financial situation was not sound. It was difficult to determine what property and debts were Joseph’s and what were the church’s . . . .

Just as Emma feared, the church owned the assets, while she was liable for the debts. Because she was left with a young family and was pregnant, it is no surprise she pushed for leadership whom she could trust and who could help her out of her financial mess.

Because Emma was also an ardent opponent of polygamy, any trustee she pushed for must be the same. In this view she had many allies. One was William Marks, who rejected the doctrine after hearing it officially taught on August 12, 1843, in a high council meeting.36

Dinger explains why Marks could have made a claim for leadership.

While Marks is not usually brought up today when discussing the succession “crisis,” he was initially one of the most likely options. First, he was one of the highest-ranking church leaders alive at the time. Joseph Smith revealed in 1835 that the high council of Zion (which was the Nauvoo High Council) was equal in authority to both the First Presidency and the Twelve Apostles. However equal, the high council was the “cornerstone of Zion,” while the Twelve Apostles were a “traveling high council.” Thus, it could be argued that Marks should have presided in Nauvoo and the twelve in the periphery. Second, it could be argued that Marks’s standing in the Quorum of the Anointed was greater than that of other claimants. Marks was one of the first to be anointed (as was Brigham Young), but he was also the first non-Smith to receive his second anointing. Finally, Marks outranked all other claimants in the Council of Fifty, which used a seniority system according to William Clayton. Marks was the tenth most senior member of the council, outranking both Brigham Young and Sidney Rigdon.37

Those favoring the Twelve’s leadership gradually moved Marks out of authority, and raised questions about his loyalty. Then in December of 1844 the high council demanded he sign a document in support of the Twelve and opposing Rigdon’s claims to leadership. Even after this capitulation Marks continued to experience harassment and theft of property as rumors spread that he was trying to undermine the Twelve. He and his family fled Nauvoo in March of 1845 and eventually joined the Strangites, later affiliating with the RLDS Church in 1859.

9. JAMES J. STRANG

Thirty-year-old James J. Strang first encountered the Mormons in Wisconsin Territory during the summer of 1843. Then in February of 1844 he journeyed to Nauvoo, Illinois, to meet Joseph Smith. Historian William D. Russell observed:

Apparently Strang liked what he saw in Nauvoo, as he was baptized by the prophet on 25 February and was ordained an elder by Hyrum a week later . . . In the course of their discussions with Joseph Smith, James Strang and Aaron Smith suggested that a stake of Zion be established in the area of the White River in Wisconsin. Smith suggested that Strang investigate the situation and send him a report.

In May Strang sent his favorable report to Smith. Strang claimed that in response to his letter, Joseph Smith sent a letter appointing Strang as his successor. William D. Russell wrote:

According to Strang, Smith answered the letter on 18 June, ten days before his murder. Called by Strangites “the letter of appointment,” its postmark is of 19 June. Strang claimed to have received it at Burlington, Wisconsin, on 9 July, some twelve days after Smith’s death, but before word of his death had reached the Saints in Wisconsin. Considerable controversy ensued over this claim. . . . Brigham Young labeled the letter “a lie—a forgery—a snare.”

While Brigham Young had been a top leader in the LDS movement since the early 1830s and was head of the Twelve Apostles, he lacked the charisma of Strang and made no claim to special revelation. William D. Russell explains:

Baptized into the Mormon church by Smith himself only four months before the prophet’s death in June 1844, Strang was nonetheless able to make a believable claim that he was Joseph’s legitimate successor by producing a letter purported to be from Smith, by claiming a vision in which Smith ordained him, by publishing revelations which he had received, and by unearthing plates and translating them, reminiscent of Smith’s Book of Mormon. These were claims which Brigham Young could not make to buttress his assertion that he was Joseph’s legitimate successor.

The fact that Strang initially denounced polygamy helped to win over a number of prominent Mormons, including several from the Smith family, who did not accept Brigham Young’s claim. According to Russell, “His [Strang] biggest catches were William Smith, apostle and younger brother of the martyred leader; the prophet’s mother, Lucy Mack Smith; Apostle John E. Page; George Miller, who had been the presiding bishop at Nauvoo; and William Marks, president of the Nauvoo Stake.”

According to Robin Jensen:

Mormons did not join Strang simply because they rejected plural marriage, Brigham Young and the Twelve, or the way west, although part or all of the above were likely factors in their decision. In other words, Mormons were not simply looking for a negative reason to reject the leadership of the Twelve; they also were legitimately attracted to Strang’s version and interpretation of Mormonism.

While thousands joined Strang’s movement, there were many who left after he openly embraced the doctrine of polygamy in 1850. Russell explains, “Included in those who defected are some key leaders in the development of the Reorganized Church, including Jason W. Briggs, Zenas H. Gurley Sr., and Henry H. Deam.”

Strang died in 1856 without appointing a successor. His dying admonition was “for every man to take care of his family and do the best he could, till he found out what to do.” According to Vickie Cleverley Speek, “Strang’s death set up a succession void that would eventually cause most of his scattered flock to join Joseph Smith III’s Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (now known as the Community of Christ).”

10. Brigham Young

The two main contenders in Nauvoo for leadership after Smith’s death were Sidney Rigdon, the last surviving member of the First Presidency but who opposed plural marriage, and Brigham Young, president of the Twelve Apostles and husband to several secret plural wives. The struggle was much more than determining authority claims. Also at issue was whether or not one accepted Joseph Smith’s recent secret teachings on polygamy, Second Anointing, Council of Fifty, and the political Kingdom of God.48

Brigham Young, as president of the Council of Twelve, wisely sidestepped the issue of appointing a new prophet and directed attention to the authority of the Twelve to preside over the church after Smith’s murder. Mormons today assume the right of the Twelve to appoint the president, yet this was not the understanding at the time of Smith’s death. Under Joseph the Twelve had jurisdiction in the branches, which were outside the established areas of the church, and the Presidency and High Council had oversight of the stakes.49

According to Quinn:

If written revelation alone governed the post-martyrdom situation, then the Quorum of Twelve had authority only over scattered branches of the church . . . Young rightly told Mormons in August 1844 that the Quorum of Twelve “stand next to Joseph,” but he did not remind them that the Nauvoo Stake high council also stood “next to Joseph.” At church headquarters before June 1844, no quorum or echelon of authority separated the First Presidency from the high council’s jurisdiction over Mormons.50

A First Presidency

Most Mormons today probably assume that the First Presidency, with a president and two counselors, overseeing the Twelve Apostles, was always the pattern. However, history shows that this hierarchal order was not established until Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball and Willard Richards were voted in as the LDS First Presidency.53 This also helped set the precedence of appointing the next president of the church by apostolic seniority.

According to Quinn:

In reality since 1844 the organized First Presidency has always been an apostolic presidency. Since 1844 the senior apostle in rank within the Quorum of the Twelve, based first on age and later on length of service in the

For those attuned to this manifestation, it was a compelling sign that the apostles should lead the church. However, not everyone present at the August 1844 conference experienced this manifestation. About twenty people voted against the apostles. Most accepted the calm logic of the apostles without seeing a miraculous transfiguration of Young. Some voted for the apostles but had second thoughts later . . .

In August 1844 Latter-day Saints actually voted to sidestep the succession question. There were too many unresolved succession claims for various men to be the sole successor to Smith. The church membership simply voted to defer that question by turning to the Quorum of Twelve Apostles to “act in their place.”51

During the months following Smith’s death Sidney Rigdon, William Marks and James J. Strang were excommunicated, thus limiting their influence in the church.

Then on December 5, 1847, Brigham Young called a meeting of the apostles at Orson Hyde’s cabin in Iowa to formalize his position as President of the church. According to Gary James Bergera:

He [Brigham Young] wanted to resolve the thorny issue once and for all. In what proved to be a marathon meeting, any who had questioned the wisdom and necessity of forming a new First Presidency changed their minds. By meeting’s end the Twelve voted unanimously to sustain Young as president of the church and to allow him to organize a First Presidency and select his two counselors.52

The Vote

On August 8, 1844, a meeting was called in Nauvoo to hear the arguments for leadership. Rigdon and Young both addressed the members, each presenting their particular claim for oversight of the church. Rigdon put forward his right to govern based on personal revelation and his standing as the only survivor of the First Presidency. Young argued that the Twelve were the rightful leaders by rank and by steadfast service. As he spoke, some felt that he was transfigured and took on the appearance and sound of Smith, thus showing God’s approval of him.

quorum, has been president of the church. As Wilford Woodruff stated in a letter of 28 March 1887: “The President of the Twelve is really the President of the Church by virtue of his office as much while presiding over the Twelve Apostles as while presiding over his two counselors.” The church has experienced an unbroken apostolic interregnum since 1844.54

Brigham Young’s Sons

A seldom mentioned event in early Mormon history is Brigham Young’s ordination of three of his sons to be apostles. With the move to apostolic seniority according to date of ordination Brigham Young may have hoped that by ordaining his sons at an early age it would give them seniority among the apostles and hopefully set the stage for one of them to advance to church president.

According to Todd Compton, “On November 22, 1855, eleven-year-old John Willard Young, son of Brigham Young received his endowments, undoubtedly accompanied by his father. . . . following the endowment—President Young placed his hands on the head of his son and ordained him an apostle. . . . About eight years later, Brigham Young ordained two more of his sons [Joseph Angell Young and Brigham Young Jr.] apostles in a private ceremony.”55 In 1864 they were set apart “as assistant counselors to the First Presidency.” However, they were not placed into the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles at the time of their ordination or calling as assistants to the First Presidency. This later raised the question of Brigham Young Jr’s seniority in the Twelve—should he be ranked by the date of his ordination as an apostle or by the later date of his entrance into the actual Quorum? In 1900 this was resolved by ranking him according to his entrance into the Quorum, which put Joseph F. Smith, Joseph Smith’s nephew, ahead of him. Thus when Pres. Lorenzo Snow died in 1901 Joseph F. Smith became the next president instead of Brigham Young Jr., who died two years later.56

Orson Pratt’s Problems with Seniority

Two of the original apostles ordained in 1835, Orson Hyde and Orson Pratt, had problems with church leadership and were removed from their positions. During the late 1830s Hyde had a number of disagreements with the leaders and was put out of the Twelve for several months, but was reinstated in 1839.57

Orson Pratt’s problems centered around Joseph’s new teaching on polygamy. Sometime after Pratt’s return from his mission to England in 1841 his wife informed him that Joseph Smith had requested her to become his plural wife. This so outraged Pratt that he left the church. While some question the reliability of Sarah Pratt, it is clear that Joseph Smith did approach other apostles about marrying their wives. Pratt was dropped from the Quorum in 1842 and Amasa Lyman was ordained to take his place. Then in 1843 Pratt was reconciled with Smith, accepted plural marriage, and was reinstated to his former position as an apostle.58

Hyde and Pratt’s standing became an issue in 1875 when the leaders were trying to resolve issues of seniority. Should Hyde and Pratt be listed apostles by their date of original ordination or by the dates of their reinstatement? Many years before, Joseph Smith had stated that they were to be admitted back into the Quorum and given their original place in seniority. But now the apostles questioned this position. It was resolved by placing them in seniority according to the dates of their reinstatement.59 This meant that John Taylor would become president following Brigham Young’s death, rather than Orson Pratt.

Seniority or Retirement

Another challenge to senior apostolic succession came in 1970. According to Quinn:

In the last years of his presidency David O. McKay was so impaired by injury, stroke, and medication that five counselors were needed in the First Presidency. McKay’s biographer, a secretary to the First Presidency, notes that when the second-ranked apostle Joseph Fielding Smith became one of the extra counselors in October 1965, “he was then in his ninetieth year, [which] made it impossible for Elder Smith to carry much of the administrative load of the First Presidency.”60

By going to a pattern of apostolic seniority the church has gone from being led by relatively young men to senior citizens. Brigham Young was ordained as an apostle in 1835 at the age of 34, then at the age of 46 he became president of the church and was 76 when he died. There followed a three year gap in the office before John Taylor, at age 72, was formally appointed president. Since 1887, when Wilford Woodruff became the LDS president at age 82, most of the presidents of the LDS Church have been in their 80s or 90s.

At present the senior apostle, Russell M. Nelson, is 93 and appears to be in good health. Upon the death of President Monson, if the usual protocol is followed, Nelson will be the next president of the LDS Church. Apostle Nelson is evidently a firm believer in celestial plural marriage. Having outlived his first wife, his second marriage was solemnized in the temple. Thus, according to LDS doctrine he will be a polygamist in heaven.

If Nelson were to die before Monson then Dallin H. Oaks, age 85, would become the next president. He, like Nelson, outlived his first wife and remarried in the LDS temple, thus putting him in the same category as Nelson of looking forward to living polygamy in the hereafter.

Some have questioned the wisdom of continuing the current system. One way to keep apostolic seniority and yet allow for younger men to advance would be to offer aged apostles the option of retirement. However, there doesn’t seem to be any movement in this direction. In 1978 the church instituted a policy that gave emeritus status to the First Quorum of Seventy at the age of 70, but not to the apostles.

Upon the death of a church president his two counselors revert back to their seniority positions among the apostles and the next president will usually pick his two counselors from that list. With the death of LDS Apostle Robert D. Hales in October of 2017 and not counting President Monson, the ranks of the apostles have been reduced to thirteen. A new apostle, to replace Robert D. Hales, will be announced at the April 2018 LDS annual conference. Below is a listing of the current apostles according to seniority.

Historian Todd Compton gave this summary of the development of apostolic succession:

It was not delivered to the church in final form, neatly packaged and immediately recognized. It developed through a system that might be called creative trial and error. It moved through four distinct stages, from (1) age within group in the original Twelve, to (2) age combined with group date of ordination/entrance in the Quorum, to (3) date of ordination (the standard throughout most of the nineteenth century), to, finally, at the dawn of the twentieth century, (4) date of entrance into the Quorum and public sustaining.

TRUSTEE IN TRUST

The LDS Church is registered as a corporation sole with the state of Utah. Under the name of Corporation of the President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, all of the LDS Church assets are under the control of the president of the church as Trustee in Trust. Unlike other churches, there are no voting members and no disclosure of its finances. While the appointment of a new president may not happen immediately on the death of the previous one, the transfer of Trustee in Trust of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints will pass to the senior apostle. If someone besides the senior apostle were to be appointed president, the senior apostle would then transfer the office of Trustee in Trust to him.

Is It Biblical?

Traditionally, Mormon literature has emphasized that the true church would have twelve apostles and a first presidency patterned after the Gospels. However, we have seen that when Mormonism was founded in 1830 it did not have a First Presidency or twelve apostles. Instead, Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery were First and Second Elders over the church. The concept of a First Presidency presiding over the Twelve Apostles was a later addition. As for the Bible, Peter, James and John were part of the twelve, not in addition to them. Also, the original twelve were witnesses to the entire ministry of Jesus and his resurrection (Acts 1:20-26). When the apostles met after Jesus’ death they chose a replacement for Judas from two men who met this criteria. As the years passed there would no longer be someone who could qualify as a witness to all of Christ’s ministry. Although there were people other than the twelve who were referred to as apostles in the book of Acts, there is no indication that they were ever accepted as replacements for the original twelve. Indeed, there is no expectation recorded in the New Testament that a body of twelve apostles needed to be perpetuated after the original twelve had passed on.67

March 2017: Thank you for your thoughtful answers to my questions. I am still struggling, I suppose to let go of my fleshy nature and trust in God. It’s so hard to have my mind renewed to get rid of the “self” control one I have basically had over my life and let go and let God reign. I basically need a mind transplant, after 60 years of seeing through the lens of Mormonism. Christian beliefs are ever so much more simple than the complicated ins and outs of Mormonism. Christian truths are so clear and simple, that it is hard for the indoctrinated Mormon mind to grasp that all we need is Christ, and let go all the pride and self righteous works that elevate which one has held to for so many years. Thank you for taking time to steer me in the right direction. God bless.

March 2017: I just finished reading “The Changing World of Mormonism” which I found in a used book store. Well done. It is amazing to me—the honesty and sincerity evident in the Tanners’ work.

I was raised in the Mormon religion. Parents, grandparents and three great grandparents were all LDS. My great-grandfather migrated to Utah from England in 1863 as a Mormon convert from England.

In 1981 I was excommunicated from the LDS church while serving in the US Army in Germany. I wasn’t attending church and the local elders came by, also military men, and questioned me. They wanted to know if I supported the then President Kimball as a “prophet.” “What has he prophesied?” I responded. “Tell me one thing and I’ll say he’s a prophet.” They got angry, had their bishop’s court and excommunicated me in absentia as my military duties did not allow me to attend.

So, all those generations—over a 100 years of Mormonism—down the drain because I had the audacity to ask, “What has he prophesied?” It was an honest question as my reading of the Bible told me a true prophet can be determined from a false one by what he has prophesied. But even to be a false prophet, one has to prophesy something. (Just like to be considered a composer he has composed music, one has to compose something.)

I just bring this to your attention because I admire the chutzpah the Tanners have shown in asking similar questions and going full steam ahead with this.

I went on to convert to Judaism while in the Army and became very active in synagogue life, studying Hebrew in order to pray and read the Torah in Hebrew. I am especially glad that the Tanners were able to find a new way of faith as well.

[Editor: Our book, The Changing World of Mormonism, can be read on our web site.]

April 2017: I have also enjoyed listening to you via podcast. I started the process of leaving the church two months ago. It has been a rough road, including a peace bond against a member who was trying to forcibly convince me to stay. I am still going through the process of having my name removed from the Church records and believe even though it seems like a long process it will be worth it. . . . I really just wanted to thank you, Sandra, you are a gift from God. It does not go unnoticed.

April 2017: As you know, I sent in my resignation from the church Saturday. I did it through Quitmormon.com, which makes it easier. I filled out the form, and had to really go through the facts once again before pushing the submit button. Once I did, I was at peace.

After that, I accepted Jesus as my Savior. I am so grateful for His bringing me out of the LDS church, to truth. However, there is a lot of deprogramming to be done.

I attended two services yesterday. I am visiting the different churches . . . Still have a few more to visit. . . . I have been working through 8-10 books at once, to get me out of mormonism. Interestingly, it was not the Bible that I used to pull me out, but the LDS teachings, through their scriptures, prophets, doctrine, foundation, with some Bible verses. Now I need to focus on learning God’s word.

April 2017: It is too late for Jerald and it may be too late for you. You have led thousands astray many people astray and you have been led astray by Lucifer/The Devil/Satan, your MASTER!

RETURN into the Faith of your ancestors. There was a prophet of God in your ancestry and rather than continue your “ministry,” cease to persecute The Church led by Jesus and escape from apostate Christianity, both the children (Protestants, most of them) and the mother of Harlots The Great and Abominable Church aka The Catholic Church, who keep their members from the truth or be led to serve Satan by you, the daughter of lies, who leads you away from the True Church by your MASTER THE DEVIL!; AFTER A FALSE CHRIST, and another gospel far from the original Christian church, restored by God and angels thru Joseph the prophet and others. As Jesus said, your creeds are an abomination to Him. What will you do when you learn the truth and are sent to join Jerald in Spirit Prison, along with Ed Decker and Walter Martin? While Joseph The Seer and Brigham The American Moses are in Paradise sending missionaries unto others such as those you blinded and not unto such as you and Jerald, who have willfully rebelled and might even be A Son and A Daughter of Perdition! Repent, repent and don’t procrastinate the day of your repentance until it is everlastingly too late. The 2nd Coming of Jesus and the so-called cults, LDS, 7th Day Adventists and Jehovah’s Witness will be caught up into the Clouds while you are LEFT BEHIND and the real cults such as the Tanners, the Deckers and the Martin’s are revealed from the house-tops!!!!!!!

RESPECTFULLY . . . The Prophet Joseph Smith’s cousin, Who unlike you, is TRUE to Jesus’ Church

April 2017: I’m 32, and I’m still an active member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. A few years ago, I started having questions because there were some aspects of our history that didn’t seem to add up for me. I found your interviews with John Dehlin (Mormon Stories) which I found tremendously fascinating. I was in Salt Lake in December 2015. I purchased a copy of “Mormonism: Shadow or Reality.”

April 2017: Thanks so much for this Website [www.UTLM.org]. Ever since the Mormon Church purchased a major shopping mall in Utah I have become a little disillusioned with the direction of the Church. I have been inactive for a while now while I try and figure things out.
Three main questions persist with me. Why now nearly 200 years later were we told about Joseph Smith's 40 wives? Also, Has the Latter Day Saints Church now become a Tycoon Money making Empire which is totally against Gods Principles? Finally, the Prophet Paul says we Man has never seen God nor Is It possible to see Him. But Joseph Smith claims he did see God.

May 2017: I live in _____ England, joined the LDS Church in 1978 because of nothing more than an impulsive reaction. The message of the restored church of Jesus Christ sounded great at the time. I never had a 'spiritual' witness as to the truth of The Book of Mormon. In fact, every time I read The Book of Mormon I was aware that it was a nonsense book. I will say that the essays you have written and put on your website have opened up a whole new critical analysis on many points arising from the "Black Hole" in The Book of Mormon. You will have worked out that I no longer have any allegiance to the LDS Church and its doctrines. Thank you for your superb website and thank you for your dedication and perseverance to the truth in the heartland of Mormonism.

May 2017: In 1962, my late wife and I lived in “Zion,” Independence, Missouri. We were active second generation members of RLDS.

We were visited by two LDS missionaries, who were skilled to work in Independence, where RLDS members were already believers in many Mormon basics.

Basically, they dwelt on Joseph Smith’s origin of certain doctrines, that are not used and are denied by RLDS. We went to the RLDS history library in Independence and asked for some early publications of the Nauvoo period, but we were denied the use of these and others. So we ordered Publications from the Huntington Library and from your early sources. We bought a microfilm reader and ordered a lot of film from yours and other locations.

In short, we did not accept LDS membership, and we promptly exited the RLDS, because of the cover-up and their denial of the obvious.

We were shunned by most our friends. But our trauma was not as acute as some LDS member exits. RLDS was Mormonism-lite, and shortly after our exit, we were transferred out of the area.

Thank you for your services and continue your good work.

May 2017: I think that your ancestors might be sad and disappointed that their sacrifices for you to have been in vain. The pioneers who died on the way were valiant to the end. You are wasting away the days of your probation. Repent before it is too late!!! . . .

You are clever like Korihor, the Anti-Christ of Book of Mormon fame. I hope you don’t end up like him. I wish you all the best, after all, you are my sister. Repent ye, repent ye, for the day of reckoning is nigh and it may very well be in my lifetime or maybe even yours as well. Surely you do not want to be left behind, like those who will not heed the revelations about the Second Coming of our Savior, even Jesus Christ given in The Bible, The Book of Mormon and the teachings of each of the prophets of Jesus’ Latter Day Saints, in this, The Church of Jesus Christ.

May 2017: I didn’t see your stated compilation [on our web site]. But whatever doctrinal point of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints that you find contrary to your personal biblical interpretation, that is your prerogative, but you should move on with your life!

We only repeat what we believe The Savior stated to Joseph Smith, specifically as to which church to join when teenager Joseph was searching to join one of the existing Christian churches of his day, namely:

“I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong; and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt; that: “they draw near to me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me, they teach for doctrines the commandments of men, having a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof.” [LDS Pearl of Great Price]

So, one asks sincerely if The Lord spoke these words to Joseph. The answer comes depending on the profound sincerity and intention to learn of the petitioner. This message itself reveals that The Savior of the world is not happy with false creeds (not its members) that misrepresent Him and His doctrine.

May 2017: Thank you for your dedication to biblically attack every aspect of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints has embedded in it the mentality of “I’m right you’re wrong,” which is the message and ultimate goal of your website.

What you should espouse is personal sincere scripture study and sincere prayer and let the Spirit guide! This Spirit never leads the children of men to attacks and condemnation of others. I believe you already knew this!

May 2017: I have greatly admired the work you have selflessly done to bring the truth and the light of Christ to so many. You have been instrumental in helping me find the courage to altogether leave the LDS church. . . . My parents joined the church in Ireland and like many emigrated from Belfast to Canada . . . I grew up in the church, was married in the Salt Lake Temple, raised my five children in the church and held numerous callings, including gospel doctrine teacher and member of the high priest’s presidency. The usual. . . . I became acquainted with the work of Jerald and Sandra Tanner, Fawn Brodie, Richard Bushman, Michael Quinn, Dan Vogel, and Grant Palmer to mention a few.

Sandra, one might think that my faith crises would cause me a great deal of sadness and a feeling of loss. However, because the example of people like you, those who have left the church and discovered the true Christ; it has been a positive thing. . . . May God continue to bless you and keep you.

June 2017: After spending 2012-2013 investigating the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, I found my faith in Christ. I stepped away from the church knowing Jesus was more than a brother and so much more satisfying than all the romanticized proclamations, doctrine, or prophecies of the LDS church. . . .
Your ministry is one of the first resources I found as I questioned my faith. Thank you, thank you, thank you!

June 2017: You probably don’t remember me but we met at your book store back in Dec. . . . My wife and I have been lifelong temple going Mormons. We raised our four kids to be faithful Latter Day Saints. Our oldest daughter just returned from her mission earlier this year and she is still strong in her faith with the lds church.

Anyway to my story. Today we attended two services one Christian and the other lds. The only reason we went to the lds church was because our daughter asked us to attend her friends mission homecoming talk. What I found interesting was the Christian service was about Christ’s final words and Him paying our sin debt in full. There is nothing we can add to what He did for us. We learned that we can’t earn our way or contribute to what He did for us. In the lds service this elder gave his talk and shared a story about how we must do our part and endure to the end. Basically saved after all we can do. He went on to say that whatever we don’t get done Jesus will do the rest. But we must do our best.

I’m so thankful to have found God’s grace. It was an interesting comparison today. We are still learning every day and it is remarkable to us that the differences are so clear. I thank you and others in this movement for your knowledge and resources that are provided. I don’t think I could have made this transition without them. When I first started to question Mormonism I was well on my way to becoming agnostic. I praise God for showing me the way.

June 2017: I’m new to biblical Christianity but I am so grateful to learn about the true God. In January I was a very faithful and active super-mom. Then I confronted my husband when I saw he was collecting very old books on Mormon history and doctrine.
I had always thought our relationship was pretty close to perfect and completely honest. As it turned out, he had learned years ago about the truth of Mormonism but was too afraid to confront me because I was so incredibly invested and genuinely thought I would leave him over it. I was floored and upset, both that he “lost his testimony” and that he would hide something so big from me. Of course I’d never leave him. So out of respect I heard him out.

It was so painful and confusing to hear what he was saying.
Hours and hours per night after the kids went to bed, for at least a week. My brain at first would not let anything sink in. I rationalized it all away because that’s what I was trained to do, until one night I just broke and had an embarrassing core meltdown. For months the issues paralyzed and consumed me. I was less of the wife and mom than I should have been. My mind was always elsewhere. I cried and prayed and read . . . During this ordeal my sweet husband would ask me, “would you rather not have known?” And though I was never bitter toward him my answer was consistently “yes.” I was happy and familiar with life as a Mormon. And now it’s all gone. I didn’t mean to hurt him with my answer but being honest is a big deal to me, so there it was.

But today is a very big day for me. This is the text I sent to my wonderful husband. “When I thought I was happy as a Mormon, now I am both happy and free. Being healed by my savior through his love as I really come to know him and his teachings. I can’t get enough of the bible. I feel so clear. There is no longer a shelf that I put contradictory teachings of the gospel on. Now I follow the pure gospel of Jesus.”

June 2017: Thank you so much for teaching truth in regards to the Mormon Church. And, I thank God you know Jesus Christ. After five months of requesting my name be taken off the membership rolls it is finally completed! I celebrate this! More importantly
I celebrate the true Jesus and His love for me. Now I attend a Bible and Christ believing and teaching church. Thank you for your help and being a blessing to me.

June 2017: I met you in July of 2016. I drove from ______ to your bookstore. When I arrived you were in a meeting with two gentlemen. You asked me how you could help me and I told you in front of them I had just finished listening to your Mormon Stories podcast. I was unsure why I was there in your bookstore other than I knew I had to meet you for myself and I had found for myself the history of the church wasn’t what I thought it was. The two gentlemen smiled almost knowingly as if they understood very well what was happening to me.

You spent the next hour or so answering all questions I had about the Mormon church. You answered until I said I was done. I believe you would have sat with me till the evening had
I asked for it.

Since our visit much has occurred. Much of it has to do with the impression upon meeting you. You were the first ex-mormon
I met. You are more genuine than all the local and the few general leaders I have met all put together.

Since this time I began a sacrament-only attendance in September of 2016, I stopped attending church all together in November, and I resigned my membership in March of this year.
I sent in my paperwork to quitmormon.com on my birthday, ______. Best present ever. I simply want to thank you for the part you played in freeing me from a real estate corporation.
Thank you for your time that day.

July 2017: I remember very clearly the first time I saw your book, [Mormonism] Shadow or Reality, Sandra. I was in the library of the Presbyterian church downtown. I was with a friend and I started reading and I kept saying, “Is this true?” It’s the first time all of my bad feelings about Mormonism were vindicated. I was raised Mormon but hated it. Until I saw your book I always felt guilty—like there was something wrong with me.

July 2017: I would like to inform you that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has actively renounced polygamy and does not practice it and hasn’t for more than a hundred years. Though it does say it in what we call the Doctrines and Covenants, we do not believe it to be as correct as the Book of Mormon. Even though there are still sects of the church that still practice it, the church has said many times that they are not part of the church.

I would also ask you politely to please take down the section you play in your site that describes temple ordinances in detail. We believe them to be very sacred. Out of respect, we do not talk about them publicly.

Thank you for reading my feedback and (hopefully) making changes to show your unbiased view on the church.

September 2017: We were out at the prison last evening . . . and an older inmate said that he became a believer (about 10 years ago . . .) after seeing literature from Utah Lighthouse ministries!
(he had been LDS for many years . . .)
October 2017: I’m an Englishman who was brought up LDS but left Mormonism and became Christian in the late 90s, in the early days of internet outreach to Mormons. Your website and other materials, along with the support of Luke Wilson at Mormons in Transition (irr.org/mit) went a long way to guide me out of Mormonism and into faith in Jesus. For this, I thank you and praise God! It led to some difficult times, being the first of my family to confront these issues openly with my believing parents and it still can be uncomfortable twenty years later! But I know that I made the right choice, thanks to the work of you and others with the same heart to share real Christianity with Mormons (as well as the truth about LDS history).

At the age of 20, in 1998, having stopped believing in Mormonism and becoming a Christian a year earlier, I made my one and only trip to the USA and visited Utah and Wyoming. Obviously, I took the time to visit your bookstore and I bought a copy of No Man Knows My History (which I had to sneakily pass on to my brother because he had wanted a copy!) I’m sure you were in the store but I didn’t know for sure that it was you at that time. Now, having a better understanding of how your life of bringing truth to Mormons has gone, I wish I had stopped to talk to you properly, rather than just to pay for the book!! E-mailing you today is the next best thing I can do, nearly 20 years later!

So thank you for the work you and Jerald have done all these years. Who knows, I may have lived a life tied to the demands of the “God of Mormonism” otherwise! I admire your passion for getting the truth out to Mormons and for the life of service you have offered.

October 2017: I will put your name on the prayer role [of the LDS temple].

October 2017: Some years back, my life was changed after reading a Master Outline of the New Testament AND one of your books [I was married to a Mormon at the time], The Changing World of Mormonism. It is the most underlined book in my collection.

October 2017: I want to thank you, the more you bash the lds church the more I know it’s true. You are funny.

APOSTLES AND SEVENTIES DISCIPLINED SINCE 1900

John W. Taylor: Ordained apostle, age 25, 1884, resigned 1905, excommunicated 1911, died 1916, blessings restored posthumously 1965. Taylor was the son of LDS President John Taylor, third president of the LDS Church.

Both Taylor and Matthias F. Cowley were forced to resign in 1905 due to their continued practice and support of polygamy. “From 1900 until the disposition of the Smoot case in 1907, the Mormon question was again before the nation’s eyes. This burst of renewed inquiry was to reveal that not only had polygamous cohabitation continued but, more disturbing, the performance of new polygamous marriages, including some by apostles, had taken place as well.”

Matthias F. Cowley: Ordained apostle, age 39, 1897, resigned 1905, priesthood suspended 1911, restored 1936, died 1940. His son, Matthew Cowley, became an apostle in 1945.

(See John W. Taylor entry.)

Richard R. Lyman: Ordained apostle, age 47, 1918, excommunicated 1943, rebaptized 1954, died 1963.

Lyman evidently entered into a secret plural marriage. “This is first plural marriage of current general authority since 1905.” Son of Apostle Frances M. Lyman and his polygamist wife, Clara C. Callister.

George P. Lee: Sustained First Quorum of Seventy, age 32, 1975, excommunicated 1989, died 2010.

He was the first Native American to be made a Seventy. Lee charged the LDS authorities with being “vain men bent on dislodging Indians from their rightful place in Mormon theology.” He was later charged with sexual abuse of a minor. He also taught the doctrine of polygamy.

Paul H. Dunn: Sustained in Presidency of the First Quorum of the Seventy, age 52, 1976-1980, named emeritus General Authority in 1989 after being censured for telling false/exaggerated stories in his sermons. (See free book offer on back page.)

According to the Deseret News Dunn wrote, “They have censured me and placed a heavy penalty upon me. I accept their censure and the imposed penalty, and pledge to conduct my life in such a way as to merit their confidence and full fellowship.” Church spokesman Don LeE’vye said Saturday that the nature of the penalty is “an internal matter, and we don’t discuss such matters” publicly.

James J. Hamula: Sustained First Quorum of Seventy, age 51, 2008, excommunicated 2017.

While the LDS Church does not generally discuss the reasons for excommunication, according to the Deseret News it was made clear that “Tuesday’s action was not due to disillusionment or apostasy on the part of Hamula.” This would mean that it was for some form of moral lapse. In time, after sufficient repentance, Hamula would be able to rejoin the church.

BLACKS AND PRIESTHOOD:
40 YEARS LATER

“for the seed of Cain were black and had not place among them.”
Pearl of Great Price, Moses 7:22

“We have pleaded long and earnestly in behalf of these, our faithful brethren,” wrote Spencer W. Kimball in the announcement of June 8, 1978, when the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints lifted the ban on blacks holding their priesthood, now published as Official Declaration 2 in the Doctrine and Covenants.

According to KSL.com, on Friday, June 1, 2018, the LDS Church will hold a celebration of the 40th anniversary of granting priesthood to blacks. Along with a message from the First Presidency of the LDS Church, two famous black singers, Gladys Knight and Alex Boyé will be included in the event. Ms. Knight joined Mormonism in 1997 and Mr. Boyé has sung with the Mormon Tabernacle Choir.

Even though two or three blacks had been baptized and ordained to the priesthood during the lifetime of Joseph Smith this did not grant them access to the secret LDS temple rituals, thus barring them from the Mormon goal of eternal marriage and advancement to godhood.

ELIJAHABEL

The most well-known black to hold the priesthood during Smith’s lifetime was Elijah Abel, a Seventy, who moved to Utah territory with the pioneers. LDS historian Andrew Jenson made note of Abel’s ordination:

Abel, Elijah, the only colored man who is known to have been ordained to the priesthood . . . was ordained an elder March 3, 1836, and a seventy April 4, 1841, an exception having been made in his case with regard to the general rule of the church in relation to colored people.

Even though Elijah Abel was allowed to retain his priesthood and go on a mission after the Mormons came to Utah, he was not allowed to participate in the temple endowments. Historian Armand Mauss commented on the priesthood ban:

It was periodically reconsidered after Brigham Young’s death in 1877, usually in response to a petition from a black member or sympathizer. The first of these reconsiderations occurred as early as 1879, when Young’s successor, John Taylor, responded to a petition from Elijah Abel (the sole surviving black member to have received the priesthood) that he be admitted to the sacred temple rites of the church. Taylor’s consultations turned up a claim by two prominent local church leaders that in the mid-1830s they had heard Joseph Smith declare that Negroes could not be given the priesthood and that Abel was supposed to have been stripped of it before Smith died.

Taylor himself, though a contemporary of these witnesses and a close associate of Smith, could recall no such instruction. . . .

After that, each hearing and reconsideration by the church leadership simply brought another confirmation of the policy, so that by about 1920 there was an accumulation of precedents from previous leaders, as well as a rapidly receding institutional memory about the historical origins of the policy.4

Abel’s requests for temple ordinances were repeatedly denied. He died in 1884 and was buried in the Salt Lake City Cemetery. In 2002 a new headstone was placed on Elijah Abel’s grave.

When it was finally ready, Apostle M. Russell Ballard was asked to “dedicate the new headstone.” The Salt Lake Tribune reported on the event:

> Abel was born a slave in Maryland in 1808. At 23, he fled to Canada and obtained free papers. A year later, he moved to Ohio and met Joseph Smith . . . Abel joined in 1832, and Smith ordained him into the priesthood four years later. . . .

> Abel and his family joined the Mormon odyssey to Salt Lake City in 1852, among fewer than 100 black pioneers, and he helped construct the Salt Lake Temple.

> That same year, however, new church leader Young prohibited blacks from joining the faith’s all-male lay priesthood, a rule that would stand until Church President Spencer Kimball’s 1978 revelation. . . . The reason Young and other church leaders cited (and continued to cite for 126 years) was the Bible-based belief that blacks were descendants of the wicked Cain. . . . Young also sent Abel on several missions in his later years. When Abel petitioned Young’s successor, John Taylor, for his temple endowment, it was denied.5

Curiously, Abel’s son Enoch and grandson Elijah were also ordained to the priesthood in Logan, Utah, in the early 1900s.6

While Apostle Joseph Fielding Smith was aware that Elijah Abel had been ordained to the LDS priesthood he maintained that it was invalid. In a letter dated April 10, 1963, he wrote:

> According to the doctrine of the church, the Negro, because of some condition of unfaithfulness in the spirit—or pre-existence, was not valiant and hence was not denied the mortal probation, but was denied the blessing of the Priesthood. . . . It is true that elders of the church laid hands on a Negro and blessed him “apparently” with the Priesthood, but they could not give that which the Lord had denied. It is true that Elijah Abel was so “ordained.” This was however before the matter had been submitted to the Prophet Joseph Smith.7

Scriptural Racism

While Joseph Smith did not officially deny priesthood to blacks, his new scriptures laid the groundwork for the later racial position of the church. His Book of Mormon and Pearl of Great Price reflected the common view of race in America at that time: White people were the enlightened ones, bringing the message of salvation to the dark heathens of the land. The main storyline of the Book of Mormon covers approximately 600 BC to 421 AD, with the righteous, white Nephites continually battling the wicked, dark Lamanites. Historian Newell G. Bringhamhurst observed:

> Smith’s account of these ancient Americans incorporated racist concepts of nonwhite racial inferiority as contrasted with white racial superiority. Mormon racism was particularly evident in those Book of Mormon passages outlining the conflicts and divisions plaguing the Nephite nation.8

Bringhamhurst continues,

> Moreover, Laman, Lemuel, and their followers were cursed with a “skin of blackness” by “the Lord God” (2 Ne. 5:21-24). Thereafter they were known as Lamanites, “a dark, and loathsome, and filthy people full of idleness and all manner of abomination” (1 Ne. 12:23).

Yet the Book of Mormon held out the promise that when those Lamanites embraced the gospel “their curse was taken from them, and their skin became white like unto the Nephites” (3 Nephi 2:15).

Apostle Harold B. Lee explained:

> Their dark skin was a curse put upon them because of their transgression, which in a day to come in their descendants

7 Letter from Joseph Fielding Smith to Joseph H. Henderson, April 10, 1963; photo of letter in Curse of Cain? Appendix C.

Joseph Smith’s racial views also appear in the Book of Moses and Book of Abraham, part of the Pearl of Great Price. The Book of Moses relates that “the seed of Cain were black and had not place among them” (Moses 7:22), and the Book of Abraham refers to “Pharaoh being of that lineage by which he could not have the right of Priesthood” (Abraham 1:27).

This teaching was soon embraced by the leaders of the LDS Church. Apostle John Taylor, who went on to become the third president of the church, wrote in 1845:

> The descendants of Ham, besides a black skin which has ever been a curse that has followed an apostate of the holy priesthood, as well as a black heart, have been servants to both Shem and Japheth, and the abolitionists are trying to make void the curse of God, but it will require more power than man possesses to counteract the decrees of eternal wisdom.

After the Mormons migrated to what became Utah territory, on February 5, 1852, Brigham Young made denial of priesthood to blacks a rule of the church:

> If there never was a prophet or apostle of Jesus Christ spoke it before, I tell you, this people that are commonly called Negroes are the children of old Cain. I know they are. I know that they cannot bear rule in the priesthood, for the curse on them was to remain upon them, until the residue of the posterity of Michael and his wife receive the blessings, . . .

This same teaching was repeated by Brigham Young in 1859:

> Cain slew his brother . . . and the Lord put a mark upon him, which is the flat nose and black skin . . . . How long is that race [blacks] to endure the dreadful curse that is upon them? That curse will remain upon them, and they never can hold the Priesthood or share in it until all the other descendants of Adam have received the promises and enjoyed the blessings of the Priesthood and the keys thereof. Until the last ones of the residue of Adam’s children are brought up to that favourable position, the children of Cain cannot receive the first ordinances of the Priesthood. They were the first that were cursed, and they will be the last from whom the curse will be removed.

Sealed as a Servant to Joseph Smith

Jane Manning James, a black convert, is an example of how firm the church leaders were about denying temple ordinances to blacks. She claimed that while living with the Joseph Smith family in the 1843 time frame the Smiths had offered to have her sealed to them as part of their family, but not understanding what that meant, she declined. Years later, living in Utah as a faithful LDS member, she longed for an eternal family and repeatedly requested to be sealed to her husband and children but the leaders refused.

Jane then approached the leaders about being sealed to Joseph Smith, as Emma had suggested. The leaders finally offered to seal her “as a Servitor for eternity to the Prophet Joseph Smith.” According to the journal of Joseph Christenson, recorder in the Salt Lake temple, the ceremony was done on May 18, 1894:

> “Aunt Jane,” a negress, was sealed to the Prophet Joseph Smith as a servitor for all eternity.

However, Jane was not allowed to attend the ceremony. Historian Max Mueller noted:

> The Salt Lake Temple records indicate that James herself was not permitted to participate in her own circumscribed sealing. Instead, famed suffragist and Relief Society leader Bathsheba W. Smith served as James’s proxy during the ceremony, an unusual occurrence because proxies were employed almost exclusively for dead participants. President Joseph F. Smith stood in for his uncle. He also officiated the ceremony, declaring the “Negro Woman” Jane Elizabeth Manning James would be a “Servitor to Joseph Smith . . . and to his household for all eternity.”

Scholar Jessie L. Embry explained that a special ceremony was created for the occasion:

The ban on blacks continued into the next century.

Writing in 1935 Apostle Joseph Fielding Smith, who later became the tenth president of the LDS Church, gave this explanation of the curse on Cain:

Not only was Cain called upon to suffer [for killing Abel], but because of his wickedness he became the father of an inferior race. A curse was placed upon him and that curse has been continued through his lineage and must do so while time endures. Millions of souls have come into this world cursed with a black skin and have been denied the privilege of Priesthood and the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel. These are the descendants of Cain. Moreover, they have been made to feel their inferiority and have been separated from the rest of mankind from the beginning. Enoch saw the people of Canaan, descendants of Cain, and he says, “and there was a blackness came upon all the children of Canaan, that they were despised among all people.” [Moses 7:8][21]

The LDS First Presidency issued an official statement on the issue of race on August 17, 1949:

The attitude of the Church with reference to Negroes remains as it has always stood. It is not a matter of the declaration of a policy but of direct commandment from the Lord, on which is founded the doctrine of the Church from the days of its organization, to the effect that Negroes may become members of the Church but that they are not entitled to the priesthood at the present time . . . . The position of the Church regarding the Negro may be understood when another doctrine of the Church is kept in mind, namely, that the conduct of spirits in the premortal existence has some determining effect upon the conditions and circumstances under which these spirits take on mortality . . . . Under this principle there is no injustice whatsoever involved in this deprivation as to the holding of the priesthood by the Negroes.—The First Presidency[22]

In the wake of the civil rights movement political pressure was mounting for the LDS Church to change its racial restrictions. In 1967 N. Eldon Tanner, a member of the First Presidency of the LDS Church, was very emphatic that blacks could not receive the priesthood. In an interview he stated:

“The church has no intention of changing its doctrine on the Negro,” N. Eldon Tanner, counselor to the First Presidency told SEATTLE during his recent visit here. “Throughout the history of the original Christian church, the Negro never held the priesthood. There’s really nothing we can do to change this. It’s a law of God.”[23]
Such statements identifying blacks with the curse of Cain, or denying blacks the priesthood because it was the law of God, were typical in Mormonism prior to 1978.24

NO MISSIONARIES TO BLENDS

While there was no restriction on blacks joining the LDS Church, there was no direct effort to evangelize them either. Apostle Bruce McConkie, writing in 1958, declared:

Negroes in this life are denied the priesthood; under no circumstances can they hold this delegation of authority from the Almighty. The gospel message of salvation is not carried affirmatively to them . . . Negroes are not equal with other races where the receipt of certain spiritual blessings are concerned . . .25

Just prior to the change on ordaining blacks, William E. Berrett, Vice Administrator of the Brigham Young University, wrote: “. . . no direct efforts have been made to proselyte among them.”26

However, the Bible tells Christians to offer salvation and baptism to all mankind, regardless of race. Jesus said “Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost” (Matthew 28:19). In the book of Acts, Philip was commanded to preach the gospel to an Ethiopian (a black) who was then baptized (Acts 8:26-39). Nothing is said about the Ethiopian being restricted in his service to God.

NO INTERMARRIAGE

Since the Mormons viewed black skin as evidence of God’s curse, they were opposed to racial intermarriage. In 1845 Joseph Smith declared, “Had I anything to do with the negro, I would confine them by strict law to their own species, and put them on a national equalization.”27

In 1863 Brigham Young declared that those who engaged in intermarriage were worthy of death:

Shall I tell you the law of God in regard to the African race? If the white man who belongs to the chosen seed mixes his blood with the seed of Cain, the penalty, under the law of God, is death on the spot. This will always be so.28

Interrace marriage with a black person was seen as bringing the priesthood curse on their posterity. In 1954 Apostle Mark E. Peterson instructed:

The reason that one would lose his blessings by marrying a Negro is due to the restriction placed upon them. “No person having the least particle of Negro blood can hold the Priesthood” (Brigham Young). It does not matter if they are one-sixth Negro or one-hundred and sixth, the curse of no Priesthood is the same. If an individual who is entitled to the Priesthood marries a Negro, the Lord has decreed that only spirits who are not eligible for the Priesthood will come to that marriage as children. To intermarry with a Negro is to forfeit a “Nation of Priesthood holders”.29

However, in a broad general sense, caste systems have their root and origin in the gospel itself, and when they operate according to the divine decree, the resultant restrictions and segregation are right and proper and have the approval of the Lord. To illustrate: Cain, Ham, and the whole negro race have been cursed with a black skin, the mark of Cain, so they can be identified as a caste apart, a people with whom the other descendants of Adam should not intermarry.30

SEGREGATED BLOOD?

The LDS fear of having even one drop of black blood led to the policy of segregating blood in Utah hospitals under the control of the LDS Church. Lester Bush, an LDS historian, quoted an early statement of the LDS First Presidency regarding the problem of “negro blood”:

By 1907 the First Presidency and Quorum had . . . ruled that “no one known to have in his veins negro blood, (it matters not how remote a degree) can either have the priesthood in any degree or the blessings of the Temple of God; no matter how otherwise worthy he may be.”31

Given the statements of past LDS leaders against having “one drop” of black blood in their veins, it is no surprise that Mormons extended this to segregating the blood supply in their hospitals. While this practice was common in the past, the U.S. military ended its policy of segregating blood on the basis of race in 1949. The American Red Cross continued to segregate blood until the 1960s. The hospitals under LDS control segregated blood on the basis of race until the 1970s. Writing in 1978, reporters David Briscoe and George Buck explained:

For all too many Mormons, the figurative role that “blood” plays in Mormon doctrine in denoting ancestry, has been all too literal. Less than two weeks after the Priesthood announcement, Consolidated Blood Services for the intermountain region announced its first agreement ever to handle blood bank services for a group of hospitals with previous LDS connections, including LDS Hospital, Primary Children’s and Cottonwood Hospitals in Salt Lake City; McKay-Dee Hospital in Ogden and Utah Valley Hospital in Provo. At one time in the past, hospitals administered by the LDS Church kept separate the blood donated by blacks and whites. Although this has not been the case for several years, some patients who have expressed concern about receiving blood from black donors have been reassured it would not happen—as if the policy were still in effect.32

PRE-EARTH LIFE AND RACE

To better understand the Mormon attitude concerning blacks, a person must first be aware of their doctrine of pre-mortal life. While standard Christianity views man’s origin in the womb, such as Psalm 139:13, Mormonism teaches that we have eternal existence as “intelligences” and were born to Heavenly Father and Mother in a pre-mortal existence. Joseph Smith taught that man is the same species as God and is his direct offspring, raised to maturity prior to being sent to earth as an infant. Preaching at the funeral of an early Mormon, Joseph Smith stated:

First, God himself, who sits enthroned in yonder heavens, is a man like unto one of yourselves, that is the great secret . . . I am going to tell you how God came to be God. We have imagined that God was God from all eternity . . . God himself; the Father of us all dwelt on an earth the same as Jesus Christ himself did . . . The mind of man is as immortal as God himself. I know that my testimony is true, . . . their spirits existed co-equal with God . . . God never did have power to create the spirit of man at all.33

The LDS Church teaches that God was once a mortal on some other world. He and his wife were faithful on that earth, died, were resurrected and eventually advanced to godhood. Their spirit children, who were literally born to them in that heavenly realm, were later sent to an earth to obtain a mortal body and possibly advance as their heavenly parents did before them. However, some of God’s progeny were less faithful during their “first estate” and thus did not merit as favorable a birth into mortality as others.

Alvin R. Dyer, assistant to the Twelve Apostles and later ordained an apostle, spoke on racial issues and man’s pre-earth life to the Norwegian Mission gathering in Oslo, Norway, on March 18, 1961. In this talk he said:

I want to talk to you a little bit now about something that is not missionary work, and what I say is not to be given to your investigators by any matter of means. . . . Why is it that you are white and not colored: Have you ever asked yourself that question? Who had anything to do with your being born into the Church and not born a Chinese or a Hindu, or a Negro? Is God such an unjust person that He would make you white and free and make a Negro cursed under the cursing of Cain that he could not hold the Priesthood of God? . . . Those who have been cursed in the pre-existence were born through this lineage of Ham. . . . Why is a Negro a Negro? . . . The reason that spirits are born into Negro bodies is because those spirits rejected the Priesthood of God in the pre-existence. This is the reason why you have Negroes upon the earth.

You will observe that when Cain was influenced by the power of Lucifer to follow him and to fall down and worship him in the beginning, it was then that . . . Cain rejected the counsel of God. He rejected again the Priesthood as his forebears had done in the pre-existence. Therefore, the curse of the pre-existence was made institute through the loins of Cain. Consequently, you have the beginning of the race of men and women into which would be born those in the pre-existence who had rejected the Priesthood of God. . . . Ham reinstated the curse of the pre-existence when he rejected the Priesthood of Noah, and in consequence of that he preserved the curse on the earth. Therefore, the Negroes to be born thereafter, or those who were to become Negroes, were to be born through the loins of Ham.34

In a letter dated April 10, 1963, Apostle Joseph Fielding Smith explained that one is born black due to his “unfaithfulness” in the spirit world:

According to the doctrine of the church, the Negro, because of some condition of unfaithfulness in the spirit-or pre-existence, was not valiant and hence was not denied the mortal probation, but was denied the blessings of the Priesthood.35

33 Times and Seasons, vol. 5, pp. 613-615; also in History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 302-312.
To counter the many past statements of LDS leaders relating to premortal performance determining race, the church posted a Gospel Topics essay online, “Race and Priesthood,” which states:

Today, the Church disavows the theories advanced in the past that black skin is a sign of divine disfavor or curse, or that it reflects unrighteous actions in a premortal life; . . .

Yet their leaders continue to speak of those who have been blessed according to their pre-mortal life. As recently as 2008 Terry Ball, then the Dean of Religious Education at BYU, taught that our place on earth was assigned according to our performance in the spirit world:

Have you ever wondered why you were born where and when you were born? Why were you not born 500 years ago in some primitive aboriginal culture in some isolated corner of the world? Is the timing and placing of our birth capricious? For Latter-day Saints, the answer is no. Fundamental to our faith is the understanding that before we came to this earth we lived in a premortal existence with a loving Heavenly Father. We further understand that in that premortal state we had agency and that we grew and developed as we used that agency. Some, as Abraham learned, became noble and great ones (see Abraham 3:22–23). We believe that when it came time for us to experience mortality, a loving Heavenly Father, who knows each of us well, sent us to earth at the time and in the place and in circumstances that would best help us reach our divine potential . . .

While Terry Ball appealed to Abraham 3:22-23 to support the LDS idea of the “noble and great ones” being chosen for future places of honor on earth, he failed to mention the earlier passages that speak of Pharaoh, being from “the loins of Ham,” which “preserved the curse in the land” and that because of that lineage “he could not have the right of Priesthood” (Abraham 1:21-27). It isn’t enough for the LDS leaders to simply say they reject all forms of racism and yet retain racist doctrines in their scriptures.

Patriarchal Blessings Declare Lineage

The LDS Gospel Topics essay suggests two common explanations as to why blacks were denied priesthood:

The curse of Cain was often put forward as justification for the priesthood and temple restrictions. Around the turn of the century, another explanation gained currency: blacks were said to have been less than fully valiant in the premortal battle against Lucifer and, as a consequence, were restricted from priesthood and temple blessings.

While the current Gospel Topics statement rejects this concept, it has been the common view in LDS circles for decades. Valiant spirits were born white, non-valiant spirits were born black. Apostle Joseph Fielding Smith wrote in 1954:

There were no neutrals in the war in heaven. All took sides either with Christ or with Satan. Every man had his agency there, and men receive rewards here based upon their actions there, just as they will receive rewards hereafter for deeds done in the body. The Negro, evidently, is receiving the reward he merits.

In his book, The Way to Perfection, Joseph Fielding Smith equated race with pre-earth merit:

Is it not a reasonable belief that the Lord would select the choice spirits to come through the better grades of nations? Moreover, is it not reasonable to believe that less worthy spirits would come through less favored lineage? Does this not account in very large part for the various grades of color and degree of intelligence we find in the earth?

Since the days of Joseph Smith, Mormons have received “Patriarchal Blessings,” a sort of guide for your life and declaration of your lineage. Blessings usually make mention, among other things, of your pre-mortal life, your faithfulness and being valiant, all of which determine your lineage. In my February 10, 1955, blessing I [Sandra Tanner] was told:

You have royal blood in your veins for you are a descendant of Father Abraham. You come from the house of Joseph the favorite son of Jacob who was sold into Egypt and from the loins of Ephraim. . . . You were valiant in your first estate [pre-mortal life] and the Lord has rewarded you for it. You struggled valiantly that we might have our free agency and the Lord held you in reserve to come forth at this late time to the home of goodly parents.

Mormons today are still being told they were valiant in the spirit world. In a 2005 Patriarchal blessing a white woman in Utah was told:

41 “LDS Patriarchal Blessings” by Sandra Tanner, http://www.utlm.org/onlineresources/patriarchalblessing.htm
You are one of his faithful, devoted, and noble spirits, and He is pleased with the way you are conducting your life. . . . You lived with Him in the pre-mort world and there you became a faithful and valiant spirit.42

If one teaches that some are granted a favorable birth due to pre-mort performance then it stands to reason that some are given unfavorable births due to lack of performance. Mormonism will never be completely free of racism as long as it continues to teach that your pre-earth conduct determines your lineage and quality of your birth.

FOLKLORE OR DOCTRINE

Today the LDS Church seems to be categorizing the teachings of past prophets on racial issues as “folklore.” In an article commemorating the thirtieth anniversary of lifting the ban on blacks, Sheldon F. Child, of the Council of Seventies, explained to a reporter:

“We have to keep in mind that it’s folklore and not doctrine,” Elder Child said. “It’s never been recorded as such. Many opinions, personal opinions, were spoken. I’m just so grateful for this [1978] revelation,” he said, adding he can recall exactly where he was and what he was doing when he heard the news 30 years ago.43

If the leaders’ sermons on race were merely “folklore,” why did it require a revelation to change the practice? Why did President Spencer W. Kimball need to plead “long and earnestly” for God to give priesthood to blacks? This certainly makes it look like the brethren believed God was the one withholding priesthood.

Despite the lifting of the priesthood ban in 1978, the LDS church was still left with years of sermons denigrating blacks. LDS Apostle Bruce R. McConkie counseled:

There are statements in our literature by the early Brethren which we have interpreted to mean that the Negroes would not receive the priesthood in mortality. I have said the same things, and people write me letters and say, “You said such and such, and how is it now that we do such and such?” And all I can say to that is that it is time disbelieving people repented and got in line and believed in a living, modern prophet. Forget everything that I have said, or what President Brigham Young or President George Q. Cannon or whomever has said in days past that is contrary to the present revelation. We spoke with a limited understanding and without the light and knowledge that now has come into the world.44

But if the leaders’ earlier sermons relating to the “curse of Cain” and the ban on blacks holding the priesthood were simply due to “limited understanding” how are the LDS faithful to have confidence in their leaders’ sermons today? The leaders were certainly claiming their sermons on race were doctrine and the will of God at the time.

Peggy Stack, reporter for the Salt Lake Tribune, observed:

Latter-day Saints everywhere recognized the move [in 1978] as a game-changing milestone. It opened the door for wider proselytizing in Africa and other continents with black populations, and allowed Mormonism to woo potential believers in far-flung regions previously off-limits because of the priesthood prohibition.

Yet dropping the ban did not—indeed could not—eliminate all racism in the church.

LDS leaders offered no apology nor, at the time, any in-depth analysis of the reasons for the exclusionary policy. Justifications, including the notion that blacks were descendants of a biblical bad guy, Cain, or that they were less valiant in a premortal existence, continued to be taught and touted by members. Statements dismissing or denigrating blacks offered by previous Mormon authorities remained in print and often were embraced by believers long after the ban’s demise.

Racial strife—including slurs and denigrating remarks—still “lifts its ugly head . . . even right here among us,” President Gordon B. Hinckley preached in a 2006 LDS General Conference address. “. . . I remind you that no man who makes disparaging remarks concerning those of another race can consider himself a true disciple of Christ.”45

Lifting the ban, as Peggy Stack pointed out, has opened the door for LDS missionaries in areas of darker-skinned people. There are now 578, 310 members of the LDS Church in Africa and 1,155,764 in Asia.

Matthew Bowman, professor at Henderson State University, reported:

Today about one in 10 converts to Mormonism are black, but surveys report that only about 1 to 3 percent of Mormons in the United States are African-American.46

In 2013 the LDS Church attempted to provide answers for the lifting of the priesthood ban with an essay in their Gospel Topics series entitled “Race and Priesthood.” But instead of giving a clear explanation of their doctrine on race or a denunciation of Brigham Young and other past prophets’ statements on race, they tried to rationalize their earlier racism as no worse than that of others in the nation. The essay states:

The Church was established in 1830, during an era of great racial division in the United States. At the time, many people of African descent lived in slavery, and racial distinctions and prejudice were not just common but customary among white Americans. Those realities, though unfamiliar and disturbing today, influenced all aspects of people’s lives, including their religion. Many Christian churches of that era, for instance, were segregated along racial lines.47

While the above statement is true it fails to explain why Mormonism lagged so far behind the rest of the United States in granting equal status to blacks. Despite the wide-spread acceptance of racism during that time, many Christians were actually preaching against it in the 1800s. By the time the LDS Church opened its priesthood to blacks in 1978 they were embarrassingly behind the times.

If the LDS Church is truly led by prophetic wisdom why wasn’t the policy changed before the civil rights movement of the mid-1900s instead of years after? In contrast to this, Joseph Smith’s son, as president of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, now known as the Community of Christ, opened the door to black ordination during Brigham Young’s lifetime. Christian scholar Robert Bowman observed:

It is ironic that during Brigham Young’s tenure as president of the LDS Church, his main rival as the true prophetic successor to Joseph Smith went in a completely different direction on the issue of blacks and the priesthood. In 1865 Joseph Smith III (the son of Joseph Smith Jr.), the first president of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, issued a revelation calling for the ordination of men “of every race” to the priesthood. Yet according to the Utah-based LDS Church, Joseph Smith III was not a prophet at all. How is it that an uninspired or false prophet could see the wisdom in 1865 of inviting people of all races to share fully in the ministries of the restored Church, but Brigham Young, supposedly the true prophet, could not? Indeed, how is it that it took the Mormon Church 113 years after Joseph Smith III to come around to the same conclusion?48

Author John G. Turner, writing in the New York Times, observed:

White Christians of many denominational stripes used repugnant language to justify slavery and the inferiority of black people. . . . Most Protestant denominations, however, gradually apologized for their past racism.

In contrast, while Mormon leaders generically criticize past and present racism, they carefully avoid any specific criticism of past presidents and apostles, careful not to disrupt traditional reverence for the church’s prophets.49

Joel Groat, of the Institute of Religious Research, compiled the following after comparing the past LDS statements on race with the current Gospel Topics essay:

- For about 125 years the Mormon prophets and apostles taught these ideas not as “theories” but as doctrines originating in divine revelation, given in Scripture and reaffirmed by the living prophets from Brigham Young to David O. McKay as commandments from God. All Latter-day Saints were expected to view them as such.
- During that time they simultaneously affirmed: “Neither the President of the Church, nor the First Presidency, nor the united voice of the First Presidency and the Twelve will ever lead the Saints astray or send forth counsel to the world that is contrary to the mind and will of the Lord.” This reinforced the fact that their racist policies came directly from God.
- However when faced with the embarrassing and damaging racist implications of views still being taught in the LDS Church over 30 years after the ban was lifted, current LDS leaders provided the following explanation on the official church website in 2013.
  1. None of the prior teachings related to race and the priesthood were doctrines of the church; they were simply theories.
  2. These ideas originated not with God but with Brigham Young, who was influenced by the social and cultural ideas of his time.
  3. They as a church were officially disavowing these theories as racist and wrong.50

It seems the Mormons want it both ways, past prophets and apostles were true representatives of God, but at the same time many of their sermons were racist and “folklore.”

While we applaud the LDS Church’s efforts to remove racism from its teachings, one wonders if it can truly succeed as long as the Book of Mormon and the Pearl of Great Price, with their racist teachings, are embraced as the word of God? We are reminded of Paul’s instructions to the Galatians:

There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. (Galatians 3:28)

One of the major claims of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is that it is the only true church, with the only authority to act in God’s name. Mormonism has a lay priesthood, its leaders are not trained in theology or biblical languages, but are usually businessmen advanced due to faithful church service. In the fifth and sixth Articles of Faith of the LDS Church we read:

5. We believe that a man must be called of God, by prophecy, and by the laying on of hands by those who are in authority, to preach the Gospel and administer in the ordinances thereof.

6. We believe in the same organization that existed in the Primitive Church, namely, apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers, evangelists, and so forth.

The LDS Church believes that God removed His priesthood authority from earth shortly after the death of Christ’s apostles. In the Encyclopedia of Mormonism we read:

LDS rejection of much post biblical Christianity is based on belief in an ancient apostasy . . . Apostolic authority ceased just after the New Testament period, and without apostolic leadership and authority the Church was soon overwhelmed by alien intellectual and cultural pressures.

But one wonders how the early church could go astray so quickly and priesthood be lost? Jesus promised in Matthew 16:18 that “the gates of hell” would not prevail against his church. Also, according to Joseph Smith, four of Christ’s disciples did not die but have been left on earth to do missionary work. These include the Apostle John and three Book of Mormon disciples.

According to the Doctrine and Covenants, John, the apostle, was transformed and Jesus left him on earth to do evangelism. Joseph Smith claimed to receive by revelation the following information about John:

And the Lord said unto me: John my beloved, what desirest thou? . . . And I said unto him: Lord, give unto me power over death, that I may live and bring souls unto thee. And the Lord said unto me: Verily, verily, I say unto thee, because thou desirest this thou shalt tarry until I come in my glory, and shalt prophesy before nations, kindreds, tongues and people.

Evidently Joseph Smith misinterpreted John 21:20-23. Jesus did not say that John would remain alive, but merely pointed out to Peter that John’s future mission was not Peter’s concern. The Book of Mormon also teaches that three Nephites, Jesus’ disciples in the New World, did not taste of death but were transformed and would remain on earth to do evangelism. (See 3 Nephi, chapter 28.) LDS Apostle Jeffrey Holland explained the role of the three Nephites in our day:

These three Nephites continue in their translated state today, just as when they went throughout the lands of Nephi . . . they are yet ministering to Jew, Gentile, and the scattered tribes of Israel, even all nations, kindreds, tongues, and people.

How could there have been a total apostasy, as asserted by the LDS Church, if there have been four apostles on the earth since the time of Christ? Why wouldn’t they have been able to ordain future apostles and keep the church from falling into a total apostasy?

NECESSITY OF PRIESTHOOD

In the February 2004 issue of the Ensign LDS President Gordon B. Hinckley laid out the four cornerstones of Mormonism. The first is Jesus Christ and his plan of salvation, second is Joseph Smith’s first vision, third is the Book of Mormon and fourth is priesthood authority. The LDS Church claims that those holding its priesthood are the only ones recognized by God to perform baptisms, eternal marriages and ordinances of the gospel. Mormonism rejects baptisms done by any other church. The LDS manual Doctrines of the Gospel explains:

What is the [LDS] Priesthood? It is nothing more nor less than the power of God delegated to man by which man can . . . act legitimately; not assuming that authority, nor borrowing it from generations that are dead and gone, . . .

Marvin Cowan explained how the Mormons misuse John 15:16 in their effort to prove their priesthood “ordination” claims:

In support of their priesthood doctrine, LDS often quote part of John 15:16, where Jesus said, “Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you and ordained you.” LDS claim that Jesus was speaking about the priesthood, but priesthood is not mentioned in this context or anywhere in any of the four gospels! This verse says “ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit . . .”

Neither John 15:16 nor any other New Testament verse says that Jesus laid His hands on the disciples and ordained them to the priesthood, but LDS claim that is what the word “ordain” means. However, D. & C. 89:14 says, “all grain is ordained for the use of man and of beast.” Did someone lay hands on the grain and give it the Priesthood? Obviously that is not the meaning of “ordain.” While it is possible for someone to be ordained by “laying on of hands,” that word really means to “appoint” or “point out.” D. & C. 89 also mentions that herbs and flesh of beasts and fowls are “ordained for the use of man.” Thus, even LDS scripture shows that “ordained” means “appointed,” not lay hands on to give some priesthood office.

The LDS also use Heb. 5:4 to support their doctrine of an ordained priesthood. It says, “No man taketh this honor unto himself but he that is called of God as was Aaron.” Then they claim that Aaron was called by Moses in Ex. 28:1. But, neither Heb. 5:4 nor Ex. 28:1 say anything about “laying on of hands or “ordaining” anything. Heb. 5:4 says, “called of God,” not “called by Moses” or “called by laying on of hands” as LDS interpret it. Ex. 4:27 declares, “The Lord said unto Aaron . . .” which shows that Aaron was called by the Lord, not Moses. In Num. 18:7 the Lord said to Aaron, “I have given your priest’s office unto you . . .” Even in D. & C. 132:59, the Lord says, “Verily if a man be called of my Father as was Aaron, by my own voice and by the voice of Him that sent me and I have endowed him with the keys of the power of this priesthood . . .”

Notice that LDS scripture says Aaron and those with LDS priesthood were called by the “voice” of God, not by laying on of hands! Neither Aaron nor anyone else was ever ordained to the Aaronic priest’s office in the Old Testament. The only “priests” who were ordained in the Old Testament were idolatrous priests (II Kings 23:5; II Chron. 11:15)! Aaron was “anointed” (Ex. 40:13), but so was the tabernacle and everything in it (Ex. 40:9-15). Therefore, this “anointing” was not the “laying on of hands” to give the priesthood, unless the tabernacle and everything in it were also ordained to the priesthood! A good concordance will show that many other things in the Old Testament were “ordained,” but the priests who served God were not!

“The Proper Order”

The LDS Church teaches that priesthood authority must be acquired by the proper means. In Doctrines of the Gospel we read that every priesthood act must be done “in the proper way, and after the proper order.”

This raises the question as whether or not Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery were baptized and ordained by proper “priesthood authority” in the “proper way”? Joseph Smith’s account of the event is published at the back of the Pearl of Great Price. In it Smith relates that while working on the translation of the Book of Mormon in May of 1829, he and Oliver Cowdery became concerned about baptism and went out into the woods to pray:

While we were thus employed, praying and calling upon the Lord, a messenger from heaven descended in a cloud of light, and having laid his hands upon us, he ordained us, saying:

> Upon you my fellow servants, in the name of Messiah, I confer the Priesthood of Aaron, which holds the keys of the ministering of angels, and of the gospel of repentance, and of baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; . . .

He said this Aaronic Priesthood had not the power of laying on hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost, but that this should be conferred on us hereafter; and he commanded us to go and be baptized, and gave us directions that I should baptize Oliver Cowdery, and that afterwards he should baptize me.

Accordingly we went and were baptized. I baptized him first, and afterwards he baptized me—after which I laid my hands upon his head and ordained him to the Aaronic Priesthood, and afterwards he laid his hands on me and ordained me to the same Priesthood—for so we were commanded. . . . It was on the fifteenth day of May, 1829, that we were ordained under the hand of this messenger, and baptized.

How could the angel, elsewhere identified as John the Baptist, ordain them to the priesthood before they were baptized? According to LDS doctrine today, a man must be baptized by someone holding the LDS priesthood authority before he can be ordained to the priesthood.

7 Doctrines of the Gospel, p. 68.

If John the Baptist’s ordination was valid, why did Joseph and Oliver need to baptize each other and then re-ordain each other to the same priesthood? Why wouldn’t the angel baptize them first and then ordain them?

Merrill J. Bateman, one of the top leaders in the LDS Church, emphasized the necessity of restoring proper priesthood authority to Joseph Smith:

One of the remarkable evidences of the Restoration is the testimony of Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery regarding the manner in which the priesthood and its directing powers were returned to earth... John the Baptist brought back the Aaronic Priesthood with the keys of repentance and baptism. Peter, James, and John restored not only the Melchizedek Priesthood but also “the keys of [the] kingdom.”...

In contrast, 19th-century ministers in the Palmyra environs, not understanding the great Apostasy that had taken place, believed in an entirely different process for priesthood reception. They believed that the power to preach came through an inner calling to a priesthood of believers.9

If such keys were needed why didn’t Peter, James and John restore both the Aaronic and Melchizedek priesthoods? Since Mormonism claims that these men held the authority for both, why would John the Baptist need to come at all?

WHEN DID IT HAPPEN?

If Peter, James and John conferred the priesthood on Joseph and Oliver, when did it happen? In his story printed at the back of the Pearl of Great Price Joseph Smith stated that on May 15, 1829, the Aaronic Priesthood was conferred on him and Oliver Cowdery. While Smith is confident on the date for the Aaronic Priesthood, there is no date given for his ordination to the Melchizedek Priesthood. The History of the Church, by Joseph Smith, shows that there is real confusion as to when Peter, James and John supposedly appeared.

... before the 6th of April, 1830, and probably before that very month of June, 1829, had expired Peter, James and John had come and conferred upon Joseph and Oliver the keys of the Melchizedek Priesthood, ...10

Today the LDS church maintains that after the spring of 1829 both priesthoods were functioning in the church. However, the earliest LDS historical documents show that the concept of the Aaronic and Melchizedek Priesthoods were not taught prior to 1831 but were products of Joseph Smith’s evolving theology. Historian D. Michael Quinn explained:

A closer look at contemporary records indicates that men were first ordained to the higher priesthood over a year after the church’s founding. No mention of angelic ordinations can be found in original documents until 1834-35. Thereafter accounts of the visit of Peter, James, and John by Cowdery and Smith remained vague and contradictory.11

Mormonism maintains that when John the Baptist appeared to Smith and Cowdery in 1829 they received the Aaronic Priesthood, which included the offices of deacon, teacher, and priest. When Peter, James and John supposedly appeared a short while later, they conferred on Smith and Cowdery the Melchizedek Priesthood, which included the offices of elder, seventy, high priest, bishop, patriarch, Apostle and Prophet.

While one can find mention of such offices as elder or teacher in early LDS documents, these were not considered part of a larger priesthood system such as Melchizedek or Aaronic. Smith seems to have initially used the designations of elders and teachers in the same way that other churches of the day would have used such terms.

TWO PRIESTHOODS ADDED

People reading the current edition of the Doctrine and Covenants assume that the revelations read the same as they were originally printed. However, there have been important revisions relating to priesthood.

The first printing of Smith’s revelations in book form was in 1833, in a work titled Book of Commandments. Later, in 1835, a new edition was prepared, changing many of the original revelations and adding new ones. The title was also changed to Doctrine and Covenants. Researcher John Farkas observed:

There are seven revelations in the Doctrine & Covenants... on these priesthoods. Although five of them were allegedly received before October 1832, one as early as 1823, and one as late as September 1832, none of these five were included in the 1833 Book of Commandments. Two of them did not show up in the D&C until the 1876 edition, three were first included the 1835 edition.12

10 Joseph Smith, Jr., History of the Church, (Salt Lake City: Deseret Book, 1976) vol. 1, p. 61, note.
12 John Farkas, “Fabricating the Mormon Priesthood: By God or By Man?” https://beggarsbread.org/2012/10/06/fabricating-the-mormon-priesthood-by-god-or-by-man/)
Chapter 24 of the 1833 Book of Commandments gave instructions about elders, priests, teachers and deacons but made no mention of two priesthoods. When this revelation was reprinted in the 1835 Doctrine and Covenants (which is section 20 in a current edition) dozens of words were added to the text to include such offices as high counselors, high priests and high priesthood. Below is a photo of part of chapter 24 of the 1833 Book of Commandments (now section 20 of the Doctrine and Covenants) with the revisions noted in the margins.
Another example of changing Smith’s revelations to support his later priesthood ideas is seen in a comparison of Chapter 28 in the 1833 Book of Commandments and the current Doctrine and Covenants, section 27. Joseph Smith made these additions in 1835 to support his new claim of receiving priesthood from Peter, James and John. The original 1833 printing of the revelation did not contain any mention of priesthood restoration.

BOOK OF COMMANDMENTS - Chapter 28
COMPARE DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS - Sec. 27

CHAPTER XXVIII.

1 A Commandment to the church of Christ, given in Harmony, Pennsylvania, September 6, 1830.

AND TAKE UPON YOU MY UNCLE ARMOR, THAT YE MAY BE ABLE TO WITNESS THE EVIL DAY, HAVING DONE ALL, THAT YE MAY BE ABLE TO STAND. STAND THEREFORE, HAVING YOUR LOINS GIRD ABOUT WITH TRUTH, HAVING ON THE BREAST-PLATE OF RIGHTEOUSNESS, AND YOUR FEET SHOD WITH THE PREPARATION OF THE GOSPEL OF PEACE, WHICH I HAVE SENT MINE ANGELS TO COMMIT UNTO YOU; TAKING THE SHIELD OF FAITH WHEREWITH YE SHALL BE ABLE TO QUENCH ALL THE FIERY DARTS OF THE WICKED; AND TAKE THE HELMET OF SALVATION, AND THE SWORD OF MY SPIRIT, WHICH I WILL POUR OUT UPON YOU, AND MY WORD WHICH I REVEAL UNTO YOU, AND BE AGREED AS TOUCHING ALL THINGS WHATSOEVER YE ASK OF ME, — W. A.

2 For behold I say unto you, that it matter saith not what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, when ye partake of the sacrament, if so be that ye do it with an eye single to my glory:

3 Remembering unto the Father my body which was laid down for you, and my blood which was shed for the remission of your sins:

4 Wherefore a commandment I give unto you, that ye shall not purchase wine, neither strong drink of your enemies:

5 Wherefore you shall partake of none, except it is made new among you, yea, in this my Father’s kingdom which shall be built up on the earth.

6 Behold this is wisdom in me, wherefore marvel not, for the hour cometh that I will drink of the fruit of the vine with you, on the earth, and with all those whom my Father hath given me out of the world:

7 Wherefore lift up your hearts and rejoice, and gird up your minds, and be faithful until I come; Amen.

8 AND YE SHALL BE CARRIED UP THAT WHERE I AM YE SHALL BE ALSO. — W. A.

MORMON, WHOM I HAVE SENT UNTO YOU TO REVEAL THE BOOK OF MORMON, CONTAINING THE FULLNESS OF MY EVERLASTING GOSPEL, TO WHOM I HAVE COMMITTED THE KEYS OF THE RECORD OF THE STICK OF EPHRAIM; AND ALSO WITH ELIAS, TO WHOM I HAVE COMMITTED THE KEYS OF BRINGING TO PASS THE RESTORATION OF ALL THINGS SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL THE HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN, CONCERNING THE LAST DAYS; AND ALSO JOHN THE SON OF ZACHARIAS, WHICH ZACHARIAS HE (ELIAS) VISITED AND GAVE PROMISE THAT HE SHOULD HAVE A SON, AND HIS NAME SHOULD BE JOHN, AND HE SHOULD BE FILLED WITH THE SPIRIT OF ELIAS; WHICH JOHN I HAVE SENT UNTO YOU, MY SERVANTS, JOSEPH SMITH, JUN., AND OLIVER COWDERY, TO ORDAIN YOU UNTO THE FIRST PRIESTHOOD WHICH YOU HAVE RECEIVED, THAT YOU MIGHT BE CALLED AND ORDAINED EVEN AS AARON; AND ALSO ELISHA—unto whom I have committed the keys of the power of turning the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the hearts of the children to the fathers, that the whole earth may not be smitten with a curse; and also with Joseph and Jacob, and Isaac, and Abraham, your fathers, by whom the promises remain; and also with Michael, or Adam, the father of all, the prince of all, the ancient of days; and also with Peter, and James, and John, whom I have sent unto you, by whom I have ordained you and confirmed you to be apostles, and especial witnesses of my name, and bear the keys of your ministry and of the same things which I revealed unto them; unto whom I have committed the keys of my kingdom, and a dispensation of the gospel for the last times; and for the fulness of times, in which I will gather together in one all things, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; and also with — W. LDS historian Gregory A. Prince wrote:

Although in the Mormon church today the term “priesthood” refers to this bestowed authority, such a relationship did not develop until years after the founding of the church. Initially authority was understood to be inherent in what are now termed “offices.” Three offices—elder, priest, and teacher—were present by August 1829, as were the ordinances of baptism, confirmation, and ordination, but the word “priesthood” was not used in reference to these for another three years.13

Prince goes on to explain that while the Book of Mormon contains references to “higher authority” they were not understood in terms of “priesthood.” He concluded:

It was not until several months after the June 1831 general conference, when the “high priesthood” was conferred, that the term “priesthood” entered Mormon usage at all.14

Thus we see that at the time of the founding of Mormonism in 1830 there was no teaching or awareness of Joseph Smith claiming to have received either the Aaronic Priesthood or the Melchizedek Priesthood in 1829.

Another example of changing revelations to include Melchizedek and Aaronic priesthood information is seen by comparing Smith’s 1831 revelation, which was printed in 1832 in the church newspaper, The Evening and Morning Star, with the current version in the Doctrine and Covenants, section 68. (See photo on next page.)

Also, sections 2 and 13 of the current Doctrine and Covenants, which mention priesthood, were not printed in the 1833 Book of Commandments. They were extracted from Joseph Smith’s history, which wasn’t started until 1838, and were not added to the Doctrine and Covenants until 1876.

As Joseph Smith’s church began to grow so did the need for clearer delineation of authority, thus the backdating and insertion of priesthood claims into the revelations. David Whitmer, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, related the following concerning the addition of priesthood concepts:

Authority is the word we used for the first two years in the church . . . This matter of two orders of priesthood in the Church of Christ, and lineal priesthood of the old law being in the church, all originated in the mind of Sydney Rigdon. . . . This is the way the High Priests and the “priesthood” as you have it, was introduced into the Church of Christ almost two years after its beginning—and after we had baptized and confirmed about two thousand souls into the church.15

Whitmer also condemned the LDS leaders for endorsing the rewriting of Smith’s revelations between their first printing in the Book of Commandments in 1833 and the second printing in the Doctrine and Covenants in 1835. Whitmer wrote:

You have changed the revelations from the way they were first given and as they are to-day . . . to support the error of Brother Joseph in taking upon himself the office of Seer to the church. You have changed the revelations to support the error of high priests. You have changed the revelations to support the error of a President of the high priesthood, high counselors, etc.16

In recent years the LDS church has been more open about the textual revisions in Smith’s revelations. Yet they continue to insist that the priesthood was restored in 1829. If the Melchizedek and Aaronic priesthoods were a part of the church prior to the printing of the 1833 Book of Commandments it certainly seems strange that it contains no such teaching.

Researcher LaMar Petersen concluded:

There seems to be no support for the historicity of the restoration of the priesthood in journals, diaries, letters, nor printed matter prior to October 1834.17

A REVELATION, GIVEN NOVEMBER, 1831.

My servant, Orson, was called, by his ordination, to proclaim the everlasting gospel, by the spirit of the living God, from people to people, and from God to the world, in the congregations of the wicked, in their synagogues, reasoning with and exhorting all scriptures unto them: And behold and lo, this is an example unto all those who were ordained unto this priesthood, whose mission is appointed unto them to go forth: And this is the example unto them, that they shall speak as they are moved upon by the Holy Ghost; and whatsoever they shall speak, when moved upon by the Holy Ghost, shall be scripture; shall be the will of the Lord; shall be the mind of the Lord; shall be the word of the Lord; shall be the voice of the Lord, and the power of God unto salvation: Behold this is the promise of the Lord unto you, O ye my servants: wherefore, be of good cheer, and do not fear, for I the Lord am with you, and will stand by you; and ye shall bear record of me even Jesus Christ, that I am the Son of the living God; that I am; and that I am to come. This is the word of the Lord unto my servant, Orson, and also unto my servant, Luke, upon unto my servant, Lyman, and unto my servant Will, upon unto all the faithful elders of my church: Go ye unto all the world, preach the gospel to every creature; acting in the authority which I have given you: baptizing in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and that he believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned; and he that believeth shall be blessed with signs following, even as it is written: And whosoever it shall be given to know the signs of the times, and the signs of the coming of the Son of man; and of these things; and of the Father shall bear record, to you it shall be given power and skill to open up eternal life: Amen.

And now, concerning the things in addition to the laws and commandments, they are thus: There shall be hereafter in the due time of the Lord, other blessings to be set apart unto the church, to minister even according to the first; therefore it shall be in high priestly worth, and it shall be anointed by the confirmation of high priest. And again, no bishop or judge, which shall be set apart for this ministry, shall be tried or condemned for any crime, save it be before a conference of high priest; and in as much as he is found guilty before a conference of high priest, his testimony that cannot be impugned, shall be condemned; and he shall bear record of it in the conference of high priest. And again, he shall bear record of the commandments shall be confirmed by the church, by the laying on of the hands, when they are old; the sin be upon the head of the priest, for this shall be laid unto the inhabitants of Zion and their children shall be sprinkled with the blood of the lamb, when they are old, and receive the laying on of the hands; and they shall bear record of their children's age, and they shall be sprinkled with the blood of the lamb, and shall be sprinkled with the blood of the lamb, and the priests shall bear record of it in the conference of high priest. And the inhabitants of Zion shall observe the sabbath day to keep it holy. And the inhabitants of Zion, also, shall remember their labor, in as much as they are appointed to labor, in all faithfulness, for the latter shall be laid in consequence and unto the Lord. And now, I the Lord am not only well pleased with the inhabitants of Zion, but with the children among them, and their children are also growing up in wickedness: They also seek not sabbath days or holy days. These things I have ordained that ye should not do; but they shall be kept holy, and are called sabbath days unto the Lord. And a commandment I give unto you, that he that observeth not his precepts before the Lord in the season thereof, let him be had in remembrance before the judge of my people. These sayings are true and faithful: whereas transgress them not, neither take therefrom. Behold I am Alpha and Omega, and I come quickly: Amen.
The LDS Church priesthood is divided into two groups, Aaronic and Melchizedek. Below is a list of the various offices:

Melchizedek Priesthood
- Prophet [senior apostle]
- Apostle [12 apostles, plus those in First Presidency]
- Seventy [General Authorities]
- Patriarch [one in each stake]
- High Priest [usually ordained to this when called to such offices as bishop, stake president or to the stake high council]
- Elder [18 yr old or older]

Aaronic Priesthood
- Bishop [presiding high priest in ward]
- Priest [16 yr old]
- Teacher [14 yr old]
- Deacon [12 yr old]

Since the LDS Church makes the specific claim that their priesthood is the same as in the Bible we need to compare their offices with those mentioned in scripture. First we will look at the Old Testament priesthood and then authority in the New Testament.

Aaronic Priesthood

Prior to the law of Moses, men such as Abraham offered sacrifices to God, but not as part of any priesthood. When God set up the priesthood in the days of Moses, he restricted it to Aaron and his adult descendants, who were of the tribe of Levi (Numbers 3:1-10, 8:5-22; Exodus 38:21). This would disqualify most Mormons as they do not claim to be descended from Aaron. Many LDS believe they are from the tribe of Ephraim but this would not make them eligible for the Aaronic priesthood.

Even Jesus could not function in the Aaronic priesthood because he descended from the tribe of Judah. Hebrews 7:14 explains: “For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Judah; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood.”

There were only two offices in the Aaronic priesthood, priests and one high priest. The priests prepared and offered the daily sacrifices. The high priest was the only one allowed into the most sacred part of the temple, the Holy of Holies, which he did once a year to offer sacrifices for the sins of the people of Israel.

The priesthood of the Old Testament was brought to an end with the death of Christ. According to Hebrews, chapter seven, the Aaronic (“Levitical”) priesthood, with its endless system of animal sacrifices to cover sin, never could bring about perfection because even the priests themselves were imperfect people whose sins needed atoning by the same sacrificial system.

If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, (for under it the people received the law,) what further need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron? (Hebrews 7:11)

Thus, there was a need for Christ (“who knew no sin,” 2 Corinthians 5:21) to come “after the order of Melchisidec,” offering himself as the perfect, one-time sacrifice for all sin and ending the imperfect Aaronic priesthood.

Also, in Matthew 27 we read that the veil of the temple, which closed off the Holy of Holies, was split in two at the time of Christ’s death, thus showing that the way into the presence of God no longer required the Jewish priesthood system, with its animal sacrifices, since Christ himself was the lamb of God offered for our sins and he is now our only High Priest. Accordingly, there is no mention in the Bible of Christ’s followers ever needing to hold an Aaronic priesthood, let alone a Melchizedek priesthood, because the former was ended in Christ and the latter could be fulfilled only by him.

Deacons

In Numbers 8:23-25, God set the minimum age of the Aaronic priesthood at twenty-five, and there were only priests and one high priest. The Old Testament has no mention of deacons. The LDS Church ordains young men deacons, their first office in the Aaronic priesthood, at the age of twelve. However, Paul instructed Timothy that deacons are to be mature men and faithful husbands (1 Timothy 3:8-12).

Teachers

As part of the Aaronic Priesthood in the LDS Church a young man is ordained a teacher at the age of fourteen. (This office is separate from the assignment of teaching a class such as Sunday School.) The New Testament passages about teachers do not make them part of a special priesthood. Teachers should be mature Christians “able to teach others” (2 Timothy 2:2), not teenagers.
Priests

In the LDS Church a young man is ordained a priest in the Aaronic Priesthood at the age of sixteen and does not need to be a descendant of Aaron. This was never done in the Old Testament. There are Jewish priests mentioned in the New Testament, but an office of priest is never mentioned in the Christian church.

Melchizedek Priesthood

Melchizedek is mentioned in Genesis 14:17-20 as the King of Salem (Jerusalem) and priest of God who blessed Abraham. In Psalm 110:4, a promise was given that his priesthood would be forever. That promise was fulfilled in Jesus Christ as indicated in chapters five through seven of Hebrews, where Melchizedek is identified as a type of Christ.

Hebrews 5:10 tells us that Christ is the only High Priest “after the order of Melchisedec.” Then in Hebrews 7 we read that there were many high priests due to death, but Jesus had a superior priesthood because he continues as High Priest due to his endless life:

For it was fitting for us to have such a high priest, holy, innocent, undefiled, separated from sinners and exalted above the heavens; who does not need daily, like those high priests, to offer up sacrifices, first for His own sins and then for the sins of the people, because this He did once for all when He offered up Himself. (Hebrews 7:26-27)

The only Christian priesthood mentioned in the New Testament is the spiritual priesthood of every believer. Peter wrote:

But you are a chosen people, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God’s special possession, that you may declare the praises of him who called you out of darkness into his wonderful light. (1 Peter 2:9)

Notice that men are not singled out as the only ones holding this priesthood. It is for every Christian.

Elders and Bishops

In Mormonism, a man is ordained an elder upon entering the Melchizedek Priesthood. While the New Testament mentions elders (Acts 14:23; Titus 1:5-6; 1 Peter 5:1-3), they are never referred to as part of a priesthood system.

In 1 Timothy 3:1 and Titus 1:7 the word bishop appears in the King James Version of the Bible. But the word bishop simply means overseer or steward and is rendered that way in newer translations. Bishop is not a separate office in the books of Timothy and Titus, but a continuation of Paul’s instructions about elders.

When Paul gave instructions to Timothy about leadership he did not mention anything about ordaining men to either the Aaronic or Melchizedek priesthoods. Instead, the emphasis was on choosing mature Christians. In 2 Timothy 2:2 Paul wrote:

... and what you have heard from me in the presence of many witnesses entrust to faithful men, who will be able to teach others also. (2 Timothy 2:2)

Seventy

In the LDS Church a seventy is a specific office in their Melchizedek Priesthood. He is a type of missionary and overseer of a given area of the church (D&C 107:25). Joseph Smith evidently read about Christ sending out seventy men in Luke 10:1 (some Bibles say seventy-two) and turned this event into an ordination of men into a specific office of the priesthood. The LDS church has now expanded this to different quorums of Seventy.

However, there is no mention in the New Testament of anyone ever being appointed to be a replacement of any of these seventy men. Surely if such an office was to be part of the church it would have been mentioned in Acts or the other letters in the New Testament.

High Priest

While there are thousands of high priests in the LDS Church, there was only one Jewish high priest at a time. The high priest was part of the Aaronic Priesthood. Hebrews 5:1 explains that the duties of the Jewish high priest were to “offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins.” Mormon high priests do not offer any sacrifices so they are not following the Old Testament pattern. The Jewish high priest served as an “example and shadow of heavenly things” (Hebrews 8:5).

Christ fulfilled this “when he offered up himself” (Hebrews 7:22-27). He is the only High Priest in the Christian church. Because Christ lives forever his priesthood can never pass to another. There are no references in the New Testament to any Christian holding the office of high priest.

Pastors

Mormons will often use Ephesians 4:11 when trying to prove their system of priesthood. This verse reads:

And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers.
The LDS Church, however, does not have any pastors. One of their apostles, Joseph Fielding Smith explained:

The term pastor does not refer to an order in the priesthood, like deacon, priest, elder . . . a bishop is a pastor; so is an elder who has charge of a branch . . . 18

Oddly, the Mormons insist that apostles and teachers are specific offices of the priesthood, but do not believe that pastor or evangelist are priesthood offices.

Evangelist or Patriarch?

Ephesians 4:11 mentions evangelists yet there is no such office in the Mormon Church. Instead, they claim that the original meaning has been lost and that an evangelist is supposed to be a patriarch. However, the simple meaning of evangel is “good news.” Thus an evangelist is one who spreads the “good news,” such as a missionary.

However, LDS Apostle Bruce R. McConkie claimed:

Having lost the true knowledge of the priesthood and its offices, . . . the false traditions of the sectarian world have applied the designation evangelist to traveling preachers, missionaries, and revivalists.19

Joseph Fielding Smith explained: “An evangelist is a patriarch . . . The Patriarch to the Church holds the keys of blessing for the members of the Church.”20

There is no evidence that the Greek word evangelist ever carried the meaning of patriarch. The Greek word translated evangelist has always carried the meaning of someone who proclaims the good news, not one who gives prayer blessings to church members. In the LDS Church a patriarch gives a blessing to a member as a sort of spiritual blueprint for his/her life (D&C 107:39-56).

Apostles and Prophets

After Judas betrayed Christ there was one man chosen to replace him as part of the twelve apostles (Acts 1:21-23).To qualify for this position the person had to be an eyewitness to the full ministry of Jesus, including his resurrection. There is no evidence in the New Testament that anyone else was chosen to replace one of the original twelve.

In Mormonism the president of the church is considered a prophet and apostle. LDS Apostle Bruce R. McConkie stated:

Apostles and prophets are the foundation upon which the organization of the true Church rests.21

In trying to establish the need for apostles and prophets in the church Mormons appeal to 1 Corinthians 12:28:

Now you are the body of Christ and individually members of it. And God has appointed in the church first apostles, second prophets, third teachers, then miracles, then gifts of healing, helping, administrating, and various kinds of tongues.

However, if one reads the entire section from verse 27 to verse 31 it is obvious that Paul is discussing various ministries or gifts in the early church, not listing specific offices of priesthood.

Notice also that Paul lists apostles first and prophets second. In Mormonism the highest calling is the prophet of the church with the apostles serving under him. Also in Mormonism the office of teacher is bestowed on fourteen-year-old boys, not a man third in rank to the prophet and apostles.

Another problem for the LDS position is the concept of having three apostles in its First Presidency that oversee the Twelve Apostles. This adds up to fifteen apostles and is not the same as Jesus’ twelve apostles.

They also maintain that Peter, James and John were the First Presidency of the early church. But they were part of the twelve, not in addition to the twelve.

If Mormonism is going to insist that the church today must be set up exactly as it was under Christ then they have too many apostles. The Mormons cannot have it both ways. Either they are a “restoration” that is exactly like the New Testament church or they are setting up something different from the early Christian church.

Thus we see that besides the problem that Mormon priesthood concepts are not in accord with the New Testament, the lack of historical references in early LDS documents to priesthood restoration leaves us with no reason to accept the Mormon claim of priesthood authority.

False Prophets?

While Mormons insist that there needs to be a prophet at the head of the church they seem to ignore the New Testament warnings of false prophets.

Matthew 24:24, warns “For false christs and false prophets will rise and show great signs and wonders to deceive, if possible, even the elect.”

We should test those who claim to be prophets. In 1 John 4:1, we are counselled: “Beloved, do not believe every spirit, but test the spirits, whether they are of God; because many false prophets have gone out into the world.”21

CONCLUSION

If the LDS people want to truly follow the New Testament model they will need to renounce their claims to Aaronic and Melchizedek priesthoods and embrace the priesthood of all believers. In 1 Peter 2:4-5 we read:

As you come to him, the living Stone—rejected by humans but chosen by God and precious to him—you also, like living stones, are being built into a spiritual house to be a holy priesthood, offering spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ.

Christians everywhere look to Jesus’ death and resurrection for the atonement for our sins, trusting Christ alone for Eternal Life, thus becoming part of His holy priesthood.

EXCERPTS FROM LETTERS AND EMAILS

October 2017: I just finished listening to your podcast on the Mormon podcast community. I found it so fascinating and couldn’t stop listening to your story. I immediately recognized you because I worked at ____ bank and used to see your Utah lighthouse checks come in all the time. . . . I remember being curious what it was and looked it up online and was so offended that you were “anti Mormon” that I am afraid I was very judgmental and not as friendly as I should have been. I didn’t understand at that time why someone would “attack” the church. It is amazing how much I have evolved since then and the wool has been lifted from my eyes. It’s been a long and difficult journey but I now think of you as a heroine and admire the courage it took to expose the Mormon church against so much opposition. Thank you for devoting your life to such a worthy cause. I am sorry for the judgmental person that I was. I no longer work at that bank but I wish I did so that next time I saw you I could get the chance to be a friendlier person to you and get to know you a little better. . . . anyway, God Bless.

October 2017: I love being LDS

November 2017: You inspired me to find Christ. I have been a Christian for several years. I was living in Florida when The Wilders Son found Christ and brought the rest of his family in. You are a True pioneer . . . thank You for your courage. It gave me courage to make the choice to become a Christian. I love Jesus and I love Sandra and Gerald Tanner.

P.S. I called you 10 years ago at my darkest hour in my faith Crisis. You talked through to a place where I could choose and be happy . . . you have made such a difference.

November 2017: Yesterday, I finally came full circle in a story that began over 40 years ago while serving my mission as a young zone leader in the western suburbs of Sydney, Australia. A family that my companion and I were teaching expressed interest in the church but said that they had come across some questions that gave them pause and they hoped that we would be able to resolve these questions for them during our discussions appointments. Being young, fully converted and never doubting that the church was everything that it claimed to be and also unknowingly being very naïve . . . we assured this family that there was not a question that could not be answered to their full and complete satisfaction. The father then handed me a book, Mormonism: Shadow or Reality by Gerald and Sandra Tanner. We promised to read the book and return with answers.

Despite being raised in an active LDS family, being completely devout and graduating from 4 years of seminary and a missionary preparation class at the local Institute of Religion, nothing had prepared me for this book.

Upon returning to our flat, aka apartment, I began to browse through the book. It didn’t take me long to realize that nothing in my previous 20 years of life had prepared me for what I was reading. Joseph’s compete disregard for living the word of wisdom such as riding his horse down the streets of Nauvoo while smoking his cigar, multiple changes and additions to the Doctrine and Covenants, Nephi being the name of the angel that appeared to Joseph instead of Moroni were just a few of the earth shattering revelations that rocked what I had thought was a firm unshakable testimony.

Needless to say I didn’t get very far in the book before I realized that were I to continue to read further, what testimony I had left would be torn to shreds, so devastating were the seemingly credible claims I was reading.

It’s hard to describe the depth of the spiritual pain I fell in, . . . I approached God as a broken, devastated missionary and pleaded with Him to give me answers. I remember pouring out my heart and with tears flowing down my face, sharing my fears in what the consequences of these new revelations would mean. . . . [after an unusual event that he took to mean the church was true, he put our book aside] I went on with my mission becoming even more committed and dedicated than I had been before. I believed that God had personally intervened in my life and answered my prayer in a very real and direct manner.

Following my mission my life followed a very traditional Mormon path, dedication to the church, temple wedding, leadership positions etc. But somewhere buried deep within me, lying dormant, were those seeds of doubt that had been planted from reading the Tanner book. . . . In the many years since my mission, other doubts creped in, with a emergence of DNA, questions on why a people that are claimed to have filled the whole of America could [be] real and yet leave no trace of their existence. Of learning of the anachronisms in the Book of Mormon, discovering that Joseph would make things up and pass his stories off as factual truth . . . such as the Book of Abraham and the story of Zelph and many, many more which I won’t go into.

As my many doubts accumulated and as I tried to cling to belief, I would always hold to the experience of my miracle while on my mission to keep me going. But eventually my shelf became too heavy and one day I realized that all of these issues simply disappeared if I accepted the conclusion that the church simply wasn’t what it claimed to be.
Yes making this conclusion caused me to have to reinterpret this and other seeming miracles in my life as just random circumstances instead of a God taking a personal interest in me and interceding in my life.

For years I have known that the Tanner’s Lighthouse ministry bookstore is located on West Temple across from the Salt Lake Bee’s Baseball Field. I have driven past the building many times over the years, thinking someday I need to go in there and share my missionary experience with the Tanner’s but never have. Early on it would have been to go and testify to the lies that they were spewing but in recent years it would have been to share the story of how their book was instrumental in planting the seeds that would eventually lead me out of Mormonism.

Yesterday, as I was driving along West Temple, I passed the store and I thought today is the day. . . I’m going to go in there. Upon entering, I asked if Sandra was available and was quickly introduced to a kind, gentle grandmotherly woman. After introducing myself, I proceeded to share my story.

For years I have thought about what this day might be like and I must admit that the years of my Mormon indoctrination did kick in which had taught me to fear this woman and what she represented, but those fears quickly vanish as I shared my story. We had a nice friendly conversation, one not unlike the many she must have on a weekly bases from others who have also discovered that the church is not what it claims to be. After sharing my story of how her book had been a real miracle in my life, I thanked her and left. The seed that she had help[ed] plant over 40 years ago had finally grown into a full tree and born fruit, the fruit of truth and knowledge.

November 2017: I have experienced many emotions as I have come to the realization that Joseph was not only a false prophet but also an Antichrist, in my opinion. I feel angry and betrayed. I live here in Utah. My family genealogy goes back to the beginning of the formation of the LDS church and on both sides of my family. I was raised in a polygamist family to later become LDS. It scares me to know how deeply this religion is embedded into our very fibers of our body. Once the greatest truth and now I just see another cult. My heart does break and yet I rejoice to come to this knowledge. I am so thankful for you and others like you who made the sacrifice to embrace the truth and then labor continually for people like me. I cry tears of relief and thankfulness to God and to you who serve him, thank you, thank you and may God bless you forever for your work.

December 2017: I am a family law attorney (married 29 years) and father of four. . . I am a returned missionary and have been an active tithe paying member throughout my life.

My doubts about LDS truth claims began when watching the PBS special “The Mormons” in about 2008. For the first time, I learned that Joseph Smith “translated” the Book of Mormon using a seer stone.

Since that time, I have undertaken a deep study of LDS history. About six months ago, my proverbial “shelf” collapsed. I have heard and clearly understand that Joseph Smith was deceptive and that he engaged in a pattern of making repeated grandiose and untrue claims.

The good news is that my faith in Christ is stronger than ever. I am excited that I can now follow Christ free from the clutter and distraction of Joseph Smith’s incorrect ideas. (Though, I have also taken many good things with me.) I have started to attend a non-denominational Christian Church. . .

All of that said, I must now socially operate within a strong LDS family, neighborhood, and social network.

December 2017: Thank you for helping people like me out of Mormonism. Your documents have been enlightening and I treasure this new, free relationship I have come to know with Christ. Continue the good work!

January 2018: Sandra tanner is a joke

January 2018: I am so shocked to find that the one true church isn’t as true as it claims. After 56 years of devotion and donating I’m angry. My husband seems to think that only Mormons tell the truth while everyone else makes up lies. I feel so lost and alone.

February 2018: Your Darkhouse will soon join Jerald in his darkhouse. I think he is with the evil spirits and you soon will join him in Outer Darkness. I think you both are son/daughter of perdition. You have accepted the antichrist as your savior, Satan/

Sandra Tanner? Good candidate for the Missionary Alliance Church, whatever man-made group of teachings that may be. Sandra would crucify the Saviour all over again if He tried to teach her the truth. Very strange.

Trinity? Oh yeah. That’s a word found in the Bible. Right, Sandra. Oh. Maybe not. But we should believe this Catholic innovation. Because . . . Always fun to read your ramblings.

March 2018: I recently came to the Lighthouse Bookstore with my missions team Evangelical Mormon Interactions from Biola University. I was able to listen to Sandra tell some of her story and tell of her ministry. I just wanted to say that I found out after my trip to Utah that it was because of Sandra and Jerald Tanner’s book, The Changing World of Mormonism, that my mom decided to finally leave the Mormon church when she was 20 years old. From there she raised me and my brother to be evangelical Christians. It certainly is wonderful to see how God works in families’ lives.

March 2018: Sandra, when was the last time that you prayed and asked the Lord to forgive your sins?

Acts 3:19 “Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out.”

If you are not repenting of your sins then Satan has deceived you into a false sense of complacency, and as a result of this deception and the accumulation of sin in your life, you cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven . . . worlds without end.

March 18: [My family and] I drove out to the Mountain Meadows Massacre site. They were vaguely aware of the atrocity but knew nothing about it. Now they do know about it, not only as a historical curiosity in the distant past, but also as an evil event in the history of the Mormon Church. Good enough.

I have begun reading Mormon Enigma and am hoping I will be able to recommend it to my wife. From what I have read so far, I think I will be able to without causing any stress or hurt feelings. My goal is to avoid rude bashing of the faith, but instead to make available or gently reveal historical facts that are not known . . .

As for myself . . . it is by reason that I am a firm believer in an intelligent creator. It is by faith that I believe he is good invited her to read the book, but she complained about the lack of time to do so, which is actually true. Interestingly, a lady at work knows who you are and is fairly well informed about Mormon history. She has even ordered books from your store.

When she saw that I was reading Mormon Enigma she asked if she could read it when I was finished. It now sits on her desk. My next book I have just started is Grant Palmer’s An Insider’s View . . . Following that will be Charles Larson’s book on the papyri. I will save . . . your [Mormonism—] Shadow or Reality for last as I think that one is going to take some time to get through.

April 2018: One of the best moments of my transition from Mormonism was the chance to sit down and talk to Sandra for a couple of hours. She kindly asked about “my story,” we talked doctrine, and most importantly grace in Jesus Christ. Oh, and I got to apologize for harboring the bad feelings I held for she and Jerald because they had indirectly made my life as a Mormon missionary a refiners fire! You two are pioneers in your own right, and have my admiration and gratitude.

April 2018: Sandra Tanner has a large resource of published works and YouTube videos that allowed me to start to examine why the Mormon church is false and what is the truth.

I began my exploration when I woke up and asked what happened to the gold plates and found out they had conveniently been taken into heaven. Mormonism is burdensome to women, not just lacking power and equality, but in wanting to maintain family ties. There are so many broken family lines and those who do not believe, that the church cannot be true. When the absurd facts about Joseph Smith fall into place, it is a great relief to know that through Sandra Tanner I was able to see it for what it was and let it go. Polygamy is dreaded by church women and they fear being subject to it in the “next life.”

Thank you Sandra Tanner. Access to your works continue to keep me mindful of the truth.

May 2018: I was born into the Mormon Church and my family dates back to 1848 when my ancestors were “sealed” in the temple. I always felt guilty because I could never keep all the laws and commandments they required so I would try, fail, give up and rebel. It was a vicious cycle. . . . [years later] I started to perform my own research. I noticed the Bible taught a completely different Gospel and I trusted the Bible over the Church due to the overwhelming evidence. . . . I was still living in the world and was selfish. . . . I fell on my knees and worshiped Jesus as my personal savior, I surrendered my life to Him and was Changed at that moment. My whole view of Grace was completely WRONG. I was baptized shortly after and I have been sharing the good news with everyone I run into. There was a major change due to faith, fear of the Lord, and gratitude for Grace. I was mormon for 25 years and have been born again (praise God) for 1 year.

"A Major Victory for Satan"
Nicknames Pronounced Blasphemous by President Nelson

A revelation from God? Refraining from using “LDS,” “Mormon” demanded by Nelson
By Eric Johnson of Mormonism Research Ministry

Russell M. Nelson, the 17th president of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, made a claim that God personally revealed to him how “LDS,” “Mormon,” “Mormonism,” and other nicknames referring to the church, the religion and its adherents are offensive to God. Nelson first explained this revelation on August 16, 2018, where he said that “the Lord impressed upon my mind the importance of the name He decreed for His Church, even The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.”

As he toured central and eastern Canada a few days later, he seemed surprised by the hubbub caused by his announcement. He told one crowd, “We released that announcement to the media on Thursday, and oh, they’re pretty excited about it—‘it can’t be done.’ I know it can’t—but it’s going to be, because the Lord wants it that way.”

Speaking at the October 2018 general conference, Nelson argued that the new policy was not a “name change,” “rebranding,” “cosmetic,” “a whim,” or “inconsequential.” He started his main talk by saying,

Some weeks ago, I released a statement regarding a course correction for the name of the Church. . . . Instead, it is a correction. It is the command of the Lord. Joseph Smith did not name the Church restored through him; neither did Mormon. It was the Savior Himself who said, “For thus shall my church be called in the last days, even The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.” . . . Thus, the name of the Church is not negotiable. When the Savior clearly states what the name of His Church should be and even precedes His declaration with, “Thus shall my church be called,” He is serious. And if we allow nicknames to be used or adopt or even sponsor those nicknames ourselves, He is offended.

To say that God is offended when people use nicknames of this church is a pretty serious charge, seemingly on the same level as the breaking of the First Commandment. Such a claim has no biblical origins, as no biblical apostle or prophet ever argued about what the early church and its people ought to be called. According to Acts 11:26, “the disciples were called Christians first at Antioch.” Referenced only three times in the New Testament, the word “Christian” appears to have been a derogatory reference used by the enemies of the early church—notice, the name was “given” to them and not something they apparently appointed for themselves.

1 Also see another article by Eric Johnson, “Russell M. Nelson draws a line in the sand over LDS and Mormon describing his church and people,” http://www.mrm.org/nelsons-mandate

It certainly was not used positively by King Agrippa in Acts 17:28 when he asked Paul, “Do you think that in such a short time you can persuade me to be a Christian?” Nelson continued in his conference talk, What’s in a name or, in this case, a nickname? When it comes to nicknames of the Church, such as the “LDS Church,” the “Mormon Church,” or the “Church of the Latter-day Saints,” the most important thing in those names is the absence of the Savior’s name. To remove the Lord’s name from the Lord’s Church is a major victory for Satan. When we discard the Savior’s name, we are subtly disregarding all that Jesus Christ did for us—even His Atonement. . . . When we omit His name from His Church, we are inadvertently removing Him as the central focus of our lives.

If Nelson’s church is supposed to be a restoration of Christianity, where do we find anything in the Bible to say that the early church was called after the name of Jesus? In the quotes given by Nelson above (including the name of his conference talk), notice how Nelson continually uses “the Church” (capitalized, of course, as he is referencing “The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints”). Shouldn’t God be offended by Nelson’s lack of reference to Jesus in reference to the “Church” in the same way that He is said to be “offended” when someone uses “LDS” or “Mormon”? After all, both examples fail to use “Jesus” in the name God supposedly gave to Joseph Smith.

Another question. Was God “offended” when Nelson’s church did not have the name of Jesus Christ in its early years? MRM founder Bill McKeever writes,

If Mormons wish to use this argument, they must answer as to why their own church was called merely “The Church of the Latter-day Saints” from 1834-1838. By their reasoning their own church must have been in apostasy for at least four years. Those who belonged to the early Christian church were known more by their geographic location rather than an “organizational” name. In I Thessalonians 1:1 Paul addresses “The church of the Thessalonians.” Are we to assume that Paul was addressing a false church?

Nelson decided to give two pragmatic reasons for why the change was needed:

For much of the world, the Lord’s Church is presently disguised as the “Mormon Church.” But we as members of the Lord’s Church know who stands at its head: Jesus Christ Himself. Unfortunately, many who hear the term Mormon may think that we worship Mormon. Not so! We honor and respect that great ancient American prophet. But we are not Mormon’s disciples. We are the Lord’s disciples.

The idea that “Mormon” in “Mormon Church” is a reference to the fictional character by the same name found in the Book of “Mormon” is something I certainly have never thought of, nor do I think the average person thinks this is the case. It sure seems to be a stretch to even make this point.

For his second reason, Nelson said,

In the early days of the restored Church, terms such as Mormon Church and Mormons were often used as epithets—as cruel terms, abusive terms—designed to obliterate God’s hand in restoring the Church of Jesus Christ in these latter days.

As mentioned above, the term “Christian” was not self-appointed by the biblical apostles. Rather, it was given and apparently used by outsiders in a deriding manner. Yet the days of “Mormon” being a “cruel” or “abusive” term are long over. Nobody watching the Broadway play The Book of Mormon will walk away thinking such a thing. Neither do the Latter-day Saints themselves who have used these terms in an affectionate manner in reference to themselves. This is why, until October 2018, there was a “Mormon Tabernacle Choir.” And what about the “I am a Mormon” campaign, the Meet the Mormons movie that began playing at Temple Square in 2014, or the website “Mormon.org”? Over the years the word Mormon has been a common descriptor used by the church leaders and its members as well as outsiders such as the media and MRM. With so many other issues that God could communicate to Nelson about, why this one? And why now?

WHAT SHOULD THE CHURCH BE CALLED?

At the end of Nelson’s talk, he said,

Our revised style guide is helpful. It states: “In the first reference, the full name of the Church is preferred: ‘The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.’ When a shortened [second] reference is needed, the terms ‘the Church’ or the ‘Church of Jesus Christ’ are encouraged. The ‘restored Church of Jesus Christ’ is also accurate and encouraged.”

There are problems with the command given by Nelson. For instance,

3 Nelson, General Conference (October 2018).
4 Bill McKeever, “Examining the ‘17 Points of the True Church,’” http://www.mrm.org/17-points

5 Nelson, General Conference (October 2018).
• The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints takes 47 keystrokes to write. It is unwieldy and would be laborious to write (and read) over and over again.
• It is redundant. When we talk about a person, we can use personal pronouns (he, him, etc) that help minimize the redundancy. The same is needed for the proper name of this church.
• Imagine how many Latter-day Saints might think the Christian is mocking them by repeating the church’s whole name over and over again.
• There is a theological problem with Christians referring to this religious organization as “the Church” (capitalized), the “Church of Jesus Christ,” or “the restored Church of Jesus Christ.” These names are truth claims. Christians don’t hold that this is God’s “Church,” nor do they believe it is Jesus’s church or that Christ’s church even needed to be “restored.” (Calling it the “restored church” would mean that we agree with the “great apostasy,” something Christians completely reject.)

Nelson references Doctrine and Covenants 115:4 (from the Standard Works) to support his case. It says, “For thus shall my church be called in the last days, even The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.” If this is the church’s name, then why does Nelson encourage his followers to use names that are different from this command? After all, if “Mormon Church” or “LDS Church” are offensive to God because they are not the “real” names of the church, then how is it any better to call it the “Church of Jesus Christ” or even “the Church,” a name that completely omits the name of Jesus? His reasoning seems inconsistent.

The church-owned Deseret News printed a story regarding the name change that explained how difficult it is to come up with suitable alternative references. On August 25, 2018, reporter Doug Wilks wrote, Fundamentally, there is no Mormon church nor Latter-day Saint (LDS) church. Yet over the decades those terms have been accepted, perhaps as a way to draw distinction from other Christian denominations, or in an effort to reclaim a term (Mormon) that was once used as a slur against church members.

Wilks went on to say that the church has every right to self-name itself and therefore journalists should consider the wishes of this organization. It is true that the church leadership can ask to be called by any name it wants. But when its leaders demand that truth claim names ought to be used in replacement, the line is drawn and we won’t cross it. This revelation is going to cause many problems with headlines in newspapers—imagine having to use the full name of the church in headlines and take up all the space. What is most frustrating for both the secular media as well as apologetic ministries such as Mormonism Research Ministry is that Nelson does not provide suitable alternatives while merely offering faith-promoting choices that are not appropriate for outside organizations to use.

Despite Nelson’s edict, Salt Lake Tribune’s Peggy Fletcher Stack—Nelson said at a press conference that he knows this religion reporter’s family personally—continues to use “LDS,” “Mormon” and “Mormonism” throughout her writing. Typically, she uses the church’s complete name at the beginning of her story before referencing it with these other abbreviations and names.

The headline writers at this paper are also not catering to this church’s whim. Here are some recent article headlines from the past month that were used in the online edition of the Salt Lake Tribune:

• “A dozen new LDS temples announced”—Oct. 8, 2018
• “Put serving God and his children before chores, urge Mormon’s women leaders”—Oct. 7, 2018
• “About the new Mormon Sunday meeting schedule”—Oct. 7, 2018
• “Mormons rejoice at news of shorter Sunday services”—Oct. 7, 2018
• “With the church’s blessing, Mormon girls are passing the sacrament”—Oct. 3, 2018
• “USU names finalists to head up Mormon studies program”—Oct. 2, 2018
• “Nelson and the ‘R’ word: Why this Mormon prophet speaks more openly about revelations from God than his predecessors did”—Oct. 2, 2018
• “More millennial Mormons are choosing a middle way”—Sept. 29, 2018
• “No Scouting doesn’t mean an end to church-sponsored camping for Mormon youths”—Sept. 21, 2018
• “Mormon church takes another step in its anti-Prop 2 push”—September 20, 2018

When Latter-day Saints are questioned by outsiders about their religious affiliation, Nelson gave a way to respond:

If someone should ask, “Are you a Mormon?” you could reply, “If you are asking if I am a member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, yes, I am!” If someone asks, “Are you a Latter-day Saint?” you might respond, “Yes, I am. I believe in Jesus Christ and am a member of His restored Church.”

The first response sounds prideful. The questioner wasn’t asking if the person was a “member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints” but whether the person is a “Mormon.” Instead of simply stating it as is (i.e., responding with “our prophet has asked us to refer to Latter-day Saints and not ‘Mormons’”), a correction is given in the answer that is the question that ought to have been asked and is nothing more than an end-around. If it were me, I’d rather the Latter-day Saint be upfront than play the game that Nelson is encouraging.

Changes of Names in Church Organizations

Before the October 2018 general conference began, the church announced that the name of the Mormon Tabernacle Choir was changed to “The Tabernacle Choir at Temple Square.” The old website “mormontabernaclechoir.org” has been rerouted to “thetabernaclechoir.org,” even though the first sentence on the site still reads “Visitors to Salt Lake City may attend a live broadcast of Music and the Spoken Word featuring the Mormon Tabernacle Choir on Sunday mornings.” (Imagine the impossible job given to the webmaster in charge of the church’s websites to change all of the thousands of articles using the wrong names!)

At the time of this article, the website Mormon.org has not been rerouted anywhere else. However, its main page has been changed and begins this way: “Welcome. This is The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, a community where we’re all trying to be a little bit better, a little bit kinder, a little more helpful—because that’s what Jesus taught. Welcome.”

Many other websites or names have not been changed, including “Lds.org” and “Ldschurchnews.com.” Hundreds of videos that came from the “I’m a Mormon” campaign that took place between 2010-2015 are still listed on a church-owned website. Unless the church decides to take these videos down, this series seems to be at great risk, especially if God is truly offended at the nickname “Mormon.”

A Revelation from God? Or an Old General Authority’s Prejudice?

Nelson is claiming that he has received nothing less than a “revelation” from God, making it clear that God “impressed” this into his mind. We must wonder if this policy change will need to be added into the Doctrine and Covenants, the place where other modern revelations of God—mostly given to Joseph Smith—have been placed. In her October 2, 2018, article Salt Lake Tribune writer Peggy Fletcher Stack wrote,

By his own account, Russell M. Nelson speaks often to God, or, rather, God speaks often to him. Nelson, the 94-year-old president of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, said recently that he was awakened at 2 a.m. with a distinct impression that he should go to the Dominican Republic. Within days, the Church News reported, the energetic nonagenarian was on a plane to that Caribbean nation. . . . Indeed, in his first nearly nine months as the Utah-based faith’s top “prophet, seer and revelator,” Nelson has used the term “revelation” again and again to describe his motivation for initiatives and changes.

Noting that few of Nelson’s predecessors have used the “revelation” card when it came to receiving communication from God, Stack writes that Nelson has never shied away from the word, saying,

In January, the month Nelson took the faith’s reins, his wife, Wendy Watson Nelson, reported that one night she was prompted to leave her husband alone in their bedroom. “Two hours later, he emerged from the room,” Wendy Nelson told apostle Neil L. Andersen, who reported it on Facebook. “Wendy, you won’t believe what’s been happening,” the church president told his wife, according to Andersen’s account. “The Lord has given me detailed instructions on what I am to do.”

When Nelson wanted “to strengthen [his] proposal to his second wife Wendy (his first wife, Dantzel, had died), he told his prospective wife, “I know about revelation and how to receive it.” (Wouldn’t every single guy like to have such an advantage?) When he was the president of the apostles in January 2016, Nelson used the word “revelation” to describe a church policy on homosexuals mandating that married same-sex couples be considered “apostates” and their children be excluded from church rituals until they are 18.

According to Wendy, her husband “thrives on change.” In a five minute video interview that aired the last week of October 2018, she said,

I have seen him changing in the last 10 months. It is as though he’s been unleashed. He’s free to finally do what he came to earth to do. . . . He’s free to follow through with things he’s been concerned about but could never do. Now that he’s president of [the church], he can do those things. He’s not afraid to do something different. If we’re really preparing the church and the world for the Second Coming of the Savior, he is sincere about that. He doesn’t want us spending money, time, energy on anything that isn’t really focused on that. . . . I’ve seen him become younger. I’ve seen him become happier because he’s doing what he came to earth to do.

6 Peggy Fletcher Stack, “Nelson and the ‘R’ word, Why this Mormon prophet speaks more openly about revelations from God than his predecessors did,” Salt Lake Tribune, (October 2, 2018).

7 Ibid.

In that same video, Nelson said to buckle up because we haven’t seen anything yet. He enthusiastically stated,

If you think the church has been fully restored, you’re just seeing the beginning. There is much more to come. . . Wait till next year. And then the next year. Eat your vitamin pills. Get your rest. It’s going to be exciting.9

Latter-day Saints who may have enjoyed the “status quo” may be a bit concerned. After all, is this a man who has taken his personal views—including the idea that “Mormon” and “LDS” are offensive to God—and manipulated his people to think that it is God who is directing him to act. What incredible power there is to be the top dog in this religious organization!

HAS THE CHURCH BEEN DOING IT “WRONG” ALL ALONG?

To me, the most amazing comment in his general conference address is where he references Jesus:

After all He had endured—and after all He had done for humankind—I realize with profound regret that we have unwittingly acquiesced in the Lord’s restored Church being called by other names, each of which expunges the sacred name of Jesus Christ!10

Notice carefully what Nelson is saying when he says “we have unwittingly acquiesced in the Lord’s restored Church being called by other names.” Whether it was done intentionally or not, he is saying that it has been wrong by leaders to have left the name of Jesus out of any reference to the church.

To understand the power of the statement, it needs to be made clear that Latter-day Saint leaders do not “apologize.” The words used by Nelson (“profound regret”) is the closest an LDS leader gets to admitting something was not right. As an example, consider the words of Henry B. Eyring who, at the time the first counselor in the First Presidency. Speaking at a special conference titled “150th Anniversary of Mountain Meadows,” he said:

What was done here long ago by members of our Church represents a terrible and inexcusable departure from Christian teaching and conduct. We cannot change what happened, but we can remember and honor those who were killed here. We express profound regret for the massacre carried out in this valley 150 years ago today and for the undue and untold suffering experienced by the victims then and by their relatives to the present time. A separate expression of regret is owed to the Paiute people who have unjustly borne for too long the principal blame for what occurred during the massacre. Although the extent of their involvement is disputed, it is believed they would not have participated without the direction and stimulus provided by local Church leaders and members.11

Although several media outlets (including the church-owned Deseret News) announced that Eyring had “apologized,” although this was not accurate. In fact, church spokesman Mark Tuttle felt the need to clarify the media’s mistake soon afterward when he told the media, “We don’t use the word ‘apology.’ We used ‘profound regret.’” The phrase “profound regret” is purposely meant to be a rung below “apology,” but it is still mightily strong.

By using the word “we” in the above quote, we should understand that this is a reference to previous LDS leaders. As an apostle speaking at the April 1990 general conference, Nelson firmly laid out his thinking in a message titled “Thus Shall My Church Be Called.” He cited Doctrine and Covenants 115:4 (“Thus shall my church be called in the last days, even The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints”) and said,

Note carefully the language of the Lord. He did not say, “Thus shall my church be named.” He said, “Thus shall my church be called.” Years ago, its members were cautioned by the Brethren who wrote: “We feel that some may be misled by the too frequent use of the term ‘Mormon Church’” (Member-Missionary Class—Instructor’s Guide, Salt Lake City: The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, 1982, p. 2). Before any other name is considered to be a legitimate substitute, the thoughtful person might reverently consider the feelings of the Heavenly Parent who bestowed that name.12

I am unclear about the difference between the words “named” and “called.” Wasn’t the church “named” The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints? And isn’t that what it is supposed to be called? If so, I fail to see how these are different.

Then, at the end of the talk, Nelson cited from Doctrine and Covenants 63 and said that

10 Nelson, General Conference (October 2018).
just as we revere His holy name, we likewise revere the name that He decreed for His church. As members of His church, we are privileged to participate in its divine destiny. May we so honor Him who declared, “Thus shall my church be called . . . The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints,” I pray in the sacred name of Jesus Christ, amen.13

Six months later, future 15th President Gordon B. Hinckley—who was Nelson’s superior and served at that time as the first counselor in the First Presidency—gave additional insight. In his October 1990 talk “Mormon Should Mean ‘More Good,’” Hinckley made a direct reference to Nelson’s message. He cited the following poem:

Father calls me William,
Sister calls me Will,
Mother calls me Willie,
But the fellers call me Bill.

After citing this, he said,

I suppose that regardless of our efforts, we may never convert the world to general use of the full and correct name of the Church. Because of the shortness of the word Mormon and the ease with which it is spoken and written, they will continue to call us the Mormons, the Mormon church, and so forth. They could do worse.

When he asked a friend how Latter-day Saints could get people to use the proper name of the church, his friend replied, “You can’t. The word Mormon is too deeply ingrained and too easy to say.” He went on, “I’ve quit trying. While I’m thankful for the privilege of being a follower of Jesus Christ and a member of the Church which bears His name, I am not ashamed of the nickname Mormon.”

“Look,” he went on to say, “if there is any name that is totally honorable in its derivation, it is the name Mormon. And so, when someone asks me about it and what it means, I quietly say—‘Mormon means more good.’” (The Prophet Joseph Smith first said this in 1843; see Times and Seasons, 4:194; Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith, pp. 299–300.)

Later, Hinckley said, “We may not be able to change the nickname, but we can make it shine with added luster.” Referring to the name Mormon, he said,

After all, it is the name of a man who was a great prophet who struggled to save his nation, and also the name of a book which is a mighty testament of eternal truth, a veritable witness of the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ. May I remind you for a moment of the greatness and of the goodness of this man Mormon.

In a quote that must have chafed the current president’s hide and clearly contradicts the Lord’s feelings as supposedly revealed by Nelson in 2018, Hinckley went on to say,

And so, while I sometimes regret that people do not call this church by its proper name, I am happy that the nickname they use is one of great honor made so by a remarkable man and a book which gives an unmatched testimony concerning the Redeemer of the world. Anyone who comes to know the man Mormon, through the reading and pondering of his words, anyone who reads this precious trove of history which was assembled and preserved in large measure by him, will come to know that Mormon is not a word of disrepute, but that it represents the greatest good—that good which is of God.

Hinckley concluded by saying how “in a very real sense Mormonism must mean that greater good which the Lord Jesus Christ exemplified.”

I must ask what Nelson meant when he expressed “profound regret” for those who “unwittingly acquiesced” by not using the name of Jesus in conjunction with the church’s name. Could he have been referencing someone like Hinckley more than a quarter century before seemingly upstaged Nelson’s earlier talk?

It’s not as if other leaders haven’t talked about the issue in apparent agreement with Nelson. For instance, Marion G. Romney, a member of the First Presidency, believed with Nelson that the correct name of the church is its full name, though he wasn’t fazed by the use of “Mormons” or the “Mormon church.” He said,

Members of the Church do not resent being referred to as Mormons, nor does the Church resent being referred to as the Mormon church. As we have said, however, it is not the correct name of the Church. Its correct name is, as we have already explained, “The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints” (D&C 115:4).14

At the April 2011 general conference, senior apostle Boyd K. Packer explained, Obedient to revelation, we call ourselves The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints rather than the Mormon Church. It is one thing for others to refer to the Church as the Mormon Church or to us as Mormons; it is quite another for us to do so.15

At the October 2014 conference, Ballard said he had been given a “clear impression” to tell his people how “we should not” reference the church as Mormon Church or LDS Church.” A divine commandment, it wasn’t. But, then contradicting Nelson’s latest edict, he also said,

The term Mormon can be appropriately used in some contexts to refer to members of the Church, such as Mormon pioneers, or to institutions, such as the Mormon Tabernacle Choir. Church members are widely known as Mormons, and in interactions with those not of our faith, we may fittingly refer to ourselves as Mormons, provided we couple this with the full name of the Church.16

Let’s consider some of the other leaders who have used these synonyms when referring to their own church or people, as referenced from Bill McKeever’s wonderful resource book In their Own Words:

John Taylor:

“CHRISTIANITY WILL BEAR HONEST INVESTIGATION.—We call ourselves Christians, that is, we Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Episcopalians and Mormons, we call all ourselves Christians. Well, perhaps we are, and then, perhaps we are not” (John Taylor, The Gospel Kingdom, p. 75).

“Now I come to us, Mormons. We are the only true Church, so we say. We have the only true faith, so we say and believe. I believe we have many great and true principles revealed from the heavens. I will tell you how I feel about it, and what I have said many times when I have been abroad among the priests, people, and philosophers. If any man under the heavens can show me one principle of error that I have entertained, I will lay it aside forthwith, and be thankful for the information” (John Taylor, The Gospel Kingdom, p. 50).

Joseph Fielding Smith:

“The Latter-day Saints, so commonly called ‘Mormons,’” have no animosity towards the Negro. Neither have they described him as belonging to an ‘inferior race’” (Joseph Fielding Smith, Answers to Gospel Questions 4:170).

B. H. Roberts. In a book titled—ironically—“Mormon Doctrine of Deity:”

“Some of the sectarian ministers are saying that we Mormons are ashamed of the doctrine announced by President Brigham Young, to the effect that Adam will thus be the God of this world. No, friends, it is not that we are ashamed of that doctrine. If you see any change coming over our countenance when this doctrine is named, it is surprise, astonishment, that any one at all capable of grasping the largeness and extent of the universe, the grandeur of existence and the possibilities in man for growth, for progress, should be so lean of intellect, should have such a paucity of understanding as to call it in question at all. That is what our change in countenance means—not shame for the doctrine Brigham Young taught” (B. H. Roberts, Mormon Doctrine of Deity, pp. 42-43).

John A. Widtsoe:

“Enemies of the Church, or stupid people, reading also that Adam is ‘our father and our God’ have heralded far and wide that the Mormons believe that Jesus Christ was begotten of Adam” (John A. Widtsoe, Evidences and Reconciliations, p. 56).

Hugh B. Brown:

“All men, regardless of the degree of their guilt or innocence, will be resurrected from the dead, and this belief also becomes a foundation stone in the structure of the Mormon Church. But in addition to this general salvation through the atonement, every soul that lives in mortality to the age of responsibility may place himself within the reach of divine mercy and may obtain a remission of sin” (Hugh B. Brown, Conference Reports, April 1965, p. 43).

Bruce R. McConkie:

“Mormons are true Christians; their worship is the pure, unadulterated Christianity authored by Christ and accepted by Peter, James, and John and all the ancient saints” (Bruce R. McConkie, Mormon Doctrine, 1966, p. 513).

Bernard P. Brockbank:

“It is true that many of the Christian churches worship a different Jesus Christ than is worshiped by the Mormons or The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints” (Bernard P. Brockbank, “The Living Christ,” Ensign (Conference Edition), May 1977, p. 26).

Many other examples from church leaders could be given. (In fact, go to my earlier article here for similar citations.) Were these the type of citations for which Nelson expressed “profound regret”? Did these men wrongly use these nicknames “unwittingly”? Or did these leaders know better and were not in step with God’s will? (If they are general authorities of the church, shouldn’t they have known better?)

Another question: If Nelson understood that it was wrong to use LDS and Mormon in 1990—and he clearly did—then why did it take him (and the church) so long to reveal God’s will for this religion? More than a quarter of a century has passed by and yet the leaders sat back, doing nothing officially, while approving the “I am a Mormon” campaign and hosting websites such as Mormon.org and LDS.org?

Facebook commentator Steve McKnight makes a great point when he commented,

It has been my experience that when a new boss is put in charge, the first thing they want to do is renovate their office, give it a new look. This has to be a personal preference as this issue with the names hadn’t been a problem in the past and was even promoted at one point. Had this been an issue with the Mormon god as LDS President Nelson has suggested, why has their god(s) not impressed this upon past LDS prophets?

We must state the obvious: By his statement, Nelson has now placed any misuse of the name of the church into the sin category. If this is the case, then what about those leaders who used these inappropriate nicknames and abbreviations who are now passed away? If they offended the Lord by using these terms, wasn’t repentance required? In fact, how many living Latter-day Saints who commonly used “Mormon,” “LDS,” and “Mormonism”—all the while offending God—have repented this upon the person as sin? It seems Nelson has placed his people, both dead and living, in quite the precarious position.

Meanwhile, a number of LDS authors writing about their own religion have referenced a banned term such as “Mormon” in the titles of their books. Consider just four:

- What should we now call Bruce R. McConkie’s classic work Mormon Doctrine (“The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saint Doctrine”)?
- Popular young writer Al Carraway’s book More than the Tattooed Mormon needs to be changed to More than the Tattooed Latter-day Saint.
- Charles R. Harrell needs to reinvent his book’s title, “This is My Doctrine”: The Development of Mormon Theology.
- And BYU professor Stephen E. Robinson needs to adjust his title of Are Mormons Christian?

I’m just touching the tip of the iceberg.

Misuse of the Church’s Name on Websites

Current church website www.mormon.org (when will that site’s name be changed?) references the religious organization and its people in the old ways. For instance, consider just one page on the site https://www.mormon.org/beliefs/church-community:

- “What’s the Mormon community like? Generally speaking, Mormon Church communities are where we learn about our relationship with God and His plan for us and are founded on the teachings of Jesus Christ.”
- “Because they follow Jesus, Mormons actively care for and help each other. One way Mormons do this is by participating in a monthly fast where they don’t eat or drink for two consecutive meals. They then donate the money they would have spent on the two meals—or more money if they choose—to help people in need.”

On the “mormonnewsroom.org” website (again, when will that site’s name get changed?), an article titled “What to expect at Mormon Church services” has been changed to eliminate the word “Mormon.”17 Another article on that site, “Church Leaders Break Ground on Two South American Temples,” used the word “Mormon” in front of “church leaders” from March 4, 2017 until just after Nelson’s announcement.18

Will MRM Change its Name?

Some have asked if we at MRM will be changing our ministry name. The answer is, simply, no. While Nelson did not mention “Mormonism” as a banned word in a Latter-day Saint’s vocabulary, it is talked about on the church’s oxymoronic website www.mormonnewsroom.org. It says,

The term “Mormonism” is inaccurate and should not be used. When describing the combination of doctrine, culture and lifestyle unique to The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the term “the restored gospel of Jesus Christ” is accurate and preferred.

This is in complete disagreement with another page on this website titled “Mormonism 101: What is Mormonism?” An article here (current at the time I wrote this piece) reads

Mormonism is a term defining the religious beliefs and practices of members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, also known as Mormons. Mormonism describes the doctrines of the Church that were restored to the earth through the Prophet Joseph Smith. When asked what Mormonism is, members of the Church will often speak of their love of the Savior Jesus Christ. To them, the Savior is central to Mormonism.19

17 “What to Expect at Church Services,” https://www.mormonnewsroom.org/article/what-to-expect-at-church-services
We agree with this statement, even if the top leader of today’s LDS Church has changed his mind.

The next question people ask is if we will change our current use of “LDS” and “Mormon” when referencing this church and its people. While we will not, on purpose, use the name “Mormon Church,” we will continue to utilize these nicknames and abbreviations instead of continually using the full name of the church. This was commonly done by many different leaders and Latter-day Saints over the years, as described above. While Russell M. Nelson is the leader of his followers, he is not a recognized Christian leader. Therefore, he does not have authority to instruct us. Because we don’t believe God has spoken to him, we feel perfectly in line to use these same terms in a respectful way, just as many others in the media are doing so.

The reader must understand that our intentions are good. After all, we don’t want to purposely anger the Latter-day Saints. To show that what I am saying is genuine, consider the new book Sharing the Good News with Mormons (Harvest House, 2018) that I co-edited with my friend Sean McDowell. On the first page of the introduction, I explained how I and the book’s contributors would reference the church and its members. I cited LDS apologist Gary C. Lawrence who once wrote, “Our members are properly referred to as Mormons or as Latter-day Saints. Our church may be referred to by its full name or as the LDS Church. We prefer not to be called the Mormon Church.” Based on that citation and other directives given by other leaders, I explained,

Thus, to be respectful and prevent any unnecessary arguments, we will refer to those who belong to this religion as “Latter-day Saints,” “LDS,” or “Mormon.” While we will leave direct quotes using the term “Mormon Church” intact, we will not use this designation in our writing; instead, we will refer to the church using its full name or as “LDS Church.”

Now Nelson demands for us to stop using these other synonyms for the church and its people by claiming God instructed him to ban these words and abbreviations. Please, Mr. Nelson, give us viable alternatives where we, as non-Mormons, can reference your people and church without a) offending you or, gasp, God; b) making a truth claim that supports the veracity of this church.

Conclusion: Will this be the end of the derogatory term “anti-Mormon”?

I want to be a “the-glass-is-half-full” kind of guy and say that perhaps some good can come from Nelson’s edict. The term “anti-Mormon” has been used on me many hundreds of times by well-meaning Latter-day Saints who want to ignore my public evangelistic ways. I have always disliked this term because “Mormon” has traditionally been a nickname for a person who belongs to The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Certainly I am in disagreement with the theology of this organization, but I take the risk to share my faith with Latter-day Saints because I honestly love them and care about them. Yet so often LDS leaders have attacked our approaches and motives. Consider Apostle Bruce R. McConkie:

Ignore, if you can, the endless array of anti-Mormon literature and avoid cults like a plague . . . There are, of course, answers to all of the false claims of those who array themselves against us—I do not believe the devil has had a new idea for a hundred years—but conversion is not found in the dens of debate. It comes rather to those who read the Book of Mormon in the way Moroni counseled. Most members of the Church would be better off if they simply ignored the specious claims of the professional anti-Mormons.20

And check out this amazing quote found on an apologetic website:

“The term anti-Mormon is herein used to describe any person or organization that is directly and actively opposed to The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, its doctrines, policies and programs. It is not, as critics sometimes mischievously try to claim, a catchall term for anyone who does not accept or believe in the Church, but is applied only to those who actively campaign against it. As an adjective, it applies to those specific activities that may with reasonable accuracy be described as attacks upon the Church . . . So we return to the question with which we began this survey: are anti-Mormons Christian? The answer: of course not. They were never even in the hunt. Their clerical collars and pious platitudes are simply a smokescreen to hide the ugly reality that anti-Mormonism is one of the clear manifestations of the darkest side of human nature; the side that made possible the death camps and burning crosses, the massacre of the Hutus and the wholesale slaughter of the Native Americans. Just as vicious and repressive dictatorships like to give themselves grandiose and liberal-sounding titles like ‘The People’s Democratic Socialist Republic of Such-and-such,’ so these nasty religious haters appropriate the label of ‘Christian’ in order to claim for themselves a specious respectability that their deeds and attitudes do not merit.”21

For those Christian believers like me who choose to share their faith with Latter-day Saints, I think Nelson’s edict may be good news! After all, if there are no more “Mormons” in existence, then there can be no more “anti-Mormons.” I can’t wait to respond with this comeback the next time someone accuses me of being “anti-Mormon”!

IN THE NEWS

CHANGING A WEB ADDRESS.

While President Nelson, speaking at the October LDS General Conference, declared that nicknames are “a major victory for Satan,” he failed to offer a good alternative. In the religion section of the Salt Lake Tribune for September 27, 2018, David Noyce wrote about the dilemma facing the LDS Church web developers.

Click on Become.org or Worshipwithus.org and what do you get? Well, it turns out, Mormon.org. What’s with that? Not surprisingly, it has to do with the faith’s efforts to steer away from use of the “Mormon” nickname.

Will they be able to come up with a good alternative to “LDS” or “Mormon” in their various web addresses? “Become.org” and “Worshipwithus.org” are easily confused with other faith-based web sites. Adding to the problem, the LDS Church has already invested millions of dollars in their 2011 “I’m A Mormon” campaign.

Utilizing the web name Mormon.org as a gateway for outsiders to learn about their faith, the LDS Church heavily promoted the new site. In 2014 they even set up “New Mormon Kids” app on www.mormonchannel.org

It remains to be seen if the LDS Church can come up with a new short way of referring to itself that will also work on public media.

NO MORE “MORMON TABERNACLE CHOIR”

In accordance with President Nelson’s edict to stop using the terms “Mormon” and “LDS,” their famous choir has now been renamed “The Tabernacle Choir at Temple Square.” [Associated Press, October 5, 2018]

Since Nelson’s concern with using nicknames was that it left out the name of Christ, one wonders why they didn’t rename the choir the “Church of Jesus Christ Tabernacle Choir?” Isn’t “Tabernacle Choir at Temple Square” just as lacking as “Mormon Tabernacle Choir?”

TWO-HOUR SUNDAY MEETING BLOCK UNVEILED

At the Saturday session of the October 2018 General Conference, President Nelson announced that the LDS Church was changing the Sunday services from a 3-hour block to a 2-hour block. Apostle Quentin Cook explained that the traditional three-hour block will be shortened as of January 2019, to 60-minute sacrament service, down from 70 minutes, will be followed by a 50-minute class period after a 10-minute transition period.

Classes will alternate by week, with traditional Sunday school meetings on the first and third weeks of each month, and the faith’s all-male priesthood, female Relief Society and youth classes held on the second and fourth weeks. [11:20 a.m. – Sunday church schedule wasn’t just “shortened,” apostle says, it was “strengthened.” https://www.sltrib.com/religion/2018/10/06/mormon-general-conference/]

NO MORE HIGH PRIEST GROUP IN THE WARD

Another change announced at the LDS General Conference was the disbanding of the local ward High Priests meeting.

During the general priesthood session on Saturday, March 31, President Russell M. Nelson announced a “significant” restructuring of ward and stake Melchizedek Priesthood quorums that will help Melchizedek Priesthood holders “accomplish the work of the Lord more effectively. In each ward, the high priests group and the elders quorum will now be combined into one elders quorum,” he said. There will continue to be a stake high priests quorum, but it will [be] based on “current” priesthood callings.

One is left to wonder if this was, in part at least, a necessity due to lower attendance.

DOWN WITH HOME TEACHERS, UP WITH MINISTERING

The LDS Church newsroom reported:

During the Sunday afternoon session of April general conference, President Russell M. Nelson announced a significant change to the way members serve and care for each other.

The separate programs of home teaching and visiting teaching will be “retired,” he said, becoming a coordinated effort called “ministering,” a “new and holier approach” to Christlike caring for others and helping meet their spiritual and temporal needs.

Further on in the same article we read:

Elders quorum presidencies will assign ministering brothers to every household, and Relief Society presidencies will assign ministering sisters to each adult sister. Sister Bingham suggested elders quorum and Relief Society leaders counsel together prayerfully. Then, she said, “rather than leaders just handing out slips of paper,” they make assignments in person in a conversation about the strengths, needs, and challenges of those to whom brothers and sisters minister.

However, some have observed that it just looks like reshuffling titles. How is “ministering” different from assigning visiting teachers?

LDS Women to take 10-Day Fast from Social Media

On October 6, 2018, Fox 13 reported:

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints President Russell M. Nelson invited women church members to participate in a 10-day fast from social media Saturday during the General Women's Session. Nelson stated the following during his speech at the session:

First, I invite you to participate in a 10-day fast from social media and from any other media that bring negative and impure thoughts to your mind. Pray to know which influences to remove during your fast. The effect of your 10-day fast may surprise you. What do you notice after taking a break from perspectives of the world that have been wounding your spirit? Is there a change in where you now want to spend your time and energy? Have any of your priorities shifted—even just a little? I urge you to record and follow through with each impression.

[https://fox13now.com/2018/10/06/lds-church-president-invites-women-to-make-10-day-fast-from-social-media/]

While the LDS women may have benefitted from a 10-day fast from social media, one is left to wonder why the same advice wasn’t given to the men of the church?

LDS Girls Passing the Sacrament?

This year saw a few LDS wards allowing girls to help with passing the sacrament. While it doesn’t seem to be a concession to women wanting LDS priesthood, it does signal a lessening of restrictions on women participating in areas that were previously male-dominated. One bishop justified the change in practice by saying it is “no different than deacons handing trays to members in the pews, who then hand them from person to person, regardless of gender.”

Two-Transfer Missionaries?

In recent years the LDS Church has sought ways to  insure a successful missionary experience, especially for special needs people. In 2017 one blogger observed:

What are two-transfer missions? A two-transfer mission is a temporary, three-month mission where a missionary facing unique challenges (e.g. social anxiety disorder, autism spectrum, post-traumatic stress disorder, etc.) stays in their home area and serves with local missionaries. In effect, it’s a “trial run” for a missionary who may not be confident in their ability to serve a full-length mission and needs a chance to experiment. Two-transfer is different from a “mini-mission,” where a prospective missionary goes out with local missionaries for a week or two. The two-transfer option is suggested by church headquarters, not requested by the missionary.

Two-transfer missionaries don’t go to the MTC when the mission begins. Instead, they get dropped off directly at the mission home and get to work in the community immediately. If their performance doesn’t go as hoped for, they are honorably released from their mission call after three months. If they find success and maintain their desire to serve, they can be called to a church-service mission or full-time mission. They might stay in their home area or be called to another part of the United States. A trip to the MTC occurs in-between their two-transfer and full-time missions. 12 New LDS Temples Announced

Russell M. Nelson, 94-year-old president of the LDS Church, announced at the October general conference plans to build 12 new temples. One will be in southern Utah, bringing the state’s total to 20 temples. Also planned is the renovation of the historic Salt Lake City temple.

President Russell M. Nelson recently spoke of the importance of temple rituals, and future revelation:

“The Book of Mormon teaches over and over again that you need to have the ordinances,” he emphasized. “And of course, that’s why we have temples so that all the potential that God has in store for His children can become a fact, a reality. . . . No one else can offer perpetuation of the family unit beyond the grave. And that, according to our Heavenly Father, is the greatest gift that He can give to His children.”

“We’re witnesses to a process of restoration,” said the prophet. “If you think the Church has been fully restored, you’re just seeing the beginning. There is much more to come. . . . Wait till next year. And then the next year. Eat your vitamin pills. Get your rest. It’s going to be exciting.”

Tithing Ends Poverty Cycle?

President Nelson recently declared tithing can break cycles of poverty in poor nations and families.

“We preach tithing to the poor people of the world because the poor people of the world have had cycles of poverty, generation after generation,” he said. “That same poverty continues from one generation to another, until people pay their tithing.”

The law of the tithe was followed by ancient peoples as taught by Old Testament prophets. LDS faithful believe God restored the law and its blessings for those who follow it by giving one-tenth of their income to the church. End of Mormon Pageants?

According to the Deseret News, October 27, 2018, the LDS Hill Cumorah Pageant in New York will end after its 2020 season. The other six pageants are also coming under review. If the Mormon Miracle Pageant, held in Manti, Utah, continues it is assumed it will see a name change as well as a paring down of the size of the cast. [https://www.deseretnews.com/article/900039117/mormon-church-statement-says-changes-coming-for-local-celebrations-including-pageants.html]

For some reason, the LDS missionaries were forbidden to attend the Hill Cumorah pageant this past summer. The attendance at the pageant evidently reached its height in 1997, with about 73,000 attending. But this year the number dropped to 25,000, and most were already members of the church. Lawsuit filed against LDS Church relating to Child Abuse

The Salt Lake Tribune, on October 3, 2018, reported:

A lawsuit filed in Salt Lake City’s federal court on Wednesday alleges sexual abuse and a cover up involving family members of the president of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

FOX 13 is reporting that the lawsuit lists six unnamed plaintiffs, identified as “Jane Doe” and “John Doe” and two unnamed defendants. Brenda and Richard Miles, who are the daughter and son-in-law of LDS Church President Russell M. Nelson, are those unnamed defendants and they vigorously deny the allegations, according to their attorney. [https://www.sltrib.com/religion/2018/10/04/lawsuit-accuses/] Former LDS Bishop, Sam Young, Excommunicated for Challenging Bishop Interviews.

Every young Mormon has at one time or another been asked to meet with the local bishop for a “worthiness interview.” Part of the bishop’s interview is to determine if the youth is honest, morally clean, and abstaining from sexual activity. According to CNN, “While all bishops are required to ask whether members ‘obey the law of chastity,’ abstaining from all premarital sexual activity, Young says more than 3,000 people, including four of his daughters, have said their bishops probed for the explicit details of their sexual conduct as children. . . . The church calls the practice of bishops’ interviews a “sacred responsibility” and offers the opportunity for mentorship; critics argue it is traumatizing and creates opportunities for grooming and emotional or sexual abuse.” [https://www.cnn.com/2018/09/24/us/mormon-young-excommunicated/index.html]

After hearing stories of inappropriate questioning by some bishops, Sam Young built up the courage to ask one of his daughters if she had ever been asked sexually explicit questions during an interview for the church.

She admitted that she had, “all the time,” from ages 12 to 17. After her first interview, she told her father that she had to look up “masturbation” online, since she had never heard the term before her bishop brought it up. [https://www.houstonchronicle.com/life/houston-belief/article/Behind-closed-doors-12524563.php]

After enduring a 23-day hunger strike, Sam Young was formally excommunicated from the Mormon Church. [https://www.newsweek.com/mormon-bishop-sam-young-excommunication-sexually-explicit-children-interviews-1096856]

Sam Young reported the following from a Stake Conference in Southern California on November 4, 2018:

Stake President: “Brothers and Sisters, OUR STAKE IS DYING! Tithing and Fast Offerings have DRASTICALLY dropped in the past 6 months. Temple attendance is way down. We have never had fewer endowed members with a current recommend. Few members are accepting callings. We need to start calling the Lord’s church by its revealed name or the curse will get worse.”

Stagnant growth and people streaming out of the church have nothing to do with what we call the Church. It has everything to do with a culture that is toxic to open and honest discussions. Not to mention how Mormons allow children to be treated.

Excerpts From Letters and Emails

April 2018: After 48 years of membership in the church, after being converted at the age of 17 from Catholicism and serving an honorable mission in France and Switzerland… after having served in every calling a male can serve in a ward (with the exception of the bishopric…) and after having researched the inconsistencies in the historicity of the church and having watched your exquisite interviews with John Dehlin, in this last week I have made the decision to completely disassociate myself from the Mormon church. On April 6, 2018 I stopped reading the Book of Mormon. The next day I disposed of my temple garments. Now, I’m spreading the word to friends that I am out.

May 2018: I just listened to your talk on the Biblical Temple . . . versus the Mormon temple(s). [https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=7Zc2wkPqrs] Thanks so much for the clarification. I already knew the difference, but I so much appreciate you giving the explanation about the differences between them. It is a much need explanation.

June 2018: I don’t expect you to remember me but I spoke to you on the phone a few years ago. Asking forgiveness for being unknd to you when I served a LDS missionary in Salt Lake. I am a Christian and love Jesus. I have enjoyed many videos that you are in on the internet.

June 2018: Greetings from . . . Canada. After 41 years as a member of the LDS church, my shelf broke (splintered is more like it) and I went from fully active, serving as Ward Clerk to inactive in less than 6 weeks.

One of the things that destroyed my faith was realizing that things I had been told were anti-Mormon lies were now being taught as legitimate Mormon history. An example I’ve used with others is that Joseph Smith was a treasure hunter and used a seer stone to search, unsuccessfully, for treasure prior to receiving the plates.

June 2018: I want to let you know how much I appreciate your years of research and care you’ve given to share the truth of the gospel!

God gave me, ______ years ago, a new (and now most precious) friend. I didn’t find out until about four months into our friendship that she was Mormon. I was so unknowledgeable about the LDS at that point. All I knew was that which my parents told me (something like “they’re not real Christians”)

My friend and I started having short conversations about the LDS—she suggested I read “How Wide Is the Divide.” That book left me more confused than ever! But it did do me one service, and that was to validate the fact that even though I would say “grace” or “the trinity” it didn’t mean the same thing to my friend. We were speaking two different languages. I came out of that book knowing I needed help understanding truly “how wide was the divide.”

I got online & found your material right away. What a blessing! I have poured over your material—I’ve learned so much! My friend and I have quietly skirted around our differences—she’s not willing to talk much about theology. But I know God’s working in her life. He’s been so gracious to us by keeping our friendship strong—I feel such peace knowing that when the Holy Spirit lefts the veil, if she wants, she’s got a friend to turn to that can answer questions or at least point her to your research. :-) !

June 2018: Sandra Tanner is a very disrespectful, inconsiderate, argumentative DAMNED LITTLE BABY!

July 2018: My whole world collapsed recently after the passing of my wife three years ago. I am a Mormon in exile. I was baptised into the LDS faith on ____, 1969. I am/was a High Priest and went through the usual steps of priesthood progression.

However, after having read the bible through from cover to cover for the first time in my life, my eyes began to be opened and through the guidance of the Holy Spirit I came to realize that I have been terribly deceived for so many years and by those I had fully trusted with my eternal soul.

I feel so lost right now and don’t know where to turn for help, as far as this life is concerned. The one thing I never let go of, however, is my faith and hope in my Saviour, Jesus Christ, my master, my Saviour, my King, my atoning one.

I miss going to church each week and participating in and partaking of the sacrament. I miss my friends and family for they have abandoned me for my decision to leave the LDS faith. However, I do cling to my faith and hope in Christ Jesus, the true and living Saviour, the true messiah of the bible. Not the false Christ of Mormonism. I never realized there was a difference until my eyes were opened through the guidance of the Holy Spirit. . . .

I turned to the internet and started my search for true Christian fellowship and stumbled onto your website and felt that I needed to contact you to see if you would want to help a lost brother find his way back into true fellowship with Christ. I don’t think that Jesus wants me to be alone any longer. I believe He led me to your website and the Holy Spirit is guiding me to seek your help and reach out for your help and support. . . . Thank you for any help you might be able to render to a lost brother in Christ. He said He will never leave us or forsake us and I truly believe that with all my heart, and if it turns out that I must live the rest of my life in loneliness and isolation then so be it. But I do think and believe that He is leading me out of that state of mind and back into a community of true Christian fellowship and believers.

July 2018: I came across this site by accident and I have been struck by the nasty, inane and vitriolic comments made against the Mormon church. I did not expect to see the comments I did from a supposedly Christian mission.

I am a Mormon and I am not uneducated, as one commentator stated, I speak several languages and am educated past degree level. I have always been respectful to other people’s faiths and have attended many services in many different types of buildings.

All I have seen here is disrespect, mocking of things people hold sacred and a general superiority of mood. I see no evidence of Christian love to the sinner. I feel you would have been the first to throw the stone and it saddens me so much.

Life is too short to be nasty to people. It is perfectly alright to disagree.

July 2018: For as long as I live, I will not have enough breath to thank Jerald and Sandra Tanner for the work they’ve done.
They have been one of the primary sources for all of my work, and a huge influence in my exodus from Mormonism.

July 2018: [From a Mormon] They believed that to kill the [LDS] church was to cut off the head, they did and it didn’t. Why? Every other cult has died after cutting off the head, why not LDS?

July 2018: I’m former LDS. Too long of a story short, I was a Baptist up until 2000 and then I got sucker into the Mormon church by a girl. I was baptized into it and stayed in it for 4 or 5 years. I’m currently getting my name removed from their membership rolls and have a solid foundation in the Bible.

July 2018: Thank you so much for your quest for truth and for the materials you have written or made available. Your contributions in terms of sharing, speaking, publishing and encouraging are admirable. Your motivation has been misunderstood by those who vilify you as LDS church haters. Instead your “lighthouse” shines a light. That is so important in assisting people like myself, who are looking for answers—questioning or weighing the evidence for deciding whether to leave or join.

It has become so evident to me over years of reading your material that for whatever reasons the Church in general and the prophets, particularly Joseph, decided that LDS members had to be fed “facts” that hid the truth. How is it a victory to win members when their belief and loyalty can only be held together with numerous distortions and half-truths? I know I felt duped and cheated when I learned the truth regarding so many aspects of Church doctrine and history. This led to my resignation after 50+ years of devout membership. You were supportive of me during that painful process.

Knowing that members including missionary converts all over the world were being fooled as a whole church which was not only our religion/belief system but our entire way of life was and is really heartbreaking. It is still painful and it certainly has split families apart. I wonder what those priesthood holders who orchestrated the fraud and have continued it for over 188 years will say to their Maker at the Judgement bar. Even now with recent supposed “transparency” the Brethren continue to mislead in areas of doctrine and practice.

This has been a long e-mail but I’ve had a lot to be thankful to you for. I am grateful you are in Christianity. I am healing as I have been baptized into Christianity. May your burdens be light as you continue on in your Christian ministry work. God bless you.

July 2018: Thank you for this opportunity to write to you. My parents were tricked into the Mormon faith by them telling them what she believed, not what the Bible says. My daughter was at one time given a blessing and within a short period was to meet a Mormon, get married and have children who are now Mormons. They very rarely go to church though. If they would study the Bible they would see the truth as so many are now finding the truth as you did and stand up for the truth.

August 2018: I along with my wife and one of my daughters, had the privilege of meeting you earlier this summer. We were there on a day when a young woman, who recently resigned from the Mormon church, was there, and she talked to my daughter for quite a while. I was able to buy a few books that day from you.

I wanted you to know that I have greatly benefitted from books you and Jerald have written, especially Mormonism: Shadow or Reality? and The Changing World of Mormonism. I have also benefitted from Speaking the Truth in Love to Mormons, and have been in contact with the author and his ministry at tilm.org.

August 2018: I apologize for mocking the death of your husband. It was wrong of me to do that. I’ve since made amends. I’m sorry. I am . . . [a] former member of the church.

September 2018: I recently listened to a Mormon Stories podcast where you discussed Joseph Smith’s First Vision. Your knowledge and interpretations frankly out shown everyone else. [https://www.mormonstories.org/podcast/joseph-smiths-first-vision/]

September 2018: This is both a thank you and a letter of encouragement… I read The Book of Mormon and realized there was no Mormon doctrine in it. I heard about the Doctrines and Covenants and ordered one from the missionaries but I never got it. Later on I found out the reason. It contains the real teaching which they don’t want you to know. . . .

Then I met a missionary and he told me about your book Mormonism—Shadow or Reality? I read it and was astounded. But I said: “There can’t be that much proof that Mormonism is wrong and yet it is growing.” So I wanted to check out this book. I bought quite a number you mentioned so I could read them in context. To my happy surprise everything you wrote was very accurate and you could use it with assurance. . . .

I know you have had a lot of opposition from Mormons but the Lord has used your ministry to explain the truth to Mormons and I am sure many have left and been saved because of your ministry.

October 2018: The Book of Mormon is the word of God. Translated by the power of the Lord, it is another Testament of Jesus Christ. If you read and pray you will know if is true by power of the Holy Ghost. People say the Bible is just a book. The Lord said by two or three witnesses shall his word be established. So the Lord gave us the Bible and Book of Mormon to let us know he lived, he taught and he died for our sins and was Resurrected the third day. I know Jesus is our Savior, I also know the Bible and the Book of Mormon is the word of God. Find out for yourself, you can only know if true if you study & pray.

October 2018: So sad for you. We [LDS] do study the Bible. 2019 is New Testament time again. Where do you get they are 5 years. I'm currently getting my name removed from their church by a girl. I was baptized into it and stayed in it for 4 years. I'm former LDS. Too long of a story short, I was a Mormon—Shadow or Reality? why not LDS?

[From a Mormon] They believed that to kill the [LDS] church was to cut off the head, they did and it didn’t. Why? Every other cult has died after cutting off the head, why not LDS?

More LDS Temple Changes– A Nod to Feminism?

Open their morning newspaper on Thursday, January 3, 2019, Utahans were surprised to read “LDS Church changes temple ceremony; faithful feminists will see revisions and additions as a ‘leap forward.’” The article went on to note:

Many women have complained in the past about the “endowment” ritual, which includes a re-enactment of Genesis, noting that Eve has no words during her sojourn with Adam after the couple’s expulsion from the Garden of Eden.

Now that seminal female figure has a whole monologue, said the attendee, who did not want her name used because of the sacred nature of the ceremony. “She has more lines than Satan.”

And men and women make all the same covenants, or promises, to God, rather than separate ones. Women also no longer covenant to hearken to their husbands.¹

While Eve has been given a larger speaking part in the secret temple drama of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, she merely quotes a passage from the Book of Moses, part of their scriptures known as the Pearl of Great Price. The endowment ceremony, only open to faithful members, depicts the story of Adam and Eve and their journey from the Garden of Eden to entering into God’s presence. The instructions, passwords and handshakes learned in the ritual are considered necessary for eternal life, also called exaltation.

After the Fall is enacted and Lucifer ordered out of the garden, Adam now quotes part of Moses 5:10: “Blessed be the name of God, for because of my transgression my eyes are opened, and in this life I shall have joy, and again in the flesh I shall see God.” To which Eve responds, quoting Moses 5:11, “Were it not for our transgression we never should have had seed, and never should have known good and evil, and the joy of our redemption, and the eternal life which God giveth unto all the obedient.”

Since Adam and Eve’s added dialogue is simply quoting from one of the LDS scriptures one wonders why it was not publicly acknowledged. The drama was also edited to add more mention of Eve. Previously Elohim addressed Adam alone, now he addresses both Adam and Eve.

Contrary to standard Christianity, the LDS scriptures and temple ceremony present a scenario of Adam and Eve being given two conflicting commandments in the garden. First, they were not to eat of the tree of knowledge and second, they were commanded to have children. But according to Mormonism, as spirit beings, they couldn’t reproduce until they ate of the fruit and became mortal. Thus God set them up to break one of these commandments. This is why Eve is seen as performing a meritorious act by disobeying God and becoming mortal. According to an article in The Ensign posted on the LDS web site, the Fall was necessary:

Most Christian churches teach that the Fall was a tragedy, that if Adam and Eve had not partaken of the forbidden fruit, they and all their posterity could now be living in immortal bliss in the Garden of Eden. But truth revealed to latter-day prophets teaches that the Fall was not a tragedy—without it Adam and Eve would have had no posterity. Thus, the Fall was a necessary step in Heavenly Father’s plan to bring about the eternal happiness of His children.2

LDS Apostle Bruce R. McConkie explained:

The fall of Adam brought temporal and spiritual death into the world, and the atonement of Christ ransomed men from these two deaths by bringing to pass the immortality and eternal life of man. This makes the fall as essential a part of the plan of salvation as the very atonement itself.3

After Eve quotes the passage from the Book of Moses, the temple patrons, dressed in white, are instructed to put on their green aprons, representing the fig leaf aprons of Adam and Eve. The white outfit and green apron are worn by all those being endowed, whether getting sealed that day or not, or whether the ceremony is for them personally or on behalf of a dead person. Most LDS missionaries have been through the endowment ceremony but have not been “sealed” in marriage—a ceremony that takes place after one is “endowed.”

Faithful LDS, who have been sealed to their partner, are also buried in the white outfit and green apron. Prior to January 2019 the temple veil would be put over the woman’s face just before closing the casket. Now the family has the option of using the veil or not.4

Another change is the elimination of women veiling their faces during the special prayer circle during the endowment ceremony. They still wear the thin, 3-foot square veil, but they are no longer instructed to veil their faces.

Feminists see these changes as a hopeful move toward equality for women and men in the ritual. While these recent changes are significant, they are just the latest in a long list of revisions since the temple endowment ritual was first introduced by Joseph Smith in 1842.

Currently the LDS Church has 209 temples “operating, announced or under construction.” These are special buildings, not open to the general public, where vicarious baptisms are performed on behalf of dead people, and where members go through the endowment ritual, and are either married/sealed for all eternity for themselves or in behalf of the dead. Their regular meeting houses are open to the public.

WASHING AND ANOINTING CHANGES

Originally the temple endowment ceremony began with a washing and anointing ceremony that required the member to totally disrobe and be ceremonially washed in a large tub and oil poured over his/her head. This was administered by someone of the same sex.6 A tub was used until after the turn of the twentieth century.7 Over the years this ceremony has been changed to make it less offensive to people.

In the 1969 version of the Washing and Anointing patrons, in divided areas for men and women, stored their regular clothes in lockers and then covered themselves with a “shield,” like a poncho, which covered the front and back of a person but open on the sides. Then in a small enclosed area attendants would reach under the cloth and ceremonially touch various parts of the attendee’s naked body with water, then with oil, as certain blessings were pronounced on the person. After these anointings the attendants would help the person pull on the special one-piece undergarment with Masonic-like markings on both breasts, the navel and the right knee.8 The person then returned to the locker area and donned their white outfit, with the hat/veil, green apron, robe and sash folded in a small parcel.

The original temple undergarment was like a one-piece union suit, full length with long sleeves, and ties. These were modified in 1923, allowing for the garment to end just below the knee and elbow.9 Through the years the garment has continued to evolve, becoming shorter and available in more fabric choices. A photo of the garment is posted on the LDS web site.10 Last year the church discontinued the embroidered markings on the garment in favor of silk-screening them on the back side of the material.11

Evidently in an effort to provide more modesty, in 2005 the clothing ritual was changed again. In the locker room the individual put on the LDS garment, which has been changed to a two-piece, and then the poncho-like “shield,” which was sewn up on the sides.12 The patron then proceeded to the cubical for his/her anointing with water and oil on the forehead. Then the patron returned to the locker area to dress in the white outfit.

But this scenario has been changed. In 2019 the shield was eliminated and the person changes in the locker room into his/her garments and puts on the white temple outfit, and then goes to the anointing booth where only the forehead is anointed.

These changes have given rise to a number of questions about the eternal nature of the ordinances. Brigham Young declared:

> Has the holy Catholic Church got faith in Jesus that we have not got? Not a particle that is true and pure. But as for the ordinances of the House of God, we say, . . . that the mother church and all her daughters have transgressed the laws, every one of them; they have changed almost every ordinance of the House of God; . . . There is but one mode of baptism and that is by being immersed in the water . . .13

Changing from a total bath to simply touching the forehead with water and oil seems to be comparable to some Christians performing baptisms by sprinkling instead of immersion. Why is the LDS change condoned and the non-LDS change condemned?

Lucifer’s Apron

In the 1984 version of the temple drama, after Adam and Eve ate the forbidden fruit, Lucifer came on the scene and Adam asked, “What is that apron you have on?” To which Lucifer responded, “It is an emblem of my power and Priesthoods.” The dialogue continues: “Adam: Priesthoods? Lucifer: Yes, Priesthoods.”14 This exchange was shortened in 1990 and then totally deleted in 2019. Lucifer’s apron is visible in the 2013 clandestine video of the live enactment of the ritual.15 Lucifer’s apron appears to be green in the video but has usually been described as black or navy blue. We are not informed as to the visibility of his apron in today’s live sessions. In the recent videos it is hard to see his apron.

But these are just the latest edits to Lucifer’s roll in the ritual. In the 1984 version, after Adam and Eve left the Garden and entered the Lone and Dreary World, Lucifer introduced them to a preacher. “Lucifer: Have you been to college and received training for the ministry? Sectarian Minister: Certainly! A man cannot preach unless he has been trained for the ministry. Lucifer: Do you preach the orthodox religion? Sectarian Minister: Certainly! A man cannot preach unless he has been trained for the ministry. Lucifer: Do you preach the orthodox religion? Sectarian Minister: Yes, that is what I preach. Lucifer: If you will preach your orthodox religion to these people, and convert them, I will pay you well.”

Adam later summarized the minister’s teachings: “They preach of a God who is without body, parts, or passions; who is so large that he fills the universe, and yet is so small that he can dwell in my heart; and of a hell, without a bottom, where the wicked are continually burning but are never consumed. To me, it is a mass of confusion.” This has been completely removed.

Later, the minister, talking to Peter, realized that the devil had deceived him and he said: “This man told me that we should never have any revelation or apostles, but if any should come professing to be apostles, I was to ask them to cut off an arm or some other member of the body and then restore it, so that the people might know that they came with power.” The preacher then wanted out of the Devil’s employ but he refused to pay the minister since he didn’t convert Adam and Eve to his religion. For years people have complained that the LDS ceremony mocked Christian ministers and implied that they were only in it for the money. Researcher David John Buerger observed that several “Christian ministers were added in the 1850s. . . . By 1905 the ceremony had been edited to allow only one minister.”

Finally, in 1990 the part of the minister was removed.

All Patrons Stand

Also changed is the number of times patrons need to stand up. In the past, when the ceremony got to the Second Token of the Aaronic Priesthood everyone would stand and don their white robe, sash, with the green apron tied over these items, along with the hat/veil. Now they remain seated and don’t put on the robe and other items until the part about the First Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood. This seems to be a time-saving adjustment, allowing the patrons to remain seated during the earlier part of the ceremony.

From Movie to Slides

Originally the endowment ceremony was a live play, but in the 1970s the LDS Church began to incorporate filmed portions. Currently only the Salt Lake and Manti temples perform the story of Adam and Eve live. But these temples are scheduled to close at the end of 2019 for remodeling. However, one wonders if they will continue to present the live drama when the two temples reopen in a few years?

In 2013 and 2014 the LDS Church introduced three new temple films. Each of the films used the same dialogue, but had different actors, thus providing a little variety as the films were rotated in use. Actors are seen playing the parts of Elohim, Jehovah and Michael communicating with Lucifer, Adam and Eve. It also showed Peter, James and John conversing with the various characters in the creation play.

However, this year the films have been eliminated. Now they only use slides depicting various scenes from the play while the audience listens to a recording of the actors’ voices. After going to such expense to create and translate these new films, why revert to slides?

One possible answer would be that it simplifies the task when making adjustments to the ceremony. A new version of the video would not need to be made. Also, it would be easier to adjust the length of the ritual when a translation into a foreign language takes longer than in English. Some have speculated that the removal of the films might have been to distance the church from the producer of the videos, who recently pled guilty to sex crimes.

The Church’s Defense

On January 2, 2019, the First Presidency of the LDS Church issued the following statement in defense of the recent changes in the temple ceremony:

Whenever the Lord has had a people on the earth who will obey His word, they have been commanded to build temples. Scriptures document patterns of temple worship from the times of Adam and Eve, Moses, Solomon, Nephi, and others.

With the restoration of the gospel in these latter days, temple worship has also been restored to bless the lives of people across the world and on the other side of the veil as well.

Over these many centuries, details associated with temple work have been adjusted periodically, including language, methods of construction, communication, and record-keeping. Prophets have taught that there will be no end to such adjustments as directed by the Lord to His servants.

A dedicated temple is the most holy of any place of worship on the earth. Its ordinances are sacred and are not discussed outside a holy temple.23

Several problems come to mind after reading the statement. First, there is no commandment in the Bible for Adam and Eve to build a temple. The forerunner to the temple in Israel was the tabernacle, which was first instituted during the 40 years Israel wandered in the wilderness at the time of Moses. The book of Exodus, chapters 26-30, records the instructions for the tabernacle, all its furnishings, and the rituals. Hundreds of years later, Solomon built the first permanent temple, following the pattern of the tabernacle.24

The whole point of the Old Testament sacrificial system was to show that man’s sins had separated him from God and he could only approach God through bringing his offerings to the temple for the priest to present at the altar. And then once a year on the Day of Atonement the High Priest would enter the Holy of Holies to present an offering for both himself and all Israel.

All of this served as a forerunner to the ultimate offering for sin, when Jesus himself, as our great High Priest, would enter the true Holy of Holies on our behalf, and offer himself as the lamb slain for the sins of the world.25

The Jewish priests never performed any rituals like the LDS endowment ceremony and marriages were never done in their temple. Jewish marriages were attended by family and friends, not a secret affair, as shown in the story of Jesus attending a marriage in Cana.26

Second, there is no command in the New Testament for the Christians to build temples and they did not have access to the Jewish temple in Jerusalem to perform any rituals. Some of the early Jewish Christians met at times in the courtyard of the temple, but not being Jewish priests they were not allowed into the temple itself.27

On the LDS website we read: “Temples serve as the only place where ceremonies such as baptism and eternal marriage can be performed in behalf of those who have died—a practice that Latter-day Saints believe was followed in New Testament times but that later was lost.”28

Yet no evidence of such rituals is cited. Christians met in homes, not church buildings. For instance, early Christian leaders Priscilla and Aquila had a church meeting at their home (Romans 16:3, 5). Paul also mentions a church meeting in the home of Nympha in Colossians 4:15. Christians did not have their own temple or buildings.

Third, both Jesus and Paul taught that marriage was for this life only. Why would Paul advise the unmarried to remain single if he believed in the Mormon doctrine that a temple sealing is necessary for exaltation?29 Also see Matthew 22:29-30 and 1 Corinthians 7:39. If the Mormons are going to insist that their temple ritual is a “restoration” of a Christian ritual they will need to document when, where and how such a ritual was practiced.

Their statement that changes have occurred over “many centuries” is without merit as there is no evidence that any Christians had a ritual with the same meaning and purpose as the LDS endowment ritual. However, there are similarities to the Masonic ritual,30 which has gone through various changes, but these have nothing to do with a Christian ritual designed by God for eternal marriage.

Fourth, their statement, “Prophets have taught that there will be no end to such adjustments as directed by the Lord to His servants” leaves one wondering what they are referring to? People have searched for such statements in LDS literature and failed to find anything where their prophets publicly taught there would be “no end to such adjustments” in relation to the temple ritual. In fact, we find just the opposite. On the LDS website Joseph Smith is quoted as saying:

27 Acts 2:46—This would have been in the courtyard; Acts 5:12—Apostles at Solomon’s porch, outside of the actual temple. Acts 3:1-11.
29 1 Corinthians 7:8-9.
30 Michael W. Homer, Joseph’s Temples: The Dynamic Relationship between Freemasonry and Mormonism, (Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 2014).
Ordinances instituted in the heavens before the foundation of the world, in the priesthood, for the salvation of men, are not to be altered or changed. All must be saved on the same principles.31

Obviously, the temple ritual has gone through periodic editing since Joseph Smith’s day, but if it was originally a “revelation,” why would it need altering? The alterations seem to be removing troubling parts, not giving more doctrine. The temple changes in 1990 followed a church survey of several thousand members, which questioned them about their experience in the temple.33 Does revelation come from surveys?

Since the Mormons are so concerned that baptisms and the prayer over the sacrament must be done exactly as instructed, one wonders why they think the temple ritual can be altered? Which version of the LDS temple ritual is the one the early Christians were supposed to have practiced? If the temple ritual is always open to change, how could it ever be considered “lost” in the first place? Wouldn’t they just be earlier versions?

2019 Version

The 2019 version of the ritual has been clandestinely recorded and a typescript noting the changes can be read online as one listens to the ritual.34 This also includes the new LDS introductory comments given at the start of the ritual. The narrator reads a statement by the First Presidency explaining that the new changes have been approved by their prophet and apostles:

Brothers and sisters, since the temple endowment was first administered in this dispensation occasional adjustments have been made by the First Presidency and the quorum of the Twelve Apostles, acting unitedly in their capacity as prophets, seers, and revelators.

Upon seeking the will of the Lord and after solemn prayer in the upper room of the Salt Lake Temple, the Lord has again revealed inspired adjustments to the temple ceremonies.

These adjustments, which you will notice during your worship experience in the temple today, will bring harmony to the way men and women make covenants with God. They deepen our understanding of His will and His relationship with his daughters and sons.

These modifications do not affect the sacred and eternal covenants associated with the saving and exalting ordinances of the temple. As a reminder, due to the sacred nature of all temple ordinances, the fact and content of these changes should not be discussed outside the temple.35

Even though patrons take an oath of silence regarding any changes, there have been numerous exposés by those leaving the LDS church over the past 175 years, thus allowing comparisons to be made.36

IN THE BEGINNING

Joseph Smith first founded the Church of Christ, now known as The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, in New York in 1830, with the claim that it was the restoration of the original New Testament church, with all the same doctrines and rituals.37 However, there was no teaching relating to eternal marriage, secret endowment rituals or the need for temples until years later. In fact, the only temple mentioned in the Book of Mormon was one built in the Americas and was evidently open to the public.38

A year and a half later (November 1831) Smith revealed that the church was to build a temple in Independence, Missouri, to be the center point of Zion in preparation for the return of Christ. But this edifice was intended for public meetings, not secret rituals as are done in current LDS temples.39 However, the Mormons were soon forced out of the city and have never built that temple to this day. On the LDS web site we read:

Missouri has been and will be the site of many key events in Church history. It was the location of the Garden of Eden and Adam-ondi-Ahman, where Adam gathered his posterity for a final blessing (see D&C 107:53–57). It was the place the Saints in Joseph Smith’s day started to build Zion but were violently driven out before their dreams could be realized. It is the place where the Lord Jesus Christ will return again to a New Jerusalem (see D&C 57:2–3; A of F 1:10).

Then in 1836 Smith introduced a new ritual among the men in their temple in Kirtland, Ohio. Historian
David John Buerger explained:

The Kirtland temple ritual was a simple, staged ceremony consisting of washing and anointing the body, blessing and sealing the individual, and washing the feet.

While Smith claimed that the sealing keys had been restored at that time, it seems to have been related to sealing various blessings pronounced on each man in attendance, not to sealing a man and a woman in eternal marriage.

SECRET POLYGAMY

Starting in 1841, in Nauvoo, Illinois, Joseph began to secretly take plural wives in some sort of marriage/sealing ceremony, but this was not the endowment/temple ceremony known today. These were not legal marriages as the state of Illinois had laws against bigamy. These were usually done without his wife’s knowledge or consent.
Only the top leaders in the church were aware of Smith’s new doctrine and practice. Smith’s need for secrecy grew after former church leader John C. Bennett published an exposé of Joseph Smith and polygamy in 1842. A way to secure his leaders’ silence became apparent after Joseph Smith embraced Freemasonry with its oath of secrecy.

FREEMASONS

In March of 1842 Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon were initiated into the Masonic Lodge in Nauvoo, Illinois, and became Master Masons. Researcher Michael
W. Homer explained:

During these [Masonic] rituals Smith and Rigdon were given signs, due-grips, due-guards, pass-grips, words, passwords, and obligations of secrecy of those degrees. The Master Mason degree contained references that would become familiar to Mormons, including the “all-seeing eye, whom the sun, moon and stars obey,” the bee-hive as “an emblem of industry,” the five points of fellowship, and the grand hailing sign of distress.

Within six weeks of Smith becoming a Master Mason, he initiated several men into a new “endowment” ceremony, which included washing and anointing, signs, tokens, and penalties along with the potential to be kings and priests unto God. Smith clearly appropriated some of the same words and symbols of Masonry for his new temple ritual. However, women were not a part of the endowment ritual until a year later. David John Buerger explained:

As in Kirtland, Smith elected to administer new rituals, an expanded “endowment,” to selected leaders before the [Nauvoo] temple was finished. In 1842 the new endowment was performed only for men, but in 1843 wives were included.

Two additional ceremonies were introduced in 1843 about a year following the initial conferral of the new endowment: celestial marriage for time and eternity and the fullness of the priesthood or the second anointing.
Celestial marriage was applied to and equated with plural marriage until the late nineteenth century.

While the LDS Church maintains that the temple endowment ceremony came by way of revelation to Joseph Smith, no copy of such a revelation has been found. Since his revelations on baptism and the sacrament have been recorded and published, one wonders why something so critical to a Latter-day Saint’s eternal exaltation would not be recorded as well?

Only a limited number of Smith’s closest followers had gone through the Nauvoo temple ceremony prior to his death. The next year, 1845, Brigham Young and the other top leaders recreated the ritual for those who still needed their endowments. William Clayton recorded the events at the temple on November 30, 1845:

At about 12 o’clock we clothed [in the temple robes] and . . . then offered up the signs of the Holy Priesthood and repeated them to get them more perfect. I was requested to keep minutes. President [Young] offered up prayers and dedicated the Attic story [of the unfinished Nauvoo temple], the male room and ourselves to God, and prayed that God would sustain and deliver from the hands of our enemies, his servants until they have accomplished his will in this house.

For the next two weeks Brigham Young and various leaders worked to arrange the attic with the necessary fittings, veils, etc. for the ritual, and also on getting the wording of the ritual more accurate. On December 13, 1845, William Clayton recorded:

Last evening an arrangement was made establishing better order in conducting the endowment. Under this order it is the province of Eloheem, Jehovah and Michael to create the world, plant the Garden and create the man and give his help meet. Eloheem gives the charge to Adam in the Garden and thrusts them into the telestial kingdom or the world. Then Peter assisted by James and John conducts them through the Telestial and Terrestrial kingdom administering the charges and tokens in each and conducts them to the vail where they are received by the Eloheem and after talking with him by words and tokens are admitted by him into the Celestial kingdom . . .

Not only were the Mormons busy getting their temple endowments, they were also active in joining Freemasonry. According to David John Buerger, “in 1840 only 147 men in Illinois and 2,072 in the United States were Masons. By the time of the exodus to Utah in 1846-47, approximately 1,366 Mormon males in Nauvoo had been initiated into the Masonic order.”

Blood Oaths

Prior to 1990 those going through the Endowment Ceremony swore an oath of secrecy on pain of death. This was patterned after the Masonic oath. In the 1827 booklet Free-Masonry Exposed we read:

> “I will . . . never reveal any part or parts, art or arts, point or points of the secret arts and mysteries of ancient Free-masonry . . . binding myself under no less penalty than to have my throat cut across, my tongue torn out by the roots.”

The initiate is instructed to draw “your right hand across your throat, the thumb next to your throat, your arm as high as the elbow in a horizontal position.”

The early LDS ceremony had very similar wording. In the 1931 exposé of the LDS ritual we read:

> The left arm is here placed at the square, palm to the front the right hand and arm raised to the neck, holding the palm downwards and thumb under the right ear.

Adam . . . “We, and each of us, covenant and promise that we will not reveal any of the secrets of this, the first token of the Aaronic priesthood, with its accompanying name, sign or penalty. Should we do so, we agree that our throats be cut from ear to ear and our tongues torn out by their roots.”

Sign—In executing the sign of the penalty, the right hand palm down, is drawn sharply across the throat, then dropped from the square to the side. . . .

This oath was later modified. In the 1985 version the words were changed to “Rather than do so, I would suffer my life to be taken.” In 1990 the oath of secrecy no longer included the penalty of having one’s throat slit.

Five Points of Fellowship

Another element Joseph Smith borrowed from the Freemasons was the embrace on the five points of fellowship. This was part of the culmination of the temple ceremony, where the patron would come to the veil at the front of the room, put his/her left hand through a hole in the veil to the person’s shoulder, take the person by the right hand and embrace the person, with the veil in-between, on the “five points of fellowship.” Thus there would be five points at which their bodies would touch during the embrace. At that time the patron would give the man, representing God, the proper handshake and password which would make it possible to enter the next room, labeled the “Celestial room,” which represents entering the top kingdom of heaven.

Since the revision of the ceremony in 1990, the embrace has been eliminated. Now they simply place their “left arms . . . upon right shoulders.” They do not put their feet and knees together and all the wording concerning the Five Points of Fellowship has been completely deleted. On the next page is a comparison of a portion of the 1984 version with the 1990 version:

Utah Lighthouse Ministry is a non-profit 501(c)(3) organization and donations are tax-deductible.

In the 1990 revised version all references to the Five Points of Fellowship have been deleted.

Regardless of the reason for the change, it raises serious questions concerning the inspiration of church officials. If a person was previously compelled to receive the secret information necessary to enter heaven on the Five Points of Fellowship, how can the church leaders now by-pass God’s revealed way which was supposed to have been given to the prophet Joseph Smith? Wouldn’t this be equivalent to changing baptism by immersion to sprinkling?

As the patron gives the man at the veil the hand grip, he says the “name” of the Second Token of the Melchizedek Priesthood. It is: “Health in the navel, marrow in the bones, strength in the loins and in the sinews, power in the Priesthood be upon me, and upon my posterity through all generations of time, and throughout all eternity.”

Notice that these code words contain no mention of God, Jesus, the atonement, no calling upon the grace of God. It is totally centered on gaining personal exaltation.

The person is then drawn through the veil into the last room of the endowment ceremony, representing the Celestial Kingdom, or God’s presence.

Lecture at the Veil

Sometimes at the end of an endowment session there would be a lecture given to the patrons. David John Buerger explained:

The St. George endowment included a revised thirty-minute “lecture at the veil” first delivered by [Brigham Young].

Young. This summarized important theological concepts taught in the endowment and contained references to Young’s Adam-God doctrine. In 1892, L. John Nuttall, one of those who transcribed Young’s lecture, recalled how it came about:

In January 1877, shortly after the lower portion of the St. George [Utah] Temple was dedicated, President Young, in following up in the Endowments, became convinced that it was necessary to have the formula of the Endowments written, and he gave directions to have the same put in writing.

Shortly afterwards he explained what the Lecture at the veil should portray, and for this purpose appointed a day when he would personally deliver the Lecture at the Veil. Elders J.D.T. McAllister and L. John Nuttall prepared writing materials, and as the President spoke they took down his words. Elder Nuttall put the same into form and the writing was submitted to President Young on the same evening at his office in residence at St. George. He there made such changes as he deemed proper, and when he finally passed upon it [he] said: This is the Lecture at the Veil to be observed in the Temple.

A copy of the Lecture is kept at the St. George Temple, in which President Young refers to Adam in his creation and etc.60

While Brigham Young’s lecture at the veil, including his Adam-God doctrine, is no longer used, one is left to wonder why a theological lecture by a prophet has been abandoned. Was Brigham Young wrong to preach it, or is the church wrong to reject it?61

Eternal Marriage

Those who have received their endowments still need to be sealed to someone. To be “sealed” means you have entered into an eternal marriage. Many people, such as young missionaries, have been through the endowment ceremony yet still need to have a temple sealing. Mormons believe one cannot enter the highest level of the LDS Celestial Kingdom without this ceremony.

For years the LDS policy has been that a couple must do their wedding vows at the same time as they have their sealing ceremony in a temple, otherwise they must wait a year after a civil marriage to have a temple sealing. There was an exception for those living in a country that demanded a civil wedding prior to the temple ceremony, such as England. In those cases a couple did not need to wait a year after their public wedding to be sealed in the temple.

Traditionally, the LDS Church has put very strong emphasis on the value of a temple wedding, thus causing problems between families. The ruling meant that if a couple wanted to combine their wedding with their sealing the only ones who could witness the marriage were those who qualified to enter the temple. Thus non-LDS family and inactive Mormons were not allowed to see their loved ones get married. This has caused serious rifts in families.

The Salt Lake Tribune reported one woman’s experience of a temple marriage without her family:

Next month, Boise resident Kristen Talmage Lindsay and her husband will celebrate the 15th anniversary of their wedding in the Oakland Temple.

“I was the only member in my family, so my parents, my sister, grandparents and all the important people in my life had to wait outside,” she wrote on Facebook. “It was cruel and so painful for me. At the time, I told myself I was being obedient, and it’s just how it is. I so, so wish I had just had a civil ceremony.”

Lindsay had “sad tears on my wedding day,” she said. “I wanted to throw up because of how alone I felt without my family.”

However, couples will no longer be faced with this heartache. On May 6, 2019, the LDS leaders announced a new policy. Couples will no longer be penalized for having a civil marriage prior to the temple sealing. The statement reads:

> The policy requiring couples who have been married civilly to wait one year before being sealed is now discontinued. Couples who have been married civilly may be sealed in the temple when they receive their temple recommends.

> Where possible, leaders should encourage couples to be both married and sealed in the temple. Where a licensed marriage is not permitted in the temple, or when a temple marriage would cause parents or immediate family members to feel excluded, a civil ceremony followed by a temple sealing is authorized.

Mormon author Jana Riess commented on the change:

> In practice, the old policy created heartbreaking situations for many Mormons, especially converts who were sometimes the only people in their families to join the faith. Many have commented before that a religion that makes so much of uniting families forever in temples has caused unnecessary divisions in families here on earth.

> In my own life as a Mormon, I’ve known many stories of exclusions from temple weddings. Protestant parents whose son converted to Mormonism were left in the cold when he married a Mormon woman in an LDS temple. His mother had a very hard time getting over the disappointment. And a woman I know who has experienced a “faith transition” and could not get her temple recommend renewed missed being part of her brother’s wedding with the rest of her family.

> Now, hopefully, stories of exclusion from what should be a joyous event will be a thing of the past. Couples will be able to choose to have both a civil ceremony and a temple ceremony, though the First Presidency today encouraged local leaders to stress that it’s ideal to have both the wedding and the sealing in the temple.

Conclusion

The LDS Church teaches that only members who receive their endowments and have been sealed in the temple will obtain the highest exaltation in the hereafter, meaning eternal life. For instance, President Spencer W. Kimball, the twelfth prophet of the LDS Church, emphasized: “Only through celestial marriage can one find the strait way, the narrow path. Eternal life cannot be had in any other way. The Lord was very specific and very definite in the matter of marriage” (Deseret News, Church Section, November 12, 1977).

President Kimball bluntly stated that “the ordinance of sealing is an absolute, and that without it there can be no salvation in the eternal world, no eternal life.”

Mormon theology teaches that those who have been married in the temple can become Gods. Apostle Hugh B. Brown taught:

Through the divine institution of celestial marriage, . . . men and women, joined together by the Holy Priesthood, may through their faithfulness attain immortality, eternal life and eternal increase; . . . When we speak of eternal increase, we speak not only of increase of posterity, we speak of increase of knowledge, and the power that comes with knowledge; . . . increase of intelligence, which is the glory of God; increase of all that goes to make up Godhood.

There is nothing in the Bible about a need for “celestial marriage” or an endowment ceremony. The Bible clearly proclaims that there is only one God (Isa. 43:10-11; 44:6, 8) and that “whosoever believeth in him [Jesus] should not perish, but have eternal life” (John 3:15).

The fact that so many changes have been made in the temple ceremony over the years provides powerful evidence against the claim that it came to Joseph Smith by divine revelation. While it is true that these changes have made the endowment more palatable to the LDS people, they do not bring the ceremony into conformity with Christian beliefs.

In Mark 2:21, Jesus said that “No one sews a piece of unshrunk cloth on an old garment; or else the new piece pulls away from the old, and the tear is made worse.” The endowment ritual not only has many patches in it, but it also has patches on top of patches. Even though there have been improvements in the temple ceremony, it is still filled with material taken from the Masonic ritual and concepts that are not biblical. Sewing new patches on the many rents in this old garment will not solve the problem. The entire ceremony and the idea of men becoming Gods needs to be abandoned.

Many writers who are familiar with both the Masonic rituals and the Mormon temple rituals (the “endowment”) have remarked on their similarities as well as their differences. Many early Mormons were also Masons, and acknowledged the similarities, usually asserting that the endowment was the purer, uncorrupted form, restored to its original purity, sometimes referring to the endowment as “celestial Masonry.” . . .

Conclusion

Even Masonic scholars and historians admit that the Masonic rituals did not originate in Solomon’s Temple in Jerusalem (as the Masonic legend relates), but were an outgrowth of the European builders’ guilds of the late Middle Ages. This weakens the Mormon belief that the endowment ritual was given to Adam in the Garden of Eden. It seems much more obvious that Joseph Smith used basic elements from the 19th century Masonic ritual, and the Mormon endowment ritual is not ancient at all. The fact that the endowment has changed so much since its introduction in Nauvoo in 1842 also belies the Mormon claim that Joseph Smith was restoring the purity of the original (Adamic) ceremony.

MASONRY AND THE MORMON TEMPLE ENDOWMENT CEREMONY (EXCERPT)

By Sharon Lindbloom

mrm.org 18 February 2019

Earlier this month The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints posted a new essay to the Church History Topics section of its website. In the church’s continuing effort to be more “transparent” about its past, the new essay, titled “Masonry,”1 examines the relationship between the LDS temple endowment ceremony and Masonic ritual. . . .

The essay gives very little detail regarding the “similarities” between the LDS endowment ceremony and Masonic ritual, providing but one sentence in the introduction: “. . . Masons advance by degrees, using handgrips, key words, and special clothing,” and another near the conclusion: “Masonic rituals deliver stage-by-stage instruction using dramatization and symbolic gestures and clothing . . . .” Endowed Latter-day Saints recognize that similar elements are included in their temple endowment ceremony, but they have no way of knowing how closely the original ceremony imitated (and continues to imitate) the Masonic ritual. For example, it’s not just that Masons use handgrips in their ritual; they appear to use virtually the same handgrips that Mormons are taught in the temple. BYU professor Charles Harrell notes,

> Though different in certain respects, many similarities can be seen between this new temple endowment and Freemasonry. For example, the endowment incorporated the same five points of fellowship (since 1990 it has no longer been used in the Mormon endowment), the same kinds of gruesome penalties (also discontinued in 1990), and the same compass and square symbols. The Masonic ritual included a rehearsal of the “periods of creation” as initates representing Adam progressed through stages according to their “sincere desire to make advances in knowledge and virtue.” Initiates for Freemasonry also wore ceremonial regalia (aprons, robes, etc.) with instructions that they were “never to be forgotten or laid aside.” BYU humanities professor George S. Tate notes that prayer circles were also conducted by “Freemasons of the period [who] arranged themselves in circular formation around an altar, repeating in unison the received Masonic signs.”2

Regarding Masonry, the church essay claims “stark differences in...content and intent,” yet the LDS temple endowment ceremony has much more in common with Masonic rituals – rituals that, according to the LDS church’s essay, “originated in early modern Europe” – than it does with anything that God ever prescribed for His biblical temple. There are such fundamental differences between the biblical temple and LDS temples that, whether conceding the endowment ceremony’s origin in Freemasonry or not, Mormon temples and the ceremonies performed therein are, in fact, unbiblical.

In researching Brigham Young’s wives, I came across utlm.org and it mentioned Wife No. 19, Ann Eliza Young’s book. I stayed up reading that book one night until it was light, and that morning, I felt the horror of that thing on my “shelf”—polygamy—that thing that always ate at me no matter how I tried to avoid it and trust it would be explained later, leave. I knew Christ could not be the author of such horror. I felt immense peace, love, and gratitude.

In the past month, I enjoyed your Mormon Stories interview and discovered that utlm.org is your website! Ha! There is a lot I do not yet know and I feel like I have been studying constantly for 6 months! But, I feel closer to Christ than ever.

November 2018: Sandra Tanner is not a very nice person she is the devil . . . Old nag lol.

November 2018: You saw me through my darkest hour and you don’t even know it. One day, I will stop in at your bookstore and personally praise Jesus with you. Thanks sweet sister. You are doing God’s work.

November 2018: Sandra, may you have a special Thanksgiving spent with family and those you love. Thank you so much for all the hard work you and Jerald did for so many years. God bless you for helping me to realize the falsehoods of Mormonism and how it lead me to the true Jesus Christ.

November 2018: Starting just a few months ago my eyes have been opened to the world outside of Utah and the Lds church. I haven’t been able to put down you tube and podcasts. Thank you most to the Tanners and Mormon stories for helping me through my journey.

November 2018: Still is nasty as ever. I hope it’s worth it, sucks to be you after this life.

December 2018: Years ago, I was a teenage convert to Mormonism. Needless to say, the missionaries did not tell me the whole story. When I started college, I met people with other worldviews and somehow I ended up receiving material from the Tanners. This was nearly 40 years ago and in my memory, I believe Sandra herself may have sent the tracts and a copy of the Book of Mormon with 3,000 errors which I requested. So, when I decided to look the Tanners up on the internet I found your site. I don’t know the status of Mrs. Tanner but if possible I would like to say thank you and wish her well.

December 2018: Mrs. Tanner, thank you so much for all of your hard work over these many years. I’m a Baptist Pastor in ____ Fl, but my family has a long history of LDS roots in England and Ireland. Thankfully, my grandmother realized the church wasn’t true and the Book of Mormon was a clever attempt to deceive the massive by Joseph Smith. I can’t tell you how helpful your books, articles, and interviews have been to me as I’ve witnessed and cared for Mormon people. Thank you so much! In Christ, Rev. M. H.

December 2018: I discovered this website in my research of how to help my Mormon friends see the Light of Jesus. All I can really say is thank you. Thank you for making this website. Thank you for providing everyone with this knowledge.

December 2018: Thanks so much for your lifelong effort to reveal the falsehood of Mormonism. I resigned my membership Oct. 6, 2018 — 42 yrs after my baptism in Ogden, UT.

I have so enjoyed the interviews you have done — John Dehlin, Ancient Paths, etc. I had never heard of you before this year.

God bless you and keep you in His tender care. You are a lovely lady. Wish I had met you a long time ago.

December 2018: Sandra, my Bride and I are so very thankful that God used you to influence our Daughter from joining the LDS and being unequally yoked. Jesus is everything, the cross is enough, Jesus plus nothing!

January 2019: I want to thank you for your years and years of work. I found my faith in the lds church failing in 1992 after attending the temple ceremony. I read everything I could to help me get to a better understanding. You and your husbands work was paramount to me! THANK YOU!

January 2019: I have watched many of Sandra’s interviews and read many of her articles. It is hard to believe that intelligent people could be so misled. I have been impressed by her and her late husband’s research to help people like myself (an uninformed Christian) become informed that I might better share with my Mormon friends. Also, I would like to subscribe to your newsletter.

January 2019: IT IS TOO LATE FOR JERALD. BUT THERE IS STILL A CHANCE FOR YOU! REPENT! Do not PROCRASTINATE the day of your repentance (Alma 34:33-35). You and your spouse have been leading thousands to Sprit Prison. Some of them are with him and many of them are in Paradise. Their eyes have been opened and they no longer believe your lies. He seems to be on the way to OUTER DARKNESS. YOU WILL JOIN HIM UNLESS YOU REPENT.

You are following the steps of KORIHOR. He preached and had success like You and Jerald.

You follow another False Jesus (Jesus’ brother, Satan) and fight against The True Jesus and His True Church, the LDS Church or Mormons as most Gentiles call them.

You call your anti-Christ teachings the Utah Lighthouse Ministry. Well, I went to your store and it was a DARKHOUSE!!! I do not want to go back there again.

There is an evil spirit in that house. One day, all your half-truths and lies will all be exposed. I can debunk most of them even now. After this, I don’t want to waste my time reading your trash; and the satan’s alive for the FALSE JESUS THE DEVIL . . .

I WISH YOU WELL. Even though you have been LED ASTRAY, IT IS NOT TO LATE FOR YOU. COME BACK TO THE TRUE CHURCH. TAKE DOWN YOUR WEBSITE, CLOSE YOUR STORE AND RECYCLE ALL YOUR WRITINGS, TO START WITH. MARRY A FAITHFUL LATTER-DAY SAINT IN THE TEMPLE TO REPLACE JERALD.

OTHERWISE, I’m sorry for you, very, very sorry. Jerald wasted the days of his probation. Do not be another Korihor. Leave Jerald to his fate. Do not follow his bad example.

With Love,… Joseph Smith’s Close Cousin
January 2019: Around 40 years ago your name was circulated around the area where I was growing up, as some kind of evil apostate. As you and I have the same first name, it caught my attention. Yet the “information age” had not quite dawned yet, so I was not able to get more information until about 15 years ago when a never-Mormon lent me “anti” books. Of course your “Shadow or Reality” book came as quite an enlightening read to me!

Well of course now your lectures and talks are easily available to watch and I have seen them all I suppose. Anyway, before the option is unavailable, I wanted to thank you. As a Mormon member for 40+ years and a direct descendant of Joe Smith and Brigham Young, etc. I was very conflicted about what I could clearly see as problems with the truth claims and fickle doctrines of the church and yet under blood oaths never to discuss my misgivings. The conflicts in my heart and mind drove me to seriously think of ending my own life.

I thought I was going crazy! My search for truths and the ideas by leaders that doing so was evil drove into my mind that I was completely full of darkness and unredeemable as a person. This ruined my marriage as well as poisoned my family relationships with siblings, parents, and my own children. Eventually I lost all my family, my home, and my birthright relationships with siblings, parents, and my own children. I left the LDS church and found our faith in Christ in 2004. . . . Through a series of amazingly unlikely events, I was saved on my knees alone at a city park in May 2004, later sealed in 1998. . . . My wife _____ and I were married in 1997, and I was saved on my knees alone at a city park in May 2004, later sealed in 1998. . . . Through a series of amazingly unlikely events, I was saved on my knees alone at a city park in May 2004, later sealed in 1998. . . .

Thank you, again and again.

January 2019: My wife _____ and I were married in 1997, later sealed in 1998. . . . Through a series of amazingly unlikely and absolutely God directed circumstances, [my wife] and I left the LDS church and found our faith in Christ in 2004 prior to ever stepping inside a Christian church. During an intense and very uncomfortable period of self-examination and questioning, pieces of your work found its way to me.

Thank you. I’ll never forget praying to God and telling Him that I wanted to know the truth. I didn’t care WHAT the truth was, but I just could not stand the possibility of being deceived concerning my relationship to Him. It was an older paper on the book of Abraham as I recall, which then lead me to some of your work on Church history and on and on to more of your work and the work of others.

In any case, God revealed His love and His grace to me and I was saved on my knees alone at a city park in May 2004. April 2019: I stumbled upon your site after I encountered several Mormons . . . and I wanted to figure what Mormonism was all about, and why it was considered a cult (I had no idea). Long story short, as I’ve begun to look into what they believe, I’ve been shocked and saddened for the ways that they have been deceived, and just want to be more knowledgeable so that I know how to talk to them both about my faith, but also plant seeds of doubt about theirs.

I, too, was a Mormon member for 40+ years and a direct descendant of Joe Smith and Brigham Young, etc. I was very conflicted about what I could clearly see as problems with the truth claims and fickle doctrines of the church and yet under blood oaths never to discuss my misgivings. The conflicts in my heart and mind drove me to seriously think of ending my own life.

March 2019: You cannot destroy the LDS church sweetheart it’s gods church and it’s here to stay good luck.

March 2019: I’m so grateful for all of research you and Jerald have done to outline the many changes to the church scriptures and the white-washed history of the Mormon church. I was able to mentally break from the church in 2014 and have never looked back. I will always be in your debt.

April 2019: God help you after this life, you’re one hateful lady. And I’m so glad that the LDS church is driving you guys nuts, yeah baby.

April 2019: God help you after this life, you’re one hateful lady. And I’m so glad that the LDS church is driving you guys nuts, yeah baby.

May 2019: You seem like a person who needs attention, I love you do you need a hug? Is there something missing out your life that you have to bash the LDS church. You live a very sad life and I feel so sorry for you why do you care what the church does? Do we kill you, did we talk mean about you or what? you seem like a woman who is searching and I feel so sorry for you.

May 2019: Why don’t you go attack the Muslims who rape their kids or the Priest that molests little kids. By the way I am reporting you guys for slandering a religion.

May 2019: It was in the year of 2016, that I for the first time had the privilege of raising our family in a Christian home, been taught well in healthy churches, enjoyed a God centered marriage, and been instrumental in helping many others as they struggle with Mormonism and the very real fears associated with leaving. We’ve been able to work with our own Pastor, and several others as a resource and an advocate to those who are leaving, or whom are still damaged by their time and experience in the LDS faith. It seems like anger is the biggest challenge for many. Standing by them, and allowing them to work through it with someone who understands is not particularly thrilling work, but it’s what God has us doing. I’m certain that you can relate. It’s on that note that I wanted to say a very overdue THANK YOU! You are respected and prayed for in our home.

May 2019: I’m trying to figure out why people hate the Mormons so much.
On the morning of February 8, 1843, Mormonism founder Joseph Smith said that he had met with “a brother and sister from Michigan, who thought that ‘a prophet is always a prophet;’ but I told them that a prophet was a prophet only when he is acting as such” (History of the Church 5:265).

This escape clause is too convenient. Mormons often make reference to this statement in an attempt to dismiss embarrassing comments made by past leaders. A good counter to this excuse is asking how the Mormon knows Smith was “acting as a prophet” when he said this in the first place. After all, it was said in a private conversation in the Smith home and not from behind a pulpit at, let’s say, general conference. But let us assume Smith was offering a correct assessment.

In the March 2012 edition of Ensign magazine, Apostle Dieter F. Uchdorf wrote an article titled “Why We Need Prophets.” On page 5 he said, “Listen to general conference with an ear willing to hear the voice of God through his latter-day prophets.”

This comment is not at all out of harmony with statements from other general authorities. For example, 11th President Harold B. Lee gave a conference message in April 1973 where he said, “If you want to know what the Lord has for this people at the present time, I would admonish you to get and read the discourses that are delivered at general conference; for what the Brethren speak by the power of the Holy Ghost is the mind of the Lord, the will of the Lord, the voice of the Lord, and the power of God unto salvation” (Conference Reports, April 1973, 176. See also Lee’s book, Stand Ye In Holy Places, 183).

Of course, comments like the above raise many questions. For example, if a prophet can be counted on to speak the mind and will of the Lord in general conference, was Brigham Young speaking the mind and will of the Lord in his April 9, 1852 conference talk when he said Adam was God and the “only God with whom we have to do”? The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints renounced Young’s teaching after his death, even though Young stated that this pronouncement was “doctrine” so important, that to treat it “lightly or with indifference,” it “will prove their salvation or damnation” (Journal of Discourses 1:51).

Since its inception in 1830, LDS Church leaders have claimed that what separates their religion from all others are prophets who provide “latter-day” or “modern” revelation. They use this concept to maintain the trust of its members. While Doctrine and Covenants 3:2 says God does not “vary from that which he hath said,” the problem is that church history is replete with course corrections.

Doctrine or Policy?

Consider that for much of its history, those of African heritage were denied the priesthood. In 1978 this was reversed, and today all worthy male members of the LDS Church are allowed to hold this important office. Was this not a doctrine? Prior to 1978 members were certainly led to believe this was so. In his book The Way to Perfection, 10th President Joseph Fielding Smith apparently thought it was when he said,

This doctrine did not originate with President Brigham Young but was taught by the Prophet Joseph Smith. At a meeting of the general authorities of the Church, held August 22, 1895, the question of the status of the negro in relation to the Priesthood was asked and the minutes of that meeting say: “President George Q. Cannon remarked that the Prophet taught this doctrine: That the seed of Cain could not receive the Priesthood nor act in any of the offices of the Priesthood until the seed of Abel should come forward and take precedence over Cain’s offspring” (The Way to Perfection, 110. Emphasis mine).

On August 17, 1949, the First Presidency, led by President George Albert Smith, sent an official statement to Brigham Young University President Ernest L. Wilkinson. It said,

The attitude of the Church with reference to the Negroes remains as it has always stood. It is not a matter of the declaration of a policy but of direct commandment from the Lord, on which is founded the doctrine of the Church from the days of its organization, to the effect that Negroes may become members of the Church but that they are not entitled to the Priesthood at the present time. (www.fairmormon.org. “Statements made by Church leaders regarding the priesthood ban”).
Fast-forward to the 21st century. On April 4, 2019, the church released a statement on its MormonNewsroom.org website titled “Presidency Shares Messages from General Conference Leadership Session.” Dallin H. Oaks, President Russell M. Nelson’s first counselor in the First Presidency, said, “While we cannot change the Lord’s doctrine, we want our members and our policies to be considerate of those struggling with the challenges of mortality.” The statement went on to say that effective immediately, children of parents who identify themselves as lesbian, gay, bisexual or trans-gender may be baptized without First Presidency approval if the custodial parents give permission for the baptism and understand both the doctrine that a baptized child will be taught and the covenants he or she will be expected to make. A nonmember parent or parents (including LGBT parents) can request that their baby be blessed by a worthy Melchizedek Priesthood holder.”

Oaks also said that “same-gender marriage by a church member still is considered a serious transgression. However, it no longer will be treated as apostasy for purposes of church discipline.” This announcement completely reversed an earlier mandate given in November of 2015, raising many questions regarding this “policy vs. doctrine” debate.

In 2015 it was announced that those in same sex marriages were to be considered apostates, and that children with parents involved in same sex marriage could not be baptized unless they disavowed the behavior and practice of their parents. This position was then included in Handbook 1: Stake Presidents and Bishops under headings 16.7.2 and 16.7.3.

On January 10, 2016, Russell M. Nelson detailed how the 2015 resolution came about in a talk called, “Becoming True Millennials.” Speaking to LDS young adults at BYU Hawaii, he said,

This prophetic process was followed in 2012 with the change in minimum age for missionaries and again with the recent additions to the Church’s handbook, consequent to the legalization of same-sex marriage in some countries. Filled with compassion for all, and especially for the children, we wrestled at length to understand the Lord’s will in this matter... We met repeatedly in the temple in fasting and prayer and sought further direction and inspiration. And then, when the Lord inspired His prophet, President Thomas S. Monson, to declare the mind of the Lord and the will of the Lord, each of us during that sacred moment felt a spiritual confirmation. It was our privilege as Apostles to sustain what had been revealed to President Monson.

Notice the language Nelson used. He made clear that the conclusion they reached in 2015 was sought by prayer and fasting and that it was revealed to President Thomas S. Monson as “the mind of the Lord and the will of the Lord.” Nelson and his colleagues also “felt” a spiritual confirmation.

How is this any different than how Mormon doctrine comes about? Are we really to believe that God revealed this controversial “policy” in late 2015, but always had in mind that he would rescind it in April of 2019? Does it not show that “feeling” something to be true at the time can one day show that your feelings were misleading?

Consider also Nelson’s mention of lowering the age of male missionaries from 19 to 18 back in 2012. Why was this changed? We know that it hasn’t really affected the convert baptism rate. What we do know is since that was implemented, many young missionaries are coming home early due to homesickness. Compounding this feeling of failure is the shame many young people will experience when they return to their families and local congregations. Could this have been more a “policy” based in perceived pragmatism?

It appears that the leadership is knowingly engaged in a shrewd and confusing game of semantics. If the 2015 announcement was not technically a doctrine, it certainly seems to fit the definition of a “decree” since it was enforced with the full authority of the First Presidency behind it. That being the case, shouldn’t members follow the counsel of Alma 41:8 in the Book of Mormon? It states very clearly that “the decrees of the Lord are unalterable.” It ought to be pointed out that this verse has a footnote directing the reader to the LDS King James Version edition that references Mormon 9:9. It says, “For do we not read that God is the same, today, and forever, and in him there is no variableness neither shadow of changing?”

The next verse says, “And now, if ye have imagined up unto yourselves a god who doth vary, and in whom there is shadow of changing, then have ye imagined up unto yourselves a god who is not a God of miracles.” Since Mormons insist that they believe in a God of miracles, how is this contradiction to be explained?

Again, D&C 3:2 teaches how God does not “vary from that which He hath said.” If God really spoke to Monson and Nelson in 2015, does it make sense that He would reverse Himself in 2019?

Reversing its 2015 decision—whether it is called a “revelation,” “policy,” “doctrine,” or “decree”—appears to have been based on the trends within this secular culture or even the pressure put upon them by some LDS members. This is not the way that the God of the Bible operates. While church leaders tell their members that they are guided by revelation reflecting the mind and will of God, the evidence seems to suggest differently.
Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony: 1842-1990
By Jerald and Sandra Tanner  Price: $6.00
Contains the actual text of the 1990 revision of the highly secret endowment ritual and other accounts of the ceremony dating back to 1846. Shows that Joseph Smith borrowed from Masonry in creating the ritual and that it has evolved over the years. Also shows all of the serious changes made in the ceremony in 1990 and changes made in the washing and anointing ceremony in 2005.

The Mysteries of Godliness: A History of Mormon Temple Worship
By David John Buerger  Price: $20.00
Well-documented study of the development of LDS temple rituals and their relationship to Masonry.

Joseph’s Temples: The Dynamic Relationship between Freemasonry and Mormonism
By Michael W. Homer  Price: $35.00
The parallels between Mormon ritual and doctrine and those of Freemasonry have long been recognized. There are indications that Freemasonry was a pervasive foundational element in Mormonism and that its rituals and origin legends influenced not just the secret ceremonies of the LDS temples but also such important matters as the organization of the Mormon priesthood, the foundation of the women’s Relief Society, the introduction and concealment of polygamy, and the church’s position on African Americans’ full membership. Joseph’s Temples provides a comprehensive examination of a dynamic relationship and makes a significant contribution to the history of Mormonism, Freemasonry, and their places in American history.

The Development of LDS Temple Worship: 1846-2000
By Devery S. Anderson  Price: $45.00
Devery S. Anderson has brought together a comprehensive collection of official documents on temple ceremonies, limited only by what would be inappropriate to discuss publicly. The documents include rulings by the First Presidency on changes to the ceremonies, letters to temple and stake presidents and bishops reminding them of temple policies, minutes of Quorum of the Twelve meetings, excerpts from sermons and Church publications, and commentary by apostles and temple presidents in diaries, letters, oral histories, and temple scrapbooks.

The Inside of Mormonism: A Judicial Examination of the Endowment Oaths Administered in All the Mormon Temples (1903)
By The United States District Court  Price: $7.00
An early examination (1903) of the temple oaths and penalties, as well as their political implications.

“The purpose in publishing this evidence at this time is to show that a man who is a member of any one of the three quorums which constitute the government of the Mormon Church and are the fountain of authority in that Church, is not a loyal citizen of the United States, and cannot, by the most liberal construction of his covenants and obligations, consistently qualify as a member of either House of Congress.” (Introduction, p. 4)

SECOND ANOINTING: THE TEMPLE RITUAL THAT ISN’T DISCUSSED

One of the most important tenets of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is the necessity of temple ordinances. LDS Apostle Bruce R. McConkie explained:

From the days of Adam to the present, whenever the Lord has had a people on earth, temples and temple ordinances have been a crowning feature of their worship... The inspired erection and proper use of temples is one of the great evidences of the divinity of the Lord’s work... where these are not, the Church and kingdom and the truth of heaven are not.

The LDS Church teaches that only those with proper priesthood authority can administer these essential rites. Joseph Smith, in May of 1842, initiated a small group of men into the new temple ceremony, called the endowment. It would be some months before women were included.

The endowment ceremony, which is performed in special white clothing and a green apron (representing Adam and Eve’s fig leaf apron), includes a play reenacting the Fall in the Garden of Eden, secret handshakes, passwords and oaths to always obey the edicts of the LDS Church and to always wear the LDS temple undergarments. These rites are never to be discussed outside of the temple.

Young people, age 18 to 22, generally go through the endowment ritual prior to serving their short term mission, or prior to their temple marriage. A person must have a temple marriage/sealing in order to progress to godhood. The 2016 Eternal Family Teaching Manual explains:

Eternal marriage is essential for exaltation in the highest degree of the celestial kingdom, and it is attained only through being sealed by the proper authority in the temple and then living in accordance with the covenants entered into at that time.

After members have experienced these rituals for themselves they may return to the temple to do proxy rituals for their deceased loved ones, thus offering the dead a chance to accept the LDS faith in the spirit world. While LDS teens usually perform baptism for the dead, only adults perform the Endowment ceremony and proxy marriages/sealings for those who have died outside the faith. This is the reason the LDS members are so involved in genealogy—collecting the names of their ancestors so that the living members can perform the necessary rituals for the dead. However, the church does not stop at tracing their own genealogy. According to the LDS Church, it “has created the largest collection of family records in the world, with information on more than 3 billion deceased people.” These records are used to perform proxy rites for thousands of dead people with no connection to the LDS Church.

SECOND ANOINTING

Through the years there have been numerous published exposés of the endowment ritual (see Evolution of the Mormon Temple Ceremony: 1842-1990). However, there is another little known ceremony given by invitation only from church leadership called the second anointing. In fact, teachers are instructed to avoid the topic. In their Doctrines of the Gospel Teacher Manual we read:

Caution: Exercise caution while discussing the doctrine of having our calling and election made sure. Avoid speculation. Use only the sources given here and in the student manual. Do not attempt in any way to discuss or answer questions about the second anointing.

In order to qualify for this ritual one must have proven him/herself worthy with a lifetime of service and already participated in both the endowment and sealing ceremony. LDS researcher David Buerger pointed out:

The higher ordinance was necessary to confirm the revealed promises of “kingly powers” (i.e., godhood) received in the endowment’s initiatory ordinances. Godhood was therefore the meaning of this higher ordinance, or second anointing.

One does not apply for this privilege, but is invited to the temple, under strict secrecy, to meet with a couple of the top leaders for this special honor. The couple receiving their second anointing go to the temple, and then dress in their temple robes. On December 26, 1866, LDS Apostle Wilford Woodruff described the ritual in his journal:

I met with The Presidency and Twelve at President Youngs Office at about 12 oclok. The subject of the Endowments & 2d Anointings was presented when President Young said that the order of the 2d anointing was for the persons to be anointed to be cloathed in their Priestly robes the man upon the right hand and wife or wives upon the left hand. The Administrator may be dressed in his usual Clothing or in his Priestly Robes as he may see fit. The meeting Should be opened by Prayer then the Administrator should Anoint the man A King & Priest unto the Most High God. Then he should Anoint his wife or wives Queens & Priestess unto her husband.

On January 11, 1846, Brigham Young and his legal wife, Mary Ann Angell, received their second anointing. Part of their ceremony reads:

Brother Brigham Young, I pour this holy, consecrated oil upon your head, and anoint thee a King and a Priest of the Most High God . . . for princes shall bow at thy feet and deliver unto thee their treasures; . . . And I seal thee up unto Eternal Life, . . . And thou shalt attain unto [the] Eternal Godhead . . . that thou mayest . . . create worlds and redeem them; so shall thy joy be full . . .

Elder Heber Chase Kimble then anointed Mary Ann Young, a Queen & Priestess unto her husband (Brigham Young) in the Church . . . Sister Mary Ann Young, I pour upon thy head this holy, consecrated oil, and seal upon thee all the blessings of the everlasting priesthood, in conjunction with thy husband: and I anoint thee to be a Queen and Priestess unto thy husband, . . . inasmuch as thou dost obey his counsel; . . . And I seal thee up unto Eternal Life, thou shalt come forth in the morning of the first resurrection and inherit with him all the honors, glories, and power of Eternal Lives, and that thou shalt attain unto the eternal Godhead, so thy exaltation shall be perfect, . . .

Early Mormon Apostle Heber C. Kimball recorded the second anointing ceremony in his diary:

February the first 1844. My self and wife Vilate was annomted Preeast and Preastest unto our God under the Hands of B[ Brigham]. Young and by the voys [voice] of the Holy Order.

April the first 4 day 1844. I Heber C. Kimball receivd the washing of my feet, and was annomted by my wife Vilate fore my burial, that is my feet, head, Stomach. Even as Mary did Jesus, that she might have a claim on Him in the Reserrection. Inform the City of Nauvoo.

In 1845 I receivd the washing of my feet by [which follows is in Vilate’s hand:]

I Vilate Kimball do hereby certify that on the first day of April 1844 I attended to washing and anointed the head, /Stomach/ and feet of my dear companion Heber C. Kimball, that I may have claim upon him in the morning of the first Reserrection. Vilate Kimball.

Kimball’s comparison of his wife’s washing of his feet to Mary washing the feet of Jesus stems from the early LDS teaching that Jesus and Mary were sealed in marriage. Speaking in 1855, Apostle Orson Hyde declared that “Jesus Christ was married” and that “Mary, Martha and others were his wives.”

The second anointing rite has been slightly modified over the years. Mr. Buerger gave the following outline of the modern second anointing ceremony:

In practice today the second anointing is actually the first of two parts comprising the fullness of the priesthood ceremony. . . . In the Salt Lake temple, second anointings are usually administered on Sunday afternoons. . . . The first part of the ceremony—being anointed and ordained a king and priest or queen and priestess—is administered in a Holy of Holies or special sealing room and is performed by or under the direction of the president of the church. There are usually but not always two witnesses. Only the husband and wife need to dress in temple robes. The husband leads in a prayer circle, offering signs and praying at an altar. He is then anointed with oil on his head, after which he is ordained a king and a priest unto God to rule and reign in the House of Israel forever. . . . He is also blessed with the following (as the officiator determines): the power to bind and loose, curse and bless, the blessings of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; the Holy Spirit of Promise; to attain godhood; to be sealed to eternal life (if not done previously); to have the power to open the heavens; and other blessings.

Next the wife is anointed . . . to be an heir to all the blessings sealed upon her husband . . . to receive the blessings of godhood; . . . to have the power of eternal lives (of posterity without end); . . .

At the conclusion of this ordinance, the washing of the husband’s feet by his wife is explained to the couple. It is a private ordinance, without witnesses. Its significance is related to the resurrection of the dead, as Heber Kimball noted. The couple is told to attend to the ordinance at a date of their choosing in the privacy of their home. At the determined time the husband dedicates the home and the room in which they perform the ordinance, which then follows the pattern of Mary’s anointing Jesus in Matthew 12. The ordinance symbolically prepares the husband for burial, and in this way the wife lays claim upon him in the resurrection . . . Kimball’s journal entry derives from a speculative belief taught by early Mormons that Jesus married Mary and Martha, the sisters of Lazarus.

The emphasis on the wife’s assertion that “I may have claim upon him in the morning of the first Resurrection” seems to relate to the teaching in the temple that the woman is called from the grave to exaltation by her husband. The first time members go through the endowment ceremony they are given a new name, like Paul or Mary or some other scriptural name, and the wife is instructed to not tell her name to anyone other than her husband. Writing in 1846, one former Mormon woman described receiving her new temple name:

In one place [during the temple ritual] I was presented with a new name, which I was not to reveal to any living creature, save the man to whom I should be sealed for eternity. By this name I am to be called in eternity as after the resurrection.

Preaching in 1857, Apostle Erastus Snow declared:

Do you uphold your husband before God as your lord? . . . Can you get into the celestial kingdom without him? . . . No woman will get into the celestial kingdom, except her husband receives her . . .

Apostle Charles Penrose, writing in 1897, explained:

In the resurrection, they stand side by side and hold dominion together. Every man who overcomes all things and is thereby entitled to inherit all things, receives power to bring up his wife to join him in the possession and enjoyment thereof.

In the case of a man marrying a wife in the everlasting covenant who dies while he continues in the flesh and marries another by the same divine law, each wife will come forth in her order and enter with him into his glory.

Apostle Penrose’s statement about the wives resurrecting in their order demonstrates the LDS belief that they will be living polygamy in the Celestial Kingdom. This would apply to current LDS President Russell M. Nelson and LDS Apostle Dallin Oaks, both of whom have remarried after the death of the first wife. This would also apply to all LDS men who have been sealed in marriage to multiple women.

While the LDS leaders claim that their rituals date to Old Testament times, their temple endowment, second anointing and other rites are very different from those of the Jewish temple. The temple in the Old Testament, with its High Priest and animal sacrifices, was a foreshadowing of Christ’s role as both our final High Priest and last blood offering for sin (Hebrews, chapters 5-9). When Christ died on the cross the veil of the temple was torn in half (Luke 23:45) thus signifying that the Old Testament temple ritual had been replaced by the atonement of Christ. Not only does the Bible say marriage ends at death (see Matthew 22:30; Romans 7:2), there is nothing to indicate that the husband will call the wife from the grave (1 Thessalonians 4:16-17).

Attaining Godhood

Originally, the second anointing was to be a guarantee of godhood. Mr. Buerger observed:

Because of the strict confidentiality surrounding second anointings, it is unclear precisely what long-term effect they had on recipients nor, for that matter, the degree to which the conferral of godhood was held to be conditional or unconditional. Most early nineteenth-century statements imply that the ordinance was unconditional.\(^{15}\)

Today, some church leaders seem to be minimizing the importance of the second anointing and refer to it as a “special blessing” but not necessary for exaltation/godhood.\(^{16}\) In 2002 the official LDS magazine Ensign emphasized the necessity of the endowment (as opposed to the second anointing) for “eternal exaltation.”\(^{17}\) The article went on to state: “Obedience to the sacred covenants made in temples qualifies us for eternal life . . .” According to Mormonism, a person’s endowment and temple marriage starts one on the road to godhood (D&C 132:20—“Then shall they be gods”). In a seeming effort to down-play the literalness of attaining Godhood, some Mormons emphasize that the word “gods” in the revelation is not capitalized, however editions prior to 1900 have it capitalized. Also an official statement of the LDS First Presidency used the capitalized form, and declared that man’s ultimate goal was to evolve “into a God” (Ensign, February 2002, p. 30).

In 2002 Tom Phillips, a Stake President, and his wife were invited to the Preston, England, LDS temple to receive their second anointing. He later left the LDS Church and wrote up his experience:

In April 2002 Elder Harold G. Hillam of the First Quorum of Seventy, as President of the Europe West Area, called me into his office. He said he was extending to me and my wife (she was not present), on behalf of President Hinckley, an invitation to receive a “special blessing” in the Preston England Temple. He asked whether I had heard of the “second endowment” to which I replied no. I later told him that I had heard of it, but was so stunned by his invitation my mind went blank regarding the matter.

He told me very few people receive this blessing and it must be kept secret. He said if the general membership knew about it there would be problems. More would want to receive the ordinance than the apostles have time to accommodate and members would wonder why so and so had received it but they had not. I must not even tell my children. He said I should just tell them that their mother and I were going away for the day or weekend. He recommended I read all that Elder Bruce R. McConkie had written on the subject of making your calling and election sure.

Elder Hillam promised me it would be a “life changing” experience. He said the ordinance was performed in Joseph Smith’s time but had been discontinued during President David O. McKay’s time. This resulted in only 2 of the then apostles, Harold B. Lee and Spencer W. Kimball, having had this ordinance on the death of President Joseph Fielding Smith. It was therefore re-introduced and is still practiced today.\(^{18}\)

Among the promises bestowed on him that day were “The Holy Spirit of Promise . . . Blessed to live as long as life is desirable. Blessed to attain unto the Godhood. Power to be a member of a Godhead bestowed. Sealed up to eternal life.”\(^{19}\)

The doctrine that men could eventually achieve Godhood, ruling their own planets, just as our Heavenly Father did, was first introduced by Joseph Smith in the 1840’s. He stated: “you have got to learn how to be Gods yourselves, and to be kings and priests to God the same as all Gods have done before you.”\(^{20}\) The teaching that a man may achieve literal Godhood and rule over his own planet is still taught in current LDS manuals. For instance, their 2010 publication Doctrines of the Gospel Student Manual includes this quote from past president Spencer W. Kimball:

> Each one of you has it within the realm of his possibility to develop a kingdom over which you will preside as its king and god. You will need to develop yourself and grow in ability and power and worthiness, to govern such a world with all of its people. You are sent to this earth not merely to have a good time or to satisfy urges or passions or desires. . . . You are sent to this world with a very serious purpose. You are sent to school, . . . to begin as a human infant and grow to unbelievable proportions in wisdom, judgment, knowledge, and power.\(^{21}\)

Joseph Smith also taught that our God had a father, who had a father, who had a father, etc., thus creating a whole pantheon of Gods:

If Abraham reasoned thus—if Jesus Christ was the Son of God, and John discovered that God the Father of Jesus Christ had a Father, you may suppose that He had a Father also. Where was there ever a son without a father?

While Mormons say they worship only one God, they believe there are countless Gods in the Universe, ruling other worlds. However, the Bible clearly teaches that there is only one God. Isaiah 44:8 says: “Is there a God beside me? Yea, there is no God; I know not any.”

HANS AND BIRGITTA MATTSSON’S EXPERIENCE RECEIVING THE SECOND ANOINTING

In 2013, Salt Lake City Messenger No. 121, we shared some of Hans and Birgitta Mattsson’s journey out of Mormonism. In the early 2000’s Hans was an Area Authority Seventy in Sweden for the LDS Church. In this new appendix to their book, Truth Seeking: The story of High-Ranking Mormon Leader Hans Mattsson Seeking Sincere Answers . . . , they discuss their experience with the little known LDS temple ceremony called the second anointing. Following is the Appendix to their book.

APPENDIX TO “TRUTH SEEKING”

In his first year as an area seventy, Mattsson was called to the Mormon temple in Frankfurt, Germany. They were not allowed to tell or talk to anyone about this invitation. Hans knew that there were further temple ceremonies. Despite all his years of leadership he had not taken part of this ritual. But he had diffuse expectation of what they meant and no insight into how the ritual was performed. It was only “whispered” about this, and the people involved were expected to deny all knowledge of the secrets. This selected inner circle was very limited and got access only through an invitation.

One Sunday afternoon, Mattssons and three other couples found themselves at the Temple gate. The Apostle, Elder Ballard and a few other church leaders welcomed them.

Elder Ballard briefly explained that the ceremony they were now to participate in is known as the second anointing or to have their calling and election ensured.

“You are now worthy to receive a higher level of knowledge and to obtain a deeper degree of certainty. The experience you are now facing will change your life fundamentally,” he said.

The ceremony contained two separate parts. The first part consisted of elder Ballard washing the men’s feet. The foot-washing made the participants clean and innocent from the sins of the world. The model appears in the New Testament, where Jesus washes the feet of the apostles just before the crucifixion. Elder Ballard also anointed the participants with oil as the ancient kings of the Old Testament were anointed. In connection with this anointing ceremony, a blessing was pronounced with promises to Hans and the other men. These promises included the power to bless or curse, to live as long a life as is desirable, that the window of heaven should be opened, that is to say that nothing would stand in the way of the coveted and also the certainty of becoming a God himself. It was a fact. Now we had a sure promise.

The women were anointed to be queens and priestesses for their husbands. During the second part of the ceremony, each pair was referred to a separate room. There was a bowl with water and a towel. The wife now washed the man’s feet and dried them. She then placed her hands on her husband’s head and pronounced a blessing on him as the spirit dictated.

After this, the participants converged again in the celestial room. Elder Ballard summarized the day and invited questions because the occasion would never return. No one should know that they had received the second anointing. Uninitiated members should not even know that this occurs.

“If anyone asks, deny any knowledge whatsoever!” That message was clear.

The temple ceremony Hans had experienced as so difficult and frightening in his youth was in contrast to what he now experienced. Hans thought it was as though he was in a new dimension. He had been approved before God. The promises and covenants that God has made with Abraham once, had God now concluded with him. He felt humble and selected at the same time. The feeling of inadequacy disappeared. God had after all chosen him, he had not exalted himself.

Birgitta’s heart flowed. Everything was wonderful, and what a spiritual experience. Now when they had the second anointing they and their descendants were guaranteed an eternal life together.

For Birgitta, the first part of the ritual was about Hans.

“The church really puts the women so high! The women are clean without foot-washing” she thought.

22 Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith, edited by Joseph Fielding Smith, p. 373
The blessings and promises had been pronounced over his head, but as his wife she was complicit (involved). She is a prerequisite for Hans achieving this.

During the second part of the ceremony Birgitta had been the active. She was intensely present at every moment in solitude with Hans. She was his queen, his priestess, the mother of his descendants now and forever. It was no longer just a picture or a promise of the future. It was for real here and now. She was his escort and great love. They were each other’s life and meaning and eternal destination.

Birgitta was at ease when she washed Hans’ feet in solitude. She realized that this foot-washing must have a completely different meaning than the foot-washing elder Ballard just performed. The Apostle had represented Christ himself.

“Who do I represent?” She recalled how Mary Magdalena anointed the feet of Jesus.

“It must be her I represent. She works in service and love. She is preparing for funeral and resurrection. The physical touch strengthened the proximity and affinity. But Birgitta became more uncomfortable in her next mission, to lay her hands on Hans head and utter a blessing on him. The laying of hands was not what Mormon woman normally exerts.

“What should I say? How should I say? Do I speak by myself or by inspiration?

“She wanted all her soul to lift him as a husband, family man, leader, and priesthood holder. Words came across her lips. Hans was deeply touched by her words and thus disappeared the uncomfortable feelings.

Hans and Birgitta left the temple with an even firmer determination. They now carried a great secret experience together. Their future was secured. Their loyalty would consist of all the tests. They had now achieved all that can be achieved on this earth. All old disappointments and failures were of no importance. They had been sealed and approved for eternal life with the Holy Spirit of Promise.

(epilogue)

Thoughts wander back to Frankfurt. The memories goes to that special Sunday afternoon when we received our calling as a couple and the election ensured. Then, the mind had been filled with wonderment, determination and loyalty.

“Birgitta,” I ask, “What are you thinking these days about the second anointing?”

“Maybe it was good for us when it happened, our life was so stressed and this gave added strength.”

She thinks, silence prevails and I’m waiting.

“Even though I no longer believe, the emotions it created between us remains, customized and enhanced.”

I look at her and I see how she suddenly pinch together the mouth in a grimace.

“But as a person I feel diminished. As women we are so pure and without sin, we need no washing said. Then I thought that it was due to the fact that women held so high. Now I see that it is the other way around. We are not even of legal age explained to stand for our own actions. As a Child.”

I consider her answer, and analyze the experiences and memories. The image of the outer ritual remains unchanged. But the meaning seems different. I marvel that I so fully believed in this. Why did I accept the secrecy? A single secret and selected inner circle (circuit) that others should not know about, especially my fellow believers.23

2018 LDS Church Statistics

The Salt Lake Tribune, April 6, 2019, reported the following 2018 statistics for the LDS Church:

Membership — 16,313,735
Converts in 2018 — 234,332
New children of record — 102,102
Congregations — 30,536
Full-time missionaries — 65,137
Service missionaries — 37,963
Operating temples — 161

According to the article, independent church demographer Matt Martinich concluded this was the “lowest net increase in church membership since 1978.” He also calculated that as many as 140,868 members had resigned in 2018.1

According to Jana Riess, the LDS Church had a 2.03% growth rate in 2013 but this has fallen every year since then. It now stands at 1.21% growth for 2018.2

There is evidence that some form of baptism of or for the dead was practiced by three early Christian heresies: the Marcionites, the Cerinthians, and the Montanists. But the mishandling of the evidence by Mormon apologists and General Authorities has resulted in a great deal of confusion concerning the matter. In the present article I shall discuss and evaluate both the Patristic evidence (i.e., the evidence of the Early Church) relating to baptism for the dead, and the Mormon mishandling of it.

Apologists are motivated by a desire to defend a point of view. That’s what makes them apologists. They want to, in a sense, weaponize the evidence they are working with in the way that best supports the case they are making. As Austin Farrer wrote of C. S. Lewis:

There are frontiersmen and frontiersmen, of course. There is what one might call the Munich school, who will always sell the pass in the belief that their position can be more happily defended from foothills to the rear. Such people are not commonly seen as apologists . . . They are too busy learning from their enemies to do much in defence [sic] of their friends. The typical apologist is a man whose every dyke is his last ditch. He will carry the war into the enemy’s country; he will yield not an inch of his own.¹

And all that’s fair enough, so far as it goes. But there’s a line between favorably reading evidence and distorting or twisting it to make it say something it doesn’t want to. In my experience the apologetic impulse toward crossing that line is a very ecumenical one: Evangelical, liberal Protestant, Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, Hindu, Moslem, Buddhist, even Atheist apologists, are all too often guilty of this particular species of transgression. Really, it gives apologetics a bad name.

For some reason the literature of the early Church has proved a particularly fertile field of harvest for evidence-distorting apologists. Part of the explanation for this, no doubt, lies in a desire to have writers of that early period—writers much closer in time to the founding of Christianity—agree with them, or at least disagree with those they want to refute. The level of distortion increases where apologists, before reading a single line or page of early Church writings, already feel sure their practice of Christianity today mirrors exactly what Jesus intended it to be from the beginning. Many churches hold this perspective to some degree, but none so categorically as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (the Mormons).

I believe that as a prerequisite for using the writings of the early Church in a credible way apologetically one must first learn how to read them disinterestedly; that is to say, one must be able to read them on their own terms, allowing them to develop their own theological language to express their own thoughts in their own way. Otherwise it becomes too easy for apologists to merely exploit, plunder, or mine the ancient texts for what they want to get out of them. Such persons can never really come to know the ancient writers in this way. And, as a result, they frequently distort and misrepresent them, sometimes without even knowing it.

Even though, as I said, apologists of all stripes have been guilty of this, it is a simple fact that Mormon apologists are more likely to be guilty of it because they actually believe, as part of their “dogma,” if you will, that Mormonism is now precisely what early Christianity was in its original founding. This presupposition provides what they mistakenly believe will be a helpful grid for reading the writings of the early Church. Traditionally

Mormons have imagined that to whatever degree any early text differs from current LDS teaching, to that very same degree it was corrupted in a process of falling away from the truth they call the Great Apostasy. Conversely, they imagined that to whatever degree something agrees with current LDS teaching, to that same degree they imagine it retains a glimmer or remnant of original pre-apostasy Christianity. In other words, if one wants to know if a certain ancient Christian teaching is corrupted or not, all one has to do is see if it lines up with current LDS teaching. If it does not, then it can be safely regarded as corrupt. As incredible as it may sound, this grid of judgement was actually authoritatively proposed in the LDS “First Presidency Statement on the King James Version of the Bible” (1992), where it is applied to evaluating places where modern translations differ from the King James: “The most reliable way to measure the accuracy of any biblical passage is not by comparing different texts [i.e., in different Bible translations], but by comparison with the Book of Mormon and modern-day revelations.” In reality, of course, the Book of Mormon and modern-day LDS revelations are going to agree with the King James Version where it differs from other modern versions, simply because both are cribbed from or based on the King James Bible. The same grid is also glowingly articulated by Mormon scholars and apologists Daniel C. Peterson and Stephen D. Ricks, though somewhat more cautiously:

Latter-day Saints, though, are in an enviable position here. Given our belief in an apostasy, we fully expect there to be differences, even vast differences, between the beliefs of the Fathers and Mormon doctrine. Any similarities that exist, however, are potentially understandable as survivals from before that apostasy. When any similarities, even partial ones, exist between Latter-day Saints beliefs and the teachings of the Fathers but are absent between contemporary mainstream Christendom and the Fathers, they can be viewed as deeply important.2

But what may appear to Mormons as a helpful grid, that allegedly puts them in “an enviable position,” actually fits them with blinders that keep them from being able to see what actually lies before them in the ancient texts.

All this brings us uncomfortably near to a story told by Moslem historians about how Caliph Umar allegedly commanded the burning of the books in the Alexandrian library on the grounds that “[I]f what was in them agrees with the Book of God [the Qur’an], they are not required: if it disagrees, they are not desired.”

At the end of the day, if a methodology produces results that appear too good to be true, it is likely a flawed and dubious one withal. In this case we discover the methodology’s refutation in the fact that it can as easily be turned on its head to be used to prove Mormonism always wrong no matter what (i.e., by saying that wherever the early Church evidence agrees in any way with Mormonism, to that extent it had gone apostate, etc.). And there is also the fact that other groups, Evangelicals, Roman Catholics, Jehovah’s Witnesses, can use, and in fact have used, the same methodology, each with equally satisfactory results in defending their own versions of early Christianity.

Mishandling of the Evidence Relating to the Baptism of the Dead

In the present article we will focus our investigation on the Mormon apologetic appeal to patristic evidence in support of its controversial doctrine of baptism for the dead. There are a number of passages Mormons resort to when trying to argue that the practice of baptism for the dead, referred to obliquely by Paul in 1 Corinthians 15:29, was actually a divinely instituted practice which the ancient Church had fallen off performing as it slipped into black apostasy, but which God reestablished when he restored the Church to its original primitivity through the prophet Joseph Smith.

Marcion and Cerinthus among the Mormon Plagiarizers

We mentioned at the beginning that there was some evidence that the Marcionites, the Cerinthians, and the Montanists might have practiced a baptism of or for the dead. Very often, as we shall see, Mormons get confused between the first two groups, the Marcionites and the Cerinthians, so that they commonly mention one when actually speaking of evidence relating to the other. It is this error in fact that has been perpetuated due to plagiarism. But before getting into that let us first deal briefly with the evidence relating to the Marcionites, which though sparse, is some of the most straightforward. One of the earliest and best attested examples of a practice of baptism for the dead relates, as we said, to the followers of the mid-second century heretic Marcion. Their practice is referred to by the late 2nd/early 3rd century North African writer Tertullian,⁴ and actually described by the 4th century Greek theologian John Chrysostom. “[W]hen any [Marcionite] Catechumen departs among them,” Chrysostom writes, “having concealed the living man under the couch of the dead, they approach the corpse and talk with him, and ask him if he wishes to receive baptism; then when he makes no answer, he that is concealed underneath saith in his stead that of course he should wish to be baptized; and so they baptize him instead of the departed.”¹⁵ When challenged about the practice, Chrysostom went on to say, the Marcionites quoted 1 Corinthians 15:29.

In addition to Tertullian and Chrysostom, Mormons also regularly cite a passage from the 4th century writer Epiphanius of Salamis claiming that it too refers to the Marcionite practice of baptism for the dead. But this is an error. In the passage cited below Epiphanius was actually discussing the practices of a group called the Cerinthians not the Marcionites.⁶ In due course we shall evaluate what Epiphanius had actually said about that other group. But for now, we need to pause and trace the source and origin of the Mormons’ mistake. Those making the mistake obviously hadn’t read Epiphanius. They simply copied the mistake out of other Mormon books, but usually without crediting their actual sources, thus becoming guilty of plagiarism. The following paragraph, for example, appears virtually verbatim in the writings of LDS authors George F. Richards,⁷ Mark E. Petersen,⁸ Albert Zobell,⁹ and LeGrand Richards,¹⁰ with only the last mentioned actually crediting any source beyond Epiphanius:

Epiphanius, a writer of the fourth century, in speaking of the Marcionites, a sect of Christians to whom¹¹ he was opposed, says: “In this country—I mean Asia—and even Galatia,¹² their school flourished eminently; and a traditional fact concerning them has reached us, that when any of them had died without baptism, they used to baptize others in their name, lest in the resurrection they should suffer punishment as unbaptized.”

And it should be said that the above passage is only an excerpt of a larger block of text Mormons have copied out of one another’s books for well over a century. Had the above authors read the passage in its original context they would have seen it was a mistake.

Such “research” required no real knowledge of the subject being discussed, no familiarity with Epiphanius or the Marcionites. It only required the ability to mindlessly copy out somebody else’s work. It was only the original author of the frequently plagiarized passage who had to do any real research in non-Mormon sources. But which of the above authors (if any) actually first introduced and perhaps even composed the widely plagiarized passage?

As we said, only LeGrand Richards tells us his source, and he says he got it from an article by Mark E. Petersen in the April 1933 issue of the Utah Genealogical and Historical Magazine.¹³ But it was not ultimately Petersen who composed and introduced the passage, nor was he the one who originally confused the Marcionites with the Cerinthians. That honor on both counts most likely goes to Brigham Henry [B. H.] Roberts (1857-1933), who included the oft-copied passage in several of his books.¹⁴

How Roberts likely came to confuse the Cerinthians with the Marcionites can be seen by comparing the passage as he wrote it with his probable source, namely J. Jacobi’s entry on baptism for the dead in Kitto’s Cyclopaedia of Biblical Literature.¹⁵

¹¹ Mark E. Petersen has “which” here rather than “whom”.
¹³ L. Richards, Marvelous Work, 180.
¹⁵ Roberts’s source in this case is strongly suggested in his clear and acknowledged dependence on this entry in the same context. The same passage from Kitto is also found in Moroni Snow “Redemption and Regeneration,” Latter-day Saints Millennial Star 42.24 (June 14, 1880) 370. There the source is noted, although Snow mistakenly has “Meronites” instead of “Marcionites.”
B. H. Roberts

Epiphanius, a writer of the fourth century, in speaking of the Marcionites, a sect of Christians to whom he was opposed, says:

‘In this country—I mean Asia—and even in Galatia, their school flourished eminently…’

The Panarion of Epiphanius of Salamis

A similar account is given by Epiphanius (Haeres, xxviii. 7) of the Gnostic sect of Cerinthus, who were much opposed to the Marcionites:

‘In this country,—I mean, Asia,—and even in Galatia, their school flourished eminently…’

Where Jacobi had said that Epiphanius had written about the followers of Cerinthus, who in their turn were “much opposed” to the Marcionites, Roberts, by skip of eye or thought, seemed to imagine it was Epiphanius himself who was opposed to the Marcionites. It is a reasonable assumption, since Epiphanius was “much opposed” to the Marcionites, but it is not what the passage was about. The very fact of the confusion suggests Jacobi/Kitto as Roberts’s ultimate source for the quotation, since there is no mention in the original context of the passage in Epiphanius’s work of the Marcionites. In addition this passage from Epiphanius is often referenced as being found not at xxviii 7, as Jacobi and Roberts both have it, but at xxviii 6 which is actually the correct reference.

There is an irony in the fact that it was B. H. Roberts who became the victim of widespread Mormon plagiarism in this instance since it was also he who delivered a very stern warning specifically directed at Mormon leaders engaging in plagiarism in his Seventy’s Course on Theology:

I desire to say one more thing, and to say it as emphatically as it is possible for it to be said. Let every speech, lecture, or discourse by a Seventy be an honest one. Let it be his own, good, bad, or indifferent. A poor speech that is one’s own is more to one’s credit than a good one stolen.

One interesting feature of all the copied versions of the Roberts passage, is the variant numbers included as the alleged reference in Epiphanius where the passage supposedly appears.

One would be hard pressed finding one’s way from the reference given in any one of the plagiarized sources to the actual passage in Epiphanius. This is because the reference numbers given usually make no sense. Once one sees a few of the plagiarized versions together, however, it becomes clear what is going on. Jacobi gave as reference 28:7, which Roberts accurately repeats. Of the four mentioned who copied the Roberts passage, only one, LeGrand Richards, managed to retain the full reference (28:7). Petersen and Zobell inadvertently dropped the 2 from 28, referencing the quote instead to “8.7”. The most mysterious change of reference, however, appears in George F. Richards, who directs the reader to “Heresies, p. 383.” Are we to suppose that G. F. Richards had in mind the page number of some obscure edition of Epiphanius, or was he giving the page number of Jacobi’s article in Kitto? As to the former, since G. F. Richards felt satisfied simply copying his material out of someone else’s book, it seems unlikely he would have then troubled himself hunting down an edition of Epiphanius and finding the page number where the quote occurred. The fact that he repeats Roberts’s mistake also militates against this. As for the Kitto reference, we know what page that was on, and it wasn’t 383. What seems most likely to have happened was that Richards has given us the page number of his true source, namely B. H. Roberts’ New Witness for God [Vol. 1], where the passage in question appears on page 383.

Until now we have been dealing with Mormons who copied the Roberts passage verbatim. But there were also those who repeated Roberts’s mistake closely enough to still be committing plagiarism but without copying the whole of it word for word. For example, John A. Tvedtines, a professor at BYU who wrote a number of articles, reviews, and papers on baptism for the dead in early Christianity, repeats Roberts’s mistake about Epiphanius and the Marcionites, but he does so without copying verbatim.

21  Roberts, New Witness for God I, 383. In the same context where Richards cites another passage as coming from “Heresies, p. 290” we actually find the words on page 290 of Roberts’s The Gospel.
Thus in one of his more recent efforts Tvedtnes declares: “Two of the early church fathers, Epiphanius (AD 315–403) in Panarion 1.28.6 and Tertullian (AD 145–220) in Against Marcion 5.10, note that the Marcionites, an early Christian group, baptized others in the name of the dead.”

Here at last, Tvedtnes gives the correct reference to the passage in Epiphanius, the place where one could actually look it up in, say, Frank Williams’s familiar English edition of the Panarion published by E. J. Brill. In his earlier writings, Tvedtnes did not give the correct reference but simply copied the wrong reference (Panarion 8.7) out of another Mormon’s book, and, typical of those who went before him, did so without properly crediting his source.

In giving this incorrect reference, Tvedtnes inadvertently revealed that he didn’t get the passage from Epiphanius, nor even from B. H. Roberts, but rather from one of Roberts’s many plagiarizers. This detail alone causes us to doubt that Tvedtnes ever read the passage in context in Epiphanius—since there was no way to get from the erroneous reference to the passage itself—but was content to take his place in line as a copiest of the copiest of the copiest of Epiphanius. As we saw, J. Jacobi repeated the passage but gave the reference not as 28.6 but as 28.7 (see discussion above). B. H. Roberts, in his turn, copied Jacobi’s form of the passage, including his 28.7 reference. Then Mark E. Petersen and Albert Zobell copied Roberts, or one another, or some other Roberts plagiarizer, but in the process muddled the reference, inadvertently dropping the 2 from Roberts’s 28.7, reducing it to 8.7.

Finally Tvedtnes, in his earlier works, copied the passage from Petersen or Zobell or some other Roberts plagiarizer, again repeating the muddled 8.7 reference.

Posthumous Baptism for Marcionite Catechumens

Even granting that Epiphanius was not speaking of the Marcionites, we still have the statements from Tertullian and Chrysostom saying they practiced a form of baptism for the dead, and in the case of the latter the practice is described as a baptism by proxy. When a catechumen—one already engaged in a course of preparation for baptism—dies, someone gets under the bed to request baptism on behalf of the dead person, and then is afterward baptized in the dead person’s stead.

Chrysostom’s description as likely as not provides the explanation of the practice’s origin. Where baptism is counted essential for salvation, the death of someone in process of preparing for it must have seemed particularly tragic. Could not some way be found to justify baptizing the dead catechumen? Wasn’t he or she faithful and, as it were, almost there! Under such unhappy circumstances we can easily imagine 1 Corinthians 15:29 being seized upon as suggesting a positive way forward.

If this explanation is correct it nullifies the Mormons’ appeal to Marcionite baptism for the dead as a way of justifying their own more elaborate practice. In addition, in order for it to be of any use to Mormon apologists the practice would need to be viewed as a remainder of authentic, original Christian practice, not as a later innovation by Marcionites. Such was the attempt of Tvedtnes when he wrote: “Some dismiss this evidence on the grounds that the Marcionites were heretics, Latter-day Saints, believing that the great apostasy was already well under way by Marcion’s time and that no Christian group then possessed the full truth, see the practice as a remnant of an earlier rite dating from the time of the apostles.”

And yet even laying aside the fact that Marcionites were heretics, where is there any proof to support Tvedtnes’s assertion of the practice’s primitivity? We recall that Chrysostom himself says that when the Marcionites were challenged about the teaching they appealed to 1 Corinthians 15:29. He mentions no claim on their part that they were adhering to a traditional practice, although, to be sure, they may or may not have made such a claim.

Ricks; Provo, UT: Foundation for Ancient Research and Mormon Studies [FARMS], 1999), 56. See also Questions 26 for SHIELDS 42 Questions List (http://www.shields-research.org/42_Questions/ques26_Tvedtnes.htm. Although his plagiarism was much more direct.

But however that may be the Marcionite practice really does reflect a situation later than the New Testament period. In the New Testament there was no concept of an extended period of preparation prior to baptism. You simply heard, believed, and were baptized. We see this, for example, in the fact that those responding to Peter’s Pentecost sermon were baptized the same day (Acts 2:38-41). The same is true in the case of the Philippian jailer who practiced baptism for the dead (Acts 16:30-33): He then brought them out and asked, “Sirs, what must I do to be saved?” They replied, “Believe in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved—you and your household.” Then they spoke the word of the Lord to him and to all the others in his house. At that hour of the night the jailer took them and washed their wounds; then immediately he and all his family were baptized.

It was only later that baptism came to be delayed to make way for an extended period of preparatory instruction. The Marcionite practice therefore makes more sense as a response to contingencies arising from the later situation.

Yet for the sake of argument let us suppose for a moment that the Marcionites were following some sort of traditional, long-established practice. If they were, whose practice was it? Was it Christ’s practice? The Apostles’? One of the ironies of the Marcionite practice is that Paul’s appeal in 1 Corinthians 15:29 to the practice of baptism for the dead is part of his defense of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead—“If the dead are not raised at all, why are people baptized for them?” But the Marcionites not only practiced baptism for the dead, they also denied the resurrection. The question then becomes: did those who practiced baptism for the dead at Corinth also deny the resurrection? In the context of 1 Corinthians we notice that Paul refers to baptism for the dead indirectly rather than as something he himself would want to endorse: “why are they then baptized for the dead?” Who are they? As we read through 1 Corinthians we discover a number of things going on at Corinth that Paul must definitely did not endorse. A man there was having sex with his father’s wife (5:1), and some at Corinth were boasting about it, apparently considering it a healthy exercise in Christian freedom (5:2). At the communion table there was social and economic separatism as well as too much wine, some people getting drunk, others going away hungry (11:20-21). Believers were suing one another in court before the secular authority (6:1). Paul even has to remind the Corinthians that they ought not go to prostitutes (6:14), and that if in the course of prophetic speech someone says “Jesus be cursed” he is not speaking by the Spirit of God (12:3). Finally, in defending the centrality of the resurrection, Paul reveals that there are actually people in the Corinthian church who denied the resurrection: “if it is preached,” he wrote, “that Christ has been raised from the dead, how can some of you say that there is no resurrection of the dead?” (15:12).

Something had gone dreadfully wrong at Corinth, and it appears to have featured an unhealthy reading of the saying “everything is permissible” (1 Cor 6:11, 10:23). Many recent translations often place those words in quotation marks, implying that Paul was treating it as coming from some other written or spoken context, as, for example, something he or Apollos or somebody else might have written, or said, but that had been interpreted entirely wrong, or perhaps something that the Corinthians had said in their letter to Paul (see 7:1), or that Paul had heard from Corinthian visitors to Ephesus from Chloé’s household (see 1:11). In either case some of the particulars as to how something had gone morally wrong over the statement are clear enough. But how all that might relate to the rejection of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead by some at Corinth is uncertain. Perhaps they were arguing something along the lines, for example, of later libertine Gnostics, who held that since it is the soul rather than the body that is raised, it doesn’t matter what one does with one’s body, such that all the traditional morals become passé. In view of this possibility it is interesting that when Paul addresses the problem of sexual immorality in the letter the issue of the body stands at the center of his argument:

Do you not know that your bodies are members of Christ himself? Shall I then take the members of Christ and unite them with a prostitute? . . . Flee from sexual immorality. All other sins a man commits are outside his body, but he who sins sexually sins against his own body . . . You are not your own; you were bought at a price. Therefore honor God with your body (6:15-20).

Notice that Paul does not simply say, “honor God,” but, “honor God with your body,” making it clear that it is possible to dishonor God by what one does with/to one’s body. He also makes it clear that one can sin against one’s own body. Such argumentation would answer very well a teaching that said it didn’t matter what one did with one’s body because it is the soul rather than the body that survives death.

Was it possible, then, that the Marcionite teaching about baptism for the dead might have had some genetic connection with the practice of baptism for the dead?

It is simply false to say that Marcionites are “invariably referred to as Christians.” Typical of the Early Church’s view of Marcion and his followers is the following story of an encounter between Marcion and Polycarp, the disciple of the Apostle John the Evangelist:

And Polycarp himself, when Marcion once met him and said, “Knowest thou us?” replied, “I know the first born of Satan.” Such caution did the apostles and their disciples exercise that they might not even converse with any of those who perverted the truth.31

In contrast, Mormon writer Alexander B. Morrison readily admits that the Marcionites were regarded as heretics, but he does so in the context of making the outrageous assertion that it was for the practice of baptism for the dead that Marcion was “accused of heresy, and condemned by ‘orthodox’ Christians.”32

But, again, that simply isn’t true either.32 Marcion was condemned for rejecting the God of the Old Testament and much of the New Testament. He was condemned as well for repudiating a number of central Christian teachings including the resurrection of the dead.

Christians might feel comfortable using the term “Christian” to describe Marcion, so long as the term is an adjective modifying the noun “heresy.” Marcion was the founder of a “Christian” heresy in the sense that he cobbled together his system largely from Christian sources in a Christian context. Hence it would be wrong to say he founded, for example, a “Buddhist” heresy. His was a Christian heresy. In the same way most Christians would be happy to speak of Mormonism as Christian in the same sense, i.e., as a Christian, as opposed to say, a Buddhist, or Jewish, or Moslem heresy. To be sure Mormons are perfectly within their rights to call themselves Christians if they want to: ‘Tis a free country. But as soon as they begin insisting that other people call them Christians they run into problems of the sort that always arise where ancient cherished words are co-opted and given new and foreign meanings.

Baptism for the Dead among the Cerinthians

A while ago we were discussing a rather widespread Mormon misunderstanding concerning who the 4th century writer Epiphanius had accused of practicing baptism for the dead. As the reader will recall, they were saying it was the Marcionites, when in reality it was another heretical group known as the Cerinthians. Here is what Epiphanius said about them:

For their school reached its height in this country, I mean Asia, and in Galatia as well. And in these countries I also heard of a tradition which said that when some of their people died too soon, without baptism, others would be baptized for them in their names, so that they would not be punished for rising unbaptized at the resurrection and become the subjects of the authority that made the world.33

Cerinthus’s heresy differed at points from that of Marcion. For example, Cerinthus is not thought to have denied the resurrection outright, as Marcion did, but rather is credited with saying that Jesus would not rise until the general resurrection.34 By the fourth century, when Epiphanius was writing, some Cerinthians were denying the resurrection, while others continued in the teachings of their founder.35

When Mormon apologists seek to exploit the teaching of early heretics in support of their own, they often place the words heretic or heretical in quotation marks as a way of casting doubt over the designation. They often further underscore this with some reference to the teacher or the group being condemned by the “orthodox,” again in quotation marks. The idea is to minimize the significance of the negative characterization: How is a church that teachings of their founder.35

We mentioned above that Peterson and Ricks had suggested that the “anti-Mormon claim that those who baptize for the dead cannot be Christian . . . ignores the fact that such groups as the Montanists—whom we have already seen to be universally recognized as Christians—practiced a similar right.”39 The claim that the Montanists were “universally recognized as Christians,” is incorrect, as it was in the case of the Marcionites. What Peterson and Ricks have done is look in a handful of recent dictionaries endorsing it.

So far as I am aware no Mormon apologist has made this claim as yet. However, since trading on ambiguity is a major feature of Mormon apologetics, we would not be surprised to find this interpretation to be adopted somewhere by some Mormon apologist or other in the future, if only because I have mentioned its possibility as an interpretation here.

and encyclopedias where the adjective Christian was used to describe these two movements. Naturally such a superficial approach to research is inadequate for arriving at a true sense of how both ancient and modern Christians have viewed these two movements. As it happens the teachings of Marcion have almost always been deemed heretical, but there are those in the modern Church who are more willing to entertain the possibility that Montanus and his followers were Christians, and to see a parallel to Montanism in the modern prophetic or charismatic movements, where, although a lot of good things happen, some people have been a bit too quick to declare the time of the end, make prophesies that don’t pan out, or fake miracles, tongues, or other spiritual gifts. Unhealthy? Certainly! Ill advised? Indubitably! But heretical? Well, maybe, maybe not. In addition the fact that the great theologian Tertullian ultimately became a Montanist has also been a mitigating factor in hesitancy to write the whole movement off as heretical. By way of contrast to modern Christian feelings, the ancient Church was largely agreed on the heretical character of Montanism.

But however that may be, evidence that can be cited for a Montanist baptism for the dead is slender and late, consisting primarily of a single reference from the late 4th century writer Filaster (Filastrius/Philastrius), who claimed without elaboration concerning the Montanists, that “They baptize the dead” (Hi mortuos baptizant). Yet even granting the brevity of Filaster’s statement, notice that we are not talking, apparently, of proxy baptism, i.e., the baptizing a live person in a dead one’s stead, i.e., a baptism for the dead. Rather we are talking about baptism of the dead, i.e., the baptism of a corpse. Hugh Wimber Nibley, that late great Father Patriarch of Mormon apologetics, recognized the lack of direct parallel here, yet still attempted to make the passage relevant for the Mormon cause by representing it as a corrupted form of the earlier, and allegedly more pristine, practice of the Marcionites. Thus for Nibley the Marcionite practice represented “a half-way point between baptism for the dead and the later rite of baptism of the dead . . . in their need to find some official condemnation of baptism for the dead, churchmen have had to resort to citing those instances which deal with condemnation of its opposite, namely baptism of the dead” (my italics). Therefore, whenever the early Church spoke of baptism of the dead, Nibley wants to regard it as “a deliberate confusion.” As to Filaster’s description of the Montanist practice, Nibley deftly dismisses it as one of “a number of false and exaggerated charges against the Cataphrygians [Montanists] in the fourth century.” Nibley was very sure of himself in what he says here (as he was in all things), but there is really no reason to claim that the Montanists were being slandered by Filaster when he said that they baptized the dead. Nor can Nibley establish that things developed in the way he described. The weakness of his argument is rendered conspicuous by his need to resort there to a stock ad hominem attack on the supposedly sinister intents and motives of the early Christian church.

John A. Tvedtnes is very typical of Mormon scholars and apologists when he remarks:

That baptism for the dead was indeed practiced in some orthodox Christian circles is indicated by the decisions of two late fourth-century councils. The fourth canon (fifth in some lists) of the Synod of Hippo, held in 393, declares, “The Eucharist shall not be given to dead bodies . . . nor baptism conferred upon them.” The ruling was confirmed four years later in the sixth canon of the Third Council of Carthage.

Tvedtnes is mostly right, except for one thing. The canon he quotes reads: “The Eucharist shall not be given to dead bodies, nor baptism conferred upon them.” The error is calling what was condemned baptism for the dead, which he does at the beginning of the passage. As in the case of Filaster’s remark about the Montanists, so here too, we are dealing with a baptism of not for the dead. The point is brought out rather sharply by the fact that apparently the Eucharist was being placed into the mouths of corpses as well.

This claim that the Synod of Hippo/Council of Carthage had condemned baptism of the dead is an oft repeated one in Mormon apologetics, again largely because B. H. Roberts said it\(^{46}\) and many others simply copied what he said either verbatim or nearly so.\(^{47}\) In this case as well Roberts was apparently relying on Jacobi’s article in Kitto. And once again he misread his source:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Jacobi</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>In the Concil. Carthagin. A.D. 397, can. 6, and Codex Eccles. Afric. can. 18, it is forbidden to administer baptism and the holy communion to the dead.</td>

<tr>
<th>Roberts</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>The council of Carthage, held A. D., 397, in its sixth canon, forbids the administration of baptism and holy communion for the dead.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

It is curious that Roberts leaves out any reference to what Jacobi says soon after: “Here baptism by proxy is not alluded to, and we must therefore assume that the Councils had no ground for its prohibition, the custom having, as it seems, not then existed in those parts.”\(^{48}\) Interestingly when the Mormon Moroni Snow appealed to this same passage from Kitto in his 1880 sermon, “Redemption and Regeneration,” he managed to notice that the article spoke of baptism of the dead, and so he too remarked upon the fact that “baptism by proxy is not alluded to.”\(^{49}\)

The context in which baptism of the dead as condemned in these late 4th century ecclesiastical gatherings might arise is not hard to imagine. Indeed it dovetails nicely with the fact that some people had been putting off their baptisms until they were about to die. The rationale for that practice being that one was supposed to avoid all sin after baptism. Already more than a half-century earlier the first Christian Emperor, Constantine, had waited to be baptized until he was on his deathbed.\(^{50}\) It doesn’t take a strong imagination to see how a practice of baptism of the dead, could come along to supplement baptism of the dying in cases where the dying had waited just a bit too long.

An Exercise in Reaching

Given the paucity of early evidence in which someone, somewhere, was said to have practiced baptism of the dead, it is hardly surprising to find more intrepid Mormon apologists searching further afield for potentially useful evidence for defending their practice of proxy baptism. And in the process they have managed to turn up a few tidbits that are interesting, even though not ultimately very helpful to their case. Here our focus continues on John A. Tvedtnes and the late Hugh Nibley who seem to be the two who have worked hardest at this.

It should be noted before we proceed further that in almost every case we have looked at so far those who are said to practice baptism of the dead were being described by others and not by themselves. Happily, we do have a passage from an early Gnostic teacher named Theodotus who does venture an interpretation of 1 Corinthians 15:29 on his own: “And when the Apostle said, ‘Else what shall they do who are baptised for the dead?’ . . . For, he says, the angels of whom we are portions were baptised for us. But we are dead, who are deadened by this existence, but the males are alive who did not participate in this existence.”\(^{51}\) In other words baptism of the dead refers to angels being baptised for us. Such a passage is understandably of limited use to Mormon apologists and they have not featured it. Of some interest however is the passage appealed to by Tvedtnes from the Gnostic Pistis Sophia 3.128 where Mary asks Jesus what to do if a pious relative of an unrepentant, definitely outer-darkness bound person dies, and Jesus responds by recommending that “the one mystery of the ineffable which forgives sins at all times,” should be performed, promising a positive outcome. Tvedtnes adds words and excludes them in order to make the passage sound more Mormon. He does this first of all, by equating what the text called mysteries with ordinances, and one mystery of...

Some members of the Church deplored the lateness of the decision. But in fact late, last minute baptism — like adult baptism in general — was not an infrequent phenomenon, because it was strongly felt that after baptism one ought not to commit a sin, and the only way to ensure this was to become baptized when one was not going to live very much longer” (Constantine the Great: The Man & His Times [New York: Scribner’s, 1994], 212).

the ineffable with baptism. While both substitutions may be reasonable surmises, they are by no means obvious from the immediate context, and Tvedtnes made no attempt to provide evidence indicating that his surmise in each case was correct. Then secondly, he uses ellipsis points to pass over mention that the passage appears to involve a process of post mortal progress that involves reincarnation. The latter can be seen plain enough by simply reproducing Mary’s question to Jesus with the words Tvedtnes excludes printed in bold:

“My Lord, if a good man has fulfilled all the mysteries [ordinances], and he has a relative, in a word, he has a man and that man is an impious one who has committed all the sins which are worthy of the outer darkness; and he has not repented; or he has completed his number of cycles in the changes of the body, and that man has done nothing profitable and has come forth from the body; and we have known of him certainly that he has sinned and is worthy of the outer darkness; what should we do to him so that we save him from the punishments of the dragon of the outer darkness, so that he is returned to a righteous body which will find the mysteries of the Kingdom of the Light, and become good and go to the height, and inherit the Kingdom of the Light?”

And yet despite Tvedtnes’s Mormonizing touches, there is no question that the passage is dealing with some sort of liturgical rite aimed at delivering souls from outer darkness.

In addition to the above, Tvedtnes also references in footnotes (but does not describe) several interesting practices by contemporary Middle Eastern Mandaeans, another heretical group, including one in which, when a baby dies during their lengthy baptism ritual, an image of the child is made out of dough and the rest of the ceremony is performed to completion, thus rendering the actual example of the practice of baptism for the dead.

But of course contemporary examples are of limited value when trying to establish the precise character of ancient practice.

At points however both Nibley and Tvedtnes become too creative in their attempts at molding the evidence in the direction they feel it needs to go. Let me demonstrate this with one example from each.

In the case of Tvedtnes, one of the most interesting claims he puts forward is that the Egyptian Coptic Church practiced and continues to practice baptism for the dead. He even dedicated a paper to the topic entitled “Baptism for the Dead: The Coptic Rationale.” One of the interesting things about that paper is that in the course of his argument he gives no actual evidence. He does mention the decision of Hippo and Carthage and then says that “The monophysitic church of Egypt was not represented at these minor councils and hence did not feel bound to discontinue the practice.”

54 The extent to which Tvedtnes’s example departs from the simplicity of the ancient baptismal liturgies is seen in the following excerpt in The Mandaeans of Iraq & Iran by Drower (pages 215-16):

Then, without speaking, the proxy descends into the water, and repeats voicelessly, ‘I, N. son of N. (the name of the dead person) am baptized with the baptism of [216] Bahram the Great, son of the mighty [ones]. My baptism shall protect me and cause me to ascend to the summit.’ He submerges thrice, and on emerging puts on a completely new rasta. As in the case of the dead person, a piece of gold (attro) and a piece of silver (kesva) must be sewn to the right and left side respectively of the stole. The proxy then comes and sits before the toriana facing the North Star (House of Abathur), while the ganzibra, who wears a kila (myrtle wreath) on the little finger of his right hand, goes, together with the priests and shganda, to perform another riglama at the yardna.

They return and stand in a row facing the north, the ganzibra to the extreme right and the shganda at the extreme left, and repeat the ‘Sharwali ‘treš’, &c., touching each part of the rasta.

They then repeat:

‘My Lord be praised! The Right heal ye! In the name of the Great Primal Strange Life, from sublime worlds of light, who is above all works; health and purity (or victory), strength and soundness, speaking and hearing, joy of heart and a forgiver of sins may there be for my soul, mine, N. of N. (the name of the reciter), who have prayed this prayer of rahmia, and a forgiver of sins may there be for N. son of N. (the name of the dead person) of this masiqa (ascension) and dukhrana (mention, remembrance), and a forgiver of sins may there be for our fathers, and teachers, and brothers and sisters, both those who have left the body and those still in the body, and a forgiver of sins may there be for me.’

right in regarding these councils as merely regional rather than ecumenical, but beyond that he speaks of them anachronistically in using the adjective monophysitic to describe the Church in Egypt. That term has no relevance in the present case, it only really comes into play after the mid-fifth century Council of Chalcedon. More deeply problematic is Tvedtnes’s claim that the Egyptian Church continued to practice baptism for the dead due to it not being under the jurisdiction of Hippo and Carthage. The difficulty there is that he provides no evidence that the Egyptian church ever started practicing baptism for the dead in the first place. Nor could he have done so, since there is none. Naturally one cannot continue to baptize for the dead unless one has started doing it in the first place. Despite this Tvedtnes includes a footnote in which he claims that “there is abundant textual evidence for this practice among early Christians in Egypt.” Actually there isn’t.

When it comes time to support his claim of an ongoing practice of baptism for the dead in Egypt, Tvedtnes writes: “I have, to date, found no documentation for its existence in the modern Coptic Church. Nevertheless, some of my Coptic friends have assured me that it is still practiced in the case of family members who die unbaptized.” Tvedtnes goes on to point to one printed source which is supposed to provide evidence of the continuation of the practice in the modern Coptic Church: “the Coptic story of the girl who was baptized after her death,” (Tvedtnes’s words). The story is found in S. H. Leeder’s Modern Sons of the Pharaohs: A Study of the Manners and Customs of the Copts of Egypt (1918).

When we go to that work, however, and turn to the page indicated by Tvedtnes, we discover that it provides evidence neither of baptism for the dead’s continuing existence in the modern Coptic Church, nor of its having ever been practiced. Rather it describes a story attributed to the fourth century that dealt with a miraculous divine action relating to a girl who died without baptism:

There is a Coptic story of the fourth century (which might have come from a village to-day) illustrating not only the importance attached to baptism, but also the infinite hope these Eastern people have in the mercy of God. A certain man living remote from the world had a little daughter, who died before she could be baptized. Her father distributed among the poor the portion that came to her; and he never ceased to make entreaty to God on behalf of his daughter because she had departed without being baptized. As he prayed one day, he heard a voice, which said, “Have no sorrow; I have baptized thy daughter”; but he lacked faith. And the voice spake again, saying, “Uncover her grave, and thou wilt find she is no longer there.” And he did so, and he found her not, for she had departed, and had been laid with the believers.

Not only does this story fail to provide evidence for a practice of baptism for the dead, it indicates the opposite, namely that one was not in place. When his little daughter died without baptism, all the father could do was pray and hope in God. Had such a practice been in place, there would have been no reason for the anxious prayer, nor the miraculous sign in answer to it, nor even for the story itself.

In advance of its appearance, Tvedtnes promised concerning his article “Baptism for the Dead in the Early Church” published in 1999 that it would “put to rest any doubts about the widespread belief in baptism for the dead among early Christians.” This ambitious claim naturally leads the reader familiar with this earlier paper on baptism for the dead in the Coptic Church to wonder whether Tvedtnes would do anything in the new article to improve his case on that point. Given the fact that Tvedtnes’s earlier assertion about the Coptic Church’s ongoing practice of baptism for the dead was based on nothing better than hearsay—“my Coptic friends have assured me”—would he now in his more definitive study firm up his evidential base, or at least delete his unwarranted claim? As it happened he did neither. Indeed he again appealed to hearsay and to the story in Leeder’s book, this time more inaccurately than before: “To date, I have found only one modern story of an Egyptian girl who was baptized by proxy after her death.” The key distorting addition is the word “proxy.”

Ironically, in his “final-word” article, Tvedtnes further raises the possibility that the Syrian Orthodox Church practices baptism for the dead as well, but again on the basis of nothing better than hearsay: “A Syrian Orthodox priest recently told me that his church still recognizes baptism for the dead, but I have not yet received the promised documentation to support that claim.”

Naturally since Tvedtnes’s claims came to be posted on the Internet, it was only a matter of time before someone from the Coptic Church would respond. In the Question and Answer section of the website for the Coptic Orthodox Diocese of the Southern United States, one of the questions takes note of the Mormon claim and then asks: “I know our church does not practice baptism for the dead now, but did it ever?” To which an extended answer is given beginning with the statement: “Baptism for the dead is a false practice never observed by the Church.”

We turn then to Hugh Nibley. It is hard to read very far in Nibley before getting the feeling (legitimately or not) that he is trying to make it hard for his readers to check out his claims from his sources. He does this, as I have noted elsewhere, by “featuring obscure editions in other languages instead of the widely available, and often more up-to-date and authoritative, English ones.” This is true in the present case, in addition to which he confounds things further by not referring to his source by its usual name.

In the course of his 1946 sequence of articles on “Baptism for the Dead in Ancient Times,” quoted here from his collected works, Nibley quotes a work he calls “Discourses to the Apostles” in which the Lord tells his disciples that they will be called “Servants [diakonoi] because they [the dead] will receive the baptism of life and the forgiveness of your sins from my hand through you, . . . and so have part in the heavenly kingdom.” By placing the word “the dead” in brackets Nibley is indicating that in the larger context it was the dead that were clearly in the author’s mind. But how do we discover whether or not that is the case? Nibley provides a footnote that directs us to pages 133-35 of a German volume by Carl Schmidt entitled Gespräche Jesu mit seiner Jüngern nach der Auferstehung (1919).

The actual passage quoted is on page 135 and we see that Schmidt, unlike Nibley, uses the familiar title in the top left heading of the pages cited: Epistula apostolorum, known in English as the Epistle of the Apostles. Both the Latin and English forms are the familiar names by which scholars refer to this well-known work. Nibley uses neither, but inappropriately gives as the name of the work a title derived from the title of Schmidt’s book. This makes it unnecessary for him to cite the chapter and verse he is quoting from the Epistle of the Apostles. It would have been nice had Nibley helped his readers evaluate his claim by informing them that at the time he wrote the passage he quotes, could have easily been consulted in section 42 of the English edition of the Epistle of the Apostles in Montague Rhodes James’s popular The Apocryphal New Testament. Had he done that, however, it would have become clear to every English reader who cared to check the reference that his insertion of “the dead” into the phrase “they shall receive the baptism of life and the remission of their sins at my hands through you,” was entirely illegitimate. The occasion of the statement in the larger context is Jesus’s meeting with his disciples after his resurrection and teaching them about their upcoming task of world evangelism. The baptism being referred to, therefore, is the baptism they will be performing on living people as they go out and preach the Gospel. It has nothing to do with baptism for the dead.

Conclusion:

Early orthodox Christianity never had a practice of baptism for the dead, 1 Corinthians 15:29 notwithstanding. Very possibly in that context Paul was alluding to the practice of a faction in the Corinthian Church that had departed substantially from early apostolic teaching in other crucial areas as well (they may have, for example, also been denying the resurrection). Two additional heretical groups, the Marcionites and the Cerinthians, did practice forms of proxy baptism—the former for catechumens who had died during preparation for baptism, and the latter for fellow Cerinthian believers who had died too soon,” whatever that means. In addition to these examples of baptism for the dead, there is also evidence of a practice of baptism of the dead, i.e., a baptism of corpses. The Montanists were accused of this by one 4th century author, although when Tertullian, writing as a Montanist at the beginning of the 3rd century, refers to the practice in Against Marcion 5.10 he does not affirm it, nor does he even seem to know what Paul was speaking about in 1 Corinthians 15:29. In addition, the Synod of Hippo (393) forbid the practice of baptizing dead bodies as well as the placing of the Eucharist in their mouths. This practice, baptism of not for the dead, although frequently appealed to by Mormon apologists, really does not relate to their own practice at all. This leaves them only the Marcionite and Cerinthian practices to appeal to for explicit support, although in each of these cases we are probably dealing with a rite whose inner logic is entirely foreign to the one underpinning the current Mormon practice.

62 It should be “their sins” (Schmidt: “ihrer Sünden”). See also, M. R. James below. Apparently, Nibley simply made a mistake here since the mistranslation does not appear to forward his argument.
63 Nibley, “Baptism for the Dead,” in Mormonism and Early Christianity, 123.
64 Also note that where Nibley has “forgiveness for your sins,” it ought to be, and Nibley probably actually intended, “forgiveness for their sins.”

65 Sec. 33.1 in Schmidt’s translation of the Coptic Version.
67 Quoted here from the edition of James.
Thus the case Mormon apologists put forward for a baptism for the dead endorsed by Jesus and the apostles is not impressive. But then, given the methodology endorsed by the First Presidency and Peterson and Ricks at the beginning of this article, it doesn’t have to be, so long as the only ones they hope to persuade are Mormons. Still, it is interesting that even being given to such dubious methodology, the language of legitimately using evidence and making valid arguments still persists, as in the case of Tvedtnes’s prediction that his 1999 article on the subject would “put to rest any doubts about the widespread belief in baptism for the dead among early Christians.”

And while it is possible that in making that declaration Tvedtnes was only engaging in rhetorical bluster, a more disturbing possibility exists. Did he actually believe what he said, and should we regard his overconfidence as a consequence of following the flawed methodology? And does he not imply this himself when he says: “Latter-day Saints, believing that the great apostasy was already well under way by Marcion’s time and that no Christian group then possessed the full truth, see the practice as a remnant of an earlier rite dating from the time of the apostles”?69

What we would have in that case is a methodology that actually fosters an insensitivity toward the weight of evidence, and which in turn breeds overconfidence, a vicious cycle that calls to mind what Karl Mannheim said in another connection about those who “become so intensely interest-bound to a situation that they are simply no longer able to see certain facts which undermine their domination,” or, in this case, their sense of being “in the right.”70 Such a situation makes it extremely difficult for Mormons to dialogue with and/or be taken seriously by outsiders who expect the early evidence to be handled in a credible and respectful manner. Since this has not been the case, the best outsiders can perhaps do in a sense is to regard such authors as objects of study rather than partners in scholarly interaction.

MORMON POSITION:

Latter-day Saints (Mormons) believe that water baptism by immersion “is the first saving ordinance of the gospel. . . . All who seek eternal life must follow the example of the Savior by being baptized and receiving the gift of the Holy Ghost” (True to the Faith, 2004, p. 21).

Baptism, according to Mormonism, is the prerequisite to receiving the “gift of the Holy Ghost” and is a necessary step in the process of being exalted to the highest level of heaven. Believing that non-Mormon dead relatives will have an opportunity to receive the Mormon “restored gospel” in “spirit prison,” Latter-day Saints take it upon themselves to help “save” them by engaging in proxy baptism on behalf of their dead ancestors. Mormon Apostle Bruce R. McConkie explains:

> . . . though held captive in the spirit prison, these prisoners of hope looked forward with desire and expectation to their redemption . . . a redemption that would be complete only after baptism for the dead had been performed for them in this mortal sphere where there is water.—(Mormon Doctrine, p. 601)

Appealing to 1 Corinthians 15:29 and Hebrews 11:40 for Biblical support, Joseph Smith claimed that “the greatest responsibility in this world that God has laid upon us [Mormons] is to seek after our dead . . . every spirit in the eternal world can be ferreted out and saved. . . . And so you can see how far you can be a savior . . . This doctrine was the burden of the scriptures. Those Saints who neglect it in behalf of their deceased relatives, do it at the peril of their own salvation” (Teachings of the Prophet Joseph Smith, 1976, by Joseph Fielding Smith, pp. 356-357, 193).

BIBLICAL RESPONSE:

Contrary to the claims of Mormonism, physical baptism is not a pre-requisite for salvation. At Luke 23:43, we read that Jesus assured the thief on the cross (who had not been baptized), that he would be “with” Him in paradise that day, simply because he believed. The apostle Paul made a distinction between the “gospel” and “baptism” when he proclaimed to the Corinthian believers: “I thank God that I baptized none of you. . . . For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel: not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect” (1 Corinthians 1:14, 17).

Not only does Paul reject the notion that “baptism” was part of the “gospel,” but he repeatedly affirmed salvation by “faith” apart from works (see Romans 4:5, 11:6). Furthermore, we see that baptism is not a requirement to receive the Holy Ghost. At Acts 10:44-47, we read of an incident where believers received the gift of the “Holy Ghost” before they were baptized.

Just as Biblical Scripture presents water baptism as a sign (not seal) of salvation, there is no indication in Scripture that early Christians engaged in the practice of “baptism for the dead.” The only place the practice is mentioned is in 1 Corinthians 15:29. It is important to note that in this passage, Paul excluded himself and the Christian believers he was speaking to by his use of the terms “they” and “them” in reference to the practice. It is likely that Paul had in mind heretical groups such as the Cerinthians and Marcionites who practiced a form of baptism for the dead. It appears that Paul was pointing to groups such as these as examples of those whose practice would be futile if Christ had not indeed raised from the dead. If such practice is indeed essential for salvation, we ask why the lack of emphasis in the Bible and Book of Mormon? With genealogical research being a necessary activity for “baptism for the dead,” we ask why the Bible warns against this practice when it states:

> But avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain.—Titus 3:9

> Neither give heed to fables and endless genealogies, which minister questions, rather than godly edifying which is in faith: so do.—1 Timothy 1:4

Thus we conclude that contrary to the Mormon notion that we all can be “saviors” by “redeeming our dead” ancestors through baptism, the Bible proclaims:

> None of them can by any means redeem his brother; nor give to God a ransom for him:—Psalm 49:7

EXCERPTS FROM LETTERS AND EMAILS

May 2019: LDS woman: I read your article and was rather impressed by your understanding of your book, but I am concerned that you provided a bit of false information about the Church’s doctrine. Mormons, or Latter-Day Saints, are Christians, and we believe in one God, which is our Heavenly Father. We do not worship Joseph Smith or anything like that. . .

Sandra: After sending her two pages of quotes from Joseph Smith and other LDS prophets where they clearly taught that Heavenly Father is just one of many deities, she responded as follows:

So I like to call this the law of eternal progression. Like it said in the articles [that I sent her], God—by which I mean our Heavenly Father, not Jesus Christ—was once a mortal, among others, who came to earth and had trials and experiences. We can assume—just assume, though, we have no doctrine about this and it does not affect us personally—we can assume that there was another God who was the Heavenly Father of our Heavenly Father—our Heavenly Grandfather. As Latter-Day Saints, we believe that if we accept Christ’s Atonement and obey God’s commandments, we can be exalted and become literal gods and goddesses. Mind, not everyone will receive this level of exaltation, but it is possible.

What you may be confused about—and it’s okay, a lot of people get hung up on this—is that they think that we are saying that we mortals can become equal to our Heavenly Father, Elohim. This is not true. Just like we can progress throughout eternity, so will God. The scriptures say that He is “unchanging.” That can be misleading, because obviously someone who is alive cannot remain exactly the same. It actually means that He does not change direction. He continues to help His children as they progress through life. Part of His plan for helping us includes giving us more revelation and scriptures.

Sandra: I still don’t understand why you originally said the LDS Church believes in one God, since clearly they believe in countless gods. I understand Mormons don’t pray to other gods, but when a Christian says there is only one God they mean there are no others anywhere ever, not even in another universe. You clearly knew when I first asked about Mormons believing in many gods what I was meaning so why play a word game with me. Why not just send me this last statement first? Instead of the denial?

When Isaiah reports God as saying “Fear ye not, neither be afraid: have not I told thee from that time, and have declared it? ye are even my witnesses. Is there a God beside me? yea, there is no God; I know not any,”[Isa. 44:8] we take that as an absolute statement. If God doesn’t know of any other Gods, then there are no other gods anywhere in any other universe.

She responded: I’m sorry if I created any confusion. We only know of other gods in theory, but whether or not there are other gods equal to our Heavenly Father, they have no bearing on our salvation or relationship with him.

May 2019: I love how you guys break the 10 Commandments specially they’ll shall not bear false witness against a neighbor.

And I love this that you guys do not believe in the Bible and I know you guys don’t read it, didn’t Jesus say those without sin cast the first stone. If you love me keep my Commandments. Did Jesus say love one another and guess what you guys are not doing what Jesus is teaching so you guys are hypocrites in the eyes of the Lord

And also Jesus said by your fruits I won’t know thee. If you don’t know you talking about the fruits of the spirit. Sweetheart you have no idea what you’re talking about you have no clue who Jesus is, you talk to talk but you don’t walk the walk.

May 2019: My husband and I recently left the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, seven months now. I had been a member my whole life and my husband a convert since he was twelve. We were faithful members. I served as a Relief Society President, a Primary President, Seminary Teacher, Stake Young Women’s President and my husband High Counsel, Bishopric, Young Men’s President etc. I am an LDS writer, with three published novels through Covenant Communications. Basically, our entire world was LDS.

I came across a side note to teachers in my seminary manual that bothered me. It said that Joseph Smith translated a portion of the Book of Mormon with a stone he found. I started doing research, which led to more research. A week and a half later I knew the church wasn’t true! I told my husband and he said he had to do his own research. He came to me a week later and had even more disturbing information.

I’m sure you get many emails like this, so I won’t get any more into our story. Basically, at this point I’m almost three fourths of the way through [Mormonism] Shadow and Reality. One of the worst things, or at least the statement that bothers me the most is in the History of the Church. It’s a quote you have on your website by Joseph Smith. (History of The Church, vol. 6, pp. 408-409) “I have more to boast than ever man had . . .” He then proceeds to compare himself to Christ, saying he (Joseph) ran a church better than Jesus! Wow! There is no possible way that Joseph Smith “saw” the Savior of the world and thought himself better. If the Primary Account of the First Vision wasn’t convincing enough, this is a blow. My question: Is that quote taken from Joseph’s journals, writings etc.? I realize that The History of the Church, though claimed to be written completely by Joseph Smith, has been finished by historians. I want to know the origin of that particular quote, since it is so telling of Joseph’s character.

Sandra: I sent her the link to the original source, from the Joseph Smith Papers Project:

May 2019: Yeah, Utah Lighthouse Ministry, your cult is false. You guys are not born again and your paid liar pastor is not saving you. Your spirit-god is false. You don’t believe in the resurrection. You believe in a fake doctrine called the rapture. You guys are a fake church and you guys are not saved. The church of God that was restored by a prophet is still the truth and your little web site, U[T]LM.org is ca-ca, just like your paid liar pastors are ca-ca.

May 2019: It’s really sad that you guys cannot leave the Church of Jesus Christ of latter day Saints alone. If Sandra is not God she acts like she’s God, you guys are brainwashed by her. But after just life you have to answer to God why you are trying to dry [destroy?] his church good luck with that. I really feel sorry for you guys, . . . I hope one day you’ll find Jesus and truly know who he is, because you have no clue who he is, very sad . . . Keep up the good work the more you Bash the LDS church the more you will come forth as eunuchs. Matthew 19:12. (Enjoy the Te[l]estial/Terrestrial Kingdom)

May 2019: Your website is such garbage. We know that Jesus instructed the apostles on the temple. You are profane still, and not saved. You shall all perish and come forth in the 2nd resurrection of the unjust as genderless eunuchs. Matthew 19:12.

May 2019: Your cult is false. You will come forth at the second resurrection as eunuchs. You will not have gender, because you do not choose to go to the Celestial Kingdom. You guys are a joke, a sick joke.

July 2019: To Sandra, all my life we were taught to steer clear of the Tanner’s. Nothing but trouble would come from it. 25+ years later as our eyes are opened to the church and we can see that you were right all along. I pray that this vindication sustains you and that more will have their eyes and hearts opened to the truth. . . . Thanks to you and Jerald for all your years of tireless sacrifice and courage to stand for the truth.

July 2019: Your website is such garbage. We know that Jesus instructed the apostles on the temple. You are profane still, and not saved. You shall all perish and come forth in the 2nd resurrection of the unjust as genderless eunuchs. Matthew 19:12.

July 2019: How pleased I was when I saw a documentary on Oxygen today regarding Mark Hoffman that included comments by you. I was very impressed with your comments and demeanor and am proud that I took the time to read such documents compiled by you and Jerald including MORMONISM—SHADOW OR REALITY?, The Case Against Mormonism, and Major Problems of Mormonism. You have had a significant impact on my thinking concerning religion and Mormonism in particular. Thank you immensely.

August 2019: I just finished Sandra Tanner’s Mormon Stories interview. I think it’s the best one I’ve heard yet! [https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=W64Ntsea6uw] She’s very logical, knowledgeable, and she has a lot of entertaining stories! My takeaway thoughts: 1. I can’t see how anyone who listens to that interview can stay believing. 2. It shows how hard the church tried AND STILL continues to hide information!! To the extent that they tried to bankrupt the Tanners out of spite for exposing FACTS. It’s immoral and just plain wrong. Here are two other short videos of hers that are great:

LDS President Russel M. Nelson started 2020 with a challenge to the church members to “immerse yourself” in the story of Joseph Smith’s First Vision and the restoration of the church in preparation for the next General Conference, which would be the 200th anniversary of Smith’s vision. He promised those who thus prepare themselves that the April 2020 annual conference would be “not only memorable but also unforgettable.”

However, events took an unexpected turn with the outbreak of COVID-19 and the closing of all public meetings. The annual church conference, held in Salt Lake City, Utah, and usually attended by thousands, had to be broadcast from an empty auditorium with pre-recorded music from the Tabernacle Choir.

During the session on Sunday, April 5th, a pre-recorded message from President Nelson was broadcast. He read a new proclamation, “The Restoration of the Fulness of the Gospel of Jesus Christ: A Bicentennial Proclamation to the World.” In it we read:

Two hundred years ago, on a beautiful spring morning in 1820, young Joseph Smith, seeking to know which church to join, went into the woods to pray near his home in upstate New York, USA. He had questions regarding the salvation of his soul and trusted that God would direct him.

In humility, we declare that in answer to his prayer, God the Father and His Son, Jesus Christ, appeared to Joseph and inaugurated the “restitution of all things” as foretold in the Bible. . . . We declare that The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, organized on April 6, 1830, is Christ’s New Testament Church restored.

Joseph Smith’s First Vision was also emphasized as the foundation of the LDS Church by President Gordon B. Hinckley at the October 1998 Conference of the LDS Church:

Our entire case as members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints rests on the validity of this glorious First Vision. . . . Nothing on which we base our doctrine, nothing we teach, nothing we live by is of greater importance than this initial declaration. I submit that if Joseph Smith talked with God the Father and His Beloved Son, then all else of which he spoke is true. This is the hinge on which turns the gate that leads to the path of salvation and eternal life.4

However, Joseph’s conflicting accounts of this event, along with various historical problems, leaves the LDS Church with a very shaky foundation. In an attempt to reconcile the various versions the LDS Church has posted an article with links to the actual documents. This is certainly a welcome step toward full disclosure, but still leaves many questions unanswered.

GOSPEL TOPICS ESSAY – FIRST VISION ACCOUNTS

As part of an ongoing series of essays on the LDS church website that deal with topics on Mormonism that have traditionally been criticized, the church’s current article on the First Vision states, “Joseph shared and documented the First Vision, as it came to be known, on multiple occasions; he wrote or assigned scribes to write four different accounts of the vision.”5

Granted, he related several accounts of the First Vision, but not necessarily of the Father and Son appearing in each of them. As we will show in this article, the story evolved over the years.

Part of the LDS canon is the “Joseph Smith—History,” located at the back of the Pearl of Great Price. This section includes Joseph Smith’s first published account of a vision he claimed to have had in 1820. This account was composed in 1838 and 1839, then printed in the Times and Seasons, a Mormon newspaper, in 1842, and finally canonized in 1880 as part of the Pearl of Great Price.6

In the official account Smith related that when he was fourteen there was a revival in his neighborhood causing “an unusual excitement on the subject of religion. It commenced with the Methodists, but soon became general among all the sects in that region . . . and great multitudes united themselves to the different religious parties.” Smith went on to state that due to this revival his mother, sister and two brothers joined the Presbyterians, while he favored the Methodists. “My mind at times was greatly excited, the cry and tumult were so great and incessant. The Presbyterians, while he favored the Methodists. “My

Consequently, in the Spring of 1820 he went into the woods to seek God’s direction on which church to join. When he knelt to pray, “I was seized upon by some power which entirely overcame me,” his tongue was bound, he was overcome by “thick darkness” and feared for his life. Then “a pillar of light” appeared over his head, expelling the darkness, and two beings, “whose brightness and glory defy all description,” appeared above his head. “One of them spake unto me, calling me by name and said, pointing to the other—This is My Beloved Son, Hear Him!” After composing himself, Smith asked the personages which of all the sects was right (for at this time it had never entered into my heart that all were wrong)—and which I should join. I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong and the Personage who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt; that they draw near to me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me, they teach for doctrines the commandments of men, having a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof.7

When young Smith returned home he said to his mother, “I have learned for myself that Presbyterianism is not true.” A few days later he related his experience to the local Methodist minister, who berated him for making such a claim. Smith claimed that he shared his experience with others, which “excited a great deal of prejudice against me among professors of religion, and was the cause of great persecution, which continued to increase; . . . all united to persecute me . . . However, it was nevertheless a fact that I had beheld a vision . . .”8

Yet Smith’s story of “great persecution” is absent from contemporary sources. LDS scholar Steven C. Harper conceded: “There is no evidence in the historical record that Joseph Smith told anyone but the minister of his vision for at least a decade.”9

CHALLENGING THE VISION

Fawn Brodie, writing in 1945, pointed out that there were no contemporary accounts of Smith’s 1820 vision until Orson Pratt published his pamphlet “An Interesting Account of Several Remarkable Visions” in 1840.10 LDS historian James B. Allen frankly admitted that the story of the First Vision “was not given general circulation in the 1830’s.” Dr. Allen also admitted that “none of the available contemporary writings about

8 Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith–History, 1:20
Joseph Smith in the 1830’s, none of the publications of the Church in that decade, . . . mentions the story of the first vision. . . .” Dr. Allen went on to state that in the 1830’s “the general membership of the Church knew little, if anything, about it.”\textsuperscript{11} While there were a few mentions of the First Vision in literature during Brigham Young’s lifetime, they seem to have had little impact on how the Mormons presented their message. Other than one article by Orson Pratt in 1849, the leaders did not appeal to this 1820 experience to establish the LDS doctrine of God and Jesus being totally separate deities with physical bodies until after the canonization of the \textit{Pearl of Great Price} in 1880, which contained Smith’s First Vision.

Research regarding Smith’s visions entered a new era in 1965 when Paul Cheesman finished his BYU Master’s thesis, \textit{An Analysis of the Accounts Relating Joseph Smith’s Early Visions}, which contained Joseph Smith’s long suppressed handwritten 1832 account of the First Vision, wherein only Christ appears.

We then published the 1832 account in our booklet, \textit{Joseph Smith’s Strange Account of the First Vision}. Another important challenge to the First Vision story came in 1967 when Rev. Wesley P. Walters published his booklet \textit{New Light on Mormon Origins From the Palmyra, N.Y. Revival} in which he challenged Smith’s story regarding a revival in Smith’s neighborhood in 1820.\textsuperscript{12} Beginning in the 1960’s the LDS church has occasionally published articles trying to correlate the various First Vision accounts, however, the average Mormon seems to have remained uninformed on the issue.

While the Gospel Topics article “First Vision Accounts”\textsuperscript{13} does reference Joseph Smith’s various narratives of the event, it glosses over the contradictions. The article states, “Joseph shared and documented the First Vision, as it came to be known, on multiple occasions.” However, this might leave the reader with the impression that it was an oft told story. Actually, while Joseph Smith had mentioned the vision on a few occasions, the first published account was not until 1840, twenty years after the event, by LDS Apostle Orson Pratt, in a pamphlet published in Scotland.\textsuperscript{14} The next published account was one written by Joseph Smith and printed in the LDS newspaper \textit{Times and Seasons} in 1842. This account would later be canonized in the \textit{Pearl of Great Price}. With only two published accounts by 1842, most Mormons would not have been familiar with the story.

\textbf{Contradictions}

A few basic contradictions among the accounts include the following: According to the 1832 account Smith would have been 15, not 14, and had already concluded that all churches were wrong before entering the grove to pray, but the official account claims it was the heavenly visitors who first inform him of that. Also it does not mention a demonic presence at the start of the experience, yet later accounts do. In the 1832 account only Jesus was said to have appeared, but in later versions it was either angels or the Father and Son. The early accounts mention Smith was seeking forgiveness for his sins, whereas later accounts stress his desire to know which Christian denomination was accepted by God. According to various accounts Smith had his First Vision in 1820, 1821, or 1823.

Additionally, in the official account Smith claimed that the neighborhood revival occurred in 1820, while historical records indicate a revival date between 1824-1825.

Most of the accounts of the First Vision prior to 1875 described the appearance of either one or more angels, but rarely God and Jesus. And even then, there was no emphasis on the Father as a physical being.\textsuperscript{15} President Gordon B. Hinckley declared that the First Vision was the greatest revelation of God that man has ever experienced:

\begin{quote}
I hope with all my heart that each member of this Church will read the story of the Prophet Joseph Smith, read the story of the \textit{First Vision} . . . cultivate within your hearts a testimony of the truth of that marvelous experience, when the Father and the Son appeared to the boy Joseph. \textit{There’s no other event in all recorded history that compares with it, not even at the}
\end{quote}

\textsuperscript{12} This research was later expanded in \textit{Inventing Mormonism: Tradition and the Historical Record}, by H. Michael Marquardt and Wesley P. Walters, (Salt Lake City: Smith Research Associates, 1994), chapter two. H. Michael Marquardt has now expanded this research under the title \textit{The Rise of Mormonism: 1816-1844}. The original booklet has been renamed \textit{The Palmyra Revival & Mormon Origins}.

baptism of the Savior... He had an understanding of the Father and the Son that no other man had really ever experienced.\textsuperscript{16}

However, if this vision really was so fundamental to Joseph Smith’s understanding of the nature and identity of God as a physical being one wonders why he did not use it as the basis for promoting such a revolutionary theology, a theology that flew in the face of the Bible and centuries of established Christian doctrine.\textsuperscript{17}

Indeed, when Smith gave his clearest teaching on the nature of God in his famous 1844 sermon (known as the King Follett Discourse), in which he refuted the orthodox belief of God as a spirit, and emphatically taught that God has a physical body of flesh and bone, he did not appeal to his First Vision as the source of this knowledge.\textsuperscript{18}

\textbf{FROM MAGIC, TO AN ANGEL, TO GOD AND JESUS}

Below is a timeline analyzing Smith’s evolving story, the LDS concept of God and the First Vision accounts.

\textbf{1820} — While Smith gave this date to his First Vision story years after the event, there is no contemporary documentation that Joseph Smith told anyone of a vision that year. Also, there is no record of a revival involving the Methodists, Baptists and Presbyterians, as described in Smith’s 1842 account published in the \textit{Pearl of Great Price}. According to the records of those churches, each of them showed either losses or only modest gains of a handful of people, not the massive numbers expected from a revival.\textsuperscript{19}

\textbf{1822} — Joseph Smith found a dark magical stone while digging in a creek and a white stone while digging a well. Both stones were later used in money-digging and translating the Book of Mormon.\textsuperscript{20}

\textbf{1823} — According to the \textit{Pearl of Great Price}, the angel Moroni appeared in Joseph’s bedroom on September 22, 1823, to tell him of an ancient record engraved on metal plates and buried in a nearby hill, recounting God’s dealings with the forefathers of the Native Americans. He was not yet allowed to retrieve the plates, but was to meet the angel each year on September 22nd until God saw fit to deliver the plates into Smith’s hands for translation. There are no contemporary accounts of Smith telling people of this vision. It would be several years before anyone writes about this event.

Two months after the angel first appeared Joseph’s brother Alvin died a tragic death. The date of Alvin’s death becomes important in establishing the date of the revival that Smith said led to his prayer in the woods close to his home.

\textbf{1824-25} — A large revival took place in the Palmyra area involving the Methodists, Presbyterians and Baptists. This revival, rather than one Smith claimed to have occurred in 1820, seems to fit the description given by Smith in his 1842 account.\textsuperscript{21} One of the participants at the revival was Mr. Lane of the Methodist Church, who came to the area in 1824 but was not there in 1820.\textsuperscript{22} Records show that approximately 300 people joined the three churches as a result of the revival. Joseph’s mother, two brothers and sister joined the Presbyterians at this time.\textsuperscript{23} Joseph’s brother William later wrote that the large revival happened after Alvin’s death. Smith’s father would not attend the revival because one of the ministers had earlier spoken at Alvin’s funeral and had inferred that Alvin was in hell since he had never been baptized.\textsuperscript{24}

This would make Smith’s chronology hopelessly confused. If the First Vision happened after Alvin’s death (in 1823) what year did the angel first appear and tell Joseph about the plates?

Writing in 1851, Orsamus Turner, a former resident of Palmyra, New York, recollected that Joseph had caught “a spark of Methodism in the camp meeting, away down in the woods, on the Vienna road, he was a very passable exhorter in evening meetings.”\textsuperscript{25} An exhorter would have addressed the people at the meeting after the preacher had finished his message, giving further encouragement to follow the minister’s instruction.

Supposedly Smith would have met the angel again in September of 1825, but was still not able to recover the plates. Shortly after this, Joseph and his father left Manchester, New York, and traveled across the state to Harmony, Pennsylvania, to work for a farmer named Josiah Stowell, as he searched for a lost silver mine.\textsuperscript{26} mentions this event in his history but brushes it aside by describing his involvement as merely being a laborer, hired to help dig for the treasure. However, Martin Harris, one of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon, stated that Smith was hired due to his special powers:

Joseph had had this stone for some time. There was a company there in that neighborhood, who were digging for money supposed to have been hidden by the ancients. Of this company was old Mr. Stowel—I think his name was Josiah—also old Mr. Beman, also Samuel Lawrence, George Proper, Joseph Smith, jr., and his father, and his brother Hiram [Hiram] Smith. They dug for money in Palmyra, Manchester, also in Pennsylvania, and other places. When Joseph found this stone, there was a company digging in Harmony, Pa., and they took Joseph to look in the stone for them, and he did so for a while, and then he told them the enchantment was so strong that he could not see, and they gave it up. There he became acquainted with his future wife, the daughter of old Mr. Isaac Hale, where he boarded. He afterwards returned to Pennsylvania again, and married his wife, taking her off to old Mr. Stowel’s, because her people would not consent to the marriage. She was of age, Joseph was not.

Lucy Smith, Joseph Smith’s mother, also wrote that Stowell sought out Joseph specifically “on account of having heard that he possessed certain keys, by which he could discern things invisible to the natural eye.”

Thus we see that Stowell was actually hiring Smith for his magical powers. In anticipation of finding a treasure, the Smiths signed an agreement with several other men earlier been involved in money-digging, he had become disillusioned with the project. After Smith married his daughter, Mr. Hale stated that Joseph promised him “that he had given up what he called ‘glass looking’ and that he expected to work hard for a living.” It was only after Joseph and Emma moved to Hale’s property that he “was informed they had brought a wonderful book of Plates down with them.”

1826 — In March Joseph Smith, the “glass looker,” was arrested in Bainbridge, New York, and charged with being “a disorderly person and an impostor.”

I [Joseph Lewis], with Joshua McKune, a local preacher at that time, I think in June, 1828, heard on Saturday, that Joe Smith had joined the church on Wednesday afternoon, (as it was customary in those days to have circuit preaching at my father’s house on week-day). We thought it was a disgrace to the church to have a practicing necromancer, a dealer in enchantments and bleeding ghosts, in it. So on Sunday we went to father’s, the place of meeting that day, and got there in season to see Smith and talked with him some time in father’s shop before the meeting. Told him that his occupation, habits, and moral character were at variance with the discipline, that his name would be a disgrace to the church, that there should have been recantation, confession and at least promised reformation—that he could that day publicly ask that his name be stricken from the class book, or stand an investigation. He chose the former, and did that very day make the request that his name be taken off the class book.37

If God had instructed Smith in 1820 not to join any church, why was he seeking to join the Methodist Church in 1828?38

Mr. Lewis also asserted that Joseph Smith had told him that by a dream he was informed that at such a place in a certain hill, in an iron box, were some gold plates with curious engravings, which he must get and translate, and write a book. . . . In all this narrative, there was not one word about “visions of God,” or of angels, or heavenly revelations.39

In September Joseph was finally able to take the ancient plates home and began his translation. However, rather than using the “interpreters” (Mosiah 8:13; Ether 4:5) preserved with the plates, he used his magic stone to conjure up the translation. Supposedly God had the “interpreters” preserved because the Nephite language would be totally unknown to the future seer (Joseph Smith). Yet a rock Smith inadvertently found on a neighbor’s farm apparently worked just as well.40 Using the same process that he did when scrying for lost treasures, Smith placed the stone in his hat, where it shone in the dark and purportedly gave him the translation of the plates, word-for-word, which he then dictated to a scribe.

In 2016 LDS Apostle Dieter F. Uchtdorf compared Joseph’s use of a seer stone to that of a text message on a mobile phone:

People have asked me, “Do you really believe that Joseph Smith translated with seer stones? How would something like this be possible?” And I answer, “Yes! That is exactly what I believe.” This was done as Joseph said: by the gift and power of God. In reality, most of us use a kind of “seer stone” every day. My mobile phone is like a “seer stone.”42

Thus the “translation” was not accomplished through any regular process used by scholars, but by mystical means. Smith simply read the divinely given message off the stone.

1829 — In need of money to publish the Book of Mormon, Joseph consulted his seer stone about selling the copyright for the Book of Mormon in Canada. God the Father revealed through Smith’s stone that several of his followers were to make the journey, and would be successful. However, they failed to find anyone to buy the copyright. David Whitmer wrote about the debacle:

Joseph looked into the hat in which he placed the stone, and received a revelation that some of the brethren should go to Toronto, Canada, and that they would sell the copyright of the Book of Mormon. Hiram Page and Oliver Cowdery went to Toronto on this mission, but they failed entirely to sell the copyright, returning without any money. Joseph was at my father’s house when they returned. . . .

Well, we were all in great trouble; and we asked Joseph how it was that he had received a revelation from the Lord for some brethren to go to Toronto and sell the copyright, and the brethren had utterly failed in their undertaking. Joseph did not know how it was, so he enquired of the Lord about it, and behold the following revelation came through the stone: “Some revelations are of God: some revelations are of men: and some revelations are of the devil.” So we see that the revelation to go to Toronto and sell the copyright was not of God, but was of the devil or of the heart of man.43 a local farmer and convert to the LDS Church. Smith’s new scripture does not contain any teaching that God the Father has a physical body, only the Son.44 It actually teaches that God is a spirit. In Alma 18:28 Ammon instructs the king that the “Great Spirit” is “God.” Later in the story a man named Aaron informs another king of the “Great Spirit” who is “God” (Alma 22:8-11).

1830 — The Book of Mormon was published in March of 1830, having been financed by Martin Harris.

Evidence that the early Mormon teachings on the godhead were fairly typical of the day can be seen in the testimony of the three witnesses, at the front of the Book of Mormon: “And the honor be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, which is one God.”

This same concept is repeated in the text of the Book of Mormon:

2 Nephi 31:21—And now, behold, this is the doctrine of Christ, and the only and true doctrine of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, which is one God, without end.

Mormon 7:7 speaks of those in heaven singing endless praise “unto the Father, and unto the Son, and unto the Holy Ghost, which are one God.”

In 3 Nephi 11:27 the resurrected Jesus instructs the Nephites “verily I say unto you, that the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost are one; and I am in the Father, and the Father in me, and the Father and I are one.”

Contrary to current LDS teachings on the Godhead, the Father and Son are described as the same person. The title page of the Book of Mormon reads: “to the convincing of the Jew and Gentile that JESUS IS the CHRIST, the ETERNAL GOD, manifesting himself unto all nations.”

In Ether 3:14 we read: “Behold, I am Jesus Christ. I am the Father and the Son.”

In Mosiah 15:1-3 we read that

God himself shall come down among the children of men, and shall redeem his people. And because he dwelleth in flesh he shall be called the Son of God, and having subjected the flesh to the will of the Father, being the Father and the Son — The Father, because he was conceived by the power of God; and the Son, because of the flesh; thus becoming the Father and Son. And they are one God, yea, the very Eternal Father of heaven and of earth.

Thus we see that the doctrine of God in the Book of Mormon contradicts Joseph Smith’s teaching that the Father has a body of flesh and bone and is totally separate from the Son.

Shortly after the publication of the Book of Mormon in 1830, Smith formed the Church of Christ. In 1834 the name was changed to the Church of the Latter Day Saints and then renamed The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in 1838.

Towards the end of 1830 Joseph Smith began working on his Inspired Revision of the Bible and changed verses to make the Father and Son one, which would put it more in line with the Book of Mormon. For instance, Luke 10:22 of the King James Version states “no man knoweth who the Son is, but the Father; and who the Father is, but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him.” However, Smith changed this to read:

...no man knoweth that the Son is the Father, and the Father is the Son, but him to whom the Son will reveal it. (Luke 10:23)

This hardly seems like a change one would make if ten years earlier the Father and Son had appeared to Smith as two separate individuals.

1831 — Lucy Smith, Joseph’s mother, wrote to her brother Solomon Mack, Jr., about the coming forth of the Book of Mormon and the establishing of the true church, but made no mention of God appearing to her son in 1820. Instead, she began Joseph’s story with the angel telling of the hidden record:

He [God] has now commenced this work, he hath sent forth a revelation in these last days, & this revelation is called the book of Mormon, . . . Perhaps you will enquire how this revelation came forth. it has been hid up in the earth four=teen hundred years, & was placed there by Moro[ni] one of the Nephites; it was engraven upon plates which have the appearance of gold . . . Joseph after repenting of his sins and humbling himself before God was visited by an holy Angel whose countenance was as lightning and whose garments were white above all whiteness and gave unto him commandments which inspired him from on high. and gave unto him the means of which was before prepared that he should translate his book . . .46

That same year Alexander Campbell, the famous preacher of the Restoration Movement, printed a criticism of Joseph Smith and his Book of Mormon, but made no mention of Smith’s claim of an 1820 vision or objecting to Smith’s view of God.47

1832 — Smith started working on the first draft of his history in 1832. In his handwritten account he related that he was fifteen (in his “sixteenth year”) when he had his First Vision and that he had already concluded that all the churches were wrong:

... which led me to searching the scriptures ... thus from the age of twelve years to fifteen I pondered many things in my heart ... my mind become exceedingly distressed for I become convicted of my sins and by searching the scriptures I found that mankind did not come unto the Lord but that they had apostatised from the true and living faith and there was no society or denomination that built upon the gospel of Jesus Christ as recorded in the new testament ...

Yet this contradicts his 1842 account, where he said that prior to his vision “it had never entered into my heart that all were wrong.”

Also absent from the 1832 account is any admonition to not join any existing church. He then relates the appearance of Christ, but nothing was said about God the Father:

... while in the attitude of calling upon the Lord in the 16th year of my age a pillar of fire light above the brightness of the sun at noon day come down from above and rested upon me and I was filled with the spirit of god and the Lord opened the heavens upon me and I saw the Lord and he spake unto me saying Joseph thy sins are forgiven thee. go thy way; walk in my statutes and keep my commandments behold I am the Lord of glory I was crucified for the world that all those who believe on my name may have Eternal life ...

If this vision happened when Smith was 15 it would place the vision in the spring of 1821, not a year earlier, since he wouldn’t have turned 15 until December of 1820. The 1832 account is silent about the presence of a demonic force just prior to the vision. The sinister element doesn’t enter the story until 1835 and is expanded in the 1842 account:

I kneeled down and began to offer up the desires of my heart to God. I had scarcely done so, when immediately I was seized upon by some power which entirely overcame me, and had such an astonishing influence over me as to bind my tongue so that I could not speak. Thick darkness gathered around me, and it seemed to me for a time as if I were doomed to sudden destruction.

But, exerting all my powers to call upon God to deliver me out of the power of this enemy which had seized upon me, and at the very moment when I was ready to sink into despair and abandon myself to destruction ... I saw a pillar of light exactly over my head, above the brightness of the sun, which descended gradually until it fell upon me. It no sooner appeared than I found myself delivered from the enemy which held me bound.

Another problem with his 1842 version, is that he claimed he experienced great persecution for telling people of his First Vision:

I soon found, however, that my telling the story had excited a great deal of prejudice against me among professors of religion, and was the cause of great persecution, ... men of high standing would take notice sufficient to excite the public mind against me, and create a bitter persecution; and this was common among all the sects—all united to persecute me.

Yet there is no evidence that anyone had heard of this experience until after he started his church in 1830. Since non-Mormons had related similar heavenly visits it is doubtful that Smith’s vision described in his 1832 account would have caused much of a stir. Even his 1842 account of the Father and the Son is not that different from other visionaries of the day.

For example, in 1815 Norris Stearns published an account his own conversion to Christianity which included an appearance of the Father and the Son:

I saw two spirits, which I knew at the first sight. But if I had the tongue of an angel I could not describe their glory, for they brought the joys of heaven with them. One was God, my Maker, almost in bodily shape like a man. His face was, as it were a flame of fire. ... Below him stood Jesus Christ my Redeemer, in perfect shape like a man—His face was not ablaze, but had the countenance of fire, being bright and shining. His Father’s will appeared to be his! All was condescension, peace, and love.

Also, in 1816 a minister by the name of Elias Smith (no relation to Joseph Smith) recounted his conversion to Christianity. Notice how similar it is to Joseph Smith’s first account:

... I went into the woods ... a light appeared from heaven. ... My mind seemed to rise in that light to the throne of God and the Lamb. ... The Lamb once slain appeared to my understanding, and while viewing him, I felt such love to him as I never felt to any thing earthly. . . . It is not possible for me to tell how long I remained in that situation . . . .

Alexander Campbell, well-known preacher, wrote the following on March 1, 1824, concerning a “revival in the state of New York” where many were claiming miraculous visions:

Enthusiasm flourishes. . . . This man was regenerated when asleep, by a vision of the night. That man heard a voice in the woods, saying, “Thy sins be forgiven thee.” A third saw his Savior descending to the tops of the trees at noon day.

Asa Wild claimed to have a revelation which is very similar to the story Joseph Smith later published. It was printed in the Wayne Sentinel (the paper to which Joseph Smith’s family apparently subscribed) on October 22, 1823:

It seemed as if my mind . . . was struck motionless, as well as into nothing, before the awful and glorious majesty of the Great Jehovah. He then spake . . . He also told me, that every denomination of professing Christians had become extremely corrupt.

Joseph Smith’s 1832 revelation, Doctrine and Covenants 84:20-22, stated that “without the ordinances thereof, and the authority of the priesthood” no one can “see the face of God.” According to this revelation Smith could not have seen God the Father in 1820 since he made no claim to priesthood at that time.

1833 — In an 1833 interview, Willard Chase, the man who hired the Smiths to dig a well in 1822, said he had known the Smiths since 1820. “At that time, they were engaged in the money digging business, which they followed until the latter part of season of 1827.” Mr. Chase went on to state that in 1827 Joseph Smith, Sen. told him about the angel appearing to young Joseph several years earlier to tell him of the plates. Yet Chase makes no mention of Smith claiming a vision of God and Jesus prior to the angel.

Joseph Smith’s revelations were printed in A Book of Commandments for the Government of the Church of Christ. However, there is no material dealing with Smith’s claim of an 1820 vision. This volume teaches a view of God and Christ that would have been acceptable in the Christian community. For example, chapter 24:18: “believe in the gifts and callings of God, by the Holy Ghost, which beareth record of the Father and of the Son, which Father and Son and Holy Ghost, is one God, infinite and eternal, without end.”

1834 — E. D. Howe’s exposé, Mormonism Unvailed, was published toward the end of 1834, which contained critical statements by various neighbors and acquaintances of the Smiths, yet it is silent about Joseph claiming a vision in 1820. Howe did not attack Smith on a claim of seeing God and Jesus, but on Smith’s money-digging and his new scripture, the Book of Mormon.

Also that year, Peter Bauder wrote of his visit with Joseph Smith at the Whitmer’s home in New York in 1830. Evidently Mr. Bauder asked Smith to recount his conversion experience. Instead, Smith started his story with the angel announcing the Book of Mormon, not with an account of an earlier vision of God and Jesus:

[I] had the privilege of conversing with him [Joseph Smith] alone, several hours, and of investigating his writings, . . . He could give me no Christian experience, but told me that an angel told him he must go to a certain place in the town of Manchester, Ontario County, where was a secret treasure concealed, which he must reveal to the human family.

That same year Oliver Cowdery, one of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon, with the help of Joseph Smith, published the first history of Mormonism in the LDS paper Messenger and Advocate, starting in 1834 and continuing into 1835.

However, Cowdery did not mention any vision in 1820, but began Smith’s story with an account of a revival in the Palmyra area when Smith was in his 15th year (age 14). But further on Cowdery corrected Smith’s age, stating Smith would have been in his 17th year (16) not his 15th year (14) and placed both the revival and the angel vision in 1823.

According to Cowdery’s account, following the 1823 religious excitement Smith prayed to know “if a Supreme being did exist, to have an assurance that he was accepted of him.” Smith’s prayer was answered on September 21, 1823, when a “messenger” appeared to him in his bedroom “to deliver a special message, and to witness to him that his sins were forgiven, and that his prayers were heard.”

If Smith had already seen God and Jesus in 1820 why would he later pray in 1823 to know if God existed? And why wouldn’t Oliver Cowdery start with Smith’s earlier 1820 vision if Smith often shared the story?

It should also be remembered that the records during this period of Mormonism show a fairly standard Trinitarian view of the godhead. Their baptismal prayer ended with the phrase “in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and the Holy Ghost.” Their sacrament prayer starts, “O God the Eternal Father, we ask thee in the name of thy Son Jesus Christ, to bless and sanctify this wine to the souls of all those who drink of it.”

1835 — On August 17 a larger compilation of Smith’s revelations was presented to the church, voted on and published under the title Doctrine and Covenants of the Church of the Latter Day Saints. The preface states “We deem it to be unnecessary to entertain you with a lengthy preface to the following volume, but merely to say, that it contains in short, the leading items of the religion which we have professed to believe.” Again, there is no mention of an 1820 vision or God having a body of flesh and bone. In fact, it taught just the opposite.

The first part of the 1835 Doctrine and Covenants was the “Lectures on Faith,” which were a series of seven lectures delivered to the elders of the LDS Church in Kirtland, Ohio, to establish them in correct doctrine. Yet these lessons fail to present the view of God currently held by the LDS Church. These lectures were printed in every edition of the Doctrine and Covenants until 1921.

Lecture five made the distinction that the Father is “a personage of spirit” while the Son is “a personage of tabernacle.” This would contradict the current LDS teaching that God the Father has a physical “tabernacle” as well as Jesus. The lecture goes on to explain that there are two personages in the godhead, with the Holy Ghost being the mind of the two.

In light of these lessons it is obvious that Joseph Smith was not teaching people that he saw God the Father in 1820 as a distinct being of flesh and bone.

According to Joseph Smith’s journal, on November 9, 1835, he was visited by “Joshua the Jewish minister,” later identified as Robert Matthias, to whom Smith recounted some of his early life:

being wrought up in my mind, respecting the subject of religion and looking at the different systems taught the children of men . . . I retired to the silent grove and bowed down before the Lord, . . . I made a fruitless attempt to pray, my tongue seemed to be swolen in my mouth, so that I could not utter, I heard a noise behind me like some person walking towards me, I strove again to pray, but could not, the noise of walking seemed to draw nearer, I sprang up on my feet, . . . I kneveled again my mouth was opened . . . and I called on the Lord in mighty prayer . . . a personage appeared in the midst of the pillar of flame which was spread all around, and yet nothing consumed, another personage soon appeared like unto the first, he said unto me thy sins are forgiven thee, he testified unto me that Jesus Christ is the Son of God; <and I saw many angels in this vision> I was about 14 years old when I received this first communication; When I was about 17 years old I saw another vision of angels in the night . . .

If the being had actually been Jesus one would not expect him to give testimony of himself. And since this was followed by the claim of seeing “many angels” it appears that Smith was not identifying the being as Jesus, but as an angel.

Several days later, on November 14, 1835, Smith gave another account of his early life to Erastus Holmes:

I commenced and gave him a brief relation of my experience while in my juvenile years, say from 6 years old up to the time I received the first visitation of Angels which was when I was about 14 years old and also the visitations that I received afterward, concerning the book of Mormon, . . .

This November 14th account of angels reinforces the assessment of the November 9th account as being angels as well, not God and Christ.

1837 — At this point Joseph Smith seems to be making a greater distinction between the Father and Son. Thus in the second edition of the Book of Mormon the phrase “the son of” was added to several verses to distinguish between the Father and Son. One of the most significant changes was made in 1 Nephi 13:40 where it originally stated that the purpose of the Nephite record was to make known that “the Lamb of God is the Eternal Father and the Savior” (Book of Mormon, 1830 edition, page 32). But in 1837 it was changed to read “the Lamb of God is the Son of the Eternal Father, and the Savior” (Book of Mormon, 1 Nephi 13:40).

66 Jessee, Personal Writings, pp. 112-113.
Another important change was made in 1 Nephi 11:18. In the 1830 edition, page 25, it read “Behold, the virgin which thou seest, is the mother of God, after the manner of the flesh.” In modern editions it has been changed to read, “Behold, the virgin whom thou seest is the mother of the Son of God, after the manner of the flesh.”

1838 — Joseph Smith commenced dictating a new account of his history, which would be printed in the 1842 LDS newspaper, the Times and Seasons, and would later become the official account printed in the Pearl of Great Price.

In this account we see the purpose of the vision shift from seeking forgiveness of sins to determining which church to join. Smith mentions “an unusual excitement on the subject of religion” which soon spread to “all the sects in that region of country.” After hearing the competing arguments Joseph concluded that since each group understood the Bible differently his only recourse was to seek a direct answer from God. When the two heavenly beings appeared Smith inquired “which of all the sects was right, that I might know which to join.” However, this account mentions nothing about seeking a forgiveness of sins, as stated in earlier versions.

While this First Vision account is similar to the one given in 1835 to Robert Matthias, Smith now claims that the first personage introduced the second personage with the words “This is My Beloved Son, Hear Him!” This seems to mark the point at which Smith switched from claiming the visit of angels to an appearance of the Father and Son. But even in this account he is not making the point that they have physical bodies.

1840 — LDS apostle Orson Pratt published A[n] Interesting Account of Several Remarkable Visions in Scotland. He related that when Smith was “about fourteen or fifteen years old” he was praying in the woods when “immediately his mind was caught away, from the natural objects with which he was surrounded; and he was enwrapped in a heavenly vision, and saw two glorious personages who exactly resembled each other.”

Smith was then given the assurance that his sins were forgiven and instructed to not join any of the existing churches.

It is very similar to Smith’s 1842 account. While the vision implies that the heavenly messengers were the Father and Son, they were not specifically named. Also, seeing them in a “vision” does not demand a literal understanding that they were two physical beings standing before him.

The average Christian of the day would no doubt view this event as a mystical experience, much like Steven in Acts 7:56 exclaiming “I see heaven open and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God.”

1841 — When Joseph’s younger brother, William, was interviewed about the beginnings of Mormonism by James Murdock in 1841, he started with the angel appearing in 1823. Murdock gave this summary:

In the year 1816 or 1817, the whole [Smith] family removed to the State of New York. . . . They were in rather low circumstances, and followed farming. About the year 1823, there was a revival of religion in that region, and Joseph was one of several hopeful converts. . . . Joseph hesitated between the different denominations. While his mind was perplexed with this subject, he prayed for divine direction; and afterwards was awaked one night by an extraordinary vision. The glory of the Lord filled the chamber with a dazzling light, and a glorious angel appeared to him, conversed with him, and told him that he was a chosen vessel unto the Lord to make known true religion.

1842 — In the March 1, 1842, issue of the Times and Seasons Joseph Smith printed his letter to John Wentworth, editor of the Chicago Democrat, in which he recounted his vision of “two glorious personages.”

A similar letter (with some revisions) was published by Daniel Rupp in 1844 in a book called An Original History of the Religious Denominations at Present Existing in the United States.

In the next issue of the Times and Seasons Joseph Smith began publishing his official account of his early life, which would eventually be canonized in LDS scriptures.

According to this account, when he was in his 15th year (age 14) his mother, sister, and two brothers joined the Presbyterian Church due to a revival in the neighborhood. The revival started with the Methodists and soon spread to the Presbyterians and Baptists.

Joseph went into the grove to ask God which church to join “for at this time it had never entered my heart that all were wrong.” Two beings appeared. One spoke, pointed to the other being and said “This is my beloved Son, hear him.”

He was told to join none of the churches “for they were all wrong . . . all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; . . .”

This is also the first that we read of him being persecuted for telling people of his First Vision. Joseph wrote “I soon found however that my telling the story had excited a great deal of prejudice against me among professors of religion and was the cause of great persecution which continued to increase.” Yet the early critics of Joseph Smith, such as E. D. Howe and Alexander Campbell, fail to mention his claim of an 1820 vision.

While this account mentions the appearance of God and Jesus, there is no evidence that people understood this in a literal sense. Without any instruction to the contrary, people would not have understood this account to mean that God had a physical body. In light of the previous twelve years of Smith teaching God is a spirit, they would have presumably understood this account as a vision, not an actual physical appearance of God and Jesus.

Interestingly, the same issue of the paper where Smith started his history contained part of the Book of Abraham, where Smith introduced a plurality of gods into the Genesis creation account:

> And then the Lord said, let us go down; and they went down at the beginning, and they organized and formed, (that is, the Gods,) the heavens and the earth. . . . And they said, the Gods, let there be light, and there was light.73

Six months later, in the September 15, 1842, issue of the Times and Seasons, Joseph Smith wrote about his view of the godhead:

> We believe in three Gods. . . . no odds whether there be two, three, or “Gods many.” The Father, and the Son are persons of Tabernacle; and the Holy Ghost a spirit.74

This view is in conflict with the earlier 1835 teaching in the Lectures on Faith where the Father is described as a personage of spirit, while the Son is a personage of tabernacle. From this point on Smith paints a much clearer picture of the Father being a totally separate god from Jesus.

1843 — On April 2nd Smith instructed the Mormons in Ramus, Illinois: “The Father has a body of flesh and bones as tangible as man’s; the Son also; but the Holy Ghost has not a body of flesh and bones, but is a personage of Spirit” [D&C sec. 130:22].

If Joseph Smith had been teaching from the founding of the LDS Church that God had a physical body, why was there a need for this revelation?

An example of how Mormons understood the vision is seen in Levi Richards’ journal for June 11, 1843. Richards recorded hearing Smith tell of his First Vision, but gives no year for the vision and says nothing about God and Christ appearing:

> Pres. J. Smith bore testimony to the same—saying that when he was a youth he began to think about these things but could not find out which of all the sects were right— he went into the grove & enquired of the Lord which of all the sects were right— re received for answer that none of them were right, that they were all wrong, & that the Everlasting covenant[nt] was broken= he said he understo ood the fulness of the Gospel from beginning to end— & could Teach it & also the order of the priesthood in all its ramifications= Earth & hell had opposed him & tryed to destroy him— but they had not done it= & they <never would>75

1844 — Joseph Smith’s most famous sermon on the nature of God, often referred to as the King Follett Discourse, was delivered at the April 7th LDS General Conference:

> God himself was once as we are now, and is an exalted man, and sits enthroned in yonder heavens! That is the great secret. If the veil were rent today, and the great God who holds this world in its orbit, and who upholds all worlds and all things by His power, was to make himself visible,—I say, if you were to see him today, you would see him like a man in form— like yourselves in all the person, image, and very form as a man; . . . it is necessary we should understand the character and being of God and how He came to be so; for I am going to tell you how God came to be God. We have imagined and supposed that God was God from all eternity. I will refute that idea, and take away the veil, so that you may see. . . . He was once a man like us; yea, that God himself, the Father of us all, dwelt on an earth, the same as Jesus Christ Himself did; . . .76

This would have been a logical place to make reference to his own experience of seeing the Father and Son as two separate Gods in 1820, but Smith makes no appeal to his First Vision.

On May 24th, Alexander Neibaur, a German convert to Mormonism, recorded in his journal the following account given by Joseph Smith:

> Br Joseph tol us the first call he had . . . went into the Wood to pray kneelt down his tongue was

While this account does not give a date for the vision, it does make it clear that the two personages were God and Christ. However, in this account it is the Father who delivers the message, not Jesus.

Two months later, on June 7, the one and only issue of the Nauvoo Expositor was printed by former leaders in the LDS movement. After pleading privately with Smith to give up plural marriage, they now went public with their charges of Smith being a fallen prophet.
Besides their objections to plural marriage and political issues, they charged Smith with teaching false doctrine:

Among the many items of false doctrine that are taught the Church, is the doctrine of many Gods, one of the most direful in its effects that has characterized the world for many centuries. We know not what to call it other than blasphemy, for it is most unquestionably, speaking of God in an impious and irreverent manner.

It is contended that there are innumerable gods as much above the God that presides over this universe, as he is above us; . . . and now, O Lord! shall we set still and be silent, while thy name is thus blasphemed, and thine Honor, power and glory, brought into disrepute?
See Isaiah c 43, v 10; 44, 6-8; 45, 5, 6, 21, 22; . . .

Obviously throughout the history of the movement
Smith had not been teaching that there was a plurality of gods. Otherwise, his top leaders would have had no reason to raise the issue in the Nauvoo Expositor in 1844.

In response to the Nauvoo Expositor, on June 16th,
Smith delivered another sermon on the nature of God:

Now, you know that of late some malicious and corrupt men have sprung up and apostatized from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and they declare that the Prophet believes in a plurality of Gods, and, lo and behold! we have discovered a very great secret, they cry—"The Prophet says there are many Gods, and this proves that he has fallen." . . . I will preach on the plurality of Gods. . . . I have always declared God to be a distinct personage, Jesus Christ a separate and distinct personage from God the Father, and the Holy Ghost was a distinct personage and a Spirit; and these three constitute three distinct personages and three gods.

Again, we see that he did not appeal to his experience in the grove to establish the distinction of the Father and the Son. In fact, Smith’s teachings through the years do not show that he had always taught a plurality of Gods or the Father to be a distinct being from Jesus.
This seems to be a new teaching in the 1840’s, and not preached in the 1830’s.

Despite Smith’s claims of consistency in the above sermon, there is clearly an evolution to his teaching on the nature of the Godhead, which even Mormon scholars recognize. LDS scholar Charles R. Harrell observed:

In March 1839, Joseph first hinted that there may be more than “one God” (D&C 121:28); however, it wasn’t until 1842 that he specifically referred to the godhead as consisting of three separate beings who were also “three Gods.” He seems to now consider them to be one only in the sense that they “agree as one.” In his last public dercourse, given June 16, 1844, Joseph repudiated the trinitarian notion of a three-in-one God. “Men say there is one God—the Fa[the]r, Son & the H[oly] G[host] are only 1 God—It is a strange God anyhow 3 in one & 1 in 3.” . . .

Joseph Smith made another interesting point in his June 16, 1844, sermon in which he appealed to Revelation 1:6, which says “And hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father” to prove there was a God above our Heavenly Father:

the apost[les] have disc[overed] that there were Gods above—God was the Fa[the]r of our L[or]d J[esus]
C[hrist]—my object was to preach the Scrip—& preach the doctrine there being a God above the Fa[the]r of our Ld. J.C.

Yet this is in direct contradiction to his change in his Inspired Version of the Bible, written in the early 1830’s, when he still believed in one God. At that time he changed the verse to read “and hath made us kings and priests unto God, his Father.” By dropping the “and” and inserting a comma he made the verse clearly state that it is only referring to Heavenly Father.

Joseph’s teachings regarding the members of the godhead appear to have progressed from essentially a trinitarian three-in-one God with a modalistic flavor, to a godhead consisting of “two personages” united by the indwelling Holy Spirit, to a godhead consisting of “three personages,” and finally to a godhead consisting of “three Gods.”

One of the troubling aspects of Smith’s evolving First Vision story is the lack of importance given to it in the historical record. As we have already shown, the LDS Church’s current claims of the importance of the First Vision to their understanding of God and Jesus are questionable given how little Smith himself referred to it during his lifetime. LDS scholar James B. Allen observed:

It is worth noting that Joseph Smith himself never used the First Vision to illustrate his own expanded teachings about God. It appears, in fact, that he seldom referred to it at all, except in private conversation, even after it was published.

But a further indication of its lack of importance is how much variation occurs between the details of the different accounts, not just the details of Joseph’s age and the revivals of the time but most crucially the identity of the being who was speaking to him in the vision. One would not expect a person to forget whether it was a mere angel or God Almighty when gripped with such a riveting and life-changing experience.

First Vision References After Smith’s Death

After Joseph Smith’s death the early church leaders continued to teach a plurality of gods. However, they did not appeal to Joseph Smith’s First Vision to prove the doctrine. When Smith’s earliest vision was mentioned, it was usually associated with an angel, not the Father and Son.

1845 — The Latter-Day Saints Millennial Star, in England, printed an article titled “The Book of Mormon” which included an account of Smith’s First Vision. However, the article places the beginning of Smith’s call to 1823, not 1820:

The late martyred servant of the Lord, Joseph Smith, being much exercised in his mind on the subject of religion, when about the age of seventeen, and religious revivals, as they are termed, being the order of the day; . . . he was induced to retire in secret, and making his supplications unto the Lord, ask him for that wisdom which he had promised to give liberally without upbraiding.

The result of his pleadings before the Lord, was the ministration of an angel of the Lord, communicating unto him what was necessary for him to know, . . .

Even Lucy Smith, Joseph’s mother, did not mention Joseph’s 1820 vision in her manuscript of the family history. The only revival she mentions is the one following Alvin’s death in 1823. Evidently, the publisher of her book, Biographical Sketches of Joseph Smith the Prophet, in 1853 inserted the section of Joseph’s 1820 story from the Times and Seasons, thus making it appear that Lucy mentions the First Vision. It also makes it appear that there were two revivals, one in 1820 and one following Alvin’s death.

Although William Smith, Joseph’s younger brother, had earlier told people that Joseph’s First Vision was of an angel in his bedroom, in 1883 he revised his story, noting that Joseph’s vision happened in the woods. However, in both accounts he maintained the event happened in 1823:

In 1822 and 1823, the people in our neighborhood were very much stirred up with regard to religious matters by the preaching of a Mr. Lane, an Elder of the Methodist Church, . . . Joseph, then about seventeen years of age, had become seriously inclined, . . . At length he [Joseph Smith] determined to call upon the Lord until he should get a manifestation from him. He accordingly went out into the woods and falling upon his knees called for a long time upon the Lord for wisdom . . . an angel then appeared to him and conversed with him upon many things. He told him that none of the sects were right; but that if he was faithful in keeping the commandments he should receive, the true way should be made known to him; that his sins were forgiven, etc.

Significantly, the two Smith relatives who would have been in the home during Joseph’s teen years did not show any knowledge of an 1820 vision.

Over the next 35 years LDS leaders occasionally referred to the First Vision, but often spoke of it as a vision of angels rather than the Father and Son.

For example, LDS Apostle George A. Smith, November 15, 1863, preached:

When Joseph Smith was about fourteen or fifteen years old, . . . he went humbly before the Lord and inquired of Him, and the Lord answered his prayer, and revealed to Joseph, by the ministration of angels, the true condition of the religious world. When the holy angel appeared, Joseph inquired which of all these denominations was right and which he should join, and was told they were all wrong. . . . (Journal of Discourses, vol. 12, pp. 333-334)

James B. Allen notes that the First Vision gained new importance after 1880 in part because the church needed a new focus after years of legal battles regarding polygamy.

The time was ready—made for the outpouring of a new identity with the founding prophet—new reminders to the Saints of what their heritage really was, and of what Joseph Smith’s testimony really meant to them personally. The First Vision was a natural tool for such a purpose, and a new generation of writers could hardly fail to use it. 89

Further on in the same article, James Allen commented on the growing importance of the vision in LDS literature:

The vision and its attendant uses quickly began to appear in lesson manuals, augmenting the Mormon awareness of its transcendent importance. In 1899 the Young Men’s Mutual Improvement Association used it to demonstrate that it had ushered in the “Dispensation of the Fullness of Times.” The vision was thus replacing the angel in Mormon thought as the implementing factor in the restoration. . . .

At the beginning of the twentieth century the First Vision also took a permanent place in the missionary literature of the Church. . . . The Sacred Grove [in New York] was acquired by the church in this period, and pilgrimages to the grove became sacred experiences for many Mormons. . . . By the beginning of the twentieth century, belief in the First Vision was fundamental to the faith of the Latter-day Saints. 90

CONCLUSION

For over a 100 years the LDS Church has placed paramount importance on the appearance of God and Christ to Joseph Smith in 1820. Speaking in the October 2002 General Conference, President Hinckley declared:

Our whole strength rests on the validity of that [First] vision. It either occurred or it did not occur. If it did not, then this work is a fraud. If it did, then it is the most important and wonderful work under the heavens. I knew a so-called intellectual who said the Church was trapped by its own history. My response was that without that history we have nothing. The truth of that unique, singular, and remarkable event [The First Vision] is the pivotal substance of our faith. 91

Yet Joseph Smith’s 1820 vision was not the center of the LDS teaching during his lifetime or Brigham Young’s. It is now established that the documents and published records of the 1820’s–1830’s show no knowledge of Smith claiming an appearance of the Father and Son in 1820. While Smith did print one account in 1842, he did not appeal to his vision as proof that God has a body of flesh and bone, an important tenet of LDS theology. It was not until 1880, with the canonization of the Pearl of Great Price, that the vision took on a major role in the church’s literature.

In recent years LDS scholars have tried to minimize the many inconsistencies among the differing First Vision accounts by emphasizing the core element of Joseph’s having seen someone in the grove that day. But this misses the important point that if he only saw someone then he did not receive specific information on the nature of God.

Gordon B. Hinckley, while serving as an apostle, declared: “Either Joseph talked with the Father and the Son, or he did not. If he did not, we are engaged in blasphemy.” 92

Yes, if Mormonism is not true its doctrine of God would be a great blasphemy.

Smith not only taught that the Father and Son were two separate deities, he also taught that God at one time was a mortal on another earth, overseen by yet a higher deity. When God was a human he went through the same type of life that we are going through, he married, suffered death, was resurrected, and after eons arrived at the position of a god himself. Preaching in 1844, Joseph Smith declared:

I am going to tell you how God came to be God. We have imagined and supposed that God was God from all eternity I will refute that idea, and take away the veil. . . . he was once a man like us; yea, that God himself, the Father of all, dwell on an earth, the same as Jesus Christ himself did, . . . The Scriptures inform us that Jesus said, As the Father hath power in Himself, even so hath the Son power—to do what? Why, what the Father did. The answer is obvious—in a manner to lay down His body and take it up again. Jesus what are you going to do? To lay down my life as my Father did, and take it up again. . . . Here, then, is eternal life—to know the only wise and true God; and you have got to learn how to be Gods yourselves, and to be kings and priests to God, the same as all Gods have done before you, namely, by going from one small degree to another . . .

When Joseph Smith declared that “God was once a man like us,” and we can learn how to be Gods ourselves, it would imply that God at one time was a sinner like us. President Lorenzo Snow wrote: “As man now is, God once was; As God now is, man may be.”

Joseph Smith’s 1820 vision is obviously a later invention which was then back-dated to give a more dramatic start for his prophetic career and which also introduced a heretical view of God.

Yet when we turn to the Bible for instruction, we find a very different doctrine of God than the one Smith proclaimed the last year of his life. Bill McKeever, of Mormonism Research Ministry, summed it up this way:

The Mormon doctrine of God is not the same as the historic Christian view. It holds that God and man are essentially of the same species, and that God the Father has a body of flesh and bones. He is not uniquely self-existent, transcendent, or eternal. Neither is he truly the creator of all things, for he is one among potentially billions of Gods, and does not even have the ability to create matter. . . .

To the contrary, God says in Isaiah 43:10, “Before me no god was formed, nor shall there be any after me.” Psalm 90:2 says of him, “Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever you had formed the earth and the world, from everlasting to everlasting you are God.” This is the God Christians worship. Of him we can say, “Who has known the mind of the Lord, or who has been his counselor? Or who has given a gift to him that he might be repaid? For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be glory forever. Amen” (Romans 11:34-36).

The God of the Bible is not the god of Joseph Smith.

LDS Church Growth for 2019

At the April LDS Conference it was reported that church membership now stood at 16,565,036, up from the 2018 count of 16,313,735. There were 94,266 new children of record listed and convert baptism was listed as 248,835.1

According to the Salt Lake Tribune for April 4, 2020:

The latest statistical report, released Saturday, put total membership above 16.5 million at the end of 2019, up by more than 251,000 from the previous year.

That’s a 1.54% increase, according to independent demographer Matt Martinich, and represents the “first year since 2012 in which the rate of membership growth has accelerated instead of decelerated.” The church grew by 1.2% in 2018.

Convert baptisms last year also mushroomed, to 248,835, up more than 6% from 234,332 in 2018.

So 2019 “is the first year since 2014,” Martinich writes on his blog at ldschurch.growth.blogspot.com, “that the annual number of convert baptisms has increased by a sizable amount compared to the prior year.”

LDS in Salt Lake County Continues to Slide

According to the Salt Lake Tribune for December 9, 2018, an unrelenting demographic shift has hit a major milestone:

Fewer than half the people living in Salt Lake County are on the rolls of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

They show Salt Lake County’s population is now 48.91 percent Latter-day Saint, the lowest since at least the 1930s, according to the available records. There are 558,607 people on the church membership rolls in the state’s largest county, which has an estimated population of 1,142,077.

The article continues, “In Utah overall, the percentage of Latter-day Saints is 61.55 percent, a figure that has also inched down as the state’s hot job market has attracted new residents who are less likely to be members of the predominant faith than the state’s homegrown population.”

The Christus Statue to be New LDS Logo

Since 1966, an eleven-foot replica of Danish sculptor Bertel Thorvaldsen’s statue, The Christus, has been on display at the LDS Church visitor center in Salt Lake City. At the Saturday evening, April 4, 2020 session of LDS Conference President Nelson announced that the new church logo would be a drawing of the statue enclosed in an arch, with the name of the church underneath.

EXCERPTS FROM LETTERS AND EMAILS

August 2019: I am 17 years old from Montana. I’d like to start by thanking you for all of your research and provisions of information. They have been most helpful for me when talking with my mormon friends, and I pray that they will use your information to see the truth!

September 2019: A Call to Repentance. The warning call: Cease & desist your destructive behavior, and repent before it grows too late, lest ye find yourself among these “Lost Souls”:

[Doctrine and Covenants 76]
31 Thus saith the Lord concerning all those who know my power, and have been made partakers thereof, and suffered themselves through the power of the devil to be overcome, and to deny the truth and defy my power—
32 They are they who are the sons of perdition, of whom I say that it had been better for them never to have been born;
33 For they are vessels of wrath, doomed to suffer the wrath of God, with the devil and his angels in eternity;
34 Concerning whom I have said there is no forgiveness in this world nor in the world to come—…

PS: It’s never ‘too late’, whilst you draw breath, to repent & save the rest of your family. (& save your deceased husband, by helping in renewing his vows, via proxy work)

September 2019: I have half a bookshelf, at least, of your excellent works and other books… Thank you, Sandra and Jerald, for your decades of work. You helped me out more than you know. God Bless the late Jerald and everyone there at the UTLM.

September 2019: Though I am an Agnostic/Atheist I just wanted to reach out to UTLM and especially Mrs. Tanner. Obviously we are going to approach Biblical studies from a different perspective - I still learned so much from the talks that you have given that are available on YouTube. It is always easy to spot a labor of love and it is very obvious you are incredibly passionate and well informed on the subject of Mormonism and its conflicts with its inspiration, the Bible.

September 2019: I am 74 years old and have just resigned my membership of 56 years. I was an active temple going member; teacher on both ward and stake level. First the control and manipulation came to my realization. Also I was taught one thing when I joined years ago and found teachings were entirely different years later when I finally gained access to the computer and found web sites such as yours. I LOVE YOUR WEB SITE!

September 2019: I became a Christian at the age of 41 and am now only 43. Studying Mormonism is what brought me into a relationship with Jesus. I attended [a Christian class on Mormonism] and it became a class of evangelism. I went from arguing for the possibility of Mormonism being true to gaining the knowledge and relationship of Jesus. . . . I’ve gained one knowledgeable exmormon friend who loves Jesus and I have studied scripture but it is hard being a Christian and all your neighbors be Mormon.

September 2019: I’m 29 years old, . . . and for several years now, I’ve had a fascination with Mormonism. As such, it was only going to be a question of time before I came across Utah Lighthouse Ministry. I wish to say that your work is marvelous. The intellectual honesty you have consistently shown, not just on celebrated matters such as the Salamander letter, but your general determination to make sure you always get every fact correct, your principled stance against sensationalism, is admirable. Further, you have always shown yourselves to be ever so gentle, diplomatic, and proper in your outreach to Mormons.

October 2019: “YOU are still a HUGE FRAUD.”

October 2019: I cannot thank you [enough] for the years of service and dedication you’ve provided, many times under duress and threats . . . At 18 I joined the [LDS] Church in ___ OR; at 19 I was married in the Oakland Temple and things just went down the tube over a period of 21 yrs in a horrible marriage and financial oppressed lifestyle. There’s not a day that goes by that I don’t praise the Lord for His mercy of removing me from the bondage I had been in for 21 yrs. He IS a Merciful God, Who gave his life a ransom for me. I am blessed beyond expression.

November 2019: [Man from Missouri] I just finished reading an article in issue 133 of The Messenger, . . . You published Ronald Huggins’ article, “Did Early Christians Practice Baptism for the Dead?” I found this article to be the best of its kind that I have read. In a scholarly way, Mr. Huggins presented objective historic information on this practice, and then reflected critically on Mormon scholars’ misuse of this data. I found this article to be very informative, objective and balanced.

November 2019: [Man in Utah] Thanks to you, Sarah Tanner and cohorts, for publishing the Grammar and Alphabet of the Egyptian Language. I have been studying it for over 40 years. The LDS Church is ashamed of it, because nobody is intelligent enough to figure it out. The truth is, nobody on the planet reads Egyptian hieroglyphs correctly, nor hieratic in the least degree. But I have been able to prove that Joseph Smith was in fact the only man on the planet ever to read Egyptian correctly in our dispensation. . . . I have been able to prove that everything Smith translated was done correctly.

December 2019: I would like to thank Sandra for the years she and her husband Jerald spent uncovering the true history of the Mormon church. The MormonStories podcast she did was amazing. It solidified my view that my mormon life was a farce and needed to end. The story of Jerald driving to Missouri to find the truth about Mormon history was inspiring. Thanks for all you do.
December 2019: I give thanks to God for your ministry & faithful tenacity to the truth of the Word. Through your writings I have been able to converse with LDS family & have seen some come to faith in Christ Jesus. May God continue to encourage you with fruit as you move forward in integrity & love.

January 2020: I want to say how much I admire Sandra and her stamina all these years in informing Mormons of the truth of Mormonism! She has been an inspiration to me for truly decades!

I first learned of Jerald and Sandra’s ministry in 2001, at a dinner. . . . A woman at the table recommended [Mormonism] Shadow or Reality to me. . . . Over the years, I was heavily involved with outreach as I seemed to be surrounded by Mormonism . . . Those experiences and conversations were some of the richest of my life!

January 2020: THANK YOU and Doris Hanson. I sent in formal papers yesterday to be removed officially from LDS Church membership. Have been member since 1975. I live in [Utah] and health is not good. I prayed God would keep me alive until I could have my name removed. AND HE DID.....Praise God.

January 2020: I’m just learning about all of this. I was raised in the church, went inactive at 15 & went back to church at 50. I’m 56 now. So glad to be finding this out now. I have watched several of your videos including mormonstories. Thank you for the work you do!

January 2020: I just read the 2019 newsletter you sent. WOW! . . . As a former member of the church . . . I do want to say that I have the greatest respect & love for you, as you & Gerald spent your lives bringing truth & reason to a world who didn’t & still doesn’t want it—the inconvenient truth.

February 2020: You and your ministry were such a great help and resource when my father and I left the Mormon Church. I can never thank you enough for all you have done and still do. My father passed away a year ago and it was such a blessing to know he is with our Lord and Savior.

February 2020: I wanted to say thank you to you and your late husband, for all of the work that you have done. I have read many of the publications that you have released, and am especially grateful for people like you who have paved the way for people like me to live free of the ever-growing shadow of the church. I continue on my quest for my own scholarly education on early LDS history, and your work has helped me tremendously.

February 2020: My wife and I just watched an interview of Sandra on MormonStories.org. We want to let you know how much we enjoyed and were impressed by her articulate knowledge. Well done!

We moved into this area [Idaho] three years ago and it has been the work of vanguards like Jerald and Sandra who have helped us learn more about the faith of our neighbors.

February 2020: Hello Sandra It just listened to your interview with John Dehlin. I was very impressed with what you and your husband have accomplished. I can tell you are a very intelligent person. You represented yourself well. Thank you so much for all you have done. I’ve been out of the church for a little over a year.

February 2020: Dear Sandra, you sent me some of your free newsletters. To which I am responding because today, being the 9th day of February I am saved and a born again Christian. I owe you a deep debt of gratitude.

March 2020: I have heard just about every anti argument you can think of, and it does not bother me. I just don’t understand what your purpose is. If it is only to destroy/tear down, it really isn’t doing any good.

March 2020: Hello, Mrs. Tanner. On Tuesday my beloved mother in law passed. She was mormon and my husband’s entire family is including his brother who is a bishop of the church . . . My husband was very upset during the [funeral] service but he was curious when the sta[k]e president was invited to speak and basically did the mormon sunday morning church speech for 30 minutes. . . . Its becoming more and more clear to him that [what] he was raised to believe was a cult. He likes listening to you alot. When I started on my education of Mormonism he said he wasn’t supposed to listen to you lol. We are in Tennessee so as you know you are known all over but even here in our dumpy town. Thank you for reading and doing all you do.

April 2020: I never knew of you as a active member and it’s been many years since I attended regularly. I am a man but couldn’t receive the priesthood and always felt shame during blessings as everyone worthy made their way up front. I couldn’t bless any of my kids and had to ask others in my place. Nothing seemed to go right.

I found out a couple years ago that Smith practiced polygamy and polyandry, I was devastated and for the first time directed an Earnest prayer to Jesus for answers. Within a week I started noticing crosses everywhere and my entire worldview started to crumble, things I believed my whole life somehow I knew they were wrong.

I started devouring the Bible and learning about historical Christianity and textual criticism. I’m an ironworker but I get up a couple hours early to study where I’m led and Jesus came to life for me. I am so happy I’m not alone and I know you understand, your courage means so much to me.

Looking back I have been so blessed, for some reason I was protected from the blasphemy of claiming the priesthood for myself and am aware of many other issues. I’m alone in my faith in my family but am quickly being equipped to defend my faith with reality and scripture.

On April 6, 1830, the day Joseph Smith founded the Church of Christ, later renamed The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, he received a revelation designating himself as “a seer, a translator, a prophet, an apostle.” The terms prophet and apostle are generally understood in LDS circles. But what is meant by seer and translator? Does divine translation result in the same message that scholars, taking a specific text from one language and rendering it in another, would arrive at? If not, how are we to understand “translate” in Smith’s writings?

Traditionally the LDS Church has taught that the Book of Mormon is a literal translation of an actual record, inscribed on gold plates, recounting God’s dealings with the people occupying America hundreds of years before the arrival of the Europeans. However, extensive research shows the presence of nineteenth-century ideas and sources, such as the King James Version (KJV) of the Bible, in the book.1 This is causing some LDS scholars to redefine the word translation to mean revealed text. For example, Richard Bushman, author of Joseph Smith: Rough Stone Rolling, responded in an interview:

The Book of Mormon is a problem right now. It’s so baffling to so many that Joseph was not even looking at the gold plates [to translate them]. And there’s so much in the Book of Mormon that comes out of the 19th century that there’s a question of whether or not the text is an exact transcription of Nephí’s and Mormon’s words, or if it has been reshaped by inspiration to be more suitable for us, a kind of an expansion or elucidation of the Nephite record for our times. I have no idea how that might have worked or whether that’s true. But there are just too many scholars now, faithful church scholars, who find 19th-century material in that text. That remains a little bit of a mystery, just how it came to be.2

Years of research have led to several theories of how Joseph Smith produced his scriptures. These can be broadly put into four categories: (1) the literal translation, or “tight control,” theory, where Smith dictated the English text he read on his seer stone, which in turn was the Lord’s translation of what was recorded on the ancient plates;3 (2) the expanded text theory, where Smith expanded the message of the ancient record with current concepts and Bible quotes;4 (3) the revelatory theory, where the dictated text is more the result of inspiration, meditation and influences of the day... than actually translating an ancient record into English, sometimes referred to as the catalyst theory; 5 (4) and the naturalistic (fiction) theory where no ancient text is needed, only the creative mind of the storyteller coupled with religious issues of the day and current events. 6 These theories would help explain why Smith never looked at the ancient plates during his dictation. However, only the first theory fits the earliest accounts of Smith’s translation efforts, with Smith simply reading the God-given English translation off his seer stone to scribes. In recent speeches and articles the top leadership of the LDS Church seem to be holding to the literal method while many of its scholars seem to be looking more to an expanded text or the revelatory theory. 7

BOOK OF MORMON TRANSLATION ESSAY

In 2013 the LDS Church released several essays addressing difficult issues in their history. 8 One of these articles, “The Book of Mormon Translation,” discusses the method used by Joseph Smith to render the Book of Mormon into English. 9 In this article we read “The angel charged Joseph Smith to translate the book from the ancient language in which it was written.” Thus Smith is declared to be in possession of an actual record that is translatable. The article then proceeds to build a case of Smith as an uneducated man incapable of inventing such a complicated story, thereby implying that it must be what it claims to be, a God-given translation from an ancient text. The article asserts that Smith was untrained in languages thus the translation was accomplished through the use of divinely prepared instruments called “interpreters” (large spectacles with crystal lenses preserved with the plates) and “seer stones” (magic rocks found in the ground by Joseph Smith).

We read further that “by looking through these, he was able to read in English, the reformed Egyptian characters, which were engraved on the plates.” This claim of dictating the English text as it appeared on the interpreters or stone would certainly demand a God-given translation from one language to another, which would preclude Smith expanding the text.

To emphasize the book’s historicity and underscore Smith’s limited education and inability to compose such a book the essay quotes Emma Smith, Joseph’s wife, saying that he “could neither write nor dictate a coherent and well-worded letter, let alone dictate a book like the Book of Mormon.” However, the inaccuracy of this statement is seen when we examine one of Smith’s letters written in 1829:

Respected sir I would in form you that I arrived at home on Sunday morning the 4th. after having a prosperous journd, and found all well the people are all friendly to <us> except a few who are in opposition to evry thing unless it is something that is axactly like themselves and two of our most formidable persacutors are now under censure and are cited to a trial in the church for crimes which if true are worse than all the Gold Book business. we do not rejoice in the affliction of our enimies but we shall be glad to have truth prevail[.]

there begins to be a great call for our books in this country the minds of the people are very much excited when they find that there is a copy right obtained and that there is really books about to be printed. 10

While there are several misspelled words the document demonstrates that Joseph Smith could write a “coherent and well-worded letter,” thus showing that Emma was simply trying to bolster the idea that Joseph was too uneducated to have composed the Book of Mormon. Also, Joseph himself wrote in 1832 that he studied the Bible from the age of 12 11 and his mother said he entertained the family in the evenings with stories of the Native Americans. 12 Young Joseph, according to Orsamus Turner, attended the local Methodist camp meetings, becoming a “very passible exhorter at evening meetings.” Turner also recalled that Joseph was involved in the “juvenile debating club.” 13 These activities show he had an active mind, was a reader, and could compose his thoughts. In addition, one only needs to look at his revelations during and after writing the Book of Mormon to see his ability to dictate his thoughts to a scribe.14

Joseph Smith spent his teen years in western New York, in an area often referred to as the burnt-over district, well-known for numerous religious revivals and spiritual excitement. While his parents were religious, they were not members of any particular church. However, during an 1824–25 revival in Palmyra, New York, Joseph’s mother, sister and two brothers joined the Presbyterian Church. His father, Joseph Smith Sr., refused to affiliate with any denomination and only attended one or two of the local revival meetings. Joseph Jr. studied the Bible from the age of twelve, attended the revivals often and evidently favored the Methodists.15

In the 1820’s many people, including the Smiths, believed in magical stones, like crystal balls, and divining rods that allowed the owner to discover the location of buried treasures, metal or water. For instance, the Wayne Sentinel, published in Joseph Smith’s neighborhood, reprinted the following from the Windsor (Vermont) Journal:

Money digging.—We are sorry to observe even in this enlightened age, so prevalent a disposition to credit the accounts of the Marvellous. Even the frightful stories of money being hid under the surface of the earth, and enchanted by the Devil or Robert Kidd, are received by many of our respectable fellow citizens as truths. . . . A respectable gentleman in Tunbridge, was informed by means of a dream, that a chest of money was buried on a small island. . . . After having been directed by the mineral rod where to search for the money . . . he and his laborers came . . . upon a chest of gold . . . the chest moved off through the mud, and has not been seen or heard of since.16

Oliver Cowdery, who acted as scribe for Smith during most of the Book of Mormon dictation, evidently claimed the gift of working with a divining rod. In the 1833 Book of Commandments, section seven, his gift is called “the gift of working with the rod” and “rod of nature” which works “in your hands, for it is the work of God.” But this section was rewritten for the 1835 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants, now section eight, changing Cowdery’s rod of nature to “gift of Aaron,” which you hold “in your hands.” These changes obscure the original meaning of Cowdery’s practice of dowsing, using a magical divining rod.

Another story in the 1825 Wayne Sentinel told of people using a “mineral stone” placed in a hat to locate buried treasures, similar to Joseph Smith’s efforts:

Wonderful Discovery.—A few days since was discovered in this town, by the help of a mineral stone, (which becomes transparent when placed in a hat and the light excluded by the face of him who looks into it, provided he is fortune’s favorite,) a monstrous potash kettle in the bowels of old mother Earth, filled with the purest bullion. . . . His Satanic Majesty, or some other invisible agent, appears to keep it [the treasure] under marching orders; for no sooner is it dug on to in one place, than it moves off like “false delusive hope,” to another still more remote.17

Interestingly, a similar story of burying riches only to find that the treasure has slipped away is found in the Book of Mormon. There Samuel the Lamanite speaks of “slippery” treasure:

“And behold,” he said, “the time cometh that he curseth your riches, that they become slippery, that ye cannot hold them; and in the days of your poverty ye cannot retain them.

“... And then shall ye lament, and say: . . . O that we had remembered the Lord our God in the day that he gave us our riches, and then they would not have become slippery that we should lose them; for behold, our riches are gone from us.

“...Yea, we have hid our treasures and they have slipped away from us, because of the curse of the land.” (Helaman 13:31-33, 35)

These are just a few of the instances where the Book of Mormon story mirrors events in Smith’s environment. Joseph Smith and most of the early converts to Mormonism believed in such magical instruments as seer stones and mineral rods.18

In 1822 Joseph Smith found a magic rock, like the one mentioned in the Wayne Sentinel, while digging a well for his neighbor, Willard Chase. In 1833 Mr. Chase gave his account of the event:

“I became acquainted with the Smith family, known as the authors of the Mormon Bible, in the year 1820. At that time, they were engaged in the money digging business, which they followed until the latter part of the season of 1827. In the year 1822, I was engaged in digging a well. I employed Alvin and Joseph Smith to assist me; the latter of whom is now known as the Mormon prophet. After digging about twenty feet below the surface of the earth, we discovered a singularly appearing stone, which excited my curiosity. I brought it to the top of the well, and as we were examining it, Joseph put it into his hat, and then his face into the top of his hat. . . . After obtaining the stone, he began to publish abroad what wonders he could discover by looking in it, . . . ”19

The LDS essay acknowledges that Joseph Smith used his stone for money-digging. It also acknowledges that the rock was used for translating the Book of Mormon because it proved to be more convenient than the sacred interpreters preserved with the plates. According to the essay:

As a young man during the 1820’s, Joseph Smith, like others in his day, used a seer stone to look for lost objects and buried treasure. As Joseph grew to understand his prophetic calling, he learned that he could use this stone for the higher purpose of translating scripture. Apparently for convenience, Joseph often translated with the single seer stone rather than the two stones bound together to form the interpreters.

While the LDS essay concedes Smith’s use of his magic rock in looking for buried treasures, the brief mention hardly covers the situation. The Smith family was very involved in folk magic in the early 1800’s. Joseph’s stone found in 1822 reportedly possessed special powers and he had used it for years to inform people where to look for hidden or lost items. In an interview Martin Harris discussed some of the Smiths’ involvement in searching for buried riches, naming Joseph Smith, jr., and his father, and his brother Hiram Smith. They dug for money in Palmyra, Manchester, also in Pennsylvania, and other places. When Joseph found this stone, there was a company digging in Harmony, Pa., and they took Joseph to look in the stone for them.20

Joseph’s mentor for using a seer stone seems to have been Luman Walters, a well-known magician and con man. Richard Van Wagoner observed: “In the 1820s, these credulous souls believed in the posturings of Luman Walters and other tricksters like him.”21

Besides this, Smith also carried on his person a small magic medallion called a Jupiter Talisman22 and the Smith family also owned several magic parchments and a magic dagger.23

Then in 1826 Joseph Smith was arrested and charged with a misdemeanor for his claim of being able to locate buried treasures by use of his seer stone. In the court document he was referred to as a “glass-looker.”24 The issue centered on whether or not Joseph was defrauding people by claiming that his seer stone had special powers. Josiah Stowell, who had hired him, testified that Smith did have such powers. Another man, Jonathan Thompson, testified of Smith’s ability and that when they had dug for the buried trunk they hit something hard, like a plank, “the board which he struck his spade upon was probably the chest, but on account of an enchantment the trunk kept settling away from under them when digging; that notwithstanding they continued constantly removing the dirt, yet the trunk kept about the same distance from them.”25

Joseph’s defense at the 1826 hearing was that he had a genuine gift of using his seer stone and had done so for at least three years, but “of late had pretty much given it up on account of its injuring his health, especially his eyes, made them sore.”

Regardless of the outcome of the hearing the issue still remains, did the rock have magical properties that only a “seer” could use? If one accepts Smith’s claim of seeing in his stone the translation of the Book of Mormon then it follows that his claim to see the location of treasures with the same stone would be valid as well. Yet no treasures were ever located.

Called to Translate

According to Smith’s story at the back of the Pearl of Great Price in 1823 a heavenly being appeared in his bedroom to announce that God had called him to translate the long lost record of the former inhabitants of the American continent, recorded in an unknown language called Reformed Egyptian and engraved on gold plates. These plates, according to Smith’s story, had been buried in 421 AD by Moroni, the last man to make an entry on the plates.

However, Joseph was not able to retrieve the record from the local hill where they were buried until 1827. When Joseph was about to receive the plates an angel told him “he must quit the company of the money-diggers. That there were wicked men among them. He must have no more to do with them.” Thus we see that during the time Joseph was supposedly being groomed for his calling as “seer” (1823-1827) he was heavily involved in magic, glass looking and searching for buried treasures.

The essay tries to normalize the Smith family’s involvement with magic by pointing out that Joseph’s use of a seer stone was a common practice in the 1820s. However, this is overstating the situation. Yes, others believed in magic stones, but it was not accepted by many of the Christians in the community. In fact, it was the major reason that Joseph was denied membership in the Methodist Church in 1828. When Joseph Lewis, Emma Smith’s cousin, discovered that Joseph’s name had been added to the membership class he “thought it was a disgrace to the church to have a practicing necromancer” as a member. Joseph was told to either repent of his magic activities or withdraw his name. The end result was that his name was dropped from the rolls of the local Methodist church. Christians today are also troubled by the Smiths’ involvement with magic in light of such verses as Deuteronomy 18:10-12:

> There shall not be found among you . . . anyone who practices divination or tells fortunes or interprets omens, or a sorcerer or a charmer or a medium or a necromancer or one who inquires of the dead, for whoever does these things is an abomination to the Lord.

According to Smith, in 1827 he was finally able to remove the ancient record from the hill and commence his work. The necessity of waiting four years to procure the plates suggests he literally needed them to produce his translation. The manuscript was completed and published in 1830 under the title The Book of Mormon.

Lost 116 Pages

In Joseph Smith’s history he relates that he began translating the plates in 1828 with Martin Harris acting as one of his scribes. Martin’s wife had been badgering him for some time that Smith’s claims were not valid. Harris left home in northwest New York, travelling to Harmony, Pennsylvania, in April to aid Smith in his translation work. At last Martin was able to convince Joseph to let him take a few pages of the manuscript home to Manchester, New York, to show his wife that he was aiding Smith in a genuine work of God. Joseph had been reluctant to oblige, but finally agreed.

When Harris did not return the pages in a timely manner Smith made the trip to Harris’ home. Smith’s worst fears had been realized—the pages were lost, stolen or destroyed. Joseph’s mother, Lucy Mack Smith, described the meeting when Harris came to the Smith family home and told Joseph he had lost the pages. “Oh! My God My God My God said Joseph clenching his hands together all is lost is lost what shall I do I have sinned.”30 Soon after this Joseph received a revelation chastising him for allowing Harris to take the pages home and the Lord temporarily removed his gift of translating.31

Joseph evidently feared that Martin Harris, referred to as a “wicked man” in Doctrine and Covenants, section 10, was doubting his prophetic claim and planned to put him to the test by altering the words of the manuscript.

In the preface to the 1830 Book of Mormon Joseph Smith explained that even though God could give him the power to translate the same words again he was to switch to a different set of plates:

As many false reports have been circulated . . . and also many unlawful measures taken by evil designing persons to destroy me, and also the work, I would inform you that I translated, by the gift and power of God, and caused to be written, one hundred and sixteen pages, the which I took from the Book of Lehi, . . . which said account, some person or persons have stolen and kept from me, . . .—and being commanded of the Lord that I should not translate the same over again, for Satan had put it into their hearts to tempt the Lord their God, by altering the words, that they did read contrary from that which I translated and caused to be written; and if I should bring forth the same words again, or, in other words, if I should translate the same over again, they would publish that which they had stolen, and Satan would stir up the hearts of this generation, that they might not receive this work: . . . therefore thou shalt translate from the plates of Nephi, until ye come to that which ye have translated, . . . and thus I will confound those who have altered my words. . . .32

First, we wonder why Joseph couldn’t just look in his stone and find the lost pages or see what happened to them? He had done so at an earlier time. According to Joseph Smith’s mother, when he first took the plates out of the ground he temporarily hid them in the trunk of a tree. While he was away from home his wife, Emma, went to him to warn him that people were using local mediums to try to locate the hiding place of the plates. But Smith “looked in the Urim and Thummim, and saw that the Record was as yet safe.”33 Second, how could a scoundrel change the words in the manuscript without it showing signs of alteration? Third, it seems obvious that Smith couldn’t retranslate the same words again so he had to come up with an excuse that would still support his claims of translating. Thus Joseph announced that the Lord had prepared for this event over two thousand years before by telling Nephi to make a second set of records that covered that same time period but to include more religious material. Therefore, Smith is told not to translate the same material again, but to switch to this other more religious set of plates.34 This leaves one wondering why God had Joseph start with Nephi’s larger set of plates in the first place? Joseph’s story of two sets of plates sounds more like a way to cover up the fact that he couldn’t dictate the same material again.35

BECOMING A SEER

The Book of Mormon presents the idea of a prophetic calling to be a seer, which includes the ability to translate ancient records. In Mosiah 8:9-13 we are told of an ancient record of the Jaredites, a group who migrated to America at the time of the tower of Babel, preserved on twenty-four gold plates, which were written in an unknown script. The king is told of “a man that can translate the records; for he has wherewith that he can look, and translate all records that are of ancient date” (Mosiah 8:13). This gift operates by staring into an apparatus called “interpreters.” Only a seer may look in these sacred objects and receive instruction from God. Several chapters later we are told that the Jaredite record was translated “by the means of those two stones which were fastened into the two rims of a bow . . . And they have been kept and preserved by the hand of the Lord . . . And whosoever has these things is called seer” (Mosiah 28:13-16). Notice that the label seer does not stand alone but is given to one who has these special eyeglasses. Smith claimed that these were buried with the Nephite record to aid the future seer who would translate the Book of Mormon plates.36 Joseph Smith described the interpreters as two stones in silver bows—and these stones, fastened to a breastplate, constituted what is called the Urim and Thummim—deposited with the plates; and the possession and use of these stones what constitutes seers in ancient or former times; and that God had prepared them for the purpose of translating the book [Book of Mormon].37

While the interpreters, later referred to as Urim and Thummim, were specifically preserved for use in translating the plates, Joseph Smith evidently only used them, if at all, in producing the first 116 pages of the manuscript. After Martin Harris lost those pages Smith was only seen using his own stone, found several years earlier, to produce the manuscript used in the printing. Emma Smith, and two of the Book of Mormon witnesses, Martin Harris and David Whitmer, all described Joseph using his stone in his hat while dictating the Book of Mormon, but none of them describe him using the ancient glasses/interpreters buried with the plates. This raises the question, why were the Book of Mormon interpreters preserved for centuries if Joseph Smith could simply use a rock he found buried on his neighbor’s property?

In 1939 LDS scholar Dr. Francis W. Kirkham denounced the claim that Smith used a seer stone to translate. He wrote in the LDS Church magazine, The Improvement Era:

> A neighbor, Willard Chase, asserted Joseph stole a “singularly appearing stone” which he had found in 1822 when Joseph and his brother Alvin were employed by him in digging a well. “Joseph put it into his hat and then his face into the top of his hat . . . alleging that he could see in it.”—Mormonism Unveiled, Eber D. Howe, 1834.

This is an attempt to explain the alleged power of Joseph Smith to translate the plates by a person who denounced him as a fraud and an ignorant deceiver.

In the opinion of the writer, the Prophet used no seer stone in translating the Book of Mormon, neither did he translate in the manner described by David Whitmer and Martin Harris.

However, research has proven Dr. Kirkham wrong. Russell M. Nelson, the current President of the LDS Church, has endorsed the accounts of Smith using a stone in his hat to translate, and even provided a demonstration of it in a recent video.

Many years ago M. T. Lamb made some important observations regarding Joseph Smith’s use of his stone instead of the Urim and Thummim:

> Joseph Smith would put the seer stone into a hat, and put his face in the hat, drawing it closely around his face to exclude the light; and in the darkness the spiritual light would shine. A piece of something resembling parchment would appear, and on that appeared the writing. One character at a time would appear, and under it was the interpretation in English. Brother Joseph would read off the English to Oliver Cowdery, who was his principal scribe, and when it was written down and repeated to Brother Joseph to see if it was correct, then it would disappear, and another character with the interpretation would appear.

This process did not involve any use of the original plates. Emma Smith related that the plates were off to the side, “wrapped in a small linen table cloth.” The English translation miraculously appeared on the stone and did not require any linguistic ability. Even though the plates were not consulted, Smith always presented his work as an actual translation from an ancient text:

[T]he fact is, that by the power of God I translated the Book of Mormon from hieroglyphics, the knowledge of which was lost to the world, in which wonderful event I stood alone, an unlearned youth, to combat the worldly wisdom and multiplied ignorance of eighteen centuries, with a new revelation, . . .

Such statements certainly present the project as Smith dictating the English translation of what was literally written on the plates in Reformed Egyptian. Otherwise, why preserve the plates for centuries? God could have revealed the Nephite history to Smith without the record, as he later claimed with the Book of Moses. From this, one would expect that anyone knowledgeable in Reformed Egyptian could have produced a translation essentially the same as Smith’s version.

For example, when LDS scholars produce a new translation of the Book of Mormon, or any other text, from English to another language the same essential message is preserved. The LDS Church has a whole department to translate their material into other languages. The modern process used by the LDS Church does not allow for additional sermonizing or expanding the text by the translator. In the same way, one would expect that the message Smith dictated would be the same as the one on the plates. The literalness of the translation was underscored by LDS Apostle Uchtdorf in 2016:

In reality, most of us use a kind of “seer stone” every day. My mobile phone is like a “seer stone.” I can get the collected knowledge of the world through a few little inputs. I can take a photo or a video with my phone and share it with family on the other side of our planet. I can even translate anything into or from many different languages!

If I can do this with my phone, if human beings can do this with their phones or other devices, who are we to say that God could not help Joseph Smith, the Prophet of the Restoration, with his translation work?

Uchtdorf’s statement would certainly imply that Smith’s translation of sacred records through his stone was literally the same message as was engraved on the plates, not a loose rendering with additional inspirational thoughts supplied by Smith. Since it is claimed that the Book of Mormon text itself appeared on the stone, similar to a cell phone displaying a text message, there should be no outside information added by the person reading the text. It would also mean that the text did not result from Joseph Smith putting the message in his own words. Then why does the Book of Mormon contain hundreds of phrases and verses copied verbatim from the King James Bible? (See example on next page.)

One oddity of the Book of Mormon is its mimicking of the King James Bible verbiage such as the use of “thee” and “thou.” These archaic forms had dropped out of common use by 1830. One only has to look at transcripts of Joseph Smith’s letters or read one of the local newspapers to see this. Besides the Bible, one book that could have suggested this approach would have been Gilbert J. Hunt’s The Late War between the United States and Great Britain . . . in the Scriptural Style, a historical account of the War of 1812 published in New York in 1816, for use in schools. The author acknowledged he had deliberately modeled his style after the Bible to encourage his young readers in their study of scripture. In like manner, Smith may have mimicked Elizabethan English to make his scriptures sound more biblical.

Rev. Wesley P. Walters, in his 1981 Master’s Thesis, discussed the problems associated with writing the Book of Mormon in archaic English:

In addition to borrowing biblical names and events, the Elizabethan style of the English King James Bible was adopted. Furthermore, even the material not derived from the Bible was cast into the King James style. Consequently there is a continual use of “thee”, “thou” and “ye”, as well as the archaic verb endings “est” (second person singular) and “eth” (third person singular). Since the Elizabethan style was not Joseph’s natural idiom, he continually slipped out of this King James pattern and repeatedly confused the forms as well. Thus he lapsed from “ye” (subject) to “you” (object) as

A comparison of verses from chapters 7 and 10 of Moroni in the Book of Mormon (to the left) with chapters 13 and 12 of 1 Corinthians in the Bible (to the right). According to Moroni 7:1, in that chapter Moroni is quoting “the words of my father Mormon, which he spake concerning faith, hope, and charity: . . .” In reality the words are plagiarized from Apostle Paul’s letter to the Corinthians (chapter 13). Chapter 10 of Moroni purports to be Moroni’s own words, but it is obvious that they are taken from chapter 12 of Paul’s letter to the Corinthians. That both Mormon and Moroni would independently come up with almost the same words as Paul, while isolated on another continent, seems totally beyond belief. The evidence clearly shows that the author of the Book of Mormon plagiarized the Bible. (Joseph Smith’s Plagiarism of the Bible in the Book of Mormon, p. 24) the subject of sentences (e.g. Mos. 2:19; 2:34; 4:24), jumped from plural ("ye") to singular ("thou") in the same sentence (Mos. 4:22) and moved from verbs without endings to ones with endings (e.g. "yields . . . putteth," 3:19).53

One assumes that Smith continued to use the Elizabethan style in all of his scriptures to give them the air of authority. However, if one accepts the statements of those witnessing the dictation of the Book of Mormon, Smith was not putting the translation into his own words, but dictating a divinely supplied text directly revealed on the seer stone. Thus the grammatical misuse of the Elizabethan style would have originated from the Lord.

A CHALLENGE TO SMITH’S STONE

Early LDS leader Edward Stevenson recorded a statement by Martin Harris regarding a time he put Smith to the test to see if his stone actually had special powers:

After continued translation they [Joseph Smith and Martin Harris] would become weary, and would go down to the river and exercise by throwing stones out on the river, etc. While so doing on one occasion, Martin found a stone very much resembling the one used for translating, and on resuming their labor of translation, Martin put in [its] place the stone that he had found. He said that the Prophet remained silent, unusually and intently gazing in darkness, no traces of the usual sentences appearing. Much surprised, Joseph exclaimed, “Martin! What is the matter? All is as dark as Egypt!” Martin’s countenance betrayed him, and the Prophet asked Martin why he had done so. Martin said, to stop the mouths of fools, who had told him that the Prophet had learned those sentences and was merely repeating them, etc.54

Thus Martin concluded that this was no ordinary stone, and its power only worked for a seer. As the Book of Mormon essay states, others also owned seer stones: “As a young man during the 1820’s, Joseph Smith, like others in his day, used a seer stone to look for lost objects and buried treasure.”55 LDS scholars Michael H. Mackay and Nicholas J. Frederick observed:

Even closer to Joseph Smith, several local teenagers also possessed seer stones that Joseph may have had access to during his teenage years. Three families were known to have seer stones (Chase, Stafford, and Lawrence) and their teenaged sons likely searched for buried treasure with Joseph Smith.56

Joseph’s place as God’s revelator was challenged in 1830 by Hiram Page, one of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon, who also claimed to receive revelations through a stone. To resolve this challenge to his authority, Joseph Smith received a revelation stating that he alone was God’s voice to the church and that messages through Hiram’s stone were not from God.57

. . . thou [Oliver Cowdery] shalt take thy brother, Hiram Page, between him and thee alone, and tell him that those things which he hath written from that stone are not of me and that Satan deceiveth him; For, behold, these things have not been appointed unto him, neither shall anything be appointed unto any of this church contrary to the church covenants.

David Whitmer and several other early Mormons also claimed to own magical seer stones.58 This leaves us wondering how one determined which seer stone was empowered by God and which ones were empowered by evil forces?

The Book of Mormon Translation essay tries to normalize Smith’s use of a seer stone by pointing out that God, in the Bible, used various instruments to communicate His will. But the question remains, is there sufficient evidence that Smith’s stone was a divine instrument for both treasure seeking and translation? If Smith’s stone is such a God-given instrument, why was it hidden in the church vault for over a hundred years and never used by other LDS prophets?

HEBREW OR REFORMED EGYPTIAN?

One curious aspect of the Book of Mormon story is the claim that the plates were written in Reformed Egyptian rather than Hebrew, which would have been the language of the Israelites in 600 BC. President Russell M. Nelson, writing in 1993 as an LDS apostle, stated: “The inscriptions on the plates were written in a Semitic language, using a modified Egyptian type of script.”59

56 Mackay and Frederick, Joseph Smith’s Seer Stones, p. 141.
57 Doctrine and Covenants 28:2,11-12.
At the start of the story Nephi and his brothers journey to Jerusalem to obtain their family genealogy and all of the prophetic writings on the brass plates, which presumably would have been recorded in Hebrew. Nephi explains that “it is wisdom in God that we should obtain these records, that we may preserve unto our children the language of our fathers.”

While the story seems to begin with the Nephites speaking and writing in Hebrew later statements in the book seem to point to the Nephites writing in some form of Egyptian. This results in a very convoluted story of the language used on the plates. The Encyclopedia of Mormonism tries to sort it all out as follows:

Statements in the Book of Mormon have spawned differing views about the language in which the book was originally written. In approximately 600 B.C., Nephi—one of the first Book of Mormon author and one who had spent his youth in Jerusalem—wrote, “I make a record [the small plates of Nephi] in the language of my father, which consists of the learning of the Jews and the language of the Egyptians” (1 Ne. 1:2). One thousand years later, Moroni, the last Nephite prophet, noted concerning the plates of Mormon that “we have written this record . . . in the characters which are called among us the reformed Egyptian, being handed down and altered by us, according to our manner of speech. And if our plates had been sufficiently large we should have written in Hebrew; but the Hebrew hath been altered by us also . . . But the Lord knoweth . . . that none other people knoweth our language” (Morm. 9:32-34). In light of these two passages, it is evident that Nephite record keepers knew Hebrew and something of Egyptian. It is unknown whether Nephi, Mormon, or Moroni wrote Hebrew in modified Egyptian characters or inscribed their plates in both the Egyptian language and Egyptian characters or whether Nephi wrote in one language and Mormon and Moroni, who lived some nine hundred years later, in another. The mention of “characters” called “reformed Egyptian” tends to support the hypothesis of Hebrew in Egyptian script. Although Nephi’s observation (1 Ne. 1:2) is troublesome for that view, the statement is ambiguous and inconclusive for both views.

The article goes on to explain:

Nephite authors seem to have patterned their writing after the plates of brass, a record containing biblical texts composed before 600 B.C. that was in the possession of descendants of Joseph of Egypt (1 Ne. 5:11-16). At least portions of this record were written in Egyptian, since knowledge of “the language of the Egyptians” enabled Lehi, father of Nephi, to “read these engravings” (Mosiah 1:2-4). But whether it was the Egyptian language or Hebrew written in Egyptian script is again not clear. Egyptian was widely used in Lehi’s day, but because poetic writing are skewed in translation, because prophetic writings were generally esteemed as sacred, and because Hebrew was the language of the Israelites in the seventh century B.C., it would have been unusual for the writings of Isaiah and Jeremiah—substantially preserved on the brass plates (1 Ne. 5:13;19:23)—to have been translated from Hebrew into a foreign tongue at this early date. Thus, Hebrew portions written in Hebrew script, Egyptian portions in Egyptian script, and Hebrew portions in Egyptian script are all possibilities. If the brass plates came into being while the Israelites were still in Egypt, then earlier portions (e.g., words of Jeremiah) in Hebrew.

If we look at the Book of Mormon as a nineteenth century production, why would Joseph Smith make up such a confusing story of the language on the plates? Obviously, he couldn’t claim the text was written in Hebrew as it was well known in the 1800s, and translators had been working with Hebrew for centuries. By having the engravings on the plates in an unknown script Smith builds into his story the need for a future seer/translator to use the divinely prepared “interpreters.” It also makes the script beyond testing by an independent translator.

The Anthon Transcript

In 1827 Martin Harris embarked on another effort to test Smith’s claims. He and Smith decided he would go to New York with a sample of the text to seek the opinion of scholars. He met with three different men, Luther Bradish, Samuel L. Mitchill and Charles Anthon. His meeting with Charles Anthon is the best known and most controversial. Harris maintained that Anthon confirmed the legitimacy of the transcript while Anthon later refuted Harris’ account.

Joseph Smith’s account of Martin Harris’ visit with Professor Anthon is given in the Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith 2:62-65:

... I [Joseph Smith] commenced copying the characters off the plates. I copied a considerable number of them, and by means of the Urim and Thummim I translated some of them, ... Mr. Martin Harris came to our place, got the characters which I had drawn off the plates, and started with them to the city of New York. For what took place relative to him and the characters, I refer to his own account. ...

I [Martin Harris] went to the city of New York, and presented the characters which had been translated, with the translation thereof, to Professor Charles Anthon, ... Professor Anthon stated that the translation was correct, more so than any he had before seen translated from the Egyptian. I then showed him those which were not yet translated, and he said that they were Egyptian, Chaldaic, Assyriac, and Arabic; and he said they were true characters. He gave me a certificate, certifying to the people of Palmyra that they were true characters, and that the translation of such of them as had been translated was also correct. ...

In continuing to print the story of Martin’s visit with Professor Anthon in their scriptures the LDS Church is perpetuating the claim that Anthon verified the characters and translation. Notice that Martin claims that Anthon verified that there were “Egyptian, Chaldaic, Assyriac, and Arabic” on the sample of Book of Mormon characters. One wonders why there would be these various scripts on the plates when supposedly Mormon abridged the Nephite records in about 385 AD in “reformed Egyptian”?

Another question that comes to mind is how could Anthon verify the translation if only a seer could decipher the message in the unknown language? While several years later Professor Anthon acknowledged Harris’ visit he insisted that he had not said the “translation was correct”:

New York, Feb. 17, 1834.
Dear Sir—. ... The whole story about having pronounced the Mormonite inscription to be “reformed Egyptian hieroglyphics” is perfectly false. Some years ago, a plain, and apparently simple-hearted farmer, called upon me with a note from Dr. Mitchell of our city, now deceased, requesting me to decipher, if possible, a paper, which the farmer would hand me, ... Upon examining the paper in question, I soon came to the conclusion that it was all a trick, perhaps a hoax. ... This paper was in fact a singular scrawl. It consisted of all kinds of crooked characters disposed in columns, and had evidently been prepared by some person who had before him at the time a book containing various alphabets. Greek and Hebrew letters, crosses and flourishes, Roman letters inverted or placed sideways, were arranged in perpendicular columns, and the whole ended in a rude delineation of a circle divided into various compartments, decked with various strange marks, ... [I] well remember that the paper contained anything else but “Egyptian Hieroglyphics.” ...

Linguists today side with Anthon’s assessment that the document does not represent a real language. Obviously Martin Harris either misrepresented or misunderstood his conversation with Anthon. Yet Joseph Smith presented this sample as a literal copy of the characters on an ancient record—that he, Smith, had successfully translated. For nearly 200 years the LDS Church has pointed to this event as proof of the legitimacy of Smith’s translation, in spite of the fact that the Anthon transcript doesn’t match any known script. It actually contains quite a few English characters and numbers. To illustrate this we have taken various characters from the Anthon transcript and arranged them in a sentence.

Importance of Book of Mormon Plates

While some today try to minimize the importance of the Nephite plates being an actual ancient record, the Book of Mormon itself presents a story of numerous ancient prophets writing on physical plates. According to the story, these records were condensed and protected by Mormon, who in turn, passed the records on to his son Moroni. At the end of the book, Moroni is left to wander the continent and finally to transport these records to the Hill Cumorah in New York. To aid students in their study of the Book of Mormon the LDS Church released a new video this year featuring a re-enactment of Moroni, at approximately 421 AD, burying the plates in the hill where, hundreds of years later, he will appear to Joseph Smith as an angel and lead him to the long lost record.

The enormity of the job of condensing the Nephite and Jaredite records done by Mormon and Moroni is illustrated by LDS scholar John Tvedtnes in his overview of the many plates mentioned in the Book of Mormon:

The Nephites kept a large number of records for the benefit of future generations (Hel. 3:13, 15–16.) The importance of record-keeping is stressed in the story of Nephi, who, before leaving the Old World, obtained the BRASS PLATES from Laban in Jerusalem. (1 Ne. 3; 1 Ne. 4) These plates were apparently handed down in the Nephite royal line, for King Mosiah I had them. (Omni 1:14.)

Arriving in the New World, Nephi prepared two sets of plates. (1 Ne. 19:1–6) The LARGE PLATES OF NEPHI were passed down by the kings to Benjamin, son of Mosiah I. (Omni 1:11; W of M 1:10.)

The SMALL PLATES OF NEPHI came down in a different line. The first part of our present Book of Mormon (1 Nephi through the Words of Mormon) comes from the small plates. The men who wrote on them referred to them as “these plates,” while referring to the large plates held by the kings as the “other plates.”

Amaleki, noting that the plates were almost filled, turned them over to King Benjamin (Omni 1:25), who added them to the “other plates” (W of M 1:10). Thus King Benjamin possessed the plates of brass, as well as all of the plates of Nephi. (Mosiah 1:3–4, 6.) These he passed on to his son, Mosiah II. (Mosiah 1:16; Mosiah 28:11.)

King Mosiah II added to the large plates of Nephi the records of Zeniff and Alma. (Mosiah 25:5–6.) He also came into possession of 24 GOLD PLATES containing the Jaredite history. (Mosiah 28:11–13, 17–20.) He gave all of the plates to Alma II (Mosiah 28:20), and from him they were passed on . . .

Ammaron hid the plates in the hill Shim. (4 Ne. 1:48.) He then chose young Mormon as his successor and instructed him to remove the plates of Nephi from the hill in his 24th year. (Morm. 1:1–4.) At the appropriate time Mormon took the plates. He updated the history on the large plates, then began an abridgement of these on a separate set of plates. (Morm. 2:17–18.)

Later, because of the Lamanite danger, Mormon removed the rest of the plates from the hill Shim. (Morm. 4:23.) He completed his abridgement of the large plates and hid most of the Nephite records in the Hill Cumorah, except for his own abridgement and the small plates of Nephi, which he gave to his son Moroni. (Morm. 6:6; W of M 1:1–7.)

Moroni finished the record of his father on the abridgement. (Morm. 8:1, 13.) Then he wrote a preface to his father’s work, which is the first paragraph of the present-day preface to the Book of Mormon.

Later Moroni found sufficient time to add an abridgement of the 24 gold plates, or Book of Ether (Ether 1:1–5), and even to write some of his own thoughts (Moro. 1:1–4). He then wrote the second paragraph of the preface and hid the plates.

A little over 1,400 years later Moroni turned over the abridged Nephite records to Joseph Smith. Yet, after that monumental effort to gather the records, make an abridgement, transport, and hide the plates, they were not even needed since Smith merely read off the English translation by looking at a rock in his hat. So why preserve the plates for over two thousand years?

For those who suggest that the plates did not need to be literally in Smith’s possession, that he could have viewed them in a vision, one must remember that all of his story demands the presence of literal metal plates. According to Smith the angel showed him the plates in 1823 but made him wait four years before he could physically retrieve the plates from the hill. Joseph’s mother, Lucy, recounted that when he finally brought them home he had to run through the woods carrying the plates in his coat in order to prevent thugs from stealing them. She also told of hiding the plates under the hearth. When Joseph moved away from Manchester, New York, the plates were supposedly hid in a barrel of beans.

68 Pearl of Great Price, Joseph Smith—History 1:59.

69 Anderson, Lucy’s Book, pp. 385-386.

71 Anderson, Lucy’s Book, p. 401.
Joseph Smith gave a detailed description of the plates as measuring “six inches wide and eight inches long, and not quite so thick as common tin. They were filled with engravings, in Egyptian characters, and bound together in a volume as the leaves of a book, with three rings running through the whole. The volume was something near six inches in thickness, a part of which was sealed.”

Martin Harris estimated the weight of the plates at “forty or fifty pounds.” Emma Smith told her son that she “moved them [the covered plates] from place to place on the table, as it was necessary in doing my work.”

When Smith finished his translation he returned the plates to the angel:

But by the wisdom of god, they [the plates] remained safe in my hands, until I had accomplished by them what was required at my hand. When, according to arrangements, the messenger called for them, I delivered them up to him, and he has them in his charge until this day, being the second day of May, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight.

All of the early accounts of Smith being shown the plates by an angel, retrieving them from the hill, showing them to witnesses, hiding them in the woods, storing them on the table, returning them to the angel, etc. would make no sense if there was no physical object, whether real or invented. If the ancient plates did not literally exist Smith’s story is a fabrication.

Mormon’s Abridgment

The title page of the Book of Mormon reads:

An account written by the hand of Mormon upon plates taken from the plates of Nephi . . . Wherefore, it is an abridgment of the record of the people of Nephi, and also of the Lamanites.

Considering the effort needed to make the original gold plates of the Book of Mormon, to engrave them, and then abridge them, one would expect a scribe to be as concise as possible, not wordy. For example, Nephi’s brother, Jacob complained: “I cannot write but a little of my words, because of the difficulty of engraving our words upon plates” (Book of Mormon, Jacob 4:1).

However, lengthy sentences abound in the Book of Mormon. Here is just one example:

And now it came to pass that according to our record, and we know our record to be true, for behold, it was a just man who did keep the record—for he truly did many miracles in the name of Jesus; and there was not any man who could do a miracle in the name of Jesus save he were cleansed every whit from his iniquity—And now it came to pass, if there was no mistake made by this man in the reckoning of our time, the thirty and third year had passed away; And the people began to look with great earnestness for the sign which had been given by the prophet Samuel, the Lamanite, yea, for the time that there should be darkness for the space of three days over the face of the land. (3 Nephi 8:1-3)

One could more easily imagine such long, rambling descriptions coming from someone spontaneously dictating to a scribe (as Joseph evidently did) than from someone painstakingly engraving each word of a long historical record. Since Smith was supposedly translating Mormon’s abridgment of the extensive history of his people, such wordy sentences become problematic.

One of the clues that Joseph Smith was not translating an ancient record but orally telling a story is his oft used phrase “in other words.” For example, Mosiah 7:27 reads: “he should take upon him the image of man, and it should be the image after which man was created in the beginning; or in other words, he said that man was created after the image of God. . . .” The combination “in other words” is used once by Smith in the 1830 Preface to the Book of Mormon, twelve times in the text, three times in the Doctrine and Covenants, and three times in his new Bible translation. Yet the phrase does not appear in the KJV Bible. It appears to be a staple in Smith’s storytelling, but hardly something one would expect in an abridged historical record.

DID THE WITNESSES SEE PHYSICAL PLATES?

In the official statement at the front of the Book of Mormon, Martin Harris, Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer declared:

And we also testify that we have seen the engravings which are upon the plates; and they have been shewn unto us by the power of God, and not of man. . . . an Angel of God came down from heaven, and he brought and laid before our eyes, that we beheld and saw the plates, and the engravings thereon; and we know that it is by the grace of God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ, that we beheld and bear record that these things are true.

---

72 Smith, History of the Church, vol. 4, p. 537
74 Saints Herald, (October 1, 1879).
The testimony of the three witnesses leaves a person with the impression that they all saw the angel and the gold plates at the same time; however, such was not the case. In his History of the Church, Joseph Smith admitted that Martin Harris was not with David Whitmer and Oliver Cowdery when they saw the plates. Joseph started by having the three witnesses pray in an effort to obtain a view of the plates, but to no avail. Finally:

Upon this, our second failure, Martin Harris proposed that he should withdraw himself from us, believing, as he expressed himself, that his presence was the cause of our not obtaining what we wished for. He accordingly withdrew from us, and we knelt down again, . . . presently we beheld a light above us in the air, of exceeding brightness; and behold, an angel stood before us. In his hands he held the plates . . .

I [Joseph Smith] now left David and Oliver, and went in pursuit of Martin Harris, . . . We accordingly joined in prayer, and ultimately obtained our desires, for before we had yet finished, the same vision was opened to our view, at least it was again opened to me, whilst at the same moment, Martin Harris cried out, apparently in an ecstasy of joy, "'Tis enough; 'tis enough; mine eyes have beheld; mine eyes have beheld;" . . .

Notice that the emphasis is on a miraculous event, not a normal, physical examination of the object. If the covered plates had been physically laying on the table for a couple of months during the translation, why weren’t they simply uncovered? Why would the witnesses need to go out into the woods to pray? Why would an angel need to appear in a vision to show them the plates? Some of the statements by the witnesses suggest a physical viewing of the plates. But these accounts need to be compared with their other statements that clearly tell of a vision experience.

John H. Gilbert, the printer who set the type for the Book of Mormon, recounted a conversation he had with Martin Harris:

> I said to him, —“Martin, did you see those plates with your naked eyes?” Martin looked down for an instant, raised his eyes up, and said, “No, I saw them with a spiritual eye.”

Early Mormon convert Stephen Burnett became disillusioned with Joseph’s claims when in 1838 he heard Martin Harris say he had not physically seen the plates:

I have reflected long and deliberately upon the history of this church & weighed the evidence for & against it—loth to give it up—but when I came to hear Martin Harris state in a public congregation that he never saw the plates with his natural eyes only in vision or imagination, neither Oliver [Cowdery] nor David [Whitmer] & also that the eight witnesses never saw them & hesitated to sign that instrument for that reason, but were persuaded to do it, the last pedestal gave way, in my view our foundations was sapped & the entire superstructure fell a heap of ruins, I therefore three week since in the Stone Chapel gave a full history of the church since I became acquainted with it, the false preaching & prophecying etc. of Joseph together with the reasons why I took the course which I was resolved to do, and renounced the Book of Mormon with the whole scene of lying and deception practiced by J. S [Joseph Smith] & S. R [Sidney Rigdon] in this church . . .

I was followed by W. Parish Luke Johnson & John Boynton all of who concurred with me, after we were done speaking M Harris arose & said he was sorry for any man who rejected the Book of Mormon for he knew it was true, he said he had hefted the plates repeatedly in a box with only a tablecloth or a handkerchief over them, but he never saw them only as he saw a city through a mountain. And said that he never should have told that the testimony of the eight witnesses was false, if it had not been picked out of [h]im but should have let it passed as it was . . .

If it doesn’t require faith to see the table in the room, why would it take faith to see metal plates laying on the table? Joseph could have simply removed the cloth and displayed the artifact.

The Parchment of John

Towards the end of the gospel of John in the New Testament is a discussion between the resurrected Christ and Peter regarding John’s future duties. Jesus asked Peter: “If I will that he [John] tarry till I come, what is that to thee?” (John 21:21-23). This resulted in confusion among the early Christians whether or not John was promised to remain on earth until Christ’s return.

However, for Mormons this was settled in the Book of Mormon when the ancient disciples in America were visited by the resurrected Christ and were given a similar... promised. Jesus instructed three of the Nephite disciples, “Behold, I know your thoughts, and ye have desired the thing which John, my beloved, who was with me in my ministry, before that I was lifted up by the Jews, desired of me. . . . for ye shall never taste of death; but ye shall live to behold all the doings of the Father . . . And ye shall never endure the pains of death” (3 Nephi 28:6-8). The narrative goes on to tell that these three men, along with John, “will be among the Gentiles, and the Gentiles shall know them not” (3 Nephi 28:27).

Possibly working on this section of the Book of Mormon brought the subject to Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery’s attention. At any rate, in 1829 they had a discussion on the possibility that Jesus, in John 21:21-23, promised John he would live until Christ returned. As a result, Joseph Smith claimed to receive a revelation of a “parchment” written and hidden by John, disciple of Jesus.82

This parchment, presumably written in Greek, promised John that he would live until Christ’s return. This record was hidden somewhere and later revealed to Smith. Smith’s 1829 translation of the text was published in the Book of Commandments (1833) but later expanded in the 1835 edition of the Doctrine and Covenants. If Joseph’s 1833 printed translation was actually from an ancient record written by John, why would he later expand it, adding words throughout the text? Below is the 1835 version of the revelation.

1835 Doctrine and Covenants, Section 33
(Section 7 in current editions).

[With words added in 1835 in bold type.]

1 And the Lord said unto me, John, my beloved, what desirest thou? For ye shall ask, what you will, it shall be granted unto you. And I said unto him, Lord, give unto me power over death, that I may live and bring souls unto thee. And the Lord said unto me, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, because thou desiredst this thou shalt tarry until I come in my glory, and shalt prophesy before nations, kindreds, tongues and people.

2 And for this cause the Lord said unto Peter, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? For he desiredst of me that he might bring souls unto me; but thou desiredst that thou might speedily come unto me in my kingdom. I say unto thee, Peter, this was a good desire, but my beloved has desired that he might do more, or a greater work, yet among men than what he has before done; yea, he has undertaken a greater work; therefore, I will make him as flaming fire and a ministering angel: he shall minister for those who shall be heirs of salvation who dwell on the earth; and I will make thee to minister for him and for thy brother James: and unto you three I will give this power and the keys of this ministry until I come.

3 Verily I say unto you, ye shall both have according to your desires, for ye both joy in that which ye have desired.

It seems that Smith felt free to revise his translations to fit his current ideas. Notice that verse 2 is expanded to include the concept of Peter, James and John holding the keys of power, bolstering his concept of priesthood that was brought into the church sometime after its founding in 1830.83 How are we to take Smith’s claim of “translating” ancient documents seriously if he is able to go back and add to and revise them as his theology expands?

JOSEPH’S BIBLE REVISION

In the LDS Articles of Faith Joseph Smith wrote “We believe the Bible to be the word of God as far as it is translated correctly; we also believe the Book of Mormon to be the word of God.”84 Thus the Book of Mormon is accepted as reliable while the Bible is approached with skepticism. In fact, Joseph’s new book of scripture specifically undermines the Bible by claiming that “many parts which are plain and most precious; and also many covenants” have been removed.85

Soon after finishing the Book of Mormon, Joseph Smith set out to remedy the problem of a corrupted Bible by producing his own version, known as the Joseph Smith Translation (JST) and the Inspired Version. Not knowing any biblical languages or having access to any ancient manuscripts, Smith would produce his Bible through revelation.

Between the years 1830 and 1833 Smith and his scribes went through the Bible noting places to be changed, plus adding new verses to the text. The importance of the work can be seen by the many revelations regarding the revision in the Doctrine and Covenants.86 It wasn’t published until 1867, long after Smith’s death, by the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, now known as the Community of Christ.87

84 “The Articles of Faith” number 8, Joseph Smith, Pearl of Great Price.

Some of the changes were Smith’s attempt to make a more logical reading, some were simply insertions by Smith, other changes were issues discussed in Bible commentaries. Joseph Smith’s extensive use of Adam Clarke’s Bible Commentary has recently been discussed in the new book, Producing Ancient Scripture. Thomas A. Wayment and Haley Wilson Lemmon observed:

The direct parallels between Adam Clarke’s commentary on the Bible and Joseph Smith’s revision of the Bible are simply too numerous and too close to explain as mere coincidence or happenstance. Parallels between the two texts number into the hundreds . . .

As with the Book of Mormon, Smith imported aspects of New Testament Christianity into his revision of the Old Testament. For instance, in his revision of Genesis, as printed by the Community of Christ, he indicates that Adam was baptized in the name of Jesus Christ and received the Holy Ghost:

And he called upon our father Adam, by his own voice, saying, I am God; . . . If thou wilt, turn unto me and hearken unto my voice, and believe, and repent of all thy transgressions, and be baptized, even in water, in the name of mine Only Begotten Son, who is full of grace and truth, which is Jesus Christ, the only name which shall be given under heaven, whereby salvation shall come unto the children of men; and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost, asking all things in his name, and whatsoever ye shall ask it shall be given you . . .

This same passage is printed in the LDS Pearl of Great Price, Book of Moses 6:51-52. While Enoch receives only passing mention in the Bible, Smith added pages to Genesis, chapters 6 and 7, about Enoch and his city. He also added over 800 words to Genesis, chapter 50, including a prophecy about himself. In 1979 the LDS Church printed their own Bible, using the KJV, and added their own cross-references and extracts from the Joseph Smith Translation. For example, at the back of their Bible, Genesis 50:33 of Joseph Smith’s revision reads:

And that seer will I bless, and they that seek to destroy him shall be confounded; for this promise I give unto you; for I will remember you from generation to generation; and his name shall be called Joseph, and it shall be after the name of his father.

This was obviously intended to be a reference to Joseph Smith, whose father was also named Joseph. Furthermore, Genesis 14 was expanded to enlarge the role of Melchizedek and his priesthood.

Likewise, Isaiah received numerous corrections, with chapter 29 being greatly expanded. This was done so that the passage about a sealed book could be reinterpreted as a prophecy about the Book of Mormon. Interestingly, his revision of Isaiah still retains the verses declaring that there is only one God, such as Isaiah 43:10-11, which contrasts with Smith’s later teachings on a multitude of Gods.

The Book of Mormon states that the Old Testament went “from the Jews in purity unto the Gentiles,” but was then changed after the time of the apostles by “that great and abominable church.” With the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls it is now clear that Smith’s additions to the Old Testament are not supported by ancient manuscripts. Also Christianity was not taught in the Old Testament.

Smith also added many words to the New Testament, even rewriting the well-known opening of the gospel of John. John 1:1 states:

In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.

However, Joseph Smith changed it to read:

In the beginning was the gospel preached through the Son. And the gospel was the word, and the word was with the Son, and the Son was with God, and the Son was God. (JST, John 1:1)

Needless to say, there is no manuscript evidence for Smith’s additions.

94 Walters, Use of the Old Testament.

In examining the Sermon on the Mount we find the Book of Mormon version follows Matthew’s account in the KJV. But the Joseph Smith Bible revision is longer, which leads to the question: Which is the accurate version?

Matthew 7:6 (KJV Bible)

6 Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you.

3 Nephi 14:6

6 Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you.

JST Matthew 7:10-11

10 And the mysteries of the kingdom ye shall keep within yourselves; for it is not meet to give that which is holy unto the dogs; neither cast ye your pearls unto swine, lest they trample them under their feet.

11 For the world cannot receive that which ye, yourselves, are not able to bear; wherefore ye shall not give your pearls unto them, lest they turn again and rend you.

One change he made in Revelation 1:6 was to reinforce the doctrine of one God. In the KJV it says that we are made “kings and priests unto God and his Father.” To eliminate any confusion that two gods are meant, Smith dropped the word “and,” so that it read “God, his Father.” However, preaching in 1844, Smith completely ignored his own revision, and used the KJV reading “God and his father” to bolster his new doctrine that there was a God above our Heavenly Father.96 This is just one of many instances of Smith’s evolving view of the godhead.

Curiously, Smith seemed to ignore his revision once it was finished, choosing instead to quote from the KJV or give a new rendering in his sermons. Writing in 1963, LDS writer Merrill Y. Van Wagoner explained:

> Whenever the prophet quoted from the Bible he either retained the words of the King James version or else flatly declared it to be wrong and then gave a rendering of the passage which differed from it. He seems to take no account of his changes in the Inspired Revision, which of course was not printed.97

One example of this is seen in his various renditions of Malachi 4:1-6. Recounting the visitation by the angel Moroni during his teenage years Joseph told how Moroni quoted from these verses:

> . . . he [Moroni] quoted also the fourth or last chapter of [Malachi] the same prophecy, though with a little variation from the way it reads in our Bibles. Instead of quoting the first verse as it reads in our books, he quoted it thus: For behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly shall burn as stubble, for they that come shall burn them, saith the Lord of Hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch.

And again, he quoted the fifth verse thus: Behold, I will reveal unto you the Priesthood, by the hand of Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord.

He also quoted the next verse differently: And he shall plant in the hearts of the children the promises made to the fathers, and the hearts of the children shall turn to their fathers. If it were not so, the whole earth would be utterly wasted at his coming.98

Curiously, when Christ appears in the New World and quotes Malachi it is slightly different from Moroni’s quote to Smith:

> Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord; And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse. (3 Nephi 25: 5-6)

However, when Smith was working on his Inspired Revision, he marked the book of Malachi as “correct.” But this is not the end of the confusion. Joseph Smith, preaching on January 24, 1844, gave yet another rendering of Malachi 4:5-6. Although he followed the wording of the King James Version, he claimed that the word “turn” should be translated “bind” or “seal”—a rendering which he did not use in either the Book of Mormon or the Inspired Version.99

Mormons often object to the form of our current biblical canon, maintaining that early Christian councils decided which books were to be canonized and thus voted out many books that should have been included in the Bible. Interestingly, Smith did not restore any of these “lost” writings.100 In fact, he even eliminated the Song of Solomon from his Bible.

99 History of the Church, vol. 6, pp. 183-184. For more on Smith’s Bible revisions, see Jerald and Sandra Tanner, Mormon Scriptures and the Bible (Salt Lake City: Utah Lighthouse Ministry, 1970).

When the LDS Church printed its own edition of the King James Bible the leaders certainly could have made their own compilation of books to be included in the canon. But they left it the same. While they did not make any alterations to the actual text, they did introduce new chapter headings and footnotes which cross-referenced their other books of scripture.

Included at the back of the official LDS Bible (KJV) are numerous quotes from the Joseph Smith Bible revision. The Pearl of Great Price includes Smith’s revision of Genesis and extracts from Matthew 23-24. If these portions of his revision are considered divinely given, then why not use all that Smith had produced, even if the project wasn’t complete? Also, why not simply include his revisions in the biblical text, where they supposedly belong? If the KJV really was corrupt, wouldn’t this be the time to present it in its corrected state?

According to Joseph, the Lord wanted him to finish and publish the revised Bible during his lifetime.101 Since that never happened, one wonders why subsequent LDS prophets have never completed the task? It is claimed that they hold the same gifts and callings that Joseph Smith did. Yet their priorities still don’t seem to include restoring the Bible to its original form.

Conclusion

When Christians refer to various Bible translations they are generally referring to such items as the King James Version (KJV), the New American Standard Bible (NASB); the New International Version (NIV); or the English Standard Version (ESV), among others. These all contain the same books, translated from the best ancient manuscripts available at the time. Anyone who takes the time to learn the biblical languages (Hebrew, Aramaic and Greek) would be able to do their own translation of these manuscripts. However, no such undertaking is possible with Joseph Smith’s work. There are no ancient manuscripts for the Book of Mormon or the Joseph Smith Translation (JST) that could be translated by an independent linguist. Scholars now admit that Smith did not translate anything in the normal sense of the word. It appears that Joseph’s own imagination, coupled with Bible commentaries and literature of the day provided the inspiration for his scriptures.

Extracts from Letters and Emails

June 2020: I have been a student of yours since the 1970’s when I was in college. I was given a copy of Mormonism: Shadow or Reality. I rejoiced as my best friend growing up was LDS as was my aunt … I became a born again Christian 8/23/71. I knew Mormonism was false but now I had a tool that helped decipher the truth!!! I have been a student of Mormonism, sharing the true good news with Mormons, friends and relatives of LDS and educating Christians about Mormonism. (I have relatives in SLC!) Thank You for all the incredible work you have done and continue to do until Jesus returns!

July 2020: Thanks for your extensive research over the years which has opened my mind to the truth of the LDS church. I joined the LDS church at the age of 22, here in [the UK], and served in many positions, even as a bishop for seven years; I am now 69. If I had known then what I know now, through your books and articles, I would never have given my money, service and years of time, to the LDS religion. I feel betrayed, for I had believed everything taught by the church and it’s leaders; now I know better and am struggling to settle my mind to seeking truth through the Holy Bible, and that only. I am not sure where I go from here, but I am sure I will never again advance the cause of the Joseph Smith deceit.

July 2020: My wife and I just finished “Mormonism shadow or reality” and loved the work you guys did and are doing.

July 2020: Issue #134 [Salt Lake City Messenger], June 2020 was excellent, on first vision. I have read and re-read it. I am constantly amazed at Mormonism. Keep up the good work.

July 2020: Just a note to express how much I appreciated your excellent interview with James Walker. I just finished Part I [https://www.watchman.org/PodcastSandraTanner.htm] and am looking forward to Part II.

I also want to thank you for the last “Messenger” It was outstanding. I couldn’t believe how many issues you have produced. Wow! I still remember when I first visited you and Gerald.

You had your little printing press in your garage. I’ll never forget how nice Gerald was to me.

July 2020: Although my final destination after leaving my parent’s religion appears to be atheism, I have great respect for the Tanners and what they have done. They have altered society a small way, and that is more than the majority of us will ever do. Thanks for your work.

September 2020: Words can’t express how fundamental you are to Mormonism. I have been wrong about you and your husband my entire life. Like many that come to you for answers I have been in my own faith crisis since last April. My eyes have been opened. I can honestly admit I know more about mormonism in the last year and a half than my 40 years in the church. Thank you for all that you and your husband have done. My wife and children as well. Your efforts to show the spotlight of truth are forever appreciated.
September 2020: I called a few weeks ago and talked with Sandra about some research I was doing … She suggested a few items, but when the package arrived, there were all kinds of additional materials related specifically to my area of research with my order. She took the time to dig through news letters from years ago. I was overwhelmed. Thank you so much. I can’t tell you how much that means to me.

October 2020: I had a coworker tell me there was a South Park cartoon about Mormons where JS was shown translating the gold plates by sticking his head in a hat with “the” rock in it. I said they have the cartoon wrong, Joe didn’t do it that way. I told him I would prove him wrong. Holy smokes, a little delving into the internet and my world shattered. What else was kept from us good little followers?

I found videos made by Sandra Tanner, and she told me the truth and opened my teary eyes even wider. I had home teachers come by a few times to dissuade my journey. They couldn’t answer my questions or told me to go to the temple and pray about these things while sitting in the C room. All I needed to do was reread the B of M and all my questions would be answered. I am here to say that I finally left the foggy world of LDS and was born again 2 years ago. The greatest part of this adventure is the man that I married after divorcing my eternal partner was basically agnostic most his life, found Jesus and was baptized. I thank Sandra and Gerald for all their research and perseverance…. What a glorious ending to this frightful journey!

February 2021: I’m sad to say this is a letter of apology. I used to be a Mormon. I went on a mission in ‘99. Was out for a year and got sick. Heart problems, runs in the family. While I was out there we as missionaries talked about “The Tanners” quite a bit. I’m sad to say none of it was truth. There was a time that I even thought that somehow, even though it’s not doctrine, that you were part of the 1/3 of the host of heaven. I’m sorry I helped in spreading lies about you and I thought you were such an evil person. I have heard so many interviews and her husband have done to share the truthful information about the LDS Church history is very much appreciate it. I truly enjoyed listening to Sandra’s recent interview on the Mormon Stories and the Netflix show “Murder among the Mormons.”

March 2021: Please let Sandra Tanner know that the work she and her husband have done to share the truthful information about the LDS church history is very much appreciate it. I truly enjoyed listening to Sandra’s recent interview on the Mormon Stories and the Netflix show “Murder among the Mormons.”

March 21: Thanks for all your work Sandra. Left Mormonism in 2017 at age 39. My family of 6 is so much healthier. Sometimes I admire or even envy your hope in God that you mention on Mormon Stories. I live in the most non religious place in the US …

March 2021: Thank you for the excellent YouTube interviews and work you do! You’ve played a key role in converting a loved one and helping her to understand that Jesus already paid the price for our sins and to follow his teachings. My wife was a 5th generation LDS and now she’s a born again Christian, a follower of Jesus and we worship the one and only God. We are now active members of [a church in New Mexico].

March 2021: Loved your Mormon stories podcasts. I am not a Christian or a Mormon, but your story was so fascinating and inspiring!

March 2021: Yes, I have to thank you for all your work exposing Mormonism. Your website was a great resource when I was having my Mormon faith crisis in the mid-2000’s. I just watched your interview with John Dehlin and I wanted to support you. Thank you.

March 2021: I would like to commend you for your work refuting the lies of Mormonism. I found out about your organization after watching “Murder Among the Mormons.” Thank you or contributing to that mini-series, and thank you for sharing Christ’s truth where you currently are located…. Thank you, God bless, and I will look forward to reading more in the future.

April 2021: Thank you for everything! I just listened to the John Dehlin episode [on Mark Hofmann—https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=42X-OD6Aprc&t=9223s] ... my first Mormon Stories listening ever…..Wonderful information from your insight on the Netflix documentary [Murder Among the Mormons]! Thank you for everything, truly…..God Bless you and your late husband.

Your donations make this newsletter possible!
April 2021: Thank you Sandra, God has used you in unmeasurable ways. One of those ways occurred a few years ago when you visited personally with our daughter and her then Mormon boyfriend. Your conversation and speaking God’s truth changed our daughter’s direction. Shortly after your visit, they separated and we have God to thank for using you to help our daughter see the Mormonism deception. God bless your God honoring ministry.

April 2021: I served a mission 20 years ago in Southern California. I received my first copy of this book [Mormonism—Shadow or Reality?] in Orange California at the Ex mormons for Jesus shop. I donated 20 dollars in an act of hubris. They gifted me this book. My father destroyed the book before I could read it after I returned home. Now my own family of 5 have removed our names from the church. I am excited to finally read this book.

April 2021: Thank you so much for your research and your ministry. I have been meeting regularly with the missionaries to share the Christian gospel with them for more than five years now, and I always feel well prepared because of all the hard work you have done. God bless you!

April 2021: Thank you so much for your decades of research and the promotion thereof. …My brother and I left Mormonism years ago—and wallowed in the confusion for years. We, however complicated the journey was, could not shake the conviction that Jesus was the Savior. However, what does that mean? What does that even look like, esp. after such betrayal and trauma in basically the only religious experience we had.

Studying that out in our minds (and our hearts) took time—but thanks, in part, to your consistent criticism of Mormon history without the embrace of the so-called “higher criticism” …we were able to (responsibly) see how, contrary to the impressions of many voices out there, the BOM and the Bible are qualitatively different! Essentially distinct! …You have been a consistent voice distinguishing these things. Thank you so much for that.

My brother and I are finally, years later, looking forward to joining real Christianity for the first time. We are scheduled to be baptized … on May 16th.

It was a long and painful transition. But receiving Peace with God through the person of Jesus Christ, the One True God, the real historical first-century Rabbi—and HIS life, His teachings, His work, His death on the Cross, His Resurrection—and His Kingdom; THAT is what is the source and end of our hope going forward. With that in my mind and heart—all the pain and confusion of Mormonism seems very small, indeed.

April 2021: I have spent the last two years of deconstructing my beliefs in the LDS church. Although I can finally identify this as liberating, I am left with some confusion. Most of my Post LDS friends have come to a place of atheism that I just can’t embrace. I hope it isn’t wishful thinking, but I still feel a connection to something beyond myself especially during meditation. I’ve heard you talk on several podcasts and I sense you still have a deep connection to Christ. I am now reading the New Testament but I have to admit, without using my LDS tools, I have trouble understanding it.

May 2021: Thank you, Sandra Tanner, for your and Jerald’s life’s work in bringing the truth, the real truth about the Mormon Church to the world. You are the “Davids” against the Goliath.

That was my son who came to your store today, Monday (or yesterday if your are reading this on Tuesday). He called me to tell me about it. He was genuine in his praise and appreciation expressed to you. You probably weren’t sure what to think but he was so thrilled to meet you in person and express his admiration to you for all you have done in the face of great opposition and, at times, disrespect and threats. Please know that there are so many of us former Mormons who so cherish your information and fortitude. You and Jerald are our real life heroes!

A friend of mine, ______, left the church over 35 years ago and your invaluable information (many mimeographed pamphlets and booklets) helped keep her solid when active family members put her through the wringer. She still has all the information stacked 3 feet in her office.

I was a convert of 44 years and when I came to my senses in 2016 and had my name taken off the records of the church, it was a real free-fall. Watching you on Mormon Stories was so helpful in keeping my senses together since I still live in the ward and neighborhood of 23 years—where I taught Gospel Doctrine, RS Pres; and all that stuff—it was a real shock to those around me and I became a pariah for a while. But I made non-mormon friends and a whole new world opened up to me. My son, who had his name taken off the records of the church over 10 years ago never dreamed his mother would ever “wake-up” and come out of the Mormon stupor. I told him about you and the interview on Mormon Stories and he watched it and also watched the one following up on The Mormon Murders. Just know there are many of us out there who truly admire you and are encouraged by your bravery, that many are out doing what they can, as John Dehlin reports. …You have erected the Standard of Truth. Our prayers and blessings to you always~

May 2021: I found UTLM online way back in 1997 and am so grateful that you had the will to go online at such an early time in internet history, and also that UTLM provided free mailed newsletters. The newsletters and my purchase of the huge book “Mormonism—Shadow or Reality” were instrumental in my leaving the church. It has taken all these years for me to come to Christianity, and now I am an influencer for Christ in the lives of my friends and family. Thank you, Tanners, for playing such a huge role in my life. God bless you and your continued work.
How Many LDS Converts Are Children?

By Eric Johnson
Mormonism Research Ministry Update
April 2021

We reported in the March 2021 Mormonism Research about how the LDS Church baptismal convert numbers have continued to decline during the past three decades. Whereas the church was growing by more than 4% in the late 1980s, the rate has gone down to less than 1.5% during each of the past five years.

Church leaders announce the numbers every April at general conference, with the main emphasis given to the baptismal convert number. While the 2020 numbers won’t be announced until Saturday, April 4, 2021, we are speculating that the number of converts in 2020 will be fewer than 200,000, which would be the lowest number in many decades. Of course, the restrictions on missionaries being able to proselytize most of the year due to COVID-19 is the reason there will be a decline from the previous year.

In a website article titled “A Closer look at the Declining Growth of the LDS Church since 1990” (mrm.org/declining-growth), we explained the following:

Although the church does not provide the exact number, those children who are baptized at the age of 9 or older are counted as “convert baptisms” for that year. Most people wrongly assume that “converts” refer to those who came into the church as adults, mainly through missionary activity, yet these children are mostly belonging to parents who are church members. Does it make sense that a pre-teen or teen from an LDS family should be considered a “convert”? Just how many “converts” each year come from these baptisms ages 9-17? And is this a convenient way to pad the “convert” numbers?

A returned missionary friend read this article and provided me with additional first-hand information:

I was on my mission in Utah during 1991-93. The Salt Lake City mission baptized around 300 converts a month. However, about half were 9 to 17-year olds. Many of us missionaries would get a list from the ward clerk called the bishops’ action list. It provided the names of those in the ward boundaries who had been blessed but were not baptized. We wouldn’t touch them while they were eight but when they turned nine we knocked on their families’ doors. We were able to baptize many of these 9, 10, and 11 year olds. I’m sure to this day that missionaries in heavily populated LDS areas baptize children over eight, fluffing the convert baptisms for the church (Personal email to me, 2/17/2021).

According to this account, half of the converts in the Salt Lake City mission in the early 1990s were ages 9 to 17. To get preteens/teens into an LDS baptismal font would not be difficult. Multiplied by many different missions throughout highly LDS states such as Utah, Idaho, Arizona, and California, how many tens of thousands of Mormon converts must come from this age group? By increasing the numbers by 20, 30, or even 40 percent by employing such a practice (and having to use children to do so) dulls the luster of the church’s once impressive convert numbers.

We must ask why there was not a concerted effort to baptize the 8-year-olds in the church. Might there be an ulterior motive in letting these children go unbaptized until at least the age of 9? As my friend had speculated, it would not be surprising if the church leaders continue to follow this questionable practice today to boost the convert numbers, which is the church’s major PR landmark!

My friend also explained:

Though my mother was LDS and I was blessed in the church—I wasn’t baptized until I was 10. It wasn’t until my mission in the early 90s that I learned that I was identified as a convert. Unfortunately, there were times that my fellow missionaries or pioneer heritage members would make me feel that my family was less than theirs because they were baptized as children of record and I was a convert.

In essence, then, these church leaders were willing to allow those children to remain unbaptized until at least the age of 9 while opening them up to ridicule by their LDS peers once they were baptized as “converts.” And what if the child had been hit by a car at, say, the age of 8 and a half? Where would this soul have been destined? Certainly not the celestial kingdom. In the words of Seventy Royden G. Derrick, “Baptism is the gateway to the celestial kingdom” (Temples in the Last Days, x).

If this is the case, could we not conclude that if the age of eight is the “age of accountability” (as it is in the LDS Church), that the child’s eternal destiny is put at risk for the sake of upping the church’s convert numbers? Does this seem like a loving policy? Is this what Jesus would do?

2023 is shaping up to be a monumental year for Utah Lighthouse Ministry. First, after much prayer, I am announcing my retirement effective March 1, 2023. While my health is good, at 82 I realize my body is getting older and slower. Second, we have sold the property and will be closing the bookstore and selling all of our inventory in February. As we sell the various titles we will not be restocking them, but we will post our research on our web site, utlm.org. Thus we will no longer have a physical office or bookstore as of March 1st. We will be donating all of the Tanner research files to the University of Utah Library, Special Collections Department. The bulk of the ministry’s remaining assets and finances will be divided up among several non-profits, with a portion set aside to maintain the UTLM website.

We send our deepest thanks and appreciation to all our friends who have supported our research over the decades. We couldn’t have done it without you.

Dr. Huggins wrote: I am grateful to the publisher, Signature Books, for granting permission to include an excerpt from the book in this issue of the newsletter. The one we have chosen tells the story of the absurdly comical, cloak-and-dagger attempt on the part of the LDS Church Historian’s Department to refute the Tanners in an anonymously written and clandestinely distributed booklet entitled Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s Distorted View of Mormonism: A Response to Mormonism: Shadow or Reality? [1977] The Church ended up with egg on its face after the Tanners figured out in only a few weeks not only who had written it (the late Mormon historian D. Michael Quinn, 1944-2021) but also where it came from, i.e., the LDS Church Historian’s Department. With that introduction, I hope you will enjoy the story of “Dr. Clandestine.”

Lighthouse — Chapter 12: Dr. Clandestine.

Wilfrid Clark, an employee of Salt Lake City’s venerable Sam Weller’s Zion Bookstore, was driving down Redwood Road, a north–south street lined with dilapidated industrial buildings running the length of the city. Locals knew it as something of a rough dividing line between the city’s blue-collar westside and the vast salty wastes to the west. It was December 1977 and there was little hope for a white Christmas. The weather was overcast and dreary, with temperatures stuck in the low 40s. As he drove, Clark kept his eye out for an address given to him by his boss, Sam Weller. Clark spotted the building, turned off the road in front of a non-descript self-storage company, and began searching. He was hunting for a numbered door that matched the key he held—the key that had mysteriously arrived with instructions in an anonymous letter sent to Weller.

Clark found the door, turned the key, and stepped inside. The light outside revealed the room’s contents: a pile of boxes. The bookseller dutifully loaded them into his vehicle and drove back to Zion Bookstore. They opened the boxes and found 1,800 copies of a booklet, Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s Distorted View of Mormonism: A Response to Mormonism: Shadow or Reality? The booklet listed Salt Lake City as its printing location and its author as “a Latter-day Saint Historian.” A note on the inside cover stressed that the booklet “has not been copyrighted, so that it can be reproduced and distributed freely by others, if they feel that the contents have value.”

Five days before Christmas, the sky cleared and the temperature plummeted to near zero, and Weller put the anonymous booklets on display. It was the same day that, according to one student who witnessed it, LDS Church Historian Leonard J. Arrington was seen distributing copies of the booklet at BYU.1

Before the New Year, the tract had made its way to other places as well, such as Bloomington, Minnesota, where the mission president gave a copy to Jack Hallman, who read it and then wrote to the Tanners asking if they knew about it.2 The mission president would say only that a friend had sent it to him, but refused to identify the friend. Hallman said that, “from what he told me, that ‘friend’ was probably the Church Historian’s Office in Salt Lake.”³

1 Jerald and Sandra Tanner, Answering Dr. Clandestine, enlarged ed. (Salt Lake City: Modern Microfilm, 1978), 5. Arrington was the first academically credentialed person to be set apart as official LDS Church Historian. Prior to Arrington, the post was filled by LDS general authorities, as it is today.

2 Jack Hallman to Jerald and Sandra Tanner, Jan. 7, 1978, 1, in Tanner and Tanner, Papers. In his letter Hallman says that he had been given the booklet “a little over a week ago.”

3 Jack Hallman to Jerald Tanner, Jan. 24, 1977, 1, Tanner and Tanner, Papers.
The Tanners were naturally curious to discover who wrote the pamphlet. To find out, they first asked Weller where he sent the payment for the booklets. Weller told them that instead of paying, he was asked to reprint the pamphlet with any profits. When the Tanners asked to see the original anonymous letter, Weller declined.

No one in the burgeoning Mormon historian community admitted to knowing anything about Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s Distorted View of Mormonism. Arrington claimed he was in the dark until it mysteriously appeared. However, there had been rumors of a forthcoming response to their work for more than a year. The 1970s were a unique era in Mormon historiography. The once-closed LDS Church archives had become more accessible—not to everyone, and certainly not to Jerald and Sandra Tanner. But certain professional historians and favored graduate students could call at the archives in the east wing of the new Church Office Building on North Temple Street and ask to see documents long inaccessible. It was not a free for all; some collections remained restricted, and historians employed by the church had more access than outsiders. But it seemed to represent a positive shift in how the LDS Church approached and handled its history, and more people, especially students, were getting involved. But it was all still very fragile and tenuous.

A senior project by Richard Steven Marshall, a student at the University of Utah, submitted the previous May, inadvertently shed some light on the booklet. Marshall’s paper, “The New Mormon History,” included several interviews with Mormon historians and others (including the Tanners) as part of the project. Marshall interviewed Reed C. Durham Jr., a historian and former director of the University of Utah Institute of Religion:

> [Durham] said that due to the large number of letters the Church Historian’s Office is receiving asking for answers to the things the Tanners have published, a certain scholar (name deliberately withheld) was appointed to write a general answer to the Tanners including advice on how to read anti-Mormon literature. This unnamed person solicited the help of Reed Durham on the project. The work is finished but its publication is delayed, according to what Leonard Arrington told Durham, because they can not decide how or where to publish it. Because the article is an open and honest approach to the problem, although it by no means answers all of the questions raised by the Tanners, it will be published anonymously, to avoid any difficulties which could result were such an article connected with an official Church agency.

Jerald found the possibility of a committee of Mormon scholars shooting at him from the shadows of anonymity under the pretense of a letter written by a single person disconcerting because of the level of deception involved. “Inasmuch as we are being attacked from ambush,” Jerald wrote, “we would like to know if we are up against one individual or a team of well-trained marksmen.” Jerald used the word ambush to intentionally mirror the words of Mormon historian B. H. Roberts, who had once insisted that engagement in debate “would certainly require that the acceptance of the challenge should be otherwise than from ambush . . . I am entitled to know the name of my opponent that I may judge somewhat of his character and standing.”

Jerald vaguely recalled a conversation he had had a year prior during which he learned about a potential response. He could not remember all the details, including whom he had spoken to, but the name Michael Quinn stood out. Leafing through Quinn’s published works did not prove helpful, but when the Tanners studied his 1973 University of Utah master’s thesis and his 1976 Yale doctoral dissertation, they detected similarities to Jerald and Sandra Tanner’s Distorted View of Mormonism.

The author of the booklet included Latin fallacy phrases such as post hoc ergo propter hoc (after this, therefore because of this). Who but Quinn, Jerald reasoned, would employ a phrase like that in a document purporting to be written to a layperson with questions? Quinn, Jerald noticed, had previously used post hoc ergo propter hoc in both his thesis and his dissertation. There were other similarities, such as footnotes containing the same references to the same sources in the same order in the booklet as in the thesis and the dissertation. Quinn’s work and the booklet quoted from a rare anti-Mormon manuscript in the Oliver H. Olney Papers in Yale University’s Beinecke Library where Quinn had worked on his doctorate.

By the time Jerald had finished working through Quinn’s master’s thesis, he felt sure he had enough evidence to get an admission from Quinn that he was the anonymous “Latter-day Saint Historian.” When he called and presented his evidence, Quinn emphatically denied that he had anything to do with the matter. It was this that had caused Jerald to work his way through Quinn’s doctoral dissertation as well, which only further solidified what he suspected.

Jerald finally confirmed the authorship when, digging through a drawer, he found his handwritten notes of the previous year’s conversation when he had first heard that a response was in the works. Quinn’s name had been mentioned. The conversation, according to the notes, had taken place almost a year to the day before the booklet was put on sale at Sam Weller’s Zion Bookstore. The notes, consisting of only a few words and phrases in Jerald’s scrawl, “confirmed that the author was ‘Michael Quinn[n],’ that the work was written ‘For [the] Historians Office,’” that “it was a ‘50 page paper,’” and that the Church ‘may not publish it.’” But it also included the name “David Mayfield” written in a box along with the line “had been done.” (see drawing below)

So Jerald picked up the phone and gave Mayfield a call, but apparently did not identify himself, or, if he did, Mayfield missed it. One of the first things he asked was if Mayfield had seen Quinn’s paper before it came out in the form of a booklet. Mayfield, apparently assuming he was speaking with someone at the LDS Church History Department, admitted that he had. But when he discovered it was Jerald he was talking to, he quickly backed away from his earlier statements. After hanging up, Jerald called Arrington and confronted him with Mayfield’s admission. Arrington recalls his response:

I vehemently denied that this was true, and had a considerable argument with him, completely denying everything. We got into a little bit of a shouting match. I then telephoned Dave, who said that Jerald had telephoned him and asked if he had seen a paper by Mike Quinn which was a response to the Tanners. He said he was “caught off guard,” and did admit he had seen such a paper. Pretty soon, Jerald Tanner telephoned me again and apologized for becoming angry with me for my denial. I re-denied the whole business again. Tanner said he was going to publish the complete story, and no doubt he will publish what he believes to be the true story. But he said he would publish that I denied it. I telephoned Mike Quinn to tell him this.13

After a conversation with Mayfield, Arrington told Jerald that Mayfield had said he had made a mistake and had been thinking about a different paper. When subsequently asked about this, Mayfield refused to say one way or the other. When Jerald confronted Quinn with what he now knew, Quinn no longer denied he had been the author, but adopted a neutral position that he would neither affirm nor deny being its author.

In the meantime Jerald had found the historical scholarship in Quinn’s dissertation to be excellent: “Although Dr. Quinn has almost nothing good to say about us,” Jerald wrote, “we feel that he is probably one of the best historians in the Mormon Church. His dissertation written for Yale University is a masterpiece.”14 But the quality of scholarship in the booklet was mixed, suggesting to Jerald that other scholars besides Quinn

12 Mayfield was an LDS Church employee who was later director of the Family History Department. The note, still in the Tanners’ papers, says that “someone phoned on Dec. 12, 1976.”

might be involved.15 “Since we do not think it fair to give Michael Quinn all the blame for this pamphlet,” Jerald wrote, “we have decided to christen the ‘author or authors’ as ‘DR. CLANDESTINE.’”16

The Tanners spent nearly half of their Answering Dr. Clandestine unmasking the author. The thing that made Distorted View of Mormonism interesting, after all, was not what it said, but its anonymity and the absurd carnivalesque series of events that accompanied its birth.

The two dueling publications, Clandestine’s on the one side and the Tanners’ on the other, provoked different responses. Chad Flake, director of Special Collections at BYU’s Harold B. Lee Library, understood the Tanners’ frustration. “Here’s a man who’s writing to evaluate the Tanners, yet he doesn’t have enough gumption to put his name on it. The credibility of the pamphlet, as far as I am concerned, is nil.”17 Non-Mormon historian Lawrence Foster, on the other hand, saw the Tanners’ preoccupation with the anonymous author as thin-skinned: “How could anyone who had unleashed the volume of invective that the Tanners have on the Mormons react with such outrage and seeming surprise to a generally fair, if critical, analysis of their own efforts?”18

But Foster got it wrong. Far from being motivated primarily by anger, Jerald was also energized by it, excited to engage it. If anything angered Jerald, it wasn’t the response. It was the subterfuge, the anonymity, the cloak and dagger. As Sandra recalls, “He would have been glad to see someone give a serious review of the issues, but why such a cowardly process? We were always in the phone book, put our name and address on everything. If the church was going to put out a rebuttal why not own their defense? It was like the anonymous phone calls we would receive telling us off.”19

Although convinced that Quinn had written at least a substantial portion of the booklet, the Tanners were in doubt over the extent of Arrington’s involvement. As it would turn out Arrington had to have known about the booklet before its release because he had sent a copy of an earlier draft to a friend along with a cover letter dated September 6, 1977, which eventually came into the Tanners’ hands.20

The Tanners probably didn’t need to write an entire book in response to Distorted View of Mormonism. A newsletter establishing its connection with the Church History Department would have probably sufficed, after which they could have watched the booklet sink under the burden of the problems it had created for itself: It was too honest. “We certainly do not believe that Apostle [Ezra Taft] Benson would approve of the rebuttal,” Jerald and Sandra wrote. “[I]t makes far too many admissions concerning historical problems in the Church.”21 Some LDS apostles were in fact at that moment taking steps to rein in Arrington and his department, which they felt had been too secular in their historical writing.22

In the process of making his case, the anonymous author admitted that Joseph Smith had a violent temper, drank alcohol after revealing the Word of Wisdom, took plural wives before the polygamy revelation, retroactively changed revelations, quoted from the King James Bible in the Book of Mormon, and was tried as a glass looker in 1826. The pamphlet argued that church leaders had the “limitations of all men” and might err in their teaching due to misunderstandings of scripture and history. It acknowledged that the LDS temple endowment may have borrowed from Freemasonry. It chided “many of our writers (including nearly all of our apologist-defenders)” on the ground that they “ignore or even deny the weaknesses, fallibility, and humanity of our prophets and apostles.” The author frankly acknowledged the issues surrounding the First Vision and embarked on a lengthy but idiosyncratic argument in support of its historicity.23

An anonymous historian refuting the Tanners by not only admitting that many of their criticisms against Smith and the church were true, but also challenging the veracity of the First Vision as recounted in the LDS canon, was not a strategy that was likely to warm the hearts of a majority of LDS Church leaders. Then to have the booklet traced directly to the LDS Church Historical Department within a month of its publication represented 15 But it also may reflect Quinn’s being stronger in some research areas than others.

a particularly bad bit of luck for Arrington, who was already sensing that his position as church historian was becoming increasingly untenable. On the same day Jerald called him to confront him over the booklet, Arrington recorded in his diary my job as Church Historian is an impossible assignment. Consider the following.

1. The anti-Mormons (Jerald and Sandra Tanner, Michael Marquardt, Wesley Walters, John W. Fitzgerald) seek to use every advantage to get information. If one is truthful and “open,” they destroy me by citing you, by declaring I permitted them access, by tripping me up on inconsistencies. They’re out to injure the Church by injuring me.
2. The highly orthodox, cautious people, such as Elders [Ezra Taft] Benson, [Mark E.] Petersen, and [Boyd K.] Packer, are alert for every misstep; they want to discredit me.
3. [Church employee] Tom Truitt (and also Lauritz Petersen at an earlier stage) is a spy for Elders Benson and Petersen. He reads everything I do or say that he can get his hands on, underlines statements which, out of context, will be objectionable to Elders Benson and Petersen, and sends these on to them.

I feel very despondent today, pessimistic about my future, feel that I do not have the support of the brethren, and also that I do not have the support of the fellow historians I have a right to expect support from. The Tanners published their twenty-two-page edition of Answering Dr. Clandestine in February 1978, less than two months after the booklet appeared. On February 24 Arrington was called into the office of his supervisor, G. Homer Durham, and informed that the First Presidency had decided to bring the Historical Department under its direct control, with Apostles Gordon B. Hinckley and Boyd K. Packer reporting to the presidency on the department’s actions. Arrington was also informed that he was no longer the official Church Historian, but would now be called Director of the History Division. Arrington was not to publicize this change in title.

LETTERS AND EMAILS

March 2022: I sent an email in the early 2000’s telling you how despicable I thought you were. I AM SORRY. You were always telling the truth. The church is so harmful. I can’t believe how brainwashed I was until recently. Keep up the GREAT work.

April 2022: Excerpt from a letter sent by an LDS customer who actually ordered a book:

“You people in your cult ministries, you’re really arrogant and haughty!! Why is it that you’re always right and every one else is wrong? You dismiss a God-Given testimony, giving it no credit or importance at all; then condemn the group or church the convert has just joined!! . . . You think you’re so right and you push your beliefs upon others. I, for one, cannot be pushed around like that. . . .”

BTW--she contacted us, we did not initiate contact with her.

June 2022: I am sure that Sandra isn’t reading this, but just in case, thanks for being the exact opposite of who I was taught you are Jerald were. You have heard it thousands of times, but I will forever be in your debt, thank you for everything. You guys kick ass.

June 2022: This was my second order from utlm as I have been more than grateful for Sandra and Gerald’s examples of truth, honesty, and integrity.

I saw Sandra on one of the episodes of Mormon Stories back in 2015 when I was having my “faith crisis” with the church and have loved and admired her since. Please give her the biggest hug from me and let her know that there are people in this world who love and value her more than she will ever know! I have appreciated her sacrifices to bring this truth to the world. My life has been incredibly blessed because of it.

June 2022: Thank you Sandra and your late husband Gerald for your years of hard work and perseverance to provide reliable materials and support to those who are investigating the Mormon church, usually from within the ranks. I, like many others, saw this book [Mormonism-Shadow or Reality?] on the series [Under the Banner of Heaven?] and I’m eager to read this publication too. I’ve read other books and work your ministry has done. I’m really excited to read this one too! Bless your whole ministry for what you are doing: working on distributing the truth!

July 2022: I recently got your book in the mail, ‘3,913 Changes in the Book of Mormon’. It’s been really eye opening! I am also a former Mormon. I was baptized into the LDS faith in June 2015, and left in September of 2016. I accepted Jesus as my Savior on September 9, 2016, and he is the only one I need. I’ve seen many of your interviews, on John Ankerberg, Mormon stories podcasts, and also a couple of documentaries on Mormonism. Your ministry has really helped me study the true history of the Mormon faith. Thanks for all you do Ms. Tanner!!

July 2022: We are still so appreciative and amazed that you came out and visited with us 4 years ago, just days after Christmas! What a wonderful and special honor it was to meet you. Thank you so for your 2 hours of time, for sharing your great knowledge, and for devoting your life to truth and to the gospel of our Savior. I sat across a table from you, where you lovingly explained so much that I never knew. Barbie and I praise God for your part in helping me come to a glorious place in my life; to be free and worshipping in a non-denominational church. We have found community and can rest in His Grace. Praise God for blessing you with His care, protection, and love. We certainly love you and pray for you always.

August 2022: I received my copy [of your biography] yesterday and have [read] the first 100 pages. So far I am loving this book. Some cool pictures too. Sandra is right, Jerald was a handsome young man. He looks like he’s fresh out of high school in that wedding picture. I want to say thanks for the extras you sent with it. Especially that copy of the Nauvoo Expositor. That was awesome and I appreciate it.

August 2022: Dear Sandra

I live in the UK … and about 2 months ago 2 LDS missionaries turned up at my doorstep. I did initially try to avoid them and kept avoiding them but did end of talking to them in the end and met 3 times and talked for about 10 hours in total.

Initially I was positively surprised (especially by one of them) and was impressed with their commitment and dedication to their mission. What they told me did not seem to deviate from standard Christianity all that much and for the first time I felt that God and Jesus became a bit more accessible to me through them and the Book of Mormon than before (I was raised by Roman Catholic and Serbian Orthodox grandparents).

However, I did also do my own research on the side as I am a naturally curious and skeptical character. It was when I went beyond the Book of Mormon and I came across Joseph Smith’s King Follett Sermon [http://mldb.byu.edu/follett.htm] I realized that Mormonism fundamentally differs from Christianity. Joseph Smith’s claims about the nature of God (and the Council of Gods) contradicts all descriptions of God in both Old and New Testaments of the Bible. In particular the claim that God created the world out of ‘chaotic matter, which is element, and in which dwells all the glory.’ God summoned the council of Gods and then came up with the plan to create the universe out of this chaotic [matter] that already existed. However, this raises the question: did its existence pre-date the existence of God? If so it raises the question who or what in turn created this matter and where does it come from? Joseph Smith also mentions that God was once a man like we are now in this mortal ‘Fall of Man’ world and then became God and this is something we all can achieve and aspire to. But this would mean that there must have been meta-Gods (or something like that) that existed before God and these created the world for him to prove himself in and then became God.

None of this is spelled out in the Sermon and these logical gaps remain. I wanted to ask you as you are much more familiar with LDS ideology than I am: is it just me and my lack of complete understanding or does this simply not make sense? (to anyone who actually tries to think it through).

When I asked the missionaries they shrugged shoulders and said they did not know. (As it’s not in the Book of Mormon and they generally don’t want to talk about anything that is not in this book.

I also cannot really buy into their claim that there has been a Great Apostasy and that priesthood authority was given to Joseph Smith by the Ghosts of John the Baptist, and Peter, James, and John and that the LDS Church is the only church on this earth that now has the authority to give the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands.

Their Celestial Kingdom also seems to have a very ‘manmade flavour’, it’s a re-combination of things that already exist on this earth, just like most of the things in the Book of Mormon that make sense are pinched from the Bible and are a pastiche of it.

They say that these things are true and that if I don’t believe them I need to pray more and read more of the Book of Mormon and eventually it will happen.

I assume you have heard stories like mine many times by now. But what is interesting is that these missionaries seem to have unlocked and revived my belief in God and Jesus and I have started to pray and read the Bible and the Holy Spirit is giving me wonderful insights and experiences that are bringing me closer to God (I was effectively an atheist before they turned up).

August 2022: Sandra, you were very instrumental in getting me out of the cult. Born again, God bless.

August 2022: Thank you so much for your ministry. I have been able to touch dozens and dozens of people’s lives with relative ease because of Gerald and Sandra’s decades’ long hard work. I am grateful for you and your team. Many blessings.

August 2022: I never thought I’d say this, but thank you so much for all of the hard work you & Jerald did researching the LDS church history.

I grew up thinking your “Anti-Mormon” literature was of the devil, but when I could no longer get answers from church sources & I needed to know the truth I realized your research told the truth. I’ve been out of the church for 1 1/2 yrs. & your ministry/bookstore was an important part of my journey. Thanks for spending time with my mom & me when we came to visit. You are a God-send to so many.

September 2022: I’ve told you before, but we will forever be grateful for what you did for us. The day after Thanksgiving or Christmas—the day after that holiday, about 7 years ago—I was through w/LDS religion, but my TBM husband was unsettled by the things I had told him. We dropped in to your bookstore, and you were THERE! The Lord provided the space, the time, and a bookstore free of other patrons, and you sat across your desk and with the gentle brilliance you possess, shared so much with him – for 2 hours! You planted a beautiful seed, and although it took several more years, [my husband] and I now rejoice in our new life in Christ and worship actively in a non-denominational church. I cannot imagine being happier in our new life. Thank you.

September 2022: If there ever was “A Marvelous Work and Wonder” it would have to be the Utah Lighthouse Ministry and all the work that Brother and Sister Tanner have done in bringing Light to a Darken Religion. With much love

October 2022: I’m sure you will be getting many of these ‘thank you cards’ over the next few months, but I wanted to be included with those saying thank you.

In 1975 I found myself in love with a boy from an LDS family who having completed a mission to France was now questioning Mormonism. We had many discussions and I even came to SLC to meet with you. I gave him [Mormonism] ‘Shadow or Reality’ to read.

It was that book that convinced him that Mormonism was an evil cult . . . He became a Christian & . . . he deeply loves & trusts the Lord now. We have [grown] children and grandchildren who all love & serve Jesus. . . . Thank you for being faithful, humble, honest & persevering through what I’m sure were hard times . . .

October 2022: I became a believer in 1974 but I was not strong in my doctrine when in 1977 (at age 25) I was being proselytized by a Mormon young lady at Columbus Air Force Base where I worked. Not having the answers to her allegations about 3 levels of heaven, a mother god, God once being a man, etc., I turned to a friend who put me onto the works of Dr. Walter Martin and he also provided me some of the resources he had obtained from you and Jerald. . . .

Your resources (along with Walter Martin’s books) provided me what I needed. Your research allowed me to respond to her accurately. This interaction with her actually began a life-long study of Mormonism (and the cults in general) that has strengthened my faith over the years and allowed me to address many, many other Mormons through the years . . . in confidence and truth.
While some may view Jerald and Sandra Tanner only as despised critics of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, it is impossible to trace the course of Mormon history over the past sixty years without acknowledging their contribution. Many both inside and outside of Mormonism respect them for their unflinching quest for truth no matter the cost, as when Jerald declared Mark Hofmann’s notorious Salamander Letter a forgery months before some experts declared it authentic. Their Utah Lighthouse Ministry has operated for decades only blocks from church headquarters, where their many works on Mormonism are still printed and sold. Jerald died in 2006 but Sandra continues to oversee the ministry.

The Tanners consistently challenged the church’s position on many historical issues. Utah Lighthouse was long the only source for Mormon scholars to obtain crucial historical reprints, which they still happily or begrudgingly purchase; for others, the Tanners’ writings have been the source of disillusionment with the church. Despised or beloved, the influence of Jerald and Sandra Tanner cannot be underestimated or ignored.

Reviews of Lighthouse: Jerald & Sandra Tanner

Lady in Utah: I just finished reading the biography. I read it in about 12 hours in a span of 24 hours. I have not read a book so quickly in years. It was a most excellent and captivating account of 2 people just being faithful to God’s leading. The detail was incredible. I was touched by your recount of dreaming of and talking to Jerald…. I am so blessed to know you.

Local pastor: I am writing both of you to say “thank you” for the sacrifices you have made for the cause of Christ. I have just finished the biography … I have recommended it to several. It is an excellent book, well written with stories beyond the pale of believability. Thank you for enduring the nonsense described and still love Jesus. “Great ships rarely see their own wake.” At least with this book you have, hopefully, been able to see enough of the wake of your lives to know a difference has been made, and a difference for the better. Thank you.

Gosh, I just finished the biographical account of Sandra and Jerald written by Huggins, and I never wanted it to end. It has to be one of the best books I’ve ever read, and trust me, I’m a very avid reader.

I “learned apologetics” from the Tanners, and I also believe that documentation is paramount.

I am the Administrator of [a Facebook page] designed to teach Christians about Mormonism. I’m not as kind and patient as the Tanners. My first concern has always been to protect the Body of Christ from Mormonism. But one thing I do try to accentuate is the need for documentation and references . . . to the point where I’m sure some of the posters get frustrated. But, hey, we can’t make claims that are unsubstantiated.

God bless Sandra. . . . I’m trying to prepare others to take over when I finally retire (and that could be sooner than later), and I hope they stress the need for documentation in everything.

Jerald was a model for us all - he attended to detail. He made no false accusations. I will let everybody on my site know about this wonderful book.

What a Wonderful Book!

I have run into Sandra Tanner when she was interviewed by John Dehlin. I am not a member of the LDS church but had a faith crisis that led me to change churches. I found listening to Sandra talk about her journey in faith to be reassuring and helpful.

I bought the book already having heard some of her and her husband’s stories. The book does not disappoint and provided me with more information about their ministry. As a writer myself, I love footnotes which were numerous and accurate. The narrative of Gerald’s decline was very touching.

Congrats on a book well written about lives well lived.

Fascinating Stories

This book will interest anyone who has been on a spiritual journey or gotten pushback when they have asked honest questions about the viewpoints of their family or regional culture. Jerald and Sandra Tanner questioned what they had been taught by their Mormon religion. This book documents their quest for truth and so much more. It is also an intriguing history of what it was like to live in a Mormon culture a few decades ago. The book also addresses other issues such as racism during this era. This story demonstrates that one couple’s courage can have a great impact that is still felt years later. It is inspiring. It establishes the Tanners deep roots in the culture that they questioned. The Mormon institution is more open about its teachings now days in part because of this couple. Also, the Kindle format is great. The footnotes are easy to read with a touch.

Warm and in-depth retelling of the Tanner’s story

I have long admired the Tanners for their writing about the significant problems in Mormon history and theology, and enjoyed this book that gave me more about their story and their personal lives. They are people with real integrity, something rare these days!
A Tanner Bibliography 1959–2022

A Tanner Bibliography 1959–2022 contains a list of publications written by Jerald and Sandra Tanner. It is compiled, as far as possible, in chronological order. The listing with title and short comment is based upon the format prepared by Robert R. Black in 1970. Jerald and Sandra first started publishing their works in a mimeograph format. They later used offset printing. The following publications are considered both of their writings and exceptions will have each name after the title. For a very short period they wrote papers while living in North Hollywood, California. All other publications were done in Salt Lake City, Utah. Sandra Tanner is listed as editor of the Salt Lake City Messenger commencing October 2003. Jerald Tanner died on October 1, 2006.

Not included in this bibliography are cassette tapes, videos, postings on web site, newspaper advertisements, introductions to reprinted publications, short handouts on various topics, and reprints of church periodicals. A few exceptions are listed. [Digital books are not included in this list. See http://www.utlm.org/booklist/digitalbooks.htm] “Ad” at the end of an entry means advertisement for the book by the Tanners and is included without quotation marks. All other notations are my own.
